35. If the required larger majority of deputies to the National Assembly is achieved during the reconsideration of a law following a suspensive veto, the law is adopted, but if such majority is not achieved, the law is not adopted. As soon as the suspensive veto has been exercised, it is no longer clear (as is the case before the “first” voting on the law) whether the required majority will be achieved and the law will be adopted or not. In the event that the suspensive veto is exercised, the law would have to be adopted during the repeated, i.e. “second”, vote in order for it to be deemed to have been adopted by the National Assembly. If one takes both the wording of Article 21 of the RPIA and the definition of a subsequent legislative referendum into account, the only possible interpretation is that, in the event that a suspensive veto has been exercised by the National Council and the National Assembly has adopted the law during the reconsideration procedure, the period for submitting an initiative or request to call a referendum referred to in Article 21 of the RPIA begins to run as of the day on which the law is adopted during its reconsideration by the National Assembly following the suspensive veto. In this context, the Constitutional Court did not review whether any other statutory regulation of this issue in the RPIA would be consistent with the Constitution as this was not the subject matter of these proceedings. The Constitutional Court has therefore not taken a position as to which statutory implementation of the constitutional right to a referendum by the RPIA (including the provision regulating the time limit for submitting an initiative or request [to call a referendum]) would be consistent with the Constitution, but has only found that, given the applicable statutory implementation of this right in the RPIA, only the above-mentioned interpretation is acceptable. In this context, the Constitutional Court states that the RPIA does not specifically regulate the situation wherein the suspensive veto was exercised by the National Council and the National Assembly adopts the law during the reconsideration procedure, and it does not regulate the issue of when, in the event of such, the time limit for submitting an initiative or request to call a referendum begins to run; in such a situation (i.e. where this issue is not specifically regulated in the RPIA), the statutory implementation of the constitutional right to a referendum cannot be interpreted restrictively, but only in favour of exercising the right to a referendum, and in the event of doubt, a decision must be reached in favour of those who submitted an initiative or request to call a referendum.
36. The purpose of a subsequent legislative referendum is that the electorate either confirms or rejects a specific law that has been adopted by the National Assembly, and for which it is clear that it would have entered into force if there had not been a referendum. In a subsequent legislative referendum, the electorate does not decide on a law for which it is not yet clear whether it will be adopted. This is the principal characteristic of a preliminary referendum. If we accepted the interpretation that an initiative or request to call a subsequent legislative referendum must in any case be submitted within seven days of the first adoption of the law, this would entail that such an initiative or request would, in the event that a suspensive veto were exercised within the same time limit, lose its meaning since the initiative for a subsequent legislative referendum would be “transformed” into an initiative for a preliminary referendum, because it would refer to a law which the National Assembly had yet to decide on, i.e. a law for which it is not yet known whether it will be adopted by the National Assembly. It is true that, after the suspensive veto has been exercised, the National Assembly may only adopt the law as a whole, with the wording unchanged, and thus the electorate and the authorised referendum initiators may become familiarised with the substance of the law to be adopted. The electorate is therefore aware of the issue covered by the law but, and this is of crucial importance, it does not know whether or not such law will be adopted.

37. The interpretation that the time limit for submitting an initiative or request to call a subsequent legislative referendum begins to run as of the “first” adoption by the National Assembly, even if the suspensive veto has been exercised, is also not acceptable in terms of the Constitution due to the constitutionally defined position of the National Council. As regards the legislative procedure, the National Council has two institutions at its disposal through which it may intervene in the procedure for the adoption of a law: the suspensive veto and the legislative referendum. It is not possible to agree with the National Assembly’s position that the National Council must make use of both institutions in the same seven-day time limit after the “first” adoption of the law. The Constitution does not provide a basis for such a position. There is no constitutional or statutory provision that requires the National Council to choose between the two institutions. If the National Council first exercises the suspensive veto as a milder means and is not successful (i.e. the National Assembly does not change its decision during the reconsideration procedure, and adopts the law with the required larger majority), the National Council must have the opportunity to lodge a request to call a referendum as a more serious means to challenge the decision of the National Assembly if it disagrees with the adopted law.<sup>4</sup> This does not, however, entail that the National Council could not immediately avail itself of the possibility of a subsequent legislative referendum without previously having exercised its suspensive veto. The decision as to whether the National Council uses either or both instruments in order to intervene in the legislative procedure in the broader sense must depend entirely on the National Council itself. In order for the expression “after the adoption of the law” in Article 21 of the RPIA to be consistent with the Constitution, it must be interpreted in the sense that, if a suspensive veto has been exercised, the law may only be deemed to have been adopted if it was adopted after its reconsideration in the National Assembly, which means that the period for submitting an initiative or request to call a referendum referred to in Article 21 of the RPIA begins to run upon the adoption of the law after its reconsideration in the National Assembly. The interpretation and application of this provision regarding the starting point of the time limit in question may not differ for specific authorised referendum initiators and must apply equally to all of them.

38. The third paragraph of Article 292 of the RPNA, which stipulates that if the suspensive veto has been exercised and the law has been adopted during the repeated voting, such law shall be immediately sent for promulgation, is inconsistent with the Constitution, since it allows for the law to be sent for promulgation before the expiry of the time limit for submitting an initiative or request to call a referendum referred to in Article 21 of the RPIA, i.e. prior to it becoming clear whether the law will be confirmed. For this reason, the Constitutional Court abrogated this provision. The provision of Article 292 of the RPNA is included in the chapter titled “The Relations of the National Assembly towards the President of the Republic”. It is, however, the same situation mutatis mutandis as that referred to in the second paragraph of Article 254. Therefore, the reasons for abrogating the provision of the third paragraph of Article 292 of the RPNA are mutatis mutandis equal to those referred to in Paragraph 30 of this reasoning. The situation following the abrogation of the said provision must be considered mutatis mutandis in the same way as explained in Paragraph 31 of this reasoning.
39. This also entails that, taking into account the applicable regulation of the legislative referendum in the RPIA as a statutory implementation of the constitutional right to a referendum, an initiative or request to call a referendum must in any event (if the law has been adopted, in a regular, fast-track, or shortened procedure, during the “first” voting of the National Assembly, and the veto has not been exercised, or the veto has been exercised and the law has been adopted after its reconsideration) be submitted within seven days of the adoption of the law: if the suspensive veto has not been exercised, within seven days of the “first” adoption of the law, and if the suspensive veto has been exercised, within seven days after the “second” adoption of the law by the National Assembly. It is not true that such an interpretation puts the authorised referendum initiators in an unequal position, depending on whether or not the National Council has exercised a veto on a specific law. The time limit of seven days following the adoption of the law applies in both cases. If an initiative or request for a referendum is submitted after the “first” adoption of the law, and then a suspensive veto is also exercised in due time, the initiative or request for a referendum becomes irrelevant, since the National Assembly must decide again on the law in question and it is unclear until that point as to whether or not the law will be adopted. It is only after the law has been adopted during the reconsideration procedure that the authorised initiators may submit an initiative or request [to call a referendum]. It is their own choice as to whether or not they will submit (again) such an initiative or request. A different interpretation of the provisions on the starting point of the time limit would bring the subsequent legislative referendum (which is optional) close to a mandatory referendum, which is not provided for by the applicable regulation of referenda in the RPIA (as an enactment of the constitutional provisions regarding referenda and participation in the management of public affairs), since such would entail that it is certain prior to the adoption of the law in the National Assembly that, if the law is adopted, a referendum on this law will be held. The provision of Article 20 of the RPIA, which provides that when adopting a law the National Assembly itself may decide to call a referendum, does not also entail that the National Assembly is bound by such decision, which was adopted during the “first” adoption of the law, in the event that a suspensive veto has subsequently been exercised with regard to the law; similarly as the [first] adoption of the law, such prior decision to call a referendum becomes irrelevant; if it intends to call a referendum, the National Assembly will (again) be required to adopt a decision thereon after the adoption of the law on the basis of the suspensive veto.

40. The Constitutional Court further deems that the National Assembly’s claim that all the statutorily determined initiators also had the opportunity to initiate a preliminary referendum, but failed to do so, is irrelevant in the case at issue because the preliminary referendum and the subsequent referendum are two independent institutions, and thus the efficient implementation of each must be ensured (taking into account that they were determined by the legislature as the manner in which the constitutional right referred to in Articles 90 and 44 of the Constitution is to be exercised), without the subsequent legislative referendum being conditional upon whether or not the possibility of a preliminary referendum was also used.

B – VII

41. As the Constitutional Court abrogated the provisions of the second paragraph of Article 254 and the third paragraph of Article 292 of the RPNA, it also abrogated the part of the second sentence of the second paragraph of Article 292 of the RPNA that refers to the two aforementioned provisions of the RPNA and is devoid of meaning without the aforementioned provisions of the RPNA. More specifically, this provision does not regulate any independent issue but only constitutes a part of the purely technical formulation of the legal regime determined by the third paragraph of Article 292 and the second paragraph of Article 254 of the RPNA. In this context, the Constitutional Court refers to the reasoning provided in Paragraph 31 that the provision requiring that a law be sent for promulgation on the eighth day following its adoption must be interpreted in accordance with the Constitution, taking into account both the first paragraph of Article 91 of the Constitution and all the constitutionally guaranteed legal positions of specific subjects entitled to participate in the law-making process.

B – VIII

42. The Constitutional Court also reviewed the constitutionality of the procedure for the adoption of the ATDFSEU. The Constitutional Court acknowledged the petitioner’s legal interest for the review of the constitutionality of the procedure for the adoption of a specific law, irrespective of whether or not it demonstrated legal interest to challenge the aforementioned regulation in terms of its substance. The Constitutional Court considered that the legal interest to challenge a regulation through the constitutional review of its adoption is demonstrated by the party claiming that one of its constitutional rights was violated during that procedure. Such is the case here. More specifically, the petitioner claims that during the procedure for the adoption of the ATDFSEU it was prevented from effectively exercising the right to submit an initiative to call a subsequent legislative referendum, which is guaranteed by Article 90 in conjunction with Article 44 of the Constitution, in the manner provided by the RPIA on the basis of Article 90 of the Constitution.

43. There is no dispute between the parties with regard to the facts relating to how the procedure for the adoption and entry into force of this law was carried out or the order in which specific actions occurred. The ATDFSEU was adopted by the National Assembly on 31 January 2001. On 7 February 2001, the law at issue was considered by the National Council, which adopted a decision requiring the National Assembly to decide again on the law; this decision was submitted to the President of the National Assembly on the same day. Such entails that the National Council exercised its suspensive veto. On 21 February 2001, the National Assembly again decided on the ATDFSEU and adopted it with the required larger majority. On 22 February 2001, the ATDFSEU was sent to the President of the Republic for promulgation and was promulgated on the same day; on 28 February 2001, the ATDFSEU was published in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia. On 28 February 2001, Nova stranka (the petitioner in the case at issue) submitted an initiative for the voters to lodge a request to call a subsequent legislative referendum on the ATDFSEU. By Act of the President of the National Assembly No. 005-02/97-8/8, dated 2 March 2001, its initiative to call the referendum was rejected. Nova stranka brought an action before the Administrative Court against not only the order for the promulgation and publication of the ATDFSEU but also the Act of the President of the National Assembly, by which its initiative was rejected. The Administrative Court rejected the first action and dismissed the second one. Nova stranka lodged two appeals against the two Administrative Court decisions, upon which the Supreme Court has yet to decide.
44. The Constitutional Court finds that the ATDFSEU was sent for promulgation and publication immediately after it had been adopted following its reconsideration by the National Assembly due to the suspensive veto being exercised. The law was therefore sent for promulgation and publication prior to the expiry of the time limit for submitting an initiative or request to call a subsequent legislative referendum referred to in Article 21 of the RPIA. The Constitutional Court abrogated the provision of the third paragraph of Article 292 of the RPNA, which included this rule, as it found that it was inconsistent with the Constitution. Since the Constitutional Court abrogated the said provision of the RPNA, while reviewing the constitutionality of the procedure for the adoption of this specific law, i.e. the ATDFSEU, it found that this law had not been promulgated and published in accordance with the Constitution and that, accordingly, the law had not entered into force and may not be applied, and it substantiated this finding on the same grounds on which the aforementioned abstract rule had been abrogated and which are stated in Paragraphs 32 to 40 of this reasoning.

45. The Constitutional Court has the power to review the constitutionality of laws (the first indent of the first paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution and the first indent of the first paragraph of Article 21 of the CCA) and, pursuant to the third paragraph of Article 21 of the CCA, it also has the power to review the constitutionality of the procedures by which these acts were adopted. The case at issue, where the Constitutional Court only reviews the constitutionality of the procedure for the adoption of a law, is specific because the law itself is not being challenged and therefore the constitutionality of its substance is not being reviewed.
46. The Constitutional Court emphasises that it did not review the constitutionality of the substance of the ATDFSEU in these proceedings. The Court did find, however, that during the procedure for the adoption of this law in the broader sense of the word, i.e. while it was being made, the constitutionally guaranteed position of the electorate or the initiator of a referendum with regard to the exercise of their constitutionally enshrined rights regarding a referendum as a way for voters to directly participate in the management of public affairs had been violated. This violation was a result of the fact that the ATDFSEU had been sent for promulgation and publication prior to the expiry of the time limit for submitting an initiative or request to call a subsequent legislative referendum.
47. The Constitutional Court furthermore emphasises that, in these proceedings, it neither reviewed nor decided on the question of whether the initiative to call a referendum submitted by Nova stranka on 28 February 2001 had met all the formal and substantive requirements determined by the RPIA, which must be fulfilled in order for the submitted initiative to call a referendum to be considered, the time limit for the collection of the voters' signatures to be set, and a referendum to be called in the event that a request of 40,000 voters is lodged. The President of the National Assembly decides on this issue and his decision is an individual act which is subject to judicial control in proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts and, after all legal remedies have been exhausted and under the conditions determined in the CCA, it may also be subject to constitutional judicial control in the context of the constitutional complaint (a similar decision was adopted, for example, in the orders of the Constitutional Court Nos. U-I-346/98-9, dated 26 October 2000, OdlUS IX, 255, and Up-70/01, dated 27 March 2001). However, initiators of a subsequent legislative referendum cannot exercise their right to a subsequent legislative referendum, including eventual judicial protection, if the National Assembly sends a law for promulgation and publication prior to the expiry of the time limit for submitting an initiative or request to call a referendum. In such instances, the persons entitled to initiate a subsequent legislative referendum can also not obtain effective protection in proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts initiated due to violations relating to the initiative or request to call a referendum by applying the provisions of the second paragraph of Article 69 of the Judicial Review of Administrative Acts Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 50/97, etc.). Only the Constitutional Court may interfere with a law, which is a general legal act.

48. Pursuant to the first paragraph of Article 161 of the Constitution and Article 43 of the CCA, the Constitutional Court may abrogate any law which is unconstitutional. This also applies in the event that the unconstitutionality of a law is the result of a violation of the Constitution during the procedure for the adoption of such a law. However, in the case at issue an abrogation of the law would not be a necessary or proportionate sanction and it would not be in accordance with the purpose for which constitutional judicial protection was sought. The Constitutional Court finds that, in the case at issue, no allegation was made that the Constitution had been violated during the law-making process prior to the law's adoption by the National Assembly. The violation occurred with regard to the exercise of the right to a referendum during the period before the expiry of the time limit for submitting an initiative or request to call a referendum because the law had been sent for promulgation and publication prior to the expiry of the time limit for submitting an initiative or request. To abrogate the law in such a case (which would entail that, in order to adopt this law, the legislature must carry out the entire legislative procedure from the beginning, starting with the draft law, i.e. including those stages in the procedure where no violation of the Constitution was established) would therefore entail a disproportionate interference with the legislative procedure, given the principle of the separation of powers referred to in Article 3 of the Constitution. Furthermore, by abrogating the law, the petitioner's intention would not be achieved, i.e. to ensure the effective exercise of the right to a referendum; in the case at issue this entails that, provided that all the prescribed conditions are or will be met, a subsequent legislative referendum on the ATDFSEU is to be called and conducted, in which the electorate will be able to directly decide on whether the law adopted by the legislature should be confirmed or rejected.
49. The Constitutional Court imposed the sanction determined by Point 2 of the operative provisions of this Decision on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA. If the Constitutional Court may abrogate a law, by applying an a maiori ad minus interpretation, it may also impose a milder sanction if such is more appropriate (a similar decision was reached, for example, in Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-114/95, dated 7 December 1995, Official Gazette RS, No. 8/96, and OdlUS IV, 120). The Constitutional Court's decision that the ATDFSEU had not been promulgated and published in accordance with the Constitution and that, accordingly, it had not entered into force and may not be applied in fact abrogated that part of the ATDFSEU drafting process in which the violation of the petitioner's constitutionally protected rights occurred and restored the situation to what it had been before the promulgation and publication of the law. In the past, the Constitutional Court imposed a similar sanction in a similar case which also related to the exercise of the right to subsequent legislative referendum (Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-84/99, dated 6 July 2000, Official Gazette RS, No. 66/2000, and OdlUS IX, 190).
50. Since the suspension of the implementation of the ATDFSEU and this Decision of the Constitutional Court resulted in a very specific situation, the Constitutional Court, on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA, also determined the manner in which this Decision is to be implemented. By stipulating the manner of implementation, the Constitutional Court avoided the dilemmas which could have arisen owing to this Decision and the suspension of the implementation of the ATDFSEU, particularly those regarding the starting point of different time limits. In this context, the Constitutional Court took particular account of the fact that the legislature itself can no longer adapt the substance of the law to the new circumstances, which have arisen due to the suspension of the law and the passing of time. The Constitutional Court notes that its powers are limited, and that its options are restricted as a result; therefore, adhering to the principle of the separation of powers, the Constitutional Court only intervened where necessary (where the suspension of the law would cause an untenable situation, leading to the unconstitutionality or infeasibility of the regulation concerned) and only to the extent required. The way in which implementation is determined is therefore not necessarily optimal; however, the Constitutional Court's room for manoeuvre in determining the manner of implementation is not and may not be the same as that of the legislature when regulating legal relations. The specific and problematic nature of the situation which may have arisen if the ATDFSEU had entered into force is also a result of how the legislature acted during the procedure for the adoption of the ATDFSEU and, in particular, owing to the incomplete and inadequate statutory regulation of referenda.

51. The finding that the law had not entered into force entails that no legal consequences could have arisen on the basis thereof, and so any declaratory decision which may have been issued on the basis of Article 16 of the ATDFSEU is therefore non-existing. Restoration of the position to what it had been prior to the promulgation and publication of the law, in the case at issue the ATDFSEU, means that the procedure regarding the referendum pursuant to the Constitution and the RPIA, which entails a constitutional "impediment" to the promulgation, publication, and entry into force of the ATDFSEU, can (and must) be carried out and concluded. Thus far no final decision has been issued regarding the initiative of Nova stranka for the voters to lodge a request to call a referendum on the ATDFSEU. Any further developments will be dependent on such decision. If Article 273 of the General Administrative Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 80/99, etc.) is applied mutatis mutandis, then the President of the National Assembly may, prior to the conclusion of the proceedings for judicial review of administrative acts, change his decision and uphold the initiative of Nova stranka submitted on 28 February 2001 to lodge a voters' request to call a subsequent legislative referendum on the ATDFSEU.
52. If in deciding on the initiative of Nova stranka it becomes evident that, even despite the fact that the time limit for submitting an initiative began to run from the moment the law has been adopted after its reconsideration by the National Assembly as a result of the suspensive veto, the initiative fails to meet all the formal and substantive requirements determined in the RPIA, then there will exist no further impediments to the promulgation, publication, and entry into force of the ATDFSEU. If it is demonstrated that the initiative meets all the prescribed requirements, the time limit for collecting signatures must be set. Owing to the aforementioned specific situation in the case at issue, the thirty-day period referred to in Article 21 of the RPIA, which commenced upon the adoption of the ATDFSEU by the National Assembly, has already expired; therefore, taking into account the meaning of the provision of the second paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA, the Constitutional Court has determined the manner in which this Decision is to be implemented, i.e. in the event that such situation arises, the thirty-day period for collecting signatures must be set so that it will begin to run as of the service of the decision regarding the initiative. If no request to call a referendum is lodged by 40,000 voters within this period, such entails that there are no impediments to the promulgation, publication, and entry into force of the ATDFSEU. If such a request is lodged by the voters in accordance with the RPIA, a referendum will have to be called and conducted pursuant to the RPIA. If the ATDFSEU is confirmed in the referendum, there will be no further impediments to its promulgation, publication, and entry into force.

53. In all the aforementioned cases where there are no impediments to the entry into force of the ATDFSEU, the law will be sent for promulgation and publication and all the legal effects resulting therefrom will arise. Pursuant to the general rule referred to in the first paragraph of Article 154 of the Constitution and taking into account the provision of Article 20 of the ATDFSEU which determines when this act will enter into force, the ATDFSEU will enter into force on the fifteenth day following its publication. The ATDFSEU sets several time limits as fixed dates. Of central importance is the setting of the time limit in which the currently applicable regime governing duty-free shops ceases to apply (31 May 2001) and the new regime governing duty-free shops enters into force (1 June 2001); all the other time limits depend on these two. By its Order No. U-I-104/01, dated 28 May 2001, the Constitutional Court suspended the implementation of the ATDFSEU, thereby preventing this time limit from expiring and the consequences that would have resulted therefrom from occurring. By issuing this Decision, the effects of the interim suspension will cease and thus the Constitutional Court, taking into account both the provision of Article 155 of the Constitution and the intention of the legislature (whose intention was not a retroactive effect of the law), has determined as a manner of implementation of this Decision how the time limits determined by the ATDFSEU are to run. The Constitutional Court emphasises that it did not undertake a substantive assessment of the regulation of time limits in the ATDFSEU, but has only postponed the expiry of the time limits determined by the legislature. The time limits in the ATDFSEU, which are set as fixed dates, shall expire as follows: - the time limit set as 1 May 2001 shall expire on the 10th day following the entry into force of the law; - the time limit set as 31 May 2001 shall expire on the 30th day following the day referred to in the first indent; - the time limit set as 1 June 2001 shall expire on the day following the day referred to in the second indent; - the time limit set as 31 July 2001 shall expire two months after the day referred to in the second indent; - the time period set as 31 August 2001 shall expire three months after the day referred to in the second indent.
54. Although this Decision will be published pursuant to Article 42 of the CCA in order for everyone to be able to familiarise themselves therewith, due to the principle of legal certainty (as one of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law referred to in Article 2 of the Constitution) the Constitutional Court has nevertheless determined that this Decision shall be implemented as follows: if the ATDFSEU is published, a copy of part of this Decision, i.e. its operative provisions and points 50 to 55 of its reasoning, shall be published below the law in the same volume of the Official Gazette.

55. On the grounds that dictated that this case be considered as a priority case in the proceedings before the Constitutional Court, the Constitutional Court made the effects of its Decision dependent on its service on the National Assembly, and not on its publication in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia (Article 43 of the CCA).

C

56. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision pursuant to the third paragraph of Article 21, Articles 30, 40, and 43 of the CCA, and the sixth indent of Article 52 of the Rules of Procedure of the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Slovenia (Official Gazette RS, No. 49/98), composed of: Franc Testen, President, and Judges Dr Janez Čebulj, Dr Zvonko Fišer, Lojze Janko, Milojka Modrijan, Dr Ciril Ribičič, Dr Mirjam Škrk, Dr Lojze Ude, and Dr Dragica Wedam-Lukić. Point 1 was adopted by seven votes against two; Judges Fišer and Škrk voted against. Judge Fišer announced a dissenting opinion. Points 2 and 3 were adopted by six votes against three; Judges Fišer, Modrijan, and Škrk voted against and announced dissenting opinions. Point 4 was adopted unanimously.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE DR FIŠER

1. Hereinafter I shall briefly elaborate on the reasons that led me to vote against Points 1 to 3 of the [operative provisions of the] Decision in the case at issue (the abrogation of specific provisions of the RPNA, and the decision that the ATDFSEU was not promulgated and published in accordance with the Constitution, and therefore had not entered into force and must not be applied). My view of the entire case does not concern the decision as such, but perhaps more the (indirect) message it may convey. Although Point 4 of the [operative provisions of the] Decision (which provides that the Decision will enter into force on the day following its service on the National Assembly) was not, in my opinion, disputable, it is by no means irrelevant.
2. I have already stated in my dissenting opinion dated 11 June 2001 to the Order, under the same reference number, dated 28 May 2001, by which the Constitutional Court decided to initiate proceedings in order to establish whether specific provisions of the RPNA and the ATDFSEU were unconstitutional, that I do not agree with the Court initiating these proceedings regarding the act in question since, in my opinion, the petitioner lacks legal interest for such. There is nothing to add here, and I refer to the aforementioned opinion only to the extent that this is still necessary. A logical consequence of the aforementioned opinion is that I was unable to uphold Point 2 of the [operative provisions] of this Decision.

3. I agree with the initial finding that the provisions of the RPNA that should regulate the situation (or rather: situations, and this is quite different) that arises in the event that the National Assembly has passed (“adopted”) a law but there exists the possibility of exercising a veto or submitting an initiative or request to call a referendum are not only inappropriate and unclear but, most notably, incomplete. However, this does not entail that based on the interpretation supported by the majority in the Decision these provisions are unconstitutional.

This interpretation is based on the position that the provisions of the RPNA must be interpreted in a manner that opens the door as widely as possible to (potential) subsequent interferences with the adopted decision of the National Assembly (I am referring, in particular, to referenda since a veto has not been directly considered in the case at issue). This interpretation of a referendum as an expression of the popular sovereignty par excellence was intended to be Constitution-friendly. I cannot agree that this is the case.

I believe that without good reason such position fails to observe the relation between the rule and the exception. The legislative procedure follows its usual, regular course which is concluded by the adoption of the law in the National Assembly, its promulgation and publication; there is no need for me to describe it in more detail here. This procedure is the rule applicable to the vast majority of cases. Only in specific cases and under precisely defined conditions, i.e. in exceptional circumstances, may it be interrupted by a suspensive veto of the National Council and various requests or initiatives to call a referendum. It is inadmissible to treat the rule and the exception equally, let alone accord the exception preferential treatment.

In the past, a practice was established in the National Assembly with regard to how requests or initiatives to call a referendum should be treated, especially those called at the request of at least forty thousand voters. The aforementioned practice may have not been ideal (this is, of course, a euphemism, as this practice actually caused a number of disputes, several of which were eventually brought before the Constitutional Court) and could be improved. Despite such it was, in my opinion, acceptable in that it observed the proper relation between the rule and the exception. Through this practice, stability and predictability were introduced into the nonideal system, which is why it is not possible to consider this practice to be unconstitutional.

4. By opening and emphasising the possibilities for intervening in the legislative procedure, which is only possible after the National Assembly voted on a law, the structure of this procedure is being changed. Already at the time of discussing the veto, which may be exercised by the National Council, the interpretation was rejected that would lead to a situation in which such further decision-making would entail a kind of a fourth stage in the legislative procedure. However, this risk is not, by any means, the only one: to open the doors widely to interferences with a previously adopted law through decision-making in a referendum could have similar consequences. The decision, with which I cannot agree, has given rise to almost unimaginable possibilities of new ways to interfere with an adopted law, which have the potential to make the situation completely unclear and difficult to manage.

It is not beneficial to the work of parliament if its attention, which should be focused mainly on the stages of making a law, the work in parliamentary bodies, and discussions and decision-making processes regarding laws in the regular legislative procedure, is directed towards the possibilities available to affect the adopted decision in extremis. A referendum is a blunt instrument that either confirms or annuls a matter in its entirety, but it cannot make any changes to its substance, whereas the parliamentary decision-making process must be a creative process with a keen sense for nuanced distinctions where required.

5. The legislative procedure becomes even more complex and lengthy because of the possibility that a referendum may interfere greatly with a law that has already been passed by the National Assembly. In the event of such, it is necessary to consider the rational limits of such interferences. It is beyond doubt that the legislative procedure is vital and that it must not only be clearly defined but also appropriately structured in order to allow various ideas, doubts, and concerns as well as principled objections by the opposition to be expressed. Ultimately, however, a decision must be reached and if the procedure leading to such a decision is too complicated, parliament becomes inefficient and its fundamental function (adopting regulations) is jeopardised.
  6. Referenda have an important and prominent position in our legal system; however, their significance must not be exaggerated or even absolutised. This is even more true if we are aware of the fact that the regulation of the referendum is subject to numerous criticisms. It is difficult, in my view, to accept that the signatures of as many as two hundred voters are sufficient to submit an initiative for collecting signatures to call a referendum. Simply by providing notification of his or her intention on time, the initiator can delay the entry into force of a law for a considerable length of time. Furthermore, it is a fact that no issue is excluded a priori from the possibility of being decided upon in a referendum, which is clearly excessive and, for a modern state that seeks (and demands) efficiency, verging on the suicidal. I also believe that there would be nothing wrong with determining a quorum of voters that must participate in the referendum in order for the referendum decision to be valid, or determining a majority by which a referendum can be passed. In short, the regulation of decision-making in referenda currently in force does not include the absolutely necessary precautionary measures required to prevent referenda from being used speculatively. Last, but not least, the Constitutional Court has also played its part in the referendum controversy (not always appropriately) in the past.
- Taking all of the above into account, I would not be surprised if new ideas emerged according to which the referendum might instead be used as a means to interrupt and impede the legislative decision-making process or as a further way in which to exert pressure on the legislature, and not as an institution for expressing the genuine will of the people. I do not want such ideas to form through references, albeit indirectly, to a decision of the Constitutional Court.

Although it might at first sight appear that the importance and power of referenda increase by having a broad possibility to use them, this is not in fact the case. In fact, the institution of referenda will lose credibility with each case where serious doubts arise as to whether a referendum has been proposed or used in order for voters to decide on a matter or merely to exert pressure on the legislature and obstruct it by threatening to hold a referendum or pursue any other further stage in the procedure concerned.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE MODRIJAN

I voted against Points 2 and 3 of the operative provisions of the Decision as I believe that, in this particular case, the petitioner failed to demonstrate legal interest for challenging the Act Regulating the Transformation of Duty-Free Shops at Road Border Crossings with Member States of the European Communities, Acting within the Framework of the European Union, into Border Shops, and the Special Supervisory Measures Relating to these Shops (ATDFSEU). In its petition, the petitioner claims that the procedure for the passing of the ATDFSEU was inconsistent with the Constitution and the RPIA because its initiative to call a subsequent legislative referendum had been rejected by Act of the President of the National Assembly No. 005-02/97-8/8, dated 2 March 2001. The petitioner disagrees with the decision that its initiative to call a referendum was not submitted in good time. It believes that, in the event that the National Council requires the National Assembly to decide again on a law (i.e. by exercising the suspensive veto), the seven-day period referred to in Article 21 of the RPIA begins to run from the date on which the National Assembly decides again on the law and not from the date on which the law is "first" adopted by the National Assembly. Since the aforementioned act of the President of the National Assembly removed the possibility of holding a subsequent legislative referendum on the ATDFSEU, for which the initiative was submitted, the procedure for the passing of the ATDFSEU was contrary to the Constitution and the RPIA.

In the case at issue the petitioner actually challenges the Act of the President of the National Assembly that is an individual act. Individual legal acts are only reviewed by the Constitutional Court in the special constitutional complaint procedure. In its Order No. U-I-346/98-9, dated 26 October 2000, the Constitutional Court adopted the position that a decision of the President of the National Assembly is an individual act and must be served on the person who submitted the initiative for voters to request the calling of a referendum. The initiator is guaranteed judicial protection in proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts. If the initiator believes that, by adopting such a decision, the President of the National Assembly has violated the law or even interfered with the initiator's constitutional rights, it can therefore initiate the appropriate proceedings before the competent administrative court. The person who initiated the appropriate proceedings may also propose that the court suspend the implementation of the challenged act or order that the legislative procedure be suspended until the court decision has been issued. Only after the legal remedies have been exhausted may the initiator file a constitutional complaint pursuant to Article 50 of the CCA. This provides the person who submitted an initiative for voters to request the calling of a referendum with the appropriate judicial protection. Only if in the aforementioned procedures it becomes evident that, by issuing a decision, the President of the National Assembly has violated the law or the constitutional rights of the initiator would the latter be allowed to lodge a petition to review the constitutionality of the legislative procedure for the adoption of the law, the individual aspects of which were the subject of the initiative or request to call a referendum.

Given the aforementioned Order of the Constitutional Court (which was actually adopted with regard to an initiative for voters to call a preliminary legislative referendum, although this does not change the situation), in the case at issue I advocated a rejection of the petition. The petitioner initiated proceedings for judicial review of administrative acts that were still pending and it could have filed a constitutional complaint after all legal remedies would have been exhausted. If it became evident in such proceedings that the President of the National Assembly violated a constitutional right, the petitioner could lodge a petition to review the constitutionality of the legislative procedure for the adoption of the ATDFSEU as has already been stated in the aforementioned Order of the Constitutional Court.

It is true that, in terms of the substance of the ATDFSEU, judicial protection in proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts would be an ineffective legal remedy after the ATDFSEU enters into force; however, this question is irrelevant in the case at issue. The petitioner did not comply with the applicable RPIA in that it failed to submit an initiative for voters to call a subsequent legislative referendum within the prescribed seven-day period after the “first” adoption of the ATDFSEU. A suspensive veto and an initiative to call a referendum are two different institutions which, in my view, are independent of each other and must be lodged within seven days after the adoption of a law. If the National Council exercises its suspensive veto, it might be possible that the time limit for submitting the initiative to call a referendum would be interrupted (the law does not regulate such a situation) and then it would continue to run or begin to run anew, but only after the National Assembly would have adopted the ATDFSEU by an absolute majority in the repeated vote. If such were the case and the President of the National Assembly had sent the ATDFSEU for promulgation and publication before the decision on the initiative to the voters to call a referendum had become final, I would not have had any doubts regarding the existence of the petitioner’s legal interest prior to the exhaustion of judicial protection. In the case at issue, however, the National Council exercised its suspensive veto on the seventh (last) day after the “first” adoption of the ATDFSEU, whilst the petitioner failed to simultaneously submit the initiative to the voters. If the National Council had not lodged its veto, the petitioner would have missed the statutory time limit and not have been able to lodge the initiative to the voters (not even if this Decision of the Constitutional Court had already entered into force). Therefore, I believe that the Constitutional Court should not have recognised the petitioner's legal interest to challenge the ATDFSEU as the petitioner was "speculating" and did not adhere to the applicable RPIA despite having the opportunity to do so. In the case at issue, the petitioner's exercise of his constitutional rights was not violated by the promulgation and publication of the ATDFSEU.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE DR ŠKRK

1. In the case at issue, I have already voted against Points 3, 4, 5, and 6 of the Order, dated 28 May 2001, by which the Constitutional Court accepted the petition to initiate proceedings to review the constitutionality of the Act Regulating the Transformation of Duty-Free Shops at Road Border Crossings with the Member States of the European Communities, Acting within the Framework of the European Union, into Border Shops, and the Special Supervisory Measures Relating to these Shops (Official Gazette RS, No. 13/01 – hereinafter referred to as the ATDFSEU) and suspended the implementation of the third paragraph of Article 292 and the second paragraph of Article 254 of the Rules of Procedure of the National Assembly (hereinafter referred to as the RPNA) and the aforementioned Act until the final decision of the Constitutional Court. I have not given a dissenting opinion to the aforementioned Order. However, practically the same reasons for which I voted against the aforementioned Order have also led me to vote against all the three points of the operative provisions of the Decision, dated 14 June 2001, which relate to the substance of the case. I have only voted in favour of Point 4 of the operative provisions, which is procedural in nature and determines the entry into force of the decision (the day following the service on the National Assembly).
2. As regards the interpretation and the resulting abrogation of the allegedly disputed provisions of the RPNA, I join points 3, 4, and 5 of the dissenting opinion of Judge Dr Zvonko Fišer in their entirety, especially his position that, when taking into account the hitherto practice of the National Assembly, these provisions cannot be said to be unconstitutional. That is why I voted against Point 1 of the operative provisions of the Decision and, therefore, against Points 2 and 3 of the operative provisions. As regards the role of referenda in our present legal system I join point 6 of the dissenting opinion of Dr Zvonko Fišer. In addition to this, I have some doubts about the case at issue concerning the regulation of referenda currently in force, which I present in the following points.
3. In reviewing the legal consequences of the request lodged by Nova stranka, Ljubljana, which was, in the opinion of the Constitutional Court, lodged in due time, the Constitutional Court has, both formally and substantively, treated the ATDFSEU as a completely "ordinary" law, i.e. it did not undertake to review its substance after the procedural violations were found. In formal terms, the Constitutional Court had every reason to do so. In this regard, the Constitutional Court based its interpretation on the previous Decision No. U-I-47/94, dated 19 January 1995 (Official Gazette RS, No. 13/95, and OdlUS IV, 4), by which the Constitutional Court abrogated inter alia Article 10 of the RPIA (Paragraph 2 of the reasoning of Decision No. U-I-47/94). In the opinion of the Constitutional Court, the provisions of Article 10 of the RPIA entail a limitation to the constitutional right to a referendum referred to in Article 90 of the Constitution (legislative referendum) in conjunction with Article 44 of the Constitution (participation in the management of public affairs). The third indent of the abrogated article provided that no legislative referendum may be called regarding the “laws to be adopted in order to implement ratified treaties”. I fully accept Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-47/94 and do not and cannot have any doubts regarding its principled reasons. It is manifestly clear to me that the Constitutional Court is also bound by this when deciding on the admissibility of limiting the constitutional right to a referendum.

4. In view of the legal consequences that the present decision had for the ATDFSEU in the regulation of Slovenia’s international relations, I would further like to draw attention to another aspect. In its extensive reasoning and thorough assessment of human rights in its Decision No. U-I-47/94, the Constitutional Court did not refer to the control exerted through legislative referenda over those laws that oblige the state to implement treaties. The message of the Constitutional Court was then clear. Taking into account the exercise of the constitutional right referred to in Article 44 of the Constitution, the voters also have the right to request a referendum on any issue regulated by law. The Constitutional Court, as a relatively young court of a newly independent state, has opted for dualism in its case law regarding the assumption of obligations under international law. In other words, the Constitutional Court treats laws and decrees on the ratification of treaties as the state’s domestic regulations. As a result, the Constitutional Court does not consider the laws and regulations passed by the state in order to meet its obligations arising from international law separately. I would, however, like to point out that the Constitutional Court has been gradually developing a doctrine of the constitutionality of obligations arising from treaties in relation to international and domestic law, only fully establishing it as a system in case Rm-1/97, dated 5 June 1997 (Official Gazette RS, No. 40/97, and OdlUS VI, 86) when, during the ratification process, it reviewed the Europe Agreement Establishing an Association between the European Communities and their Member States, Acting within the framework of the European Union, of the one Part, and the Republic of Slovenia, of the other Part (hereinafter referred to as the Association Agreement). In relation to its powers pursuant to the first paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution (subsequent control of the constitutionality of treaties), the Constitutional Court stated the following in Paragraph 13 of the reasoning in case Rm-1/97: “If upon such review the Constitutional Court finds that a provision of the treaty is contrary to the Constitution, it may abrogate the law on the ratification; however, this decision of the Constitutional Court is only effective within the domestic legal system. It does not affect the state's obligations under international law, which remain unchanged in such an event." Such development of the case law of the Constitutional Court regarding Slovenia's obligations under international law towards the other subjects of international law is not, in my opinion, entirely irrelevant to the present case U-I-104/01.

5. The ATDFSEU regulates relations that refer to Slovenia's EU accession process. The Association Agreement, which is an agreement under international law entered into by Slovenia, the European Communities, and EU Member States, serves as the direct legal basis of the ATDFSEU. The EC and Member States only conclude such treaties with states which are undergoing the EU accession process. It is well known in actual and legal circles that Slovenia has officially requested to join the states acting within the framework of the EU (Member States) and that it seeks to join them in the first round of enlargement. The whole association process to date, including the constitutional amendment regarding the property rights of aliens (Article 68), has been carried out by the legislative and executive branches of power irrespective of the direct "will of the people", i.e. without deciding by way of a referendum. The ATDFSEU interrupted this process. Thus far, none of these legal facts or procedures have been challenged through referendum control by anyone in the country, at least not successfully or with the assistance of the Constitutional Court.
6. The direct legal basis for the ATDSFEU is the provision of Article 94 of the Association Agreement regulating customs, or rather the Joint Declaration to the same Article which provides that "before July 1998, in accordance with international commitments, the Parties will take the necessary steps to implement the Recommendation adopted by the Customs Cooperation Council on 16 June 1960". As is evident from the legislative materials in question, Slovenia's interpretation of this provision or the substance of the aforementioned Joint Declaration initially differed from that of the other party to the agreement. With regard to the operation of duty free shops, it was stated at the session of the Committee of the National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia for Finance and Monetary Policy held in 1997 that "neither the Joint Declaration to the Association Agreement nor the Recommendation of the Customs Cooperation Council refer to the closure of existing duty free shops – they only include a negatively formulated obligation to abstain from opening new shops of this kind". (Gazette of the National Assembly, No. 38, 2 August 1997, pp. 41–42). The Committee held the position that duty free shops located at international border crossings were compatible with Slovenia's associated country status, as defined by the Association Agreement (Ibidem, p. 43). Three years later when, during the same legislative procedure, the first reading of the Draft Act regulating the Transformation of the Activities of Duty Free Shops Located on Land Border Crossings with Austria, Italy and Hungary was held, it was repeated, under the heading Status Assessment and Reasons for Adopting the Act, that the EU and the Republic of Slovenia have a different interpretation of the Joint Declaration to Article 94 of the Association Agreement; it was added, however, that the EU insists that, by entering into the aforementioned agreement, Slovenia has "assumed a political obligation to abolish duty free shops within the time limit fixed in the Joint Declaration. In this sense, the European Union included the issue of duty free shops in the system of negotiations for Slovenia's accession to the European Union and, in addition, included the abolition of duty free trade among the short-term priorities of the Accession Partnership in 2001" (Gazette of the National Assembly, No. 62, 4 August 2000, p. 12). According to the majority decision of the Constitutional Court, the procedure resulted in the ATDFSEU being adopted unconstitutionally.

7. Another question which arises is whether Slovenia, in its EU accession negotiation process, has actually assumed only a political obligation to abolish duty free shops. Had this been true, the resolution of this question would have fallen within the sphere of the executive branch of power, which is primarily authorised and responsible for managing relations with other countries and international organisations. In such a case, the room for manoeuvre provided by domestic law to the legislature and the Constitutional Court as a guardian of constitutionality would have been considerably different. I cannot, however, agree with the position that the abovementioned case simply meant that Slovenia had a political obligation to close down its duty free shops. Given that the case concerning duty free shops involved two different interpretations of a provision of a treaty, i.e. the Joint Declaration to Article 94 of the Association Agreement, it is first necessary to consider that Article 113 of the Agreement itself provides for a procedure to follow in the event of a dispute between the parties relating to the application or interpretation of the Agreement. Such dispute may be submitted for resolution to the Association Council, or it may be submitted for arbitration if it is not possible to resolve it under the remit of the Association Council. As far as I am aware, Slovenia has not availed itself of the procedure relating to the interpretation of the disputed provision governing duty free shops, and has instead continued its negotiations for its accession to the EU's institutional mechanisms. Such entails that Slovenia, by so doing, implicitly agreed with the interpretation of the Joint Declaration relating to duty free shops held by the other party to the agreement, i.e. the European Communities and their Member States acting within the framework of the EU. This again entails that Slovenia assumed an obligation under international law to restructure its duty free shops. This finding additionally strengthened my decision that I cannot support the substantive part of this Decision.
8. As mentioned previously, I have joined point 6 of the dissenting opinion of Judge Dr Zvonko Fišer regarding the assessment of referenda in our legal system as performed by the Constitutional Court in this Decision. I cannot imagine what consequences under international law of the harmonisation of Slovene legislation with European Community law with the goal of ensuring that Slovenia's legislation will be gradually brought into line with that of the Community (Article 70 of the Association Agreement) could occur if further domestic law procedures are carried out in accordance with the scenario drafted by the Constitutional Court in this Decision.

Decision No. U-II-1/10, dated 10 June 2010

DECISION

At a session held on 10 June 2010 in proceedings pursuant to the first paragraph of Article 21 of the Referendum and Public Initiative Act (Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia, No. 26/07 – official consolidated text), initiated upon the request of the National Assembly, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

Unconstitutional consequences would occur due to the rejection of the Act on Amendments and Modifications of the Act on the Regulation of the Status of Citizens of Other Successor States to the Former SFRY in the Republic of Slovenia (Gazette of the National Assembly, No. 149/09, EPA 735-V) in a referendum.

Reasoning

A

1. The National Assembly adopted the Act Amending the Act on the Regulation of the Status of Citizens of Other Successor States to the Former SFRY in the Republic of Slovenia (hereinafter referred to as the ARSCOSS-B) on 8 March 2010 in a shortened legislative procedure. On the basis of Article 90 of the Constitution and Article 12 of the Referendum and Public Initiative Act (hereinafter referred to as the RPIA), on 12 March 2010 a group of thirty-one National Assembly deputies filed a request that a subsequent legislative referendum on the ARSCOSS-B be called. At a session held on 18 March 2010, the National Assembly reached the decision that unconstitutional consequences could occur due to the suspension of the implementation or the rejection of the ARSCOSS-B and it requested that the Constitutional Court decide on this matter pursuant to the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA. Enclosed with the request [of the National Assembly] is the request of the group of deputies to call a legislative referendum, the opinion of the Legislative and Legal Service of the National Assembly, dated 16 March 2010, the opinion of the Government, dated 18 March 2010, and a transcription of the session of the National Assembly at which the decision was reached.

2. According to the National Assembly, the unconstitutional consequences which could occur due to the requested legislative referendum is that by the suspension of the implementation or the rejection of the ARSCOSS-B a situation could arise that would be inconsistent with the Articles 2, 8, 14, and 22 and the second paragraph of Article 120 and the second paragraph of Article 153 of the Constitution.
3. The National Assembly claims that the purpose of the ARSCOSS-B is in particular the elimination of the unconstitutionality found by the Constitutional Court in Decisions No. U-I-284/94, dated 4 February 1999 (Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia, No. 14/99, and OdlUS VIII, 22), and No. U-I-246/02, dated 3 April 2003 (Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia, No. 36/03, and OdlUS XII, 24). In these two decisions the Constitutional Court found the Aliens Act (Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia, No. 1/91 etc. – hereinafter the AA) and the Act Regulating the Status of Citizens of Other Successor States of the former SFRY in the Republic of Slovenia (Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia, No. 61/99 and 64/01 - hereinafter the ARSCOSS) unconstitutional from the perspective of Articles 2 and 22 and of the second paragraph of Article 120 of the Constitution. The National Assembly points out that the first decision of the Constitutional Court was adopted eleven years ago and the second seven years ago; therefore, any delay in the implementation of those decisions would mean that the unconstitutional situation would continue. In this context, the National Assembly refers to Order of the Constitutional Court No. U-II-3/03, dated 22 December 2003 (OdlUS XII, 101) and Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-II-2/09, dated 9 November 2009 (Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia, No. 91/09).
4. In addition to eliminating the unconstitutionality found by these constitutional decisions, the National Assembly states that the ARSCOSS-B also regulates several other issues not covered by the decisions of the Constitutional Court but which are closely related to these unconstitutionality and which should therefore be considered when regulating, in a comprehensive and non-discriminatory manner, the status of the citizens of other republics of former SFRY [Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, hereinafter Yugoslavia] whose registered permanent residence status illegally ceased once the AA became applicable to them. The ARSCOSS-B also regulates the issuance of permanent residence permits for the children of citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who were born in the Republic of Slovenia after 25 June 1991, because otherwise these children would be in a worse position than their parents. If the Act did not regulate the status of the children, there would be, in the opinion of the National Assembly, a violation of Articles 2 and 14 of the Constitution and the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (Official Gazette of the SFRY, No. 15/90, Act on Notification of Succession concerning UN Conventions and Conventions Adopted by the International Agency for Atomic Energy, Official Gazette RS, No. 35/92, MP, No. 9/92 - hereinafter the CRC), and, due to the disparity of the statutory regulation with the CRC, consequently also with Article 8 and the second paragraph of Article 153 of the Constitution. A second group of persons who are regulated by the ARSCOSS-B although not covered by the decisions of the Constitutional Court, are the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who at the time of Slovenia attaining independence had registered permanent residence status in the Republic of Slovenia, but this residence status ceased once the AA became applicable to them and they were only subsequently granted citizenship of the Republic of Slovenia, without having first obtained a permanent residence permit. If the Act did not regulate the status of these persons, they would allegedly be unduly disadvantaged in comparison with those who had obtained a permanent residence permit, which would entail a violation of Articles 2 and 14 of the Constitution.

5. The National Assembly is of the opinion that the ARSCOSS-B implements the decisions of the Constitutional Court in a manner consistent with the Constitution and that all the provisions of the Act are important for this implementation. Since the implementation of the decisions of the Constitutional Court in a manner consistent with the Constitution is an obligation arising from the principles of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution), according to the National Assembly, the subject of a requested referendum cannot be a statutory regulation implementing the decisions of the Constitutional Court. The National Assembly also believes that unconstitutional consequences could occur simply due to the fact that the activities necessary to call a referendum or to prepare for holding such would delay the enforcement of the ARSCOSS-B.
6. The Government of the Republic of Slovenia also states that unconstitutional consequences would occur due to the suspension of the enforcement of the ARSCOSS-B or due to its rejection in a referendum. Allegedly, (as Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-246/02 states) it is contrary to Articles 2 and 22 and the second paragraph of Article 120 that the ARSCOSS does not recognise permanent residence status to the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who were removed from the register of permanent residents on 26 February 1992, from that date onwards, that it does not regulate the acquisition of a permanent residence permit for the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who were removed from the register of permanent residents on 26 February 1992 and against whom the measure of the forcible removal of an alien pursuant to Article 28 of the AA was pronounced, and that it does not provide criteria for interpreting the undefined legal term of “actual presence [in Slovenia]”, which is a condition for obtaining a permanent residence permit. As the ARSCOSS does not provide a deadline for applying for a permanent residence permit (the Constitutional Court annulled the three-month period in Decision No. U-I-246/02) and it does not grant a permanent statutory basis for the issuance of supplementary decisions, Article 2, the second paragraph of Article 3, Article 87, and the second paragraph of Article 120 of the Constitution were allegedly violated. Since it does not regulate the issuance of permanent residence permits to children of the erased persons who were born in the Republic of Slovenia after 25 June 1991, the ARSCOSS is allegedly inconsistent with Articles 2, 8, and 14 and the second paragraph of Article 153 of the Constitution. Articles 2 and 14 of the Constitution were allegedly infringed also because the ARSCOSS does not regulate the issuance of special decisions to citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who at the time of Slovenia gaining independence had registered permanent residence status in the Republic of Slovenia that ceased to be valid when they were removed from the register of permanent residents and were later granted citizenship of the Republic of Slovenia, without having first been issued a permanent residence permit.

7. The government emphasizes that the purpose of the ARSCOSS-B is to fully remedy the injustices caused to the “erased” residents of the Republic of Slovenia in the part that refers to the revocation of their status eighteen years ago. In addition to the implementation of the decisions of the Constitutional Court, the Act should allegedly also eliminate certain deficiencies that have arisen in practice in the implementation of the ARSCOSS and which are also a result of erasure from the register of permanent residents. The ARSCOSS-B allegedly constitutes a legally appropriate and the only possible solution for regularizing the status of the persons who were illegally removed from the register many years ago. According to the Government, a referendum on these issues would ruin the entire system of checks and balances, because it would be a referendum on whether the implementation of the decision of the Constitutional Court is acceptable. The Government emphasizes that the rejection of the ARSCOSS-B in a referendum would create a situation which, pursuant to the provisions of RPIA, could not be reconciled with the Constitution for a full a year after the referendum.
8. In their reply, the proposers of the referendum state various objections concerning the ARSCOSS-B. In the introduction of their reply they emphasize that the ARSCOSS-B regulates the beneficiaries to a permanent residence permit differently [than in the original Act]. Instead of “citizens of other successor states of former Yugoslavia”, the new beneficiaries are “aliens who were citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia on 25 June 1991”. This change is not reflected in the title of the Act, which still mentions the regulation of the status of citizens of other successor states of former Yugoslavia. This would allegedly lead to ambiguity in the legal order.
9. According to the proposers of the referendum, the National Assembly should have adopted the ARSCOSS-B by the regular and not by the shortened legislative procedure. The Act allegedly contains numerous solutions that go beyond the mere implementation of the decision of the Constitutional Court; therefore, using the shortened procedure was not founded and constituted a manifest abuse of the procedure. Also, the statement that the ARSCOSS-B will have no financial implications for the state budget is allegedly misleading and completely untrue and constituted a breach of the provisions of the Rules of Procedure of the National Assembly (Official Gazette RS, No. 92/07 – official consolidated text – hereinafter the RPNA) concerning the legislative process. The proposers of the referendum point out that high costs would occur first of all due to the resulting administrative and judicial procedures, and the subsequent payment of compensation and claims for various rights would cost taxpayers even more. Due to the long-term financial consequences of the Act, the referendum would be particularly legitimate and legally founded.
10. The ARSCOSS-B is, according to the proposers of the referendum, also questionable from the perspective of common human values and especially the fundamental values of the attainment of independence, since it does not exclude opportunists and those who allegedly attacked the independent Republic of Slovenia with firearms from the group of persons entitled to material benefits. In this way, the Act creates new injustices and entails the humiliation and a gross violation of the human rights of everyone who helped co-create the independent Republic of Slovenia. The ARSCOSS-B allegedly constitutes a serious injustice also for all those new citizens who since independence have regularised their status in accordance with the regulations, and who now as taxpayers would have to pay compensation and other costs. It is allegedly legally absurd to grant permanent residence retroactively also to those persons who in the past did not want this status. Allegedly, everyone who fought for an independent Slovenia, including those who paid the highest price in pursuit thereof, was also put in a humiliating position.

11. In the opinion of the proposers of the referendum, the ARSCOSS-B is controversial also because it does not regulate the issuance of decisions in the same manner for all beneficiaries and therefore allegedly violates the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution. The Act should provide for a mandatory review of all decisions that were already issued in order to retroactively equalize the conditions and the procedure. The decision of the Constitutional Court allegedly could not constitute the basis for the issuance of specific administrative decisions, and therefore an adequate Act should have been adopted before any decision was issued. The complementary decisions that have so far relied on Point 8 of the operative provisions of Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-246/02 are allegedly legally questionable, and their issuance is allegedly contrary to the fourth paragraph of Article 153 of the Constitution. The proposers emphasize that they endorse the principle of individual treatment at all times; it should be determined in specific procedures whether an individual has been wronged. The correct solution would be, in the opinion of the proposers, to retroactively change the status of those persons who were not able to regularize such for reasons beyond their control. It is, however, allegedly absurd to grant status to those persons who did not want to regularize it or even wanted to forcibly prevent others from doing so.
12. The proposers of the referendum also believe that the ARSCOSS-B should contain provisions limiting compensation for damages or defining it as a fixed amount. As the Act does not limit the compensation for damages in any way, this is contrary to the established approach in other instances. Compensation for damages should be reserved for victims of war and the post-war revolutionary violence, for persons who suffered during the Second World War in concentration camps, and also for those who died in the War for Slovenia. Therefore, the totally unlimited possibilities regarding compensation for damages open to the “aggressors” and the “attackers” are allegedly “unlawfully scandalous”.
13. In the opinion of the proposers of the referendum, there is also a series of controversial and “unresolved” legal issues in the constitutional law doctrine. The proposers point out that Article 13 of the Basic Constitutional Charter on the Sovereignty and Independence of the Republic of Slovenia (hereinafter the BCC) and Article 81 of the AA have the nature of a constitutional act or even the nature of the Constitution itself. On the basis of these provisions the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia had the undisputed duty to regularise their status, namely to request either citizenship or permanent residence status. Since these persons did not comply with the applicable law or neglected to use the legal options available to them, the competent national authorities allegedly acted properly when they concluded that those persons who had not submitted an application to regularize their status as citizen or alien did not want to live in the Republic of Slovenia.

14. The ARSCOSS-B is, in the opinion of the proposers of the referendum, allegedly also discriminatory and therefore unlawful and unacceptable, as upon the issuance of permanent residence permits it enables that a special decision be issued in accordance with which the beneficiary shall be deemed to have continuously resided on the territory of the Republic of Slovenia and there will be no determination of actual residence in Slovenia for a certain period. The proposers emphasize that in cases of the absence of an individual from the territory of the Republic of Slovenia longer than one year, no other circumstances than erasure from the register will be taken into account. The proposers also note that the concept of actual presence is defined unclearly and this could entail inequalities in the enforcement of the Act. The lack of precision and the looseness in terms of substance are also problematic with regard to the principle of the clarity of regulations and also with regard to the principle of legality. The condition of actual presence should be clearly defined in order for the competent administrative authorities to have clear guidelines when exercising their discretion.
15. In light of all of the above, the proposers of the referendum are of the opinion that the mentioned provisions and many other provisions of the ARSCOSS-B are unclear and imprecise and are therefore inconsistent with the principles of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution), the principle of constitutionality and legality (Article 153 of the Constitution), and the principle of legality (the second paragraph of Article 120 of the Constitution). They propose that the Constitutional Court establish that no unconstitutional consequences would occur due to the suspension of the implementation, or the rejection of the ARSCOSS-B in a referendum, or subsidiarily, that unconstitutional consequences would occur due to the implementation of the ARSCOSS-B.

B – I

16. By adopting the ARSCOSS-B the legislature reacted to the unconstitutionality of the regulation in force that was established by the Constitutional Court in Decision No. U-I-246/02. By this decision the Constitutional Court established the unconstitutionality of the ARSCOSS, as it does not recognise permanent residence status to the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who were removed from the register of permanent residents on 26 February 1992 from that date onwards, as it does not regulate the status of those persons for whom the measure of the forcible removal of an alien was pronounced and as it does not define the criteria for determining the condition of actual presence for obtaining a permanent residence permit.

17. In Article 90 the Constitution regulates referenda “on any issue which is the subject of regulation by law (a legislative referendum)”. The National Assembly may call a referendum on its own initiative; however it must call a referendum if so required by at least one third of the deputies, by the National Council, or by 40,000 voters. The constitutional provisions concerning the legislative referendum are mainly of an organizational and procedural nature, their goal is the actualisation of the fundamental constitutional principle that citizens exercise power (also) directly (the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution), and the realization of the human right defined in Article 44 of the Constitution concerning the right of citizens to direct and indirect participation in the management of public affairs. Since Article 90 of the Constitution entails the implementation of the human right determined by Article 44 of the Constitution, the right to decision-making in a referendum is also a human right. Statutory interferences must therefore be subject to the legal regime of Article 15 of the Constitution, which governs the exercise and restriction of human rights and fundamental freedoms. Pursuant to the second paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, the manner of the exercise of human rights and fundamental freedoms may be regulated by law whenever the Constitution so provides or where this is necessary due to the particular nature of an individual right or freedom. As determined by the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, human rights and fundamental freedoms may be limited only by the rights of others and in such cases as are provided by the Constitution.
18. The Constitutional Court has already adopted the position that the first paragraph of Article 90 of the Constitution also sets out a substantive framework for the direct participation of citizens in the management of public affairs. In relation to this, it took the view that this provision, which provides that “[t]he National Assembly [...] call[s] a referendum on any issue which is the subject of regulation by law” means that a legislative referendum is permitted on all issues governed by law. In accordance with the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA, upon receiving a petition from the National Assembly the Constitutional Court is competent to assess “whether the suspension of the implementation [of the] law due to a referendum or its non-implementation would truly affect such an important constitutional right that, due to this – upon weighing the affected constitutional values – it would be permissible to interfere with the constitutional right to decision-making in a referendum” (Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-47/94, dated 19 January 1995, Official Gazette No. 13/95, and OdlUS IV, 4).
19. The Constitution and Constitutional Court decisions are not binding only upon the National Assembly as the legislative body, but also upon citizens when they exercise power directly by deciding on a particular law in a referendum (Constitutional Court Decision No. U-II-3/03). In a subsequent legislative referendum the voters decide to confirm or reject an adopted act as a whole (in accordance with the all or nothing principle – Article 9 of the RPIA). Individual legal issues cannot be separated out and the decision adopted in a referendum entails that the act as a whole is either confirmed or rejected. When judging on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA, the Constitutional Court must assess on the basis of weighing the affected constitutional values from the aspect of the considerations of constitutional law whether it is permissible to infringe upon the right to a referendum. However, the Constitutional Court does not rule upon the suitability of a specific statutory regime, as it has no such competence either when assessing the constitutionality of laws or in the exercise of the competences determined by the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA.

B – II

20. The Constitutional Court first established the unconstitutionality of the statutory regulation concerning the legal status of the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who were removed from the register of permanent residents by Decision No. U-I-284/94. It established that the AA was inconsistent with the Constitution as it did not define the conditions for obtaining permanent residence permits for the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who had not opted for Slovene citizenship or whose application for citizenship was rejected.<sup>1</sup> The position of the Constitutional Court was that the general regime of permits for temporary and permanent residence was not appropriate for the status of the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia, and this regime also could not be applied to these persons by means of statutory and legal analogy. Since the AA did not regulate the legal status of the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia in the transitional provisions in such a way as to take into account that they had permanent residence status in the Republic of Slovenia and were actually present in this territory, these persons found themselves in “a legally uncertain position”. From the transitional provisions of the AA these persons “could not grasp what kind of status is applicable to them as aliens and which provisions of the Act should apply to them”. The Constitutional Court ruled in Decision No. U-I-284/94 that, due to the undetermined legal status of the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia, the principle of legitimate expectation, which is one of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution), was violated. It also found a violation of the principle of equality determined by the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution due to the unjustified distinction in the AA between the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia and the persons who lived in the territory of the Republic of Slovenia prior to independence as resident aliens. Concerning the legal status of persons who were considered aliens even before the independence of Slovenia, AA namely determined that the permanent residence permits of all aliens who had permanent residence status in Slovenia at the date the AA came into effect would continue to be valid.

1 The Constitutional Court wrote in the reasoning: “The said persons registered their permanent residence in the territory of Slovenia in conformity with the applicable laws and regulations and actually resided in the territory of Slovenia. Permanent residence and actual residence in the territory of the Republic of Slovenia are the essential circumstances which assign a special legal position to the persons concerned, which is why the provisions of the AA which regulate the acquisition of permanent or temporary residence are inappropriate for them. The legislature should have regulated the position of the persons concerned and/or their transition to the status of alien in a special manner in the transitional provisions of the AA or in a special statute. This is due to the fact that the provisions which regulate the different legal positions of aliens have as their starting point the assumption that an alien comes to the Republic of Slovenia with the intention of remaining in it for a shorter or longer time and that, in accordance with the provisions of the AA, he or she will gradually (from temporary residence permit to permanent residence permit) start to arrange his or her legal position of alien.”

21. Therefore, the issue was that the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia were, on the one hand, treated unequally in comparison with aliens who were citizens of other states (the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution), and on the other hand, this caused the said persons to find themselves in a legally uncertain position, which the Constitutional Court determined to be inconsistent with Article 2 of the Constitution in Decision No. U-I-284/94. However, in reality this entailed that individuals who had previously relied on the right to permanent residence in Slovenia were no longer able to feel secure against interferences by the state in this acquired right, which curtailed their right to safety determined by Article 34 of the Constitution.<sup>2</sup> As there was a change in the legal status of these persons without the necessary legal basis for the issuance of administrative decisions by the competent administrative bodies on this change in legal status, thus without there being an opportunity in the issuance proceedings for these persons to exercise the right to be heard (Article 22 of the Constitution), or to exercise their rights to legal remedies against such decisions (Article 25 of the Constitution) and to judicial protection (Article 23 of the Constitution), this as well constituted an infringement on their personal dignity, which is also protected by the Constitution in Article 34 and which fundamentally guarantees to every individual that in proceedings in which decisions are made concerning his or her rights, obligations, or legal interests, he or she is treated as a person and not as an object. The interference with the personal dignity and safety of these persons occurred precisely because the legislature failed to fulfil its constitutional duty determined by the Constitutional Court in Decision No. U-I-284/94 to be the obligation to regularize the status of these persons in accordance with Article 2 and the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution.
22. The National Assembly responded to Decision No. U-I-284/94 quickly (and within the deadline determined by the Constitutional Court) by passing the ARSCOSS. This Act was adopted on 8 July 1999. By this Act it was possible for the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who were removed from the register of permanent residents to obtain a permanent residence permit. On this basis the Ministry of the Interior had issued 11,746 permits for permanent residence as of 10 February 2003.<sup>3</sup>

2 For more on the importance of the human right to safety determined in Article 34 of the Constitution, see Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-266/95, dated 20 November 1995 (Official Gazette RS, No. 69/95, and OdlUS IV, 116).

3 A letter from the Ministry of the Interior, Ref. No. 1312/02-016-S-507/02-2003, dated 19 February 2003. At the same time the Ministry communicated that 288 applications had been dismissed, 97 rejected, and that in 949 cases the procedure had been discontinued due to the withdrawal of the application or due to the fact that in the course of the procedure the alien had become a citizen of the Republic of Slovenia. According to the then data of the Ministry, 18,305 citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia were removed from the register of permanent residents.

Article 19 of the Act Amending the Citizenship of the Republic of Slovenia Act (Official Gazette of RS, No. 96/02 – hereinafter the CRSA-Č) also determined that a person that had had registered permanent residence status as of 23 December 1990 and was actually present in the Republic of Slovenia from that date onwards had the possibility to obtain citizenship of the Republic of Slovenia under more favourable conditions.<sup>4</sup> In light of the above-mentioned, it can be established that the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who were removed from the register of permanent residents who were actually present in the Republic of Slovenia could have regularized their legal status on the basis of the ARSCOSS and even the CRSA-Č. This also ended the restriction of their human rights determined by the second paragraph of Article 14 and Article 34 of the Constitution. Even before the ARSCOSS came into force, these persons had the possibility to assert before the competent courts the unconstitutionality of any rights lost that were associated with permanent residence status in the Republic of Slovenia,<sup>5</sup> however, this certainly did not refer to the rights that pertain only to the citizens of the Republic of Slovenia.<sup>6</sup> Undoubtedly, the persons at issue who (at least after the ARSCOSS came into force) were actually present in Slovenia, had the possibility after Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-284/94 and after the entry into force of the ARSCOSS to regularize their legal status and regain rights that they might have lost in connection with losing permanent residence status [in addition to Constitutional Court Decision No. Up-333/96, dated 1 July 1999 (OdlUS VIII, 286), see also Decisions No. Up-60/97, dated 15 July 1999 (OdlUS VIII, 292), No. Up-20/97, dated 18 November 1999 (OdlUS VIII, 300), and No. Up-152/97, dated 16 December 1999 (OdlUS VIII, 302)]. However, none of these rights could be asserted by those individuals against whom the measure of the forcible removal of an alien from the country was pronounced or who left the Republic of Slovenia for other reasons that were directly connected with their erasure from the register of permanent residents and were not actually present in the Republic of Slovenia at the date of the entry into force of the ARSCOSS. The regulation of the legal status of

- 4 According to the data of the Ministry of the Interior (letter Ref. No. 214-93/2010/2, dated 23 April 2010), as of 21 April 2010, of those persons removed from the register of permanent residents [in 1992], 4,117 had been granted citizenship of the Republic of Slovenia who prior to their acquisition of citizenship had not obtained a permanent residence permit in the Republic of Slovenia.
- 5 In Decision No. Up-336/98, dated 20 September 2001, (Official Gazette RS, No. 79/01, and OdlUS X, 225) the Constitutional Court decided the constitutional complaint in favour of a complainant whose right to a social security income supplement was denied by the Pension and Disability Insurance Institute and the courts for the period from 1 May 1996 to 18 July 1997 as, due to erasure from the register of permanent residents, the complainant did not have a permanent residence in the Republic of Slovenia. The decision of the Institute and all the decisions of the courts, including the decision of the Supreme Court, were issued prior to Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-284/94. The Constitutional Court established a violation of the second paragraph of Article 14 and Article 22 of the Constitution on the basis of the reasons determined in Decision No. U-I-284/94.
- 6 Such was, for instance, the right to buy an apartment pursuant to Article 117 of the Housing Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 18/91 etc. – HA), which was granted only to those holders of the housing right who were Slovene citizens at that time.

these persons is exactly the issue that was at the forefront when the Constitutional Court reviewed the ARSCOSS in Decision No. U-I-246/02.

23. The Constitutional Court established in Decision No. U-I-246/02 that the ARSCOSS was unconstitutional (following the implementation of the Act Amending the Act on the Regulation of the Status of Citizens of Other Successor States to the Former SFRY in the Republic of Slovenia, Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia No. 64/01 – hereinafter the ARSCOSS-A), since it did not recognize permanent residence retroactively to those citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who were removed from the register of permanent residents on 26 February 1992, i.e. for the period from the date of erasure onwards. The Constitutional Court found in this decision that the ARSCOSS was unconstitutional also because it did not regulate the acquisition of permanent residence permits to those individuals against whom the measure of the forcible removal of an alien from the country was pronounced<sup>7</sup> and as for the purpose of retroactive recognition of permanent residence status it did not define the meaning of the notion of actual presence in the Republic of Slovenia, which would have to be proved by the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia in order to obtain a permanent residence permit, and, in particular, the Act should have defined the period of absence after which the condition of actual presence would no longer be satisfied. In relation to this, the status of these persons should not have been any worse than the status of persons who had the status of alien already before the independence of the Republic of Slovenia. The interpretation of the condition of actual presence as well should not be any stricter than the interpretation established in the jurisprudence relating to the acquisition of citizenship.<sup>8</sup> The Constitutional Court set a deadline of six months for the legislature to remedy the established unconstitutionality.
24. The Constitutional Court determined that the unconstitutionality established in Decision No. U-I-246/02 entailed an inconsistency with the principle of legal certainty as one of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law defined in Article 2 of the Constitution, which requires that the status of the said persons does not remain legally unregulated for a specific period. However, it is clear that concerning the persons who were forcibly removed from the country as aliens or who left the Republic of Slovenia for other reasons that were directly connected with their erasure from the register of permanent residents and were not able to return, it also entailed in terms of substance an inconsistency with Article 34 and with the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution.

7 In Decision No. U-I-284/94 the Constitutional Court already prohibited the application of this measure in cases concerning the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia.

8 With reference to the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia, the concept of actual living was used in Article 13 of the Constitutional Act Implementing the Basic Constitutional Charter on the Independence and Sovereignty of the Republic of Slovenia (BCC). In accordance therewith, Article 40 of the Citizenship of the Republic of Slovenia Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 1/91 etc. – hereinafter referred to as the CRSA) determined actual presence in the territory of the Republic of Slovenia as one of the conditions for the acquisition of citizenship of the Republic of Slovenia.

25. Concerning the decision on the retroactive recognition of permanent residence status, i.e. from the date of the erasure from the register of permanent residents onwards, the Constitutional Court explicitly stated that a permanent residence permit in this case does not determine a new legal status for these persons, but only establishes, in accordance with the existing situation, the legal status which had already existed. This finding applied only to persons who were actually present in the Republic of Slovenia continuously after their erasure from the register and also obtained a permanent residence permit on the basis of the ARSCOSS. Considering the fact that a large number of these persons were able to regularize their legal status prospectively, the Constitutional Court determined in Point 8 of the operative provisions the manner of the implementation of the Decision precisely for these persons, namely that the permanent residence permits that were already issued to the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia establish permanent residence status retroactively, i.e. from the date of erasure from the register onwards. It also ordered the Ministry of the Interior to issue supplementary decisions on the establishment of permanent residence status from 26 February 1992 onwards as an official duty to all those citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who were removed on that day from the register of permanent residents and had already acquired a permit for permanent residence. On these grounds everyone that was actually present in the Republic of Slovenia could regularize their legal status prospectively on the basis of Point 8 of the operative provisions of Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-246/02, subject to the condition of actual presence in Slovenia, and also retroactively even if the legislature had decided not to respond to the unconstitutionality established in Point 1 of the cited Decision. The state bodies competent for the implementation of a decision of the Constitutional Court must namely act in accordance with the part of the decision that prescribes the manner of its exercise until the legislature, if it decides to do so, regulates the issue in another manner that is consistent with the Constitution (see the position of the Constitutional Court in Order No. U-II-3/03).
26. A statutory regulation is, however, needed to remedy the established unconstitutionality determined by points 2 and 3 in conjunction with Point 1 of the operative provisions of Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-246/02, as is apparent also from that decision. In order to regulate the legal status of persons who were forcibly removed from the country or of persons who left the Republic of Slovenia for other reasons that were directly connected with their erasure from the register of permanent residents, the retroactive recognition of their permanent residence status necessitates the constitution of a legal fiction<sup>9</sup> that is (and was) needed for the eventual assertion of rights pertaining to aliens that have permanent residence permits in the Republic of Slovenia. Therefore, such permits, except in that they serve to prove the existence of the right to permanent residence status in eventual proceedings for 9 "In law, a legal fiction is a synonym for a legal fact deemed to be true even though we know that it does not exist." M. Pavčnik, Teorija prava, prispevek k razumevanju prava [Theory of Law, A Contribution to Understanding Law], Third extended, revised, and supplemented edition, GV Založba, Ljubljana 2007, p. 422.

asserting the rights connected with permanent residence, cannot have any other legal consequences. As is clear from the cited decision of the Constitutional Court, in order to remedy the unconstitutional state of affairs the legislature must also define the notion of actual presence in the Republic of Slovenia, in particular the period of absence after which the condition of actual presence would no longer be satisfied, and specifically regulate the cases where the measure of the forcible removal of an alien from the country was pronounced.

27. It follows from the data provided by the Ministry of the Interior that some citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia removed from the register of permanent residents, obtained a permanent residence permit on the basis of the AA or the Aliens Act (Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia, No. 64/09 – official consolidated text – hereinafter AA-1),<sup>10</sup> from which it is even possible to infer that some of these persons already regularized their legal status prospectively even in the absence of statutory regulation. It is also evident that at this moment only a small number of administrative proceedings and proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts concerning the acquisition of permanent residence permits are pending and that the Ministry started to deal with these applications, in accordance with the decisions of the Constitutional Court, individually, as is shown in particular by the data on dismissed and rejected applications and on proceedings that were stayed. However, it cannot be inferred from the data of the Ministry of the Interior that the statuses of all the persons at issue have been regularized prospectively,<sup>11</sup> and in even fewer cases have their statuses been regularized retroactively<sup>12</sup> in accordance with the manner determined by Decision No. U-I-246/02. Above all it is very important, as follows from the petition of the National Assembly, that the Act also regulates some of the issues associated with erasure from the register of permanent residents which became apparent when implementing the ARSCOSS; among such, of particular importance are the issue of the equal treatment of persons who have acquired nationality without having previously obtained a permit for permanent residence, and the issue of the children of persons removed from the register of permanent residents.
28. The legislature failed to respond to Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-246/02 for a long time. The Constitutional Court emphasized already in Order No. U-II-3/03 that due to a violation of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law determined by Article 2 and the principle of the separation of powers determined by Article 3 of

10 4,388 persons had obtained such permits as of 21 April 2010.

11 The number of persons for whom this status is not regularized cannot be determined, even with the data obtained from the Ministry of the Interior. The Ministry otherwise pointed out (letter Ref. No. 214-93/2010/7, dated 17 May 2010) that out of the 25,671 persons who were (after all records were organized and coordinated, as mentioned in the letter) removed from the register of permanent residents, there is no data concerning 13,412 of these persons holding any regulated status in the Republic of Slovenia (neither citizenship, permanent residence permit, nor temporary residence permit). However, the Ministry also notes that, due to the method of keeping records, it is not possible to know with certainty that all these persons are still alive or how many of them actually emigrated.

12 According to the Ministry of the Interior, 6,387 retroactive supplementary decisions have been issued.

the Constitution, unconstitutional consequences (determined by the then applicable first paragraph of Article 16 of the RPIA to be a reason for the unconstitutionality of a request to call a subsequent legislative referendum) occurred already when the deadline for implementing Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-246/02 expired unsuccessfully.<sup>13</sup> It also pointed out that any delay in the implementation of the said decision entails a continuation of the unconstitutional state of affairs, therefore the National Assembly must implement the decision as soon as possible. The Constitutional Court again found in Decision No. U-II-3/04, dated 20 April 2004 (Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia, No. 44/04, and OdlUS XIII, 29), that the unregulated status of these persons had lasted for more than twelve years, and that therefore any extension of the unconstitutional state of affairs, which may also occur in the form of the failure to adopt an Act which would finally resolve the issue of the permanent residence of these persons, already constitutes unconstitutional consequences (in terms of the first paragraph of Article 16 of the RPIA applicable at that time).

B – III

29. The National Assembly responded to the unconstitutionality established in points 1, 2, and 3 of the operative provisions of Decision No. U-I-246/02 by passing the ARSCOSS-B.<sup>14</sup> In the proposed first paragraph of Article 1 of the ARSCOSS, the term used to describing the beneficiaries is no longer “citizens of other successor states of former Yugoslavia”, but “aliens who were citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia on 25 June 1991”. Such a change is actually necessary because in this manner also the persons who before independence were citizens of the former Yugoslav republics and may have become third-country nationals or stateless persons after their erasure from the register of permanent residents are included among the beneficiaries due to the passage of time.<sup>15</sup> While this change is not reflected in the title of the ARSCOSS-B, this does not introduce any ambiguity in the legal order. In the 13 If the National Assembly does not respond to a Constitutional Court decision which determined the unconstitutionality of a statutory regulation by adopting a law, this does not only constitute a prolongation of the established unconstitutionality, but it also creates of itself a new unconstitutionality. When the Constitutional Court, pursuant to Article 48 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia, No. 64/07 – official consolidated text – hereinafter the CCA), establishes the unconstitutionality of a law and orders the National Assembly to remedy the established unconstitutionality within a specified period, the National Assembly must adopt a new statutory regulation within that period in order to eliminate the unconstitutionality. Disregarding such Constitutional Court decision constitutes a violation of Article 2 and of the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution, as was repeatedly emphasized by the Constitutional Court (for the first time already in Decision No. U-I-114/95, dated 7 December 1995, Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia No. 8/96, and OdlUS IV, 120). As long as the legislature does not respond to the identified unconstitutionality, this violation continues to exist.

14 The ARSCOSS-B amends the ARSCOSS (which was already amended by the ARSCOSS-A). The Act contains ten articles but the individual articles amend several articles of the ARSCOSS or add several new articles at the same time. For greater clarity, this decision hereinafter will not refer to the articles of the ARSCOSS-B, but to the “proposed” or “new” articles, paragraphs, and indents of the ARSCOSS.

15 The Constitutional Court uses the new terminology in this decision for reasons of clarity.

proposed second paragraph of Article 1 the Act grants a residence permit and permanent residence status at the address at which the particular individual was registered at the time of erasure, even for the period from the erasure until the permanent residence permit was obtained. For the persons who are not actually present in the Republic of Slovenia the Act therefore establishes a legal fiction of permanent residence status by recognizing a fictitious “permanent residence at the address where the [individual] was registered before [...] the erasure [...] for the period until the adoption of the ARSCOSS or until the deadlines that are to be established by this Act for the status regularisation expire”, as was explicitly called for by the Constitutional Court in Decisions No. Up-333/96 and No. Up-60/97.

30. In a manner consistent with the Constitution, the legislature eliminates the unconstitutionality found in Point 1 of the operative provisions of Decision No. U-I-246/02. In the reasoning of this decision (points 17 to 20 of the reasoning), the Constitutional Court stated that the issue of the permanent residence status of the erased persons can be regulated in a single manner only and that only this manner is consistent with the Constitution.<sup>16</sup> Therefore, the National Assembly could not regulate this issue in any other way other than to recognise permanent residence status retroactively to those individuals who obtain a permanent residence permit subject to the condition of actual presence in Slovenia. Concerning this, it should be noted that permanent residence status in the country is only possible on the basis of a permanent residence permit and that anyone who resides in the country must register their permanent residence.<sup>17</sup> It is therefore understandable that the legislature retroactively recognised the permanent residence status of the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia removed from the registry of permanent residents who are not actually present in the Republic of Slovenia by establishing the legal fiction that they had a permanent residence permit and were registered at their former address even during the period from their erasure from the register of permanent residents until they obtained a permit for permanent residence, certainly under the conditions expressly defined by the Act. As was already stated, this legal fiction is and was intended for eventual proceedings that could be initiated by individuals regarding the assertion of their rights conditional upon their permanent residence status, but cannot have any other legal consequences on its own, in particular, it cannot be used to retroactively establish legal relationships that could have existed had it not been for their erasure from the register of permanent residents.
31. The ARSCOSS-B eliminates, in a manner consistent with the Constitution, also the unconstitutionality found in point 2 of the operative provisions of Decision No. U-I-246/02, namely that the Act should regulate the possibility to obtain a permanent residence permit for those citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia against whom the measure of the forcible removal of an alien was pronounced. This unconstitutionality is eliminated by the proposed first paragraph of the Article 1 in conjunction with the fifth indent of the third paragraph of the new Article 1.č of the ARSCOSS. On this basis, the condition of actual presence in the Republic of Slovenia is fulfilled even if the absence lasted for more than a year, if the person had been removed from the Republic of Slovenia pursuant to the provisions of the AA due to erasure from the register of permanent residents. The citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who were forcibly removed from the Republic of Slovenia due to the erasure may apply for a permanent residence permit, and the fact that they were forcibly removed from Slovenia is not taken into account when determining the condition of actual presence.<sup>18</sup> In the assessment of the Constitutional Court, the National Assembly could not eliminate the central part of this unconstitutionality in a different manner. Only statutory legislation providing that the forcible removal of an alien from the country due to erasure from the register of permanent residents does not affect the acquisition of permanent residence permits and the recognition of permanent residence status retroactively is constitutionally acceptable. The legislature has a greater margin of appreciation only when deciding the length of the period of absence due to the measure of the forcible removal of an alien from the country shall be disregarded when determining the condition of actual presence in Slovenia and after what period of time a certain action can be expected from an individual from which it can be concluded that he or she wanted to return to the Republic of Slovenia and to continue to permanently reside here. By the proposed third paragraph of Article 1.č of the ARSCOSS<sup>19</sup> the legislature has obviously also taken into account the fact that some persons removed from the registry of permanent residents could regularize their status prospectively after a certain period of time on the basis of the AA-1. Therefore, the regulation defined in the ARSCOSS-B is also in this part not unconstitutional in itself.

16 “[T]he legislature could not have regulated the issue of the time effect of the legal regulation differently than that the mentioned persons who had acquired a permanent residence permit be retroactively recognized permanent resident status.” (point 20 of the reasoning)

17 The registration of residence is governed by the Residence Registration Act, Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia No. 59/06 - official consolidated text, and 111/07 – hereinafter the RRA).

32. The third unconstitutionality determined by Decision No. U-I-246/02 refers to the uncertainty of the legal notion of “actual presence in the Republic of Slovenia”. The ARSCOSS prescribed the condition of actual presence for obtaining a permanent residence permit as an undefined legal notion after already seven years had elapsed 18 In accordance with the fifth indent of the third paragraph of the proposed Article 1.č of the ARSCOSS, the condition of actual presence in the Republic of Slovenia is fulfilled even if the absence lasted for more than a year and the absence is justified because “the person was forcibly removed from the Republic of Slovenia pursuant to Article 28 of the Aliens Act (Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia No. 1/91-I, 44/97, 50/98 - Constitutional Court Decision and 14/99 - Constitutional Court Decision), or Article 50 of the AA-1, unless the person was forcibly removed due to the accessory penalty of expulsion from the country due to a committed offence”.

19 This provision provides: “If the absence on the basis of the grounds referred to in the preceding paragraph, except for the grounds in the second indent, lasted longer than five years, it is considered that the condition of actual presence is fulfilled for a period of five years; for a period of an additional five years the condition is fulfilled only if the conduct of this person indicates that he or she tried during his or her absence to return to Slovenia and continue his or her actual presence in the Republic of Slovenia.”

since the erasure from the register of permanent residents and when the different statuses of the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who had not acquired citizenship of the Republic of Slovenia became identifiable. It stems from the reasoning of the constitutional decision that the legislature should define what constitutes actual presence according to the ARSCOSS, and in particular it should define the period of absence after which the condition of actual presence is no longer satisfied. The Constitutional Court has explicitly mentioned certain limitations in the reasoning, namely that the status of these persons should not be any worse than the status of persons who had the status of alien already before the independence of the Republic of Slovenia,<sup>20</sup> and the interpretation of the condition of actual presence should not be any stricter than the interpretation established in the jurisprudence relating to the acquisition of citizenship as well. This entailed that the legislature was obliged to meet the requirement of equality before the law defined in the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution.

33. The notion of actual presence in the Republic of Slovenia is defined in the proposed Article 1.č of the ARSCOSS. The Act defines actual presence as the individual having a centre of vital interests in the Republic of Slovenia. This is assessed in accordance with certain criteria, listed as examples – personal, family, economic, social, or other connections which indicate that an individual has real and lasting ties with Slovenia.<sup>21</sup> Such a connection, of course, cannot be attributed to someone who has left the Republic of Slovenia with a view to emigrating, which was already at the time of the erasure and is still today, pursuant to the AA-1 (the sixth indent of the second paragraph of Article 45), a reason for the validity of a permanent residence permit to cease. The term “or other connections” cannot imply whatever other connections, but this statutory provision must be interpreted by an intra legem analogy. This means that only those “other connections” of the individual may be relevant that are similar in terms of their quality and intensity to the circumstances explicitly established. The requirement of the cumulative fulfilment of these criteria, which the proposers of the referendum advocate, would be unconstitutional, because the Act

20 The Constitutional Court found in Decision No. U-I-284/94 that the failure to regulate the status of these persons in comparison with the legal status of aliens also constitutes a violation of the principle of equality determined by the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution (Paragraph 18 of the reasoning). Therefore, from the perspective of equality, an absence of up to one year should not entail that the condition of actual presence is not fulfilled. The AA in force at the time of the erasure from the register of permanent residents namely prescribed in the second indent of Article 20 that the permanent residence permit of an alien ceases to be valid if this person emigrates or stays abroad for more than one year and does not inform the competent authority of this fact.

21 The first paragraph of the proposed Article 1.č of the ARSCOSS states: “Actual presence in the Republic of Slovenia under this Act means that an individual has a centre of vital interests in the Republic of Slovenia which is to be assessed on the basis of his personal, family, economic, social, or other connections which indicate that the individual has real and lasting ties with Slovenia. A justified absence from the Republic of Slovenia due to the grounds determined by the third paragraph of this Article does not constitute an interruption of actual presence in the Republic of Slovenia.”

would without any reasonable grounds require that the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who were removed from the register of permanent residents have such connections in Slovenia permanently, while such a requirement does not apply for other aliens (the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution). Therefore, it should be taken into account that the condition of actual presence is assessed by whether the individual has a “centre of vital interests” in Slovenia, i.e. that he or she has “real and lasting ties” with the Republic of Slovenia.<sup>22</sup> Personal, family, economic, social, or other connections are just circumstances which enable the competent authority to decide whether an individual fulfils this condition. Depending on the particular circumstances, only one circumstance might be sufficient to determine actual presence in a particular case, whereas in other cases the existence of two or more circumstances will have to be demonstrated for the fulfilment of the condition of actual presence. In any event, the Act requires, on the basis of the actions (filing an application) of applicants for permanent residence permits, individual consideration of these applications, which is in addition the case for all the procedures under the ARSCOSS, including the procedures pursuant to Point 8 of the operative provisions of Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-246/02.

34. Besides the condition of actual presence, the ARSCOSS-B determines the period of time and the grounds on the basis of which the individual was justifiably absent from the territory of the Republic of Slovenia. The second paragraph of the proposed Article 1.č of the Act provides that the condition of actual presence in the Republic of Slovenia is fulfilled if the person left the Republic of Slovenia and the continuous absence did not last longer than a year, regardless of the grounds for this absence. An absence which lasted for more than a year does not affect the condition of actual presence if it was due to certain justified grounds.<sup>23</sup> However, the Act provides that 22 The conditions are the same as provided by the RRA for the determination of the notion of permanent residence (the third point of Article 3).

23 The third paragraph of the proposed Article 1.č of the ARSCOSS states: “The condition of actual presence in the Republic of Slovenia is fulfilled even if the absence lasted for more than a year and the absence is justified on the basis of the following grounds:

- If the person has left the Republic of Slovenia as a result of erasure from the register of permanent residents;
- If the person has left the Republic of Slovenia due to being sent to work, to study, or for health treatment by a legal entity from the Republic of Slovenia, or in the case of a minor, by his or her parents or guardians, or where he or she was employed on a ship with a home port in the Republic of Slovenia, for the period of the referral to work, study, or for medical treatment, or for the period of employment on a ship;
- If the person has left the Republic of Slovenia due to not being able to obtain a residence permit in the Republic of Slovenia due to non-fulfilment of the conditions and his or her application for the permit has been dismissed, rejected, or the proceedings were stayed;
- If the person was unable to return to the Republic of Slovenia due to war in some other country of the former Yugoslavia, or for medical reasons;
- If the person was forcibly removed from the Republic of Slovenia on the basis of Article 2 of the Aliens even a justified absence could last only up to five years, while it could last for more than five years only if the person had actively tried to return to the Republic of Slovenia and to continue his or her actual presence there.

35. In the assessment of the Constitutional Court, the proposed legislative solutions concerning the condition of actual presence addresses the unconstitutionality found in Decision No. U-I-246/02 in a manner consistent with the Constitution. The provisions are not unclear or their substance imprecise, or at least no more than is the case for similar statutory provisions that otherwise govern the authorization of residence or the acquisition of citizenship. It cannot be asserted that these provisions are unconstitutional in relation to Articles 34 and 2 of the Constitution. The legislature met the constitutional requirements also in relation to the second paragraph of Article 14 because when defining the condition of actual presence it also considered the positions adopted by the Constitutional Court regarding the interpretation of this condition in the decisions concerning the relevant constitutional complaints, particularly in relation to the acquisition of citizenship.<sup>24</sup> Thus, in Decision No. Up-73/95, dated 27 February 1997 (OdlUS VI, 72), the Constitutional Court found that the right to the equal protection of rights (Article 22 of the Constitution) was violated due to the unlawful interpretation of the uncertain legal notion of “actual presence in Slovenia”, namely by stating that for the definition of actual presence “only the long-term interruption of the actual presence of the claimants in the Republic of Slovenia is relevant [...] and not the assertion in the claim concerning the impossibility of their return to Slovenia due to war circumstances [...]”. In Decision No. Up-77/94, dated 16 September 1997 (OdlUS VI, 188), the Constitutional Court found a violation of Article 22 of the Constitution because the complainant’s departure

Act (Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia No. 1/91-I, 44/97, 50/98 - Constitutional Court Decision and 14/99 - Constitutional Court Decision) or Article 50 of the Aliens Act (Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia, No. 64/09 - official consolidated text), unless the person was forcibly removed due to the accessory penalty of expulsion from the country due to a committed offence;

- If the person was refused entry into the Republic of Slovenia, unless he or she was refused entry due to the accessory penalty of expulsion from the country due to a committed offence, or on the grounds defined in the first, second, fifth, or seventh indents of Article 10 of the Aliens Act (Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia No. 1/91-I, 44/97, 50/98 - Constitutional Court Decision and 14/99 - Constitutional Court Decision), on the basis of the reasons defined in the first, second, or sixth indents of the first paragraph of Article 9 of the Aliens Act (Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia, No. 61/99, 87/02, and 93/05), or for the reasons determined in points (d) or (e) of the first paragraph of Article 5 of Regulation (EC) No. 562/2006 of the European Parliament and the Council of 15 March 2006 establishing a Community Code on the rules governing the movement of persons across borders (OJ L No. 105, 13 April 2006)."

- 24 The first paragraph of Article 40 of CRSA gave the citizens of other republics who on the date of the plebiscite on the independence and sovereignty of the Republic of Slovenia, i.e. 23 December 1990, had a registered permanent residence in the Republic of Slovenia and were actually present in Slovenia the right to acquire citizenship by exceptional one-time opportunity naturalization. Concerning the part of the provision stating “and is actually present here,” the legislature used an undefined legal concept, the interpretation of which has been repeatedly examined by the Constitutional Court, especially with regard to violations of the right to the equal protection of the rights determined by Article 22 of the Constitution.

from the Republic of Slovenia together with the Yugoslav Army was considered in itself an interruption of actual presence in Slovenia, whereas not all the relevant facts which could confirm or reject such interpretation were established. Due to such an unconstitutional interpretation of the uncertain legal notion of “actual presence”, the competent bodies did not take into consideration the complainant’s statements in the application for citizenship that he resigned from the Yugoslav Army after one month “because he did not want to move from the Republic of Slovenia”. In Decision No. Up-199/95, dated 5 February 1998 (OdlUS VII, 100), it found a violation of Article 22 of the Constitution because the claimant’s assertion that he was not responsible for the reasons for his absence lasting longer than a year was not considered among the decisive factors for the definition of actual presence. In Decision No. Up-200/04, dated 22 June 2006 (Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia, No. 76/06), the Constitutional Court found a violation of Article 22 of the Constitution, because the Administrative Court took the position that the fact that the complainant was not able to return to the Republic of Slovenia due to war circumstances and to the expiry of her passport was not essential, but only the fact that the complainant interrupted her actual presence in the Republic of Slovenia and is still living abroad should be considered. In Decision No. Up-211/04, dated 2 March 2006 (Official Gazette of Republic of Slovenia, No. 28/06, and OdlUS XV, 40), which concerned an application for a permanent residence permit which the complainant filed on the basis of the ARSCOSS, the Constitutional Court rejected the position of the courts that the fact the complainant was unable to return to the Republic of Slovenia due to the war was not relevant for the decision whether the complainant fulfilled the condition of actual presence in Slovenia. The position of the Constitutional Court was that the assertions of the complainant concerning the impossibility of returning due to war circumstances or due to a refusal at the border could constitute such circumstances that could justify the complainant’s absence for a longer period of time due to circumstances beyond his control, and that these circumstances have to be regarded as decisive for the definition of actual presence in the Republic of Slovenia. Certainly, in the proceedings decided on the basis of the ARSCOSS also after this amendment of the Act, it will continue to remain a duty of the administrative authorities to determine with certainty in each case, in accordance with the principle of legality and the principle of substantive truth, whether these statutory conditions are met; therefore, a person who asserts these rights will also have to demonstrate, in accordance with the rules of administrative procedure, that the facts to be considered existed for the whole period relevant for the decision in the case.

B – IV

36. In order to reach a decision on whether such unconstitutional consequences could occur due to the suspension of the implementation or the rejection of the ARSCOSS-B in a referendum, as required by the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA, it is necessary to identify the constitutional values at issue and decide which of them should be given priority. The right to a referendum, which is protected as a human right under Article 90 of the Constitution, read in conjunction with Article 44 of the Constitution, may be opposed by several constitutional values. These are the ones the legislature defined by the concept of “unconstitutional consequences” in the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA. Whether the right to a referendum should yield to these constitutional values depends on which of these values are at issue and what weight they carry.

37. Until the legislature remedies the unconstitutional gap in the law that the Constitutional Court found in Decision No. U-I-246/02, the statutory regulation concerning the legal status of the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who were erased from the register of permanent residents remains inconsistent with the second paragraph of Article 14, Article 34, and Article 2 of the Constitution (see paragraph 27 of this decision). In addition, the failure to comply with the decision of the Constitutional Court itself entails a new violation of the Constitution, namely Article 2 and the second paragraph of Article 3 thereof. The weight of all these violations is all the more important, as seven years have passed since the second decision (No. U-I-246/02) of the Constitutional Court and as they may lead to violations of rights, including human rights and fundamental freedoms.<sup>25</sup> The Constitutional Court has in the interim reiterated in its subsequent decisions that any prolongation of the unconstitutional situation already entails unconstitutional consequences in terms of the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA (particularly emphasized in Decision No. U-II-3/04), which means that the review which was requested of the Constitutional Court this time had actually already been carried out. With the further passage of time, considering that the legislature has not responded for an additional six years despite the clear warnings of the Constitutional Court, this unconstitutional situation has only deepened. It has become intolerable.
38. In the weighing of constitutional values, it should also be considered whether the legislature, by adopting an act remedying an unconstitutionality, also regulates other issues that bear no direct relation to the elimination of the unconstitutionality as such. The proposed Article 1.a of the ARSCOSS regulates the issuance of permanent residence permits to the children of the erased citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia, namely those who were born in the Republic of Slovenia after 25 June 1991. The Act also newly regulates the issuance of special decisions to the citizens of the Republic of Slovenia who, at the time of the attainment of the independence of the Republic of Slovenia, had the citizenship of other republics of former Yugoslavia and permanent residence registered in the Republic of Slovenia, but this residence ceased to be valid once the provisions of the AA became applicable to them; later, they were, however, granted citizenship of the Republic of Slovenia without having first obtained a permanent residence permit (the proposed Article 1.b). The Act also equalises the position of the persons who were issued decisions on the retroactive recognition of permanent residence on the basis of Point 8 of Decision No. U-I-246/02 with that of the persons who were issued such decisions in 2009 (the proposed Article 1.c). The decisions issued in 2004 namely merely established permanent residence retroactively, with effect from the erasure from the register of permanent residents onwards. The ARSCOSS-B equalises these decisions with those from 2009 in which a permanent residence permit as well as the registration of permanent residence status were recognised retroactively. Other issues also covered by the ARSCOSS-B include the deadline by which an alien who is issued a permanent residence permit and who at the time of the issuance of this permit does not actually reside in the Republic of Slovenia due to a justified absence, will be required to move back to the Republic of Slovenia and resume their actual presence in the Republic of Slovenia (the proposed Article 1.d); the additional reasons for denying the issuance of a permanent residence permit to an alien (the proposed amendments to Article 3); the deadline for filing an application for a permanent residence permit (the transitional provisions); and a different definition of the competent authorities. The proposed Article 1 of the Act also provides for the issuance of a permanent residence permit (effective only from the issuance onwards) to a specific group of people, namely to those citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who have continuously resided in the Republic of Slovenia since 25 June 1991 although they were not registered as permanent residents and therefore could not have been erased from the register of permanent residents.

25 When deciding in constitutional complaint proceedings, the Constitutional Court usually established a violation of the right to the equal protection of rights (Article 22 of the Constitution), which in judicial proceedings is a specific expression of the general principle of equality determined in the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution. For example, in Decision No. Up-20/97 it found that the complainant was in an unequal position compared to those aliens who were not citizens of other former Yugoslav republics but who had permanent residence in the Republic of Slovenia at the time the AA entered into force, which constituted a violation of the rights determined by Article 22 of the Constitution with regard to one's residence. In Decision No. Up-336/98 it found a violation of the complainant's right to equality before the law determined by the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution, which is expressed as a violation of Article 22 of the Constitution in proceedings for deciding on the rights, obligations, and legal benefits of individuals, with regard to their residence, because the condition of residence in the Republic of Slovenia, as one of the conditions for entitlement to a social security income supplement, was interpreted in accordance with Article 81 of the AA, an interpretation that the Constitutional Court found to be inconsistent with the Constitution already in Decision No. U-I-284/94.

39. The regulation of these issues has no direct bearing on remedying the established unconstitutionality and to that extent, the Act regulates more than what is required by the decisions of the Constitutional Court. However, by including these solutions in the ARSCOSS-B, the National Assembly may not be accused that it has regulated issues that are not directly related to the established unconstitutionality. It may also not be accused that it has done so with the purpose of preventing these issues from becoming subject to a referendum, which would entail an abuse of its legislative function. In remedying unconstitutionality, the National Assembly is entitled to address the issues which relate to the same subject-matter and are inextricably related to the remedying of unconstitutionality, particularly, as in this case, to the prevention of new unconstitutionality. The Constitutional Court considers the regulation of the legal status of the children of those citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who have been erased from the register of permanent residents in the same manner as the legal status prescribed for their parents to be necessary from the point of view of the Constitution, as their positions are directly related. The retroactive recognition of permanent residence should also apply to the Slovene citizens who were not granted a permanent residence permit before being granted citizenship; otherwise, the individuals erased from the register of permanent residents who were granted citizenship of the Republic of Slovenia would be in a worse position than those who have already been granted permanent residence permits and have received supplementary decisions on the retroactive recognition of permanent residence pursuant to Point 8 of Decision No. U-I-246/02. Although these two groups were not covered by the decision of the Constitutional Court, such an approach of the National Assembly undoubtedly prevented the emergence of new unconstitutionality, as an omission of such legislative measures would entail an unconstitutional gap in the law which would result in an unconstitutional distinction between individuals who are in essentially the same position. These unconstitutionality could not be remedied in any other manner consistent with the Constitution. It should, however, be noted that the need to regulate these issues to a large extent arose later, with the passage of time, which can be attributed to the Government (as the authority constitutionally authorised to propose laws) as well as to the National Assembly, as they have delayed the remedying of the established unconstitutionality for almost seven years. Regarding the other issues, the Constitutional Court considers them to be of minor importance or regards them as subsidiary issues: some of them to be merely procedural in nature (deadlines, transitional provisions), others, in terms of substance, only “concomitants” of the key substantive issues (such as the grounds for denying a permanent residence permit), while the purpose of the third group of subsidiary issues is solely to provide a comprehensive resolution of the problem of the legal status of the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who actually reside in the Republic of Slovenia (the second group of beneficiaries pursuant to the proposed Article 1 of the ARSCOSS<sup>26</sup>).

40. In light of these considerations, it is evident that by adopting the ARSCOSS-B, the legislature responded in a manner consistent with the Constitution to the unconstitutional position found by the Constitutional Court in Decision No. U-I-246/02. The provisions of the ARSCOSS-B are clear and precise and establish a basis on which it will be possible to definitively regulate the legal status of those citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who have been erased from the register of permanent residents, if and insofar as their status remains unregulated to this day. While remedying the unconstitutionality, however, the Act does not regulate issues that have no direct bearing on remedying this situation, or it regulates only certain less important issues, “concomitants” of the key substantive issues.

26 This refers to the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who resided in the Republic of Slovenia on 25 June 1991 and were actually present there from that day onwards, as determined already by ARSCOSS in 1999.

41. The proposers of the request to call a referendum have made several complaints with respect to the ARSCOSS-B. The pertinent complaints are those which might carry some constitutional weight. In addition to the complaints about the ambiguity and vagueness of the Act and those that claim that the Act regulates more than required in order to remedy the unconstitutionality, which have proved to be unfounded, the proposers of the referendum also complain that the National Assembly violated the legislative procedure, as the ARSCOSS-B was allegedly unjustifiably adopted in a shortened procedure, and additionally the National Assembly has misleadingly stated in the preamble to the draft Act that the Act would have no financial implications for the state budget. Pursuant to the third paragraph of Article 21 of the CCA, the Constitutional Court is also competent to rule on the constitutionality and legality of the procedures under which legislation has been adopted. However, the Constitutional Court has reiterated on many occasions that in reviewing the procedure under which a law has been adopted, it is competent to rule only on the constitutionality of the procedure, that is to say, on violations of the rules laid down in the Constitution (see, for example, Decision no. U-I-215/96, dated 25 November 1999, Official Gazette RS, No. 101/99, and OdlUS VIII, 265, Decision No. U-I-104/01, dated 14 June 2001, Official Gazette RS, No. 52/01, and OdlUS X, 123, and Order No. U-I-192/03, dated 13 May 2004). A violation of the RPNA does not by itself entail that an act is inconsistent with the Constitution; to that end, it must be demonstrated that there has been a violation of the provisions of the Constitution, which the proposers of the referendum do not allege.
42. The proposers of the referendum also complain that the ARSCOSS-B does not regulate the compensation for damages which will allegedly be claimed by the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia on the basis of this Act. In their opinion, the compensation for damages should be regulated so as to limit the amount or to determine them as a fixed amount, since there is also a limit to the compensation awarded to the victims of the Second World War and the postwar revolutionary violence, to those who suffered in the concentration camps during the Second World War, and to the relatives of the persons who died in the War for Slovenia.
43. By adopting the ARSCOSS-B, which recognised actual residence status retroactively, the legislature introduced moral satisfaction as a particular form of redress for the violations of human rights caused by erasure from the register of permanent residents. The legislature thereby also accomplished the duty determined in the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution. If damage was caused to individuals due to their erasure from the register of permanent residents because they were deprived of rights that were conditional on permanent residence in Slovenia, the question of possible state liability could arise on the basis of Article 26 of the Constitution, which provides for the constitutional protection of claims for compensation against the state and its bodies. The complaint of the proposers of the referendum that this issue should be regulated precisely by the ARSCOSS-B and that the Act is inconsistent with the Constitution as it does not include such regulation, is unfounded. The regulation of the liability for damages would entail regulating an issue which is not directly and inextricably related to the elimination of unconstitutionality established in Decision No. U-I-246/02. However, er, the issuance of decisions pursuant to the ARSCOSS and the ARSCOSS-B does not by itself constitute a new liability of the state nor does it entail new legal bases for claims for compensation, so as to imply a direct relation between the issue of assessing the new compensation claims against the state and the content of the ARSCOSS-B. While the special regulation of state liability is always possible and admissible, the fact that the compensation is not subject to ARSCOSS-B cannot by itself carry any particular weight in determining whether the Constitutional Court should find an occurrence of unconstitutional consequences in terms of the first paragraph of Article 21 of RPIA. The Constitutional Court, without considering the question of whether the failure to adopt the necessary legislative regulation, as established by a decision of the Constitutional Court, might entail unlawful conduct in terms of Article 26 of the Constitution,<sup>27</sup> or the question of whether, in the event this unlawful conduct is substantiated, other elements of state liability would be established, observes that the legislature can at any time regulate these questions separately. Already in Decision No. U-II-1/04, dated 26 February 2004, the Constitutional Court took the view that a complete exclusion of the right to claim damages for the unlawful conduct of the state (provided the constitutional and statutory conditions for such a claim are met) is contrary to Article 26 of the Constitution.<sup>28</sup> However, this situation also concerns a human right which can be limited pursuant to the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution,<sup>29</sup> of course under the conditions of the so-called strict test of proportionality.

44. The claim of the proposers of the referendum that on the basis of decisions issued pursuant to the ARSCOSS and the ARSCOSS-B, new claims can be made in respect of various rights is also not true, except insofar as the decisions can be used in future proceedings as evidence of compliance with the condition of permanent residence in the Republic of Slovenia. The Constitutional Court emphasizes that the retroactive recognition of permanent residence within the meaning of Decision No. U-I-246/02 does not create new rights for these individuals and does not retroactively create new legal relationships, as that is of course not possible. In addition, the issuance of decisions “retroactively” on the basis of the ARSCOSS-B does not by itself interfere with earlier

27 The Supreme Court, for example, already ruled on the issue of legislative unlawfulness in Judgment No. II Ips 800/2006, dated 24 June 2009, in which it stated that the legislature's liability for damages can be justified only by the most serious violations of the constitutional provisions and fundamental standards of civilization. It did not state among these violations that the Constitutional Court abrogated as unconstitutional the third paragraph of Article 40 of the CRSA to the extent that it referred, inter alia, to the grounds of danger to the public order.

28 This constitutional provision guarantees everyone the right to compensation for damage caused through unlawful acts in connection with the performance of any function or other activity by a person or body performing such function or activity under state authority, local community authority, or as a bearer of public authority.

29 The Constitution allows for the exclusion (or suspension) of individual human rights only in the event of a war or state of emergency, and only temporarily (Article 16 of the Constitution), while absolutely prohibiting such for certain rights. In the third paragraph of Article 15 the Constitution does not mention the suspension (or exclusion) of human rights. Therefore, they cannot be suspended by a law but only limited.

decisions of the competent authorities in respect of individual rights related to permanent residence. Such decisions became final if the individuals concerned did not challenge them, and can no longer be interfered with on the basis of the ARSCOSS-B. There were legal remedies (including the constitutional complaint) available in order to challenge the administrative decisions, and, as evidenced by the decisions of the Constitutional Court referred to in paragraph 22 of this decision, the individuals who used these remedies have succeeded in securing their rights and legal interests.

45. Certain allegations that the proposers made in response to the request of the National Assembly indicate that they do not really want a referendum which would decide whether the adopted Act eliminates the established unconstitutionality in a manner consistent with the Constitution. The proposers argue that there never was any unconstitutionality. To a large extent, however, they refer to some unnamed legal experts and through these experts express the view that the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia had “an indisputable obligation to apply for Slovene citizenship or the status of an alien with permanent residence”. Referring to these unnamed experts, they also wonder whether “the so-called erased” are not themselves to blame for the situation “due to their own failure to comply with the law in force or to use the legal remedies available to them”. They further contend that the “the competent national authorities [...] found it perfectly legal that those who have not applied to regularise their citizenship or alien status do not wish to live in the Republic of Slovenia or are not present here at all”. The proposers of the referendum openly attack and reject Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-246/02. They believe that the Act should provide for a “mandatory review” of the decisions issued on the basis of Point 8 of the operative provisions of the constitutional decision. Again with reference to the unnamed legal experts, they express the view that a decision of the Constitutional Court “cannot entail a basis for the issuance of individual administrative decisions” and that therefore the decisions issued on the basis of Point 8 of the operative provisions of this decision are “legally questionable”, although the Constitutional Court already expressly stated in its Order No. U-II-3/03 that the national authorities were to follow the part of the decision which, pursuant to the second paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA, regulates the manner of implementation [of the decision], until the legislature adopts a different regulation. Namely, in a state governed by the rule of law the decisions of the Constitutional Court, which, pursuant to the third paragraph of Article 1 of the CCA, are binding, must be complied with regardless of whether legal experts express doubts about them. The national authorities and therefore also the administrative authorities are bound by a decision of the Constitutional Court and cannot be absolved of this duty to comply by any concerns of the experts, even if these are justified. In order to comply with the decision of the Constitutional Court, the referendum may not, in terms of substance, entail to any degree a decision on whether certain issues should be regulated in a manner consistent with the Constitution. Such a legislative referendum would constitute a referendum on a decision and the authority of the Constitutional Court (therefore on whether there is any unconstitutionality and whether it should be eliminated at all); as such, it would be inadmissible (see Constitutional Court Order No. U-II-3/03).

B – V

46. On the basis of weighing the constitutional values at issue and taking into account the relevant circumstances, including the fact that (1) the regulation proposed by the National Assembly remedies the unconstitutionality found by the Constitutional Court Decision no. U-I-246/02, (2) by adopting the ARSCOSS-B, the National Assembly only provided for the remedy of unconstitutionality and the regulation of some urgent and related issues, (3) the ARSCOSS-B cannot be accused of unconstitutionality as alleged by the proposers of the referendum; (4) the National Assembly could not remedy the fundamental unconstitutionality in any other manner, and that even if the ARSCOSS-B were to be rejected at a referendum; (5) more than seven years have passed since the adoption of the Constitutional Court Decision no. U-I-246/02; the Constitutional Court held, for the reasons set out in the reasoning part of the Decision, that other constitutional values must prevail. The implementation of the ARSCOSS-B and the issuance of acts on its basis will remedy all the established unconstitutionality which have arisen as a result of the erasure of persons from the register of permanent residents; their human rights and fundamental freedoms will also be protected in a manner consistent with the Constitution, as the legislature has thereby fulfilled all obligations arising from the decisions of the Constitutional Court. In this case, it is therefore necessary to give priority to the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution), the right to equality before the law (the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution), the right to personal dignity and safety (Article 34 of the Constitution), the right to obtain redress for the violations of human rights (the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution) as well as the authority of the Constitutional Court (Article 2 and the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution) over the right to decision-making at a referendum. The continuation of the unconstitutional situation as a result of the rejection of the ARSCOSS-B at a referendum would be intolerable from the point of view of the Constitution. Therefore, the Constitutional Court upheld the applicant's position that unconstitutional consequences would occur due to the rejection of the ARSCOSS-B at a referendum.

C

47. The Constitutional Court reached this decision on the basis of Article 21 of the RPIA and the third indent of the second paragraph of Article 46 of the Rules of Procedure of the Constitutional Court (Official Gazette RS, No. 86/07), composed of: Jože Tratnik, President, and Judges Dr Mitja Deisinger, Mag. Marta Klampfer, Mag. Marija Krisper Kramberger, Mag. Miroslav Mozetič, Dr Ernest Petrič, Jasna Pogačar, Mag. Jadranka Sovdat, and Jan Zobec. The decision was reached by seven votes against two. Judges Deisinger and Mozetič voted against and submitted dissenting opinions. Judges Pogačar, Sovdat, and Zobec submitted concurring opinions.

Jože Tratnik
President

1. I voted against the Decision because I am of the opinion that the basic precondition requiring the prohibition of the referendum was not fulfilled, namely the occurrence of unconstitutional consequences that would result from the rejection of the Act Amending and Supplementing the Act on the Regulation of the Status of Citizens of Other Successor States to the Former SFRY in the Republic of Slovenia (ARSCOSS-B).
2. The provision of Article 21 of the Referendum and Public Initiative Act (RPIA) is formulated on ill-considered premises, namely it is based on the assumption that the Act would be rejected in the referendum, while the unconstitutional consequences are defined only as a possibility. It is absurd to consider that a referendum may be prohibited even if the Act would definitely be approved in the referendum. If the referendum is prohibited, this indisputably results in a violation of the human rights of the potential participants in the referendum and, on the other hand, in the establishment of potential unconstitutional consequences of the referendum. For this reason, the other side of the provision of Article 21 of the RPIA should be interpreted as the reliable establishment of the occurrence of unconstitutional consequences due to the rejection of the Act. A virtual or vague possibility of the occurrence of such consequences would distort the meaning of the above-mentioned legal regulation. There is another particularity in Article 21 of the RPIA, namely the prohibition of the referendum follows already if unconstitutional consequences would occur as a result of the postponement of the enforcement of the Act. The Constitutional Court thus must find that unconstitutional consequences would occur already immediately after the Act has been adopted but not yet entered into force, because it is illogical that they would occur only after the Act has been rejected in the referendum.
3. When adopting a decision in compliance with Article 21 of the RPIA, the Constitutional Court is put in a special position, namely it must establish whether unconstitutional consequences exist or would arise, i.e. it must establish the existing or future state of the facts. Therefore, in the case at issue it had to find whether the Act had been adopted based on the previous decisions of the Constitutional Court so as to remedy unconstitutionality, or whether it would be possible to remedy the unconstitutional consequences despite the failure to implement the Act. A decision of the Constitutional Court finding an unconstitutionality and a request by it to remedy this by an act are not sufficient. The Constitutional Court must verify whether the actual situation has changed upon a call for a referendum and/or whether it is possible to remedy the unconstitutional consequences in some other way, as it is obliged to do so in compliance with Article 21 of the RPIA.
4. I shall focus only on the issue of the occurrence of unconstitutional consequences, given the fact that this formal condition must be fulfilled or else the methods of the Constitutional Court's review of the request of the National Assembly to prohibit the referendum cannot be considered at all.
5. Notwithstanding the previous decisions of the Constitutional Court [on this issue], this case, No. U-II-1/10, involves an assessment of the current situation, which differs from the situation at the time those decisions were issued. The assessment pursuant to Article 21 of the RPIA can only be based on the assumption that the rejection of the Act in the referendum would render it absolutely impossible to resolve the status of the erased persons by means of retroactive recognition of permanent residence.

6. Without the amended Act (ARSCOSS-B) and according to the data of Ministry of the Interior, dated 17 May 2010 (reply to indent 8 on page 4), 6,387 supplementary decisions were issued in compliance with Point 8 of the operative provisions of Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-246/02, retroactively recognising the right to permanent residence status in the Republic of Slovenia as of the day of erasure from the register. The supplementary decisions were issued to 3,585 persons who acquired citizenship of the Republic of Slovenia and to others who did not acquire citizenship. In Paragraph 45 of its Decision No. U-II-1/10, the Constitutional Court expressly emphasised that the retroactive recognition of residence had not been unlawful. In the event the Act were to be rejected in the referendum, there would be no reason for not approving [an application for permanent residence] in the same way for other applicants too. The likelihood of unconstitutional consequences therefore cannot be attributed to the potential rejection of the Act.
7. Moreover, Paragraph 27 of the Decision stipulates that the amended Act also regulates the status of the children of the erased persons, which had not been considered problematic in previous decisions of the Constitutional Court. Even without the amended Act, these children can acquire permanent residence if they are of full age, whereas in the case of minors, their parents as their legal representatives or their guardians can arrange such on their behalf.
8. I agree that the legislature is bound by the decisions of the Constitutional Court and, in this respect, the adoption of the ARSCOSS complies with this basic premise. Nevertheless, when deciding pursuant to Article 21 of the RPIA, the Constitutional Court cannot ignore the assessment regarding the occurrence of unconstitutional consequences. Point 8 of the operative provisions of Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-246/02 is substantively the same as the essential substance of the ARSCOSS-B and in an appropriate manner enables recognition of permanent residence status as of the day of removal from the register. Even if there was a referendum that approved or rejected the Act, the authority of the Constitutional Court would not be undermined as its decision would substitute for the Act if the latter was rejected.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE MAG. MIROSLAV MOZETIČ, JOINED BY JUDGE DR MITJA DEISINGER

I

1. I voted against the Decision on the prohibition of the referendum on the Act Amending the Act on the Regulation of the Status of Citizens of Other Successor

States to the Former SFRY in the Republic of Slovenia (ARSCOSS-B) since due to its rejection unconstitutional consequences would occur. These unconstitutional consequences are related to the continuation of the unconstitutionality established by Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-246/02, dated 3 April 2003, and particularly to the fact that the mentioned Decision of the Constitutional Court has not yet been implemented. The proposed Act, which was adopted by the National Assembly, is intended to eliminate these unconstitutionality. The reasons for the “prohibition” of the referendum have not convinced me and I believe that the potential rejection of the Act in the referendum would not result in such severe unconstitutional consequences that, considering the affected constitutional rights, it would be permissible to interfere with the constitutional right to decision-making in a referendum.

2. In order to dispel any doubts, I fully support the position of the Constitutional Court, consistently repeated in a series of decisions, that its decisions are binding and that (if an act is found unconstitutional) the National Assembly must comply with the decisions and implement them and that any non-compliance with the decisions of the Constitutional Court entails a serious violation of the Constitution. I also agree with the position that neither the National Assembly nor the voters in a referendum may directly decide on whether or not to comply with a decision of the Constitutional Court,<sup>1</sup> even though this happens frequently, most often indirectly, when the National Assembly does not adopt an appropriate act or, even though it adopts such act, it fails to regulate the issue concerned in accordance with the decision of the Constitutional Court or regulates it in such a way that it is not in compliance with the Constitution. A similar thing would happen if the voters did not approve in a referendum an act eliminating an unconstitutionality established by a decision of the Constitutional Court. Nevertheless, I believe that such a violation of the Constitution (non-compliance with a decision of the Constitutional Court) in itself cannot be the only reason for prohibiting a referendum. I do not agree with the position that the fact that a decision of the Constitutional Court has not been implemented is in itself an unconstitutional consequence. This is a dangerous position which can result in a situation in which we would have to prohibit every referendum which the National Assembly believed could cause unconstitutional consequences or that unconstitutional consequences could continue to exist in the sense of Article 21 of the RPIA (even without particular reasoning). Such an unconstitutional situation can be sanctioned by the Constitutional Court within the framework of its competences by imposing stricter sanctions (declaratory, abrogating decision) and particularly by defining the manner of the execution [of its decisions] which can even be used to determine that a temporary regulation to fill a gap or replace an abrogated legal provision.
3. In my opinion, it is not even very important in the case at issue whether the right to vote in a referendum is a human right or a general constitutional right. In my personal opinion, it above all entails the exercise of power (competence) arising from the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution. A referendum is one of the forms of direct decision-making by citizens (voters) on issues regulated by law (the first paragraph of Article 90).<sup>2</sup> Nevertheless, certain conditions have to be fulfilled in order to enable the exercise of such competence or the implementation of this general constitutional or human right.<sup>3</sup> This can be decided by the National Assembly or required by the National Council, by a certain number of deputies of the National Assembly, or by a certain number of citizens. This competence or right cannot be affected merely by the issue of who initiated the process of deciding in a referendum. In any case, it is the “representatives” of the citizens (voters) and we can say that (maybe somewhat pathetically) this procedure is always triggered by the citizens, directly or indirectly, who would like to decide on a specific act. In the event of this procedure, voting on an act in a referendum is the last step in the process of adopting an act.<sup>4</sup> Therefore, the fact that voting in a referendum is only possible upon request does not make this any less a constitutional (human) right. It cannot be otherwise, because of the nature of this decision, since it is not a right to be exercised periodically. It is only exercised upon request. The determination of eligible proposers prevents this right from being exercised in an ill-considered manner.<sup>5</sup>

1 Nevertheless, there is a certain amount of pathetic exaggeration in the position that permitting the referendum could “jeopardise the very existence of the Constitutional Court”.

4. What could be the reason, in my opinion, for prohibiting the referendum? If I base my deliberation on Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-47/94, dated 19 January 1995 (Official Gazette of the RS, No. 13/95, and OdlUS IV, 4), an interference with the right to decide in a referendum, which is a human right, is only possible if it is required for the protection of human rights or allowed by the Constitution itself. The Constitution foresees no particular limitations of this right. An interference with the right to decide in a referendum is thus only allowed if required for the protection of the human rights of others. The RPIA grants the competence for such a review to the Constitutional Court (the first paragraph of Article 21), which decides the issue upon the request of the National Assembly.
5. When the National Assembly receives a request to call a referendum, it is obliged to do so unless it believes that a [referendum] decision to enforce or reject an act could result in unconstitutional consequences (the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA). In such a case, it must request within the specified deadline that the Constitutional Court decide on the issue. The Constitutional Court thus reviews if the opinion of the National Assembly that there could be unconstitutional consequences is justified or not and then assesses on the basis of Decision No. U-I-47/94 if the re-

2 Considering this position and concurring that it is not a human right, the question arises if an act can, at all, interfere with the constitutional right of the voters to decide on all issues regulated by an act in a referendum. The Constitution gives no such authority to the legislature, nor does it contain any limiting provisions. From this point of view, Article 21 of the RPIA is also problematic.

3 This is a human right according to Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-47/94.

4 The RPIA regulates the subsequent legislative referendum approving an act.

5 Abuses are, of course, possible. There are many different ways to influence and in a way manipulate citizens voting in a referendum. Nevertheless, this can also be done with voters in elections (as these are the same people), and the members of a legislature are far from immune to different attempts at influencing their decisions.

jection of the act in a referendum would indeed affect such significant constitutional rights that, considering the affected constitutional rights, it would be permissible to interfere with the constitutional right to decide in a referendum (i.e. to prohibit the referendum). I disagree with the position that the National Assembly need not justify its claim that the rejection of the act could result in unconstitutional consequences and that the mere claim and reference to a decision of the Constitutional Court is sufficient. I believe that such a position is not based on the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA.

6. This is a case of weighing between constitutional rights. On the one hand there are the constitutional rights that are being violated (which has in this specific case been established by the Constitutional Court) and on the other hand there is the constitutional right to a referendum. In this specific case, the weighing must also take into account if the established unconstitutionality would still actually exist, even if the act had not been passed, which answers the key question of whether the rejection of the act at the referendum would indeed result in the occurrence (or continuation) of unconstitutional consequences, reflected in the violation of the rights of affected individuals. It is thus necessary to establish not only if the legislature at the legislative level (abstractly) complies with the Decision of the Constitutional Court but also, and particularly, if the actual state or circumstances that represented (or still represent) the violation of human rights on which the Decision of the Constitutional Court was based still exist. This finding is important when weighing which rights should be given priority. It is clearly evident from the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA that it is the National Assembly which has to reason the existence or occurrence of such unconstitutional consequences, i.e. to reason its opinion that unconstitutional consequences would occur. In my opinion, it is not enough that it merely claims that the proposed act implemented the Decision of the Constitutional Court.

II

7. There is no dispute that the position of the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who had permanent residence in Slovenia as of 26 February 1992 but failed to apply for Slovene citizenship or had their application rejected, has not been regulated in a legal manner. The Constitutional Court encountered this issue several times in the procedures for reviewing regulations and the procedures involving a constitutional appeal and assessed such situation as unconstitutional.
8. Thus, the unconstitutionality of a legal regulation relating to the legal position of the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who were removed from the register of permanent residents in Slovenia was established for the first time in Decision No. U-I-284/94, dated 4 February 1999 (Official Gazette of the RS, No. 14/99 of 12 March 1999). It was established that the AA was in conflict with the Constitution since it did not stipulate the conditions for obtaining a permanent residence permit by the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who decided not to apply for citizenship of the Republic of Slovenia or who have had their application for citizenship rejected. The position of the Constitutional Court was that the general regulation of permits for temporary and permanent residence was not suitable for the position in which the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia found themselves, since it failed to take into account that these persons had valid permanent residence status and actually resided in the territory of Slovenia. It pointed out that it was the permanent residence status and actually residing in the territory of Slovenia that put these persons in a position that required special regulation. It is also prohibited the imposition of the measure of forcible removal from the Republic of Slovenia on such persons.

9. The National Assembly responded to Decision No. U-I-284/94 by passing the Act on the Regulation of the Status of Citizens of Other Successor States to the Former SFRY in the Republic of Slovenia (Official Gazette of the RS, No. 61/99, ARSCOSS). This Act allowed the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who were removed from the register of permanent residents to obtain a permanent residence permit. Furthermore, Article 19 of the Act Amending the Citizenship of the Republic of Slovenia Act (Official Gazette of the RS, No. 96/02) implemented the possibility that a person with permanent residence on 23 December 1992 who actually lived in the Republic of Slovenia as of that day may obtain citizenship of the Republic of Slovenia under more favourable conditions.
10. According to the data of the Ministry of the Interior which the Constitutional Court received in relation to case No. U-I-246/02, 18,305 citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who were registered on 26 February 1992 as permanent residents in the Republic of Slovenia were transferred from the register of permanent residents to the records kept on aliens. Based on the explanations of the Ministry of the Interior, dated 17 May 2010 (in case No. U-II-1/10), it is evident that the stated numbers of those “erased or transferred” were obtained by comparing the computer records and the physical records. According to the computer records, 29,064 persons were “erased”. After comparing the two records it was established that 10,759 persons deregistered their permanent residence and emigrated. Of the remaining 18,305 persons, 12,937 filed an application according to the ARSCOSS and 1,033 according to the Aliens Act, i.e. a total of 13,080 persons. The mentioned persons who filed an application in accordance with the Aliens Act obtained a permanent residence permit under the ARSCOSS, since this was more favourable for them. Of the total of 12,047 applications, 10,713 were granted, 288 rejected, and 97 dismissed and 949 procedures were stayed because of the withdrawal of the application or because the alien became a citizen of the Republic of Slovenia in the interim. It can be established that practically all persons who lodged an application managed to obtain a permanent residence permit or citizenship. It can also be established that approximately 5,225 persons failed to lodge an application by the specified deadline, i.e. 28 December 1999 (three months after the entry into force of the Act, which took place on the sixtieth day after the publication of the Act, i.e. 30 July 1999).
11. In view of the stated data, I therefore agree with the finding of the majority, namely that the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia removed from the register of permanent residents who actually resided in Slovenia, were able to regulate their legal status on the basis of the ARSCOSS or the CRSA-Č, and I add, of course, if they wanted to. Nevertheless, I am not convinced of the accuracy of the finding that those who were “forcibly removed” or left Slovenia for other erasure-related reasons and who did not actually reside in Slovenia upon the entry into force of the ARSCOSS were not allowed to exercise these rights. We do not even know if they were indeed deported, since the Ministry of the Interior maintained no records of this. In Decision No. U-I-246/02 the Constitutional Court found that few persons were deported since the measure was rarely imposed because the unregulated residence status of the citizens of other republics was generally tolerated (Paragraph 27 of the reasoning). In addition, the Constitutional Court prohibited the imposition of the measure of forcible removal by Decision No. U-I-284/94 (published in the Official Gazette, dated 12 March 1999). Albeit, I agree that such cases cannot be completely excluded.

12. By Decision No. U-I-246/02, dated 3 April 2003 (Official Gazette of the RS, No. 36/03, dated 16 April 2003), the Constitutional Court established the unconstitutionality of the ARSCOSS (after the enforcement of the ARSCOSS-A) since it did not determine retroactive recognition of permanent residence status, i.e. for the entire period since the erasure, for the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who were removed from the register of permanent residents on 26 February 1992. With the mentioned Decision the Constitutional Court established the unconstitutionality of the ARSCOSS also because it failed to regulate the acquisition of a permanent residence permit for those individuals who were forcibly removed from the country as aliens and since it did not define the notion of actual presence in the Republic of Slovenia that needed to be proved by the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia in order to obtain a permanent residence permit under the provision of retroactive recognition of permanent residence status; in particular, the Act should determine the period of absence after which the condition of actual residence is no longer fulfilled. The Constitutional Court also abrogated the provision that determined the deadline for submitting the application.
13. The mentioned Decision had not been (legally) implemented until the adoption of the proposed Act on the Regulation of the Status of Citizens of Other Successor States to the Former SFRY in the Republic of Slovenia (the ARSCOSS-B) for which a request was filed that it should be approved by the voters in a referendum and which is now the subject of review before the Constitutional Court (in this Decision, No. U-II-1/10). This does not mean that the applications that were filed have not been resolved and because of the abrogation of the deadline for submission, new applications could have been filed.
14. According to the data of the Ministry of the Interior, 724 persons obtained permanent residence permits and 2,070 obtained citizenship in the period from the adoption of Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-246/02 (published on 16 April 2003) until 11 May 2010. In the same period, 162 applications were allegedly rejected, 128 dismissed and in 469 cases the procedure was stayed. In total, 3,553 persons filed applications. According to the data, 5,225 persons did not submit an application until 19 February 2003 and if we subtract the 3,553 persons we can establish that 1,672 persons did not submit an application. Considering the fact that many of these persons might have died by now, the number becomes even smaller. The Ministry of the Interior provides a different number of unresolved cases, but they based their calculations on the number of 25,671 erased persons. It is not too convincing in explaining where this figure originates from. The most probable cause resulting from the report of the Ministry of the Interior is that records have not been kept up-to-date since 2003 and that there were obviously still discrepancies between computer and physical records. The fact is, namely, that the data on submitted applications and resolved applications (one way or another) are approximately the same in both reports of the Ministry of the Interior and that the only difference is in the data on the “erased”.

15. These data point to the fact that surprisingly few persons applied for regulation of their status after the publication of Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-246/02. The reason for this is unknown. Nevertheless, we can claim with a reasonable level of probability that after the publication of Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-246/02 all the erased persons had the possibility to file an application to regulate their status even if they left Slovenia because of their erasure or even if they were forcibly removed. In my opinion, the fact that the Constitutional Court established certain unconstitutionality cannot be cause enough for them not taking action [regarding the situation]. As indicated, those who missed the deadline had another opportunity to file an application due to the fact that this provision was abrogated. Even though the Constitutional Court found that the legal term “actual continuous residence” is undetermined to the point that it represents a violation of Article 23 of the Constitution and ordered that it be specified in more detail, the reasoning of the Decision indicates how the term should be interpreted, in particular, the issue of when the interruption of continuous residence occurred. In this framework it was also possible to resolve the cases in which the measure of the forcible removal of an alien was pronounced (which was only possible until 12 March 1999). As frequently highlighted by the Constitutional Court, the interpretation of undefined legal notions lies within the competence of the regular courts. The decisions of the Constitutional Court in procedures involving a constitutional complaint (see point 34 of the reasoning of the mentioned Decision) also contributed to the interpretation of this term. It is interesting that some of the stated decisions were issued prior to the publication of Decision No. U-I-246/02. Furthermore, the Decision states that the existence of permanent residence status must be determined for the entire time after erasure. In addition to finding that very few applications were filed after the publication of the Decision of the Constitutional Court (compared with the most recent data of the Ministry of the Interior on the number of erased persons with unresolved status), the fact that relatively few court proceedings were initiated is also somewhat surprising. We could observe that this indicated the lack of action (lack of interest) on the part of those affected rather than the unwillingness of the Republic of Slovenia to resolve these issues after the adoption of both decisions of the Constitutional Court.
16. In view of the above, it could be concluded that all those interested have had the opportunity to file an application to resolve their status and that the others probably have no intention of doing so. Nevertheless, if there are still individuals who wish to file an application, they can do so on the basis of the applicable Act. Despite that, I cannot agree with the position that the Act must be amended in order to be able to resolve the applications of the “erased persons” who have not yet regulated their status because they filed no application.<sup>6</sup> Nonetheless, this is negated by the fact that practically all applications filed after the publication of Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-246/02 have been granted.

17. I therefore conclude that the National Assembly failed to adequately reason its opinion that the potential rejection of the Act would result in such severe unconstitutional consequences that this would justify an interference with voters’ constitutional right to decide on the Act in a referendum.
18. Of course, this does not mean that if the Act were rejected at the referendum, the National Assembly would be freed from the obligation to try again to regulate these issues in other ways, where possible. And it would most certainly not excuse the administrative bodies from deciding on all the applications, taking into account all the positions of the Constitutional Court, and this would apply even more strictly to the courts which would interpret the undetermined legal term “actual uninterrupted residence” when deciding on judicial protection. In my opinion, it is clearly evident from the Decision of the Constitutional Court that when resolving the applications of all those who meet the prescribed conditions it must be established that they were entitled to permanent residence for the entire period after erasure. This does not mean that I am claiming that all the “erased persons” have already regulated their status; I only say that the National Assembly failed to justify the existence of such an unconstitutional state that would justify the prohibition of referendum. Moreover, it cannot be said that by stating the figures I only tried to illustrate that the number of unresolved issues was small and that therefore the claimed unconstitutional consequences were not severe enough. The purpose of stating the figures was sufficiently clarified in the previous paragraphs. I dare anticipate that the number of unresolved issues stated by the Ministry of the Interior in the most recent communication will not change much or at all until the expiry of the deadline for submitting applications determined anew by the present Act. The issue of the “erased persons”, at least in terms of permanent residence status, will thus be resolved upon the expiry of the legal deadline for submitting applications; until that time, it is possible to manipulate the “large” numbers presented by the Ministry of the Interior.

<sup>6</sup> The Act further regulates some issues that arose with the passage of time which can be resolved on the basis of adequate interpretation.

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE MAG. JADRANKA SOVDAT

1. I voted for the Decision since I agree with the reasons substantiating the review of the Constitutional Court in this matter. After the Constitutional Court established several times, in its previous decisions related to the issue of erasure from the register of permanent residents, that there were unconstitutional consequences and that the legislature should respond as soon as possible to the unconstitutionality established in Decision No. U-I-246/02 dated 3 April 2003 (Official Gazette of the RS, No. 36/03, and OdlUS XII, 24), there really should be especially well-founded constitutional reasons based on which the unconstitutionality could continue. More on this will be presented below. I would first like to present the constitutional considerations I have with regard to the statutory regulation of the legislative referendum and related competence of the Constitutional Court stipulated in the first paragraph of Article 21 of the Referendum and Public Initiative Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 26/07 – official consolidated text – hereinafter: the RPIA). However, I am aware that the basis of my concerns and the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA are so directly interconnected that a completely different statutory regulation would be required. Therefore, these questions can only be posed in relation to the future but they cannot change the “game” in the middle of which we have found ourselves. It started with the request of the proposers of the referendum and continued with the request of the National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia for the evaluation of unconstitutional consequences, and according to the applicable law it needs to actually end with the decision of the Constitutional Court adopted on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA. However, there are two reasons for writing this opinion. The first relates to my concerns regarding the regulation of the constitutional review of the admissibility of legislative referenda, whereas the second relates to the issues that were the focus of this case.

I

2. At the time of the entry into force of the RPIA (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94) Article 10 stipulated that a legislative referendum cannot be called if it concerns acts passed by the shortened procedure, when such is required by an emergency, the defence of the state, or natural disasters, acts adopted on direct execution of the state budget,<sup>1</sup> or acts adopted to implement ratified treaties. In addition, the first paragraph of Article 16 determined the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court to review, upon the request of the National Assembly, whether the content of a call for a referendum is contrary to the Constitution. By Decision No. U-I-47/94, dated 19 January 1995 (Official Gazette RS, No. 13/95, and OdlUS IV, 4), the Constitutional Court abrogated Article 10 and established the unconstitutionality of Article 15 since it did not provide any jurisdictional protection against a decision of the National Assembly to not call a referendum. In the reasoning of the Decision the Constitutional Court stated:

---

1 It is interesting that the pension and health care “funds” were not taken into consideration by the legislature.

“In view of the fact that Article 90 entails the constitutional implementation of the constitutional right to direct decision-making of citizens determined by Article 44 of the Constitution, and also because the right of 40,000 voters to require a referendum, which is encompassed in Article 90, it can be considered a “human right” under the legal regime referred to in Article 15 of the Constitution, the provisions of the second and third paragraphs of Article 15 of the Constitution also apply for potential statutory interferences with the provisions of Article 90 (insofar as they refer to this constitutional right).” On these grounds it decided that the statutory exclusion of certain legislative referenda is a measure that is not necessary since a less restrictive measure could be used in order to grant protection to an objective allowed by the Constitution – i.e. either the right of others or the public interest.<sup>2</sup> A less restrictive measure was seen in the fact that the Constitutional Court could in each individual case review “whether the suspension of the implementation of this law due to a referendum or its non-implementation would truly affect such an important constitutional right that, due to this – upon weighing the affected constitutional values – it would be permissible to interfere with the constitutional right to decision-making in a referendum”. The big question is whether today with all the experience gained through the review of the admissibility of previous as well as subsequent legislative referenda, the same decision would be made concerning the legislature being denied the possibility to evaluate in advance the inadmissibility of certain legislative referenda (the abrogated Article 10) as well as whether the right to referendum decision-making – therefore, the right to vote in a referendum required by eligible legislative referendum proposers determined in the second paragraph of Article 90 of the Constitution – is actually a human right, as the Constitutional Court has repeated and continues to repeat in numerous decisions.

3. First it needs to be established that in Decision No. U-I-47/94 not even the Constitutional Court itself declared the right to referendum decision-making a human right. It linked this right to Article 44 of the Constitution and characterised it as a human right considering that a call for a legislative referendum can be required by 40,000 voters and even in this decision the words human right are in inverted commas. In a way, it assigned 40,000 voters, as one of the eligible legislative referendum proposers, the role of exercising a human right.<sup>3</sup> Therefore, we are dealing with two aspects of this human right – the right to require a referendum and the right to vote in a referendum as an expression of direct participation in the management of public affairs. It should be noted, however, that the right to vote in a referendum is actually the primary right. Only if this right exists as a human right can the first right mentioned also be recognized as being of the same nature. Since in that Decision the Constitutional Court linked Article 90 of the Constitution to the right determined by Article 44 of the Constitution, the question arises what the content of this right actually is.<sup>4</sup> Even if there was no such provision in the Constitution, a legislative referendum would entail an implementation of the constitutional right to direct decision-making power of the citizens arising from the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution [“In Slovenia power is vested in the people. Citizens exercise this power directly and through elections”]. In the Commentary on the Constitution, Prof. Čebulj states that the right determined by Article 44 of the Constitution entails “a general constitutional right [that] has no separate statutory regulation, but is exercised within the legislation concerning local self-government, the referendum and public initiative, and elections.”<sup>5</sup> The same definition is provided by Prof. Grad,<sup>6</sup> who states that it is a “general constitutional right exercised through other constitutional rights that in a more concrete manner regulate the participation of citizens in the management of public affairs, in particular, for example, local self-government, the referendum and public initiative, and elections.”<sup>7</sup> Local self-government is a constitutional right that the Constitution explicitly grants in Article 9 (among the general provisions) and regulates in Chapter V in more detail. It is therefore a constitutional right but not a human right. Similarly as with self-government, the Constitution also regulates a referendum or direct implementation (in this case legislative) of the power referred to in the second paragraph of Article 3 (thus among the general provisions) and in Article 90 (in Chapter IV a), where it regulates the National Assembly). Therefore, in terms of systemic-technical considerations, this is the same regulation. Yet, for referendum decision-making the Constitutional Court established the criteria of review arising from the second and the third paragraphs of Article 15 of the Constitution i.e. such review that only applies to human rights but not to other constitutional rights lacking this legal nature, while in the case of local self-government this was not the case. As we have seen, both local self-government and the referendum are related in the same way to Article 44 of the Constitution.

2 Already in decisions reached prior to this decision, as well as in some subsequent decisions, the Constitutional Court stated that the public interest is a constitutionally admissible aim, on the basis of which a human right can be restricted in accordance with the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution (see F. Testen in: L. Šturm (ed.), Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije [Commentary on the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia], Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Ljubljana 2002, p. 200).

4. Was the reason for the application of the criteria that apply to the manner of exercising or restricting human rights the similarity between the right to vote and the right to decision-making in a referendum? The right to vote is undoubtedly a human right. The Constitution regulates it as such in Article 43, although its relevant elements – in this discussion the principle of periodicity is of particular importance for its exercise – are also regulated in other provisions of the Constitution (the first paragraph of Article 81, the second paragraph of Article 98, and the third paragraph of Article 103). And it is the principle of periodicity and thus the periodic exercise of the right to vote that in my opinion makes the right to vote significantly different from the right to vote in a referendum. This principle attributes the right to vote its universal character, for at the end of certain a period (i.e. a term of office) its exercise does not depend on whether a definite number of citizens or politicians will want it to be exercised since the periodicity regarding its exercise is ordered; however, an early election can trigger the exercise of this right outside of the intervals planned, but surely and always upon the expiry of the term of office. This content of the voting right as a human right is without a doubt explicitly stated in Article 3 of Protocol No. 1 to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter: ECHR).<sup>8</sup> As regards the right to vote in a referendum, the situation is essentially different. In addition to the fact that, on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 90 of the Constitution, every citizen (being a voter) has the right to require, together with 39,999 other citizens (being voters), that a referendum be called (and in Decision no. U-I-47/94 the Constitutional Court in particular exposed this aspect, but as I have already pointed out, this right is, in my opinion, secondary), it is characteristic of the right to vote in a legislative referendum that as citizens (being also voters) we can only exercise it when the politicians we have elected (i.e. the National Assembly, one third of the deputies of the National Assembly, or the National Council) so decide. And this can be several times a year, every ten years, or ad absurdum never. Unusual for a human right. Although as regards the manner of its exercise, the right to vote in a referendum is exercised similarly as the right to vote, namely it also reflects the declaration of the will of a citizen entailing decision-making, this is nevertheless not a decision on who to vest with the legislative power, but rather a decision on the content of the matter to be approved (or not) in a referendum,<sup>9</sup> and based on this the right to vote in a referendum differs significantly from the right to vote. Thus the question arises whether the decision of the Constitutional Court on the basis of which the right to vote in a referendum is considered a human right (since then the two words have been written without inverted commas) was the right one. It is true that the development of human rights can lead to an individual right being proclaimed a human right earlier in certain countries, and due to its proclamation as such there is no need to wait for its general recognition in the international community. Still, the question arises whether, in accordance with the nature of human rights, the same really applies to the right to vote in a referendum.

4 The Constitutional Court states that Article 90 is “a derivation of the constitutional right to the direct decision-making power of the citizens determined by Article 44 of the Constitution.”

7 Grad criticises the review of the Constitutional Court according to which the right to vote in elections to the National Council is reviewed under Article 44 of the Constitution instead of Article 43, which would be more appropriate in his opinion. It increasingly seems to me he is right.

8 Article 3 of the Protocol No. 1 to the ECHR stipulates: "The High Contracting Parties undertake to hold free elections at reasonable intervals (stressed by J.S), by secret ballot under conditions which will ensure the free expression of the opinion of the people in the choice of the legislature." There is probably no need to draw attention to the fifth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, since the interpretation of other provisions of the Constitution leads us to the same conclusion.

5. In modern countries, the direct exercise of authority has mainly been replaced by so-called representative democracy. This superseded “self-governance”,<sup>10</sup> historically already established in the ancient Greek Athenian democratic state.<sup>11</sup> All citizens over 18 years of age could vote in the People’s Assembly, which met four times a month in order to decide on the most important domestic and foreign issues.<sup>12</sup> The policy was proposed by a council consisting of 500 citizens, who were chosen by lot for a period of two years.<sup>13</sup> However, this kind of direct democracy was only possible in a small state where the number of free citizens with full rights (and male, of course) that could take part in the exercise of authority was very low. Then centuries passed before the idea of the sovereignty of the people started to appear, the idea that authority belongs to the people.<sup>14</sup> And that people can exercise it either by directly performing all or some of the offices or by electing representatives through which to exercise authority indirectly.<sup>15</sup> It became increasingly obvious that the direct exercise of authority or “self-governance” was only preserved to a minor degree and thus from the time that a middle class arose, “political (elected) representation as the basis of the democratic political form of government” was accepted.<sup>16</sup> It has also been established in the modern state, where there are simply more tasks of governance than can be performed by the people themselves.<sup>17</sup> If this is the case, does this not concern more the question of who is called to exercise authority than the exercise of a human right? Does this not concern the constitutional-political decision to establish when a legislative decision is to be taken by voters directly and when it is to be made by those entrusted by the voters to make these decisions during their term of office? And as we are already discussing the comparison with the right to vote, is it not more of, for example, an electoral system in its narrow meaning (its choice is subject to a political decision) than the periodic exercise of a right that results in entrusting power to govern to representatives of the people so elected? And if so, the question whether in terms of decision-making in a referendum we would like to resemble Switzerland (a country of numerous referenda) or France (where referenda are rare) is probably a matter of a constitutional-political decision determined by the Constitution or an act and not a matter of a human right and its (in)admissible restriction. In individual cases it is more of a political decision on whether the elected representatives of the people, by having been elected, already have the power to make decisions on a certain important issue or if they again require legitimising their decision-making.<sup>18</sup>

6. If it is a matter of a constitutional-political decision on whether we want to be a country of referenda or not and not a matter of the restriction of a human right, then the question of the need for competence determined by the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA must be raised, although it was practically “ordered” by the Constitutional Court in Decision No. U-I-47/94; it definitely “ordered” it since the basis used was the criteria applying to a human right, which in accordance with the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution inter alia needs to be ensured legal protection (this is the reason for the logical establishment of unconstitutionality under Article 15 of the RPIA). This question is posed a fortiori since the Constitutional Court later explicitly noted that it has the same competence to review the constitutionality of acts passed by the legislature as well as acts adopted (i.e. approved) by voters in a referendum.<sup>19</sup> If that is the case, then the first and the latter can give rise to the same unconstitutional consequences and the same applies to the omission of their adoption. In the event of an omission of the required statutory regulation, therefore either when no act has been adopted (after years have passed, as in this specific case) by the National Assembly, or in the event the act is rejected in a referendum. What is then actually the role of the Constitutional Court when it needs to review the [possible] occurrence of unconstitutional consequences which make the right to vote on a specific issue in a referendum yield to other constitutional values?
7. Due to the facts already mentioned in the introduction, namely that in the middle of a “game” the rules cannot be modified, and due to the necessary connection between the starting-point, which I have serious reservations about, and the jurisdiction determined in the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA, I am aware that the questions that I have and which I have emphasised can be taken into account de lege ferenda and therefore cannot influence the decision in this case. Probably this is something requiring serious reconsideration by the legislature. For this reason I have written them down. My final position on these issues is not urgently required since it cannot influence the decision-making with regard to this case, although what direction I favour can be deciphered. In the decision-making in this matter the Constitutional

18 Prof. Jambrek states: “The powers and tasks of regulatory bodies have to be given legitimacy since they stem from the people and in an identifiable manner they are the expression of the people’s will. Therefore, there should be a continuous chain of democratic legitimacy running from the people to the regulatory body and from the latter back to its source.” P. Jambrek in: L. Šturm (ed.), ibid., p. 48. Cf. F. Grad, ibid., pp. 23–24, and B. Watt, ibid., p. 11.

19 This is explicitly stated in Decision No. U-II-3/03, dated 22 December 2003 (OdlUS XII, 101). The conseil constitutionnel, in Decision No. 92-313 DC, dated 23 September 1992, stated differently that it was not competent (since this competence is not explicitly determined in either the Constitution or the organic act on the Constitutional Court) to rule on the constitutionality of an act adopted by the French people in a referendum; it referred to (the second review of) the act approving the ratification of the European Union Treaty.

Court remains a “prisoner” of the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA, which by determining the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court also determines its tasks. In its decision-making, the Constitutional Court is bound by this provision with its constitutional basis in the eleventh indent of the first paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution. Therefore, I was of the opinion that the decision-making in this matter should consider this provision and follow the explanation provided by the Constitutional Court in its previous decisions. On the basis of the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution, also the Constitutional Court is bound to ensure equality before (the Constitution and) the law. By the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA, the legislature ordered the Constitutional Court to establish, upon request, whether “unconstitutional consequences could occur due to the suspension of the implementation of the law or due to a law not being adopted”.

8. In the past four years<sup>20</sup> the Constitutional Court has been tasked with deciding on the constitutional admissibility of a legislative referendum four times. At the request of the National Assembly it established, based on what was then the first paragraph of Article 16 of the RPIA (the text of which was not very different from the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA), in Decision No. U-II-1/06 (in the case of a preliminary referendum) that the suspension of the adoption and implementation of the amendment to the Health Care and Health Insurance Act could result in unconstitutional consequences, and in the reasoning (Paragraph 17) it expressly stated that the Constitutional Court was only required to establish whether the alleged unconstitutional consequences could arise. The latter were determined by the Constitutional Court to lie in the fact that, short of a law regulating property relationships between the Vzajemna insurance company and the HIIS (the Health Insurance Institute of Slovenia) in relation to the former’s transformation into a public limited company, an interference with the property and financial standing of the HIIS might occur contrary to Article 50 of the Constitution, and consequently, this would entail an interference with the position of the insured persons paying compulsory health insurance. The reasoning of Decision No. U-II-1/06 does not indicate that the Constitutional Court weighed different constitutional values. It is obvious that it considered the mentioned reason to be sufficient to establish the occurrence of unconstitutional consequences. In Decision No. U-II-1/09, dated 5 May 2009 (Official Gazette RS, No. 35/09) it established that unconstitutional consequences would have arisen if the amendment to the Attorneys Act had been suspended or rejected based on the finding of the unconstitutionality of the applicable Attorneys Act and the Attorney Fee Tariff Act, whose unconstitutionality was, in the opinion of the Constitutional Court, remedied by the amendment. The reasoning of this Decision also does not indicate that the Constitutional Court weighed [between different constitutional values], but it shows which were the constitutional values (the right to judicial protection, the right to defence in criminal proceedings, and the right of the Bar Association of Slovenia to take part in the adoption of lawyers' fees, based on which the Constitutional Court established that unconstitutional consequences would occur. In Decision No. U-II-2/09, dated 9 November 2009 (Official Gazette RS, No. 91/09), it established that if the amended regulations on judges' salaries had been rejected at the referendum, unconstitutional consequences would have occurred. The last Decision differs from the previous ones mainly in the fact that its reasoning shows that the Constitutional Court returned to the original reasons given in Decision No. U-I-47/94, which indicate that the Constitutional Court must weigh the right to a referendum against the constitutional values that would be affected if the act was rejected at the referendum. In Decision No. U-II-2/09, the constitutional values whose protection would be ensured by the implementation of the act, including the right to judicial protection, the independence of the judiciary, and compliance with the Constitutional Court's decision, prevailed over the right to a referendum.

20 An overview of some decisions over a longer period is also provided in the dissenting opinion of Judge Prof. Ribičič in Decision No. U-II-1/06, dated 27 February 2006 (Official Gazette RS, No. 28/06, and OdlUS XV, 17).

9. The first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA has been designed so that it contains an inherent assumption based on which the Constitutional Court must assume that the act would be rejected at the referendum (if the first part of the provision referring to the suspension of the implementation is ignored), even though it is completely clear that the opposite could be the case. The deprivation of the right to vote in the referendum may therefore lead to the finding that unconstitutional consequences have occurred which would not have occurred if the citizens had voted for the act in the referendum. However, it is not up to the Constitutional Court to guess what would happen at the referendum (it is perfectly clear that it cannot do so), but it must evaluate the possibility of unconstitutional consequences occurring based on the mentioned assumption – i.e. that the act would be rejected at the referendum. Therefore, the possibility that the act might even be approved in the referendum in a specific case cannot influence the review in any way.
10. The interpretation of the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA also has to take into consideration the purpose of this provision. This purpose is indicated specifically in Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-47/94. The Constitutional Court should assess if the right to a referendum is opposed by the constitutional values that have to be given priority over the right to vote in a referendum. The latter right cannot automatically be assigned greater weight merely because it is (can be) exercised by all persons eligible to vote (and is therefore enjoyed by more eligible persons), even if it is opposed by constitutional values, including human rights, which are, given the circumstances of a specific case, provided to only a limited number of eligible persons. If this factor (the number of eligible persons) were the criterion of review, the Constitutional Court would no longer be needed to make decisions, as the number of eligible persons on the opposing side is seldom equal. Furthermore, it is necessary to take into account that the decision of the Constitutional Court on the [potential] occurrence of unconstitutional consequences does entail a limitation of the right to a referendum, but in itself does not entail that the reasons (i.e. the constitutional values) causing this limitation should be reviewed as restrictedly as possible. If on the other side of the scales there are also human rights and also other constitutional values, including such as are actually the mechanism of the state of law, ensuring the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms (e.g. the authority of the judiciary or the authority of the Constitutional Court<sup>21</sup>), then these values cannot be from the very start assigned a lesser weight than the right to a referendum. For this reason and pursuant to the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution, I believe that as long as we have the authority referred to in the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA, the approach to assessing the constitutionality of the consequences that can be expected if the act is rejected at the referendum should remain based on the position which the Constitutional Court explicitly emphasised already in Decision No. U-II-2/09. In order to abandon this position there would have to be, in my opinion, serious and well-founded reasons, which I do not see at this moment, because the interpretation of the legal text is restricted by the respective possible linguistic interpretation.<sup>22</sup>

11. The RPIA requires that we determine whether the rejection of an act in a referendum would result in unconstitutional consequences. The text of the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA was interpreted in the latest decision as if it contained an inherent weighing of the right to a referendum against other constitutional values in view of the purpose of this statutory provision. Thus far I perceive no argument allowing anything more than that without crossing the boundary of linguistic interpretation and ascribing it contents it cannot have. Of course, this position leads to questions that are essential: 1) which constitutional values are identified that stand against the right to vote in a referendum, 2) what weight are they attributed, and 3) what are the reasons that some are attributed greater weight than others? In this respect, my review differs from that of some of my colleagues, and this in itself is the area that relates to the circumstances of this specific case, namely the decision on whether the rejection of the ARSCOSS-B at the referendum would give rise to unconstitutional consequences within the meaning of the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA.

II

12. When assessing the circumstances of this case, several important questions arose. The final outcome of the review greatly depends on the answers to these questions. This is undoubtedly a case when the legislature has not responded to the decision of the Constitutional Court for several years, in spite of the fact that since the expiry of the response deadline established in Decision No. U-I-246/02, the Constitutional Court has a number of times reiterated its warning regarding the response in its subsequent decisions and rulings on issues directly related to this matter, as well as

21 These values, if measured in terms of the number of eligible persons, even exceed the number of persons eligible to vote, as they pertain to all persons in the state as well as foreigners within the state.

22 As the academic Prof. Pavčnik states, linguistic interpretation is "also the level setting the outer boundary that the interpreter cannot cross." M. Pavčnik, Teorija prava, Prispevek k razumevanju prava [Theory of Law, A Contribution to Understanding Law], Cankarjeva založba, Ljubljana 1997, p. 356.

in the annual reports on the past year's work.<sup>23</sup> Ever since the 2003 Annual Report, the Constitutional Court has continued to repeat in these reports that the deadline for the legislature's response had expired, while the unconstitutionality had not yet been remedied, and pointed out a grave violation of Article 2 and the second sentence of the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution. Therefore, we have before us a case entailing an already established unconstitutionality, as indicated in the decision of the Constitutional Court. But this finding in itself is not sufficient for assessing the [potential] occurrence of unconstitutional consequences. It had to be determined whether the act with which the legislature responded remedied the unconstitutionality in a manner consistent with the Constitution. That does not mean that the Constitutional Court reviewed whether the ARSCOSS-B is consistent with Decision No. U-I-246/02, as an act can only be reviewed based on the Constitution and not a decision of the Constitutional Court; it does mean, however, that precisely because of compliance with the principle of equality, the adopted statutory regulation was reviewed in the light of those constitutional provisions on the basis of which the Constitutional Court had already reviewed the constitutionality of the statutory regulation in force. That is, from the aspect of Article 2 and the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution. Moreover, in Paragraphs 21 and 24 it added additional reasons in the light of Article 34 as well as Articles 22 and 25 and the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution, which could have been noted by the Constitutional Court already during the previous review, since these constitutional reasons were there to be invoked. I fully agree with this approach.

13. I also agree that the Constitutional Court had to first clarify the meaning of its two main decisions whereby it decided on the constitutionality of statutory regulation regarding the erasure from the register of permanent residents. First, Decision No. U-I-284/94, dated 4 February 1999 (Official Gazette RS, No. 14/99, and OdlUS VIII, 22), to which the legislature very quickly responded, which has perhaps not been stressed clearly enough by the domestic and international publics, and which for the most part finally regulated the status of these persons. This was extremely important, because on this basis the violations of human rights ceased for the most part, with the right referred to in Article 34 of the Constitution having the central role, in my opinion. Then it had to clarify the meaning of Decision No. U-I-246/02, whereby the Constitutional Court established an unconstitutionality, as the legislature failed to regulate the status of these persons retroactively. At first glance it is not clear what exactly the Constitutional Court had in mind, even though in its subsequent decisions it often reiterated that the legislature may remedy the unconstitutionality only in one manner consistent with the Constitution. The legal status by its very nature cannot be regulated retroactively. And even though the legislature, in regulating this issue, practically literally followed the two decisions of the Constitutional Court issued in the constitutional complaint cases, the question arose what that actually means and what is actually meant by the ARSCOSS-B stating that “it is deemed that a person has a permanent residence permit and registered permanent residence at the address at which permanent residence was registered at the time of the erasure from the register of permanent residents”. I agree with the answer given in this respect by the Constitutional Court in its decision. This does not in fact involve the regulation of legal status retrospectively, but the determination of the status that has existed throughout (if a person indeed resided in Slovenia throughout this time), and in the case of persons who were forcibly removed from the country as aliens or who left the country for reasons directly related to the erasure, it involves the creation of a legal fiction with a very specific legal purpose and meaning, and therefore in itself cannot give rise to any other legal consequences, which is explained in detail in the Decision. Of greatest importance, in my view, is the definition of either the declaration of the actual status or the legal fiction, which the Constitutional Court explicitly pointed out in Paragraph 43 of the reasoning – the definition of immaterial satisfaction in the sense of the elimination of the consequences of human rights violations, as prescribed by the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, which in individual cases apparently occurred.

14. I am convinced that the competent authorities deciding in individual procedures in accordance with the ARSCOSS-B, which upon entry into force will supplement the provisions of the ARSCOSS, will carry out the tasks stipulated by this Act in accordance with the Constitution and these legal provisions. While doing so, they will be able to rely on the explanation of the mentioned act which the Constitutional Court had to provide in order to review the constitutionality of its provisions. I am also certain that they will not accept the speculations that the proposers of the call for a referendum fear and state as the reasons against the adoption of this act. In a state governed by the rule of law, the competent authorities have all the authority to prevent the abuse of law and the rights stipulated therein.
15. It was not possible to weigh which constitutional values should be given priority in this case until the Constitutional Court found that the legislature responded to its decision by an act that cannot be said to be unconstitutional and it cannot be claimed that by this act the legislature regulated issues that are not directly related to the subject matter of regulation (meaning that abuse could be at play); on the contrary, omitting the regulation of some issues might even give rise to new unconstitutionality.
16. I agree with the reasons given with reference to this in Parts B – IV and B – V of the reasoning of the Decision. What reaffirms my opinion that in this case other constitutional values should be given priority over the right to vote in the referendum is in a way related to my starting point in this opinion, even though I expressly stated that the issues I highlighted should in fact be considered for the future and not for this case. The decision whether to allow a referendum or not – which could be the simple interpretation of the provision of the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA – is in fact a decision about whether this act should be adopted by the National Assembly (namely the representatives of the people in whom the citizens of this country vested the legislative power) or whether the legislative function should in this case be performed by the people themselves (after it has been performed by their representatives, as we are referring to a subsequent legislative referendum). If the decisions of the Constitutional Court clearly state that the Constitution is binding on both the National Assembly and the people when it makes direct decisions, the decisions of the Constitutional Court are binding also on the voters in the referendum, in which case there occurs an equal unconstitutionality if either of them fails to perform the task stipulated by the Constitution. Just as we can claim that the National Assembly grossly violated Article 2 and the second sentence of the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution by failing to comply with the decision of the Constitutional Court, the same could be claimed of the voters who would (“take back” the legislative function and) in the referendum reject the act which constitutionally puts an end to this violation of the Constitution. Let me again point out the standpoint of the Constitutional Court, i.e. that it may repeal as unconstitutional also an act approved by the people in a referendum. Therefore, the purpose of the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA is to prevent further unconstitutionality after the National Assembly has once and for all (after many years in this case) finally remedied this violation of the Constitution. That is why it is also important in this case that the unconstitutionality has lasted for (too) many years and that regarding it the Constitutional Court (more often than with regard to any of its decisions, especially subsequent decisions on the same matter) clearly stated that unconstitutional consequences occurred (which it even classified in the meaning of the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA), owing to the legislature’s failure to respond and the consequential non-compliance with the Decision of the Constitutional Court, and that by the adoption of this act the legislature remedies this unconstitutionality. The Constitutional Court clearly stated that statutory regulation was necessary to remedy the unconstitutionality and expressly highlighted this finding in its Decision. These are additional reasons why I voted for the Decision.

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE JASNA POGAČAR

1. The reasoning [in Decision No. U-II-1/10] states that the Constitutional Court already in Decision No. U-I-47/94, dated 19 January 1995, proclaimed the right to decide in a referendum a human right. However, my view of the positions presented in the mentioned Decision is somewhat different.
2. In the matter at issue in Decision No. U-I-47/94, the Constitutional Court reviewed the admissibility of a legal regulation which at the abstract level excluded a referendum on specific types of acts (adopted by the shortened legislative procedure or referring to the implementation of ratified international agreements or the direct implementation of the budget). The decision is based on the finding that the Constitution does not explicitly impose restrictions on the issues that may be decided in a legislative referendum. The Constitutional Court explained that Article 90 of the Constitution allows the exercise of the substantive provision of Article 44 of the Constitution on citizens' right to participate in the management of public affairs. In view of the fact that Article 90 of the Constitution represents the implementation of the right determined in Article 44 of the Constitution and because the right of 40,000 voters to require a legislative referendum which it encompasses may be considered a human right under the legal regime referred to in Article 15 of the Constitution, it decided that the second and the third paragraphs of Article 15 of the Constitution also apply to potential legal interferences with its provisions (if referring to this constitutional right). The adopted positions are therefore intended for reviewing the admissibility of restricting the rights referred to in Article 90 of the Constitution, for which the Constitutional Court has established a legal protection regime equivalent to the one that applies for relative human rights and freedoms.

3. What is relevant for decision-making in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA is the position according to which the National Assembly may require the Constitutional Court to determine whether the content of a call for a legislative referendum is not in conformity with the Constitution. In each specific case the Constitutional Court will have to review whether a decision made in a referendum to suspend the enforcement of an act or to reject it would affect such important constitutional rights that it would be admissible – weighing the constitutional values at issue – to interfere with the constitutional right of decision-making in a referendum.
4. The Constitutional Court characterized the right to decision-making in a referendum as the right referred to in Articles 44 and 90 of the Constitution, but it did not proclaim it a human right with universal import. It also did not explain its content, nevertheless it may be deduced from Article 90 of the Constitution that it entails rights enabling the implementation of a legislative referendum. Namely, it entails the right to request that a legislative referendum be called and the right to vote in a legislative referendum. The right arising from Article 44 of the Constitution is a general political right, which cannot be directly exercised, so the Constitution regulates its realisation in several places. A legislative referendum is a form of direct participation in the management of public affairs, expressly regulated by Article 90 of the Constitution, which also specifies the entitlements that ensure the implementation of a legislative referendum.
5. Even though in my opinion the Constitutional Court in Decision No. U-II-1/10 proclaimed the right to request a call for a legislative referendum and the right to vote in a legislative referendum to be human rights, this did not influence my decision, as I agree with the review and the result of the weighing of the constitutional values at issue.

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE JAN ZOBEC, JOINED BY JUDGE DR ERNEST PETRIČ

I

1. I will begin my considerations on the request for the prohibition of the referendum at the point where they should in fact end, namely by balancing the right to a referendum with the consequences that would result from the rejection of the Act in the referendum. Namely, a decision permitting or refusing a referendum depends on the answer to the following question: which of the conflicting constitutional values should be given priority. The first step in the search for the answer to this question is the definition of the “weight” of the competing values.<sup>1</sup>
2. First of all, I would like to discuss the right to a referendum, which has been defined by the Constitutional Court as a “human right”. It defined this right for the first time in Decision No. U-I-47/94, dated 19 January 1995, as follows: “In view of the fact that Article 90 represents a constitutional derivation of the constitutional right to the direct decision-making power of the citizens determined by Article 44 of the Constitution and also because the right of 40,000 voters to require that a referendum be called, which is encompassed in the article, can be considered a ‘human right’ under the legal regime referred to in Article 15 of the Constitution, the provisions of the second and third paragraphs of Article 15 of the Constitution shall also apply to potential legal interferences with these provisions (when referring to this constitutional right).” In my opinion, a referendum is not so much a human right as it is an important tool in the system of checks and balances with different roles and effects – depending on who the proposer of the referendum is. When a referendum is required by voters it has a different role than the one called by the National Assembly on its own initiative. The role of a referendum called by the National Assembly is different from the role of a referendum required by at least thirty elected deputies. In view of the various proposers, it is difficult to equate the different types of referendum and say that the weight of the underlying right to a referendum is always ‘the same’, irrespective of who initiates the referendum. There is undoubtedly a difference that must be considered between a referendum required by at least 40,000 voters directly exercising their right to a referendum and to direct participation in the management of public affairs, and a referendum required by a parliamentary minority. A petition filed by at least thirty elected deputies entails 'only' an indirect type of participation in the management of public affairs. Namely, this constitutes a request which is generated within a representative democracy to correct, supervise, or check the speed of such democracy and which remedies its flaws and deviations by returning to its source – the people. The people (using the referendum as a tool) participate in the creation of a referendum [required by thirty deputies] to a similar extent as they participate in any voting in the National Assembly – only indirectly, through their elected representatives.

1 The weighing (and balancing) of the competing values is a difficult and dangerous task (it can easily overstep intuition and become arbitrary). It is impossible to compare colours and smells, length and weight; likewise, individual constitutional goods are beyond metrical comparison. Balancing (in law, this concept should be understood only metaphorically – cf. Tsakyrakis, Proportionality: An Assault on Human Rights?, International Journal of Constitutional Law, Vol. 7, Issue 3 (2009), p. 473) does not mean quantifying but establishing relations between the competing values and requires argumentative skills. What weighs heavily and prevails in the end, what is decisive, is the argument, the rational justification of the decision underpinned by the law of balancing, according to which the permitted degree of non-fulfilment of one value depends on the importance of the recognition of the competing value (cf. R. Alexy, A Theory of Constitutional Rights – trans. J. Rivers, Oxford University Press, Oxford, 2002, p. 101 et seq. In an individual case it is not the value with greater weight that prevails but the value which is supported by stronger arguments in the concrete circumstances.

3. Therefore, the request for a referendum submitted by thirty elected deputies cannot be regarded in any other way. Whether such a request which gives rise to the exercise of the human right to a referendum, occurs or not depends entirely on two coincidences which cannot be directly influenced by the voters – the first coincidence is the situation when at least thirty elected deputies are in a minority position when an act is being adopted, and the second coincidence is the autonomous decision of these deputies to place the decision on an act on which they have been outvoted in the process of adoption, in the hands of the people in a referendum. As a human right which is not at all placed in the hands of the people (such as the right to periodical elections to the National Assembly), such a referendum, while it is still in the request phase, is in my opinion relatively distant from the people (precisely as distant as every decision made by the representatives of the people in the legislature) and is therefore less important than a referendum which is required by at least 40,000 voters – and can therefore be subject to more restrictions.
4. On the other hand, a referendum is an extremely powerful tool for protecting the weaker participants in the political process (and their voters) against an undemocratic parliamentary majority which disregards parliamentary dialogue and political discourse. By protecting the minority from the 'tyranny' of the majority (this term refers to those situations when the argument of power is used instead of the power of argument, situations beyond constitutional tolerance when the parliamentary majority only pursues its own interests), by promoting tolerant and democratic dialogue and a search for joint solutions, and by facilitating the development of constitutional pluralism "in which the constitutional players limit each other to adopting the fewest possible unilateral decisions and focus on decisions which benefit as many people as possible and pursue the supreme value of human dignity",<sup>2</sup> [a referendum required by 30 deputies] gains importance. Even though the referendum is intended for the people, in order to protect their rights and interests, even though it is a 'veto point of the weaker in the political process'<sup>3</sup> and even though it forces those who, supported by the majority of the votes in the parliament, pursue only their own coalition interests, to seek compromises,<sup>4</sup> it has its limitations. When there is no room for compromise (already) in the parliament, there is no referendum either. When and where this limit is, is a matter of balancing in every single case, namely the Constitutional Court (in the legal discourse and based on argumentation) must balance the 'veto point of the weaker' with the price to be paid for this (the possibility that due to the referendum unconstitutional consequences may occur).

5. And what is on the other side of the scales? Is there perhaps something that can completely annihilate the right to a referendum or even make it non-existent in a specific (in this case, even essential) area?

II

6. Historical experience teaches us that democracy contains within itself the germs of self-destruction. To survive (to protect it from itself) it is necessary that democracy features an immune subsystem, namely one whose tool is the referendum request of a parliamentary minority "by which constitutional pluralism and constructive political-interest discourse is guaranteed",<sup>5</sup> and one which prevents (even within constitutional pluralism or particularly for this reason) (constitutional) democracy from being abolished in the name of democracy.<sup>6</sup> An important part of this subsystem is a release valve consisting of the constitutional prohibition on a referendum – and even more so when a referendum petition aims at disregarding a decision of the Constitutional Court. Therefore the idea that the people, functioning as the last instance, should decide on the 'validity' of a decision of the Constitutional Court is fundamentally constitutionally wrong.<sup>7</sup> Even more so if it is accompanied by the overt intention of the proposers of the referendum to manipulate the legislature's obligation arising from a decision of the Constitutional Court. Namely, it is not their intention to submit the ARSCOSS-B for legitimate consideration and supervision by the people in a referendum, but to achieve that this act is rejected by the will

4 Ibid., p. 86.

5 Ibid., p. 93.

6 This threat is well illustrated by an interesting and topical consideration of B. M. Zupančič, namely that "[t]oday [...] under the influence of manipulative media, it is particularly easy to mislead a democratic majority into electing an undemocratic tyrant", followed by "[s]topping a widely supported Milošević or for this part even a Haider, Kučma, Hitler, Mussolini, etc. [...] is only possible on the basis of the constitution, which functions as an agreement subjecting the carriers of executive power to a Constitutional Court review" (European Convention on the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms; on its 50th anniversary, Information and Documentation Centre of the Council of Europe at NUK, Ljubljana 2000, p. 1).

7 North American constitutional history features a well known case concerning the Constitution of the State of Colorado, which in 1912 (supported by the zealous endeavours of T. Roosevelt) introduced through constitutional amendments the institute of the recall of judicial decisions, according to which the people had the right to recall in a referendum a decision of the Supreme Court of the State of Colorado which had declared a law or a city statute unconstitutional, and thus the unconstitutional legal act remained valid. Later the Supreme Court [of the United States] declared this constitutional amendment to be contrary to the Constitution of the United States. For more see S. Stagner, The Recall of Judicial Decisions and the Due Process Debate, American Journal of Legal History, Vol. 24, Issue 3 (1980), pp. 257–272.

of the people and that, consequently, the unconstitutional situation established by Decision No. U-I-246/02, which has lasted for over seven years, continues.<sup>8</sup> The referendum proposers' premise that compliance with the decisions of the Constitutional Court is a matter of majority decision-making is constitutionally inadmissible. In Decision No. U-I-111/04, dated 8 July 2004, the Constitutional Court stated that "The Constitution [...] is also binding on citizens when they exercise power directly (the second paragraph of Article 3) by deciding on a certain law in a referendum" and that "[in] the Republic of Slovenia [...] a so-called constitutional democracy was established, the essence of which is that the values protected by the Constitution, including in particular human rights and freedoms (Preamble to the Constitution), can prevail over the democratically adopted decisions of the majority." When the Constitutional Court has already pronounced itself on these values and imposed on the legislature the obligation to remedy the unconstitutionality established, namely a referendum on a law which implements a decision of the Constitutional Court in a manner consistent with the Constitution and limits itself to remediation of the established unconstitutionality which can be remedied in only one manner (and additionally regulates only incidental and technical issues, those issues which are considered 'accessory' and those which are vital for the absolute protection of human rights and which can be rectified in only one way), the institute of the Constitutional Court prohibiting a referendum carries particular weight and importance. In my opinion, this weight is such that in this part (the part where the Act entails only the fulfilment of a clear-cut obligation imposed by the Constitutional Court Decision) it not only prevails over the 'human right' to a referendum but completely annihilates it – the right to a referendum simply does not extend that far. Therefore, in this part, no collision of constitutionally protected values is possible.<sup>9</sup> There is only one constitutional value, or stated more correctly, order: the legislature's obligation to implement the decisions of the Constitutional Court.

7. It is irrelevant whether I concur with Decision No. U-I-246/02 or not and whether I have or would have serious second thoughts about it – now, when it is only a matter of its implementation all these second thoughts, doubts, or even opposition are completely irrelevant if only for the fact that this is a decision of the highest body of 8 It is evident at first sight that the referendum would be burdened by a democratic deficit – and that instead of having a legitimising, legislative, and supervisory character, it would have a political one (cf. A. Teršek, Z referendumom nad demokratičnost in legitimnost, Pravna praksa, Issue 7 (2004), p. 37). This intention of the referendum proposers (which somewhat reduces the 'weight' of the right in the case at issue) is evident from their reproaches against Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-246/02, on which the ARSCOSS-B is based; the above-mentioned reproaches are stated in point 43 of the reasoning of the Decision.

judicial power for the protection of human rights and that its decisions are binding.<sup>10</sup> This Decision is absolutely and unconditionally binding – on the National Assembly, on its deputies, on the people (the electorate), and on constitutional judges when deciding on permitting the referendum. As there exists the constitutional obligation of the legislature to remedy any unconstitutionality established in a decision of the Constitutional Court (Article 2 and the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution; compare with Decision No. U-I-114/95, dated 7 December 1995, Official Gazette of the RS, No. 8/96, and OdlUS IV, 120), any obstacles used by the legislature (even if in its original role of the people) to hinder or prevent the achievement of this constitutional goal are considered unconstitutional, even though they might be highly 'democratic'.

8. In such circumstances a decision of the Constitutional Court has different force, effects, and obligations than when it plays 'only' the role of precedent and involves only a (relative) reference to the standards, doctrines, and viewpoints which the Court has developed in its jurisprudence (throughout the development of the Constitutional Court review, these are subject to constant verification, upgrading, supplementing, and also disintegration). I ask myself what permission to hold a referendum would mean from this point of view. I believe it would not only undermine the existence of the above-mentioned Decision but eventually, through continuous prolongation and generalisation, it would threaten the very existence of the Constitutional Court. What would be left of this institution if its decisions could simply be disregarded – if nothing else works, then also by means of the mechanisms of democratic decision-making, in order to achieve this goal. And what would remain of the Constitutional Court today if it permitted this to happen by granting permission for the referendum – would this not in futuro entail the gradual (self-)abolishment of the highest defender of human rights.

III

9. If I put the right to a referendum on one side of the scales, considering that voters can only decide on some unessential, incidental, and more or less technical issues, all of which brings the specific weight of this right closer to 'voidness' (at the referendum, the voters could not vote on whether permits for permanent residence should be issued to the children of the citizens of other republics of former Yugoslavia who were born in the Republic of Slovenia after 25 June 1991, because these children would be in a worse position than their parents, because this issue involves the human rights of children; likewise, they could not vote on issues concerning those Slovene citizens who had been removed from the register of permanent residents and had acquired citizenship without having first acquired a permit for permanent residence), and all the rest on the other side of the scales – that is, not only human rights, the observance and protection of which are provided for in the ARSCOSS-B (dignity, equality before the law, safety)<sup>11</sup> with which the National Assembly attempted to remedy the unconstitutionality established in points 1, 2, and 3 of the reasoning of Decision No. U-I-246/02, but also the fact that the failure to abide by a decision of the Constitutional Court constitutes a violation of Article 2 and the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution and that more than seven years have elapsed since Decision No. U-I-246/02 was issued, I am convinced that the constitutional values guaranteed by the ARSCOSS-B should be given priority – irrespective of the fact that it is not known how many persons cannot regulate their legal status without the ARSCOSS-B (these are individuals who were not actually present in the Republic of Slovenia at the time the ARSCOSS was enforced – either due to the measure of the forcible removal of an alien from the country or because they had left the Republic of Slovenia for reasons directly related to their removal from the register of permanent residents). The prohibition of a referendum can indeed be based only on actual, concrete, and proven (not only theoretical, but also tangible) unconstitutional consequences which would occur due to the rejection of an act in a referendum, which means that the National Assembly in requesting this prohibition must by means of definitions factually and concretely state (and prove) that the rejection of the act at the referendum would give rise to such consequences. However, the case at issue is special in this regard. I believe that the burden of the claim and the burden of proof are shifted here. Shifted because the meaning and the purpose of the ARSCOSS-B are completely clear and undisputable: to remedy the unconstitutionality established in Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-246/02. In such cases the National Assembly need not separately allege and prove that the postponement of the enforcement of an act or the rejection of an act in the referendum would give rise to unconstitutional consequences. One unconstitutional consequence is already the very fact that the Decision of the Constitutional Court has still not been implemented. The Decision of the Constitutional Court by which the Constitutional Court established an unconstitutionality (the Constitutional Court would not have established that if it had not been convinced of the existence of unconstitutionality)<sup>12</sup> and the finding 11 One question is whether those persons who had been removed from the register of permanent residents can perhaps become a group pushed to the margins of society due to strong social stigmatisation and therefore have to be considered a specific (definable) social minority. In such case of a direct conflict (between the social majority and minority) this should give sufficient reason to narrow the scope of the right to direct participation in the management of public affairs and the right to decide at a referendum, particularly because restrictive interference with the rights of one group of people cannot be justified by the protection of the rights of another group (cf. A. Teršek, Ustavnopravne meje referendumске демокracije – ob odločbi US RS št. U-I-111/04-21 in “Primer džamija”, Revus, Issue 5 (2005), p. 85). This circumstance could thus represent additional ‘weight’ in favour of the prohibition of the referendum (the protection of a civilised individual against the violence of others has always been the function of everything legal – see B. M. Zupančič, ibid.) – but not when such a group enjoys very strong support from the majority exerting influence in terms of politics and the media.

<sup>10</sup> It is true that 'only' a law can stipulate that the decisions of the Constitutional Court are binding. But this would also apply if the law did not stipulate that – such an effect follows already from the constitutional status and the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court (Articles 160 and 161 of the Constitution).

12 Last but not least, it follows from point 27 of the reasoning of Decision No. U-I-246/02 that the number of persons to which it refers is not high. Namely, the Constitutional Court stated that “it does not exclude the possibility that some citizens of other republics left the Republic of Slovenia also for fear of the pronounce-that by this regulation the National Assembly eliminates the unconstitutionality established in the Decision are already enough. If the referendum proposers are of the opinion that the rejection of the Act at the referendum would not give rise to unconstitutional consequences or that these would be so negligible or of such little importance that the right to referendum decision-making should be given priority (or as I see it, that it is still possible to talk about the existence of the human right to a referendum), then the burden of proof is on them. The lack of reliable data on how many people who had been removed from the register of permanent residents could be considered entitled persons pursuant to the ARSCOSS-B because without this Act they cannot regulate their status (in other words, the number of people who, for reasons directly associated with the removal from the register, were not actually present in the Republic of Slovenia upon the enforcement of the ARSCOSS and thus could not regulate their legal status) cannot serve as an excuse for the failure to abide by the decision of the Constitutional Court.

10. To conclude: the encroachment on the right to a referendum is in this case shallow, superficial, and therefore negligible (this right only exists for the purpose of regulating some incidental, more or less technical issues which due to their organic relation to the subject matter of the retroactive recognition of permanent residence could not be, in the nature of things, regulated separately by some other act; as regards the essential issue, namely the question of whether the unconstitutionality established in points 1, 2, and 3 of the operative provisions of Decision No. U-I-246/02 should be remedied, there is no right to a referendum). On the other hand, the rejection of the Act at the referendum would deeply interfere with a constitutional value, i.e. compliance with the decisions of the Constitutional Court, and with the very essence of the rights which are (for now only on paper) protected by the Decision of the Constitutional Court.

Decision No. U-II-1/12, U-II-2/12, dated 17 December 2012

DECISION

At a session held on 17 December 2012 in proceedings in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 21 of the Referendum and Popular Initiative Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 26/07 – official consolidated text), initiated upon the requests of the National Assembly, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. Unconstitutional consequences would occur due to the suspension of the implementation or rejection of the Slovene National Holding Company Act (EPA 516-VI) in a referendum.
2. Unconstitutional consequences would occur due to the suspension of the implementation or rejection of the Measures of the Republic of Slovenia to Strengthen the Stability of Banks Act (EPA 637-VI) in a referendum.

A

1. On the basis of the first and second paragraphs of Article 21 of the Referendum and Popular Initiative Act (hereinafter referred to as the RPIA), on 6 November 2012 and 23 November 2012 the National Assembly adopted two orders requesting the Constitutional Court to assess whether unconstitutional consequences could occur due to the suspension of the implementation or rejection of the Slovene National Holding Company Act (hereinafter referred to as the SNHCA) and of the Measures of the Republic of Slovenia to Strengthen the Stability of Banks Act (hereinafter referred to as the MSSBA) in a referendum.
2. In the request regarding the SNHCA, the National Assembly alleges that unconstitutional consequences could occur due to the suspension or rejection of the SNHCA in a referendum, as well as a situation that would be inconsistent with Articles 1, 2, 3, 8, 34, 50, 51, 86, 87, 89, 90, 91, and 153 of the Constitution. The implementation of entire chapters of the Constitution that regulate the organisation of the state, human rights, and fundamental freedoms would allegedly be seriously jeopardised. It alleges that the SNHCA should be implemented within the shortest possible period of time; any later implementation would allegedly to a high degree nullify its provisions. Even the approval of this Act in a referendum would allegedly not be able to eliminate unconstitutional consequences, as in the period until the referendum is to be carried out it would not be possible to take urgently necessary measures to maximise the value of state property and to stabilise public finances, which would thus render impossible the financing of state tasks determined by the Constitution. In the assessment of the National Assembly, such a situation represents an evident unconstitutionality, the elimination of which is allegedly necessary for the protection of such constitutionally important values as ensuring a social state and human dignity.

3. The National Assembly alleges that if the Republic of Slovenia does not adopt the reform measures in time it will be obliged to apply for international financial assistance. It is of the opinion that the commitments contained in the agreement regulating the granting of such assistance would entail an interference with the constitutional principle of supremacy. The so-called troika that would be making the decision, i.e. the representatives of the European Union, a representative of the International Monetary Fund (hereinafter referred to as the IMF), and the parliaments of other Member States of the European Union, would “dictate” assistance measures that would be inconsistent with Article 3a of the Constitution. Furthermore, by the end of 2013 Slovenia should adopt regulations for the implementation of Council Directive 2011/85/EU of 8 November 2011 on requirements for budgetary frameworks of the Member States (OJ L 306, 23 November 2011, page 41 – hereinafter referred to as Directive 2011/85/EU), while it is also bound by the intergovernmental treaty on the fiscal agreement that was ratified by the National Assembly by the Act Ratifying the Treaty on Stability, Coordination and Governance in the Economic and Monetary Union between the Kingdom of Belgium, the Republic of Bulgaria, the Kingdom of Denmark, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Republic of Estonia, Ireland, the Hellenic Republic, the Kingdom of Spain, the French Republic, the Italian Republic, the Republic of Cyprus, the Republic of Latvia, the Republic of Lithuania, the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg, Hungary, Malta, the Kingdom of the Netherlands, the Republic of Austria, the Republic of Poland, the Portuguese Republic, Romania, the Republic of Slovenia, the Slovak Republic, the Republic of Finland, and the Kingdom of Sweden (Official Gazette RS, No. 35/12, MP, No. 4/12 – hereinafter referred to as the TSCG).
4. Delayed adoption of measures regarding the management of state property would allegedly also jeopardise the fulfilment of international commitments of the Republic of Slovenia regarding the public deficit. The National Assembly warns that on the basis of Articles 3a and 8 of the Constitution, Slovenia must respect the commitments that it made to its European partners in the euro area. Disrespecting such commitments under European Union law would not only entail a violation of such law, but also an unconstitutional situation in the framework of Slovenia’s constitutional regulation. Without the adoption of the immediate necessary measures it would not be possible to eliminate the excessive public deficit of the state and thus provide for the fulfilment of the obligations determined by Articles 119 and 126 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (consolidated version, OJ C 83, 30 March 2010 – hereinafter referred to as the TFEU) in order to reduce the public deficit by 3% of the gross domestic product (hereinafter referred to as GDP) by the end of 2013.

5. The National Assembly substantiates the unconstitutionality of the present regulation by alleging that anomalies and complexities occurred in the implementation of the Management of Assets Owned by the Republic of Slovenia Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 38/10, 18/11, 77/11, and 22/12 – hereinafter referred to as the MAORSA), allegedly resulting in the Republic of Slovenia losing credibility abroad. The SNHCA, as part of the reforms, would allegedly contribute to the improvement of the economic environment and to the stabilisation of the public finances. As Slovenia has announced such reforms, the implementation of the SNHCA would allegedly be a necessary step towards improving the credit rating of the state. The National Assembly alleges that the present regulation in the MAORSA and its implementation in practice allow for abuses, which devalues state property. The Capital Assets Management Agency of the Republic of Slovenia (hereinafter referred to as the CAMARS) allegedly overexploited its independent position and acted, contrary to the guidelines adopted by the Government, to the detriment of state property and therefore of the taxpayers. It allegedly follows therefrom that due to the worse economic situation in the state, the exercise of the constitutional right to security of employment and the right to social security (Articles 66 and 50 of the Constitution) is not ensured. As the CAMARS allegedly does not achieve optimal profitability from the management of state property, which allegedly affects the economic situation, the welfare of the state, and employment possibilities, the National Assembly alleges that the MAORSA interferes with Article 34 of the Constitution, which guarantees the right to personal dignity and safety to everyone.
6. The National Assembly also alleges that the present regulation under the MAORSA is inconsistent with the principle of the separation of powers (the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution). The SNHCA allegedly determines additional competences of the National Assembly that allegedly to a greater extent implement the principle of the separation of powers.
7. The current regulation is allegedly inconsistent with the principle of the conformity of legal acts determined by Article 153 of the Constitution as it allegedly fails to implement to a sufficient degree the Guidelines of the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development (hereinafter referred to as the OECD) for the corporate management of companies in state ownership.
8. In the opinion of the National Assembly, the hindered borrowing of the state on the international financial markets and consequent jeopardised financing from public funds allegedly entail a violation of the Constitution, as such a situation already interferes with the constitutional guarantees regarding social security and human dignity. A situation in which financing from public funds that are allegedly jeopardised to such a degree that the state is allegedly no longer able to finance its obligations that are guaranteed to citizens and other entitled persons by Articles 50 and 51 of the Constitution allegedly violates the principle of a social state determined by Article

2 of the Constitution and interferes with the position of Slovenia as a democratic republic (Article 1 of the Constitution) based on human dignity. In such a position, the current regulation in the MAORSA, which does not allow for effective and clear management of state property, is allegedly inconsistent with the constitutional right to social security, including the right to a pension, as the Republic of Slovenia is allegedly not able to guarantee a living minimum income to a particular part of the population, and even less the social minimum income, which is higher.

9. The National Assembly also alleges that the request of a group of deputies that a referendum on the SNHCA be called does not fulfil the constitutionally determined conditions for the calling of a referendum, as it allegedly does not contain 30 handwritten signatures of deputies. Therefore, the calling of such referendum would in itself cause unconstitutional consequences. By Order No. U-II-1/12, dated 15 November 2012, the Constitutional Court requested that the National Assembly state whether there exists a request for the calling of a subsequent legislative referendum regarding the SNHCA, with the handwritten signatures of at least 30 deputies enclosed, in conformity with the first paragraph of Article 15 of the RPIA and the second paragraph of Article 113 of the Rules of Procedure of the National Assembly (Official Gazette RS, No. 92/07 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as RPNA-1). On 22 November 2012, the President of the National Assembly announced that a request calling for a referendum on the SNHCA with 30 signatures of deputies enclosed exists.
10. In its request regarding the MSSBA, the National Assembly alleges that the suspension of the implementation or the rejection of this Act in a referendum could lead to a situation that would be inconsistent with Articles 1, 2, 3, 8, 50, 51, and 153 of the Constitution, and also the implementation of entire chapters of the Constitution that determine the organisation of the Republic of Slovenia, human rights, and fundamental freedoms would be seriously jeopardised. The National Assembly alleges that the prompt adoption of reform measures, including the reorganisation of the banking sector, is crucial due to the deterioration of the credit rating of Slovenia, as Slovenia would otherwise have to apply for international financial assistance from the European fund in order to ensure financial stability. By applying for international financial assistance in which also the IMF is included, a constitutionally inadmissible interference with the supremacy of the state that is outside the scope determined by Article of 3a of the Constitution would occur.
11. The National Assembly substantiates the unconstitutionality of the existing statutory regulation with the allegation that the regulation currently in force fails to regulate the possibility to resolve the situation that has arisen in the Slovene banking system and caused a deterioration of the credit ratings of the Republic of Slovenia. As a consequence, borrowing possibilities are allegedly limited and thus financing from public funds is jeopardised. It claims that the existing instability of public finances is so severe that the Republic of Slovenia is no longer able to finance the obligations that are guaranteed to its citizens and other entitled persons by Articles 50 and 51 of the Constitution, which entails, as a consequence, also a violation of the principle of a social state determined by Article 2 of the Constitution. In the opinion of the National Assembly, such a situation also entails an interference with the position of the Republic of Slovenia as a democratic state (Article 1 of the Constitution) and an interference with the human dignity of its citizens. Due to the hindered borrowing, which is a consequence of the continual deterioration of its credit ratings, the reason for which lies precisely in the condition of the banking system, the state is allegedly no longer able to ensure the social minimum income to current and future generations, and for a certain part of the population the provision of even a living minimum income is allegedly jeopardised. In addition to the rights that the Constitution specifically determines as human rights, also other rights whereby the Constitution binds the state to act in a defined active way (e.g. Articles 49, 52, and 66 of the Constitution) are allegedly jeopardised. Due to the hindered borrowing or imminent incapacity to borrow, the state is allegedly unable to fulfil its obligations even by increasing the public deficit, which currently is already excessive. Due to its incapacity to borrow, the state is allegedly unable to provide for social and other rights, thus also causing a violation of the second paragraph of Article 148 of the Constitution.

12. The National Assembly also alleges that without the adoption of the immediate urgent measures contained in the MSSBA subsequent deterioration of the credit ratings of the state and of the banks would occur, possibly rendering the recapitalisation of banks through the European Central Bank (hereinafter referred to as the ECB) impossible, thus causing a liquidity crisis in the banks, as the ECB resources are allegedly the sole remaining source of liquidity for the banks. The problem of repaying the credits that the Republic of Slovenia has received from the European Investment Bank (hereinafter referred to as the EIB) would allegedly result, and also the credibility of guarantees by the state would allegedly decrease.
13. The National Assembly alleges that the negative trend regarding the deterioration of credit ratings, which has arisen precisely because of the problems in the Slovene banking system, can only be halted by the implementing measures contained in the MSSBA. The adoption of the MSSBA would allegedly once again enable state borrowing, which is urgently necessary in order to provide for social security. It thereby specifically underlines the importance of prompt implementation of the reform measures, as the MSSBA would allegedly efficiently eliminate unconstitutional consequences and prevent the emergence of new, even worse, unconstitutional consequences only if it is implemented in the shortest time possible. Even if the Act were to be implemented after a decision thereon in a referendum, which allegedly would happen only in the first quarter of 2013, this would compromise its effects to a great degree.
14. Allegedly, delayed implementation of the MSSBA would, due to the higher price of delayed realisation of such measures, also jeopardise the fulfilment of the international commitments of Slovenia regarding the public deficit. Without the adoption of immediate necessary measures it would allegedly be impossible to eliminate the excessive public deficit of the state and thereby provide for the fulfilment of the obligations determined by Article 3a of the Constitution and Article 126 of the TFEU, and, by the end of 2013, to reduce the public deficit by 3% of GDP. For the same reason, it would allegedly be impossible to fulfil the obligations under Article 8 of the Constitution. The legislature has namely already ratified the TSCG, on the basis of which respect for the fiscal rule regarding a balanced budget must be ensured. The National Assembly also warns that the Republic of Slovenia has to adopt regulations ensuring transposition of Directive 2011/85/EU by the end of 2013.

15. The request of the National Assembly regarding the SNHCA was transmitted by the Constitutional Court, for reply, to the group of deputies who filed the request calling for a referendum regarding the SNHCA (hereinafter referred to as the applicant of the request for the calling of a referendum on the SNHCA), which replied to it. It claims that the substantive prerequisites for prohibiting the referendum are not met, as the National Assembly allegedly had not demonstrated the unconstitutionality of the regulation currently in force, which it should have demonstrated with reference to the established case law. It thereby refers to Decisions of the Constitutional Court No. U-II-1/11, dated 10 March 2011 (Official Gazette RS, No. 20/11), and No. U-II-3/11, dated 8 December 2011 (Official Gazette RS, No. 109/11). The claims of the National Assembly allegedly refer only to the inefficiency of the regulation currently in force, which the SNHCA allegedly eliminates and ensures a higher level of accord with the OECD guidelines. The applicant of the request for the calling of a referendum on the SNHCA does not concur with the position of the National Assembly that during the legislative proceedings the insufficiencies of the SNHCA to which the OECD called attention were eliminated by amendments. Moreover, it claims that the regulation under the SNHCA is inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 146 and with Article 148 of the Constitution. It explains its viewpoint on the reasons for the adoption of the Act at issue and its own proposal regarding the statutory regulation of the management of state property, which as such was also submitted in the legislative procedure and which was intended to ensure, through a special state management company, effective and clear management of state property, but which was rejected by the ruling coalition. It specifically warns that also the capital investments of the state in the banks that would allegedly in the near future face reorganisation requiring an increase in their capital will be transferred to a holding company. As the resources for an increase in the banks' capital are allegedly not envisaged in the budget for 2013 and 2014, these resources will allegedly have to be provided by the holding company. The applicant of the request for the calling of a referendum on the SNHCA claims that the SNHCA does not belong in the framework of measures that are linked to the financial stabilisation of the state. Also the real properties of the state would allegedly be transferred to the holding company, whereby it would not be suitable for some of them to be managed by the holding company. The applicant is of the opinion that all the formal prerequisites for the calling of a referendum are met. The proceedings by which the Constitutional Court decides whether due to the calling of a legislative referendum unconstitutional consequences could occur are allegedly not intended to assess whether the procedural prerequisites for the calling of such are met, as this is, according to the regulation of the National Assembly in its Rules of Procedure, decided on by the President of the National Assembly, which reflects his autonomy when dealing with such issues. The applicant proposes that the Constitutional Court decide that unconstitutional consequences would not occur due to the suspension of the implementation or the rejection of the SNHCA at a referendum.

16. The request of the National Assembly regarding the MSSBA was transmitted by the Constitutional Court for reply to the Trade Union of Chemical, Non-Metal, and Rubber Industries of Slovenia (hereinafter referred to as the petitioner for a referendum on the MSSBA), which replied to it. It is of the opinion that the request of the National Assembly is deficient as it states neither that the MSSBA represents the direct implementation of a particular human right, nor that this Act remedies the unconstitutionality of an act that has been so determined by a decision of the Constitutional Court, in light of the fact that in its hitherto constitutional assessments the Constitutional Court has allegedly only interfered with the right to a referendum in these two instances. In this regard, the National Assembly allegedly only unclearly claimed the existence of the unconstitutionality of the provisions of the valid legislation in the field of the financial system. The National Assembly allegedly did not even allege the unconstitutionality of particular statutory provisions, thus the Constitutional Court would have to, as is required when it assesses a request regarding the unconstitutionality of an act, refuse to decide on the merits of the request. The reasons by which the National Assembly substantiates the request allegedly show at the utmost that the implementation of the legislation is inappropriate, and not that it is constitutionally deficient. Also the assessment of the National Assembly that the current regulation is poor and that the MSSBA improves it allegedly cannot substantiate the claims regarding the unconstitutionality of the statutory regulation. The claims of the National Assembly regarding the jeopardised sovereignty of the Republic of Slovenia are allegedly “misplaced” and allegedly concern some uncertain and distant possibility, which is not demonstrated. The reference to human dignity allegedly cannot be regarded as a relevant constitutional argument, as the decision-making of the Constitutional Court would thus pass from a legal assessment to an assessment of economic grounds and of the benefits resulting from challenging the acts. The urgency of the implementation of the MSSBA allegedly also cannot be a reason for the interference with the right to a referendum, as this Act could have been implemented sooner. Furthermore, the right to a referendum allegedly cannot be nullified due to some supposed time constraint.
17. The Constitutional Court sent the reply of the applicant of the request for the calling of a referendum on the SNHCA and the reply of the petitioner for a referendum on the MSSBA to the National Assembly, which replied to them. The National Assembly concurs with the attached opinions of the Government regarding the allegations of the applicant of the request for the calling of a referendum on the SNHCA and regarding the allegations of the petitioner for a referendum on the MSSBA. Regarding the SNHCA, the Government is of the opinion that the issue of proving the inexistence of the basic prerequisites for prohibiting the referendum in the case at issue by referring to another case (Decision No. U-II-1/11) with a significantly different factual and substantive situation is inappropriate and that each individual case should be decided on separately. It states that in the case at issue regarding the SNHCA, this Act is part of an integrated package of measures and that it is precisely the bad management of companies with capital investment from the state that is one of the key reasons for the poor condition of the public finances. The fact that the method of management of state property is of key importance to the condition of the public finances is allegedly admitted by the applicant of the request for the calling of a referendum on the SNHCA itself, in that it claimed that “the management influences not only the state as the owner but also the economic and social condition of the state.” The government is of the opinion that the existence of unconstitutionality is sufficiently and relevantly demonstrated by the substantiation of the unconstitutionality of the existing statutory regulation from the viewpoint of the right to social security and a pension, of a democratic and social state, of the right to security of employment, of the principle of the separation of powers, and of the principle ensuring the conformity of legal acts. It explains in detail why the SNHCA is more appropriate than the MAORSA, and reiterates the claims of the National Assembly from the request. Regarding the MSSBA, the Government claims that the request of the National Assembly is substantiated in detail and grounded, and that it clearly stems therefrom which constitutional rights are violated in the current situation, as there exists no legal basis for appropriate treatment of weakened finances in the banking sector. Therefore, it would be impossible to prove the unconstitutionality of the existing legislation, as it does not contain tools for transferring and resolving the banks’ bad debts. In the opinion of the Government, the economic sovereignty of the state is a sufficiently high criterion that can be considered by the Constitutional Court when weighing the right to a referendum and the limitation of such right. It states reasons why it is allegedly precisely the MSSBA that is of crucial importance for improving the situation in the banking sector. It stresses the need for prompt implementation of the MSSBA, as its delayed implementation (if a referendum is held, only in the first quarter of 2013) would lead to the inability to realise measures urgently necessary for the reorganisation of the Slovene banking system whereby the financing of the obligations of the state determined in the Constitution would be rendered impossible.

18. From the Ministry of Finance the Constitutional Court received the documents regarding the proceedings conducted against the Republic of Slovenia on the basis of Article 126 of the TFEU due to its excessive public deficit, data regarding the main guidelines for economic policy and public finance policy for 2013 and 2014, data regarding expected borrowings of the Republic of Slovenia for 2013, data regarding the expected total amount of payments for obligations arising from credits and guarantees to the detriment of the state for 2013, the last three credit ratings of the Republic of Slovenia issued by the credit rating agencies Standard & Poor’s, Moody’s Corporation, and the Fitch Group, as well as some other data regarding the situation of public finances in the Republic of Slovenia.

19. The explanations of the Ministry of Finance were sent to the applicant of the request for the calling of a referendum on the SNHCA and to the petitioner for a referendum on the MSSBA. The petitioner for a referendum on the MSSBA took a position thereon, whereby it continued to fully support the positions in its reply to the request of the National Assembly. It is of the opinion that the documentation of the Ministry of Finance confirms its position that there are no substantiated constitutional reasons for the prohibition of a referendum on the MSSBA. Allegedly, from the data of the Ministry of Finance it namely proceeds that “the budget is not at all illiquid, and there are no prospects (demonstrated or substantiated in the request of the National Assembly) for something similar in the future; the borrowings of the state are obviously flowing quite smoothly, even ‘successfully’, regarding the MF documentation. These data allegedly only show a certain oscillation of interest rates or conditions for borrowing. Referring to the assessment criteria determined by Decision U-II-1/11, it claims that it is not possible to substantiate the prohibition of a referendum by the supposed unconstitutionality in the future and by economic reasons that are not measurable.

20. In conformity with the first sentence of the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution, in Slovenia power is vested in the people. In conformity with the second sentence of the second paragraph of this Article, they exercise this power directly and through elections, consistent with the principle of the separation of powers. In such manner, the Constitution establishes already at the level of basic constitutional principles two ways whereby the power, which in any case belongs to the people, is exercised.<sup>1</sup> Elections are that democratic and generally established constitutional institute on the basis of which the people – the voters – confer this power on the members of the representative body for the period of a predefined term of office. It is through elections that the legitimacy that the elected members of the representative body exercise this power in the name of the citizens is established.<sup>2</sup> For the exercise of this power they are politically accountable to the people, and such accountability is re-established over and over again through periodic and free democratic elections. Therefore, in such sense this is termed the people’s indirect exercise of power, i.e. representative democracy.<sup>3</sup> The people’s direct exercise of power includes the known forms of direct democracy,<sup>4</sup> which also include the referendum.
21. In Article 90, the Constitution determines the legislative referendum as the basic form of direct democracy, whereby it determines in the first paragraph of this Article that in a referendum questions that are regulated by law can be decided on. In the fifth paragraph of Article 90, the Constitution leaves the determination of the regulation of the manner of conducting legislative referenda to a law. Legislative referenda are called by the National Assembly, and the National Assembly is bound by the result of such referendum (the first paragraph of Article 90 of the Constitution). The second paragraph of Article 90 of the Constitution on one hand confers on the National Assembly the competence to decide on its own and of its own initiative whether to call a legislative referendum, and on the other hand gives certain subjects the right to call for a referendum: the National Assembly must call a legislative referendum if so is required by at least one third of the deputies, by the National Council, or by forty thousand voters. It clearly proceeds from this provision of the Constitution that voters directly exercise power at a legislative referendum either when a decision thereon is adopted by the National Assembly or when constitutionally authorised applicants request a legislative referendum. The manner how the right to request a call for a referendum is exercised is also determined by law, in conformity with the fifth paragraph of Article 90 of the Constitution. The legislature implemented its constitutional mandate determined by the fifth paragraph of Article 90 of the Constitution by means of the RPIA, by which the subsequent legislative referendum was established. The right to request a referendum is an important constitutional right which in an established constitutional democracy enables individual issues subject to statutory regulation to not be definitively decided on by an elected representative body, but that an act which such body has already adopted is, in accordance with the valid regulation under the RPIA, referred to the voters in order to be confirmed. If such right is successfully exercised, the voters decide on the implementation of such act in a referendum, whereby in this case they exercise the legislative power directly by exercising the right to decide in a referendum, the exercise of which is also regulated by the RPIA.<sup>5</sup>

22. In the first paragraph of Article 90, the Constitution allows for the calling of a legislative referendum on all issues that are the subject of regulation by law. From this provision stems the fact that the Constitution favours a wide possibility of conducting legislative referenda. However, this does not mean that the right to request a legislative referendum is absolute in the sense that the referendum should be admissible whenever the conditions for the calling of such under the second paragraph of Article 90 are fulfilled. The Constitutional Court adopted such a position already by Decision No. U-I-47/94, dated 19 January 1995 (Official Gazette RS, No. 13/95, and OdlUS IV, 4), where it proceeded from the fact that parallel to the right ensured by the second paragraph of Article 90 of the Constitution there can also exist other, equally constitutionally protected rights whose constitutional protection needs to be ensured. The weight of such other constitutional rights can in certain cases be so important that the right to request a legislative referendum must give way to them. It is also on this that the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA is based, in accordance with which, even though the conditions determined by the second paragraph of Article 90 are fulfilled, a referendum cannot be held if it is possible to assess that unconstitutional consequences would occur due to the suspension of the implementation of the act at issue or its rejection in a referendum.

23. The Constitutional Court has hitherto numerous times underlined that the notion of an unconstitutional consequence is a non-defined legal term whose content is interpreted by the Constitutional Court through positions adopted in proceedings for the review of the constitutional admissibility of a legislative referendum.<sup>6</sup> As a particular case might deal with a collision of constitutional values, wherein on one hand there is a constitutionally ensured right to request a legislative referendum, and on the other there are other constitutionally protected values, it has to be determined in each individual case what these constitutionally protected values are that can oppose the right determined by the second paragraph of Article 90 of the Constitution. In the hitherto decisions adopted in the exercise of its competence determined by Article 21 of the RPIA, the Constitutional Court proceeded from the criteria of its assessment that were, after being first formulated in Decisions No. U-II-1/06, dated 27 February 2006 (Official Gazette RS, No. 28/06, and OdlUS XV, 17) and No. U-II-1/09, dated 5 May 2009 (Official Gazette RS, No. 35/09, and OdlUS XVIII, 20), further elaborated and as such their grounds were contained in Decision No. U-II-2/09, dated 9 November 2009 (Official Gazette RS, No. 91/09, and OdlUS XVIII, 50). In the latter case, the Constitutional Court had to deal with a request for the calling of a referendum on an act by which the legislature had remedied an unconstitutional situation which had arisen because it had failed to respond to Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-159/08, dated 11 December 2008 (Official Gazette RS, No. 120/08, and OdlUS XVII, 71) within the time limit imposed by the Constitutional Court.<sup>7</sup> By this Decision, the unconstitutionality of an act in force was determined. The Constitutional Court deemed the position and the authority of the judiciary, as ensured by the second paragraph of Article 3 and Article 125 of the Constitution, the right to judicial protection (the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution), and the importance of respect for the Constitutional Court decisions for the enforcement of the principles of the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution) and of the separation of powers (the second sentence of the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution) to be constitutionally protected values that had to be given priority over the right to request a referendum.<sup>8</sup> In the mentioned case, these values were the starting

6 Cf. Decision No. U-II-1/11, Paragraph 14.

7 In this Decision the Constitutional Court assessed the constitutionality of the regulation of judicial salaries in the Public Sector Salary System Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 95/07 – official consolidated text, 17/08, 58/08, and 80/08 – PSSSA) and in the Judicial Service Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 94/07 – official consolidated text – JSA).

8 The Constitutional Court assessed that such values must be given priority over the right to a referendum and that unconstitutional consequences would occur by the rejection of the Acts in a referendum. It namely established that even after two Constitutional Court decisions by which disrespect for one of the fundamental principles of the Constitution was established, i.e. the principle of the separation of powers, the legislature point of the assessment. Therefore, the criteria of the assessment proceeded from the fact that there existed an unconstitutionality with regard to the valid statutory regulation that previously had been finally determined by a Constitutional Court decision, and from the assessment of whether the act which was to be the subject of deciding in a referendum remedied such unconstitutionality. On the basis of these findings, the Constitutional Court assessed whether it would be admissible for the previous unconstitutional situation to continue, were the act to be rejected in the referendum. Decision No. U-II-1/10, dated 10 June 2010 (Official Gazette RS, No. 50/10), also concerned a case with the same basis. In that case an unconstitutionality had been determined by Decision No. U-I-246/02, dated 3 April 2003 (Official Gazette RS, No. 36/03, and OdlUS XII, 24)<sup>9</sup> due to an inconsistency with the principles of legal certainty (Article 2 of the Constitution) and equality (the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution), while by Decision No. U-II-1/10 the Constitutional Court specifically underlined also the right to personal dignity (Article 34 of the Constitution). For a long period of time the legislature failed to respond to Decision No. U-I-246/02, whereby the Constitutional Court in quite a number of subsequent decisions kept warning of the unconstitutionality of such situation.<sup>10</sup> Therefore, the assessment of the admissibility of the referendum in that case was performed on the basis of the same starting points as in Decision No. U-II-2/09.

24. The criteria of assessment by which the Constitutional Court in the mentioned cases assessed whether unconstitutional consequences could occur due to the rejection of the act in a referendum were adapted to the constitutional values which the Constitutional Court established carry significant weight in relation to the right to request a referendum.<sup>11</sup> The fact that the unconstitutionality had already been determined by a decision of the Constitutional Court placed two questions at the centre of the assessment criteria: 1) whether the valid act is unconstitutional, and 2) whether the act which was to be decided on in a referendum eliminates such unconstitutionality in a constitutionally consistent way. These were the basic questions that had to be answered in order for the Constitutional Court to then weigh, in such a situation involving a collision of constitutional values, whether priority should be given to the right to request had still not eliminated the unconstitutionality. It assessed that further continuation of the unconstitutional situation that a rejection of the Acts in a referendum would cause was constitutionally unacceptable, especially from the viewpoint of the role that the judicial authority has in a state governed by the rule of law and particularly regarding the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

- 9 By this Decision, the Constitutional Court assessed the constitutionality of the Act Regulating the Legal Status of Citizens of Former Yugoslavia Living in the Republic of Slovenia (Official Gazette RS, No. 61/99 and 64/01 – ARLSCFY).
- 10 For instance, in Decision No. U-II-3/04, dated 20 April 2004 (Official Gazette RS, No. 44/04, and OdlUS XIII, 29).
- 11 In Decision No. U-II-2/09, the Constitutional Court stated: “The purpose that the legislature followed while adopting the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA was obviously to prevent, by a Decision of the Constitutional Court, that in a referendum voters could adopt a decision which would render impossible a constitutionally consistent elimination of an unconstitutional legislative regulation.”

a referendum or to other constitutional values. The Constitutional Court followed such approach in its subsequent decisions by which it exercised its competence determined by the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA, regardless of the fact that in some of them (see, in particular, Decision No. U-II-1/11) it was faced with situations that in their essence were significantly different than the situations in the mentioned decisions. Furthermore, as two cases concerned extensive acts that regulated entire legal fields (i.e. pension insurance and family relations), the Constitutional Court, due to the mentioned starting points, requested that the National Assembly demonstrate that there existed an evident unconstitutionality in the valid legislation that the Act which was to be subject to approval in a referendum allegedly remedied. Therefore, it requested that the National Assembly clearly demonstrate the existing unconstitutionality of the valid statutory regulation whose elimination was necessary in order to protect important constitutional consequences that had to be given priority over the right to request a legislative referendum, by which the voters were to decide on the adopted act.<sup>12</sup> If the National Assembly failed to demonstrate the unconstitutionality of the valid act, the Constitutional Court halted its assessment already at the first level of the determination of the existence of unconstitutional consequences, i.e. on the level of assessing whether the valid regulation was unconstitutional, without substantively assessing whether the case at issue referred, in addition to the right to request a legislative referendum, also to other values whose exercise and protection the newly adopted act pursues and which also must enjoy constitutional protection. In this manner, by Decision No. U-II-1/11 the Constitutional Court rejected the request at issue of the National Assembly, as the latter failed to demonstrate that the unconstitutionality of the act regulating pension and disability insurance already existed. It dismissed as irrelevant the allegations of the National Assembly that the state would have to increase borrowings even more in the future due to increased expenditures for the co-financing of the pension system as they could not substantiate the unconstitutionality of the valid statutory regulation.

25. In cases which are different in terms of content from the instances in Decisions Nos. U-II-2/09 and U-II-1/10, the hitherto established way of assessing the possibility of the occurrence of unconstitutional consequences can cause the constitutional arguments of the National Assembly directed towards the determination of unconstitutional consequences and the constitutional arguments of the applicants of the request for the calling of a referendum to not be given sufficient weight. When the situations which the Constitutional Court deals with are not such as those contained in Decisions Nos. U-II-2/09 and U-II-1/10, it can occur that the question of whether in addition to the right to request a legislative referendum also other constitutional rights are at issue is no longer the starting point of the assessment, as the assessment of the Constitutional Court can halt already at the first stage, as the criteria of assessment are entirely adapted to the situation stated in the mentioned Decisions. The criteria on the basis of which the Constitutional Court assessed the admissibility of the referendum in the stated cases were adapted to the constitutional values that by these two Decisions were weighed against the right to request the calling of a legislative referendum. What they had in common was especially that there already existed two Decisions of the Constitutional Court regarding the unconstitutionality of an act that in a state governed by the rule of law, in which the principle of the separation of powers is established, required that the legislature respond by adopting an appropriate statutory regulation that remedies such unconstitutionality. In different cases, such a starting point can lead to the overlooking of other constitutional values that may have an important, even decisive, weight when weighing the constitutional right determined by the second paragraph of Article 90 of the Constitution and other constitutionally protected values. Such can occur especially when what is at issue is a statutory regulation that predominantly or entirely regulates anew particular social questions. An act can namely regulate the exercise of constitutionally guaranteed rights and protect constitutional values that by their nature have an important constitutional weight in comparison to the right to request the calling of a constitutional referendum.

26. The stated facts require the Constitutional Court to modify to a certain extent its position regarding the starting point of the assessment and elaborate its understanding of the notion of unconstitutional consequences in the sense of the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA. The fundamental value-based starting point for the competence of the Constitutional Court under the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA is namely that that it is the Constitutional Court as the guardian of the Constitution whose duty it is to adjudge truly whether by the suspension of the implementation of an act or by its rejection in a referendum “so important constitutional rights would be affected that for this reason it would be admissible – by weighing the affected constitutional values – to interfere with the constitutional right”<sup>13</sup> to request a referendum, which is provided for by the second paragraph of Article 90 of the Constitution. The starting point of the assessment of the Constitutional Court is the constitutionally protected rights or other constitutionally protected values, while the assessment of the Constitutional Court regarding which of them has to be given priority in each individual case must be adapted to their nature and the relationship between them.
27. The criteria of the assessment that the Constitutional Court introduced by Decisions Nos. U-II-2/09 and U-II-1/10 are thus appropriate and sufficient when the Constitutional Court deals with a request to respect the principles of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution) and of the separation of powers (the second sentence of the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution), the basis of which can be found in the already extant decisions of the Constitutional Court. Then, by the adopted act the legislature eliminates the established unconstitutionality. These criteria are also appropriate when what is at issue is in one part a fully defined statutory regulation for which, already in the legislature’s assessment, it is evident that it is unconstitutional, regarding which the legislature itself would assess that such an unconstitutionality must be remedied. It is then possible to request and expect that the legislature fulfil the burden of allegation and the burden of proof in order to convince the Constitutional Court of the unconstitutionality of the valid act that the newly adopted statutory regulation remedies in a constitutionally consistent way, and that due to the need to ensure the protection of the stated constitutionally protected values these values must be given priority over the right to request a legislative referendum.

28. However, the constitutional assessment of the admissibility of a referendum is not limited only to instances when what is at issue is a determined unconstitutionality of a statutory regulation that needs to be eliminated. When what is at issue is the question of whether due to the rejection of an act in a referendum other constitutional values would inadmissibly be affected that do not of themselves refer to the elimination of the existing unconstitutionality of the statutory regulation, nor does the newly adopted act primarily pursue such a goal, in the starting point of the assessment of the admissibility of a referendum such constitutional rights must be taken into consideration and, regarding their importance and nature, the criteria for the assessment of the possibility of the occurrence of unconstitutional consequences must be established. Due to the holding of the referendum and the [possible] rejection of the act in a referendum, these constitutional values must not remain unprotected to such an extent that such would cause their substantial limitation or even emptying, which would destroy the balance of the constitutionally protected values.
29. With regard to all of the above, in the assessment of the existence of the possibility that unconstitutional consequences might occur, it is not possible to proceed from the established criteria for the assessment that presuppose an assessment of the constitutionality of the valid statutory regulation and of the newly adopted statutory regulation that is to be the subject of deciding in a referendum, but what has to be determined is which constitutionally protected values may be an obstacle to the realisation of the legislative referendum. Important constitutionally protected values are placed in opposition to the right determined by the second paragraph of Article 90 of the Constitution and these establish the starting point of the constitutional assessment and determine the criteria of its assessment in individual cases. In this manner, the Constitutional Court has the possibility to perform its role as the guardian of constitutional values and to assess, by means of weighing – in conformity with the general principle of proportionality (Article 2 of the Constitution) – which values, among all the values that otherwise enjoy constitutional protection, must be given priority in order to maintain the balance between the constitutional values and to protect those that due to the rejection of the act at issue could be jeopardised.
30. The legislature must respond, with the adoption of appropriate statutory regulation, to needs in all fields of social life, which is even more true if such needs concern the foundations of the functioning of the state or its ability to efficiently ensure human rights and fundamental freedoms.<sup>14</sup> The representative authority was given the competence to exercise legislative authority in free democratic elections that demand responsible exercise of such power. The Government, as the constitutionally determined proposer of laws (Article 88 of the Constitution), also carries equal responsibility. The legislature has wide discretion regarding the regulation of individual social questions. The way it regulates them is a matter of the appropriateness of the statutory regulation, the adoption of which it is competent for and for which it carries all political responsibility. In this sense, the statutory regulation can also be, in conformity with the first paragraph of Article 90 of the Constitution, the subject of political decision-making in a referendum. However, the legislature is the first subject that, in accordance with the statutory regulation, is bound by the Constitution (the first paragraph of Article 153 of the Constitution), which it has to respect. Therefore, in instances when the legislature's intention is to protect important constitutional guarantees by exercising the legislative power and when by the adopted act it also has, in its opinion, already protected them, these values are placed against the right to request a legislative referendum. The legislature then no longer operates only in the framework of the appropriateness of the statutory regulation that is entirely within its discretion. When the protection of constitutional values is at issue, the statutory regulation gains a constitutional dimension. The latter is the basis for weighing the values and for assessing which of them should be given priority in order to ensure balanced (proportional) respect for all protected interests. Thereby the legislature has to assess whether the implementation of the newly adopted act is necessary in order to ensure the protection of the constitutional values that are placed against the right to request a referendum.

14 Already in Decision No. U-I-69/03, dated 20 October 2005 (Official Gazette RS, No. 100/05, and OdlUS XIV, 75), the Constitutional Court stated: "The principle of adapting the law to social relations is one of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution)."

31. The right to request a legislative referendum is an important constitutional right explicitly determined by the second paragraph of Article 90 of the Constitution. As such, the Constitutional Court has to ensure its constitutional protection. Therefore, in the case of a collision between various constitutional values, the Constitutional Court must assess, when exercising the competence determined by the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA, which of the constitutionally protected values must be given priority. Thereby, it first has to assess the importance of the constitutionally protected values that the National Assembly claims are placed against the right to request a referendum and whether their protection requires that statutory measures must be urgently adopted. Due to the holding of a referendum or rejection of the act in a referendum, the non-implementation of the newly adopted statutory regulation would inadmissibly limit or possibly even empty such values. Such would entail a serious obstacle to the exercise of the right to request a legislative referendum on acts that are intended to at least substantially mitigate, if not prevent, the limitation or even emptying of constitutional values. Due to their constitutional weight, they can outweigh the right under the second paragraph of Article 90 of the Constitution. On this basis, it first has to be determined what constitutional values are relevant in a specific case. Then, in accordance with their constitutional weight, it has to be assessed whether the right to request the calling of a legislative referendum has to have priority or whether such has to give way, as due to the protection of other constitutional values newly adopted statutory measures must urgently be implemented in order to prevent unconstitutional consequences from occurring due to the suspension of the implementation of the act or its rejection in the referendum. Thereby, the Constitutional Court has to consider that due to Article 25 of the RPIA (which prohibits the National Assembly, for one year after the promulgation of referendum decision, from adopting an act that would be substantively inconsistent with the decision of the voters), the rejection of an act in a referendum can cause unconstitutional consequences to remain for at least one year.

B – II

32. The petitioner for a referendum on the MSSBA alleges that there is a substantial deficiency in the request of the National Assembly in that it allegedly does not claim which statutory regulation is allegedly unconstitutional. Therefore, these allegations [of the petitioner] have to be replied to even before beginning a substantive assessment. Neither the RPIA nor the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 64/07 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the CCA) precisely determine the content of a request of the National Assembly by which it initiates the proceedings determined by the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA. By the nature of the matter, its content can only be directly linked to the subject of the decision-making of the Constitutional Court, while this depends precisely on the content of the notion of unconstitutional consequence. In fact, the CCA namely does explicitly determine in the first paragraph of Article 24b what a request for a review of constitutionality must contain, but this and other provisions of Chapter IV of this Act, in conformity with the first paragraph of Article 49 of the CCA in other matters in the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court, only apply mutatis mutandis and insofar as not otherwise provided by this Act. Under the second paragraph of Article 49, the CCA explicitly determines that the Rules of Procedure of the Constitutional Court determine which information must be contained in applications in other matters within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court if such is not already determined by law. As the RPIA, which establishes this special competence of the Constitutional Court, does not contain any provisions regarding this matter, the Rules of Procedure of the Constitutional Court (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 86/07, 54/10, and 56/11 – hereinafter referred to as the Rules) determine that the request of the National Assembly must contain a statement of the consequences which allegedly could occur due to the suspension of the implementation of the law or due to the law at issue not being adopted, and a statement of reasons due to which the consequences are allegedly unconstitutional (the second and third indents of Section XI.1. of the Annex with reference to the second paragraph of Article 34 of the Rules). The request of the National Assembly that refers to the referendum on the MSSBA contains such statement. Therefore, it is not possible to concur with the allegations of the petitioner for a referendum on the MSSBA regarding the existence of a substantial deficiency in the request that as a consequence allegedly does not allow for its substantive review.

33. However, it is necessary to agree with the position of the applicant of the request for the calling of a referendum on the SNHCA that the decision regarding the existence of the request for the calling of a legislative referendum constitutes an integral part of the National Assembly's autonomy. Therefore, the Constitutional Court did not take a position on the allegations of the National Assembly that refer to whether the National Assembly correctly determined that there existed a request by at least one third of the deputies regarding the calling of a referendum on the SNHCA.
34. Regarding the facts stated in paragraphs 28 to 30 of the reasoning of this Decision, what first has to be determined is which constitutional values are those which the National Assembly claims would be inadmissibly limited or jeopardised due to the suspension of the implementation of the SNHCA or the MSSBA or due to their rejection in a referendum. Thereby, the National Assembly specifically warns that inadmissible unconstitutional consequences would already occur due to the suspension of the implementation of the Acts, which was the reason why, regarding the MSSBA, it had filed its request even before the collection of voters' signatures for the filing of a request for the calling of a legislative referendum finished.
35. In both requests, the National Assembly underlines specific constitutionally protected values that in its opinion are already limited to such a degree that an unconstitutional situation already exists. It is precisely the implementation of the SNHCA and the MSSBA that allegedly would prevent the deterioration of the otherwise already existent unconstitutional situation and thus also the emergence of more severe unconstitutional consequences than already exist. Therefore, the implementation of these two Acts as two measures, among others, for the stabilisation of public finances intended to ensure the reorganisation of the banking sector and to ensure efficient and clear management of state property, is allegedly necessary.
36. The National Assembly alleges that the existing instability of public finances is already such that the Republic of Slovenia is no longer able to finance the state's obligations arising from the constitutionally guaranteed rights to social security and health insurance. Due to the hindered borrowing, which is a consequence of the continued deterioration of the relevant credit ratings, the reason for which lies precisely in the condition of the banking system and in the inefficient and opaque management of state property, the state is allegedly no longer able to ensure a social minimum income to current and future generations, and for a certain part of the population, even a living minimum income is allegedly jeopardised. Thereby, human dignity is allegedly already inadmissibly affected. In such an unstable condition of public finances, the fulfilment of the state's obligation to ensure the exercise of individual rights by paying out financial resources is allegedly made impossible, even though the state is bound to such action on the basis of Article 2 and the second paragraph of Article 148 of the Constitution. Thereby, beside the rights that are explicitly provided for by the Constitution as human rights, there are allegedly many other rights at issue regarding which the state is bound by the Constitution to act in a certain active way so that individual rights, such as those regarding employment and work (Article 66 of the Constitution) would also in fact be ensured. If the necessary measures are not adopted, the state would allegedly no longer be able to fulfil its obligations due to the hindered borrowing or imminent inability to borrow. The National Assembly therefore alleges substantial limitations regarding providing for the efficient functioning of the state and providing for an efficient system of social security and health care, which under the second paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution the state must provide for in order for the human rights determined by the first paragraph of Article 50, the first and second paragraph of Article 51, and Article 52 of the Constitution to be ensured, as well as the rights which the state must create the conditions for the implementation thereof (such as Article 66 of the Constitution).

37. The National Assembly affirmed that without the adoption of immediate urgent measures it would not be possible to eliminate the excessive public deficit of the state and thus to ensure the fulfilment of the obligations that Slovenia must respect on the basis of Article 3a of the Constitution and Article 126 of the TFEU, so that by the end of 2013 it would reduce the public deficit by 3% of GDP. Equally, for such reason it would allegedly be impossible to ensure the fulfilment of the obligations determined by Article 8 of the Constitution. The legislature had namely already ratified the TSCG, on the basis of which respect for the fiscal rule regarding a balanced budget should be ensured. Furthermore, Directive 2011/85/EU should be implemented by the end of 2013. The National Assembly therefore claims that without the adoption of specific measures, which the MSSBA and the SNHCA also constitute an integral part of, the state cannot ensure the fulfilment of its obligations that stem from binding instruments of international law (Article 8 of the Constitution) and obligations that stem from its membership in the European Union (Article 3a of the Constitution).
38. Without the adoption of immediate urgent measures, the subsequent deterioration of the credit ratings of the state as well as of the banks would allegedly occur, which could render impossible also the recapitalisation of the banks by the ECB and thus cause Slovene banks to have a liquidity crisis, as ECB funds are currently allegedly their only remaining source of liquidity. The problem of repaying the loans that the Republic of Slovenia obtained from the EIB would allegedly occur and subsequently the credibility of the guarantees of the state would deteriorate. Subsequent deterioration of credit ratings would allegedly in this and in the next year lead to an increase in the public deficit, and also problems with the liquidity of the banks and the state would allegedly occur, which would lead to a situation in which Slovenia would be obliged to apply for financial assistance from the European fund for providing the financial stability. By requesting international financial assistance, in which also the IMF is involved, a constitutionally inadmissible interference with the sovereignty of the state outside the scope determined by Article 3a of the Constitution would occur. The National Assembly therefore claims that by the adoption of immediate, urgent measures an inadmissible interference with the sovereignty of the state (the first paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution) would be prevented.
39. The National Assembly therefore places against the constitutional right to request a decision on an act in a referendum determined by the second paragraph of Article 90 of the Constitution the duty to ensure the efficient functioning of the state by the performance of its important functions and ensuring the rights to social security, health care, and also the other human rights regarding which the Constitution imposes obligations on the state, which is underlined already among the general provisions of the Constitution (the first paragraph of Article 5). In the field of establishing an appropriate economic basis for ensuring efficient free economic initiative (the first paragraph of Article 74 of the Constitution) as well as in the field of the creation of opportunities for employment and work (Article 66 of the Constitution), as well as in other fields, the efficient functioning of the state is in public interest. The efficiency of the state in all of the above fields should enable the establishment of conditions for work and for ensuring social protection and thus for ensuring the conditions which should provide for a life worthy of a human being (Article 34 of the Constitution), which actually forms the basis of human dignity (Article 1 of the Constitution). In addition, the National Assembly also underlined the duty of the state to respect adopted international obligations (Article 8 of the Constitution) and obligations arising from the European legal order (the third paragraph of Article 3a of the Constitution), and ensuring the sovereignty of the state (the first paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution), which forms a constitutionally determined basis for the existence of the state insofar as the exercise of a part of its sovereign rights were not transferred to the European Union. What are at issue are important constitutional values which call, if they are substantially limited, for a responsible response from the Government as well as from the legislature.

40. Therefore, while assessing whether unconstitutional consequences would occur due to the suspension of the implementation of the SNHCA and the MSSBA or due to their rejection in a referendum, the Constitutional Court must proceed from the question whether the possibility of a significant limitation of important constitutional values has been demonstrated, as is alleged by the National Assembly. After it determines that the National Assembly has demonstrated such limitation, it has to assess which constitutional values should be given priority in the stated circumstances: the right to request a legislative referendum or the immediate implementation of the Acts which the National Assembly assessed are urgently necessary for the protection of important constitutional values.

B – III

41. As the National Assembly first of all underlines that the sovereignty of the state, which is certainly one of the central constitutionally protected values (the Preamble to the Constitution and the first paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution), is in jeopardy, it first has to be assessed whether this value is in fact jeopardised in the stated circumstances. As the Constitutional Court already stated in Opinion No. Rm-1/02, dated 19 November 2003 (Official Gazette RS, No. 118/03, and OdlUS XII, 89), with reference to legal theory, state sovereignty is a characteristic of state power as the highest authority in the state (the so-called supreme state power), which is externally independent from any other authority; what is at issue are thus its external sovereignty, which represents the independence of the state power or the state with respect to other subjects of the same kind, and its internal sovereignty, which reflects the fact that in its territory the state is the supreme, independent, and original power, which has legally subordinated everything located in its territory. It expressly underlined that neither the first nor the second aspect of state sovereignty is absolute; the external sovereignty precisely due to the existence of public international law.<sup>15</sup> If the state were to need international monetary assistance and if to acquire such assistance it were necessary to conclude an agreement on its allocation with the IMF, which in the opinion of the National Assembly would exceed the transfer of sovereignty under Article 3a of the Constitution to the European Union, such in itself would not entail an inadmissible threat to state sovereignty. The Republic of Slovenia as a state is an international subject and as such can sovereignly conclude international treaties that have, in conformity with Article 8 of the Constitution, a status higher than laws within the hierarchy of legal acts that exist in the state. However, treaties are only assigned such power after being ratified by the National Assembly, meaning that the final decision regarding the conclusion of such international agreement is left to the legislature. When what is at issue is a transfer of the exercise of a part of the sovereign rights to international organisations which are based on respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, democracy, and the principles of the state governed by the rule of law, such international agreement must be ratified by the National Assembly by a qualified majority of deputies (the first paragraph of Article 3a of the Constitution). Sovereignty could be jeopardised by the content of such international agreement and only then the question of its constitutional relevance might arise. The circumstances of the case at issue are not such, therefore in the framework of this assessment it is not demonstrated that this good, which otherwise is constitutionally very important, would already be directly affected or inadmissibly limited.

42. However, also other values underlined by the National Assembly which are likewise constitutionally protected need to be taken into consideration. Other important constitutional values include the effective functioning of a state governed by the rule of law and the effective functioning of a social state, and in such framework, also fostering the exercise of human rights and fundamental freedoms, which include the right to free economic initiative (the first paragraph of Article 74 of the Constitution), the duty of the state to create opportunities for employment and work (Article 66 of the Constitution), and the rights from the field of social security. Under the first paragraph of Article 74, the Constitution ensures free economic initiative. Such requires that the state create conditions for its free exercise and this also has to be taken into consideration by the legislature when adopting statutory regulations. The latter thereby has to consider that the second sentence of the second paragraph of Article 74 of the Constitution does not allow only for the possibility of statutory regulation, but also requires the legislature, by prohibiting the performance of economic activity contrary to the public benefit, to form economic policy, and gives it the authority to adopt measures by which it will be able to ensure the realisation of the goals of such policy (The Constitutional Court took such a standpoint already in Decision No. U-I-145/95, dated 9 November 1995, Official Gazette RS, No. 68/95, and OdlUS IV, 113). The Constitution thereby allows the legislature wide discretion regarding the choice of economic policy measures which it deems necessary, whereby the legislature itself is bound by the constitutional prohibition that it must not allow the performance of economic activity contrary to the public benefit. What is at the heart of the economic policy by which the conditions for exercising free economic initiative are created is undoubtedly ensuring the effective functioning of the banking sector. Precisely from this view, it is understandable that the National Assembly stresses the urgent need to eliminate the so-called credit crunch,<sup>16</sup> where what is at issue is a situation in which the banks fail to perform one of their basic roles in the economic system.

43. Without creating the conditions for the effective realisation of free economic initiative, it is not possible to expect stable and efficient development of the economic system that would provide sufficient financial resources for the effective functioning of the state regarding the exercise of its functions, i.e. from the functions of the state power to ensuring constitutionally protected values, including the accessibility of education (Articles 57 and 58 of the Constitution), the existence and development of cultural, scientific, and artistic life (Article 59 of the Constitution), and the establishment of stable systems in the field of social security (the second paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution), which have to ensure the right to social security (the first paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution), the right to health care (the first and second paragraphs of Article 51 of the Constitution), and the rights of persons with disabilities (Article 52 of the Constitution).
44. From the data that were submitted by the Ministry of Finance, it is evident that the level of available budgetary financial resources substantially diminished in 2012. In September 2012, it allegedly reached the lowest level in the past five years (215 million euro). A liquidity deficit is also predicted for the first months of 2013, due to which the state budget should borrow funds already in the first quarter of next year. In its Economic Issues 2012, also the Institute for Macroeconomic Analysis and Development draws attention to this fact.<sup>17</sup> At the same time, the Budgetary Memorandum 2013-2014 (EPA 692-VI, 693-VI) proceeds from the fact that, even if all the expected structural and other planned urgent measures are taken, in 2013 GDP will still decrease by 1.4%. At the same time, in its Autumn Forecast for the Period 2012-2014<sup>18</sup> the European Commission predicts a 1.6% decrease in GDP for the same year, which can, as proceeds from the credit assessments that the Ministry of Finance submitted, have an influence on its further decrease in the future. Since a simultaneous increase 16 Also the OECD in its Economic forecast for Slovenia draws attention to the need to restore the credit activity of banks. in the public deficit is predicted, it is not possible to doubt the allegations of the National Assembly that in 2013, as proceeds from the data submitted by the Ministry of Finance, further borrowing of at least 1.4 billion euro will be necessary to ensure the smooth functioning of the state in all the stated fields. The Constitutional Court thus has no reason to doubt the credibility of the submitted data, especially since also the estimations and data of other appropriate domestic and international institutions confirm them. The fact that in such a situation certain urgent measures need to be adopted that concern the reorganisation of the banking system, the management of state property, further fiscal consolidation, and also certain structural reforms, proceeds not only from a few successive credit ratings issued by various credit rating agencies, but also from the concluding statement of the IMF mission<sup>19</sup> and from the economic prognosis of the OECD for Slovenia.<sup>20</sup> The urgency of the adoption of certain measures therefore has a role in ensuring the efficient functioning of the state, which also includes ensuring the human rights and fundamental freedoms to which the National Assembly draws attention.

45. The National Assembly has already adopted certain statutory measures, some of which are also already the subject of constitutional assessment by the Constitutional Court (such as the Fiscal Balance Act, Official Gazette RS, No. 40/12 – FBA). The basis of the purpose of such is the same as is the purpose of the statutory measures that would be subject to deciding in a referendum. This purpose is to ensure the efficient functioning of the state in the current circumstances of a severe economic crisis, when the state already has an excessive public deficit that it has to reduce in order to ensure the performance of its functions and, at the same time, to ensure the respect of certain – even more important in the economic crisis – human rights, to which the National Assembly explicitly draws attention. Regarding the existing economic and especially financial circumstances, it is thus not possible to deny the urgency of the measures that the state has to adopt, among them especially measures regarding the reorganisation of the banking system and ensuring efficient and transparent management of state property. The SNHCA and the MSSBA entail such measures. The fact that the stated Acts introduce measures that are to a certain extent interconnected is claimed not only by the National Assembly but also by the applicant of the request for the calling of a referendum on the SNHCA by drawing attention to the fact that the capital investments of the Republic of Slovenia in the banks in need of reorganisation will also be transferred to the above-mentioned holding company.

Also the Secretary General of the OECD, Angel Gurría, among other things, stated at the Bled Strategic Economic Forum (2012) that: “Slovenia must ensure that the framework for the governance of state-owned enterprises, which is currently being discussed, is robust enough to deal with the range of structural challenges facing the state owned sector, including competitiveness, deleveraging, and privatisation. The overall objective must be to ensure consistency, predictability, and transparency in the governance of state-owned enterprises. This will in turn help improve market and consumer confidence.” Available at: <http://www.oecd.org/fr/slovenie/newchallengesnewchampions.htm> (13 December 2012).

46. Ensuring respect for the adopted international obligations and the obligations of the Republic of Slovenia which, as a Member State of the European Union, stem from full membership in this international organisation also has to be taken into consideration as constitutionally important. The TSCG is an international treaty that is formally separated from the treaties of the European Union.<sup>21</sup> It is to take effect on 1 January 2013, under the condition that by then the instrument of its ratification will have been deposited by twelve states party to the treaty whose currency is the euro; if such does not occur by that date, implementation occurs on the first day of the month after the instrument of ratification is deposited by the twelfth state party to the treaty whose currency is the euro (the second paragraph of Article 14 of the TSCG). At this time, the instruments of ratification of eight states party to the treaty whose currency is the euro have been submitted.<sup>22</sup> However, the instrument of ratification of the Republic of Slovenia is one of these. By the implementation of the act on ratification, the treaty is transposed into the internal legal order. It therefore binds the state authorities, even though such international obligation arises only by the entry into force of the treaty. By ratifying the treaty, the state assumes obligations under the treaty that are to be interpreted in accordance with international law (The Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, Official Gazette SFRY No. 30/72 – hereinafter referred to as the VCLT, and rules of customary international law that are not codified therein). When a treaty becomes internationally binding, there also arises an international obligation of the state to fulfil it. Under the provision of Article 26 of the VCLT, every treaty in force is binding upon the parties to it and must be performed by them in good faith (pacta sunt servanda). Under Article 27 of this Convention, a particular party may, as a general rule, not invoke the provisions of its internal law as justification for its failure to perform a treaty. If the fulfilment of an international obligation from a treaty requires the adoption or amendment of the appropriate normative regulation, the state is bound by international law also to fulfil the obligation at issue in such manner. The failure to fulfil the obligation entails a violation of the treaty – it entails that the state commits an international offence resulting in a responsibility under international law (compare with Decision

22 For two states signatories who are members of the euro area, information is already published that as far as the national legal order is concerned, the ratification is complete, but the documents have not yet been submitted. See: Table on the Ratification Process of the Amendment of Art. 136 TFEU, ESM Treaty and Fiscal Compact, Brussels, 7 December 2012, available at: <http://www.europarl.europa.eu/webnp/webdav/site/myjahiasite/users/fboschi/public/art.%20136%20ESM%20fiscal%20compact%20ratprocess.pdf> (13 December 2012).

No. U-I-376/02, dated 24 March 2005, Official Gazette RS, No. 46/05, and OdlUS XIV, 17). After at least another four states party to the treaty who are members of the euro area submit the instruments of ratification when the TSCG becomes internationally binding, Slovenia will be obliged to ensure that the budgetary position of the general government of the state is balanced or in surplus (indent (a) of the first paragraph of Article 3 of the TSCG).<sup>23</sup> At the latest, within one year after this treaty enters into force, the state must ensure that this rule is binding and permanent, if possible a constitutional rule, or it has to ensure its full respect and fulfilment in national budgetary procedures by some other means. In conformity with the principle of acting in good faith (bona fide), a state which has ratified an international treaty must immediately act in such a manner that it will be able to fulfil its obligations arising therefrom when such treaty enters into force internationally.

47. Likewise, in conformity with Article 3a of the Constitution, the state must fulfil its obligations that arise from the legal order of the European Union. Thereby, it has to be taken into consideration that economic policy, even though it does not lie in the exclusive competence of the European Union, as does, for example, monetary policy, has become a matter of common interest and is conducted in the framework of wider guidelines which are adopted by the Council (Article 120 of the TFEU), and that the Government and National Assembly must adopt economic decisions in such a manner so as to contribute to the goals which the European Union strives to achieve.<sup>24</sup> Regarding the obligations under the law of the European Union, the National Assembly specifically underlines the recommendations of the Council adopted on the basis of the seventh paragraph of Article 126 of the TFEU precisely due to the proceedings against the Republic of Slovenia regarding the excessive public deficit. It thereby draws attention to the fact that in 2010 and 2011 Slovenia did not reduce this deficit, wherefore in this and the next year it has to be reduced by 3% of GDP. Council Decision of 19 January 2010 on the existence of an excessive deficit in Slovenia (2010/289/EU)<sup>25</sup> determined that there existed an excessive deficit in Slovenia which was not only a consequence of the reference values regarding its admissibility being temporary exceeded. The determination of the fact that there exists an excessive deficit causes the initiation of proceedings regarding the excessive deficit. The purpose of such proceedings regarding the excessive deficit is to encourage and, if necessary, compel the Member State to reduce the determined deficit.<sup>26</sup> The proceedings regarding the excessive deficit are multi-level proceedings which can lead to the introduction of sanctions under the eleventh paragraph of Article 126 of the TFEU.<sup>27</sup> Such sanctions substantially exceed the sanctions that otherwise can be imposed on a Member State that does not fulfil obligations under the law of the European Union.<sup>28</sup> Article 126 of the TFEU precisely determines the course of such proceedings on each individual level and the roles and powers of a particular institution.<sup>29</sup> Where the Council decides that an excessive deficit exists, it adopts, without undue delay, on the recommendation of the Commission, recommendations addressed to the Member State concerned with a view to bringing that situation to an end (the seventh paragraph of Article 126 of the TFEU). The Council adopted recommendations for the Republic of Slovenia on 30 September 2009 and determined therein that in 2010 the state must implement measures for fiscal consolidation, in the period 2010-2013 annually reduce the deficit by 0.75% of GDP, and determine the measures by means of which it will eliminate the excessive deficit by the end of 2013.<sup>30</sup>

23 The rule from indent a) is deemed to be respected if the annual structural balance of the sector of the state attains the medium-term objective for a particular state, determined in the amended Stability and Growth Pact by the bottom level of the structural deficit at the level of 0.5% of GDP under market prices.

26 Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Union, dated 13 July 2004, in Commission of the European Communities v. Council of the European Union, C-27/04, ECR, p. I-6679, Para. 70.

48. If a Member State fails to follow the recommendations of the Council, the latter first has the possibility to publish the recommendations in conformity with the eighth paragraph of Article 126 of the TFEU, whereas if the Member State persists in failing to implement the recommendations of the Council, the latter can, under the ninth paragraph of Article 126 of the TFEU, demand the adoption of certain measures for decreasing the deficit which, in its opinion, could improve the situation. At the same time, until the Member State respects the order adopted in conformity with the ninth paragraph of Article 126 of the TFEU, the Council can, in conformity with the eleventh paragraph of the same Article, decide also to adopt one or more additional measures. When the Council, in conformity with the eleventh paragraph of Article 126 of the TFEU, adopts an order on the introduction of sanctions against the participating Member State, as a general rule a fine is imposed, while the Council can decide to supplement this fine with other measures under the eleventh paragraph of Article 126 of the TFEU,<sup>31</sup> including an appeal to the EIB to reconsider its lending policy towards the Member State concerned.<sup>32</sup> The National Assembly expressly

32 In conformity with Article 12 of the Regulation, the amount of the fine is composed of a fixed component equal to 0.2 % of GDP and a variable component. The variable component equals one tenth of the absolute value of the difference between the deficit as a percentage of GDP in the preceding year and the reference value of the deficit as a percentage of GDP or, if such disregard for budgetary discipline includes a measurement of the debt, between the public deficit as a percentage of GDP which would have to be, in conformity draws attention to the importance of the EIB for the functioning of the Slovene banking system, therefore it is possible to agree that the failure to implement the urgent measures intended to eliminate the excessive public deficit also jeopardises the credibility of the state from the viewpoint of respecting adopted international obligations as well as the obligations that Slovenia has as a Member State of the European Union, and especially as a Member State whose currency is the euro. The credibility of the state influences its capacity to acquire financial resources on the financial markets and consequently its capacity to ensure constitutional values, which is what the National Assembly draws attention to.

49. The Treaty on European Union (consolidated version, OJ C 83, 30 March 2010 – hereinafter referred to as the TEU) binds the Member States to continue the process of reinforcing the ever closer union among the peoples of Europe. The principle of loyal cooperation determined by Article 4 of the TEU, under which the Member States are to respect each other and assist each other in fulfilling the tasks and goals pursued by the European Union, determines the general obligation of Member States to respect the law of the European Union and to adopt general and particular measures necessary to ensure fulfilment of the obligations arising out of the Treaties or resulting from the acts of the institutions of the Union. One such act is Directive 2011/85/EU, regarding which the National Assembly warns that it has to be transposed by the end of 2013. The third paragraph of Article 288 of the TFEU determines that directives are binding, as regard the result to be achieved, upon each Member State to which they are addressed, but they leave the choice of form and methods to the national authorities. The freedom regarding the execution of directives which proceeds from the second paragraph of Article 288 of the TFEU entails nonetheless that Member States must choose their most appropriate methods and manner of execution.<sup>33</sup> A directive produces legal effects regarding the Member State to whom it is addressed – and consequently regarding all the authorities of the state – upon its publication or, depending on the case, upon the date of notification of it.<sup>34</sup> Directive 2011/85/EU entered into force on 13 December 2011 and as of this Decision, the period for its transposition has not yet expired. However, in conformity with the case law of the Court of Justice of the European Union, it stems from the usage of Article 4 of the TEU, with regard to the third paragraph of Article 288 of the TFEU, that the Member States to whom the directive is addressed must not, during the period for the transposition of the directive, adopt measures which could seriously jeopardise the attainment of the aim determined by the directive.<sup>35</sup> Such entails that the Republic of Slovenia must not, until the period for the transposition of the directive expires, adopt measures which would jeopardise the attainment of the aim of Directive 2011/85/EU, i.e. uniform respect for budgetary discipline, as is required by the TFEU.<sup>36</sup> Therefore, the Court can concur with the National Assembly that disrespect for the aims pursued by the stated Directive could affect the credibility of the state from the viewpoint of the obligations which it carries as a Member State of the European Union.

B – IV

50. In the substantiation of its request regarding the inadmissibility of the legislative referenda at issue, the National Assembly thus refers to values which are specifically protected by the Constitution, and demonstrates that at this time we are already faced with them being either jeopardised or substantially limited if the state fails to adopt measures necessary for the elimination of such limitations.
51. The constitutional values that are in collision with the right to request the calling of a legislative referendum include ensuring the undisturbed functioning of the state and respect for rights guaranteed by the Constitution, among them namely those determined by the first paragraph of Article 74, Article 66, the first paragraph of Article 50, the first and second paragraph of Article 51, and Article 52 of the Constitution. Furthermore, respect for the adopted international obligations must be ensured (Article 8 of the Constitution). It has to be taken into consideration that Slovenia is a full member of the European Union, in which, among others matters, it also shares a common currency with some members. Respect for the obligations that arise from membership in the European Union entails not only respect for the law of the European Union, but also respect for the first and third paragraphs of Article 3a of the Constitution. The National Assembly demonstrates that the functioning of such values, which are constitutionally protected, would be substantially damaged without these measures that the state must adopt as urgent measures. Thereby, in a very short period of time, i.e. next year, the situation could deteriorate, and as a consequence the constitutional protection of such values could become jeopardised.
52. The stated constitutionally protected values are those that in this Decision are placed against the right to request the calling of a legislative referendum. Therefore, it has to be assessed whether they have to be given priority over the right determined by the second paragraph of Article 90 of the Constitution in order to ensure the constitutional balance of the protected values.
53. Respect for the fundamental principles of international law and for treaties ensures the international credibility of a state; therefore this value has an important constitutional weight. Ensuring the effectiveness of the law of the European Union is also constitutionally important, to which the state has bound itself on the basis of the third paragraph of Article 3a of the Constitution. Such is true regardless whether we interpret this provision of the Constitution and the law of the European Union<sup>37</sup>

<sup>37</sup> Among the legal sources of European law, so-called primary law is especially important. See V. Trstenjak and M. Brkan, Pravo EU, Ustavno, procesno in gospodarsko pravo EU [EU Law; Constitutional, Procedural, and (even in cases where what is at issue is the so-called secondary legislation<sup>38</sup> of the European Union) to entail that due to the principle of the supremacy of the law of the European Union such law unconditionally also prevails over the provisions of the Constitution,<sup>39</sup> or in a manner such that in certain exceptional cases the law of the European Union has to give way to the Constitution. In the case at issue, it is namely not necessary for the Constitutional Court to take a position on this, as the weight of the constitutional value, i.e. respect for the law of the European Union, is enormous due to the fact that the third paragraph of Article 3a of the Constitution is expressly binding with regard to the above; under this paragraph the legal acts and decisions adopted within international organisations to which Slovenia has transferred the exercise of part of its sovereign rights – in the case at issue, the acts and decisions of the European Union<sup>40</sup> – are applied in accordance with the legal regulation of these organisations. For such reason, what is at issue is a specifically protected good, which in any case has to be attributed a significant weight.

54. The National Assembly demonstrates the urgency of the need to adopt appropriate measures, which, with reference to the above, include the SNHCA and the MSSBA. In the assessment of the National Assembly, the Acts are urgently needed to ensure the sustainability of the functioning of the state with regard to the public finances in the current circumstances of economic crisis. In light of the reasons stated by the National Assembly and due to the generally known facts regarding the position of the state from the viewpoint of public finances, the financial condition of the banks in state property, and also the condition of other Member States of the so-called euro area from the viewpoint of public finances, the Constitutional Court lacks sensible reasons that would cast doubt over the assessment of the National Assembly. This urgency is demonstrated by the need to ensure the efficient functioning of the state, which has to perform its functions in the public interest and for the welfare of its citizens. It must ensure respect for human rights (the first paragraph of Article 5 of the Constitution) and ensure the effective functioning of two fundamental social subsystems (the second paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution), it has to perform the adopted international obligations, and ensure the efficiency of the European legal order in its territory, all of which the National Assembly draws attention to.
55. In this Decision, the Constitutional Court is facing a special situation as the SNHCA and the MSSBA are two specific legislative measures among the measures which not only the Government and the National Assembly, but also important international subjects assess to be necessary to ensure the sustainability of the public finances and sufficient resources for enabling the functioning of the state and respect for human rights, which the state has to take care to efficiently ensure. Also at issue is that this concerns statutory measures that are not only important each in itself, but which are even more important as a group of measures by means of which urgent aims are pursued. Therefore, the urgency of each individual measure on the level of the system is convergent with the urgency of the adoption and realisation of other measures. As far as the SNHCA and the MSSBA are concerned, also their mutual interconnectedness is demonstrated.

38 The secondary law of the European Union is composed of regulations, directives, orders, recommendations, and opinions (the first paragraph of Article 288 of the TFEU), i.e. the acts adopted by the institutions of the European Union. Ibidem, p. 175.

39 Such proceeds from the Judgments of the Court of Justice of the European Union in Costa v ENEL, dated 15 July 1964, 6/64, ECR, p. 585, and Internationale Handelsgesellschaft, dated 17 December 1970, 11/70, ECR, p. 1125. Such a position is also supported by Dr Trstenjak and Dr Brkan; see V. Trstenjak and M. Brkan, op. cit., pp. 209–211.

40 In this case, Directive 2011/85/EU and the Council Recommendations dated 30 November 2009 (see note 30).

56. Whether the SNHCA and the MSSBA introduce measures which by their nature constitute the correct answer to the alleged situation existing in the state is not something that the Constitutional Court can assess.<sup>41</sup> Whether these Acts are thus statutory measures that in terms of content are good or bad or the most appropriate for regulating the issues that obviously must urgently be regulated, depends on the suitability and appropriateness of the statutory regulation with which the legislature must respond to the existing social needs. Therefore, the suitability and appropriateness of the statutory regulation cannot have an influence on the decision regarding the existence of unconstitutional consequences itself. As the Constitutional Court has already underlined in Decision No. U-II-1/11, also responsibility for the content of statutory regulation, in the case at issue for the content of two economic policy measures that refer to the functioning of the banking system and to the management of state property, for the stated reasons falls entirely on the National Assembly and the Government.<sup>42</sup> A different position would inadmissibly interfere with the principle of the separation of powers (the second sentence of the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution).
57. In the framework of this constitutional review of the admissibility of the referenda, what is in the foreground is neither the question of the constitutionality of the statutory regulation in force nor the question of the constitutionality of the adopted statutory regulation, i.e. the constitutionality of the SNHCA and the MSSBA, which would be submitted for approval in a referendum. When the Constitutional Court does not permit the realisation of a referendum and thus the implementation of the newly adopted act occurs as priority must be given to other constitutionally protected values, not to the right to request the calling of a referendum, such does not entail that after the act is implemented, in the case at issue the SNHCA and the MSSBA, it will not be possible to request a constitutional review thereof and to remedy possible unconstitutionality on the basis of an appropriate decision of the Constitutional Court.<sup>43</sup> In this case, the above-mentioned possibility of subsequent assessment of the constitutionality of these Acts works as an argument in favour of the other constitutionally protected values which have already been demonstrated to be substantially jeopardised or limited, in comparison to the right to request the calling of a legislative referendum.

58. Due to the mentioned constitutional values, the right to request the calling of a referendum is significantly limited, but it has to be taken into consideration that despite this fact, there exists the possibility to remedy possible unconstitutionality in the newly adopted statutory regulation by applying the institute of a constitutional review to the Acts at issue. However, no efficient legal remedies exist which could, if the National Assembly fails to adopt certain measures, remedy the main limitations of the effective functioning of the state in all fields of social life at the current moment and in the period during which legislative limitations under Article 25 of the RPIA would be in force, i.e. in 2013. Therefore, the Constitutional Court must concur with the National Assembly that, regarding the principle of proportionality, in order for the protection of all constitutional values to be ensured in an appropriate constitutional balance, the right to request the calling of a legislative referendum must give way in order to ensure the reestablishment of appropriate fundamental conditions for the development of free economic initiative and of all the foundations of the functioning of the economic and social system, as well as to ensure the efficient execution of state tasks determined in the constitutional order and in a manner that ensures the sustainability of the functioning of the state regarding the public finances – i.e. to ensure the protection of the values stated in Paragraph 51 of the reasoning of the present Decision. With regard to the reasons demonstrated by the National Assembly, unconstitutional consequences would result already by the subsequent suspension of the implementation of the Acts in order to realise referendum procedures, and, with regard to Article 25 of the RPIA, also due to the rejection of these urgent statutory measures in referenda.
59. With regard to all of the above, the Constitutional Court gave priority to the constitutionally protected values underlined in the requests of the National Assembly over enforcement of the right determined by the second paragraph of Article 90 of the Constitution. On such grounds, it decided that unconstitutional consequences would occur due to the rejection of the adopted Acts in referenda.

60. The Constitutional Court reached this decision on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA and the third indent of the second paragraph of Article 46 of the Rules of Procedure of the Constitutional Court, composed of: Dr Ernest Petrič, President, and Judges Mitja Deisinger, Dr Dunja Jadek Pensa, Mag. Marta Klampfer, Dr Etelka Korpič – Horvat, Mag. Miroslav Mozetič, Jasna Pogačar, Dr Jadranka Sovdat, and Jan Zobec. The decision was adopted by eight votes against one; Judge Korpič – Horvat voted against and submitted a dissenting opinion. Judge Petrič submitted a concurring opinion.

Dr Ernest Petrič
President

1. Let me first underline that in cases U-II-1/12 and U-II-2/12 what is at issue is, of course, not an assessment by the Constitutional Court regarding whether the measures implemented by the Slovene National Holding Company Act (EPA 516-VI – hereinafter referred to as the SNHCA) and by the Measures of the Republic of Slovenia to Strengthen the Stability of Banks Act (EPA 637-VI – hereinafter referred to as the MSSBA) – which in the opinions of the National Assembly and the Government form an integral part of the urgent reform package – really constitute the best possible solutions or not. An assessment regarding this issue would be an assessment of the suitability of these statutory solutions, which cannot be subject to assessment by the Constitutional Court. The applicants, i.e. the National Assembly and the Government, bear responsibility for whether the SNHCA and the MSSBA are appropriate measures or the best possible solutions. The issue of the quality and appropriateness of these two reform measures remained disputable among the applicants and a part of the profession, on one hand, and the opposition and a part of the profession, on the other. The Constitutional Court is not in the position to act as an arbitrator thereon.
2. In conformity with Article 21 of the Referendum and Popular Initiative Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 26/07 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the RPIA) and at the request of the National Assembly, the Constitutional Court was only obliged to adjudge whether the referenda on these Acts (one or both) must be allowed. However, I would like to add a few considerations. But first, let me stress that in the [Court's] assessment, the upgrade (or modification) of the test whose essence is the weighing, on one side, of constitutionally protected values (i.e. fundamental human rights, especially the right to social security (Article 50 of the Constitution), the right to health care (Article 51 of the Constitution), and the obligation of the state to provide opportunities for employment and work and to ensure their protection (Article 66 of the Constitution)), and, on the other side, the right to a referendum (Article 90 of the Constitution), constitutes an important step in the development of the doctrine of the Constitutional Court regarding future decision-making on the admissibility of referenda. Hitherto – especially because the Constitutional Court has been faced with such requests – the Constitutional Court assessed whether the rejection of an act in a referendum would lead to the continued existence of unconstitutionality that the new act would eliminate. The Constitutional Court again followed such an approach also when assessing the act regulating pensions because, among other reasons, in that case the urgency aspect, i.e. the existence of a direct and actually existing threat to constitutionally protected values, was not in the foreground.
3. In the case at hand, with an accentuated sense of urgency, the Constitutional Court had to take an approach to weighing the right to a referendum (Article 90 of the Constitution) and other constitutionally protected values or rights. I concur with the outcome of this weighing, which is expressed in the operative provisions and in the reasoning of the Decision. While weighing between constitutionally protected values by means of this new or improved test, the Constitutional Court, in my opinion, failed to attribute enough weight to the allegations of the National Assembly that the subsequent postponement of the reforms which the SNHCA and the MSSBA are a part of, may lead to the restriction of our country's sovereignty, as by applying for assistance (from the EU and the International Monetary Fund – hereinafter referred to as the IMF), which in the opinion of the National Assembly would be a consequence of a standstill as regards the reform efforts, the state would have to welcome the arrival of the so-called “troika” and its control. I believe that these arguments of the National Assembly are well-founded and should be taken into consideration.

4. Sovereignty is not only a legal category (legal supremacy and the independence of the state power), but it also has content. Such stems already from the right of the nation to self-determination, which is, as a general rule, realised in the form of its sovereign state. Undoubtedly – and such is explicitly expressed in all the most important international acts that determine the right of peoples to self-determination – this includes the determination of its own will (i.e. free!), not only regarding its own political status, but also regarding its economic, cultural, and social development.<sup>1</sup> Such is the essence of the content of the right to self-determination and, subsequently, the content of the sovereignty of the state, after a nation has realised the right to self-determination by establishing its own sovereign state. A sovereign state can, of course, by entering an international organisation and by concluding international treaties, of its own will, transfer a part of its sovereignty. However, when a state finds itself in a position wherein either an international organisation which it is a member of, or other members of the same international organisation, or future contractual partners therein actually dictate the content of the agreement, or in a position wherein it has to accept required conditions, and when such external requirements interfere with the sphere of its internal policy (for instance, the determination of a reduction in salaries and pensions, limitations on budgetary expenditures, etc.), its internal autonomy and independence regarding the determination of the economic, cultural, and especially social policy is undoubtedly damaged. Such “freedom”, which is the primary content and meaning, the raison d'être, first of self-determination and then of sovereignty, is limited. The position of Greece, as such is in relation to those in fact dictating (even though in the form of negotiations) its conditions of assistance and then controlling (together with the parliaments of other members of the EU or of the euro group) the exercise of such agreement, entails, from a substantive point of view, an actual limitation of its sovereignty regardless of the fact that it formally remains a sovereign state. Sovereignty, its actual content, not only its form, is, however, an important constitutionally protected value (Article 3 of the Constitution).
5. Sovereignty is one of the fundamental rights of the state under international customary law and, at the same time, on the basis of the Charter of the United Nations

---

1 Article 1 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (Official Gazette SFRY, No. 7/71 and Official Gazette RS, No. 35/92, MP, No. 9/91 – ICCPR) reads as follows: “All peoples have the right of self-determination. By virtue of that right they freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development.” The eighth indent of the Helsinki Final Act on security and cooperation in Europe from 1975 reads similarly.

(the right to sovereign equality – Article 2 of the Charter), one of the fundamental principles of modern international law. Precisely for such reason, its limitation is only admissible if such is stated by express provisions of international treaties or decisions of international organisations, which must be interpreted restrictively. If the Republic of Slovenia, due to the postponement of the reform efforts, which could – according to the allegations of the National Assembly and Government, and also to a series of international institutions – be a consequence of the realisation and result of the referenda at issue, entered into a position where international forums (i.e. the EU and the IMF) determined its conditions as well as limitations on its internal economic, financial, social, etc., policy, even if in the form of an agreement, such would entail an evident reduction or limitation of its sovereignty, which is an important constitutionally protected value.

6. In separate opinions to the Decisions of the Constitutional Court regarding the admissibility of a referendum (Decisions Nos. U-II-1/11, dated 10 March 2011, Official Gazette RS, No. 20/11, U-II-2/11, dated 14 April 2011, Official Gazette RS, No. 30/11, and U-II-3/11, dated 8 December 2011, Official Gazette RS, No. 109/11), I substantiated that Article 21 of the RPIA in fact represents an interference of the judicial branch of power, namely the Constitutional Court, with the course of the legislative procedure, which I believe is unacceptable from the viewpoint of the separation and equality of the three branches of power (Article 3 of the Constitution). I am still of the opinion that the Constitutional Court should, under the “principle of correlation”, approach the constitutional assessment of Article 21 of the RPIA from the viewpoint of Article 3 of the Constitution. I hope nonetheless that this question will be resolved in the framework of the planned amendment of the Constitution (and subsequently of the legislation) regarding the regulation of referenda. What would be definitely constitutionally clear and politically appropriate would be a regulation that would sensibly determine and appropriately limit exercise of the right to a referendum. The possibility of abusing the institution of the referendum in order to effect political blockades and to transfer responsibility to the Constitutional Court and to the bearers of the constitutional right to a referendum, i.e. the voters, with regard to matters which should lie in the competence and be the responsibility of the political institutions, i.e. the legislature, the Government, and also the opposition, would thus be eliminated.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE DR ETELKA KORPIČ – HORVAT

1. In the hitherto assessment of referendum issues under Article 21 of the Referendum and Popular Initiative Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 26/07 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the RPIA), the Constitutional Court carried out an assessment of the possibility of the occurrence of unconstitutional consequences by first assessing whether the act currently in force was inconsistent with the Constitution. If it determined that it was unconstitutional, it proceeded with an assessment of whether the adopted act that was to be the subject of decision-making in a referendum remedied the existing unconstitutionality in a constitutionally consistent manner.

2. In Decision No. U-II-1/12 and U-II-2/12, the Constitutional Court abandoned such an approach. What is especially problematic is that it abandoned an assessment of whether the act to be decided on in a referendum is consistent with the Constitution. The Constitutional Court did not assess at all whether the Slovene National Holding Company Act (EPA 516-VI – hereinafter referred to as the SNHCA) and the Measures of the Republic of Slovenia to Strengthen the Stability of Banks Act (EPA 637-VI – hereinafter referred to as the MSSBA) are consistent with the Constitution, but was satisfied with the finding that “there exists the possibility to remedy possible unconstitutionality in the [newly] adopted statutory regulation by applying the institute of a constitutional review to the Acts at issue” (Paragraph 58 of the reasoning). I believe that by allowing the implementation of an unconstitutional act, the Constitutional Court itself can contribute to an unconstitutional situation.
3. The issue to which the current Decision of the Constitutional Court refers is, in my opinion, comparable namely to case No. U-II-1/11 (Decision dated 10 March 2011, Official Gazette RS, No. 20/11), by which the Constitutional Court assessed the admissibility of a referendum regarding the Pension and Disability Insurance Act (EPA 1300-V – hereinafter referred to as the PDIA-2). At that time, the allegations of the National Assembly that unconstitutional consequences would occur due to the rejection of the PDIA-2 in a referendum did not convince the Constitutional Court. The Court namely adjudged that the National Assembly did not demonstrate (1) that the applicable statutory regulation, i.e. the Pension and Disability Insurance Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 109/06 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the PDIA-1) was evidently unconstitutional and (2) that what was at issue was an unconstitutionality that already existed during the decision-making of the Constitutional Court (hereinafter referred to as an actual unconstitutionality), and not an unconstitutionality that would occur in the more or less distant future (hereinafter referred to as a hypothetical unconstitutionality). Therefore, the Constitutional Court allowed the referendum on the PDIA-2.
4. The National Assembly substantiated the request for a review of the constitutionality of the referenda regarding the SNHCA and the MSSBA, mutatis mutandis, in the same way as the request for an assessment of the admissibility of a referendum regarding the PDIA-2. As in the case in which the Constitutional Court assessed the admissibility of the referendum regarding the PDIA-2, mutatis mutandis, the National Assembly also in this case alleges that the rejection of the adopted Acts in a referendum would worsen the public finance situation of the state, which already is unfavourable, due to which unconstitutional consequences would eventually occur, i.e. in the more or less distant future a situation inconsistent with the Constitution would occur.
5. In my opinion, as in the case where the Constitutional Court assessed the admissibility of the referendum regarding the PDIA-2, the National Assembly also in this case failed to demonstrate the existence of an actual unconstitutionality; it only possibly demonstrated a hypothetical unconstitutionality. Therefore, I believe that the decision in this case should be the same as that regarding the admissibility of the referendum on the PDIA-2.

6. In the case in which it assessed the admissibility of the referendum on the PDIA-2, the Constitutional Court explicitly requested that the National Assembly demonstrate the existence of the actual unconstitutionality. That was the ratio decidendi of the decision in that case, which in my opinion represents a relevant precedent for a decision on the current requests.
7. It is nonetheless true, as Judge Petrič realises in the eighth paragraph of his concurring opinion to Decision No. U-II-1/11, that “a precedent is neither eternal nor unchangeable” and that “even in the Anglo-Saxon legal system, in which a precedent is exalted more than anywhere else [...], it is established that an ultima ratio precedent is only worth as much as the reasons which substantiate it are solid and as much as the arguments for it are convincing.” The case law can change “if compelling reasons exist for such.” Then, in the tenth paragraph, Judge Petrič adds that “[...] the Constitutional Court’s case law must not blindly follow the hitherto decisions if new understanding and changed social circumstances demonstrate that also the correction of some prior position of the Constitutional Court is needed” (emphasis added by EKH). Such considerations of Judge Petrič did not refer to the precedent at issue, as his reflections on precedent are true in general.
8. The principle disturbing issue in this decision is not the disregard for the precedent, but that the majority decision in this regard lacks any substantiation whatsoever, even though it is mainly bound by the principle of equal treatment when applying the law and the principle of trust in law.<sup>1</sup> In German constitutional case law, a precedent is not a formal source of law and changes in the case law (even in stable case law) are admissible, as long as they remain in the framework of expected legal development, that is, if the decisions do not represent a surprise (Überraschungsentscheidung) to the participants in the procedure, and under condition that they are sufficiently substantiated by the courts.<sup>2</sup> In the case at issue, there was a substantial change in the constitutional assessment, which in my opinion was not sufficiently substantiated.

1 Jarras claims, for instance, that an unsubstantiated departure from the case law of the highest courts in a particular case would entail a violation of the prohibition of arbitrary treatment. See H. D. Jarras in: H. D. Jarras and B. Pieroth (Editor), Grundgesetz für die Bundesrepublik Deutschland – Kommentar, 11th edition, Verlag C. H. Beck, München 2011, p. 120, Para. 39. Dürig claims that Article 3 of the German Federal Constitution protects against surprising decisions and requires a certain steadiness of the case law. See G. Dürig in: T. Maunz and G. Dürig (Editors), Grundgesetz – Kommentar, book I, Verlag C. H. Beck, München 1973, Article 3, Para. I, p. 187, Para. 407.

Grzeszik in: T. Maunz and G. Dürig (Editors), op. cit., Article 20, section VII, pp. 40–41, Para. 106.

9. The majority decision does not state the urgent and compelling reasons for the fact that in this case the Constitutional Court did not insist that the National Assembly demonstrate that there exists an actual (and not a hypothetical) unconstitutionality. The Constitutional Court does not explain which new understanding and changed social circumstances dictated the modification of the position that it adopted in case No. U-II-1/11. Decision No. U-II-1/11 was adopted less than two years ago (on 10 March 2011). The social circumstances were already very unfavourable at that point (i.e. bad economic circumstances, a credit crunch, the significant indebtedness of the state, a critical situation with regard to public finances, low credit ratings), and yet the Constitutional Court rejected the request with the following statement: “At this time, it is not possible to substantiate the unconstitutionality of the PDIA-1 with the allegations and data by which the National Assembly and Government can, in fact, substantiate that changes in the pension system are necessary in the future due to macroeconomic, public-finance, and demographic reasons. Constitutionally, these reasons are not measurable, therefore the Constitutional Court cannot take them into consideration in its assessment and must also not assess if they are well-founded.”
10. If the Constitutional Court assessed that the social circumstances have deteriorated to such a degree in less than two years that for such reason it had to urgently and inevitably (due to a compelling reason) abandon the position that it can only assess whether there exists an actual unconstitutionality, it has thus passed over into the domain of determining a hypothetical unconstitutionality. In other words, it has passed from the domain of assessing the constitutional consistency of the adopted acts to the domain of assessing the suitability of the adopted acts (even though it proceeds from the majority decision that the Court does not address the suitability of such [Paragraph 56 of the reasoning]). This, in my opinion, is not within the competence of the Constitutional Court.
11. The National Assembly alleges that the implementation of the SNHCA and the MSSBA will produce effects that will improve the economic and public finance situation, which will significantly reduce the risk that in the state a situation inconsistent with Articles 1, 2, 3, 8, 34, 50, 51, 86, 87, 89, 90, 91, and 153 of the Constitution will occur; a situation in which the implementation of entire chapters of the Constitution that determine the organisation of the state will be seriously jeopardised and where also ensuring the human rights and fundamental freedoms guaranteed by the Constitution will be jeopardised. In brief, the National Assembly alleges that the SNHCA and the MSSBA are suitable Acts for preventing or at least reducing the risk that a general unconstitutional situation will occur.
12. If I disregard the fact that assessing the suitability of an adopted act does not fall within the competence of the Constitutional Court, I believe that the Constitutional Court should perform such assessment by treating the allegation of the National Assembly as a hypothesis which has to be tested (confirmed or rejected, empirical, epistemological discretion) in an appropriate way. However, it failed to do so. It stems from the Decision that “the Constitutional Court lacks sensible reasons that would cast doubt over the assessment of the National Assembly” and that the SNHCA and the MSSBA “are urgently needed to ensure the sustainability of the functioning of the state with regard to the public finances in the current circumstances of economic crisis” (Paragraph 54 of the reasoning). However, the Constitutional Court did not refute doubts regarding the assessment of the National Assembly on the basis of an appropriate test of its allegations. It simply accepted the assessment offered by the National Assembly and regarded it as its own. The allegations of the National Assembly regarding the SNHCA, for instance, do not quantify the future profit of the national holding company, which could be the only direct source of income of the budget of the Republic of Slovenia. Therefore I have – in contrast to the majority of the judges of the Constitutional Court – certainly sensible reasons to have doubts regarding the assessment of the National Assembly that the SNHCA is a suitable measure for preventing or at least reducing the risk of the occurrence of a general unconstitutional situation in the conditions of the existing economic crisis. We could say that the National Assembly alleges, as the only proof of the existence of a link between the implementation of the SNHCA and the future situation of the state from the viewpoint of public finances, the by now already popular thesis that even the suspension of the implementation of the SNHCA due to a referendum – let alone its possible rejection in a referendum – would lead the credit agencies to lower the already low credit ratings of the state and of the banks. I hope that such does not entail that henceforth the Constitutional Court will in every similar case suspend the constitutional right to a referendum as soon as the National Assembly or the Government mentions such credit agencies.

13. When I state that I have, in contrast to the other judges of the Constitutional Court, sensible reasons for doubting that the SNHCA and the MSSBA are suitable measures for reducing the risk that a general unconstitutional situation will occur in the conditions of the existing economic crisis, I do not say that it is not urgent to replace, without undue delay, the current legal regulation with another; I only state that neither the National Assembly nor the majority decision of the Constitutional Court convinced me that it is reasonable to expect that the SNHCA and the MSSBA represent a suitable legal regulation for reducing the risk that sooner or later a general unconstitutional situation will occur. Perhaps it is really not “wise” to decide on the SNHCA and the MSSBA in a referendum. But “the Constitutional Court does not decide whether it is “wise” to make a decision on certain issues in a referendum, but whether such decision-making is consistent with the Constitution.”<sup>3</sup> While voting on the Decision in the cases U-II-1/12 and U-II-2/12, I could not rid myself of the feeling that this time the majority composition of the Constitutional Court was above all deciding whether it is “wise” to allow a referendum on the SNHCA and the MSSBA. Therefore I could not regard as proved that there exists a collision between the constitutional right to a referendum on the SNHCA and the MSSBA, and the constitutional values that in a more or less distant future would be substantially limited or endangered by the unfavourable economic and public finance circumstances.

Decision No. U-I-73/94, dated 25 May 1995

DECISION

At a session held on 25 May 1995, in proceedings to review constitutionality and legality initiated upon the petition of Patentna pisarna, d. o. o., Ljubljana, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

The first and fifth paragraphs of Article 17 of the Rules on the Procedure for the Registration of Industrial Designs (Official Gazette RS, No. 49/93) are annulled in their entirety, and in the second paragraph of the same Article the words “includes” (the second word in the sentence), “elements under the second paragraph of Article 3 of these Rules”, and “however” are annulled.

Reasoning

A

1. With its petition of 11 April 1994, the petitioner initiated proceedings to review the constitutionality and legality of the first paragraph of Article 17 of the Rules on the Procedure for the Registration of Industrial Designs (hereinafter referred to as the Rules). With its application of 26 April 1994, the petitioner also initiated proceedings to review the constitutionality and the legality of the fifth paragraph of Article 17 of the Rules.
2. The petitioner challenges the first paragraph of Article 17 of the Rules, which determines that an application that does not include all the elements determined by the Rules is not accepted and considered as an application for the registration of a design, and that the Office of the Republic of Slovenia for the Protection of Industrial Property (hereinafter referred to as the Office) indicates on the application that it was not accepted as an application and returns it to the applicant. The petitioner believes that the challenged provision is inconsistent with Articles 2, 8, and 153 of the Constitution, Article 55 of the Industrial Property Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 13/92, and 27/93; hereinafter referred to as the IndPA), and Articles 66 and 68 of the General Administrative Procedure Act (Official Gazette SFRY, No. 47/86; hereinafter referred to as the GAPA). In the petitioner’s opinion, the cited statutory provisions do not authorise the authorities of the state administration to proceed in the above-described manner. Article 55 of the IndPA and Articles 66 and 68 of the GAPA determine that if an application is incomplete, the Office requests that the applicant remedy the established deficiencies within a specified time limit. The petitioner namely believes that the IndPA does not regulate the legal institution “the return of an application”, and therefore the challenged implementing regulation allegedly manifestly and illegally interferes with statutory subject matter and regulates such in a manner for which it has no statutory basis.

3. The petitioner also challenges the fifth paragraph of Article 17 of the Rules, which determines that the Office rejects an application by an order if the applicant fails to remedy its established deficiencies within the specified time limit. In the petitioner’s opinion, the challenged provision is inconsistent with Article 56 of the IndPA, which regulates the conditions for the rejection of an application in a somewhat different manner. In accordance with that Article, an application is rejected by an order if the applicant fails to remedy all the deficiencies that he or she was required to remedy in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 55 of the IndPA and as a result the application cannot be considered. In the petitioner’s opinion, the text of the fifth paragraph [of Article 17] of the Rules is in direct contradiction to the text of Article 56 of the IndPA, as the challenged Article of the Rules penalises any deficiency by rejecting the application, while in accordance with the IndPA, an application may only be rejected if it contains such deficiencies that the application cannot be considered. As the challenged implementing regulation regulated the relevant statutory subject matter in a completely different manner than such is regulated by the IndPA and as there existed no statutory basis for such, the statutory mandate was allegedly exceeded, which is contrary to the second paragraph of Article 120 of the Constitution.
4. The petitioner demonstrated its legal interest to file the petition by the fact that in accordance with the third paragraph of Article 5 of the IndPA it is authorised to represent foreign natural and legal persons in matters related to industrial property before the Office as well as before other state administrative authorities and courts, and that this legal interest is affected by the allegedly illegal provisions of the challenged Rules.
5. In its reply to the petition, the Ministry of Science and Technology, which issued the challenged Rules, contests the petitioner’s claims. The Ministry states that the procedure for granting or registering industrial property rights is a special kind of administrative procedure that applies some solutions that differ from those contained in the GAPA. In the Ministry’s opinion, the filing of an application within the framework of the procedure for granting or registering industrial property rights has a different meaning than an application filed with a view to exercising other rights through an administrative procedure, as upon the formally correct filing of an application [for granting or registering industrial property rights] the applicant is granted a priority right over subsequent applicants. If an applicant wants to obtain such a right, his or her application must satisfy certain conditions that enable its consideration. If the application does not satisfy the determined minimum conditions, it is not accepted and considered as an application, but is returned to the applicant. According to the Ministry, the challenged provision of the first paragraph of Article 17 of the Rules determines in further detail the content of an application in accordance with the IndPA and is therefore not inconsistent with this Act.

6. In its reply to the petition, the Ministry states that there is no difference as regards the content of the challenged provision of the fifth paragraph of Article 17 of the Rules and of the provision of Article 56 of the IndPA. Both regulations namely determine that an application is rejected if it is established that due to the applicant's failure to remedy the established deficiencies it does not satisfy the formal requirements for consideration.

B

7. The Constitutional Court accepted the petition to review the constitutionality and legality of the challenged provisions of the Rules and, as the conditions determined by the fourth paragraph of Article 26 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94) were fulfilled, it immediately proceeded to decide the case on the merits.
8. Questions regarding the content of an application for the registration of a design and its processing are primarily regulated by the provisions of Articles 53, 54, and 55 of the IndPA. Article 53 determines the content of the application and Article 54 the conditions that have to be fulfilled for an application to be deemed complete. In accordance with Article 55 of the IndPA, the Office has to examine whether the application is complete no later than within three months following the receipt of the application. If the Office finds that the application has deficiencies, it requires the applicant to remedy them within a specified period of time by means of a written statement outlining the deficiencies. Upon the applicant's request, this time limit may also be extended. The Article also provides that the date when the application was first filed is to be deemed the filing date of all applications whose deficiencies have been remedied within the specified time limit.
9. It follows from the cited statutory provisions that a procedure for the registration of a design has to be initiated upon the filing of every application, regardless of whether the application is complete or not. In every instance of an incomplete application, the Office has to require the applicant to remedy the deficiencies. The Act namely does not differentiate between two kinds of incomplete applications, i.e. the ones that are not accepted and considered as applications at all (in instances of significant deficiencies) and the ones that have to be completed due to having minor deficiencies.
10. The challenged provisions of the Rules, however, regulate the question of the processing of an incomplete application in a different manner than the Act.
The Rules differentiate between two kinds of incomplete applications. The first category comprises applications that do not contain certain essential elements and are thus not accepted and considered as applications by the competent authority but are returned to the applicant. The second category comprises applications that, while containing the essential elements, nevertheless have minor deficiencies that must be remedied in the subsequent stages of the procedure. The Ministry alleges that such differentiation of applications is required due to the specific nature of the design registration procedure and, in this context, in particular the consequences of filing the application for the applicant and potential subsequent applicants.

11. The procedure for the protection of industrial property rights undoubtedly has some specific characteristics that require regulation different than that applied in other instances of enforcing rights through administrative procedures. However, this raises the question of which [legal] act should be used to regulate these specificities.
12. Procedural questions that affect the rights and legal interests of the parties must be regulated by law. The specificities highlighted by the Ministry could certainly be regulated by the IndPA. However, the IndPA currently in force does not regulate such specificities; they are instead regulated directly by the Rules. The Rules define the legal concept “the return of an application”, which is not applied by the IndPA. On the contrary, the IndPA expressly requires that if an application is incomplete, the applicant shall be requested to remedy its deficiencies.
13. The disputed first paragraph of Article 17 of the Rules thus regulates questions regarding the processing of an application in a different manner than the IndPA, which entails that the Rules, in fact, modify statutory provisions.
14. In accordance with the fifth paragraph of Article 17 of the Rules, the Office rejects an application by an order if the applicant, following a request to remedy all the established deficiencies, fails to do so. In accordance with Article 56 of the IndPA, on the other hand, an application may only be rejected by an order if the applicant fails to remedy all the deficiencies and as a consequence the application cannot be considered. The IndPA thus determines the rejection of an application only in the event of a failure to remedy such deficiencies that render further consideration of the application impossible. It follows from the above that the Office may not reject an application even though not all of its deficiencies have been remedied if the remaining deficiencies do not render the continuation of the procedure impossible. Not every deficiency that has not been remedied can thus result in the rejection of an application.
15. The challenged provision of the fifth paragraph of Article 17 of the Rules, however, departs from the mentioned statutory qualification of deficiencies and prescribes the rejection of an application if the applicant fails to remedy all of the established deficiencies (and thus not only those that render the continuation of the procedure impossible). The Rules thus regulate the conditions for the rejection of an application in a different manner than the IndPA and therefore place applicants in a less favourable position than the IndPA.
16. The challenged provisions of the first and fifth paragraphs of Article 17 of the Rules are thus inconsistent with Articles 55 and 56 of the IndPA as well as with the third paragraph of Article 153 of the Constitution, which requires that all regulations be in conformity with the Constitution and laws.
The cited provisions [of the Rules] are further inconsistent with the provisions of the second paragraph of Article 120 of the Constitution, according to which administrative authorities perform their work independently within the framework and on the basis of the Constitution and laws.

17. Respect for the principle of legality is essential for the relationship between the legislative and executive branches of power in parliamentary democracies. The principle of legality also determines the relationship between the Parliament and the Government as the highest administrative authority. Legal theory defines the principle of legality by defining the relationship between the legislative and executive branches of power by means of the obligation of the executive branch to comply with laws from a substantive point of view. Laws have to constitute the substantive basis for implementing regulations and individual acts issued by the executive branch of power, i.e. the Government and administrative authorities (whereby express statutory authorisation is not required), and such activity also has to remain in its entirety within the statutory framework as regards its content.
18. The second paragraph of Article 120 of the Constitution determines that administrative authorities perform their work independently within the framework and on the basis of the Constitution and laws. The principle that administrative authorities perform their work within the constitutional and statutory framework, and in particular in accordance with the constitutional and statutory basis (the principle of legality), is one of the fundamental constitutional principles. The principle of legality in relation to the work of the state administration is namely linked with other constitutional principles and relies thereon.

The principle of democracy (Article 1 of the Constitution) contains inter alia the requirement that the most important decisions, in particular those relating to citizens, are adopted by directly elected members of the Parliament. As a result, the executive branch of power (i.e. the Government and administrative authorities) can only operate legally when working on the substantive basis of and within the framework of laws, and not on the basis of its own regulations or even on the basis of its own function within the system of the separation of powers. In this respect, the priority of laws as the priority of the legislature also plays an important role in delimiting the competences of the legislative and executive branches of power in accordance with the principle of the separation of powers (Article 3 of the Constitution). The principle of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution) requires that legal relations between the State and its citizens be regulated by laws. These do not only determine the framework and basis of the work of the executive power in accordance with administrative law, but its work also becomes known, transparent, and foreseeable for the citizens, thus increasing their legal certainty. The principle of the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms (the first paragraph of Article 5 of the Constitution) requires that, in accordance with the principles of democracy and a state governed by the rule of law, these may only be limited by the legislature in the instances and to the extent allowed by the Constitution, and not by the executive power. At the same time, this principle is also important for the effective protection of the rights and legal interests of individuals, including the effective control of the constitutionality and legality of individual administrative acts.

19. In accordance with the Constitution (Article 120), administrative authorities are bound by the framework determined by the Constitution and laws when performing their work, including the issuance of regulations, and may not issue regulations that do not have a substantive basis in law; however, an express statutory authorisation is not required. The so-called implementing clause (i.e. a statutory provision requiring that certain types of implementing regulations be issued within a specified period of time) only entails that the legislature did not leave the issuance of implementing regulations (entirely) to the discretion of the executive power, but by statute required it to regulate certain questions and specified a time limit for such. The principle of the separation of powers also excludes the possibility that administrative authorities could modify or independently regulate statutory subject matter. Legal theory also maintains that general acts that are inferior to laws may not include provisions that have no basis in a law and that, in particular, they may not independently determine rights and obligations.

As a result, the challenged provisions of the first and fifth paragraphs of Article 17 of the Rules had to be annulled. The Constitutional Court has already adopted similar decisions in several cases, for example Cases No. U-I-1/92, No. U-I-72/92, and No. U-I-82/92 (OdlUS 48/I, 56/II, and 101/II), and it found no reason to change its position in the case at issue.

20. As the challenged provision of the first paragraph of Article 17 of the Rules also refers to the second paragraph of the same Article, the Constitutional Court also annulled the part of the provision of the second paragraph of Article 17 that allows the procedure for remedying deficiencies to be carried out only in the case of minor deficiencies (i.e. if the application does not include all of the elements required by the IndPA and the Rules, but it does include the essential elements that are preconditions for its acceptance and the initiation of the procedure). Following the annulment of the mentioned part, the second paragraph of Article 17 of the Rules reads as follows: "If the application does not contain all of the elements required by statute or by these Rules, the Office shall inform the applicant of the established deficiencies and request that the applicant complete the application. The Office shall specify the time period for completing the application, which may not exceed two months following the day the request has been served."
21. The Constitutional Court annulled the challenged provisions of the Rules because it determined that the negative consequences that resulted from their illegality have to be eliminated. Due to the retroactive effect of the annulment, the petitioner will be able to enforce its interests as if the challenged provisions had never been in effect.

22. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of Article 45 of the Constitutional Court Act, composed of: Dr Tone Jerovšek, President, and Judges Mag. Matevž Krivic, Mag. Janez Snoj, Dr Janez Šinkovec, Dr Lovro Šturm, Franc Testen, Dr Lojze Ude, and Dr Boštjan M. Zupančič. The Decision was adopted unanimously.

Decision No. Up-624/11, dated 3 July 2014

DECISION

At a session held on 3 July 2014 in proceedings to decide upon the constitutional complaint of Primož Skerbiš, Slovenske Konjice, represented by Saša Jenčič, attorney in Maribor, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

The constitutional complaint against Supreme Court Judgment No. VIII Ips 2/2011, dated 21 February 2011, is dismissed.

Reasoning

A

1. On 24 June 2004, the complainant's employer warned the complainant, in written form and on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 83 of the Employment Relationship Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 42/02 and 103/07 – hereinafter referred to as the ERA/02), of violations of the obligations stemming from the employment relationship. By this warning, the complainant was also warned, in conformity with the law, that his employment contract would be terminated if the violations were repeated. Due to further violations of the employment obligations, the employment contract of the complainant was terminated on 19 December 2005 for breach of obligations.
2. The court of first instance dismissed the complainant's claim that the termination of the employment contract with notice for breach of obligations was illegal. It established that the employer acted in conformity with the first paragraph of Article 83 of the ERA/02 when it warned the complainant in writing to fulfil his employment obligations and of the possibility of the termination of the employment contract in the event of a new violation. The Higher Labour and Social Court dismissed the complainant's appeal and the Supreme Court dismissed his revision by Judgment No. VIII Ips 360/2007, dated 6 April 2009. By Decision No. Up-803/09, dated 9 December 2010 (Official Gazette RS, No. 2/11), the Constitutional Court abrogated this Judgment and remanded the case to the Supreme Court for new adjudication. In this Decision, the Constitutional Court established that at the time of the decision-making of the Supreme Court, Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-45/07, Up-249/06, dated 17 May 2007 (Official Gazette RS, No. 46/07, and OdlUS XVI, 28), had already taken effect. It assessed that the complainant's right to effective judicial protection (the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution) had been violated because the Supreme Court based its judgment on the first paragraph of Article 83 of the ERA/02, which the Constitutional Court had already established was inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution by Decision No. U-I-45/07, Up-249/06 – which had been published in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia already before the revision was filed and should have been known to the Supreme Court when deciding.

3. By Decision No. U-I-45/07, Up-249/06, the Constitutional Court established that the first paragraph of Article 83 of the ERA/02 did not determine how much time after a written warning an employer could, on the basis of such warning and in the event of a new violation, terminate the employment contract of an employee. At the same time, the ERA/02 did not envisage special judicial protection against a written warning; it was only possible to claim that such written warning was unfounded in the procedure for the review of the legality of the termination of the employment contract. In such manner, the judicial protection was somewhat distant in time from when the warning was issued, therefore its effectiveness could be questionable. However, the Constitutional Court stressed that the mere fact of the passage of time does not by itself mean that such judicial protection is always ineffective. It may only be ineffective if such passage of time was so long that proving that the written warning was unfounded would be made substantially difficult. With the intention to prevent violations of the right to effective judicial protection in the procedures for terminating an employment contract with notice on grounds of a breach of obligations until the ERA/02 is harmonised with the Constitution, the Constitutional Court also determined the manner of the implementation of its declaratory decision. It determined that an employer can only terminate an employee's employment contract for breach of obligations on the basis of a written warning issued within a period of one year at most before a new violation by the employee occurs.
4. In the case at issue, the Supreme Court decided for the second time, by the challenged Judgment, on the complainant's revision and once again dismissed it. In its Judgment it explained that it did not observe Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-45/07, Up-249/06 in such a manner so as to abrogate or modify the final judgment just because the termination of the employment contract with notice was not communicated within the time limit of one year after the initial written warning was issued. It is of the opinion that due to its action after the [expiration of the] one-year time limit one cannot reproach the employer for acting unlawfully, because in 2005 the employer was not able to expect that in 2007 the unconstitutionality of the statutory regulation would be established. In its judgment, the Supreme Court assessed that a decision of the Constitutional Court that would have retroactive effects is not recognised by either the Constitution or the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 64/07 – official consolidated text and 109/12 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA). In conformity with the first paragraph of Article 161 of the Constitution and on the basis of Article 43 of the CCA, an abrogation of a law only has ex nunc effect, i.e. from the day following the publication of the decision of the Constitutional Court in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia or from the expiration of the time limit imposed by the Constitutional Court. In accordance with the position of the Supreme Court, all that applies regarding a Constitutional Court decision on abrogation allegedly also applies regarding a declaratory decision of the Constitutional Court. Therefore, Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-45/07, Up-249/06, which established the unconstitutionality of the first paragraph of Article 83 of the ERA/02, allegedly cannot affect the legality of the termination of an employment contract that was communicated two years before this Decision was adopted. The Supreme Court is of the opinion that it would be contrary to the principle of legal certainty (Article 2 of the Constitution) if decisions on the establishment of an unconstitutionality applied without time limitations, i.e. also for all the past relations that were based on the statutory provision that was later established to be inconsistent with the Constitution. In [such] labour disputes, courts assess whether the employer's conduct was in conformity with the law that was in force when it adopted the decision to terminate the employment contract; subsequent legislative amendments, as well as how a decision of the Constitutional Court determines its manner of implementation, cannot have an influence on the decision-making in a labour dispute. In the opinion of the Supreme Court, in accordance with literal and teleological interpretations, also the manner of implementation determined by Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-45/07, Up-249/06 can only refer to future relations, i.e. it can only apply to those employers who are yet to terminate the employment contracts of their employees. The application of the mentioned manner of implementation in the judicial proceedings at issue would allegedly entail conduct contrary to the prohibition of the retroactive validity of legal acts determined by the first paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution and the principle of finality determined by Article 158 of the Constitution.

5. Regardless of the above, the Supreme Court adds that it observed Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-45/07, Up-249/06 in such manner that it based its decision on the reasons from that Decision and in conformity therewith assessed whether it was substantially difficult for the complainant to challenge the written warning in the judicial proceedings. It assessed that the complainant's right determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution had been not violated, because the passing of time had no influence on his right to effective judicial protection, and in addition it established that in the judicial proceedings the complainant did not even allege that the written warning was unfounded.
6. In his constitutional complaint, the complainant claims a violation of the right to judicial protection (the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution) and the right to the equal protection of rights (Article 22 of the Constitution) as the procedural expression of the general principle of equality before the law (the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution). His right to judicial protection was allegedly violated due to the length of the period (18 months) that passed between the [issuance of the] written warning issued due to the violation of employment obligations and the termination of the employment contract due to new violations. Allegedly, due to the fact that too much time had passed since the events, he was not able to effectively challenge before the courts the well-foundedness of the written warning. He also warns that at the time when he received the written warning there existed no statutory possibility to challenge it and also the case law did not allow it. Allegedly, his right to the equal protection of rights was violated, because the Supreme Court failed to observe Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-45/07, Up-249/06, by which the Constitutional Court established the inconsistency of Article 83 of the ETA/02 with the right to effective judicial protection. The complainant is of the opinion that the manner of implementation determined by this Decision of the Constitutional Court should also apply to him, because his case allegedly concerns an equal state of the facts and statutory basis. He also refers to the Act Amending the Employment Relationships Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 103/07 – ERA-A), by which also the legislature determined the period that still ensures effective judicial protection to be one year.

7. By Order of a panel of the Constitutional Court No. Up-624/11, dated 25 April 2012, the Constitutional Court accepted the constitutional complaint for consideration. It informed the Supreme Court thereof.
8. The constitutional complaint was sent to the opposing party in the labour dispute, which proposes that the Constitutional Court dismiss the constitutional complaint, because the alleged violation of Article 23 of the Constitution is not demonstrated. It alleges that the complainant used judicial protection to admit before the courts the violations alleged in the written warning, whereas he could have challenged the validity of the written warning as regards the passage of time since its issuance by means of at least three proceedings, which he did not initiate. In the opinion of the opposing party, the complainant's allegation of a violation of the right to effective judicial protection after seven years of judicial proceedings entails an abuse of rights. By finding for the [complainant's] constitutional complaint, also the principle of legality would be violated, in the opinion of the opposing party, because the opposing party acted in conformity with the legislation in force at the time. The subsequent amending of legislation should not retroactively affect its past conduct. The complainant did not reply to the allegations of the opposing party.

B – I

9. In the case at issue, the complainant substantiates the allegation regarding the violation of Article 22 and the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution by alleging that the Supreme Court did not act in conformity with Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-45/07, Up-249/06, by which the inconsistency of Article 83 of the ERA/02 with the right to effective judicial protection was established. In light of that, two important constitutional questions arise in the case at issue that the Constitutional Court must provide answers to: (1) what would the constitutionally consistent conduct of regular courts be when they are faced with a so-called declaratory decision of the Constitutional Court and (2) what, in concrete judicial proceedings, are the legal effects of the manner of implementation that the Constitutional Court can determine in its decisions on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA.

10. The Constitution contains no provisions on declaratory decisions of the Constitutional Court.<sup>1</sup> They were only introduced by the CCA, whose Article 48 determines that if an unconstitutional or unlawful regulation does not regulate a certain issue which it should regulate or it regulates such in a manner which does not enable annulment or abrogation, the Constitutional Court shall adopt a declaratory decision on such.<sup>2</sup> There are no special provisions in the CCA on the legal effects of declaratory decisions; however, the Constitutional Court has adopted several decisions on that matter. In Decision No. Up-758/06, dated 6 December 2007 (Official Gazette RS, No. 119/07, and OdlUS XVI, 118), the Constitutional Court stressed that a declaratory decision that refers to statutory provisions cannot have more strict (more severe) legal consequences than those of a decision on abrogation determined by Article 44 of the CCA.<sup>3</sup> In the same Decision, the Constitutional Court also repeated the position from the previous constitutional case law that the determination of the unconstitutionality of a statutory provision does not entail that in (administrative and judicial) procedures such a provision may no longer be applied.<sup>4</sup> The establishment of unconstitutionality entails that such a provision must be applied in such a manner that its application will not be contrary to the reasons that led the Constitutional Court to

1 The first paragraph of Article 161 of the Constitution determines that the Constitutional Court abrogates an unconstitutional law in whole or in part. Such abrogation takes effect immediately or within a period of time determined by the Constitutional Court, with regard to which this period of time may not exceed one year. The Constitutional Court can abrogate or annul ab initio implementing regulations. The third paragraph of Article 161 of the Constitution determines that the legal consequences of Constitutional Court decisions shall be regulated by law. The Constitution does not contain other provisions on the types of decisions of the Constitutional Court and the legal effects thereof.

2 Article 47 of the CCA envisages a special declaratory decision. Such declaratory decision is adopted if a regulation ceased to be in force before or during the proceedings, and the consequences of its unconstitutionality or unlawfulness were not remedied. With respect to statutory provisions, such declaratory decision has the effect of abrogation, whereas with respect to implementing regulations, the Constitutional Court decides whether its decision has the effect of abrogation or annulment.

3 The legal consequences of the abrogation of a law are regulated by the CCA. Article 43 of this Act envisages that such abrogation takes effect the day following the publication of the decision on the abrogation, or upon the expiry of a period of time determined by the Constitutional Court (i.e. abrogation with suspended effect), whereas Article 44 determines that the abrogation of a law or a part thereof by the Constitutional Court applies to relations that had been established before the day such abrogation took effect, if by that day such relations had not been finally decided. The Constitutional Court can abrogate or annul an implementing regulation. The legal consequences of the abrogation of an implementing regulation are, mutatis mutandis, the same as with respect to laws (the third paragraph of Article 45 of the CCA). The legal consequences of the annulment of an implementing regulation are determined by Article 46 of the CCA.

4 The Constitutional Court stated this already in Paragraphs 9, 10, and 11 of the reasoning of Order No. U-I-168/97, dated 3 July 1997 (OdlUS VI, 103), and in Paragraph 24 of the reasoning of Decision No. U-I-92/96, dated 21 March 2002 (Official Gazette RS, No. 32/02, and OdlUS XI, 45).

establish its inconsistency with the Constitution. When reviewing the constitutionality of regulations, the operative provisions and the reasoning of the decision form a whole, therefore not only are the operative provisions binding, but also the reasons and positions contained in the reasoning. With respect to declaratory decisions, this also applies in the event the operative provisions of the decision do not explicitly refer to the reasons contained in the reasoning.<sup>5</sup> Therefore, a declaratory decision entails the duty of the courts to interpret the law in a constitutionally consistent manner, which is what on the constitutional level follows already from Article 125 of the Constitution, in accordance with which judges are not only bound by law when judging, but also and foremost by the Constitution. From the above it follows that with regard to statutory provisions, declaratory decisions – as is the case regarding decisions on abrogation – do not have retroactive (ex tunc) effects such as the annulment of an implementing regulation, but only have ex nunc effects. Ratione temporis, the effects of a declaratory decision are the same as the effects of an abrogation. This also means that Article 44 of the CCA, which explicitly determines only the legal effects of the abrogation of a law, is mutatis mutandis also applicable regarding declaratory decisions.<sup>6</sup> In such context, the hitherto positions of the Constitutional Court that otherwise were adopted with regard to the effects of decisions on abrogation must also be mutatis mutandis observed with regard to declaratory decisions.<sup>7</sup>

11. On the basis of the above, it is possible to establish that from Article 125 of the Constitution and mutatis mutandis application of Article 44 of the CCA it follows that a declaratory decision of the Constitutional Court applies to all relations that had been established before the day such declaratory decision took effect if by that day such relations had not been finally decided. Therefore, in all proceedings that have not hitherto been finally decided, the courts must observe the declaratory decision of the Constitutional Court, namely in such a manner that they apply the unconstitutional statutory provision in such a manner that its application is not contrary to the reasons that led the Constitutional Court to establish its unconstitutionality.
12. Due to the institute of constitutional complaints,<sup>8</sup> in conformity with which it is possible, in conformity with the Constitution and the CCA, to affect final decisions,<sup>9</sup>

5 See also Paragraph 6 of the reasoning of Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-2597/07, dated 4 October 2007 (Official Gazette RS, No. 94/07, and OdlUS XVI, 108).

6 Cf. Order of the Constitutional Court No. Up-2436/08, U-I-42/08, dated 26 March 2009, Paragraph 10 of the reasoning.

7 Also interpretation by analogy confirms such an approach, because from Article 47 of the CCA it clearly follows that declaratory decisions adopted with regard to laws that ceased to be in force have the effect of an abrogation.

8 On the basis of the sixth indent of the first paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has jurisdiction to decide on constitutional complaints stemming from the violation of human rights and fundamental freedoms by individual acts.

9 Article 158 of the Constitution determines that legal relations regulated by the final decision of a state authority may be annulled ab initio, abrogated, or amended only in such cases and by such procedures as are provided by law.

an established position of the Constitutional Court with regard to the legal effects of decisions to abrogate adopted in proceedings for the review of the constitutionality and legality of regulations is that the abrogation of a statutory provision must also be observed in constitutional complaint proceedings<sup>10</sup> and consequently – due to the fact that in order to file a constitutional complaint also the formal and substantive exhaustion of all (including extraordinary) legal remedies is required<sup>11</sup> – also in extraordinary legal remedy proceedings.<sup>12</sup> Extraordinary legal remedies filed in conformity with the conditions determined by procedural laws and a constitutional complaint filed in conformity with the conditions determined by the CCA ensure that the effects of abrogation also extend to final cases.

13. What applies to decisions to abrogate also applies to declaratory decisions of the Constitutional Court. In constitutional complaint proceedings, the Constitutional Court can penalise failure to observe its declaratory decisions – especially if the unconstitutionality was established due to an inadmissible interference with human rights and fundamental freedoms. Due to the fact that in a state governed by the rule of law it is necessary to ensure the effectiveness of legal remedies, including the constitutional complaint, it is clear that declaratory decisions apply to constitutional complaint proceedings, and consequently they also must be observed appropriately in legal remedy proceedings before regular courts. Therefore, what is at issue with regard to observing the decisions of the Constitutional Court is not the issue of whether certain conduct was legal at the time when it was performed (i.e. whether it was in conformity with the law in force at that time), but the question of whether such conduct was in conformity with the Constitution. In conformity with Article 125 of the Constitution, the assessment of this question also falls within the jurisdiction of the regular courts. In assessing legality, courts must also observe the Constitution, i.e. they must interpret laws in conformity with the Constitution and always keep questioning themselves whether the legislation in conformity with which they adjudicate is consistent with the Constitution.<sup>13</sup> Consequently, what is at issue with 10 See, e.g., Decisions No. Up-252/96, dated 30 September 1999 (Official Gazette RS, No. 86/99, and OdlUS VIII, 293), Paragraph 6 of the reasoning, and No. Up-295/97, dated 13 October 1999 (OdlUS VIII, 294), Paragraph 6 of the reasoning. See also, e.g., Decisions No. Up-425/03, dated 20 October 2005 (Official Gazette RS, No. 96/05, and OdlUS XIV, 101), No. Up-699/05, dated 5 July 2007 (Official Gazette RS, No. 65/07, and OdlUS XVI, 102), No. Up-791/10, dated 8 December 2011 (Official Gazette RS, No. 4/12), and No. Up-1136/11, dated 15 March 2012 (Official Gazette RS, No. 26/12).

11 The third paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution determines that unless otherwise provided by law, the Constitutional Court decides on a constitutional complaint only if legal remedies have been exhausted. On such basis, the first paragraph of Article 51 of the CCA determined that a constitutional complaint may be lodged only after all legal remedies have been exhausted. The second paragraph of Article 51 of the CCA determines an exception that allows for the lodging of a constitutional complaint before all extraordinary remedies have been exhausted.

12 See, e.g., Order No. U-I-249/00, dated 19 September 2002 (OdlUS XI, 181), Paragraph 2 of the reasoning, and Decision No. U-I-201/99, dated 30 January 2003 (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/03, and OdlUS XII, 3), Paragraph 10 of the reasoning.

13 Article 156 of the Constitution determines that if a court deciding some matter deems a law which it should regard to the effects of the decisions of the Constitutional Court (those to abrogate and declaratory decisions) is also the question of the effectiveness of legal remedies (regular and extraordinary legal remedies, as well as constitutional complaints) regarding constitutional issues. In fact, in the case at issue, the position of the Supreme Court that a declaratory decision adopted two years before the employment contract was terminated has no effect on the legality of such conduct is indeed correct; however, what is key in this context is that it can have an effect on the constitutionality of such conduct. Due to the fact that the termination of the employment contract was based on a law that the Constitutional Court subsequently established was unconstitutional because it inadmissibly interfered with the right to judicial protection, in addition to [the question of] legality, also the question of whether the termination of the employment contract was at that time in conformity with the Constitution arises. When assessing this question, the courts on all levels should also take into consideration the reasons from Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-45/07, Up-249/06, regardless of which phase the judicial proceedings were in when this Decision took effect. The position of the Supreme Court that this would be contrary to the principles of a state governed by the rule of law is thus unconstitutional.

14. In addition to adopting a decision by which it assesses the constitutionality of a law (or the constitutionality and legality of another regulation), the Constitutional Court may, on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA, determine the manner of the implementation of a decision.<sup>14</sup> In conformity with the established constitutional case law, it also may adopt, on this legal basis, a temporary legal regulation in conformity with which its addressees (individuals or state authorities) must act until the legislature regulates such question by law in an equal or some other constitutionally consistent manner.<sup>15</sup> The Constitutional Court has already adopted the position that the part of the operative provisions by which the manner of the implementation of its decision is determined has the [binding] power of a statutory norm.<sup>16</sup> Therefore, on the basis of the authorisation determined by the second paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA, the Constitutional Court can temporarily regulate a certain question by the same legal power as if it were regulated by the legislature.
15. The CCA does not determine what are, in concrete (judicial) proceedings, the legal effects of the manner of implementation by which a certain question is temporarily apply to be unconstitutional, it must stay the proceedings and initiate proceedings before the Constitutional Court. The proceedings in the court may be continued after the Constitutional Court has issued its decision.

- 14 The CCA does not determine the conditions that should be fulfilled in order for such authorisation to be exercised; this is left to the assessment of the Constitutional Court in each individual case (such is stated in Decision No. U-I-163/99, dated 23 September 1999, Official Gazette RS, No. 80/99, and OdlUS VIII, 209). The determination of the manner of implementation is most often connected with declaratory decisions of the Constitutional Court, although the Constitutional Court also exercises this authorisation in other types of decisions (see, for instance, Decision No. U-I-313/13, dated 21 March 2014, Official Gazette RS, No. 22/14).
- 15 Decision No. U-I-163/99, Paragraph 10 of the reasoning; Order No. U-II-3/03, dated 22 December 2003 (OdlUS XII, 101), Paragraph 24 of the reasoning.
- 16 Ibidem.

legally regulated. The manner of implementation undisputedly has an influence on the legal relations that only emerge after the decision of the Constitutional Court takes effect. However, whether and how the manner of implementation has an influence on ongoing legal proceedings (non-final or concluded with finality) depends on the factual and legal circumstances of the concrete proceedings. In accordance with the established position of the Constitutional Court, the regulation determined by the manner of implementation has the same legal power as law. Such entails that the interpretation and the implementation of such regulation are subject to established methods of legal interpretation that otherwise apply to the interpretation and implementation of laws, and also to certain fundamental constitutional principles that represent constitutional limitations with regard to the interpretation of laws (e.g. the prohibition of retroactive effects determined by Article 155 of the Constitution).

16. In accordance with the above, failure to observe a determined manner of implementation can primarily entail a violation of “statutory” law. However, ignoring the manner of implementation may also reach the level of a violation of the Constitution.<sup>17</sup> Refusal to apply the manner of implementation determined by a decision of the Constitutional Court must, above all, be substantiated, especially if the party to proceedings expressly refers thereto. The absence of reasons can entail that the court acted arbitrarily or that the ignoring of a decision of the Constitutional Court was manifestly erroneous, which in itself entails a violation of Article 22 of the Constitution. However, if the court does state reasons why it considers the manner of implementation of a decision of the Constitutional Court to not be relevant to the concrete case, those reasons must, on the one hand, follow from established rules and methods of legal interpretation or from constitutional limitations that otherwise are applicable regarding the interpretation and implementation of laws. On the other hand, it is clear that when interpreting and implementing a certain manner of implementation it is also necessary to meticulously take into consideration the reasons due to which the Constitutional Court adopted the decision that the law [at issue] is inconsistent with the Constitution, because the reason for a “legislative” intervention by the Constitutional Court is precisely the unconstitutionality of the statutory regulation. It is admissible to ignore the manner of implementation if such does not entail a violation of human rights and fundamental freedoms or if the court can adopt, by taking into consideration the constitutional reasons from the decision of the Constitutional Court, a decision consistent with the Constitution. Otherwise a decision adopted contrary to the manner of implementation may be challenged before the Constitutional Court by a constitutional complaint.

17 By Order No. Up-901/08, dated 24 February 2009 (Official Gazette RS, No. 20/09, and OdlUS XVIII, 188), the Constitutional Court explained that when deciding on constitutional complaints due to an alleged violation of the manner of implementation determined by the Constitutional Court it is necessary to distinguish between an “ordinary” violation of the manner of implementation of a decision of the Constitutional Court (which substantively equals a violation of law) and a violation that at the same time is also a violation of human rights and which may be successfully claimed in constitutional complaint proceedings.

B – II

17. In the case at issue, the complainant opposes the position of the Supreme Court that the period of 18 months that passed from [the issuance of] the written warning due to the violation of employment obligations until the termination of the employment contract due to new violations is not so lengthy as to render effective judicial protection impossible with regard to the assessment of whether the written warning was well founded. In the opinion of the complainant, such position violates his right to effective judicial protection determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution. The complainant refers to Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-45/07, Up-249/06.
18. The complainant's understanding of Decision No. U-I-45/07, Up-249/06, insofar as it refers to the one-year time limit that the Constitutional Court determined in the manner of implementation of its Decision, is not correct. From this Decision it does not follow that there exists a violation of the right to effective judicial protection already because more than one year passed from the issuance of the written warning to the termination of the employment contract. In every concrete case, "the effectiveness of judicial protection" is the constitutional standard for the assessment of a [possible] violation of the right to judicial protection determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution. The Constitutional Court determined the one-year time limit by its own discretion and as a temporary regulation until the legislature eliminates the unconstitutional situation consisting of the fact that the law did not determine any time limit. The purpose of the manner of execution determined in such manner was to prevent possible violations of the right to effective judicial protection in procedures for the termination of an employment contract with notice for breach of obligations. However, the Constitution does not provide for a precisely determined time limit in such cases, therefore this one-year time limit as such is not an integral part of the right to effective judicial protection. As the Constitutional Court emphasised in Decision No. U-I-45/07, Up-249/06, the fact that judicial protection is ensured after a long period of time does not in itself entail that such judicial protection is always ineffective. It would only be ineffective if such period of time was so long that proving that the written warning was unfounded would be rendered substantially difficult. From the above it follows that the mere fact that more than one year passed between the [issuance of the] written warning and the termination of the employment contract does not necessarily mean that there was also a violation of the right to effective judicial protection. Precisely the question of whether the judicial protection of the complainant with regard to the written warning was rendered substantially difficult and thus ineffective must be at the centre of the [relevant] court's assessment.
19. In the challenged Judgment, the Supreme Court assessed that a period of one and a half years, which was the period of time that passed from the issuance of the written warning to the termination of the employment contract, is not so long as to render impossible the effective judicial review of whether the written warning was well founded. The Supreme Court carried out such assessment by observing the constitutional reasons stated in Decision No. U-I-45/07, Up-249/06. With regard to the question of whether the complainant was ensured an actual and effective possibility of proving that the written warning was unfounded, the Supreme Court accepted the finding of the court of first instance that at the main hearing the complainant admitted violations of employment obligations (repeatedly coming late to work and disrespecting safety at work instructions). The Supreme Court assessed that the complainant did not even challenge whether the written warning was well founded and did not allege that due to the length of time that had passed he did not have the possibility to prove it was unfounded. Therefore, the Supreme Court decided – with regard to the reasons from Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-45/07, Up-249/06 – that in the case at issue the question of effective judicial protection does not even arise. The complainant does not concur with the allegation that he did not challenge whether the written warning was well founded, but he does not explain in what point the position of the Supreme Court is allegedly inconsistent with the right to judicial protection. The Constitutional Court has already explained a number of times that mere disagreement with a decision does not of itself suffice to conclude that a violation of a [particular] right has occurred.

20. With regard to the allegation that the Supreme Court did not observe the manner of implementation determined by point 3 of the operative provisions of Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-45/07, Up-249/06, the Constitutional Court assesses that it cannot be alleged that such conduct was arbitrary, which would entail a violation of Article 22 of the Constitution. The Supreme Court presented sound (constitutional) legal reasons for its decision. It assessed that the manner of implementation – such as determined by the Constitutional Court in Decision No. U-I-45/07, Up-249/06 – can only refer to future relations and that its application in the complainant's case would entail conduct contrary to the principle of legal certainty determined by Article 2 of the Constitution, the prohibition of the retroactive validity of legal acts determined by the first paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution, and the principle of finality determined by Article 158 of the Constitution. Furthermore, by such positions the Supreme Court did not violate the complainant's right to effective judicial protection. Precisely such a violation would have a decisive influence on [deciding] whether the Supreme Court observed the Constitution when deciding. As stated above, the Supreme Court assessed whether effective judicial protection was ensured and established – by taking into consideration the reasons stated in Decision No. U-I-45/07, Up-249/06 – that this right of the complainant was not violated.
21. With regard to the above, the Constitutional Court dismissed the constitutional complaint.

22. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 59 of the CCA, composed of: Mag. Miroslav Mozetič, President, and Judges Dr Mitja Deisinger, Dr Dunja Jadek Pensa, Dr Etelka Korpič – Horvat, Dr Ernest Petrič, Jasna Pogačar, Dr Jadranka Sovdat, and Jan Zobec. The decision was reached unanimously.

DECISION

At a session held on 26 November 2010, in proceedings for the review of constitutionality initiated upon the petition of the Ankaran Local Community, the Mirna Local Community, and others, represented by Mag. Miha Šipeč, attorney in Ljubljana, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. The Establishment of Municipalities and Municipal Boundaries Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 108/06 – official consolidated text) is inconsistent with the Constitution.
2. The National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia must remedy the inconsistency referred to in the preceding point of these operative provisions within a time limit of two months following the publication of this Decision in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia.
3. The Decree of the President of the National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia Calling the Regular Elections to Municipal Councils and the Regular Elections of Mayors (Official Gazette RS, No. 60/10) is annulled insofar as it refers to the elections in the Urban Municipality of Koper and the Municipality of Trebnje.
4. Within a time limit of 20 days following the entry into force of the law by which the National Assembly will fulfil the requirement referred to in the second point of these operative provisions, the President of the National Assembly shall call the elections of municipal councils and the elections of mayors of the new Municipalities of Ankaran and Mirna, and the Urban Municipality of Koper and the Municipality of Trebnje in accordance with the rules that apply for early elections of a municipal council if such is dissolved before the termination of its four-year term of office.
5. The term of office of the members of the municipal councils and the mayors of the Urban Municipality of Koper and the Municipality of Trebnje is to be extended until the first session of the newly elected municipal councils.

A

1. The petitioners challenge the Establishment of Municipalities and Municipal Boundaries Act (hereinafter referred to as the EMMBA), as it does not contain any provisions regarding the Municipality of Ankaran and the Municipality of Mirna. The National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia adopted the assessment that the territories in question fulfil the statutory conditions for the establishment of a municipality, and, on the basis of this assessment, it called referenda for the determination of the will of the residents of these territories. In both referenda the residents supported the establishment of a new municipality. On this basis, the Government of the Republic of Slovenia submitted a draft of the Establishment of the Municipality of Ankaran and the Municipality of Mirna and the Determination of their Territories Act (EPA 943-V, hereinafter referred to as the EMMBA-G), which was not adopted; furthermore, a subsequently submitted draft law on the establishment of the Municipality of Ankaran was not adopted, while a subsequently submitted draft law on the establishment of the Municipality of Mirna is still in the legislative procedure. The rejection of these draft laws or failure to adopt them without a substantiated reason would allegedly entail arbitrary decision-making by the National Assembly as well as a violation of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law and the principle of the equality of the residents of the territories in question (Article 2 and the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution), a violation of the fairness of the proceedings in which their proposals would be considered (Article 22 of the Constitution), and would prevent the exercise of the right to judicial protection and to a legal remedy (Articles 23 and 25 of the Constitution), as the law does not prescribe a legal remedy for such a situation. Since the legal situation is not consistent with the will of the people expressed in a referendum, the challenged Act allegedly also violates the principle determined by the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution, according to which power is vested in the people. Such a situation allegedly unconstitutionally interferes with Articles 9 and 38 of the Constitution, according to which local self-government is guaranteed in Slovenia and the residents exercise it in local communities, and it allegedly also violates the third paragraph of Article 139 of the Constitution, according to which a municipality is established by law, following a referendum in which the will of the residents of a particular territory is determined. At the same time, it allegedly violates Article 44 of the Constitution, as the will of the residents of the territories in question determined in a referendum was nullified and as they cannot participate in the governance of public affairs in a manner that they themselves chose in accordance with the law and the Constitution. The petitioners emphasise that the creation of such an unconstitutional situation just before the local elections entails its perpetuation for another four years, as the possible subsequent amendment of the EMMBA as such could only have effect at the first regular local elections [following its entry into force]. They draw attention to the still on-going unconstitutionality of the Urban Municipality of Koper and the Constitutional Court decisions regarding the protection of specific parts of the territory of Ankaran. They enclose an expert opinion regarding the constitutional aspects of the establishment of the Municipality of Ankaran with the petition.<sup>1</sup> They suggest absolute priority consideration. They propose that the Constitutional Court [issue a Decision] establishing the existence of an unconstitutional legal gap in the challenged Act, that, by determining the manner of the implementation of the Decision until the inconsistency of the Act with the Constitution is remedied, it ensures the establishment of municipalities on the two territories in question (they refer to Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-294/98, dated 12 October 1998, Official Gazette RS, No. 72/98, and OdlUS VII, 185), and that it suspend the regular local elections in the Urban Municipality of Koper and the Municipality of Trebnje, which will allegedly enable their transformation into municipalities that are in conformity with the Constitution.

2. In its reply, the National Assembly summarises the course of the procedure for the establishment of municipalities in the years 2009 and 2010, namely from the viewpoint of the law in force as well as from the viewpoint of the actual course of the procedure. It states that in such procedure the National Assembly decides on the basis of expert assessments and the proposals of the Government, which, within the framework of its responsibility with regard to the National Assembly (the first paragraph of Article 4 of the Act on the Government of the Republic of Slovenia, Official Gazette RS, No. 24/05 – official consolidated text, and 109/08 – AGRS), also implements the entire concept of local self-governance. Regarding the proposal to establish the Municipality of Ankaran, the Government thus established that the proposed territory fulfils the conditions for the establishment of a municipality and that the proposal goes in the direction of implementing the Constitutional Court decisions in relation with the unconstitutionality of the Urban Municipality of Koper, and it suggested that the National Assembly postpone a decision on the proposals for the establishment of municipalities and urban municipalities until the competences of regions and municipalities are defined on the basis of an expert analysis, and within this framework, especially the competences of urban municipalities. The Government made a statement regarding the proposal on the establishment of the Municipality of Mirna in the framework of a common opinion on several proposals; therein it found that the proposal satisfies the conditions, but an end must be put to the process of breaking municipalities into smaller parts, as this leads to an increase in the number of municipalities that are unable to fulfil their tasks in accordance with the principles of functional and financial autonomy, and therefore it does not support the further process of establishing municipalities. After carrying out the preliminary procedure, the Government submitted a draft of the EMMBA-G to the National Assembly with a delay with regard to its agenda, which allegedly prevented the National Assembly, as the legislature, from concluding the procedure for establishing new municipalities within the statutory time limit. When this draft law was not adopted at a second vote, two separate draft laws on the establishment of each of the municipalities and the determination of their borders were introduced into the legislative procedure; the National Assembly rejected the draft law on the establishment of the Municipality of Ankaran already upon its first reading, while the consideration of the draft law on the establishment of the Municipality of Mirna came to a standstill in the second reading within the framework of the legislative procedure. The National Assembly is of the opinion that the petitioners' statements regarding the "finality" and thereby the binding effect of a referendum on the establishment of a municipality are not substantiated. It stresses that the legal nature of such a referendum as consultative and non-binding on the National Assembly must be taken into account, and it also quotes constitutional case law on this issue. From such it allegedly follows that it falls within the constitutional competence of the National Assembly to establish a municipality by law and determine its territory, thereby taking into account the constitutional concept, statutory criteria, and within this framework, the will of the residents (Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-144/94, dated 15 July 1994, Official Gazette RS, No. 45/94, and OdlUS III, 95),<sup>2</sup> as well as the fact that the National Assembly is not unconditionally bound by such a referendum (Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-183/94, dated 9 November 1994, Official Gazette RS, No. 73/94, and OdlUS III, 122).<sup>3</sup> It emphasises that the National Assembly conducted the procedures in accordance with the Local Self-government Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 94/97 – official consolidated text, 76/08, and 79/09 – hereinafter referred to as the LSA) (with the exception of observing the time limit for their conclusion), and that it cannot be bound by its previous decisions on the establishment of municipalities, as each such procedure is allegedly independent (it refers to Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-104/02).<sup>4</sup> With regard to such, the petitioners' allegations that the EMMBA violates Article 2 and the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution because it did not establish the two municipalities in question are allegedly not substantiated. The National Assembly is also of the opinion that there is no violation of Articles 23 and 25 of the Constitution, as, in light of the opinion of the Government as the executive authority responsible for the implementation of the concept of local self-government, the National Assembly allegedly had the possibility to exercise political

- 2 In this Decision the Constitutional Court abrogated the first and third paragraphs of Article 14 of the Local Self-government Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 72/93), according to which the National Assembly was required to establish a municipality in accordance with the will expressed by the adult residents who voted in a referendum, because it deemed that it is possible to derive a process from such by which local communities could be created in Slovenia that do not fulfil the constitutional and statutory conditions for their establishment.
  - 3 The Constitutional Court established that Articles 2 and 3 of the EMMBA are inconsistent with the Constitution as they establish municipalities that do not fulfil the constitutional and statutory requirements.
  - 4 Correctly: Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-103/02, dated 18 April 2002, Official Gazette RS, No. 39/02, and OdlUS XI, 64, which drew attention to the fact that the conduct of the National Assembly must always be consistent with the Constitution and the laws, regardless of its prior illegal conduct (since it led to the establishment of municipalities that were not consistent with the constitutional concept of a municipality).

discretion and take into account the broader public interest in adopting this law, even though such entails a decision of a concrete nature. Also with regard to this law, legal protection is therefore allegedly ensured in the proceedings for the review of its consistency with the Constitution before the Constitutional Court, which would decide whether there exist substantiated and convincing reasons for “the decision adopted by the National Assembly”.

3. In its opinion, the Government emphasises that the process of establishing municipalities in Slovenia resulted in a large number of municipalities, therefore it does not support their further establishment. Continuing to break up municipalities into smaller parts would further diminish their ability to fulfil their tasks in accordance with the principle of functional and financial autonomy, which in particular is not observed by very small municipalities. As a result, the regulation regarding the establishment of new municipalities was already amended by law (the Act Amending the Local Self-Government Act, Official Gazette RS, No. 51/10 – hereinafter referred to as the LSA-R). In relation with the proposals on the establishment of the Municipalities of Ankaran and Mirna, the Government prepared a draft amendment of the EMMBA in which, taking into account Order of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-239/98, dated 15 March 2001 (Official Gazette RS, No. 28/01, and OdlUS X, 51), it found that all constitutional and statutory conditions for the establishment of the municipalities in question are fulfilled. It also forwarded such an opinion regarding the subsequently submitted proposals for the establishment of these municipalities.

4. By Order No. U-I-137/10, dated 3 September 2010 (Official Gazette RS, No. 72/10), the Constitutional Court accepted the petition for consideration and decided to consider it with absolute priority. At the same time, it suspended the Decree of the President of the National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia Calling the Regular Elections to Municipal Councils and the Regular Elections of Mayors (Official Gazette RS, No. 60/10 – hereinafter referred to as the Decree calling regular local elections) insofar as it refers to the elections in the Urban Municipality of Koper and the Municipality of Trebnje.
5. On 4 November 2010, the Constitutional Court held a public hearing. The petitioners supported the allegation regarding the National Assembly’s arbitrary decision-making in relation to the establishment of the Municipalities of Ankaran and Mirna with documents that allegedly indicate the presence of political bargaining and not only the application of the National Assembly’s political discretion, the territorial completeness and independence of the Ankaran settlement, the fact that the authorities of the Urban Municipality of Koper neglect the Ankaran settlement, the support of the Italian national community, and the initial support of the Municipality of Trebnje, which was allegedly withdrawn as a result of the subsequent political influence of the authorities of the Urban Municipality of Koper. The representative of the National Assembly stated that in the preliminary proceedings the National Assembly adopted the assessment that several territories fulfilled the conditions for the establishment of a municipality, however due to political influence it allegedly called referenda only on the two territories in question and not on the other territories. Upon reconsideration [of this matter] on the basis of a request submitted by the National Council that it again decide on the EMMBA-G in new proceedings, the majority of the National Assembly, in accordance with the positions and the warnings of the Government, allegedly realised that decisions in the direction of breaking municipalities into smaller parts are no longer feasible. The Government reiterated its assessment that Slovenia has a large number of municipalities, some of which are not able to perform their tasks due to their small size, and assessed that the two territories at issue fulfil the statutory and constitutional conditions for the establishment of a municipality. The representatives of the Urban Municipality of Koper stressed that there is neither a constitutional right to establish a municipality nor a constitutional concept of a municipality, and that the establishment of the Ankaran Municipality would be unconstitutional; such is allegedly also substantiated by the expert opinions submitted at the public hearing.<sup>5</sup> The establishment of a municipality is allegedly a matter of the National Assembly's political discretion and if its decisions were bound in any manner it would also entail an impediment to the functioning of the National Council of the Republic of Slovenia. The representatives of the Municipality of Trebnje objected to the allegations regarding the withdrawn support and stated they had problems due to the suspended elections. The replies to the questions of the Constitutional Court judges showed that when the National Assembly decided again [on the draft Act], the Government's new political concept of local self-government prevailed as a broader interest, the Government was caught between political and expert assessments of the proposals on the establishment of new municipalities, and that it determined that the proposals then in procedure which had successfully completed the preliminary stage were to be concluded according to the rules of the same procedure that was in force at the time of their submission, as well as that in the event of the establishment of the Municipality of Ankaran the special rights of the members of the Italian national community in accordance with the Constitution and the law would be guaranteed.

B – II

6. The fundamental question that the Constitutional Court must answer in the case at issue is whether the National Assembly may decide not to adopt a law after calling a referendum in which the residents [of part of the municipality] decided in favour of establishing a municipality. Before this question can be answered, the substance of the concept of local self-government, as guaranteed by the Constitution (Article 9), and of a municipality, in the framework of which the residents of Slovenia exercise the former (Article 138 of the Constitution), must be defined.
7. Already in Decision No. U-I-13/94, dated 21 January 1994 (Official Gazette RS, No. 6/94, and OdlUS III, 8), the Constitutional Court stated the following: "Although the Slovene Constitution does not explicitly refer to the right to local self-government in the chapter on fundamental rights and freedoms, the principle of local self-government was incorporated into the fundamental provisions of the Constitution and defined in more detail in a separate chapter on local and other forms of self-government. The 'right to local self-government', however, is inherent in the fundamental constitutional guarantee of local self-government ('Local self-government shall be guaranteed in Slovenia', Article 9 of the Constitution) as the institutional framework for deciding on local public affairs, on the one hand, and in the fundamental constitutional right of every citizen to participate in the management of public affairs (Article 44 of the Constitution), on the other." It especially emphasised that the process of the deconstruction of the old communes or the establishment of new municipalities entails a process "in the sense of an 'upward reform' based on the democratically expressed will of citizens regarding the territory in which they wish to establish 'their' municipality as a natural and functional local community." It may be established that from the launch of the reform of local self-government the Constitutional Court understood such as a process in which the main role is played by the persons residing in a particular territory.

8. In Decision No. U-I-90/94, dated 20 May 1994 (Official Gazette RS, No. 29/94, and OdlUS III, 58), the Constitutional Court rejected the claim that "the people may freely decide on the size of a municipality in a referendum." It further stated the following: "The establishment of municipalities is the basic condition for the actual exercise of local self-government. In Chapter V a), the Constitution namely defines the status of a municipality, an urban municipality, and a region as local communities (Articles 138 through 144). The fundamental local community is a municipality, whose constitutional concept is conditioned by (1) the common needs and interests of the (2) residents of (3) one or a number of settlements (4) who participate in the management of public affairs of a local nature (5) independently, i.e. self-governing in relation to the state. A municipality is therefore a residential community of persons living in the territory of one settlement or a number of interconnected settlements. It is particularly characterised by territorial links that are the basis for the formation of a network of interpersonal and neighbourly relations and the awareness of belonging to a municipality as the fundamental territorial community." It again emphasised that "[s]uch entails the process of the establishment of new municipalities on the basis of the democratically expressed will of the people as to the local territory where they would like to establish a municipality as a natural and functional local community." In Decision No. U-I-85/94, dated 20 May 1994 (Official Gazette RS, No. 29/94, and OdlUS III, 57), the Constitutional Court referred to Decision No. U-I-90/94 regarding the definition of the concept of a municipality and explicitly pointed out "territorial links" as an essential element of the constitutional concept of a municipality that the National Assembly must consider when establishing municipalities.
9. The Constitutional Court defined the substance of the right to local self-government most clearly in Decision No. U-I-322/98, dated 15 March 2001 (Official Gazette RS, No. 28/01, and OdlUS X, 44). After quoting Article 9 and the third paragraph of Article 139 of the Constitution, it stated that "[t]he Constitution guarantees the right to local self-government that belongs to the residents of a particular territory. It authorises the National Assembly to establish municipalities, but only after the will of the residents has been established,” and it proceeds by stating that “[t]he authorised petitioners are determined very broadly, so as to allow the residents to exercise their right to local self-government (their right to establish municipalities) to the greatest possible extent.” It follows from this Decision that the Constitutional Court also understood the constitutional right to local self-government as the right of the residents living in a particular territory to exercise such right in a municipality of their “own”. Such is also indicated by the requirement determined by the same Decision that the procedure for the establishment of a municipality must be regulated in such a manner so as to prevent the potential arbitrariness of the National Assembly in determining the constitutional and statutory conditions for the establishment of a municipality and that judicial protection against the decisions of the National Assembly must be provided. Arbitrary conduct of the National Assembly preventing the residents of a particular territory from exercising their constitutional right to express their will to establish a municipality in a referendum would consequently also entail an interference with their constitutional right to local self-government.

10. Order of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-254/06, dated 10 April 2008, entails a certain divergence from the position expressed in Decision No. U-I-322/98 and a clearer answer to the question of whether the constitutional right to local self-government also entails the right to one’s own municipality. The Order states the following: “It follows from the constitutional concept of a municipality (the second paragraph of Article 139, the first paragraph of Article 140, and Article 142 of the Constitution) that local self-government is the right of local authorities to manage common local affairs. Although the establishment of a municipality is an essential condition for the exercise of local self-government, such does not entail that the legislature is not entitled to determine the criteria (conditions) and the procedure for the establishment (and changes in the boundaries) of municipalities [...]. Therefore the provisions of Articles 138 and 139 cannot be interpreted in the sense that they guarantee the residents of Slovenia the right to their own municipality, but only the right to exercise local self-government in a municipality that is established in accordance with the conditions and according to the procedure determined by law.”
11. On the basis of the constitutional provisions regarding local self-government and considering the Constitutional Court decisions that also defined the substance of these provisions, the legislature determined the conditions and procedure for the establishment of municipalities. The procedure can be divided into two parts (two stages). The first part is initiated by a petition or proposal for the establishment of a new municipality and is concluded by a decision of the National Assembly on whether or not an individual proposal fulfils the constitutional and statutory conditions for the establishment of a municipality, and, if these conditions are fulfilled, a referendum is carried out in which the residents express their will to establish a municipality. If the proposal does not fulfil the conditions, the procedure is concluded by an order against which judicial protection is guaranteed in instances of potential arbitrary conduct of the National Assembly (the second and third paragraphs of Article 14a of the LSA). “The requirement that arbitrariness must be prevented at all levels of the legal decision-making process, especially when it could threaten rights safeguarded by the Constitution, is consistent with the principles of a state governed by the rule of law.” (Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-322/98.) If the National Assembly acted arbitrarily in making this decision, it would prevent the residents from expressing their will to establish a municipality in a referendum and such would also entail an interference with the right to local self-government (Decision No. U-I-322/98.) The holding of a referendum determining the will of the residents is a constitutional condition for the second part of the procedure for the establishment of a municipality, i.e. the initiation of the procedure for the adoption of the law by which the municipality will be established. It is not possible to establish a municipality or achieve a change in the territories of municipalities without carrying out a referendum (held by the Constitutional Court in Decision No. U-I-285/98, dated 17 September 1998, Official Gazette RS, No. 67/98, and OdlUS VII, 160). Before the referendum is carried out, all questions in relation to the fulfilment or non-fulfilment of the constitutional and statutory conditions for the establishment of a municipality have to be resolved and also, in a potential judicial dispute, all potentially disputable questions have to be resolved and potential unconstitutionality and illegalities have to be remedied. Legal protection must therefore be regulated in such a manner that it will effectively protect the constitutional rights and legal position of the participants in the procedure (See Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-322/98). In the second part of the procedure, i.e. the procedure for the adoption of the law by which a municipality is established, the National Assembly does not decide on whether the conditions for the establishment of a municipality or for a change in its territory are fulfilled. In proceedings to review the potential unconstitutionality of the law by which municipalities are established or their territories are changed and to review the constitutionality of the procedure in which the law was adopted, only violations that were committed in the legislative procedure may be assessed, and not violations committed in the preliminary procedure, against which special legal protection is provided (See Order of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-239/98).

12. A municipality is established by law following a referendum by which the will of the residents in a given territory is established (the third paragraph of Article 139 of the Constitution). The Constitutional Court has been considering the question of the legal nature of the mentioned referendum since the launch of the implementation of local self-government. Thus already in Decision No. U-I-85/94 it stated the following: “The third paragraph of Article 139 of the Constitution requires the legislature only to carry out a referendum to ‘establish the will of the people in a certain territory’ before establishing new municipalities, without thereby defining the term ‘territory’ and without explicitly binding the legislature to observe such will. In accordance with the spirit of this constitutional provision, by the first paragraph of Article 14 of the LSA the legislature bound itself to establish (by law) the territories of municipalities ‘in accordance with the will expressed [...] in a referendum’ – of course, provided such will is not contrary to the letter and spirit of the constitutional provisions regarding local self-government, since the legislature must above all else abide by the Constitution.” In Decision No. U-I-144/94, by which it abrogated the “self-imposed restriction” under Article 14 of the LSA in force at that time, the Constitutional Court repeated the position from the abovementioned Decision. “The third paragraph of Article 139 of the Constitution, however, does not prescribe such referendum [with binding effect], but it requires that prior to determining the territory of a municipality by law the will of the residents be determined in a referendum. It is, however, within the constitutionally defined sphere of competence of the National Assembly to establish a municipality by law and determine its territory, thereby taking into account the constitutional concept, statutory criteria, and within such framework the will of the residents.” And it offered the National Assembly the following practical instruction: “The will expressed in a referendum by the population of the entire referendum area as well as by the residents of its individual parts will have to be taken into account insofar as the municipality established on its basis will conform to the constitutional concept of local self-government and statutory provisions.” A similar position, which the Constitutional Court developed further, is found in Decision No. U-I-183/94: “Referenda in the sense of Article 139 of the Constitution express the will of the residents of a particular territory which is not necessarily consistent with the interests of adjacent territories and wider public interests, which the legislature must take into consideration in defining such territorial division of the state as will enable not only the implementation of local self-government but also the fulfilment of those administrative tasks of the state which the latter will exercise through municipalities and the powers of the state vested in them. Therefore, the Constitution provides for a consultative referendum, which leaves the final determination of the territory of a municipality to the legislature. In determining the territory of a municipality the legislature is thus not bound by the will of the residents expressed in a referendum in an absolute or unconditional manner.” Thereby the Constitutional Court explicitly underlined that “constitutional authorisations could be exceeded if the National Assembly failed to establish a municipality in a territory which fulfils the constitutional and statutory conditions and whose residents voted in favour of establishing their own municipality.”

13. In Decision No. U-I-294/98, the Constitutional Court adopted a very clear position on whether the National Assembly is bound [by the result of a referendum], namely: “When establishing municipalities and changing their territories, the National Assembly is bound by the will of the voters expressed in a referendum regarding the establishment of a municipality or a change in its territory – except in two instances:
  - when respecting the will of the voters expressed in a referendum would lead to the establishment of a municipality that would not be in accordance with the constitutional and statutory provisions on municipalities, and
  - when it is objectively not possible to respect the will of the voters expressed in a referendum due to the conflicting results of referenda.

Conduct contrary to the will of the voters expressed in a referendum also in other instances would entail a violation of the principle that Slovenia is a democratic republic (Article 1 of the Constitution), the principle that in Slovenia power is vested in the people (the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution), the right to participate in the management of public affairs (Article 44 of the Constitution), and the constitutional provisions regarding local self-government (Article 9, Article 138 of the Constitution).” It repeated the cited position in Decision No. U-I-288/98, dated 14 October 1998 (OdlUS VII, 189), and most recently in Order No. U-I-246/06, dated 10 May 2007.

14. In the course of their implementation, the constitutional provisions that refer to local self-government (in particular, Articles 9, 138, and 139 of the Constitution) must be applied in a manner that derives from Constitutional Court decisions. That also the legislature is bound by the interpretation of the Constitutional Court follows already from the foundations of the principle of the separation of powers. The authorisation of the Constitutional Court to provide interpretations of constitutional provisions that have legally binding effects derives from its constitutionally defined position. It follows from the hitherto interpretations of the Constitutional Court that Articles 138 and 139 must be interpreted as ensuring the residents of Slovenia the right to exercise local self-government in a municipality established in accordance with the conditions and according to the procedure determined by law, and that the National Assembly is – regarding the establishment of municipalities and any change in their territory – bound by the will of the voters expressed in a referendum on the establishment of a municipality or a change in its territory, except in two instances: when respecting the will of the voters expressed in a referendum would lead to the establishment of a municipality that would not be in accordance with the constitutional and statutory provisions on municipalities and when it is objectively not possible to respect the will of the voters expressed in a referendum due to the conflicting results of referenda. In its decisions, the Constitutional Court emphasised that the National Assembly was entitled to determine the conditions under which it assessed specific proposals for the establishment of municipalities, but the principle of a state governed by the rule of law requires that the legislature follow the rules it has itself created and that it does not act arbitrarily in its decisions regarding the establishment of municipalities (See Decision No. U-I-103/02). Conduct contrary to these principles entails a violation of the principle of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution) and the general principle of equality before the law (the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution).

15. The following may be derived from the presented positions of the Constitutional Court:

- when deciding on proposals for the establishment of municipalities, the National Assembly has to respect the constitutional concept of local self-government and the statutory conditions and procedure it itself determined. Such entails that if the National Assembly establishes that the conditions are not fulfilled, it is neither obliged to establish a municipality nor to call a referendum. If the National Assembly, however, establishes that the conditions are fulfilled, and the residents

- express their will to establish a municipality in a particular territory in a referendum and there exist no reasons to disregard the will expressed in such manner, the National Assembly is required to establish the municipality;
- the National Assembly is required to respect the will of the residents to establish a municipality in a particular territory expressed in a referendum unless it has substantiated (constitutional law) reasons to act in a different manner;
  - it may not act arbitrarily in deciding on the establishment of municipalities.

B – III

- 16. The procedure for the establishment of the Municipality of Ankaran through its secession from the Urban Municipality of Koper and of the Municipality of Mirna through its secession from the Municipality of Trebnje was conducted in accordance with the LSA in force before its amendment (LSA-R) and as it continues to govern the two proposed municipalities according to the transitional provisions (Article 8 of the LSA-R). Such entails that the provision of the LSA that enabled the establishment of a new municipality through the secession of a part of a municipality from an existing municipality (the third paragraph of Article 15) is still applicable to the two proposed new municipalities. The National Assembly found that both proposed territories fulfilled the constitutional and statutory conditions for the establishment of a municipality and following such conclusion it called a referendum in which the residents of the two territories expressed their majority will that they wish to establish a new municipality. No judicial dispute was initiated against the Decree calling the referendum. Following the referendum, the National Assembly also established the two municipalities by law. The National Council requested that the National Assembly vote again [on this matter]. In the new vote, however, the law was not adopted. The draft law for the establishment of the Municipality of Ankaran was also rejected in a newly initiated procedure, while the draft law for the establishment of the Municipality of Mirna came to a standstill in the legislative procedure.
- 17. As has already been mentioned, the petitioners' main allegation is that the National Assembly acted arbitrarily when it did not establish the two municipalities, even though in the relevant procedure it itself found that both territories fulfilled all constitutional and statutory conditions for the establishment of a municipality, which in the case at issue entails a violation of the second paragraph of Article 14 and Article 2 of the Constitution, and as a consequence it also violated Articles 9, 138, and 139 of the Constitution. The National Assembly's objection is that it is completely free when deciding on the establishment of a municipality, as such concerns full political discretion. However, at the public hearing it added that it also had the right to change its mind. The representative of the Municipality of Koper argued above all that there is no constitutional right to one's own municipality, that the referendum on the establishment of a municipality is of a consultative nature, and that the proposed new Municipality of Ankaran also otherwise does not fulfil the conditions for a municipality.

18. As regards the objections that the proposed Ankaran municipality does not fulfil the constitutional and statutory conditions, attention should be drawn to the position of the Constitutional Court that holds that all questions in relation to the fulfilment of such conditions have to be resolved in the procedure leading to the calling of a referendum, also through the use of judicial protection. The Urban Municipality of Koper could have challenged the Decree calling the referendum.<sup>6</sup> Therefore, the allegation of the non-fulfilment of the conditions cannot be taken into account. By Order No. U-I-239/98, the Constitutional Court adopted the clear position that “in the procedure for the adoption of a law the National Assembly does not establish the fulfilment of the conditions for the establishment of a municipality or a change in its territory, but proceeds from the results of the referendum in accordance with Articles 25 and 26 of the [Act regulating the procedure for establishing municipalities and municipal boundaries]. In proceedings to review a potential unconstitutionality of the law by which municipalities are established or their territories are changed and to review the constitutionality of the procedure in which the law was adopted it is only possible to assess violations committed in the legislative procedure, and not violations committed in the preliminary procedure, for which special legal protection is prescribed.”
19. The objection that the right to one’s own municipality does not exist and that the National Assembly is completely free in deciding upon the establishment of a new municipality, even though it itself established that the constitutional and statutory conditions for the establishment of the two new municipalities were fulfilled, and in spite of the affirmative will expressed by the residents, is also not substantiated. Such position is not consistent with Articles 138 and 139 of the Constitution. The National Assembly is not obligated to establish a new municipality if it finds that the constitutional and statutory conditions for its establishment are not fulfilled. However, as the National Assembly established that the constitutional and statutory conditions were fulfilled, and following the fulfilment of the last condition – the affirmative will of the residents expressed in the referendum – and the finding that no reasons exist due to which it would not be required to take into account the result of the referendum, it should have established the two municipalities, in accordance with the procedure it itself had prescribed. The National Assembly’s position that in adopting a law by which it establishes a municipality it is bound by neither the result of a referendum nor the finding from the preliminary procedure that the conditions are fulfilled, in connection with the concurrent position that legal protection against such law is guaranteed before the Constitutional Court, which will assess primarily if substantiated and convincing reasons for the decision adopted by the National Assembly derive from the entire procedural documentation, is unclear and even contradictory. What these reasons may be and why the Constitutional Court would establish them at all, since, given the National Assembly’s position that it is bound by neither the result of the referendum nor by the findings from the preliminary procedure, the National Assembly would not even be required to state them, is not evident from the National Assembly’s reply.

6 See Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-322/98.

20. Already in Decision No. U-I-13/94 the Constitutional Court stated that it is a task of a state governed by the rule of law to enable residents of municipalities to express their interests and exercise their appropriately determined will in a legally regulated manner. By a special law the National Assembly prescribed the conditions and procedure for the establishment of a municipality. Following the prescribed procedure conducted by the National Assembly, a municipality is established by a law. It is true that the legislature is completely autonomous when adopting laws by which it regulates social relations in a general and abstract manner, and bound only by the Constitution. It undoubtedly had such broad autonomy regarding the establishment of municipalities when adopting the laws by which it defined, in conformity with the Constitution, the conditions and procedure for the establishment of municipalities. However, it does not have such broad autonomy when adopting a law by which it decides on the establishment of a municipality.
21. “The establishment of a municipality by the constitutionally and statutorily defined procedure is an essential condition for the exercise of the constitutional right to local self-government.<sup>7</sup> It is the constitutional right of the residents living in a particular territory who are connected by common needs and interests to govern local affairs by themselves.”<sup>8</sup> An integral part of the right to local self-government is also the possibility of the residents of a particular territory to exercise this right in a municipality that they establish independently in accordance with the statutory conditions. That is the intention of the constitutional provision providing that the National Assembly establish a municipality following the prior determination of the will of the residents. By a decision adopted at the end of such procedure, the National Assembly decides precisely on this constitutional right, namely on the basis of the finding that according to the procedure that was carried out, the obtained documents, and the established facts, as well as according to the result of the referendum, the constitutional and statutory conditions for the establishment of a municipality as the fundamental self-governing local community are fulfilled. Therefore, such does not entail an “abstract right to a municipality” in whatever territory, but only in the territory that fulfils the constitutional and statutory conditions for the establishment of a municipality.
22. According to an explicit provision of the Constitution, the National Assembly adopts the decision on the establishment of a municipality in the form of a law. However, such constitutional competence of the National Assembly does not change the fact that, despite the prescribed formal form, such in substance entails a decision on a constitutional right in a concrete, individual case following the prior execution of the procedure prescribed by the Constitution and the LSA. Therefore, in such an instance the legislature, despite using the form of a law, nevertheless does not have a wide margin of appreciation in the sense of political discretionary decision-making, so as to be able to – having drawn its democratic legitimacy from general elections – decide on whether to establish a municipality or not only on the basis of a value-oriented and interest-oriented assessment. The margin of the legislature's appreciation is present in the general and abstract legal regulation of rights and obligations, as only there – taking into account the constitutional framework – may the democratically elected legislature freely decide on the most appropriate legal regulation. In deciding on whether in a concrete case the residents of a particular territory may exercise their constitutional right to local self-government in the framework of a new municipality, however, the legislature enjoys less freedom, as it has to respect the rules that it itself defined. As soon as the legislature defined the conditions for the exercise of its constitutional competence to establish municipalities, which have to be fulfilled and the existence of which it establishes itself, and the special procedure, in accordance with the principle of legality and trust in the law as well as the general principle of equality, it also had to observe these rules.<sup>9</sup> The statutory regulation of the conditions and the procedure for the establishment of municipalities as well as the guarantee of legal protection in such procedure require not only that the regulation be observed, including by the legislature (Article 2 of the Constitution), but also that all residents (petitioners) who want to establish a municipality in a particular territory be treated equally (the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution). The principle of equality of course does not require that the National Assembly break the law (i.e. that it establish a municipality even though the conditions for such are not fulfilled), it does however require that it apply the prescribed conditions in all cases equally. If a territory fulfils the conditions, it must act in the same manner as it acted in other cases where the conditions had been fulfilled. Citizens, in the case at issue, the residents of the two territories in which the new municipalities are to be established, legitimately expected that the legislature would adhere to the defined rules and would, provided that all prescribed conditions are fulfilled, establish a municipality, as it had done in similar cases. Conduct contrary to the described principles entails a violation of the principle of legality and trust in the law (Article 2 of the Constitution), as well as the general principle of equality under the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution.

7 Held by the Constitutional Court in Order No. U-I-254/06, dated 10 April 2008, Paragraph 5 of the reasoning.

8 See Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-163/99, dated 23 September 1999, Official Gazette RS, No. 80/99, and OdlUS VIII, 209, Paragraph 13 of the reasoning.

23. As the National Assembly did not establish the Municipalities of Ankaran and Mirna, it acted arbitrarily and thereby violated the general principle of equality (the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution) and the principle of legality and trust in the law (Article 2 of the Constitution). The refusal to establish the two municipalities consequently also entails a violation of Articles 138 and 139 of the Constitution. The Constitutional Court therefore decided that the EMMBA is inconsistent with the Constitution (point 1 of the operative provisions).

B – IV

24. The National Assembly is required to remedy the established inconsistency with the Constitution within a period of two months (point 2 of the operative provisions). In determining the time limit for remedying the inconsistency, the Constitutional Court considered that the content required to remedy the law is already known and it is not necessary to carry out a new preliminary procedure for the establishment of the fulfilment of the constitutional and statutory conditions or to carry out a referendum, but only the legislative procedure for adopting an amendment to the EMMBA. The transitional provision of the LSA-R (Article 8) can also be understood in such a manner, as it determines that procedures regarding proposals for the establishment of new municipalities regarding which a referendum had been called before this Act (the LSA-R) was adopted are to be continued and concluded under the provisions that governed these procedures before the entry into force of this Act. The Act defines the “calling of a referendum” as a condition for the application of the previously valid law, not that “a referendum had already been carried out”. In the case at issue, the results of the referendum had even already been proclaimed. The Act, however, does not define the term “conclusion of the procedures”. However, as it links the application of the LSA-R or the law in force before the amendment to the “calling of a referendum”, which entails the conclusion of the preliminary procedure, it is absolutely clear that the term “conclusion of the procedure” refers to the legislative procedure. Therefore, all actions carried out in the preliminary procedure, including the referendum, remain legally valid. Thereby it also has to be emphasised that the established inconsistencies refer only to the legislative procedure, not the preliminary procedure.

B – V

25. The Constitutional Court found that the EMMBA is inconsistent with the Constitution and ordered that it be harmonised with the Constitution, but such does not suffice for remedying the established unconstitutionality. The goal of procedures for the establishment of a municipality is the exercise of local self-government in a particular territory, which, however, may only be ensured through elections of mayors and municipal councillors, which in essence entail the final stage before the constitution of a municipality. Therefore, the EMMBA is directly linked to the Local Elections Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 64/07 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the LEA). The regulation by which the execution of these elections is ensured is the decree calling the regular local elections that is issued by the President of the National Assembly within the time limits defined by statute.<sup>10</sup> Therefore, with regard to the established unconstitutionality of the EMMBA, on the basis of the mandate under Article 30 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 64/07 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), the Constitutional Court also reviewed the constitutionality of the Decree calling the regular local elections insofar as it refers to elections in the Urban Municipality of Koper and the Municipality of Trebnje. By Order No. U-I-137/10, dated 3 September 2010, the Constitutional Court suspended the execution of the mentioned Decree insofar as it refers to the Urban Municipality of Koper and the Municipality of Trebnje. As the Constitutional Court decided that the EMMBA is unconstitutional, because it did not establish the new municipalities, the Decree calling the regular local elections is also unconstitutional in the part in which its execution was suspended, and thus the elections in the Urban Municipality of Koper and the Municipality of Trebnje were not carried out. By carrying out the elections in the Urban Municipality of Koper and the Municipality of Trebnje without previously establishing the new municipalities, the unconstitutional state of affairs established by this Decision would be perpetuated and the residents of the new municipalities would be prevented from exercising local self-government therein, which would entail a violation of the principle of legality and trust in the law under Article 2 of the Constitution. Therefore, as in the Urban Municipality of Koper and the Municipality of Trebnje certain acts in relation to elections have already been carried out, the Constitutional Court annulled the Decree calling the regular local elections insofar as it refers to the elections to the authorities of the Urban Municipality of Koper and the Municipality of Trebnje (point 3 of the operative provisions). Such entails that also all actions carried out in relation to the elections on the basis of this part of the Decree calling the regular local elections and all acts adopted on its basis also lost their legal validity.

B – VI

26. After the EMMBA is harmonised with the Constitution, local elections have to be carried out as soon as possible in the new municipalities that will be established by their secession from the Urban Municipality of Koper and the Municipality of Trebnje, as well as in the latter two municipalities. On the basis of Article 40 of the CCA, the Constitutional Court thus determined that within a time period of 20 days following the entry into force of the law the President of the National Assembly is to call local elections in both newly established municipalities as well as the Urban Municipality of Koper and the Municipality of Trebnje in accordance with the rules for early elections (point 4 of the operative provisions). The Constitutional Court chose such a manner of implementation [of its Decision] because the time limit the LSA defines for the conclusion of the procedures had already expired. Delaying the implementation of this Decision would, however, entail disregard for a Constitutional Court decision and therefore a violation of Articles 2 and 3 of the Constitution as well as a perpetuation of the established unconstitutionality.

B – VII

27. In order to ensure legal certainty regarding the functioning of the Urban Municipality of Koper and the Municipality of Trebnje in the period until the local elections are carried out on the basis of the EMMBA, which will be harmonised with the Constitution, in spite of Articles 41 and 42 of the LSA,<sup>11</sup> an extension of the terms of office [of the members of the municipal councils and the mayors of these municipalities] was determined, namely until the first session of the newly elected municipal councils of these municipalities. In this period the members of the municipal councils and the mayors of these municipalities are to retain their regular mandates to decide on all affairs within the competence of the municipalities (point 5 of the operative provisions).

11 Article 41 of the LSA determines that the four-year term of office of members of a municipal council lasts until the first session of the newly elected council, which applies to both regular and early elections, as well as elections that, for whatever reason, are carried out later than the regular elections to municipal councils.

28. The Constitutional Court is aware that the periodic nature of elections is one of the more important elements of the right to vote and the principle of democracy. However, the extension of the [mentioned] terms of office in the Urban Municipality of Koper and the Municipality of Trebnje is necessary in order to ensure that the residents who proposed the establishment of the new municipalities (regarding which the National Assembly in the prescribed procedure determined that all the conditions for their establishment are fulfilled and their residents expressed the will to establish a municipality) can enforce and exercise the right to local self-government, including elections, in a municipality “established in accordance with the conditions and the procedure determined by law”, even though as a result elections will be held after the term of office expires.<sup>12</sup> Making the territory of a municipality consistent with the Constitution without also carrying out elections in the (new) municipality does not entail of itself that the exercise of local self-government is ensured in such a municipality. The residents predominantly exercise the rights (competences) of local self-government through elected authorities (the municipal council and the mayor). Therefore, the Constitutional Court deems that a shorter delay in the holding of elections does not entail an inadmissible interference with the right to vote, and in no instance does it cause its hollowing out.

C

29. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of Article 40, the second paragraph of Article 45, and Article 48 of the CCA, as well as the third indent of the third paragraph of Article 46 of the Rules of Procedure of the Constitutional Court (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 86/07, and 54/10), composed of: Dr Ernest Petrič, President, and Judges Dr Mitja Deisinger, Dr Etelka Korpič – Horvat, Mag. Miroslav Mozetič, Jasna Pogačar, Mag. Jadranka Sovdat, Jože Tratnik, and Jan Zobec. It adopted the Decision by seven votes against one. Judge Sovdat, who submitted a dissenting opinion, voted against. Judge Petrič submitted a concurring opinion.

Article 42 of the LSA determines that the four-year term of office of mayor lasts until the first session of the newly elected council, which applies to both regular and early elections, as well as elections that, for whatever reason, are carried out later than the regular elections to municipal councils.

12 See Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-254/06.

1. By the constitutional complaint the petitioners attacked the conduct of the National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia in the procedure for the adoption of an amendment to the Establishment of Municipalities and Municipal Boundaries Act and the veto of the National Council of the Republic of Slovenia regarding the amendment of this law that had initially been adopted by the National Assembly. At the same time, they submitted a petition by which they challenge the Establishment of Municipalities and Municipal Boundaries Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 108/06 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the EMMBA) alleging an unconstitutional legal gap, as the law does not include the Municipalities of Ankaran and Mirna, and, subsequently, the Decree calling the regular local elections, published in the Official Gazette RS, No. 60/10. The Constitutional Court has already decided on the submitted constitutional complaint and rejected it by Panel Order No. Up-604/10, dated 13 September 2010, as the conduct of the National Assembly and the National Council's veto in the legislative procedure are not individual acts against which a constitutional complaint is allowed. As the constitutional complaint has already been decided, the subject matter of these proceedings is thus only deciding on the constitutionality of the EMMBA on the grounds of the alleged unconstitutional legal gap, as it does not contain the Municipalities of Ankaran and Mirna, whereby the decision-making process was initiated by Order of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-137/10, dated 3 September 2010, by which the petition was accepted for consideration. As by this Order the Constitutional Court suspended the implementation of the Decree of the President of the National Assembly calling the regular elections insofar as it refers to the Urban Municipality of Koper and the Municipality of Mirna, the subject matter of this decision-making process is also the petitioners' proposal to assess the constitutionality of this regulation, provided the Constitutional Court deemed such to be necessary.
2. I did not participate in the adoption of the Order on the acceptance of the petition and the decision to suspend the holding of elections in the mentioned municipalities. Such of course is not an obstacle that would prevent me from joining the majority in this Decision. However, reasons of constitutional law, which in my opinion oppose the arguments by which the majority decision substantiates the unconstitutionality of the Act, do not permit me to do so. In addition, I cannot agree with the interference with the right to vote.

I

3. Article 9 of the Constitution determines that local self-government is guaranteed in Slovenia and Article 138 determines that the residents of Slovenia exercise local self-government in municipalities and other local communities. The second paragraph of Article 139 defines the territorial aspect of a municipality when it determines that its territory encompasses one or more settlements that are connected by the common needs and interests of their residents. The Constitution defines the other aspects<sup>1</sup> of local self-government, insofar as it defines them, in Articles 140 and 142. The European Charter of Local Self-Government (Official Gazette RS, No. 57/96, MP, No. 15/96 – hereinafter referred to as the ECLSG) defines the concept of local self-government in the first paragraph of Article 3 as “the right and the ability of local authorities, within the limits of the law, to regulate and manage a substantial share of public affairs under their own responsibility and in the interests of the local population.” The second paragraph of this Article inter alia determines that this right is exercised by councils or assemblies composed of members freely elected by secret ballot on the basis of direct, equal,<sup>2</sup> and universal suffrage which may have executive organs responsible to them.

4. According to the third paragraph of Article 139 of the Constitution, a municipality is established by law following the prior holding of a referendum by which the will of the residents of a particular territory is determined, whereby the law also determines the territory of the municipality. The ECLSG refers to the territory of municipalities only insofar as it determines in Article 5 that the boundaries of local governments should not be changed without prior consultation with the local communities to which they refer, if possible by referendum, where such is permitted by law. At the time of its entry into force, the third paragraph of Article 139 of the Constitution had a special meaning in particular due to the fact that on the basis of constitutional provisions local self-government with the competences accorded to it by the Constitution and the ECLSG had yet to be established. The decision in the case at issue also essentially depends on the definition of its content. However, such is not possible without previously clarifying what local self-government in essence is and what the nature of rights and obligations deriving from this constitutionally-defined institution is and who the holder of such is. Understanding the latter namely enables us to understand the former. In comparison to the majority, I hold an essentially different position regarding the former as well as the latter.
5. It appears that since the enactment of the constitutional basis for the establishment of local self-government there have been two opposing concepts, whereby according to the first, local self-government is only a public law institution, having rights (only) as such, while according to the second, it is the right of the local residents to manage local public affairs on their own. If the Constitution ensures the second, the question naturally arises whether as an individual living on a particular territory I have the right to demand local self-government, and, if I do, what type of local self-government do I have the right to demand. Do I have a constitutionally protected right to demand a municipality? We thus appear to be dealing with two questions: Is local self-government as “a legal systemic institution that defines the position (status) of the local community”<sup>3</sup> or “a legal systemic quality that has to be explicitly accorded [...] to a local community by an appropriate state act”<sup>4</sup> only the right (and ability) of local governments to manage local public affairs, as is stated in the first paragraph of Article 3 of the ECLSG, namely a right belonging to a local community as an independent entity of public law? Or, does local self-government entail (only or also) the constitutional right of the inhabitants of Slovenia who reside in a particular territory and who are connected by common needs and interests to manage their local affairs on their own in a local community? These questions have been present since the writing of the Constitution and, in light of everything seen thus far, the statement of one of the discussion participants [at a meeting of] the Commission for constitutional questions that such concerns a “great question that will be debated at length by law”<sup>5</sup> has proven to be truly prophetic. Evidently, no clear answers to these questions have been provided until today. Had they been provided, the issue probably would not have been highlighted once again as central in the adoption of the last amendment to the Local Self-government Act.<sup>6</sup> And evidently it is also central in the case at issue. It appears that in spite of numerous Constitutional Court decisions that were adopted in particular in the process of the establishment of municipalities in the function of establishing a system of local self-government and that were especially burdened by the establishment of a so-called network of municipalities, i.e. the question of the territorial division of the state territory in order to ensure local self-government, we have no clear constitutional answers to these questions, which also blurs the constitutional content of the third paragraph of Article 139 of the Constitution. There even appears to be an attempt to resolve the issue of the quality of local self-government through the quantity of municipalities. I am afraid that this process will only continue also after this Decision.

6. Let us begin by reviewing the relevant decisions of the Constitutional Court. Its interpretations of Articles 9 and 138 of the Constitution are namely binding on the National Assembly. The Decision in the case at issue refers to them as well. In Decision No. U-I-13/94, dated 21 January 1994 (Official Gazette RS, No. 6/94, and OdlUS III, 8), the Constitutional Court deemed that “the right to local self-government” (also written in quotations in the Decision itself, comment by J. S.) “is the inevitable result of observing the fundamental constitutional guarantee of local self-government under Article 9 of the Constitution as the institutional framework for deciding on local public affairs under Article 44 of the Constitution.” In addition to this definition, the Constitutional Court immediately summarises from the preamble of the ECLSG that local governments are one of the main foundations of every democratic rule, that the right of citizens to participate in the management of public affairs that may be exercised in the most direct manner at the local level is a democratic principle, and it adds the content of the first paragraph of Article 3 of the ECLSG. In Decision No. U-I-90/94, dated 20 May 1994 (Official Gazette RS, No. 29/94, and OdlUS III, 58), when stressing that a municipality is the fundamental local community, the Constitutional Court stated that its constitutional conception is conditioned (emphasis added by J. S.) by 1) common needs and interests 2) of the residents of 3) one or more settlements 4) who participate in the management of public affairs of a local (...) nature 5) independently, i.e. self-governing in relation to the state.<sup>7</sup>

5 At the 18th Session of the Commission for Constitutional Questions on 12 December 1990, an unknown speaker thus inter alia stated the following: “The first question is if, for example, some village may request that the National Assembly adopt such a law and transform it into a municipality, this great question that will be debated at length by law [...]” in M. Cerar, G. Perenič (eds.), Nastajanje slovenske Ustave, izbor gradiv Komisije za ustavna vprašanja 1990–1991 [The Process of Creating the Slovene Constitution, a Selection of Documents of the Commission for Constitutional Questions 1990–1991], Book No. III, Ljubljana 2001, p. 1065.

7. In my opinion, it already follows from the quoted positions of the Constitutional Court that local self-government is undoubtedly the institutional framework for deciding local public affairs (as the state is the institutional framework for deciding state affairs<sup>8</sup>), whereby self-governance in the performance of public affairs is the right – the right of the local community as an independent entity of public law – by which it will assert and protect itself (in particular) against the state when the latter would inadmissibly interfere with its position as protected by the Constitution. However, this institution is not an end in itself. It is intended to enable the persons who live in a particular territory, to which it is limited, to self-govern local affairs for their benefit – either through direct forms of decision-making or in the manner that is predominantly applied, i.e. through a system of representative democracy with elections, which may also be inferred from the second paragraph of Article 3 of the ECLSG. Therefore, these persons are a constitutive integral element of local self-government and they undoubtedly belong in the legal definition of this institution.<sup>9</sup> Within the framework of such, they exercise their right to participate in the management of public affairs, which the ECLSG defines as a principle and which the Constitution in Article 44 elevated to the level of a human right. However, what is

7 Or, as it added in other words: “The municipality, then, is a community of people living within the area of one or more mutually interconnected settlements. Its particular characteristic is territorial integration, which is the basis for the development of a network of interpersonal and neighbourly relations and of an awareness of belonging to the municipality as a basic territorial entity.” The Constitutional Court repeated the same definition also in Decision No. U-I-144/94, dated 15 July 1994 (Official Gazette RS, No. 45/94, and OdlUS III, 95).

8 It appears logical that also in Decision No. U-I-144/94 the Constitutional Court speaks of the fact that precisely the division of competences between the state and a municipality is the first characteristic of local self-government and it adds that the territorial connection of the residents in a certain area is its second equally important characteristic due to the awareness of the residents that they form a community in which they decide on matters of common importance.

9 This is how I understand Prof. Šmidovnik, op. cit., pp. 27–29, and other above cited authors.

most important thereby is that even though within this framework also (this and other) rights are exercised, local self-government in itself is not yet a human right,<sup>10</sup> just as the state is not [a human right], even though (this and all other) rights are exercised within its framework. Thus, also Article 138 does not speak of “the exercise of the right to local self-government”, but of “the exercise of local self-government”. However, we can nevertheless speak of a constitutional (but not human!) right to local self-government. We can speak of a constitutional right to local self-government in the sense that is probably undisputable when we speak of the rights of local communities to self-government in relation to the state. Perhaps we can also speak of it in the sense of the constitutional right of the persons who live in the territory of the Republic of Slovenia to decide on common issues of local importance in a manner that is guaranteed by the institution of local self-government. If we can speak of a constitutional right of persons at all, then, in my opinion, we can do so only in this sense. Namely, if the state, in spite of constitutional provisions, did not establish local self-government at all, but established such only fictitiously, or even abolished it, its citizens could demand that it guarantee them such right – namely that it guarantee them the right to decide local public affairs in the framework of local self-government and not in the framework of the state.

8. It is, however, not possible to say that the content of this constitutional right from the viewpoint of an individual also entails that a group of persons in a particular territory has the right to establish “its” local community to which the state shall acknowledge the status of self-government and all competences linked to this characteristic. It is hence not possible to say that from the Constitution there derives “a constitutional right of individuals to their own municipality”. The content of local self-government defined in such a manner, in my opinion, also logically follows from the definitions of the Constitutional Court in Decisions No. U-I-13/94, and No. U-I-90/94. In Decision No. U-I-322/98, after the introductory statement, according to which the competence of the National Assembly derives from the Constitution, as municipalities are established and their territories changed only by law, we may, however, also read the following: “The entitled proposers (in accordance with Article 3 of the [Act regulating the procedure for establishing municipalities and municipal boundaries] in force at that time, comment by J. S.) are, however, determined very broadly so that the residents may exercise their right to local self-government (the right to establish a municipality) to the greatest possible extent.” If in this Decision the Constitutional Court stopped at only this note, we could still, even if with some difficulty due to the addition in the parentheses, speak of an interpretation in one or another manner, but as the Court at the same time required that judicial protection be ensured against decisions of the National Assembly in the preliminary procedure for the determination of the existence of the constitutional and statutory conditions for the establishment of a municipality, this Decision cannot be understood any differently than that it substantially leaned in the direction of local self-government as a right of residents to demand the establishment of a municipality. The Decision in the case at issue clearly confirms such. The constitutional law reasons against such position have already been explained by Judge Ribičič in his separate opinion with regard to Decision No. U-I-322/98. Here I quote from his separate opinion: “The right to local self-government [...] does not entail the right to establish a municipality. I am deeply convinced that such a right cannot be inferred from the third paragraph of Article 139 of the Constitution [...]. Article 138 of the Constitution contains a somewhat sterner, even though in my opinion likewise insufficient basis for the right of the residents to establish a municipality [...]. The insufficiency of such constitutional basis for constructing the human constitutional right to establish a municipality becomes especially evident if someone attempted to derive from the mentioned constitutional provision a right to establish broader local communities, provinces, regions, or states, which may be regarded as ‘other’, broader local communities.” In his opinion, the denial of the existence of a constitutional right to establish a municipality does not also entail a negation of the right to local self-government, as such may be exercised in different forms and in very diverse manners, and by no means, as he says, “only in the framework of a municipality that is established to suit the image of a local community, a group of persons, or an individual.” I cannot but agree with these constitutional law arguments. We cannot speak of local self-government as a right that guarantees “the possibility of the residents of a particular territory to exercise this right in a municipality that they establish individually in accordance with statutory conditions,” or as “the right of the residents living in a particular territory to exercise this right in ‘their own’ municipality,” as is stated in the Decision. In my opinion, we can only speak of local self-government as a constitutional right of the people to decide common issues of local importance in a manner as is guaranteed by the institution of local self-government. That is how I see the constitutional law content of local self-government.

10 As it is not a human right, it is unusual that by Decision No. U-I-322/98, dated 15 March 2001 (Official Gazette RS, No. 28/01, and OdlUS X, 44), the Constitutional Court established the inconsistency of the then valid act on the procedure for establishing municipalities with the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, as the act allegedly did not guarantee judicial protection against decisions adopted by the National Assembly in the preliminary procedure in which the conditions for the establishment of municipalities are determined, even though the decision of the National Assembly, as the Constitutional Court held, allegedly has a direct influence on the exercise of a constitutional right. The fourth paragraph of Article 15 explicitly guarantees judicial protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms (and is, from this perspective, a special provision in relation to the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution) and the right to have the consequences of their violations remedied; therefore it can have no connection with local self-government. Already at this point, the dissenting opinion of Judge Ribičič with regard to this Decision should be explicitly mentioned.

9. And, in my opinion, this is the content that one must have in mind also when interpreting the third paragraph of Article 139 of the Constitution. According to this provision, a municipality is established by law following a referendum by which the will of the residents in a particular territory is determined; the territory of the municipality is also defined by law. The interpretation of this provision is importantly affected by the legal nature of the referendum it requires. Also with regard to such, let us first have a look at what the Constitutional Court stated regarding this subject. The majority of Constitutional Court decisions [in this area] namely refer precisely to this. In Decision No. U-I-144/94, the Constitutional Court stated that the will of the residents is decisive for the establishment of a municipality, of course provided it is in accordance with the constitutional and statutory concept of a municipality.<sup>11</sup> Thereby, the referendum under the third paragraph of Article 139 is not binding, but merely requires that the National Assembly first establish the will of the voters, “it, however, lies within the competence of the National Assembly to establish a municipality and determine its territory by law, taking into account the constitutional concept, the statutory criteria, and within this framework, the will of the residents.” This position was expressed even more clearly in Decision No. U-I-183/94, dated 9 November 1994 (Official Gazette RS, No. 73/94, and OdlUS III, 122),<sup>12</sup> where the Constitutional Court stated: “Referenda in the sense of Article 139 of the Constitution namely express the will of the residents in a particular territory that is not necessarily consistent with the interests of adjacent territories and the wider public interests, which the legislature must take into consideration in defining such territorial division of the state as will enable not only the implementation of local self-government but also the fulfilment of those administrative tasks of the state which the latter will exercise through municipalities and the powers of the state vested in them. Therefore, the Constitution provides for a consultative referendum that leaves the final determination of the territory of a municipality to the legislature (emphasis added by J. S.)” However, already in this Decision the Constitutional Court added the warning that constitutional authorisations could be exceeded if the National Assembly fails to establish a municipality in a territory which fulfils the constitutional and statutory conditions and whose residents voted in favour of establishing their own municipality. This obiter dictum became the ratio decidendi in Decision No. U-I-294/98, dated 12 October 1998 (Official Gazette RS, No. 72/98, and OdlUS VII, 185), in which the Constitutional Court held that the National Assembly is bound by the will of the voters expressed in a referendum when establishing municipalities and changing their boundaries, except in the following two instances: 1) when respecting the will of

- 11 Even if we do not accept the position Prof. Šmidovnik presented at the public hearing entailing that no particular concept of a municipality follows from the Constitution, despite numerous Constitutional Court decisions, the notion of a “constitutional and statutory concept of a municipality” remains “evasive” to say the least. Such is only reinforced by the legislature’s wide margin of appreciation when filling it [with meaning]. The definition according to which a local community is a community of persons living in the territory of one or several mutually connected settlements, a particular characteristic of which is a territorial connection, on the basis of which a network of interpersonal and neighbourly relations as well as the awareness of belonging to a municipality as the fundamental territorial community are formed, and which also presupposes that the future municipality will be capable, with regard to the number of its residents and other circumstances, of independently handling local affairs, namely allows for one or another solution in the case at issue.
- 12 Also in Decision No. U-I-285/98, dated 17 September 1998 (Official Gazette RS, No. 67/98, and OdlUS VII, 160), the Constitutional Court stated, regarding the legal nature of such referendum, that through the referendum the Constitution guarantees the residents of areas where territorial changes to the network of municipalities have been proposed the right “to be heard” or to take a position regarding the proposed changes in a democratic manner.

the voters expressed in a referendum would lead to the establishment of a municipality that would not meet the constitutional and statutory provisions on municipalities, and 2) when it is objectively not possible to respect the will of the voters expressed in a referendum due to the conflicting results of referenda. Conduct contrary to referenda results also in other instances allegedly entails a violation of Article 1, the first sentence of the second paragraph of Article 3, and Articles 44 and 9 of the Constitution.

10. Is it still possible to say that a referendum is consultative and the result of the referendum is not legally binding on the legislature in accordance with this position when the Constitutional Court in the same breath speaks of a consultative referendum that remains such if the residents decide against the establishment of a municipality or other changes, while the referendum is no longer consultative if the residents of the territory in question (in the event that in the procedure for the establishment of a municipality the legislature deemed that otherwise the conditions for establishing a municipality are fulfilled and that also in the remaining part [of the municipality] the conditions exist for the further existence of a municipality) decide in favour of establishing a municipality? All of a sudden this referendum becomes legally binding on the legislature – from which we could derive that thereby a constitutional obligation to establish a municipality arises for the legislature. Such namely follows from the Constitutional Court position, whereby, if we refer to the case at issue, in my opinion, the third paragraph of Article 15 of the LSA before the adoption of the LSA-R amendment (or even before that, Article 26 of the then valid [Act regulating the procedure for establishing municipalities and municipal boundaries]) did not even require such. The LSA determined that a part of a municipality encompassing the territory of a settlement or a number of neighbouring settlements may secede from the municipality and be established as a new municipality, provided that in a referendum the majority of the voters who voted decide in favour of such and if the remaining part of the municipality also fulfils the conditions for a new municipality. By such statutory provision the legislature bound itself to the obligation not to establish a municipality in instances when it deemed that the conditions for such are fulfilled while such is opposed by the will of the residents in the affected territory. By means of its interpretation, however, the Constitutional Court in addition bound it to the obligation to establish a municipality when the will of the residents in favour of such exists, despite the explicit word “may” in the text of the law, and even though in my opinion such an obligation was not provided for. This position could only be reached on the basis of an understanding of the content of the right to local self-government that I believe to not be correct from a constitutional law perspective. In my opinion, it is not possible to say that the referendum is consultative while at the same time finding that the National Assembly is required to establish a municipality by law in the event of a “positive” result of the referendum.
11. It is interesting that the majority of legal theorists insisted on the clear position that a referendum is of a consultative nature before and after the mentioned Decision as well as in the light of the numerous statutory amendments of the LSA and the special law on the procedure for the establishment of municipalities. In 1996, Prof.

Kaučič spoke of a relative consultative referendum, even though he stated that the third paragraph of Article 139 of the Constitution “on the one hand demands the application of a referendum, while on the other hand it presupposes its consultative, i.e. non-binding power.”<sup>13</sup> While in 1998, Prof. Grad stated the following: “A municipality thus cannot be established without carrying out a referendum, therefore its use is mandatory (...). In its consequences, however, such a referendum is not binding, as it does not require the National Assembly to observe the decision adopted in the referendum. Such entails that the referendum is not legally binding on the National Assembly, which, however, does not entail that it is not politically bound by such a decision, as it is an expression of the popular will in a particular territory.”<sup>14</sup> And he added with complete clarity: “If the residents in the corresponding territories where referenda were carried out decided in favour of establishing a municipality, the National Assembly may establish it by law, but it is not obliged to do so (emphasis added by J. S.).” In the same manner, in 2002, Dr Vljaj perfectly clearly explained the following in the Commentary on the Constitution: “The referendum is of a consultative nature and does not require the [National Assembly] to establish a municipality only in accordance with the referendum result. The Constitution prescribed a consultative referendum and left the final determination of the territory of a municipality to the National Assembly (emphasis added by J. S.).”<sup>15</sup>

12. How then should, in my opinion, the third paragraph of Article 139 of the Constitution be understood? As a constitutional court judge, I certainly cannot agree that the referendum in this provision is an “error in the Constitution”, as Prof. Šmidovnik wrote,<sup>16</sup> since I have sworn to uphold the Constitution and adjudicate in accordance therewith. The constitutional law content of the relevant provision must be determined and the meaning of its integral parts and of the provision as a whole must be established. The referendum, which the National Assembly is required to call, is without a doubt intended to enable the residents to state their position regarding proposed changes in the territory of a municipality in a democratic manner, as the Constitutional Court held in Decision No. U-I-285/98. As such, it has a consultative nature that cannot legally bind the National Assembly, but it may, as is also argued by Prof. Grad, have political effects. However, the latter are not and cannot be the subject of a review of constitutionality. If the referendum result had binding legal effect, the part of the provision of the third paragraph of Article 139 of the Constitution that assigns the National Assembly the competence to establish a municipality by law would be completely nullified. This law is not a law governing a concrete case, even though such might seem to follow from it at first glance given its content that defines the boundaries of a municipality and, as Dr Šmidovnik states, accords to an individual municipality the characteristic of being part of the legal system. Such by its nature results in essential general effects. On its basis, the municipality will be able to regulate – with the power of local public authority and in a general manner – all issues in the performance of its competences, and not only its residents, but everyone falling within the scope of its authority will have to act in accordance with its regulations. On the basis of such characteristic, it will derive its original power directly from its constitutional position. Such power is not accorded by “laws governing a concrete case”. As thereby the legislature must not only keep in mind local interests, but also general interests, the legitimacy of which it was granted in a democratic manner, i.e. through elections, due to which it itself is the legitimate representative of all citizens who through it exercise their right to manage the public affairs determined by Article 44 of the Constitution, it is not [the legislature’s] right, but its competence and duty to respect local interests to such an extent as is allowed by the general interest. In adopting laws, it is, in my opinion, bound by the Constitution in an equal manner regardless of whether it regulates other issues by means of statutory content or by law accords to a municipality “the characteristic of being a part of the legal system”.

13. On the basis of all of the above, I can draw the conclusion that the right of the residents of a particular territory to have their own municipality does not derive from the constitutional definition of local self-government and that the obligation of the National Assembly to adopt a law on the establishment of a municipality if in a procedure for the establishment of a municipality the residents decide in favour of its establishment in a referendum does not derive from the Constitution. A different interpretation of the third paragraph of Article 139 of the Constitution would nullify the position of the democratically elected representative body, which is bound by the Constitution when making decisions in the legislative procedure. The deputies are representatives of all the people and are not bound by any instructions, as is determined by the first paragraph of Article 82 of the Constitution. They are, however, bound by the Constitution itself and obligated to respect it until they amend it by the prescribed procedure, as such is an elementary part of the rule of law. The Constitution, or in the case at issue the third paragraph of Article 139, however, does not require that they give priority to partial local interest in relation to general state interests, unless they themselves deem that different measures are required.
14. In past decisions, in light of the passionately debated issue of establishing a network of municipalities (which should have allegedly been concluded in 1998, even though it was evident from numerous further proposals that the process was only going to continue), the Constitutional Court stopped the “avalanche” of newly established municipalities by Decision No. U-I-103/02, dated 18 April 2002 (Official Gazette RS, No. 39/02, and OdlUS XI, 64), but from the viewpoint of the issues under consideration here, that Decision is not of essential importance, even though the Constitutional Court recognised the position of petitioner to individual local communities precisely in relation to Decision No. U-I-322/98; exactly the latter went the farthest regarding the positions that I do not agree with. What appears to be more important to me is that, in my opinion, the presented constitutional law reasons exist, i.e. the reasons on the basis of which the Constitutional Court should have changed its position on the constitutional law content of local self-government and on the constitutional law content of the third paragraph of Article 139. Unfortunately, such is also not going to be effected by the present Decision of the Constitutional Court. On the contrary, this Decision only additionally affirms the hitherto positions, with which I cannot agree.

II

15. In accordance with the principle of the separation of powers determined by the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court only restricts the National Assembly in the exercise of its legislative function from the viewpoint of constitutionality. In this sense, we speak of constitutional democracy, as in the event that unconstitutionality is established, the will expressed in a law, even though it was adopted in a procedure defined in advance and by a democratically established representative body, must give way to a higher value – the Constitution, with the Constitutional Court being the guardian thereof. Thereby the Constitutional Court must not review the political correctness of the legislature's acts and, in accordance with the principle of self-restraint, it must not encroach upon its margin of appreciation in the regulation of relationships in society. However, it may review the constitutionality of the procedure in which a law was adopted, but only in the form of a so-called a posteriori constitutional review.
16. In the case before us, the petitioners allege that the EMMBA is unconstitutional, as it does not contain provisions regarding the Municipalities of Ankara and Mirna, and the unconstitutionality is alleged to originate from the fact that in the procedure for the adoption of an amendment of this law, which has not been adopted, there allegedly occurred violations that resulted in an unconstitutionality. The Constitutional Court can assess a procedure for the adoption of a law only from the viewpoint of constitutionality on the basis of the third paragraph of Article 21 of the CCA, which entails that the Constitutional Court must have before it a regulation that it is competent to review and an assessment of the constitutionality of the procedure in which it was adopted may be a part of this review. With regard to such, in hitherto decisions the Constitutional Court as clearly as possible highlighted that in the case of a law the subject of the review can only be the constitutionality of the procedure, and not a potential violation of the rules of procedure or a law. Potential violations of laws could reach the constitutional level if we were dealing with an instance where the procedure for [adopting] a law was regulated by a special law and there could have been a violation of Article 2 of the Constitution if the legislature breached the procedural rules it had determined itself. In my opinion, however, we are not dealing with such a case. The legislative procedure regarding which the petitioners allege certain violations had been concluded (to be precise, such is not yet clear in the case of Mirna – the procedure allegedly “came to a standstill”, as the Decision states) and did not result in a valid law that could be the subject of a constitutional review. As this is the case, we cannot review the procedure for the adoption of a non-existent law. Such an independent competence namely does not derive from the third paragraph of Article 21 of the CCA, which is logical, as otherwise the competence to carry out an a priori review of the constitutionality of a law would have been established without a constitutional basis. Also a review of the National Assembly's actions that could apply the same working method as, e.g., a constitutional complaint, but which could have decisively more far-reaching consequences – an order requiring the National Assembly to adopt a law – cannot be construed in such a manner. The Constitutional Court, however, did exactly this, to be precise, it ordered [the National Assembly] to adopt a law with precisely defined content.

17. As a result, in my opinion the petitioners' statements may only be reviewed from the aspect of the [reasons] for which they can challenge the currently valid EMMBA. Such could only be unconstitutional if the petitioners demonstrated that it is unconstitutional, because it does not define Ankaran and Mirna as independent municipalities. They could only substantiate such by demonstrating that from the Constitution (from Articles 138 and 139 of the Constitution) there derives the obligation to establish these two municipalities. As in my opinion, in accordance with the reasons presented above, such does not derive from the Constitution, it is not possible to address such allegations to the currently valid EMMBA.
18. It is true that the currently valid EMMBA contains an unconstitutionality in relation to Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-301/98, dated 17 September 1998 (Official Gazette RS, No. 67/98, and OdlUS VII, 157) – the Municipality of Koper is unconstitutional, as according to the position the Constitutional Court took in the cited Decision its territory considerably exceeds the territory of the city and its direct surroundings, as it also includes the deep hinterland with settlements that do not belong to the suburban area. With regard to such, the Constitutional Court held that while the second paragraph of Article 139 of the Constitution provides the legislature with a relatively broad margin of appreciation, it does not allow for such evident deviations as are present in the case of the Urban Municipality of Koper. The Decision in the case at issue does not state a position regarding the presented arguments in relation to the cited Decision. Even though in Order No. U-I-245/06, dated 29 May 2008, the Constitutional Court again notified the legislature of the violation of Article 2 and the second sentence of the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution, as the legislature had not yet remedied this unconstitutionality, I believe that that Decision has no effect on the Decision in the case at issue, as the petitioners do not have legal interest to again establish the same unconstitutionality. Namely, no obligation to establish precisely the Municipality of Ankaran derives from Decision No. U-I-301/98.<sup>17</sup> Therefore, regardless of what position one takes with regard to Decision No. U-I-301/98, even if the Constitutional Court were to establish the same unconstitutionality once again, such would still not lead to the result that the petitioners are seeking.<sup>18</sup> With regard to the Municipality of Mirna, no such elements even exist.

17 As is evident from the dissenting opinion of Judge Krivic with regard to the cited Decision, the petitioner allegedly contended that in addition to the proposed establishment of three municipalities (i.e. the Municipalities of Ankaran-Škofije, Dekani, and Šmarje-Marezige), the proposal should have included five even smaller municipalities, while leaving Ankaran in the Municipality of Koper.

19. The Constitutional Court thus, in my opinion, does not have at its disposal appropriate constitutional law arguments and tools on the basis of which it could agree with the petitioners, establish the unconstitutionality of the EMMBA because it does not provide for the establishment of the Municipalities of Ankaran and Mirna, and order the National Assembly to adopt a law with precisely such content. The National Assembly may establish the Municipalities of Ankaran and Mirna. Such falls within the margin of its appreciation and its responsibility for the quality of local self-government, but it may not be ordered to do so by the Constitutional Court. Therefore, I voted against the first two points of the operative provisions of the Decision.

III

20. As the Constitutional Court issued an order and suspended elections in the Municipalities of Koper and Mirna, it could by no means avoid future decision-making regarding this question. Therefore, I may even have been able to agree with the mere abrogation of the act calling the elections in these two municipalities, as nothing else can be done at the moment. However, I also voted against the third point of the operative provisions, because I disagree with the other parts of the Decision. The fourth point is the continuation of the first and second points, with which I do not agree. In the fifth point, however, the Constitutional Court intervened with the principle of periodic elections. Already in Decision No. U-I-106/95, dated 25 January 1996,<sup>19</sup> by which the Constitutional Court decided on the constitutionality of the so-called national lists, it defined certain fundamental principles of elections. It outlined that in the field of elections, the principles of free, universal, and equal suffrage as well as of direct and secret elections derive from the principle of democracy in relation to indirect (representative) democracy; if the election system corresponds to the listed principles and if the periodic nature of elections and the equal right of all political parties in the state to compete are guaranteed by law, the elections are democratic.<sup>20</sup> “Alongside human rights and the rule of law, democracy is one of the three pillars of the European constitutional heritage [...]. Democracy is inconceivable without elections held in accordance with certain principles that lend them their democratic status. These principles represent a specific aspect of the European constitutional heritage that can legitimately be termed the ‘European electoral heritage’. This heritage comprises two aspects, the first, the hard core, being the constitutional principles of electoral law such as universal, equal, free, secret and direct suffrage, and the second the principle that truly democratic elections can only be held

18 Prof. Čebulj presented the reasons why the establishment of the Municipality of Ankaran would not entail remedying the unconstitutionality established by Decision No. U-I-301/98 in an opinion on the constitutional law framework of the establishment of the Municipality of Ankaran, which was provided by the Urban Municipality of Koper.

19 Official Gazette RS, No. 14/96, and OdlUS V, 12.

20 Paragraph 7 of the reasoning of the cited Decision.

if certain basic conditions of a democratic state based on the rule of law, such as fundamental rights, stability of electoral law and effective procedural guarantees, are met.” In this manner and six years after the Constitutional Court defined the fundamental electoral principles in the same manner the Venice Commission welcomed by an Explanatory Report the adoption of the new Code of Good Practice in Electoral Matters (adopted 5–6 July 2002), which already in the introduction supplements the five fundamental principles with the requirement of periodic elections. The introduction to point I, entitled Principles of Europe’s electoral heritage, namely reads as follows: “The five principles underlying Europe’s electoral heritage are universal, equal, free, secret and direct suffrage. Furthermore, elections must be held at regular intervals (emphasis added by J. S.)” Why this is the case was amply explained by Prof. Jambrek when he stated that “The competences and functions of state authorities must be legitimated in such a manner that they originate in the people and that they are an expression of the will of the people reached in a definable manner. There must namely exist an uninterrupted chain of democratic legitimacy and appropriate responsibility running from the people towards the state authority and from the latter back to its origin.”<sup>21</sup> And precisely the latter is ensured by elections held at regular intervals, also at the level of local self-government. Therefore, the principle of periodic elections is not only a principle, it is an integral part of the right to vote as such, which completely clearly also follows from Article 3 of Protocol No. 1 to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms,<sup>22</sup> which determines as follows: “The High Contracting Parties undertake to hold free elections at reasonable intervals (emphasis added by J. S.) by secret ballot, under conditions which will ensure the free expression of the opinion of the people in the choice of the legislature.” That the principle of periodic elections is an integral part of the right to vote is also stated in the Decision. Such entails a human right, which the Constitutional Court considered in Decision No. U-I-163/99, dated 23 September 1999 (Official Gazette RS, No. 80/99, and OdlUS VIII, 209), when it held that the periodicity of elections must be given precedence over the otherwise established unconstitutionality of the statutory regulation with regard to the establishment of the municipality under Decision No. U-I-301/98.

21. Also in the case at issue, the Constitutional Court interfered with a constitutional right of the voters in the territories of the Municipality of Koper and the Municipality of Trebnje. In my opinion, the Constitutional Court has to be extremely careful with regard to such interferences with this political human right. Especially following Decision No. U-I-163/99, it must carry out a constitutional law weighing of the conflicting values, whereby, in light of the above, for me the periodicity of elections ranks high on the ladder of constitutional values, as it concerns the very foundations of the democratic order. In the light of such, I voted against point 5 of the operative provisions of the Decision.

I voted for the operative provisions of this Decision as a whole, but I would like to stress that by no means do I support the further breaking up of the territory of Slovenia into municipalities.

The Decision (in Paragraph 20 of the reasoning) summarises the position of the Constitutional Court from the beginning of the process of establishing local self-government in Slovenia as that it is the task of a state governed by the rule of law to set up a regulation according to which this process is to be carried out in a legally regulated and foreseeable manner (Decision No. U-I-13/94, dated 21 January 1994). The establishment of this legal framework is the National Assembly's responsibility and, as far as the question of the appropriateness of the criteria and rules of the procedure are concerned, it falls within its margin of appreciation. The Constitutional Court may not interfere with this margin of appreciation. It may, however, review constitutional law questions with regard to the observance of the prescribed criteria and the implementation of the procedure for establishing municipalities. I would like to emphasise that it is the National Assembly's political and professional responsibility to lay down reasonable and developmentally appropriate conditions for the formation and functioning of local self-government and that it is its responsibility under constitutional law to observe and implement these conditions to the letter. Even though such concerns the legislature, its responsibility to observe existing norms cannot be any less than that of everyone else.

From hitherto Constitutional Court positions it follows that all questions in relation to the fulfilment of the conditions for establishing a municipality have to be resolved in the procedure leading up to a referendum, including by means of judicial protection, which is also summarised in the reasoning of this Decision (Paragraph 18 of the reasoning, Decision No. U-I-322/98, dated 15 March 2001). It is precisely the quality of the implementation of this part of the procedure that is essential for controlling the process of establishing local self-government and its further organisation. Regardless of the announcement of a policy change and regardless of the already amended procedure for future potential changes to the network of municipalities, the appropriate preparation of the "new municipality" project is a substantial precondition for the quality of the development and functioning of local self-government.

In order to create municipalities that are capable of performing their tasks effectively and for the benefit of the residents of their territory, a thorough and comprehensive assessment procedure has to be carried out, in which the National Assembly must adopt its finding of either the fulfilment or non-fulfilment of the criteria for the establishment of a municipality on the basis of expert information and analyses of all relevant issues regarding the establishment of a municipality. An examination of the parliamentary materials does not demonstrate such. Regardless of the applicant's identity, the submitted proposals for new municipalities should be strictly and comprehensively reviewed already in the first stage of the procedure in order to establish if they fulfil the predetermined statutory criteria for the existence and functioning of a municipality as a community of residents that enables the realisation of common needs at the local level. Already at this stage, it is also necessary to examine the wider aspects, i.e. the effects in the region, as well as at the national level. Regarding such, I particularly underline the public finance perspective, since the National Assembly should be particularly diligent in ensuring that the existence and functioning of municipalities is to be based on the constitutional principle of their self-financing in accordance with Article 142 of the Constitution and Article 9 of the European Charter of Local Self-Government (Official Gazette RS, No. 57/96, MP, No. 15/96 – ECLSG). Only when the National Assembly finds, on the basis of conclusions supported by data, that the proposed municipality fulfils the statutorily determined criteria so that it will function effectively and perform its constitutionally defined tasks may it proceed to the calling of a referendum, at which the will of the residents in the area is to be established. The National Assembly cannot pass the responsibility for the establishment of a new municipality and its future functioning on to the residents of the area at issue. It has to perform its part of the constitutional and statutory tasks of the “new municipality” project responsibly. However, once the National Assembly is already in the stage of the procedure for establishing or setting up a municipality where a referendum has been called, such entails that it has already applied and exhausted its substantive jurisdiction to establish a municipality. The return of the National Assembly to a previous stage of the procedure is no longer possible, as it has already taken decisions by which it itself is also bound in the remaining part of the procedure (Venire contra factum proprium nemini licet). Therefore, from here on only the question of the consideration of the will of the residents of a particular territory remains. Only such can still influence the implementation of the legislative competence of the National Assembly. The will that the residents express in the referendum is thus a signpost for the implementation of the final stage of the National Assembly’s constitutional competence in the procedure for establishing a new municipality and determining its territory by law. I am convinced that the National Assembly can only prevent the excessive breaking up of the territory of Slovenia into municipalities by respecting the statutorily determined criteria and conditions as well as strict assessment of the information necessary for the establishment of a municipality. The voting on the operative provisions of this Decision of the Constitutional Court, which will eventually bring about two new municipalities, might at first glance contain an inconsistency. However, the Constitutional Court cannot substitute for the National Assembly as regards its most important competence regarding the establishment of a municipality, i.e. in the assessment of the fulfilment of the criteria and conditions for the establishment of a municipality. In the case at issue, the conduct of the National Assembly did not correspond to the constitutional law criteria, as is exhaustively and reasonably substantiated in the reasoning of the Decision. Therefore, in spite of my opposition to the further breaking up of municipalities into smaller pieces, I cannot find a constitutional law basis for voting against the operative provisions of this Decision.

DECISION

At a session held on 3 February 2011 in proceedings to review constitutionality initiated upon the request of a group of deputies of the National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

The Act on Guarantees of the Republic of Slovenia for the Purpose of Maintaining Financial Stability in the Euro Area (Official Gazette RS, No. 59/10) is not inconsistent with the Constitution.

*ReasoningA

1. A group of thirty-seven deputies of the National Assembly (hereinafter referred to as the applicants) requests a review of the constitutionality of the Act on Guarantees of the Republic of Slovenia for the Purpose of Maintaining Financial Stability in the Euro Area (hereinafter referred to as the AGMFSEA). The applicants allege that the challenged Act is inconsistent with Articles 2 and 3, the second paragraph of Article 120, and Articles 148, 149, and 153 of the Constitution. The applicants allege that a special act should be adopted for every guarantee granted in the framework of maintaining financial stability in the euro area, unlike in the case under consideration, where only the AGMFSEA, which determines only the total amount and duration of guarantees while not providing for other elements mandatory for guarantees, was adopted for all future guarantees. The AGMFSEA is therefore allegedly inconsistent with Article 149 of the Constitution, which allegedly requires that all guarantees be precise and permitted on the basis of law. The challenged Act also allegedly encroaches upon the position of the National Assembly and violates the principle of the separation of powers determined in Article 3 of the Constitution and the principle of proportionality determined in Article 2 of the Constitution, as its role is allegedly excessively reduced to merely being informed of granted guarantees in accordance with individually adopted funding programmes. As funds for the commitments adopted under the AGMFSEA were allocated in neither the 2010 nor 2011 budgets, whereas Article 5 of the Public Finance Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 79/99 as amended – hereinafter referred to as the PFA) stipulates that the amount of borrowing and all planned state guarantees, borrowing requirements of the public sector at the central government level in an individual year, other elements stipulated by the Act, and the special powers of the Government and the ministry responsible for finance in implementing the budget for an individual year shall be laid down by the act on the implementation of the state budget, the AGMFSEA is also inconsistent with Article 148 of the Constitution. The applicants further state that the guarantees granted under the AGMFSEA lack the fundamental elements required under the Code of Obligations (Official Gazette RS, No. 97/07 – official consolidated text; hereinafter referred to as the CO) for guarantees. In the opinion of the applicants, a guarantee is an ancillary obligation conditional on the existence of a principal obligation, whereas in this case the principal obligation does not yet exist or, as they allege, is a future, imprecisely determined, and uncertain obligation. Moreover, the debtor is allegedly imprecisely determined as well, and the guarantee will not be granted to a debtor but to the company specified in Article 1 of the AGMFSEA. The applicants therefore allege that the AGMFSEA is imprecise, unclear, and inconsistent with Article 2 of the Constitution.

2. In its reply to the request, the National Assembly states that in the course of the legislative procedure, amendments were adopted which altered the wording so that the Act now refers to one guarantee, not multiple guarantees. The AGMFSEA allegedly determines the procedure for granting the guarantee and clearly defines the interference with the position of the persons to whom it refers by limiting the absolute amount of the guarantee. In the opinion of the National Assembly, this satisfies the principle of clarity and precision under Article 2 of the Constitution. Concerning the allegation of the applicants that the conditions required for a guarantee under the CO have not been taken into consideration, the National Assembly believes that they are not applicable, as this does not entail a question of constitutionality but one of the relationship between two acts. Notwithstanding this, the CO allegedly addresses guarantees for future liabilities and in the case of the AGMFSEA, both conditions stemming from Article 1016 of the CO are allegedly fulfilled, i.e. the precision of the liability and the precision of the time in which the liability should originate. The National Assembly further notes that the challenged Act has allowed the Republic of Slovenia to participate in the financial aid mechanism, while at the same time the Republic of Slovenia contributed to the financial stability of the euro. It states that the principle of cooperation in good faith and observance of Article 3a of the Constitution prevailed in the decision to participate in the European mechanism and to adopt the challenged Act.
3. The Government of the Republic of Slovenia submitted an opinion on the request for a review of constitutionality opposing the positions of the applicants with regard to the nonconformity of the challenged provisions with the Constitution. It is of the opinion that the civil-law regulations which govern the guarantee are not legally relevant in reviewing the consistency of the AGMFSEA with the Constitution. A guarantee in the sense of Article 149 of the Constitution should allegedly be interpreted independently, taking into account that a state guarantee has a multitude of public-law elements, which allegedly entails that CO rules may be used as supporting materials, but are not essential to the interpretation of this constitutional notion. Regarding the applicants' allegation of the absence of an ancillary character in the guarantee under the AGMFSEA, the Government states that even if this was a civil-law guarantee, Slovene law provides for derogations from the rule that a guarantee must be ancillary. It emphasises that the guarantee under the AGMFSEA is a single guarantee, not multiple guarantees as the applicants mistakenly state, but is granted for multiple liabilities, which is allegedly the norm for state guarantees. The Government is of the opinion that an interpretation of Article 149 of the Constitution which would require the adoption of a special law for every single liability in cases such as this one, where a single guarantee is being granted for all liabilities, would be too narrow and render it impossible to create a system that would allow the state to respond rapidly. The Government calls for an interpretation of Article 149 of the Constitution whereby an act creates merely a basis for subsequent implementing regulations, i.e. so-called guarantee agreements, and determines in abstract terms the conditions for borrowing and guarantees, as these conditions were allegedly intentionally left out of the original wording of Article 149 of the Constitution. The Government is also of the opinion that the AGMFSEA is clear and precise in that it provides enough elements with regard to liabilities originating from the guarantee that the liability may be considered to be precise. It alleges that the total amount of the guarantee, the types of transactions for which the guarantee is being granted, and the debtor, i.e. the Luxembourg-based European Financial Stability Facility, Société anonyme, are all precisely determined. Furthermore, the purpose for which the guarantee is being granted is also allegedly determined.

4. The reply of the National Assembly and the opinion of the Government were sent to the applicants, who responded to them. They disagree with the claims of the Government and the National Assembly that they are alleging the nonconformity of the AGMFSEA with the CO, they do, however, insist that the AGMFSEA is unclear and imprecise as the guarantee is being granted for a future, uncertain, and imprecisely determined liability, which they allege the CO does not permit for a guarantee. They reiterate that a special act should be adopted for every individual guarantee, not only the AGMFSEA as the framework act for all guarantees to be granted under the European mechanism. This will allegedly result in an encroachment on the powers of the National Assembly and a violation of the principle of the separation of powers determined in Article 3 of the Constitution.

Starting Point for Constitutional Court Review

5. Money is coined liberty.<sup>1</sup> The existence of money is a necessary condition for a functioning economy in which goods are traded with money acting as the medium.<sup>2</sup> The value of money is tied to and dependent on society. It is determined by decisions of monetary authorities and financial policy, while also being affected by individuals, who are holders of human rights and fundamental freedoms. Of particular importance are prices, loans, interest rates, economic forecasts, valuations, etc. The external value of money depends on the relationship between the national currency and other currencies, and their sovereign, economic, and social foundations. It is this interdependence that makes it impossible for a state to constitutionally guarantee the value of money. Just as the right to private property determined in Article 33 of the Constitution can guarantee only freedom of conduct in the field of property rights (Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-199/02, dated 21 October 2004, Official Gazette RS, No. 124/04, and OdlUS XIII, 65) for the person offering property, while having no bearing on the demand for the offered property, in monetary affairs the state can only provide institutional frameworks for money, but it cannot guarantee its value.

6. When the Republic of Slovenia adopted the euro as its currency,<sup>3</sup> the sovereign guarantor vouching for the stability and convertibility of money changed, as did the legal framework providing for the freedom associated with money. In this era of economic and monetary union, these are issues that, at least insofar as monetary policy is concerned, are in the exclusive domain of the European Union (hereinafter: the EU),<sup>4</sup> but economic policy issues have nevertheless remained in the domain of the Member States. A separation of powers traditionally exercised by the state has thus occurred between the EU and the Member States.<sup>5</sup>
7. The Treaty of the European Union (consolidated version, Official Journal C 83, dated 30 March 2010 – hereinafter referred to as the TEU) bound Member States to continue the process of creating an ever closer union among the peoples of Europe. It follows from the preamble to the TEU that the Member States are firmly resolved to achieving the strengthening and convergence of their economies and to establishing an economic and monetary union including a single and stable currency. The EU's objectives listed in Article 3 again make mention of the economic and monetary union whose currency is the euro. The EU shall strive for sustainable development of Europe based on balanced economic growth and price stability. Economic policy, although not in the exclusive domain of the EU as is monetary policy, has become a matter of common interest and is carried out in the context of broad guidelines adopted by the Council of the EU (Article 120 of the TFEU). Following accession to the EU and the adoption of the euro, the Republic of Slovenia and its economy is no longer the sole guarantor of money, the guarantors now are the members of the euro area and their economies. The Government and the National Assembly are thus subjects which must adopt their economic decisions in a manner that contributes to the objectives pursued by the EU. In view of the membership of the Republic of Slovenia in the monetary union, however, even the Government and the National Assembly cannot evaluate the economic, social, and political factors and forecasts of future economic trends independently; they must act in conjunction with other Member States.

8. As the euro is the single currency, the bankruptcy of one of the participating Member States may jeopardise not only the euro as a single currency, but also the economies of the participating Member States. The state of the monetary system is a symptom of the state of society and its economy as a whole.<sup>6</sup> It is precisely because the euro is a single currency that coordination among participating Member States is all the more necessary. This is in keeping with the principle of sincere cooperation among Member States (the third paragraph of Article 4 of the TEU) which respect each other and provide each other assistance in fulfilling the tasks and objectives that the EU pursues. It therefore follows that in a case such as the case under consideration, which involves the interdependence of the Member States and their economies, concerted action among euro area Member States is required even though the conduct of the Member States is based on their national competences.
9. It needs to be taken into account that long-term economic impacts and their consequences on the stability of money cannot be evaluated based on a single intervention, they must be monitored on an ongoing basis and continually verified. This is, however, a task for the government and legislature, not the courts. Since it is impossible to predict with certainty how the market will react and what the future development will be, political actors need to be given broad enough discretion in their decisions. As a consequence, constitutional review of such issues is by necessity reserved.
10. It was based on these starting points, with due consideration of the necessity of the euro area Member States to take concerted action with regard to measures to ensure the financial stability of the euro area, and in view of the current period of severe economic crisis and downturn that has affected economic growth and financial stability, worsening the debt and deficit positions of the Member States, that the Constitutional Court reviewed the alleged unconstitutionality of the AGMFSEA.

European Financial Stabilisation Mechanism

11. The AGMFSEA regulates the equity participation of the Republic of Slovenia in the joint-stock company founded for the purposes of funding financial stability in the euro area in accordance with the resolutions of the Council of the EU (ECOFIN) dated 7 May 2010, and the granting of guarantees by the Republic of Slovenia for the liabilities of this company. The Act thus allowed the Republic of Slovenia to participate in the special mechanism created by the euro area Member States to safeguard the financial stability of the area. The EU's previous institutional arrangements had not provided for an effective mechanism of financial assistance to the Member States whose common currency is the euro (the members of the euro area). The EU only had a mechanism, created by Council Regulation 332/2002,<sup>7</sup> for balance of payments financial assistance for states which have not yet introduced the euro,<sup>8</sup> which had been adopted pursuant to Article 143 of the TFEU.

12. Therefore, at the 7 May 2010 meeting of euro area Member States, the heads of state or government decided to create a special mechanism for financial assistance to euro area Member States in the event that a Member State cannot secure sufficient financing on the market. The mechanism comprises two elements: 1) a regulation on the European financial stabilisation mechanism and 2) a standing-by-facility which, under an agreement made between the members of the euro area, will be based on a special-purpose vehicle (Ger.: Zweckgesellschaft). The financial arrangement also includes the International Monetary Fund (hereinafter referred to as the IMF), which is to contribute a sum equalling at least a half of the EU's contribution via its established mechanisms.<sup>9</sup>
13. At an extraordinary session held on 10 May 2010, the Council of the EU (ECOFIN), acting on the proposal of the European Commission pursuant to the second paragraph of Article 122 of the TFEU,<sup>10</sup> adopted Regulation No. 407/2010 establishing a European financial stabilisation mechanism (OJ L 118, 12 May 2010, pp. 1–4 – hereinafter referred to as Regulation No. 407/2010). The regulation provides for financial assistance to the Member State concerned, contracted on the capital markets by the European Commission on behalf of the EU, limited to the margin available under the own resources ceiling for payment appropriations (Article 2 of Regulation No. 407/2010), which equals approximately EUR 60 billion. At the same extraordinary session of the Council of the EU (ECOFIN) on 10 May 2010, it was agreed that euro area Member States would establish a special-purpose vehicle to contract borrowings or issue debt securities with the purpose of providing financial assistance in the form of loans to euro area Member States with the guarantee of other euro area Member States. The challenged AGMFSEA was adopted to provide for the participation of the Republic of Slovenia in the special-purpose vehicle, not for the implementation of the measures pursuant to Regulation No. 407/2010. In accordance with Article 288 of the TFEU, a regulation has general application, which means it is binding in its entirety and directly applicable in all Member States. This means that the Member States do not transpose adopted and published regulations into their national law.<sup>11</sup>

The special-purpose vehicle with the registered name European Financial Stability Facility, société anonyme (hereinafter referred to as the EFSF)<sup>12</sup> was founded on 7 June 2010 by the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg acting as sole partner in order to speed up its incorporation.<sup>13</sup> All euro area Member States reaffirmed their commitment to participate in the mechanism. To this end, the Member States and the EFSF signed the EFSF Framework Agreement, which determines the conditions under which the EFSF may make loans to euro area Member States in financial difficulties, the conditions for the funding of such loans by issuing or contracting debt securities, loans and financing arrangements, and the terms and conditions under which the euro area Member States issue guarantees for the debt securities, loans, and other financing arrangements issued by, contracted by, or entered into by the EFSF.<sup>14</sup> EFSF shares will be transferred to other Member States once they have completed all the requisite internal procedures. The company is incorporated under Luxembourg law. The EFSF was founded with a subscribed capital of EUR 31,000<sup>15</sup> and authorised share capital of EUR 30 million.<sup>16</sup> The equity share of the Republic of Slovenia in the EFSF is 0.4711%,<sup>17</sup> equalling the share of the Bank of Slovenia in the capital of the European Central Bank (hereinafter referred to as the ECB), with regard to which only the euro area Member States are taken into consideration.<sup>18</sup> Each euro area Member State is to have one member on the EFSF Board of Directors, the financial assistance mechanism will be operational for three years or until 30 June 2013, and the EFSF will be dissolved and liquidated when it has received full payment of the funding granted to the Member States, and its liabilities under the debt securities issued, loans contracted, and other financing arrangements issued with the guarantees of euro area Member States, and any guarantor liabilities thereunder, have been fully repaid.

ing economic policy management with the borrower, which will be written down in a memorandum of understanding and will need to be fulfilled or shown as being fulfilled by the borrower as a condition for receiving the loan. After the approval of the memorandum of understanding, the European Commission, in liaison with the ECB, will present to a Eurogroup<sup>19</sup> working group a proposal of the main terms of the loan agreement, which will take into consideration the current financial market conditions and the terms determined in the memorandum of understanding. When the Eurogroup working group confirms the main terms of the loan agreement, the EFSF, in liaison with the Eurogroup working group, will negotiate the other (detailed) terms of the loan agreement with the borrower. The loan agreement with the borrower will be signed by the EFSF subject to prior unanimous approval by all guarantor Member States.

16. The EFSF, in liaison with the Eurogroup working group, will structure a funding programme that includes the key funding terms (interest, maturity, currency, etc.) under which the EFSF may borrow, issue debt securities, or enter into other financing arrangements to obtain funding in order to fund the making of loans in accordance with the loan agreement. The funding programme is unanimously approved by all guarantor states. In the event that a guarantee is enforced, each guarantor state will contribute to the indemnification of creditors in proportion to its respective share of the issued guarantee (pro rata pari passu). These are individual, not joint guarantees.<sup>20</sup> In the event that a guarantor state cannot fulfil its obligations under the granted guarantee, other guarantor states will cover its share of the liability to creditors (but only up to a maximum of their share of the liability increased by 20%). These guarantor states can then attempt to recover a part of the unfulfilled obligation under the granted guarantee from the stepping out guarantor state. In the event that a guarantee is enforced because a borrower cannot repay its loans, the EFSF will assign or transfer its claim with respect to the borrower to the guarantor states in proportion to the fulfilled obligations stemming from the guarantee of each guarantor state.<sup>21</sup>
17. The euro area Member States which participate in the special-purpose vehicle and thus in the established mechanism as a general rule adopt decisions unanimously. However, in accordance with the fifth paragraph of Article 10 of the EFSF Framework Agreement, unanimity means a positive or negative vote of all guarantors which are present and participate in the relevant decision, provided that any Member State which is not participating in a guarantee is not entitled to vote on any decision to make a new loan agreement. It is a precondition of the validity of any such vote that a quorum of a majority of the Member States able to vote whose guarantee commitments represent no less than two-thirds of the total guaranteed commitments are present at the meeting. Other (less important) decisions are adopted by a two-thirds majority, in accordance with the sixth paragraph of Article 10 of the EFSF Framework Agreement.

State Borrowings (Article 149 of the Constitution)

18. The applicants allege that the challenged AGMFSEA encroaches on the position of the National Assembly; in their opinion a special act should be adopted by the National Assembly for each individual guarantee. Currently, however, the Government will adopt all decisions with respect to the guarantees and inform the National Assembly thereof quarterly. In the opinion of the applicants, the AGMFSEA is therefore inconsistent with Article 3, the second paragraph of Article 120, the third paragraph of Article 153, and Article 149 of the Constitution.
19. The constitutional provision on state borrowing in Article 149 of the Constitution is – with regard to the relationship between the legislature and the executive and their powers, and hence with regard to the relationship to the second paragraph of Article 120 and the third and fourth paragraphs of Articles 153 of the Constitution – a special provision inasmuch as it refers only to state borrowings. The Constitutional Court, therefore, reviewed the alleged unconstitutionality of the AGMFSEA from the viewpoint of this constitutional provision.
20. Article 149 of the Constitution determines that state borrowings and state guarantees for loans are only permitted on the basis of law. This provision is part of Chapter VI of the Constitution, which regulates the complete system of public finances and state financing. Taxes and other charges form the bedrock of public finances and hence of state financing.<sup>22</sup> Articles 146 and 147 of the Constitution provide for the full fiscal sovereignty of the state, which encompasses the power and the right to create sources of fiscal revenue, enforce its collection, and determine the amount thereof (see also Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-233/97, dated 15 July 1999, Official Gazette RS, No. 61/99, and OdlUS VIII, 188). The second method of financing state expenditure is borrowing. When the state does so is a political and not a legal issue.<sup>23</sup> Whereas the financing of state expenditure by taxes and other charges is carried out in the present,<sup>24</sup> financing through borrowing entails a deferral of the burden to the future,<sup>25</sup> to subsequent budgetary periods. Borrowing thus affects future budgets and hence future assets and revenue from taxes and other charges, and, consequently, future decisions on state expenditure,<sup>26</sup> which requires that the matter be regulated at the level of the Constitution.<sup>27</sup> The Constitution regulates this issue in Article 149.

22 German legal theory refers to it as the Steuerstaatsprinzip. See C. Seiler, Konsolidierung der Staatsfinanzen mithilfe der neuen Schuldenregel, Juristenzeitung, Volume 64, No. 14 (2009), p. 722.

24 According to Musgrave, this is the pay-as-you-use rule. R. A. Musgrave, Should we have a capital budget?, The Review of Economics and Statistics, Volume 45, No. 2 (1963), pp. 134–137.

25 H. Kube, Artikel 115 (October 2009), in: T. Maunz and G. Dürig (eds.), Grundgesetz Kommentar, Band VII, Artikel 107–146, Verlag C. H. Beck, Munich, p. 11.

26 These are the anticipated material effects (sachliche Vorgriffswirkung). C. Seiler, ibidem, p. 722.

27 The future effects of borrowing are one of the principal reasons, according to legal theory, for institutional control of state borrowing. For details, see H. Fischer-Menshausen, Artikel 115, in: I. von Münch and P. Kunig

21. Article 149 of the Constitution uses the words and phrases “state borrowings”, “guarantees by the state for loans”, “permitted”, and “on the basis of law”. This raises the questions of what the subject of this constitutional provision entails and what constitutional law demands arise thereby. In Article 149, the Constitution does not create an explicit authority for the state to borrow, it merely permits borrowing in principle, just as Article 147 of the Constitution determines that the state imposes taxes, customs duties, and other charges by law. From a constitutional law perspective, therefore, the decisive issue is not the permissibility of borrowing but its limits.

State Guarantees for Loans

22. With regard to the terms used in Article 149 of the Constitution, it is not possible to draw on their civil-law definitions where, for example, the term guarantee (Lat. fideiussio) is defined as the guarantor’s obligation to honour the debtor’s obligation if the debtor is unable to do so itself.<sup>28</sup> Even though the terms are linguistically equal to the civil law terms, they need to be given independent meaning and defined as a constitutional law category based on the intention of the constitution framers and taking into account the nature of state borrowings and guarantees. These are important instruments of economic<sup>29</sup> and fiscal<sup>30</sup> policy that affect economic development,<sup>31</sup> which requires that the terms loan and guarantee be interpreted broadly and that it be allowed, with an appropriate breadth of meaning, that the mentioned terms also include new instruments that will be created on the market in the future and facilities that the law and economic policy do not yet recognise at present.
23. Given this starting point, the term state guarantees for loans needs to be defined as any category of security or guarantee under which the state assumes the risk of (potential) liability for third-party liabilities, thus affecting the scope of borrowing (public debt) and, by extension, the amount of state assets.<sup>32</sup> Such an effect may be achieved with a variety of instruments, including surety, guarantee, lien, letter of comfort, etc., whereby the legal form (structure) for assuming liabilities is not constitutionally relevant. What various state guarantees generally have in common is that they do not always correspond to civil law instruments,<sup>33</sup> they are hybrid legal acts with elements of multiple legal acts, or an individual security may combine civil-law and public-law elements. The fundamental difference between loans and guarantees in the sense of Article 149 of the Constitution is that loans create a direct and unconditional liability to repay the funds, whereas guarantees create a conditional liability<sup>34</sup> incumbent upon the state which is realised only in the event of a third party reneging on its liability. This means that guarantees may have financial consequences for future budgets, but not necessarily so. The difference is also reflected in the budget, as loans must be stated or planned in the budget in their entirety, whereas for guarantees only an amount corresponding to the likely due liabilities of the state arising thereunder in the budget period must be determined. However, this amount is only a portion of the entire amount of liabilities arising from the state guarantee. At the same time, this does not entail that a guarantee is not a constituent part of the public debt.

On the Basis of Law

24. In its essence, Article 149 of the Constitution is a procedural provision which regulates the legal form and power regarding the adoption of a decision on state borrowings and state guarantees for loans. State borrowings and guarantees require a special decision by the National Assembly in the form of an act. This means that what is required is a special legislative decision under which the financial burden is actually or potentially transferred to the future, while at the same time Article 149 of the Constitution provides for the fundamental power of the National Assembly (the current as well as future terms) to decide on state revenue and expenditure, taking into account the fundamental human rights and freedoms of the present and future generations, as well as the principles of a state governed by the rule of law and a social state. Article 149 of the Constitution furthermore ensures special disclosure of state borrowings and guarantees in accordance with the principles of democracy and the rule of law.<sup>35</sup>
25. It does not follow from the linguistic meaning of Article 149 of the Constitution that it determines substantive (material) conditions or limitations to which state borrowings and guarantees might be bound.<sup>36</sup> However, this does not mean that an act on the basis of which a state guarantee is assumed may be devoid of substance or that the National Assembly may give the Government unlimited power to assume state guarantees or to borrow. The constitutional requirement for the adoption of a law on the basis of which the state may borrow needs to be understood as a requirement that (future) obligations be precise or at least determinable. It is not the implementing instruments (for example, a guarantee agreement) that must make the liability incumbent upon the state clear and predictable, but the act by which the state assumes the guarantee. This also follows from the principle of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution) and the principle of the legality of the operation of the state administration (the second paragraph of Article 120 of the Constitution). The demand for precision or determinability ensures that a decision on borrowing is always adopted by the National Assembly itself and that the National Assembly does not transfer this decision with general and unlimited authority to the executive branch. Determinability requires that it is possible to infer from the legal facts of the matter what the future liabilities of the state will be and what purpose is being realised by the borrowing; in any event, liabilities must be specified in terms of amount, either in explicit terms or as a percentage of a specific amount (for example, the total budget). The latter follows from the principle of a social state (Article 2 of the Constitution), which requires that at any moment, including for the future generations which will bear the burden of present borrowing, the state must ensure a social minimum that comprises not only minimum subsistence but a minimum which ensures opportunities for the fostering of human interactions and for participation in social, cultural, and political affairs. At the same time, this is an upper limit that, despite the absence of an explicit constitutional provision on a borrowing ceiling,<sup>37</sup> The legislature may not disregard and may not encumber the state with so much debt that it would jeopardise the social state.

<sup>36</sup> This follows from the draft materials of the Constitution. A provision that tied borrowing to a substantive condition ("Loans may be taken out only for extraordinary budget expenditure.") was deleted from the draft Constitution, while such a condition was not foreseen for guarantees in any phase of the framing of the Constitution. M. Cerar and A. Perenič (eds.), Nastajanje slovenske ustave: izbor gradiv Komisije za ustavna vprašanja [The Creation of the Slovene Constitution: A Selection of Materials of the Commission for Constitutional Questions] 1990–1991, Volume III, National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia, Ljubljana 2001, p. 1139.

Review of the AGMFSEA

26. Article 1 of the AGMFSEA determines that the Act regulates the equity participation of the Republic of Slovenia in the EFSF and the assuming of guarantees for its liabilities. The applicants do not challenge the equity participation in the EFSF; accordingly the Constitutional Court limited the review of conformity with the Constitution to the regulation of guarantees for EFSF liabilities.
27. Substantively, Articles 3, 4, and 5 of the AGMFSEA regulate what was determined by the EFSF Framework Agreement, which the euro area Member States concluded with the EFSF. Pursuant to the first paragraph of Article 3 of the AGMFSEA, the Republic of Slovenia grants an irrevocable and unconditional guarantee for all funding instruments in the framework of the funding programme for the purposes of granting loans to euro area Member States in financial difficulties, for individual funding instruments outside the scope of the funding programme for the purposes of granting loans to euro area Member States in financial difficulties, and for liabilities arising from financing arrangements associated with the funding instruments and the obtaining and maintenance of a high rating thereof (hereinafter: financing arrangements). The second paragraph of Article 3 of the AGMFSEA determines the framework and the details of the granted guarantee. The guarantee is limited to EUR 2.073 billion and to the funding of obligations under loan agreements entered into on or before 30 June 2013, and can be granted for funding instruments and financing arrangements on or before 30 June 2013. The Act also stipulates that the EFSF may grant funds obtained by means of funding instruments to a euro area member state only with the unanimous approval of participating euro area Member States. The sixth and seventh indents of the second paragraph of Article 3 of the AGMFSEA regulate requests for the repayment of funds from the company that it receives from the borrowers, and the transfer of overdue EFSF claims to borrowers to the Republic of Slovenia (subrogation). The first paragraph of Article 4 of the AGMFSEA regulates the funding programme, which euro area Member States adopt unanimously and which contains the terms of the funding instruments for the acquisition of funds that the EFSF allocates for loans to euro area Member States in financial difficulties. In adopting the funding programme, the Government must cooperate with the National Assembly in accordance with the Act on Cooperation between the National Assembly and the Government in EU Affairs (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 34/04, 43/10, and 107/10; hereinafter referred to as the ACNAGEUA). In Accordance with the second, third, and fourth paragraphs of Article 4 of the AGMFSEA, the guarantee is granted for all funding instruments from each individual funding programme, for individual funding instruments outside the scope of the funding programme, and for financing arrangements. Under the fifth paragraph of Article 4 of the AGMFSEA, the minister in charge of finance is authorised to enter into guarantee agreements and grant deeds of guarantee. The sixth paragraph of the same article of the AGMFSEA regulates the duty of the Government to report, on a quarterly basis, on granted guarantees, approved loans, and individual instalments of loans to a euro area Member State in financial difficulties. Article 5 of the AGMFSEA regulates how to proceed in the event the company cannot honour the obligations for which the guarantee is given under the Act. It stipulates that the Republic of Slovenia transfer its share to the EFSF two days prior to the due date or after the due date based on a written request (i.e. a Noteholder Representative Guarantee Demand) directly to the lender, agent, or creditor, instead of to the EFSE.

28. Considering the constitutional interpretation of Article 149 of the Constitution, and in view of the described starting point of the constitutional review, in the circumstances of this case, with the euro as the single currency requiring cooperation among the euro area Member States, the Constitutional Court deems that the AGMFSEA is not inconsistent with Article 149 of the Constitution. A special decision of the National Assembly in the form of an act was adopted for the guarantee granted for the liabilities of the EFSF. The Constitutional Court deems that the authority granted to the Government [by the AGMFSEA] is not void of substance, to the contrary, it deems that the liability assumed or to be assumed by the Republic of Slovenia is precise. It is precise inasmuch as it determines the following: the purpose for which the guarantee is being granted – funding instruments by means of which appropriate funds for loans to euro area Member States in financial difficulties are provided; the amount of the guarantee – EUR 2.073 billion; the duration of the guarantee – for loan agreements made on or before 30 June 2013 and funding instruments and financing arrangements entered into on or before 30 June 2013; the debtor – the EFSF; and the types of transactions for which the guarantee is being granted – financing facilities in the framework of the funding programme or individual funding instruments outside the scope of this programme, and financing arrangements. This entails that the challenged arrangement is not inconsistent with the principle of clarity and precision, one of the principles of the state governed by the rule of law under Article 2 of the Constitution, for it is possible to determine both the substance and the purpose of the provision governing the guarantee. Since, as the Constitutional Court has already explained, it is not constitutionally relevant to the review of conformity with Article 149 of the Constitution what the legal nature of the guarantee under the AGMFSEA is – whether or not it is a guarantee within the meaning of the CO – the applicants cannot substantiate the unconstitutionality of the AGMFSEA with allegations referring to the issue of the inexistence of the ancillary nature of the guarantee under the AGMFSEA.

29. The applicants allege that the challenged arrangement is unconstitutional in particular in that, in their opinion, the National Assembly should adopt a special act for each individual guarantee, not just one, general act such as the AGMFSEA. The allegation is unsubstantiated, for the applicants' understanding of the guarantee under the AGMFSEA is clearly wrong. These are not multiple guarantees, which would require a special guarantee for each funding programme or each individual funding instrument or financing arrangement, it is a single guarantee in the amount of up to EUR 2.073 billion that is not drawn at once but in multiple instalments in accordance with the needs and always in proportion to the share of the Republic of Slovenia [in the share capital of the EFSF] (pro rata pari passu). By the nature of things, therefore, it is not necessary that a special law be adopted for each call for a portion of the guarantee. The decision on participation in the European Financial Stabilization Mechanism and hence the decision on assuming the guarantee was adopted by the National Assembly by an act that precisely defines what kind of guarantee is being granted, in what amount, to whom, and for what purpose. The range of movement that the Government has in adopting individual funding programmes in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 4 of the AGMFSEA is thus clearly and precisely defined. This paragraph provides for an additional option – which does not follow from Article 149 of the Constitution, but which does not entail that it is therefore unconstitutional, i.e. that the Government cooperate with the National Assembly in accordance with the ACNAGEUA in the adoption of funding programmes. This entails that the National Assembly will participate in forming the positions of the Republic of Slovenia on a proposed funding programme (the first paragraph of Article 4 of the ACNAGEUA) or adopt these positions itself (the first paragraph of Article 11 of the ACNAGEUA).

30. The applicants specifically highlight the third paragraph of Article 4 of the AGMFSEA, which stipulates that the Government may approve the drawing of funds under the Act for individual funding instruments outside the scope of the funding programme, and Article 6 of the AGMFSEA, which stipulates that the funds for the fulfilment of obligations under the Act and any other liabilities determined in accordance with the bylaws of the EFSF be provided in the budget of the Republic of Slovenia. The third paragraph of Article 4 needs to be interpreted in the context of the operation of the EFSF. It follows from the EFSF Framework Agreement that the EFSF may issue funding instruments outside the scope of the funding programme, but they must be closely linked to its core activity of securing the obtaining and maintenance of a high quality rating for the EFSF and its instruments, and facilitate funding by the EFSF. Regarding the guarantee for these instruments, it is vital that the liability of the Republic of Slovenia is limited to the amount determined by the AGMFSEA, which cannot be exceeded except by a new act or by amendments to the AGMFSEA; this follows from Article 3 of the AGMFSEA, which explicitly determines for which funding instruments and financing arrangements the guarantee is being granted. The EUR 2.073 billion ceiling on the liability of the Republic of Slovenia applies to any potential liabilities that may be incurred by the Republic of Slovenia in association with its participation (the status of shareholder) in the EFSF, which includes other liabilities in the sense of Article 6 of the AGMFSEA.<sup>38</sup> The liabilities incurred by the Republic of Slovenia in connection with the operations of the EFSF may not exceed EUR 2.073 billion. In the event that the liabilities exceeded this amount, the National Assembly would have to adopt a new act due to the requirements laid out in Article 149 of the Constitution. Additionally, the sixth paragraph of Article 4 of the AGMFSEA needs to be interpreted as entailing that the Government must report to the National Assembly on all liabilities incurred by the Republic of Slovenia under this law, which includes also the guarantees granted for funding instruments outside the scope of the funding programme and other liabilities within the meaning of Article 6 of the AGMFSEA.

31. The allegation of the applicants that the challenged Act is inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 148 of the Constitution, which stipulates that all revenues and expenditures of the state and local communities for the financing of public spending must be included in their budgets, is unsubstantiated as well. The Supplementary Budget of the Republic of Slovenia for 2010 (Official Gazette RS, No. 56/10 – Rb2010) includes all expenditures which have direct and financial consequences for the 2010 budget. Expenditure on increases in equity stakes abroad (account 4414) was thus increased by EUR 141,482, which corresponds to the share of the Republic of Slovenia in the subscribed capital of the EFSF in the amount of EUR 146.05 and its share in the approved capital of the EFSF in the amount of EUR 141,335.26. As the Constitutional Court has already explained in this decision, the fundamental difference between a loan and a guarantee is inter alia the moment at which a liability is incurred by the state. Since a loan guarantee is conditional (its enforcement is a future, uncertain fact), it does not have immediate direct financial consequences, but such arise at some time in the future. It is for this reason that in every budget, payments for enforced guarantees are budgeted only in the amount corresponding, according to the legislature's estimate, to the expected enforcement of guarantees or securities in the budget period. In this case, it is furthermore necessary to take into account the characteristics of the European mechanism, as the EFSF did not even start in 2010 to carry out the operations for which it had been established and the legislature appears to have assessed that no enforcement of the guarantee under the AGMFSEA was to be expected in 2010. The Constitutional Court cannot venture an opinion on the correctness of this assessment, for this is a question of adequacy, not constitutionality. In the allocation of public funds for individual functions (public expenditure), the National Assembly has a certain scope of discretion with regard to its political judgment when adopting the budget (see Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-40/96, dated 3 April 1997, Official Gazette RS, No. 24/97, and OdlUS VI, 46), which includes an assessment of expected enforcement of guarantees.

38 The EFSF Framework Agreement in the first paragraph of Article 7 also limits the liabilities of the guarantor states, which it defines as costs, losses, expenses, or liabilities, proportionally to their equity stake in the EFSF, which corresponds to the share of their respective central banks in ECB capital, taking into account only euro area Member States.

32. In the event that statutory regulation interferes with a human right, the Constitutional Court reviews the admissibility of such interference from the viewpoint of a constitutionally admissible aim (the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution) and from the viewpoint point of the principle of proportionality (Article 2 of the Constitution). If the Constitutional Court finds that the interference is constitutionally inadmissible, it establishes its nonconformity with the human right, not with the provisions governing the principles for the protection of human rights (see Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-219/03, dated 1 December 2005, Official Gazette RS, No. 118/05, and OdlUS XIV, 88). In other words, the general principle of proportionality (Article 2 of the Constitution) cannot be an independent criterion for the assessment of conformity with the Constitution, it is connected to an established interference with a specific human right. The Constitutional Court therefore did not need to respond to the alleged nonconformity of the AGMFSEA with Article 2 of the Constitution.
33. In view of the above, and taking into account the starting point of the constitutional review in the case under consideration, the Constitutional Court established that the AGMFSEA is not inconsistent with the Constitution.

C

34. The Constitutional Court reached this decision on the basis of Article 21 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 64/07 – official consolidated text – CCA), and the third paragraph of Article 46 of the Rules of Procedure of the Constitutional Court (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 86/07 and 54/10), composed of: Dr Ernest Petrič, President, and Judges Dr Mitja Deisinger, Dr Etelka Korpič – Horvat, Mag. Miroslav Mozetič, Jasna Pogačar, Mag. Jadranka Sovdat, Jože Tratnik, and Jan Zobec. The decision was reached with seven votes against one. Judge Mozetič voted against.

DECISION

At a session held on 28 November 2013, in proceedings to review constitutionality initiated upon two requests of the Administrative Court, after a public hearing was held on 7 November 2013, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

Article 12 of the Act on the Additional Taxation of a Part of Managers' Income in the Period of Financial and Economic Crisis (Official Gazette RS, No. 78/09) is abrogated.

*ReasoningA

1. On the basis of Article 156 of the Constitution, the Administrative Court stayed proceedings in two cases regarding the judicial review of administrative acts and by a request initiated proceedings before the Constitutional Court to review the constitutionality of Article 12 of the Act on the Additional Taxation of a Part of Managers' Income in the Period of Financial and Economic Crisis (hereinafter referred to as the AATPMI). The applicant alleges that it would have to apply this statutory provision when carrying out judicial reviews of administrative acts regarding the additional tax assessment prescribed by this Act. It also draws attention to the fact that thirty similar cases are pending before it.
2. In the applicant's opinion, the additional taxation of the income of the members of management and supervisory bodies prescribed by the AATPMI is not constitutionally disputable in itself, i.e. as far as it applies ex nunc. However, the applicant finds fault with the manner in which income is subject to tax under the AATPMI, which in the taxable base also includes income that taxable persons received before this Act entered into force. It is convinced that in this part the AATPMI has constitutionally inadmissible retroactive effect. In this regard, it refers to Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-98/07, dated 12 June 2008 (Official Gazette RS, No. 65/08, and OdlUS XVII, 42).

3. The applicant claims that from the principle of trust in the law there follows the expectation that the tax regulation must change in such a manner that changes are known in advance and that tax regulations which create a financial burden do not interfere with the legal situations of taxable persons that are already final. Allegedly, not even the fact that the additional tax under the AATPMI entails an annual tax obligation can change this principle. The applicant draws attention to the fact that the Constitutional Court already adopted such position in Decisions No. U-I-62/95, dated 16 February 1996 (Official Gazette RS, No. 14/96, and OdlUS V, 18), and No. U-I-81/96, dated 12 March 1998 (Official Gazette RS, No. 27/98, and OdlUS VII, 46). In the assessment of the applicant, the aims of the AATPMI, such as are determined in the legislative file, cannot justify its retroactive effect. In its opinion, also in a period of financial and economic crisis the legislature should adopt laws by taking into consideration all constitutional guarantees.
4. The National Assembly did not reply to the request. An opinion was, however, submitted by the Government, which assesses that the taxation of income under the AATPMI is not inconsistent with Article 155 of the Constitution. The retroactive effect of the Act is allegedly required in the public interest and, in addition, the regulation allegedly does not even interfere with acquired rights, as the income that is subject to additional tax in conformity with this Act does not have a legal basis in a decision of a state authority, but only in a contract. The disputed statutory regulation allegedly also passed the test of proportionality.
5. With regard to the aim of the AATPMI, the Government alleges that the Act was adopted in order to alleviate and resolve the financial and economic crisis that also affected the Slovene economy in 2008. In this regard, it is allegedly important that the additional taxation in conformity with the AATPMI only applies to income acquired for the management or supervision over those business entities that on the basis of various regulations benefitted from a surety, guarantee, or financial aid from the state to mitigate the consequences of the financial and economic crisis but in spite of that did not adjust the income of the members of their management and supervisory bodies to their financial situation. The legislature allegedly proceeded from the starting point that if a company needs state aid, it must at the same time reorganise anomalies in the system of corporate management. If, in spite of the fact that it received state aid, a business entity pays to its management personnel income that is disproportionate to business results and that is thus ethically and morally reprehensible, the state allegedly has the right to interfere with the business operations of these entities by tax policy measures. Allegedly, the primary aim of the Act was thus to prevent excessive bonuses being given to members of the management of business entities that need state aid during the economic and financial crisis. If a company is not doing well and is obliged to apply for state aid, then allegedly the rationalisation of spending and the maximising of added value cannot be achieved only by dismissing workers or by cutting their salaries, but also the management personnel must contribute to this end, in the opinion of the Government. From such perspective, the AATPMI allegedly also pursues the principle of solidarity. The additional taxation in conformity with the AATPMI was allegedly intended to prevent even greater social stratification, which is allegedly in the broader social interest.

6. Also the disputed Article 12 of the AATPMI allegedly serves to achieve the fundamental aim of the Act, i.e. to prevent members of management bodies from receiving excessive bonuses during the financial and economic crisis, and also to attenuate or resolve the financial and economic crisis in such a manner. The Government stresses that the state cannot directly influence the level of income of members of the management or supervisory bodies of companies regardless of the fact whether such companies are directly or indirectly in majority ownership thereof. Contracts regarding the salaries and bonuses of members of management or supervisory bodies allegedly concern enforceable contractual relationships, and information regarding this income is allegedly also not public. Consequently, in the opinion of the Government, the state can only interfere with the payment of income which due to illegitimate imbalances between its level and the financial situation of the business entity is ethically disputable – in addition to non-binding recommendations – by tax policy measures. Allegedly, it is also in the broader social interest that social imbalances are not aggravated in times of crisis; for such reason it is allegedly in the public interest that the retroactive tax burden pursues the systemic coherence of the new regulation. The Government underlines that the payment of high bonuses to the members of the management or supervisory bodies of business entities that have received aid from state funds reduces the resources available for the implementation of state tasks, whereby the crisis requires an even greater role and responsibility of the state, especially from the viewpoint of the requirements of a social state. With regard to Article 146 of the Constitution, which determines that the state raises funds for the performance of its duties by means of taxes and other compulsory charges (as well as from revenues from their own assets), the public interest – i.e. ensuring a social state and social cohesion in the state – allegedly requires that the state finance its tasks also by measures such as envisaged by the AATPMI, especially with regard to the fact that the income taxed by the AATPMI proved to be ethically and morally disputable. In this regard, the Government also draws attention to the social function of property determined by the first paragraph of Article 67 of the Constitution.
7. The measures adopted by the AATPMI are allegedly appropriate and necessary for achieving the described aims of the Act. The legislature allegedly did not have at its disposal other measures that would be effective to the same degree. The contractually agreed rights of members of management and supervisory bodies were allegedly also not excessively affected as compared to the benefits gained by the additional taxation on the basis of Article 12 of the AATPMI. The limit above which the additional taxation applies was namely set relatively high by the legislature, i.e. at an amount 8.6 times the average monthly salary of an employee in the Republic of Slovenia in October 2009.

8. The plaintiff in the proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts submitted to the Constitutional Court a brief in which he presented his reservations with regard to the consistency of the AATPMI with the Constitution. He alleges that already the first condition for the exceptional admissibility of the retroactive effect of a particular statutory provision, i.e. the existence of a public interest, is not fulfilled. He is namely of the opinion that the challenged Article 12 of the AATPMI does not in itself pursue the aim of ensuring fiscal income or regulating the subject of taxation. It is allegedly possible to achieve such an aim in the same manner without the Act having retroactive effect. Therefore, it is allegedly evident that the purpose of retroactive taxation is only in reducing the bonuses already paid to certain individuals, in particular – according to reports in the media – to the plaintiff in the proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts. Such an intention of the AATPMI – punitive in the opinion of the plaintiff in the proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts – allegedly does not entail a constitutionally admissible objective. In his opinion, also the second condition for the exceptional admissibility of the retroactive effect of the AATPMI, i.e. the absence of an interference with acquired rights, is manifestly not fulfilled. The trust in the law of the plaintiff in the proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts is allegedly inadmissibly weakened, as at the moment when he concluded his employment contract (on 28 January 2004) he justly counted on the fact that the income agreed in the contract would be subject to tax in conformity with the then valid statutory regulation. His claim regarding his payment of a performance bonus – even though it was paid only in 2009 – was allegedly due already after the end of business year 2006 or 2007. The plaintiff also draws attention to the fact that in Decisions No. U-I-62/95, No. U-I-81/96, and No. U-I-181/94, dated 30 March 1995 (Official Gazette RS, No. 21/95, and OdlUS IV, 31) the Constitutional Court already adopted the position that the retroactive taxation of income is inconsistent with Article 155 of the Constitution, because tax obligations imposed in such manner interfere with the acquired right to dispose of one's income.
9. The Constitutional Court sent the application of the plaintiff in the proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts to the National Assembly and Government for a reply thereto. The National Assembly did not reply to the application. The Government submitted an opinion in which it insisted upon its position in the opinion that it submitted as a reply to the request of the applicant. Also the plaintiff in the proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts took a position with regard to the opinion of the Government. Its opinion that this case does not concern an interference with acquired rights, as they are not based on the decision of an authority of the state, is allegedly erroneous. From the hitherto constitutional case law it allegedly clearly proceeds that the retroactive determination of a tax obligation entails an interference with the acquired right to dispose of one's income. The Constitutional Court allegedly also adopted the position that an already existing right under the law of obligations can have the status of an acquired right regardless of the fact whether it is based on the decision of an authority of the state (Decision No. U-I-340/96, dated 12 March 1998, Official Gazette RS, No. 31/98, and OdlUS VII, 48). In the case at issue, allegedly none of the exceptional situations exists in which, in conformity with the position of the legal doctrine, the retroactive effect of a law can exceptionally be admissible: (1) despite the general financial and economic crisis, persons taxable under the AATPMI allegedly could not expect the adoption of such legal regulation with retroactive effect – if the opposite was true, virtually any retroactive interference with the property of individuals could be justified by referring to a crisis; (2) allegedly, also the requirement of the elimination of possible unclarity did not require the adoption of the disputed statutory regulation with retroactive effect; (3) allegedly, it is evident that the case at issue does not concern a case in which the retroactive effect of the Act does not cause (significant) damage to its addressees. The plaintiff in the proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts thus proposes that the Constitutional Court establish the inconsistency of Article 12 of the AATPMI with Article 155 of the Constitution.

10. On 7 November 2013, the Constitutional Court held a public hearing (Article 35 of the Constitutional Court Act, Official Gazette RS, Nos. 64/07 – official consolidated text and 109/12 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA). It invited thereto the participants in the proceedings, i.e. the applicant, the National Assembly, the plaintiff in the proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts, and other persons whose participation at the public hearing was considered necessary, i.e. the Government and a legal expert and Member of the Slovene Academy of Sciences and Arts [hereinafter: Acad.] Prof. Dr Marijan Pavčnik, as well as a legal expert Asst. Prof. Dr Aleš Kobal (the first paragraph of Article 36 in relation to the second paragraph of Article 28 of the CCA). All the invitees except the National Assembly attended the public hearing, however the absence of the latter did not prevent the Constitutional Court from conducting the proceedings and deciding on the case (the second paragraph of Article 36 of the CCA).
11. At the public hearing, the applicant objected to the arguments of the Government that there are no other tools available to achieve the aim set by the AATPMI. As far as companies that are in direct or indirect ownership of the state are concerned, the state allegedly had at its disposal measures provided by the Companies Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 65/09 – official consolidated text and following – hereinafter referred to as the CA-1). The applicant underlined that the disputed tax entails a completely new obligation that is charged in addition to the personal income tax. The legislature allegedly did not demonstrate the public interest for the existence of the retroactive effect of the new tax regulation. The aim pursued by the AATPMI, i.e. to prevent excessive compensation of managers in companies that benefitted from state aid, allegedly cannot be achieved by the retroactive effect of the Act. The disputed retroactive taxation is therefore expressed primarily as a punitive measure. The regulation of the AATPMI is otherwise in itself – the tax rate included – not constitutionally disputable. The Administrative Court allegedly already adopted such a position in individual cases.

12. At the public hearing, the plaintiff in the proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts underlined the problem of the casuistic adoption of laws. The situation in the case at issue was allegedly precisely such, as the AATPMI was allegedly referred to as lex Kramar. It is allegedly unacceptable that the AATPMI was adopted despite the warnings of the Government Office of Legislation and the Legislative and Legal Service of the National Assembly that Article 12 of the Act is inconsistent with the Constitution. The plaintiff also drew attention to the article of Dr Rajko Pirnat, Pravne omejitve ukrepov za izhod iz krize, published in the magazine Podjetje in delo, No. 7 (2010), in which the position that such taxation is prohibited was allegedly expressed. In the opinion of the plaintiff, the disputed retroactive taxation at a rate of 90% effectively entails the confiscation of property. The sole purpose of Article 12 of the AATPMI was allegedly to dispossess a concrete person of a concrete bonus, which is something that allegedly clearly proceeds from the legislative file. Such intention of the legislature is allegedly not legitimate. The two disputed performance bonuses were determined on the basis of two multipliers completely objectivised by a formula included in the employment contract, which allegedly was based on the business results of the company NLB, PLC, Ljubljana, in 2006 and 2007. If the lawfulness of these payments was nonetheless doubtful, in his opinion the state could have made use of civil and criminal law institutes instead of deciding to confiscate them under the guise of a tax regulation. The plaintiff in the proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts also drew attention to the Judgments of the European Court of Human Rights in N. K. M. v. Hungary, dated 14 May 2013, and Gáll v. Hungary, dated 26 June 2013. He proposed that the Constitutional Court also carry out an assessment of the consistency of the challenged regulation with the right to private property determined by Article 1 of Protocol No. 1 to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR).
13. At the public hearing, the Government additionally substantiated the adoption of Article 12 of the AATPMI by referring to the prevention of tax avoidance. Due to the relatively lengthy legislative procedure, taxable persons could allegedly have expected that the disputed regulation would be adopted, therefore by their conduct they could have avoided paying this tax. Otherwise, in the opinion of the Government, the purpose of prescribing taxes is not only to pursue financial aims, as they can as well be employed to prevent conduct that the broader social community deems inadmissible or inappropriate. Allegedly, this is exactly what the AATPMI pursued. The data on taxes collected on the basis of the AATPMI allegedly prove as well that the aim of the AATPMI was not to interfere with the rights of a particular taxable person but to regulate at a general level the issue of compensating members of the management or supervisory bodies of companies that benefitted from state aid. The revenue under this fiscal item is allegedly decreasing every year. The Government explained that despite all the measures that had been implemented at the end of 2008 and in 2009 under the so-called anti-crisis laws<sup>1</sup> (these laws already contained certain limitations or prohibitions with regard to the payment of disputable income in the year when state aid was received)<sup>2</sup>, it was necessary to protect earmarked funds granted in the form of state aid from such being redirected into the income of the management also by an additional tax in force from 1 January 2009 onwards. Despite all the stated measures, the perceived compensation of members of management and supervisory bodies of companies was too high in 2009. These measures in fact entailed complementary solutions, as the so-called anti-crisis laws allegedly referred to business entities, whereas the AATPMI referred to individuals. The Government also insisted upon its position that by applying measures under the CA-1 the state was unable to effectively influence the disputed income of managers. Allegedly, only in companies in which the state was a majority owner did the state have at its disposal certain possibilities to take action: since members of supervisory bodies are allegedly autonomous in their work and independent in the framework of their competences, there allegedly only existed the possibility that their membership [in a management or supervisory body] could be disqualified in the event they did not act in conformity with the owner's interests.

14. The legal expert Acad. Prof. Dr Marijan Pavčnik emphasised that the retroactive effect of a regulation entails an exception to the established rule on the ex nunc validity of regulations and is admissible if three criteria are cumulatively fulfilled. The following conditions must be fulfilled: 1) an individual statutory provision is at issue; 2) the retroactive effect must be in the public interest; and 3) the provision must not interfere with acquired rights. In the case at issue, the first criterion is probably fulfilled, however the second and third are allegedly problematic. In the opinion of Acad. Prof. Dr Marijan Pavčnik, the introduction of additional charges in times of an economic crisis can certainly be in the public interest, however only if such charges are in conformity with constitutional principles and rules. Allegedly, in the concrete case it is above all disputable that the additional tax interferes with the acquired rights of taxable persons. There is a constitutional principle that state taxes are determined by law and that tax obligations must be envisaged in advance (Article 147 of the Constitution in relation to the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution). Allegedly, as soon as a tax obligation is determined, an individual acquires the right (the legally protected expectation) that the state will not retroactively escalate tax obligations and make them more difficult. The retroactive escalation of tax obligations allegedly always interferes with the existing rights of taxable persons. Taxable persons allegedly legitimately expect that they are only bound to pay to the state charges that are determined in advance by a law. Acad. Prof. Dr Marijan Pavčnik did not concur with the allegations of the Government that the acquired right must be based on the decision of an authority of the state. An individual allegedly acquires the right to freely dispose of his or her income at the moment when he or she receives it, i.e. when he or she has become the owner of the acquired property. Acad. Prof. Dr Marijan Pavčnik further underlined that the legislative file of the AATPMI does not even state reasons that would substantiate the retroactive effect of Article 12 of the AATPMI. Consequently, the genesis of the statutory text allegedly cannot be an additional argument in favour of the possible retroactive effect of the challenged statutory provision. Acad. Prof. Dr Marijan Pavčnik drew attention to the fact that the case at issue raises a question of principle regarding the role of law in the time and under the circumstances of a social crisis. The old dilemma is allegedly whether the benefit has priority over the law. The answer is allegedly clear: absolutely not! Acad. Prof. Dr Marijan Pavčnik stressed that no matter how severe the crisis is, [such circumstances] do not release us from acting legally and thus introducing legitimate solutions in a legal manner. Gustav Radbruch (Five Minutes of Legal Philosophy (1945), in: Filozofija prava, GV Založba, Ljubljana 2007, p. 268) was allegedly relentlessly clear: “Only what law is benefits the people.”

15. The legal expert Asst. Prof. Dr Aleš Kobal held the opinion that Article 12 of the AATPMI is actually not an individual statutory provision in the sense of the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution, with regard to the fact that it extends the validity of the entire AATPMI to a period before its entry into force. He stressed that the AATPMI introduces a completely new tax obligation. Although both the Personal Income Tax Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 13/11 – official consolidated text and following – hereinafter referred to as the PInTA-2) and the AATPMI concern the taxation of income, the AATPMI is namely (in contrast to the PInTA-2) not a systemic law, but an extraordinary tax law. Asst. Prof. Dr Aleš Kobal specifically emphasised the great importance of the predictability of regulations in the field of tax law. The principle of the precision of laws allegedly has an important place in this context. This principle allegedly means that already on 1 January taxable persons must know the taxation of their income in that calendar year, or that taxable persons are able to calculate the amount of their tax obligation or the amount of income they can freely dispose of anytime in a tax year when they receive some particular income. In conformity with the above, also the hitherto case law of the Constitutional Court and other foreign courts with regard to the admissibility of the retroactive effect of laws in the field of taxation is (compared with other fields subject to statutory regulation) more restrictive.

16. During the proceedings, the Constitutional Court received certain explanations from the Government and the Employment Service of Slovenia (the second paragraph of Article 28 of the CCA). It requested that the Government [submit to the Court] orders that it had issued on the basis of Articles 81a and 86a of the PFA, as well as contracts regarding loans or sureties granted on the basis of these orders. It also requested that it [submit] the draft act, whose content was similar to the AATPMI but which was then not submitted to the National Assembly for assessment. The Employment Service of Slovenia requested that examples of contracts concluded on the basis of the PSFWA and the PRPCA be submitted.
17. On 20 November 2013, the Ministry of Finance submitted to the Constitutional Court the data that the representative of the Government was asked to submit during the public hearing, i.e. data on the assessment and payment of tax determined by the AATPMI for 2009, 2010, 2011, and 2012, hypothetical data on the estimated amount of default interest in the event of the refund of taxes already paid due to their being unjustifiably imposed, as well as data on the realisation of public revenue from income taxes, taxes on profits, and the additional tax based on the AATPMI.

B – I

18. By the Order dated 15 March 2012, the Constitutional Court joined case No. U-I-171/11 to case No. U-I-158/11 for joint consideration and decision-making.
19. The central question of the case at issue is whether Article 12 of the AATPMI is inconsistent with the constitutional prohibition of the retroactive effect of legal acts determined by Article 155 of the Constitution. The Constitutional Court emphasises that the assessment of the concrete acts of individual members of management and supervisory bodies does not fall within the framework of such review of constitutionality. Decision-making on the possible subjective responsibility of an individual which would proceed from the failure to perform due diligence or possibly even from allegations of the abuse of authorisations when exercising the tasks of the management or supervisory body of a company would be the subject of other proceedings conducted against individual persons.
20. The first paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution prohibits the retroactive effect of legal acts by determining that laws and other regulations and general acts cannot have retroactive effect. The meaning of this constitutional prohibition is to ensure the essential element of a state governed by the rule of law, i.e. legal certainty, and thus to maintain and strengthen trust in the law (Article 2 of the Constitution). However, the prohibition under the first paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution is not absolute. The second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution determines an exception to this prohibition in principle, on the basis of which only a law may establish that certain of its provisions have retroactive effect if this is required in the public interest and provided that no acquired rights are infringed thereby.
21. In conformity with the established case law of the Constitutional Court, a regulation has retroactive effect when the moment of the beginning of its application is the moment before its entry into force and even when the moment of the beginning of its application is the moment after its entry into force, but some of its provisions have such effect that they retroactively interfere with legal situations or legal facts that were final when the previous legal norm was in force.<sup>3</sup>

22. The AATPMI introduced (the provisional)<sup>4</sup> obligation of the payment of an additional tax on the income of the members of management and supervisory bodies of business entities who benefitted from a surety, guarantee, or financial aid from the state to attenuate the consequences of the financial and economic crisis on the basis of measures adopted by either the National Assembly or the Government (Article 1 and the second paragraph of Article 3 of the AATPMI).<sup>5</sup> The subject of taxation pursuant to this Act are received salaries, other benefits stemming from employment, performance bonuses, severance pay, income received on the basis of profit sharing, certain privileges that business entities grant to taxable persons or to a member of their family, attendance allowances, and other income for conducting business or for carrying out supervision over a business entity (the first through fourth paragraphs of Article 4 of the AATPMI).<sup>6</sup> Pursuant to Article 5 of the AATPMI, the taxable base is the sum of all the mentioned income (reduced by the obligatory social security contributions) that the taxable person received in the past year in the part that exceeds the amounts determined in this Article. The additional tax is calculated and paid at a rate of 49% of the annual taxable base (Article 6 of the AATPMI) on the basis of a decision of the tax authority issued following the declaration of the taxable person in which income from the past year is taken into consideration (Article 7 of the AATPMI). The AATPMI entered into force on 6 October 2009, i.e. the next day after it was published in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia (the first paragraph of Article 13 of the AATPMI). The challenged Article 12 of the AATPMI determines that this Act applies to income referred to in this Act received from 1 January 2009 onwards. The effect of the mentioned provision is thus such as to encompass in the new taxation also income paid before the Act entered into force, i.e. between 1 January 2009 and 5 October 2009.

- 3 See, for instance, Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-98/07, Paragraph 23 of the reasoning. In theory, the effect of a law which has such retroactive effect is named true retroactivity, whereas the term quasi-retroactivity in theory describes the effect of a law whose prescribed consequence begins after the regulation is published, but the appearance of this consequence in the law is linked to circumstances (facts) from the time before the law is published (cf., for instance, L. Šturm in: L. Šturm (Ed.), Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije [Commentary on the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia], Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Ljubljana 2002, pp. 57 and 1040).
- 4 The validity of the AATPMI is limited in time; it was in force until 31 December 2010 and will remain in force until the end of the tax year in which the sureties or guarantees and measures for the attenuation of the consequences of the financial and economic crisis expire (the second paragraph of Article 13 of the AATPMI).
- 5 A taxable person liable for the payment of the tax in accordance with this Act shall be a natural person who as a member of a management or supervisory body received income from managing or supervising a business entity (the first paragraph of Article 3 of the AATPMI).
- 6 In conformity with the fourth paragraph of Article 4 of the AATPMI, it is deemed that income is received when it is paid or in any other manner made available to the taxable person regardless of the form in which it is paid or made available.

23. The Constitutional Court has already addressed the issue of the retroactive effect of a tax norm that refers to a periodic tax in Decision No. U-I-62/95. It assessed the regulation determined by the Act Amending the Personal Income Tax Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 7/95 – PInTA-A), which regulated anew the taxation of certain personal income, i.e. severance pay upon retirement, jubilee bonuses, and one-time solidarity aids which previously had not been subject to taxation. The Act entered into force the next day after it was published in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia, i.e. on 5 February 1995, and was applicable from 1 January 1995 onwards. The Constitutional Court adopted the position that a (new) tax obligation can only emerge after an act has entered into force and that the determination of a retroactive obligation is inconsistent with Article 155 of the Constitution. The Court substantiated such position by stating that [such retroactive] tax obligations entail an interference with an already existing acquired right to freely dispose of one's income (see Paragraph 8 of the reasoning of the mentioned Decision) and that the manner of tax calculation (e.g., annually) does not represent a basis for interpretation in conformity with which the validity of the tax obligation extends also to income paid when such statutory obligation had not yet existed (see Paragraph 9 of the reasoning of the mentioned Decision). Also in Decision No. U-I-81/96<sup>7</sup> the Constitutional Court adopted a similar position (cf. the eleventh paragraph of the reasoning of the mentioned Decision). In both cited cases the Constitutional Court clearly expressed that with regard to periodic taxes the constitutionally relevant state of the facts is final at the moment the taxable income arises, regardless of the fact that the final tax obligation is assessed only at the end of the tax year.<sup>8</sup>
24. The AATPMI imposed a new (49%) tax obligation on the specific group of taxable persons. The AATPMI entered into force on 6 October 2009, i.e. the next day after it was published in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia (the first paragraph of Article 13 of the AATPMI). On the basis of the challenged Article 12 of the AATPMI, the taxable base for the assessment of tax under this Act (also) includes parts of income that the taxable person received before the entry into force of this

7 The Constitutional Court assessed provisions of the Act Amending the Corporate Profit Tax Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 20/95) which entered into force the next day after the Act was published in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia, i.e. on 8 April 1995, and were applicable from 1 January 1995 onwards and regulated anew the taxation of general reserves of banks and savings banks already formed.

8 This so-called concept of a taxable event, which instead of the formal formation of a tax debt concretised in the decision of a tax authority takes into consideration the situation of a taxable person who at the moment of receiving income by trusting the existing tax regulation acquires the possibility to freely dispose of the untaxed part of the income, is (inter alia) accepted also in Denmark, the Netherlands, Sweden, and Poland. Certain other states (among them also Germany, Belgium, and Italy) accept the so-called concept of a tax period, which deems the moment of the appearance of the tax burden as the legally decisive moment; with regard to periodic taxes, this moment is the last day of the time period for which the tax is being assessed (cf. reports of individual states prepared for the conference of the European Association of Tax Law Professors, Retroactivity of Tax legislation, EATLP 2010, published on the website <http://www.eatlp.org/index.php/documents/leuven-2010>).

Act, i.e. between 1 January 2009 and 5 October 2009, when they were already subject to tax, namely to the personal income tax on the basis of the PInTA-2. Article 12 of the AATPMI thus determined the beginning of the application of this Act (1 January 2009) before the moment of its entry into force (6 October 2009), therefore it is evident that by this Article the legislature retroactively interfered with the legal situations of the affected taxable persons and imposed an additional burden thereon. Even though the additional tax on income determined by the AATPMI is assessed on an annual basis (as the personal income tax – compare with the first paragraph of Article 15 of the PInTA-2 and Article 6 of the AATPMI), under the (presented) established case law of the Constitutional Court, such new taxation (of income), introduced in the middle of a tax year, which is applicable already from the beginning of the year, has retroactive effect. The AATPMI namely attaches the emergence of a tax obligation to the moment when a particular taxable income is received, whereby it deems that the income is received when it is paid or in any other way made available to a taxable person (compare the first and fourth paragraphs of Article 4 of the AATPMI and the first and fifth paragraphs of the PInTA-2). From this moment (of the so-called taxable event) on, taxable persons legitimately expect that the income received will be subject to precisely such tax as was prescribed by the tax legislation in force at that moment and that they will be able to freely dispose of the remaining income. Therefore, Article 12 of the AATPMI has retroactive effect, which is prohibited by the first paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution. Nonetheless, the retroactive effect of individual statutory provisions is exceptionally allowed if the conditions determined by the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution are fulfilled.

B – II

25. In conformity with the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution, the retroactive effect of a particular statutory provision is admissible if this is required in the public interest and provided that no acquired rights are infringed thereby. These two conditions are prescribed cumulatively, whereby the first one is formulated positively and the second one negatively.<sup>9</sup>
26. With regard to the first condition under the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has already adopted the position that the arguments that substantiate the regulation in the part that applies ex nunc cannot be used without reservation for demonstrating a public interest that would exceptionally require that a particular statutory provision be applied retroactively.<sup>10</sup> A different position would dilute the importance of the constitutional prohibition of the retroactive effect of legal acts determined by the first paragraph of Article

9 Cf. Decisions of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-60/99, Paragraph 21 of the reasoning, and No. U-I-98/07, Paragraph 28 of the reasoning.

10 Cf. Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-340/96, dated 12 March 1998 (Official Gazette RS, No. 31/98, and OdlUS VII, 48), Paragraph 8 of the reasoning.

155 of the Constitution. Retroactive effect can thus only be justified by a specific public interest, one which substantiates precisely the retroactive effect of the regulation without which the pursued aim of the particular regulation could not be achieved.<sup>11</sup> With regard to the fact that such a public interest substantiates an exception from the constitutional prohibition of the retroactive effect of a regulation, whereby exceptions must be interpreted restrictively, such public interest must be specifically established in the legislative procedure.<sup>12</sup> The legislature must thus already in the legislative file substantiate the retroactive effect of a legal norm. Possible subsequent substantiations (presented for the first time after the legislative procedure has been completed) of the aims of an act, which are not evident in the legislative file, cannot substitute for such establishment.

27. The legislature must respect the prohibition of the retroactive effect of laws especially in the field of taxation. Not only because of the density and intensity of legal relations between the state (the tax administration) and taxable persons, but also because of the asymmetry of tax law relationships, which entail an interference by the state with the property sphere of taxable persons without directly paying any compensation for such, as well as because of the general sense of justice.<sup>13</sup> The state significantly influences the property sphere of individuals by its tax policy. Therefore, it is understandable that they plan and carry out their actions also with regard to the predicted tax consequences of such actions of theirs. Although taxable persons know or should know that the tax legislation in force that is relevant for their decisions can change and does change,<sup>14</sup> they legitimately expect that it will change in such manner that while taking decisions they will be able to take these changes into consideration, which presupposes that they are informed thereof (the first paragraph of Article 154 of the Constitution).<sup>15</sup> In the event of the adoption of a tax regulation that has retroactive effect, the legislature must demonstrate in the legislative file the existence of a particularly important public interest which particularly justifies such retroactive effect.

14 Order of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-125/05, dated 8 December 2005, Paragraph 16 of the reasoning. The principle of the adaptation of law to social circumstances is one of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law (see Decisions of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-69/03, dated 20 October 2005, Official Gazette RS, No. 100/05, and OdlUS XIV, 75, Paragraph 7 of the reasoning, and No. U-I-65/08, Paragraph 21 of the reasoning).

15 Such trust of persons subject to income tax is further reinforced by Article 2 of the PInTA-2, which determines that the personal income tax is assessed in conformity with the provisions of the law that is in force on 1 January of the year for which the personal income tax is assessed, if this Act does not determine otherwise.

28. In the legislative file<sup>16</sup> one cannot find particular substantiation of the public interest for the existence of the retroactive effect of the challenged statutory provision. The National Assembly neither replied to the request of the applicant nor attended the public hearing in this case, even despite the fact that in the legislative procedure both the Government and the Legislative and Legal Service of the National Assembly warned [the legislature] of the possibility that Article 12 of the ATPMI might be constitutionally disputable due to its (in the legislative file unexplained) retroactive effect.<sup>17</sup> As far as the allegation in the legislative file “that unsuccessful managers would be left without unjustified bonuses” could be deemed to be the substantiation of the retroactive effect of the Act, it must be established that it does not demonstrate a public interest in the sense of the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution.
29. In addition to fiscal aims, also specific socio-political aims can be pursued by taxes.<sup>18</sup> Among them, not even aims that in the context of general social or economic policy strive to dissuade potential taxable persons from certain conduct are excluded. However, the application of a tax norm with retroactive effect cannot by the nature of the matter serve to dissuade persons from conduct already undertaken,<sup>19</sup> but can only entail the subsequent legal assessment of conduct already undertaken.<sup>20</sup> Consequently, this is not a constitutionally admissible aim of statutory regulation in the field of tax law. If the purpose of a special tax regulation (also) entails dissuading persons from certain conduct, such purpose may only refer to the regulation of future conduct. Only in such a manner do taxable persons have the possibility to plan their decisions in conformity with the principle of trust in the law with regard to changes in tax legislation.
30. The mentioned substantiation of the National Assembly can also be understood as criticism of actions unacceptable in the given circumstances of a financial and economic crisis, which is obviously addressed to a circle of individuals to whom concrete actions already taken are to be attributed. Since in the foreground of the corporate management of companies, which was entrusted to an individual by appointing him or her to the position of a member of the management or control body of a company, there is the responsibility to ensure a reasonable balancing of conflicting interests between particular groups of people – which are affected by the decisions of the bodies of a company and which are important for both the cohesion of the relations between the people in a company and in general for the position of such company – the mentioned substantiation can also be understood as an allegation that such persons acted contrary to the criteria of due diligence in carrying out of tasks required of individuals, i.e. the members of management and supervisory bodies. However, as the Constitutional Court has already emphasised, deciding on the possible subjective responsibility of an individual, which would follow from the failure to perform due diligence or possibly even from the allegation of an abuse of authorisations when carrying out the function of a body in a company, and the assessment of the appropriateness of the amount of bonuses paid to the members of management or supervisory bodies do not fall within a review of the constitutionality of the statutory provision at issue.

31. Due to the fact that state funds were granted to business entities in order to attenuate the consequences of the financial and economic crisis,<sup>21</sup> the available budget resources in fact diminished. The fact that state funds were granted to business entities through anti-crisis measures cannot, however, fulfil the requirement of there being a public interest in order for the challenged statutory provision, which is addressed to individuals, to have retroactive effect. Regardless of the fact that taxes can pursue various socio-political aims, the introduction of a retroactive tax obligation cannot substitute for the statutory regulation of the system of compensating the members of the management and supervisory bodies of business entities that benefitted from state aid. In fact, the specific anti-crisis measures adopted that envisaged the expenditure of state funds contained guarantees with regard to such only being used for designated purposes, including limitations on the payment of certain income to the members of management bodies.<sup>22</sup>
32. Therefore, the legislature failed to demonstrate that the public interest requires the retroactive effect of the regulation determined by the AATPMI, even though it should have done so already in the legislative file (Paragraph 27 of the reasoning of this Decision).
33. Even if in its assessment the Constitutional Court had accepted the arguments presented in the proceedings by the Government in favour of the retroactive effect of [the Act in accordance with] Article 12 of the AATPMI, these arguments would not have led [the Court] to make a different decision. With regard to the public interest that allegedly justifies the retroactive effect of [the Act in accordance with] Article 12 of the AATPMI, the Government underlined: 1) that Article 12 of the AATPMI allegedly “prevented excessive compensation of managers in the time of the financial and economic crisis” and in such a manner also the financial and economic crisis was allegedly mitigated or resolved, 2) that illegitimate imbalances between the bonuses of the members of management and supervisory bodies, on one hand, and the business reality, requirements, and limitations imposed by the economic crisis, on the other, which have a negative effect on social cohesion, can only be overcome by having an effect on income already received, 3) that the taxation of income already paid, if such income proves to be ethically and morally disputable, is in the public interest and in conformity with the social function of property as well as with the principle of a social state, 4) that it is in the public interest if a retroactive tax burden pursues the systemic coherence of the new tax regulation, and 5) that the retroactive effect of the AATPMI is intended to prevent the evasion of paying this tax.

21 This concerns state funds ensured by the PFA-D, the Republic of Slovenia Guarantee Scheme Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 33/09, and 42/09 – the RSGSA), the PSFWA, the PRPCA, etc.

22 See note 2 of the reasoning of this Decision.

34. In itself, the tax burden has no influence on the legal possibility or the claim of a taxable person to the payment of income or a bonus. The opposite is true; the tax burden on the income presupposes that a taxable person receives an income based on a valid legal title. Therefore, it is conceptually excluded that the tax burden (in fact or legally) prevents the taxable person from receiving such income. The position of the Government that the challenged provision serves to prevent the payment of disproportionately high and thus ethically and morally disputable income is thus erroneous. On the contrary, the tax burden, when it significantly decreases the amount of money from a specific taxable income that taxable persons can freely dispose of, as a general rule influences the motivation of taxable persons to acquire such income.<sup>23</sup> However, by the nature of the matter it is not possible to motivate human action or conduct retroactively.<sup>24</sup> Therefore, if the phrase “the prevention of excessive compensation” can be interpreted as meaning that by means of a new, high tax burden one influences the motivation of the specific group of taxable persons such that they do not pay to themselves such income while the Act is in force, by the logic of the matter such an aim cannot be achieved by the retroactive taxation of bonuses and other income already paid. Such an aim is not real and thus cannot substantiate the public interest that could justify the retroactive effect of the additional taxation of income in accordance with the AATPMI.
35. Due to the same reasons that the Constitutional Court rejected the National Assembly’s reference to the aim “that unsuccessful managers would be left without unjustified bonuses”, also the Government’s reference to the following aims must be rejected: 1) that the retroactive effect on income already paid enables the elimination of illegitimate imbalances between the bonuses of members of management and supervisory bodies, on one hand, and the business reality, requirements, and limitations imposed by the financial and economic crisis, on the other hand, and contributes to the elimination of factors that have a negative influence on social cohesion, and 2) in order to ensure of the principle of a social state, the retroactive effect of the tax burden on income already paid, if such income proves to be ethically and morally disputable, is in the public interest (see Paragraphs 29 and 31 of the reasoning of this Decision). Also the uniform regulation of the taxation of income received over the entire tax year is not a sufficient reason for the retroactive effect of the new tax regulation.<sup>25</sup>
36. At the public hearing the Government also alleged that the intention of the retroactive effect of Article 12 of the AATPMI was also to prevent the avoidance of the payment of the newly introduced tax obligation. The attempt to prevent the circumvention of a new tax regulation before its entry into force can certainly be an aim in the general public interest which could justify the retroactive effect of the tax regulation.<sup>26</sup> However, in the concrete case the statement of such aim is too general, because the Government did not substantiate what kind of abuses this could concern in the case at issue with regard to the intention when adopting the AATPMI. By referring to the length of the legislative procedure it is indeed not even possible to substantiate the mentioned aim as far as it refers to the time before 21 April 2009, when a draft of the AATPMI was published for the first time in the Gazette of the National Assembly. Taxable persons namely cannot circumvent the new tax regulation if concrete drafts of such regulation are not publicly published.

23 Cf. Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-91/98, dated 16 July 1999 (Official Gazette RS, No. 61/99, and OdlUS VIII, 196), Paragraph 21 of the reasoning.

24 Cf. M. Pavčnik, op. cit., pp. 258–259.

25 Cf. Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-62/95, Paragraph 10. of the reasoning.

37. With regard to all of the above, the Constitutional Court assesses that in the case at issue already the first condition prescribed by the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution for the exceptionally admissible retroactive effect of a law is not fulfilled. Consequently, the Constitutional Court (without assessing whether the second, cumulatively determined condition determined by the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution is fulfilled) assessed that Article 12 of the AATPMI is inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution and abrogated it. The abrogation of the challenged provision entails that the regulation in accordance with the AATPMI does not apply to income that taxable persons received in the period before the entry into force of this Act, i.e. between 1 January 2009 and 5 October 2009.
38. Since the challenged Article 12 of the AATPMI had to be abrogated already due to its inconsistency with the first paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court did not adopt a position with regard to the motion of the plaintiff in the proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts to also conduct an assessment from the viewpoint of the right to private property (determined by Article 33 of the Constitution and Article 1 of Protocol No. 1 to the ECHR).

39. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of Article 43 of the CCA, composed of: Mag. Miroslav Mozetič, President, and Judges Dr Mitja Deisinger, Dr Dunja Jadek Pensa, Mag. Marta Klampfer, Dr Etelka Korpič – Horvat, Dr Ernest Petrič, Jasna Pogačar, Dr Jadranka Sovdat, and Jan Zobec. The Decision was adopted by six votes against three. Judges Klampfer, Korpič – Horvat, and Deisinger voted against. Judges Sovdat and Zobec submitted concurring opinions, whereas Judges Klampfer, Korpič – Horvat, and Deisinger submitted dissenting opinions.

1. I voted against the Decision because in my opinion there exist arguments in favour of the constitutional consistency of Article 12 of the Act on the Additional Taxation of a Part of Managers' Income in the Period of Financial and Economic Crisis (Official Gazette RS, No. 78/09 – hereinafter referred to as the AATPMI).
2. In the case at issue, the Constitutional Court only had to resolve the issue of the retroactive application of the Act, i.e. the possibility or impossibility of applying the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution. The additional taxation determined by the AATPMI itself therefore has no effect on the decision, neither does the amount of the taxation nor the consequences for taxable persons. The Decision is based on the violation of the first paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution, whereby the application of the institute of “quasi-retroactivity” has been virtually excluded by such review of constitutionality. In the Decision the fact that the Act regulated the exceptional circumstances of the financial crisis, that it is a temporary Act, and that it is not comparable to cases which the Constitutional Court has thus far decided on was not taken into consideration. In any case, the prohibition of retroactive effect determined by the first paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution must also apply in the field of taxation, however the extremely exceptional situation where quasi-retroactivity can be applied regarding tax law must also be taken into consideration.
3. In legal theory, the term quasi-retroactivity is explained as the effect of a law whose prescribed consequences begin after the regulation is published, whereby the appearance of such consequence in the law is linked to circumstances (facts) from the time before the law was published.<sup>1</sup> The difference between true and quasi-retroactivity is expressed precisely in relation to the existence of the state of the facts, namely whether the state of the facts is already final (true retroactivity) or whether such is fully finalised only after the law is published.<sup>2</sup> One characteristic of tax obligations is precisely that the relevant state of the facts for taxation is final when an income tax obligation arises, whereby such obligation arises only at the end of the tax year. All income from employment that natural persons receive in a tax year, which is equivalent to a calendar year, is subject to income tax. Consequently, Article 12 of the AATPMI only has quasi-retroactive effects. It would have true retroactive effect if its effects stretched beyond the current tax period, for instance into 2008, [a tax year] for which income has already been subject to taxation in conformity with the [tax] assessment decision of the tax authority issued in 2009.

4. The concept of a “tax period” has also been accepted by the German Federal Constitutional Court and the Constitutional Court of Belgium.<sup>3</sup> In the German legal literature, the decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court are indeed subject to critical assessments, however with regard to tax law, quasi-retroactive effect is in principle allowed under certain conditions.<sup>4</sup>
5. A comparative law analysis conducted by the Constitutional Court demonstrates that in the event a regulation enters into force during a tax period and applies from the beginning of such period (for instance, from 1 January), such regulation would have:
  - true retroactive effect in states which accepted the so-called concept of a taxable event (Denmark, Finland, Hungary, Netherlands, Poland, and Sweden); however, even though the retroactive effect of regulations is in principle prohibited, the review of the possible unconstitutionality of such regulation varies between the states, such that the retroactive effect of regulations depends on standards, the length of the period of time, exceptional circumstances, the necessity of such to achieve an aim in the public interest, minimal effects for taxpayers, etc.;
  - quasi-retroactive effect in those states that accepted the so-called concept of a tax period (Belgium, France, Germany, Italy, Luxembourg, Spain, Turkey, and Portugal) where such retroactive effect is in principle allowed;
  - in Greece, such retroactive effect of tax regulations is allowed already by the constitution;
  - in the U.S. and in the United Kingdom, such adoption and the effects of regulations form a common legislative practice.
6. No case such as the one assessed in this Decision by the Constitutional Court was noted in the reviewed case law of foreign constitutional courts. The AATPMI namely refers to an exceptional time of financial and economic crisis and provisionally introduces an additional tax. Also the position of the Court of Justice of the European Union is that a sudden financial crisis or unpredictable budgetary problems can justify the retroactive effect of regulations that create a [tax] burden.<sup>5</sup> I am of the opinion that in other states the question of quasi-retroactivity in cases involving an additional tax on the responsible persons in companies that received a surety or funds from the state for the attenuation of the consequences of the financial and economic crisis would not have been raised. Such income had its origin in the management or supervision of the mentioned business entities receiving [state] aid and consequently their income stemmed from taxpayers’ money as well.

7. In the current Decision, the lack of a substantiated public interest for the existence of the retroactive effect of the challenged statutory provision is deemed to be decisive. The allegation in the legislative file (“that unsuccessful managers would be left without unjustified bonuses”) is evaluated as insufficient in the Decision. The Constitutional Court namely established that the public interest in the sense of the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution is not demonstrated by this allegation. I believe that with its short, ambiguously expressed substantiation the legislature nonetheless stated what it could have stated by means of a longer substantiation. The legislature’s allegation in the legislative file must be connected with the law itself, i.e. with the clearly expressed intention of the law. Such entails that funds from the budget of the state cannot be spent on bonuses, because such bonuses are “unjustified”. By the additional tax that income has not been seized, but has only been subject to an additional tax. The public interest [required] by the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution was thereby demonstrated, because it was clearly evident from the [stated] purpose of the Act. In this event, also the second condition was fulfilled, namely that there was no severe interference with the acquired rights of responsible persons, and also their social rights have not been jeopardised.<sup>6</sup> The universal principle of justice is connected with this question as well. In life a regulation that rewards an individual with money that he or she receives from people – taxpayers – as aid in difficult times is unimaginable and legally unfair.
8. Epilogue: Due to the decision to abrogate Article 12 of the AATPMI, the refund of the additional tax together with default interest calculated until 30 November 2013 will amount to EUR 2,130,585.61.<sup>7</sup> Such amount will be refunded from the budget of the state from taxpayers’ funds.

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE DR JADRANKA SOVDAT, JOINED BY JUDGE MAG. MIROSLAV MOZETIČ

“No, this tenet does not mean: Everything that benefits the people is law. Rather, it is the other way around: Only what law is benefits the people.”<sup>1</sup>

1. In the case at issue, the Constitutional Court did not decide on whether the plaintiff in the proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts has the right, with regard to his success and responsibilities when performing the tasks of the former president of the management board of a bank, to keep his bonus inasmuch as it exceeded the social security contributions paid and taxation on the basis of the personal income tax (in conformity with the Personal Income Tax Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 13/11 – official consolidated text, 24/12, 30/12, 75/12, 94/12, and 96/13 – the PInTA-2)), as can be read and heard in the media. The Constitutional Court decided on whether the legislature admissibly retroactively introduced a tax obligation – i.e. with ex tunc effect. On the basis of the decision of the Constitutional Court, the Administrative Court, which initiated these proceedings for the review of constitutionality, will decide on the (constitutionality and) legality of the [tax] assessment decision by which a tax obligation was imposed retroactively on individuals. The subject of this review of constitutionality is underlined in Paragraph 19 of the reasoning of the Decision, which stresses that a decision on the possible subjective responsibility of an individual which would proceed from the failure to perform due diligence or possibly even from allegations of the abuse of authorisations when exercising the tasks of the management or supervisory body of a company can only be a subject of concrete proceedings. I agree with that and I add that this can only be subject to concrete proceedings in which all constitutional procedural guarantees are also ensured to such individuals. However, what was mentioned cannot be subject to decision-making in proceedings to review the constitutionality of a law, in the case at issue namely whether the legislature constitutionally admissibly introduced the retroactive effect of a tax law.
2. The essential finding of the Decision is that the legislature did not demonstrate a public interest that would justify the retroactive effect of the challenged statutory provision. When this was established, the Constitutional Court halted its assessment at this point and did not assess the existence of other conditions for the constitutional admissibility of retroactivity determined by the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution. In fact, it was not necessary to do so because the conditions are determined cumulatively. I concur with the Decision in this respect and for such reason I also voted for it. However, in this context, my view of the content of the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution is somewhat different. In addition,

1 At the public hearing in this case, Acad. Prof. Dr Marijan Pavčnik cited (not coincidentally!) the final thought from Radbruch's Second Minute of Legal Philosophy. See G. Radbruch, Pet minut filozofije prava [Five Minutes of Legal Philosophy], Filozofija prava, Cankarjeva založba, Ljubljana 2001, p. 268.

I wish to concur with the positions expressed in certain parts of the reasoning by also stating my own reasons. I also wish to emphasise that in my opinion, under all the conditions determined by the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution, including the admissibility of the interference with “acquired rights”, the assessment of the constitutional admissibility of retroactivity would lead to the same final decision, i.e. to the abrogation of Article 12 of the Act on the Additional Taxation of a Part of Managers’ Income in the Period of Financial and Economic Crisis (Official Gazette RS, No. 78/09 – hereinafter referred to as the AATPMI). The final decision would in my opinion also be the same if the Constitutional Court modified its position regarding the starting point of the review of constitutionality with regard to the retroactive effect of tax regulations and instead of the so-called concept of a taxable event, accepted the so-called concept of a tax period on which the German Federal Constitutional Court insists, despite critics in legal theory, when assessing the constitutional admissibility of changes to tax legislation during a tax year.

3. With regard to the above, I first present my view of the content of the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution, then I state my arguments for the assessment of all the elements of the mentioned constitutional provision, and finally I also demonstrate why in my opinion the operative provisions of the Decision would have to be the same even if the view of the starting point of the assessment with regard to the retroactivity of tax laws was different. However, I concur with the fact that the Constitutional Court did not change its position in the case at issue.

I

4. The Decision proceeds from the fact that the meaning of the prohibition of the retroactive effect of statutory provisions determined by the first paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution, which was expressly written by the Constitution-framer, lies in ensuring one essential element of a state governed by the rule of law, i.e. legal certainty, and thereby in maintaining and reinforcing trust in the law, which are two of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law. I, of course, concur with that. In a state governed by the rule of law, a human has, on one hand, the right to request freedom and opportunities to plan his or her life with a reasonable degree of certainty, and on the other, he or she must be protected by law and order which enable him or her to follow his or her path without interference.<sup>2</sup> On this path, in order to ensure harmony with others and due to the public interest, individuals must adapt their behaviour to regulations that limit their freedom in a constitutionally admissible manner. They can only do this by becoming acquainted with such regulations beforehand, for such reason the constitutional requirement that regulations must be published before they enter into force (the first paragraph of Article 154 of the Constitution), i.e. before an individual is required to abide by them,<sup>3</sup> is

3 “Abstract legal norms contained in the laws are by their nature [...] rules of conduct which apply ex nunc and encompass those legal relations that exist or arise after the norms entered into force. Logically, certain even more important. Of course, I also agree that a prohibition of retroactivity extending to all laws regardless of the field of regulation is not absolute,<sup>4</sup> because the Constitution-framers envisaged an exception under the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution. The prohibition under the first paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution can be seen as a legal rule that concretises the legal principles determined by Article 2 of the Constitution<sup>5</sup> and as a constitutional principle at the same time.<sup>6</sup> On the contrary, such does not apply to the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution, which undoubtedly is a constitutional rule, which is something that is not negligible with regard to the possibilities of its interpretation. Legal rules that introduce exceptions must already in principle be interpreted restrictively. The legislature, which must respect the Constitution when adopting laws, must take this into consideration. The second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution imposes on the legislature [the duty] to assess whether the constitutional conditions that allow it to implement statutory provisions with retroactive effect are fulfilled. This assessment must also have a recognisable and outwardly visible manifestation from which it is evident that the legislature takes its obligation to respect the Constitution seriously. For such reason, it must be evident already in the legislative file (i.e. all legislative material from the legislative procedure) why these conditions are fulfilled (Paragraph 27 of the reasoning of the Decision).

5. In accordance with the position adopted by the Decision, two conditions are prescribed in order for the exception determined by the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution to be admissible: 1) if this is required in the public interest and 2) provided that no acquired rights are infringed thereby (Paragraph 25 of the reasoning of the Decision). At the public hearing, Acad. Prof. Dr Marijan Pavčnik identified three conditions for the admissibility of retroactivity in this provision: 1) only certain of its provisions can have retroactive effect, 2) if this is required in the public interest, and 3) provided that no acquired rights are infringed thereby. In this regard he specifically underlined the cumulative nature of certain conditions. Even before assessing whether the mentioned three conditions [are fulfilled], it is in my opinion necessary to assess whether what is actually at issue is the retroactive effect of a statutory provision. If we establish that what is at issue is retroactivity, I agree that we are also dealing with three conditions, of which two are positive and one is negative. In this respect, the first condition in fact twice emphasises the statutory level of legal norms – only conduct can only be required from people ex nunc. From this it logically follows that legal norms should not have retroactive power.” Statement of the former president of the Constitutional Court in the “Commentary on the Constitution” of 2002. L. Šturm in: L. a law can determine that certain of its (i.e. statutory) provisions can have retroactive effect. And of course, I agree that all conditions must be fulfilled cumulatively, which entails that already the absence (or the presence of the negative condition – an interference with an acquired right) of one of them results in an unconstitutionality.

6. Firstly then, [I will assess] whether in the case at issue we are actually dealing with the retroactive effect of statutory provisions, and afterwards also other conditions. If what is at issue is not retroactivity, Article 155 of the Constitution is not at all applicable, but the matter at issue could possibly only be a question of an interference with the principle of trust in the law, which the Constitutional Court assesses in conformity with Article 2 of the Constitution. As is stated by Paragraph 21 of the reasoning of the Decision, in conformity with the established case law, a law has retroactive effect 1) as a general rule when the moment it becomes applicable is before it enters into force and 2) when the moment it becomes applicable is after it enters into force, but some of its individual provisions have such an effect that they retroactively interfere with legal situations or legal facts that had become final when the previous legal norm was in force. The challenged provision entered into force on 6 October 2009; it determines that the Act “applies to income referred to in this Act received<sup>7</sup> from 1 January 2009 onwards.” So far, in such cases the Constitutional Court deemed that what is at issue is the first mentioned situation, i.e. that the moment when the Act became applicable is before the moment of its entry into force. In this regard, both in Decision No. U-I-62/95, dated 16 February 1996 (Official Gazette RS, No. 14/96, and OdlUS V, 18) and in Decision No. U-I-81/96, dated 12 March 1998 (Official Gazette RS, No. 27/98, and OdlUS VII, 46) the Constitutional Court expressly stated that the manner of the calculation of tax (e.g. by an annual calculation) does not represent a basis for an interpretation under which the validity of a tax obligation is extended to income paid when such statutory obligation did not yet exist. Respect for this position brings us to the conclusion that the challenged statutory provision introduced a retroactive effect of the provisions of the AATPMI.
7. In order to depart from the mentioned explicitly expressed starting point that proceeds from the so-called concept of a taxable event (Paragraph 23 of the reasoning of the Decision), the Constitutional Court would need serious constitutional reasons. At this time, I do not see them myself. I do see, however, those which oppose a change in this position. If a free individual and his or her dignity are the source of the constitutional order – and they are, if the public authority must act in such a manner so as to respect this freedom – then this must also apply in the field of the freedom of property (Article 33 of the Constitution). The state has constitutional authorisation to limit the freedom of property by (inter alia) prescribing tax obligations (Article 147 of the Constitution),<sup>8</sup> but in such a manner that individuals at any moment know what

7 In conformity with the fourth paragraph of Article 4 of the AATPMI, an income is deemed to be received when it is paid or in any other manner made available to the taxable person.

8 The Constitutional Court does not deem these tax obligations to constitute an interference with the private property determined by Article 33 of the Constitution, as long as the amount of the prescribed tax is not such as to jeopardise the essence of property, whereby it becomes such when it exceeds one half of the income; see their obligations are (by a law that is published so that anyone can become acquainted therewith; the first paragraph of Article 154 of the Constitution), because only in such a manner will they also be able to adapt their behaviour and remain free at the same time. Such freedom would be substantially limited if virtually until the end of the year they did not know whether the state would impose additional tax obligations on them either by increasing tax rates or by imposing new taxes, by means of which they would create a burden on the income that they received during the year and which undoubtedly became their private property, and they thus acquired the freedom to dispose of such. Individuals can act freely if they know at any moment what obligations are imposed thereon by the state, therefore [any] obligations must be clearly and specifically determined by law. A tax law on the basis of which individuals cannot understand what their tax obligation is would not fulfil the requirements regarding clarity and precision. Therefore, such a law would be inconsistent already with the principle of the clarity and precision of regulations, which is one of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law determined by Article 2 of the Constitution. Only if individuals know their obligations (in this regard, also legal predictability as one of the elements of legal certainty is at issue), they will be able to fulfil them and exercise their freedom of conduct at the same time. Or, in the context of the field of a tax law and the substantiation presented by Asst. Prof. Dr Aleš Kobal at the public hearing: A tax obligation arises in the month when an individual receives an income; at the end of the year there arises the state's claim for the payment of the tax. What the principle of the precision of tax regulations ensures to individuals is precisely that at any moment in a tax year when they receive an income they can calculate the amount of their tax obligation, and the remainder is what they can allocate for their further personal spending, for investments, for anything. For such reason, already the first day of the tax year and at any moment in the tax year they must know (be able to calculate) how much tax they will pay at the end of the tax year.

8. A modification of the position regarding the so-called concept of a tax period would entail that the taxable obligation in fact does arise at the moment when an income is paid, however the tax is calculated with finality only annually, wherefore an individual could not count on the fact that the state will not modify the tax obligation (i.e. increase it or introduce additional taxation) during the tax year; the competent administrative authority will issue an assessment decision only in the first months of the following year and thus the law, although, for instance, it entered into force only in December of the tax year, will apply with finality only after it has entered into force (when the assessment decision is issued); the state of the facts of the tax assessment will be final only when the tax period comes to an end. If in the case at issue the Constitutional Court had changed its position and followed this path, this would entail that due to respect for the principle of equality (the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution) such position would also have to apply in future cases. This would open the door to the legislature being able to increase tax obligations during a tax year, whereby new or increased obligations would in any event apply to all income in the tax year regardless of when the amendment would enter into force, and the legislature would not have to respect the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution, because this would not be retroactivity at all. The legislature would only have to respect the principle of trust in the law determined by Article 2 of the Constitution – meaning that individuals could only be certain that the state will not deteriorate their position during a tax year arbitrarily, i.e. without a real substantiated reason predominantly in the public interest.<sup>9</sup> I do not find such modification of the position acceptable precisely due to an individual's freedom to act and legal predictability. In addition to the constitutional reasons already mentioned, two additional reasons strengthen my conviction that the hitherto constitutional case law is correct. On one hand, there is the warning of Asst. Prof. Dr Kobal that due to the criticisms in legal theory, the Federal Finance Court of Germany (which is one of the specialised supreme courts) is already leaning towards the full prohibition of retroactivity in the field of periodic taxes. With regard to the above, I can easily imagine the arguments for such a change. On the other hand, although the German Federal Constitutional Court maintains its current position, what is essential is the assessment test that was introduced for instances referred to as the quasi-retroactivity of a tax law. This test is not the same as the test in the established case law of our Court with regard to interferences with the principle of trust in the law determined by Article 2 of the Constitution. [I will address] this issue later (in Section III).

9. I therefore agree that we are dealing with the retroactive effect of statutory provisions. Consequently, firstly the question of whether the first condition is fulfilled is raised: only a law can determine that certain of its provisions have retroactive effect. In Decision No. U-I-181/94, dated 30 March 1995 (Official Gazette RS, No. 21/95, and OdlUS IV, 31), to which the plaintiff in the proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts also refers, the Constitutional Court abrogated the retroactive effect of an executive regulation of a ministry, by which the obligation to make payments into the budget was introduced, due to two inconsistencies, namely with Articles 147 and 155 of the Constitution. Article 147 of the Constitution prohibits the ex nunc introduction of tax burdens by implementing regulations, while Article 155 prohibits their ex tunc introduction. By Decision No. U-I-185/10, Up-1409/10, dated 2 February 2012 (Official Gazette RS, No. 23/12, and OdlUS XIX, 33), by which the Constitutional Court abrogated a statutory provision that ordered the retroactive application of an executive regulation, the Constitutional Court specifically emphasised that only a law can determine that statutory provisions have retroactive effect. However, the emphasis that only individual statutory provisions can have retroactive effect, not an entire law, is not yet present in the hitherto case law. The fact that also this emphasis could be relevant in the case at issue was stressed by Asst. Prof. Dr Kobal at the public hearing. Namely, the challenged provision does not introduce the retroactive effect of “individual” provisions of the Act, but the retroactive effect of the entire Act – the Act which “introduces the obligation of the payment of an additional tax on income received for the management or supervision of business entities determined by this Act” (Article 1 of the AATPMI). In my opinion, this warning must be taken seriously. The case at issue does not only concern a correction of individual legal norms in a system of taxation and their ex tunc application,<sup>10</sup> but the introduction of a completely new tax obligation that the legislature introduced by an entirely new law<sup>11</sup>, which is in its entirety also applicable retroactively, as is formulated in the wording of the challenged statutory provision. In fact, second thoughts regarding a [possibly] too narrow interpretation of the Constitution would be possible in this part, especially from the viewpoint [of preventing] that the choice of the legislative technique would in itself influence the adoption of the position whether what is at issue are individual statutory provisions or the entire Act. However, the position that an interpretation which disregards this perspective widens the application of a legal rule which is to be an exception and which explicitly refers to individual provisions of a law is also pertinent (and even more so when what is at issue is a law that introduces a new tax).

10. The Decision does not elaborate upon the first condition, but argues the absence of the public interest, the existence of which is the second condition for the retroactive effect of individual statutory provisions. In this context, it must be underlined that in conformity with the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution, there must exist a public interest for any retroactive effect of statutory provisions, even if they do not interfere with acquired rights. What is at issue is a public interest which can only be attained by the retroactive effect of statutory provisions or as is formulated in the Decision: “[a] public interest, one which substantiates [...] the retroactive effect of the regulation” (Paragraph 26 of the reasoning of the Decision). The Decision introduces a measure of strictness as regards the legislature in the sense that already in the legislative procedure it must be clearly evident what the public interest is due to which the retroactive effect of individual statutory provisions must be introduced. However, such strictness is logical and based on the fact that the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution entails an exception to an important constitutional rule (the principle of the prohibition of retroactivity determined by the first paragraph of this Article), which falls within an elementary

10 As was stated, for instance, by the European Court of Human Rights in N. K. M. v. Hungary, dated 14 May 2013, namely that retroactive taxation can be applicable “essentially to remedy technical deficiencies of the law” (paragraph 51), whereby the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – ECHR) does not contain a provision which would be substantially equal to Article 155 of the Constitution.

11 At the public hearing, Asst. Prof. Dr Kobal economically and legally qualified the tax determined by the AATPMI as double taxation – i.e. as a new tax that creates a burden on income that has already been subject to tax (the personal income tax).

part of [the nature of] a state governed by the rule of law. Such conduct also requires the responsible exercise of the legislative power. Consequently, I concur with the argumentation in Paragraphs 28 and 29 of the reasoning of the Decision.

II

11. Even if we recognised – by citing what has been presented in the legislative procedure and by which the Government subsequently substantiated the public interest for the existence of the retroactive effect of statutory provisions – a public interest that would retroactively impose a tax on indeed very high income, the third condition determined by the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution would even then not be fulfilled. From Decisions No. U-I-62/95 and No. U-I-81/96 it clearly proceeds that the Constitutional Court deemed the right to dispose of income paid when a tax was not yet in force an acquired right. This is in a way understandable. If a law regulating taxation is clear and precise, an individual can calculate, when [he or she receives] each paid income, what is the amount of his or her tax obligation and what remains in the sphere of his or her freedom of property.<sup>12</sup> We can take a look at this also from an alternative viewpoint. Laws regulating taxation impose obligations. If an obligation is known at the time of receiving the income, what is at issue is the legitimate expectation of the taxable person to know, by consulting the statutory regulation, how much tax he or she must pay, even if the state is to calculate this officially and with finality only after the end of the tax year. Consequently, the taxable person can freely dispose of the remainder of his or her income, because on the basis of the determined tax obligations he or she can legitimately expect that this part of the income will remain his or hers also after the tax assessment, and this is also protected by the right to private property (Article 33 of the Constitution).<sup>13</sup> Therefore, in the case at issue, taxable persons had a legitimate expectation that they could freely dispose of the income paid on the basis of contractual relations<sup>14</sup> insomuch as they exceed the taxable obligation which was in force when they received them.<sup>15</sup> Together with the prohibition of ret-

- 12 Also Prof. Pirnat deems that the right to dispose of income [remaining] after taxation as in force at the time of acquiring the income entails an integral part of private property determined by Article 33 of the Constitution. See R. Pirnat, Pravne omejitve ukrepov za izhod iz krize [Legal Limitations of Austerity Measures], Podjetje in delo, Nos. 6-7 (2010), p. 1285.
  - 13 Or, as was stated by the European Court of Human Rights: “[A] ‘legitimate expectation’ of obtaining an asset may also enjoy the protection of Article 1 of Protocol No. 1.” Judgment in N. K. M. v. Hungary, paragraph 35.
  - 14 Whether they were also entitled to receive this income was neither the subject of the tax procedure nor is the subject of this review of constitutionality.
  - 15 The allegation of the Government that with regard to rights proceeding from contracts one should not even speak of acquired rights, because they are allegedly only at issue when a right is recognised by a decision of an authority of the state, is so obviously erroneous that it is not even necessary to specifically discuss it. After all, by Decision No. U-I-340/96, dated 12 March 1998 (Official Gazette RS, No. 31/98, and OdlUS VII, 48), to which the plaintiff in the proceedings for the judicial review of administrative act brought attention, the Constitutional Court specifically underlined that the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution also protects acquired obligations law rights.

roactivity, also at issue, above all, is the legitimate expectation of individuals that the state will not retroactively impose new obligations on them, because their freedom of property would be substantially limited if until the end of the tax period they did not know whether the state would impose an additional tax burden on them or not. Namely, if a prohibition on the retroactive interference with acquired rights is in force, there must a fortiori exist a prohibition on imposing retroactive tax burdens – when what is at issue is actually the fact that in reality the content of this “right” is, from such perspective, “the right not to have obligations”.

12. In Decisions No. U-I-62/95 and U-I-81/96 the Constitutional Court interpreted the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution as a legal rule that does not allow further exceptions. If the conditions determined therein are fulfilled, retroactivity is allowed, if they are not, it is not allowed. As soon as the Constitutional Court established that there was an interference with acquired rights, it deemed such retroactivity to be inadmissible. However, already in Decision No. U-I-340/96 (which was adopted at the same session as Decision No. U-I-81/96!) the Constitutional Court indicated that in conformity with the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution it might also allow a retroactive law that would interfere with acquired rights if this were necessary due to the protection of an even more weighty right or due to the elimination of even more severe interferences with others’ rights. This is what in fact it has done two times thus far: the first time by Decision No. U-I-60/98, dated 16 July 1998 (Official Gazette RS, No. 56/98, and OdlUS VII, 150), when what was at issue was an interference with legitimate expectations<sup>16</sup> regarding the payment of lost profit when confiscated property was returned, and the second time by Decision No. U-I-60/99, dated 4 October 2001 (Official Gazette RS, No. 91/01, and OdlUS X, 168; Paragraph 24 of the reasoning this Decision expressly refers also to Decision No. U-I-340/96), when what was at issue was an interference with the right of authorised investment companies to select state property. Thereby, the Constitutional Court interpreted the third condition “provided that no acquired rights are infringed thereby” as if in fact it stated “provided that no acquired rights are inadmissibly infringed thereby”. The reasoning of such admissibility is in its entirety evident in Decision No. U-I-60/99. The Constitutional Court deemed an interference with acquired rights to be admissible if in addition to the fact that a public interest is demonstrated (which must anyway exist in conformity with the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution – therefore in addition to the fact that a public interest which justifies the retroactive effect of statutory provisions is demonstrated) the interference with acquired rights passes the so-called strict test of proportionality, i.e. that the interference with acquired rights is appropriate and necessary for attaining a public interest

16 At this point one must agree with Prof. Pirnat that what was at issue was not an interference with acquired rights, but an interference with expected rights; see R. Pirnat, Instrumentalnost javnega prava in načelo zaupanja v pravo [The Instrumental Nature of Public Law and the Principle of Trust in the Law], (the example of provisions regarding the pay for annual leave in the Fiscal Balance Act), Podjetje in delo Nos. 6-7 (2012), p. 1048. However, also expected rights that are protected by Article 33 of the Constitution must be protected by the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution.

and is also proportionate in comparison with the interest that is being protected. An interference with acquired rights can thus be admissible under the conditions determined for interferences with human rights and fundamental freedoms.

13. In such context, we can first of all raise the question of whether it is possible to assess retroactive interferences with acquired rights and the retroactive imposition of obligations in accordance with the same criteria. Such question particularly arises when the Constitutional Court at the same session in one case interprets the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution strictly regarding an ex tunc imposition of obligations and in the other case regarding an ex tunc interference with acquired rights, allowing a relaxation of this strictness, however on the basis of the strict test of proportionality when different rights oppose each other. One could also possibly conclude from the above that by Decision No. U-I-81/96 the Constitutional Court established a stricter assessment regarding the interpretation of the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution in the part “no acquired rights are infringed thereby” when additional obligations are imposed ex tunc, because what is at issue in this context is not that different rights can collide but the relationship state – individual, whereby the state imposes obligations on individuals.
14. Even if we ignore the mentioned question and even if the test referred to in Decision No. U-I-60/99 was relevant to the retroactive imposition of tax obligations, it is clearly evident that the mentioned test in fact includes both tests of the admissibility of interferences with human rights, i.e. the test of legitimacy (the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution; in conformity with the established constitutional case law, also the public interest is a constitutionally admissible aim for the limitation of human rights) and the strict test of proportionality (Article 2 of the Constitution; appropriateness, necessity, and proportionality in the narrower sense). However, the test of legitimacy is the first condition, therefore at this point again first of all the question is raised whether there exists a public interest that justifies the retroactive effect. Just as it was not demonstrated with regard to the second condition determined by the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution, it would neither be demonstrated in the first step of the assessment of the third condition – with regard to the interference with an acquired right – if we followed this path.
15. If, for instance, we deemed the need to protect public funds granted to business entities in the form of sureties or guarantees, or funds for the attenuation of the consequences of the financial and economic crisis on the basis of measures adopted by the National Assembly and the Government (the second paragraph of Article 3 of the AATPMI) to be a demonstrated public interest, we would come to the conclusion that the retroactive interference was not necessary for the protection of the mentioned funds. All the measures that were adopted and that envisaged the involvement of public funds are namely statutorily expressly regulated and contain – to which also the Decision draws attention (Paragraph 13 of the reasoning) – express limitations to ensure that these public funds are used for eligible purposes. The measures were only possible if expressly determined limitations with regard to the income of the members of the management and supervisory bodies in these business entities [were respected] during the time when public funds were being received. Supervision by competent authorities was also envisaged, together with the sanction of either the return of the funds or the nullity of contracts, and minor offence sanctions were envisaged as well. The state thus established aid from public funds in the time of crisis, but at the same time determined the conditions under which this aid was allocated, including the condition of the limitation of payments to management and supervisory bodies. Therefore, in order to protect public funds the state did not need the measure of the retroactive effect of a tax law as well; consequently the measure was not necessary.

16. With regard to the companies of which the state was the majority owner and could as such influence the conduct of the management and supervisory boards by exercising its rights, another reason joins the mentioned one that speaks against the necessity. At the public hearing, Higher Court Judge Counsellor Marjanca Faganel drew attention thereto in the name of the applicant of this review of constitutionality. She warned that in these instances the state had at its disposal absolutely all the measures in conformity with the law regulating companies in order to achieve that its influence be enforced. One can agree with that as well. If a state acts iure gestionis, then it must act, as other entities, in conformity with existing regulations in order to enforce its interests. Corporate law gives it sufficient mechanisms to this end. If the state does not exploit these mechanisms as one would expect in the interest of efficient management, then it cannot use (abuse?) its position in power – iure imperii – and thereby ex tunc repair what it did not do right iure gestionis. Such conduct would also create an inequality (without a real reason proceeding from the nature of the matter) between business entities with respect to the question of who their owner is.
17. If we assessed the interference with “acquired rights” from the viewpoint of the strict test of proportionality, then at least also the question of proportionality in the narrower sense would arise. The part of income which remained to individuals after taxation under the personal income tax became subject to the additional tax. With regard to the rate of 49%, calculations indicate that, for instance, the total tax rate of the plaintiff in the proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts would exceed 80% if the personal income tax is [taken into consideration] as well. By taking into consideration Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-91/98, we would thus as well be faced with a tax burden which substantially exceeds 50% taxation on income, therefore the question of proportionality in the narrower sense and thus of the admissibility of an interference with private property protected by Article 33 of the Constitution would become pertinent.<sup>17</sup>
18. If the Constitutional Court continued its assessment and also addressed the question of how to interpret the concept of the infringement of acquired rights from the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution with regard to Decision No. U-I-81/96, on one hand, and Decisions No. U-I-340/96 and No. U-I-60/99, on the other, then already in this Decision it would first have to adopt a clear position with regard to the question that I highlighted in paragraph 13 of this separate opinion. What is in my opinion especially important for the case at issue is that regardless of which path the Constitutional Court were to follow, i.e. either the path of Decision No. U-I-81/96 or the path of Decision No. U-I-60/99, it would have arrived at the same conclusion.

III

19. Why would we come to the same conclusion even if we changed the standpoint from the hitherto constitutional case law and followed the example of German constitutional case law? It is true that despite the criticisms in legal theory, the German Federal Constitutional Court persists in its starting point as regards the so-called tax period, according to which the emergence of tax debt is deemed to be the legally decisive moment, which with regard to periodic taxes arises on the last day of the tax period for which the tax is being assessed and is assessed by an assessment decision issued by the competent authority. The German constitution does not contain a provision such as the provision in Article 155 of the Constitution [of the Republic of Slovenia], therefore the entire assessment proceeds from the viewpoint of an interference with the principle of trust in the law, namely both “true retroactivity” and “quasi-retroactivity”, whereby the first one is absolutely prohibited and the second one can be admissible. Different provisions of constitutions can of course already entail the first essential reason due to which different positions of different constitutional courts can (and must) emerge. However, what in this context is even more essential in my opinion is the fact that also the German Federal Constitutional Court is very much aware that in instances of tax obligations it is dealing with special situations in which mere supervision over the arbitrariness of the legislature’s behaviour as regards changing tax obligations during a tax period does not suffice. For such reason, it stresses that the retroactive effect of tax regulations is only compatible with the principle of trust in the law if the interference is substantiated by a special public interest, one which substantiates precisely the retroactive effect of a regulation, and if the principle of proportionality thereby remains protected – therefore if an interference is appropriate and necessary for the attainment of the statutory aim and if with regard to the overall assessment of the weight of the affected trust and the weight and necessity of the reasons for retroactive effect the limit of attributability remains protected (BVerfG, BvL 6/07, dated 10 October 2012). The German Federal Constitutional Court thus assesses the admissibility of quasi-retroactivity by a test, which is the same as our test of the admissibility of interferences with human rights, therefore by the test of legitimacy (a public interest which justifies precisely the retroactive effect of statutory provisions) and the strict test of proportionality – it is an interference that is appropriate, necessary, and proportionate in the narrower sense.
20. Therefore, even if the Constitutional Court did have constitutionally admissible reasons for modifying the position and assessed the constitutionality of the challenged statutory provision in accordance with the mentioned criteria, the assessment would bring us, due to the reasons I have presented (in Section II), to the same result, i.e. to the establishment of unconstitutionality, whereby the Constitutional Court could have equally halted [its assessment] already at the first step of the assessment – because a public interest which specifically justifies retroactive effect is not demonstrated.

21. Due to the presented reasons, by following any possible parameters from the constitutional case law, I myself come to the same decision in the case at issue. All this further strengthens my conviction that the [decision from the] operative provisions of the Decision, which I have supported with my vote, is correct. The decision brings long-term respect for individuals' freedom (and the freedom of property as well) by simultaneously fulfilling the obligations towards the state, which is called upon to ensure the common welfare, but in such a manner that also thereby respects the law.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE DR ETELKA KORPIČ – HORVAT

1. I voted against the abrogation of Article 12 of the of the Act on the Additional Taxation of a Part of Managers' Income in the Period of Financial and Economic Crisis (Official Gazette RS, No. 78/09 – hereinafter referred to as the AATPMI), because I do not concur with the assessment that the public interest for the existence of the retroactive effect of Article 12 of the AATPMI is not demonstrated.
2. In Paragraph 28 of the reasoning the Constitutional Court states that in the legislative file (Gazette of the National Assembly, No. 60/09, EPA 317-V, dated 8 May 2009) one cannot find a special substantiation of the public interest for the existence of the retroactive effect of the Act. With regard to [the question of] whether the public interest was demonstrated in the legislative file, it indeed follows from the Decision that the allegation in the legislative file “that unsuccessful managers would be left without unjustified bonuses” could be deemed as the substantiation of the retroactive effect of the Act<sup>1</sup>, but in this respect the Decision concludes that this allegation does not demonstrate public interest in the sense of the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution. I am of the opinion that the Constitutional Court here failed to substantiate its assessment. It is true that the excerpt from the sentence contains too many value-based judgments as to what successful and unsuccessful managers are, which is something that does not belong within the legislature's assessment, and that this can be the reason for not taking [the passage] into consideration, however I think that the Constitutional Court should have taken into consideration the legislative file in its entirety and connect it with the reasons and aims regarding the adoption of the AATPMI stated therein.

1 The whole sentence from the legislative file to which the Constitutional Court refers and which refers to the reasons for the adoption of the Act reads as follows: “[...] It is precisely the unethical conduct of certain managers or ethical relativism in relation to the principle of the supremacy of the market over ethics that encouraged us to prepare a new regulation that would contribute to achieving a system that would enable unsuccessful managers to be left without unjustified bonuses or the prevention of excessive compensation of managers in times of the financial and economic crisis.” See Gazette of the National Assembly, No. 60/09, EPA 317-V, p. 3.

3. In Paragraph 31 of the reasoning the Constitutional Court states that the available budget resources were reduced due to the fact that state funds were granted to business entities, however this fact cannot fulfil the requirement of there being a public interest in order for the challenged statutory provision, which is addressed to individuals, to have a retroactive effect, and that the introduction of a retroactive tax obligation cannot substitute for the statutory regulation of the system of rewarding the members of management and supervisory bodies. I am of the opinion that the aim of the AATPMI was not to regulate the system of payments of the mentioned bodies, but to protect public funds by higher taxation, namely by higher taxation of that income that was very (excessively) high<sup>2</sup> in order for the funds to be returned into the budget in such a manner. In my opinion, this fulfils the requirement of there being a public interest.
4. Furthermore, the reasons stated by the Government with regard to the public interest were rejected by the Constitutional Court with considerable ease. The Constitutional Court established that the Government failed to sufficiently demonstrate the existence of a public interest for the ex tunc [effect of the Act] (Paragraphs 33 through 36 of the reasoning). This also applies to the allegation of the Government stated at the public hearing that one of the aims of the AATPMI was to prevent avoidance from paying this tax, which is something that even the Court of Justice of the European Union admits (the Judgment in Stichting "Goed Wonen" v. Staatssecretaris van Financiën, C-376/02, 26 April 2005) with regard to the retroactive effect of a law.
5. From the legislative file<sup>3</sup> – if we correctly understand it as a whole and if we do not dissect individual, more or less awkwardly formulated sentences – it clearly proceeds that the Act at issue falls within a package of anti-crisis measures in the field of the salaries of members of the management of business entities that are in majority ownership of the state (hereinafter referred to as state companies) and which on the basis of measures for the attenuation of the consequences of the financial and economic crisis received sureties, guarantees, or funds from the state (hereinafter referred to as state aid). From the [legislative] file it clearly proceeds that it is extremely difficult for the Government to maintain control over the income of members of management, inter alia also because their salaries are determined on the basis of contracts and because the data regarding their income are not public. Consequently, people are justifiably asking themselves how it could happen that some managers have high income although their companies are not doing well, they have to dismiss workers, apply for state aid, etc. It further proceeds from the legislative file that the aim of the Act is to prevent excessive compensation of managers in times of financial and economic crisis and that the Act thereby pursues the aim of solidarity in conformity with which also the managers should contribute their share to resolving the financial and economic crisis by paying higher taxes, not only workers by decreasing salaries. All of the above and more is clearly stated in the legislative file.

2 See Article 5 of the AATPMI.

6. With regard to the above, in my opinion the legislature's intention when adopting the AATPMI was clear and commonly known as well. The AATPMI was adopted due to the redirection of public funds into private funds through high payments to the members of managements and supervisory bodies of only those state companies that had received state aid. The taxpayers expected such measure, for such reason it also entailed a fair distribution of the burden that taxpayers carry [in order to enable] the recovery of state banks and state companies.<sup>4</sup> It must be taken into consideration that the legislature has wide discretion when adopting tax regulations, including such with retroactive effect, and that this is a very delicate field. On one hand, taxes represent the most important source of income for the budget of the state, while on the other hand tax obligations interfere with the property sphere of taxable persons. Therefore, the field of the legislature's discretion when adopting laws is not unlimited. It is undisputable, as the Constitutional Court states, that only "a special public interest, one which substantiates precisely the retroactive effect of the regulation without which the pursued aim of the particular regulation could not be achieved" can justify retroactive effect (Paragraph 26 of the reasoning). In the case at issue, a major part of the financial aid was paid to state companies in 2009 before the AATPMI entered into force. If income from the entire tax year had not been subject to taxation, the legislature would not have been able to attain, in an equally effective manner, the fundamental aim of the AATPMI, i.e. to return a certain part of public funds into the budget by an additional taxation on the payment of a high level of personal income to the members of management.
7. In conformity with the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court cannot allow a law to have retroactive effect:
  - if it is not demonstrated that the retroactive application of a law is required in the public interest;
  - if the retroactivity of the law interferes with acquired rights.
8. As stated above, with regard to the first condition, I am of the opinion that the Constitutional Court established with unacceptable ease that the public interest for the existence of the retroactive application of the AATPMI was not demonstrated. If it had established that it was, it would have to assess whether the retroactive effect of the AATPMI interferes with the acquired rights of the affected taxable persons.
9. In its hitherto case law, the Constitutional Court distinguished the retroactivity of a law as true<sup>5</sup> or quasi-retroactivity.<sup>6,7</sup> True retroactivity interferes with acquired rights. Quasi-retroactivity only interferes with expected rights. Quasi-retroactive effect can thus only be disputable due to the protection of the principle of trust in the law in conformity with Article 2 of the Constitution and not in conformity with Article 155 of the Constitution.

10. In theory, it is not disputable when what is at issue is true retroactivity and when quasi-retroactivity, as well as when what is at issue is acquired rights and when expected rights. Acquired rights are at issue when rights are individualised (they concern a determined person) and concretised (they determine the scope of rights). They are determined by an individual act (i.e. a decision, a contract).<sup>8</sup>
11. The case at issue concerns the payment of personal income tax.<sup>9</sup> The state of the facts to which the AATPMI applies is the tax on the income from employment which taxable persons receive in the entire tax year, which is the same as a calendar year and ends on 31 December of the current year. The prepayment of tax does

- 5 In conformity with the doctrine of the Constitutional Court, true retroactive effect is at issue when a time before the entry into force of a regulation is determined as the moment of the beginning of its application and when a time after its entry into force is determined as the moment of the beginning of its application, but some of its provisions have such an effect that they retroactively interfere with legal situations or legal facts that were final before its entry into force. See, for instance, Decision No. U-I-98/07, dated 12 June 2008, Paragraph 23 of the reasoning (true retroactivity).
- 6 The position of the Constitutional Court is that quasi-retroactive effect is at issue when a regulation has effects for a concrete state of the facts that indeed arose before a law is published, but when the law entered into force the state of the facts was not yet entirely final. In such instances, an individual provision of the Act only has quasi-retroactive effect, which can be disputable due to the protection of the principle of trust in the law determined by Article 2 of the Constitution and not by Article 155 of the Constitution. See, for instance, Decision No. U-I-141/01, dated 20 May 2004 (quasi-retroactivity).
- 7 When defining true and quasi-retroactivity, the Constitutional Court modelled its standpoint on the doctrine developed by the German Federal Constitutional Court (Decision dated 31 May 1960, collection of decisions of the German Federal Constitutional Court BVerfGE 11, 139 [146], Decision dated 19 July 1967, BVerfGE 22, 241 [248], Decision dated 20 June 1976, BVerfGE 48, 403 [415]).

- 9 All income from employment which natural persons acquired or achieved in a tax year, which is the same as a calendar year, is subject to personal income tax (the first paragraph of Article 15 of the Personal Income Tax Act, Official Gazette RS, No. 13/11 – official consolidated text, 24/12, 30/12, 75/12, 94/12, and 96/13 – hereinafter referred to as the PInTA-2). In this regard, it is deemed that income is acquired or achieved in the tax year in which it is received, and it is received when it is paid to a natural person or in any other manner made available for his or her disposal (the fifth paragraph of Article 15 of the PInTA-2).

not entail a tax assessment (compare the second paragraph of Article 125 of the PInTA-2). Only on the basis of a final decision of the tax authority on the assessment of personal income tax for the entire tax year does the personal income tax become a final tax. The obligation [to pay] the personal income tax therefore arises since the first prepayment is received in a tax year and finishes when the tax year ends, when the entire income from the employment of taxable persons is known.<sup>10</sup> The person liable for payment of the personal income tax must fulfil the tax obligation only after the tax year ends, on the basis of a final decision of a tax authority on the assessment of the personal income tax (the first paragraph of Article 123 of the PInTA-2).<sup>11</sup> The right of taxable persons to freely dispose of the non-taxed part of their income is concretised in an acquired right only by a final administrative decision, in the case at issue thus only at the end of the 2009 tax year. Therefore, the challenged Article 12 of the AATPMI does not interfere with acquired rights, but only with expected rights; it only has quasi-retroactive effect. It would have true retroactive effect if it was applicable for the tax year 2008, because then it would interfere in a modifying manner with legal situations already final (i.e. with already received final decisions on the assessment of the personal income tax for 2008) and thus with acquired rights.<sup>12</sup> Acquired rights are thus not violated if with regard to a periodic tax the tax obligation changes during the year. In the case at issue, this entails that both conditions for the exceptional admissibility of the retroactive application of the Act are fulfilled. Such retroactivity is required in the public interest and it does not interfere with acquired rights. In fact, this in itself does not entail that the AATPMI is in conformity with the Constitution, but I am of the opinion that such legal situations should be assessed in relation to Article 2 and not to Article 155 of the Constitution.

12. In Paragraph 23 of the reasoning the Constitutional Court states that in Decision No. U-I-62/95 (and in Decision No. U-I-81/96 as well) it has already addressed the issue of the retroactive effect of a tax norm that refers to a periodic tax, but I am of the opinion that cases No. U-I-62/95 and No. U-I-81/96 are not comparable with the case at issue. In case No. U-I-62/95 the Constitutional Court expressly established that the new personal income tax burden interferes with the existing acquired right to dispose of income. As stated above, in the case at issue the Constitutional Court did not even address the assessment of whether the AATPMI interferes with acquired rights. In fact, in note 8 the Constitutional Court concludes that in the 10 See the third paragraph of Article 44 of the Tax Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 13/11 – official consolidated text, 32/12, and 94/12 – TPA-2) [which was] in force at the disputed period of time.

11 Prepayments of tax already paid during a tax year are subtracted from a taxable person's personal income tax as a final tax (the third paragraph of Article 125 of the PInTA-2).

12 A similar position was also adopted by the German Federal Constitutional Court: compare Decisions of the second senate 2 BvL 14/02, 2 BvL 2/04, 2 BvL 13/05, and 2 BvR 748/05, 2 BvR 753/05, 2 BvR 1738/05, both dated 7 July 2010, and Decision of the first senate No. 1 BvL 6/07, dated 10. October 2012, accessible at <http://www.bundesverfassungsgericht.de>. As stated also by the Constitutional Court of Belgium: cf. Decision No. 109/2004, dated 23 June 2004, accessible at <http://www.const-court.be>.

mentioned cases, i.e. No. U-I-62/95 and No. U-I-81/96, it accepted the so-called concept of the taxable event and not the concept of the so-called tax period, although the Constitutional Court did not state this in any of the mentioned Decisions. It would also be difficult to come to such a conclusion on the basis of definitions of true and quasi-retroactivity that the Constitutional Court developed in its constitutional case law, because the cases are in fact different. In conformity with the Personal Income Tax Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 71/93 – hereinafter referred to as the PInTA), severance pay upon retirement was not included in the personal income tax base. Consequently, a zero final tax then applied to this severance pay, from which it follows that on the day of retirement the person acquired the right to dispose of the entire amount of the severance pay. In February 1995 (more precisely on 5 February 1995) the Act Amending the Personal Income Tax Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 7/95 – hereinafter referred to as the PInTA-A) was published, which was applicable from 1 January 1995 onwards. One of the changes that it introduced referred to severance pay upon retirement: in accordance with the new regulation, it had to be included in the personal income tax base. Due to the fact that before the entry into force of the PInTA-A a zero final tax was applicable to the severance pay, the retroactive application of the PInTA-A had true retroactive effect. The Constitutional Court adopted the same position also in Decision No. U-I-81/96, by which it assessed the provisions of the Act Amending the Corporate Profit Tax Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 20/95 - hereinafter referred to as the CPTA-A), which made general reserves of banks and savings banks that exceeded by more than 20% the prescribed capital suitability subject to taxation, which beforehand had also not been subject to taxation. In that case, the Act entered into force on 8 April 1995 and was applicable from 1 January 1995 onwards. In both cases what was at issue was the introduction of a new tax, i.e. an interference with states of the facts that had already been final as non-taxed.<sup>13</sup> Consequently, in both cases the new taxation interfered with the right to freely dispose of the non-taxed part of the income. This is precisely the point in which both mentioned cases significantly differ from the case at issue.

13. Since in my opinion the case at issue does not concern an acquired right, but an expected right, Article 12 of the AATPMI cannot be abrogated by referring to Article 155 of the Constitution, but possibly only due to the interference with the principle of trust in the law protected by Article 2 of the Constitution. Therefore, in the case at issue, what is of fundamental importance is not the constitutional question of whether there exists a public interest, but weighing what has to be given priority – the public interest or the trust in the law of the affected taxable persons.

<sup>13</sup> In this regard, attention should be drawn to the fact that the PInTA, which was relevant for the decision-making of the Constitutional Court in case No. U-I-62/95, treated the prepayment of tax during a year as the payment of a special tax which it deemed to be a subtype of the personal income tax (see the first paragraph of Article 3 of the PInTA). Only the Personal Income Tax Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 54/04 – hereinafter referred to as the PInTA-1) introduced the prepayment of tax such as those determined by the PInTA-2 (cf. Personal Income Tax Draft Act – PInTA-2, Gazette of the National Assembly, No. 2/04, EPA 1088-III, p. 19).

14. The Constitutional Court should have therefore weighed between two constitutionally protected assets, i.e. between the public interest and the trust of the affected taxpayers in legal certainty and a state governed by the rule of law. It should have taken into consideration all the circumstances of the case and carry out a constitutional assessment with regard to the importance of the public interest, on one hand, and the trust of the affected individuals in a state governed by the rule of law, on the other. It should have answered the question of whether due to a real substantiated public interest it is urgently necessary that the regulation determined by Article 12 of the AATPMI also applies to income that taxable persons received before the entry into force of the AATPMI, however during the same tax year, i.e. in the period from 1 January 2009 until 5 October 2009.<sup>14</sup> In such framework, it should have taken a position with regard to the questions of whether the disputed changes had been relatively predictable, whether the affected individuals could have counted on the change in advance, what the weight of the change and the importance of the existing legal situation for the addressees of the AATPMI was, and what the weight and the importance of the public interest was, including the consideration of whether an interference with trust in the law satisfies the principle of justice.<sup>15</sup> Briefly, the Constitutional Court should have explained whether the effects of the AATPMI interfere so severely with expected rights and thereby with trust in the law that the interference is not proportional to the public interest. The Constitutional Court did not carry out such weighing.
15. When weighing whether in this very specific case the public interest or trust in the law should be given priority, the Constitutional Court should not have overlooked the warning Summum ius, summa iniuria (Supreme justice, supreme injustice; Cicero).
16. With regard to the above, I am of the opinion that the AATPMI interfered with the expectations of the affected taxable persons that their personal income tax obligations in 2009 would not increase. The Constitutional Court should have therefore assessed whether by the additional taxation of members of management and supervisory bodies from 1 January 2009 until 5 October 2009, [as] determined by the AATPMI, the legislature disproportionately interfered with the principle of trust in the law. Since the Constitutional Court did not conduct such assessment, I could not vote in favour of this Decision.

14 Cf. Decision No. U-I-79/12, dated 7 February 2013, Paragraph 12 of the reasoning.

15 See Decisions of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-11/07, dated 13 December 2007 (Official Gazette RS, No. 122/07, and OdlUS, XVI 86), Paragraph 13 of the reasoning, No. U-I-66/08, Paragraph 58 of the reasoning, and No. U-I-79/12, Paragraph 12 of the reasoning.

1. By the mentioned Decision the Constitutional Court abrogated Article 12 of the Act on the Additional Taxation of a Part of Managers' Income in the Period of Financial and Economic Crisis (Official Gazette RS, No. 78/09 – hereinafter referred to as the AATPMI), because it established that in the case at issue already the first condition prescribed by the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution for the exceptional admissibility of the retroactive effect of an individual statutory provision was not fulfilled. Consequently, without considering whether the second, cumulatively determined condition determined by the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution is fulfilled, it established that the challenged statutory provision is inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution. The abrogation of this provision entails that the regulation determined by the AATPMI does not apply to income that taxable persons received before the entry into force of this Act, i.e. between 1 January 2009 and 5 October 2009.

Therefore, the majoritarian position of the judges is that the legislature failed to demonstrate even the first condition for the admissibility of the retroactive effect of a regulation, i.e. the public interest.

2. I voted against such decision, because I do not concur with the position that the challenged Act should be assessed by means of the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution and especially not with the conclusion that in the case at issue the legislature failed to demonstrate the public interest. In my opinion, the question raised in the case at issue is not whether Article 12 of the AATPMI is in conformity with Article 155 of the Constitution, because the Act does not extend to the past tax year, but whether the principle of trust in the law, which is one of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law determined by Article 2 of the Constitution, is violated. It is precisely this principle that guarantees to an individual that the state will not worsen his or her legal situation arbitrarily, i.e. without a reason based on the predominant public interest. Below in this dissenting opinion, I will present the arguments for not concurring with the majority. The basic thought that led me to a different decision – whether what is at issue is assessment under Article 155 or under Article 2 of the Constitution – is the existence of the public interest, because I am of the opinion that the aim of the legislature was to prevent, in an efficient manner by adopting the Act, the excessive compensation of managers in those business entities that received state aid, which is something that is in the interest of all taxpayers. In my opinion, the public interest is clearly expressed and is as such an appropriate constitutional basis for such act.
3. The challenged Act was adopted in October 2009 and entered into force on 6 October 2009, i.e. the next day after it was published in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia. On the basis of the challenged Article 12 of the AATPMI, this Act also applied to income received from 1 January 2009 onwards. Thus, income that taxable persons received before the entry into force of this Act, i.e. between 1 January 2009 and 5 October 2009, is included in the taxable base for tax assessment in conformity with this Act (the so-called managers' tax). What is at issue is an increase in the tax on income that has been received from managing a business and supervision carried out by management bodies who benefitted from a surety, guarantee, or financial aid from the state to mitigate the consequences of the financial and economic crisis on the basis of measures adopted by either the National Assembly or the Government. These are salaries, other benefits stemming from employment, or any other compensation for managing these business entities, performance bonuses, severance pay, income received on the basis of profit sharing, and other privileges received by managers of companies that received state aid in a tax year, which is the same as a calendar year.

4. The central and decisive question that had to be answered by the Constitutional Court in the case at issue was whether Article 12 of the challenged Act is in conformity with the constitutional rules regarding the temporal validity of regulations.

This concerns the question of whether by such statutory provision the legislature retroactively interfered with the acquired rights of the affected taxable persons, wherefore the latter is inconsistent with Article 155 of the Constitution. Also the assessment of the allegation regarding the unlawfulness of the disputed legal norm and consequently the resolution itself of this concrete constitutional dispute depend on the answer to this question. Since I proceed from the position that in the case at issue the state of the facts to which the Act referred to has not yet become entirely final, whereby also acquired rights have not yet arisen, what is at issue is not the true retroactivity of the Act determined by Article 155 of the Constitution, but it may only be a question of the protection of expected rights, which are protected through the constitutional principle of trust in the law determined by Article 2 of the Constitution. Indeed, in my assessment the challenged Act is not unconstitutional regardless of the path I choose to carry out the assessment, be it by means of Article 155 or Article 2 [of the Constitution].

5. In conformity with the first paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution, which determines that laws and other regulations and general acts cannot have retroactive effect, there is a prohibition of the retroactive effect of legal acts. An exception to this rule is determined in the second paragraph of the cited provision of the Constitution. The retroactive effect of an individual statutory provision is namely admissible if this is required in the public interest and provided that no acquired rights are infringed thereby. If the Constitutional Court assesses that the condition of there being a public interest is not fulfilled, it establishes that the retroactive effect of the regulation is inadmissible without assessing the acquired rights. If, however, it establishes that a certain measure has been adopted in order to protect the public interest, then it must also assess whether by such measure it interfered with [any] acquired right. Therefore, the Constitution protects rights acquired on the basis of a law in such manner that there can be no interferences therewith with ex tunc effect. In conformity with the doctrine of the Constitutional Court, acquired rights enjoy the same protection as human rights and fundamental freedoms (Decision No. U-I-137/93, dated 2 June 1994). Consequently, an interference with an acquired right is assessed on the basis of the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution by a test of proportionality, i.e. from the viewpoint of the necessity, appropriateness, and proportionality of the interference.

6. In my opinion, in the event of an assessment in conformity with Article 155 of the Constitution, the challenged regulation is not inconsistent with the Constitution, since both conditions for the exceptionally allowed retroactive effect are fulfilled, i.e. the public interest is demonstrated, and I am also of the opinion that [the measure] does not entail an interference with acquired rights. Already in Decision No. U-I-81/96, dated 12 March 1998 (Official Gazette RS, No. 227/98), the Constitutional Court stated that tax regulations must not have retroactive effect, except under the conditions determined by the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution. Such position entails that in the field of taxation retroactivity is not absolutely prohibited. The Constitutional Court must thus in every individual case assess whether what is at issue is a regulation in public interest, as well as whether the regulation entails an interference with acquired rights. With regard to the challenged Act, both conditions determined by the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution are fulfilled, therefore there is no violation of the principle of the prohibition of retroactivity.
7. The challenged regulation was adopted due to the protection of the public interest; what is at issue is a law adopted in the special circumstances of the financial and economic crisis. The liquidity crisis, which followed the financial crisis, also severely affected the real economy. Therefore, in 2009 the state adopted, in an urgent procedure, several measures to revitalise it. By introducing state guarantees granted to banks to support borrowing by business entities, the state attempted to increase the credit activity of banks and thus enable the economy to acquire liquid funds more easily (the Republic of Slovenia Guarantee Scheme Act, Official Gazette RS, Nos. 33/09 and 52/09 – hereinafter referred to as the RSGSA). With the intention of preventing the dismissal of workers, the state introduced new measures in the field of the active employment policy, such as subsidies to ensure full-time work hours by the Partial Subsidising of Full-time Work Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 5/09 – hereinafter referred to as the PS-FWA) and the institute of the temporary layoff by the Partial Reimbursement of Payment Compensation Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 42/09 – hereinafter referred to as the PRPCA). It also adopted measures for co-financing development investment projects already started, co-financing the outplacement of workers, and co-financing the self-employment of employees. All funds for the implementation of these measures were provided for in the budget of the Republic of Slovenia. As a result of this recovery of financial institutions and companies by means of state funds, i.e. on the shoulders of taxpayers, the problem of banks' losses and losses in the economy became a problem for the entire society. Even though the state allocated a part of taxpayers' funds to recovering business entities that had sustained losses, even in years when state aid was received, members of management and supervisory bodies were paid bonuses and other income that evidently were not proportionate to the financial situations in these business entities. Despite very weak financial situations in the business entities that they managed or supervised, these management or supervisory personnel were paid very high income from employment in these subjects, which was something that was evidently not appropriately proportional to the financial situations in these companies. The fact is that we do not have an efficient system of corporate management of companies in the state, despite relatively precise regulation in the Companies Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 65/09 – official consolidated text, 33/11, 91/11, 32/12, 57/12, and 82/13 – hereinafter referred to as the CA-1). One should not overlook the fact that Article 270 of the CA-1, which was in force at the time of the implementation of the anti-crisis measures, already determined that when determining the totality of the income of an individual member of management, supervisory boards must ensure that this income is appropriately proportional to the tasks of the members of the management and to the financial situation in the company, and that in the event that, after the income is determined, the business operations of the company deteriorate and could jeopardise its economic state or cause damage to the company, supervisory boards can also decrease such income. Precisely due to the inappropriate payment policy and the inefficiency of supervision over such, this statutory provision was amended on 20 June 2009 by the Act Amending the Companies Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 42/09 – hereinafter referred to as the CA-1C), whereby companies were required to harmonise these changes with statutes by 1 September 2010. The legislature introduced important novelties with regard to the policy regarding the income of members of management and supervisory bodies and transferred certain competences there regarding to the general meetings of companies. However, not even this ensured the payment of bonuses that would be proportional to the financial situations of the respective business entities. Also ineffective was the prohibition determined in the PSFWA and PRPCA that prohibited business subjects from calculating and paying bonuses to management and supervisory bodies in the business year in which they received a state aid.

8. Since the income of members of management for which the challenged Act determined a higher tax had been determined in employment contracts, in the opinion of such members of management it was paid completely lawfully. Managers of business entities that received state aid were most often in an employment relationship, because they had concluded an employment contract. The contractual nature of an employment relationship is reflected both in the conclusion as well as in the amendment or conclusion of a new employment contract due to changed circumstances. In conformity with Article 49 of the Employment Relationship Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 21/13 and 78/13 – corr. – hereinafter referred to as the ERA-1), a modification of any of the components of an employment contract – which also applies to payment for work – can only be achieved on the proposal of an employee or an employer by an annex to the employment contract. The employment contract is changed and the payment for work is thereby decreased if the opposing party agrees thereto, otherwise the previous employment contract remains in force. Since the refusal to sign an annex to an employment contract is not penalised by labour law legislation, an employer has no possibility to decrease the payment for work. It is also not possible to allege that the bonuses were paid to members of management on the basis of valid obligations law transactions, since with regard to employed managers what is at issue is not a civil law relationship, therefore the unlawfulness of a payment cannot be assessed on the basis of the obligations act and civil law. An employment contract with a manager is a labour law contract, by which the executive director in a public limited company or the company manager of a limited company regulates his or her relationship with the company that he or she manages as an employment relationship with all the elements of such relationship determined by Article 4 of the ERA-1. Bonuses were paid in such amounts as had been determined in the respective employment contracts.

9. In addition to all the mentioned inefficient measures (in practice, it became evident that by the mentioned measures the state could not successfully prevent payments in companies in state ownership that received state aid) the state had to [attempt to] seize the excessive part of the income of the members of management and supervisory bodies by the challenged Act. There was no other way to efficiently protect the financial resources granted in the form of state aid from inappropriate use. Since what was at issue with regard to state aid were budgetary resources, so that through the payment of general taxes all taxpayers contributed to the preservation of the business opportunities of these business entities, there was a public interest that demanded urgent action by the state in a manner that would efficiently interfere with the conduct of individual business entities that on one hand were receiving state aid and on the other were paying disproportionately high bonuses or other income to members of their management and supervisory boards. It is fair that in crisis circumstances one tries to redistribute [a part of] the burden also to the managers who are responsible for the weak financial situation of the business entities that they manage, and not only to [leave the burden to] workers and taxpayers. Therefore, there exists a public interest.
10. In my opinion, also the second condition for the retroactive effect of a regulation is fulfilled because the Act did not interfere with acquired rights. Since [at the moment] when a taxable person receives, during a tax year, a particular income from employment, he or she does not yet acquire the right to dispose of its non-taxed part, in my opinion what is at issue is not an acquired right. When an individual receives a salary or any other income from which the personal income tax is paid, he or she can, in accordance with the tax regulation in force, until the end of the tax year only estimate the expected income and determine what part of the income he or she will have to allocate for the payment of personal income tax after the end of the calendar year, i.e. what part of the income he or she can dispose of. Until the tax year – which is the same as the calendar year – ends, what is at issue in this case is not yet an amount of tax debt determined with finality and thus also not an amount of the available, i.e. non-taxable part of the income. Consequently, with regard to periodic taxes, which is what the personal income tax is, it is not possible to speak of an acquired right until the tax year ends. Such entails that during a tax year it is not possible to attribute true retroactive effect to a newly introduced statutory regulation that introduces higher or additional tax rates for income from employment already taxed beforehand by means of prepayments. For such reason, I am of the opinion that the case at issue, in which the effect of a change in a legal norm refers to the current taxable period – which applies to the personal income tax as a periodic tax – concerns quasi-retroactivity, because with regard to such tax the taxable obligation arises only when the tax year ends. What is essential for quasi-retroactivity is that it is not arbitrary, i.e. a change can be substantiated by factual reasons that stem from social activity.

11. The challenged provision of the AATPMI would therefore have true retroactive effect if its effects extended over the current tax period, i.e. if the change referred to the period before that [tax year] (for instance to 2008) or if the Act was adopted in 2010 and would interfere with income from employment paid in 2009. However, if the Act interfered with legal situations already final and thus with the acquired right to the free disposal of income that has already been subject to taxation on the basis of an assessment decision of a tax authority, that would be true retroactivity, which in conformity with the Constitution is only admissible under the condition of public interest and if what is at issue is not an interference with acquired rights. This is not, however, the case in the case at issue, because Article 12 of the challenged Act only entails that the Act connects the future legal consequences of the new tax law regulation to certain facts which arose in the past, while the concrete state of the facts – an integral part of which are those facts – was not yet final when the Act entered into force. Consequently, in my judgment, the challenged legal norm (only) has quasi-retroactive effect.
12. The German Federal Constitutional Court also differentiates between true retroactivity (echte Rückwirkung, Rückbewirkung von Rechtsfolgen) and quasi-retroactivity (unechte Rückwirkung, tatbestandliche Rückanknüpfung). According to the German constitutional case law, a law has true retroactive effect if it applies to events that have become final before it was published in an official gazette – they are, as a general rule, prohibited. On the contrary, quasi-retroactivity is at issue if the new law applies to economic activities that had been initiated in the past but were not yet completed when the law entered into force; such effects of the law are, as a general rule, admissible (Decision dated 31 May 1960, BVerfGE 11, 139 [146], Decision dated 19 July 1967, BVerfGE 22, 241 [248], Decision dated 20 June 1976, BVerfGE 48, 403 [415]).
13. It is precisely in the field of taxation where the German Federal Constitutional Court differentiates between true retroactivity and quasi-retroactivity by means of the principle of a tax period. In the opinion of the German Federal Constitutional Court, with regard to taxes regarding which a tax obligation arises only at the end of the year, a tax case is not final until the end of that year. Therefore, if a new law (for instance, a personal income tax law) is promulgated before 31 December but is applicable already from 1 January of the same year, in the opinion of the German constitutional case law, such regulation only has quasi-retroactive effect. Only if the new law is supposed to apply also to previous years is it deemed to be retroactive in this part (Decision BVerfG No. 2 BvL 2/83, dated 14 May 1986, BVerfGE 72, 200). Also the position adopted in Decision No. 2 BvL 6/59, dated 19 December 1961 (BVerfGE 13, 261), is interesting; also the plaintiff in the proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts refers thereto, although that Decision is not applicable in its case, because Article 12 of the AATPMI does not determine that income from the previous year is subject to taxation as well.
14. In fact, German fiscal theorists are opposed to the presented differentiation between true and quasi-retroactivity, because in their opinion the emergence of a tax obligation at the end of the year is allegedly only of a technical character and it allegedly does not indicate whether a relevant event subject to taxation has become final beforehand or not. Taxable persons are allegedly entitled to legal certainty with regard to taxable consequences at the moment of the execution of a transaction. However, the German Federal Constitutional Court did not abandon such differentiation, i.e. the position that in the event of a change in a regulation during a tax year the effects are only quasi-retroactive.

15. As proceeds from Decision BVerfG No. 2 BvL 14/02, 2 BvL 2/04, 2 BvL 13/05, dated 7 July 2010, the German Federal Constitutional Court only chose the stricter approach with regard to the assessment of the admissibility of quasi-retroactivity. It underlined that quasi-retroactivity is also compatible with the principle of trust in the law, but only if it is appropriate and necessary for the realisation of the purpose of a law and if the principle of proportionality is not violated when weighing between the affected trust and the necessity of the reasons for the change. In this regard, it proceeded from the starting point that with regard to tax norms it is the emergence of tax debt that is decisive. Therefore, in the field of tax law true retroactivity allegedly only exists in the case when the legislature subsequently changes a tax debt that has already arisen. In the field of personal income tax law, such entails that a change in legal norms with an effect on the current taxable period [represents] quasi-retroactivity, because the tax obligation arises only when the tax year ends. [The German Federal Constitutional Court] also stressed that in the diverse field of quasi-retroactivity, in which, as a general rule, the prohibition of retroactivity does not apply, the troubling effects of disappointment [in relation to] the legally protected trust [in the law] require sufficient substantiation from the viewpoint of their proportionality. Such allegedly also applies in the event when the legislature changes personal income tax legislation during a tax year and the change extends to the beginning of that year. In such event, the addressee of the norm must only accept the disappointment [in relation to] his or her trust [in the law] if this is justified by a special public interest, such that substantiates precisely the retroactive effect of a regulation, and by taking into consideration the principle of proportionality regarding such.
16. The Constitutional Court has also already dealt with the issue of the retroactivity of regulations in the field of taxation. In Decision No. U-I-81/96, dated 12 March 1998 (Official Gazette RS, No. 27/98), by which the Constitutional Court assessed the provisions of the Act Amending the Corporate Profit Tax Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 20/95), it stated that a tax obligation entails an interference by the state in the property sphere of legal entities, therefore “it [...] applies even more to tax regulations that they must not have retroactive effect, except under the conditions determined by the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution, i.e. if such is required in the public interest and provided that no acquired rights are infringed thereby”. Such entails that also in the field of taxation retroactivity is not absolutely prohibited. The Constitutional Court dealt with the question of the retroactive effect of a tax norm that referred to a periodic tax, i.e. personal income tax, also in Decision No. U-I-62/95, dated 16 February 1996. It assessed the regulation determined by the Act Amending the Personal Income Tax Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 7/95), which introduced the taxation of certain personal income – severance pay upon retirement, jubilee bonuses, and one-time solidarity aid – which beforehand were not subject to taxation. The Act entered into force the next day after it was published in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia, i.e. on 5 February 1995, and was applicable from 1 January 1995 onwards. In the mentioned decision, the Constitutional Court in fact adopted the position that such ex tunc determination of a tax obligation is inconsistent with Article 155 of the Constitution, because [such retroactive] tax obligations interfere with an existing acquired right to freely dispose of income (see Paragraph 8 of the reasoning of the mentioned Decision). It was of the opinion that the manner of tax calculation (for instance, yearly) does not represent a basis for interpretation in conformity with which the validity of a tax obligation extends also to income paid when such statutory obligation had not yet existed (see Paragraph 9 of the reasoning of the mentioned Decision). However, what was at issue in that case was a new taxation of categories that had previously been entirely exempt from taxation. Therefore, at the moment of the payment or the formation of the mentioned property categories they were exempt from taxation, which entails that already at that moment individuals acquired the right to freely dispose thereof. This is precisely the aspect from which, in my opinion, [that] case significantly differs from the case at issue. In this regard, attention should be drawn to the fact that the Personal Income Tax Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 71/93, 2/94 – corr. and 7/95 – hereinafter referred to as the PInTA), which was relevant for the decision-making of the Constitutional Court in case No. U-I-62/95, treated the prepayment of tax during a year as the payment of a special tax which it deemed to be a subtype of the personal income tax (see the first paragraph of Article 3 of the PInTA). Only the new Personal Income Tax Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 54/04 – hereinafter referred to as the PInTA-1) introduced the prepayment of tax such as determined by the PInTA-2 (compare with the Personal Income Tax Draft Act – PInTA-2, Gazette of the National Assembly, No. 2/04, EPA 1088-III, p. 19). In fact, at the moment when taxable persons receive an income subject to taxation they can legitimately expect that the income received will not be subject to a higher tax rate than was determined by the legislation in force at that moment, but at that moment they have not yet acquired an individualised and concretised right to freely dispose of such income.

17. In order to overcome the financial and economic crisis more easily, the state provided state aid to business entities, which is certainly in the public interest. Therefore, it is also in the public interest that by means of tax measures it tried to ensure that state aid achieve its purpose by [ensuring] that the business entities that received state aid (as a general rule, precisely due to their weak financial situation) are not exhausted by excessive payments to members of management. The Act at issue encompassed the members of the management of those business entities in which the crisis conditions began to be reflected more severely in operations. For such reason, it was more than reasonable to expect from such personnel that they would ensure the economical behaviour of business entities and in such framework also adjust their income to the given circumstances.
18. The taxation determined by the challenged Act entails the taxation of income from the employment of individuals that is among the highest in the state and that was paid in companies which in the period of the financial and economic crisis received state aid in the form of subsidies and sureties. For such taxation, the legislature demonstrated, (also) insofar as it extends to income received before the entry into force of this Act, the existence of a particularly substantiated public interest that could only be achieved by Article 12 of the AATPMI having quasi-retroactive effect. It is namely in the public interest that, in such exceptional circumstances of the global financial and economic crisis, the policy regarding the income of management and supervisory personnel of companies, which precisely due to this crisis benefitted from state aid, is regulated in such a manner that their income is not excessive but that they are in accord with the real financial situation in those business entities. Namely, the realisation of the purpose of such state aid is thereby indirectly ensured. I am convinced that when pursuing such an important public interest for the society as a whole this public interest outbalances the interference with the trust of taxable persons in the stability of the existing legal regulation of the personal income tax.

19. With regard to the above I am of the opinion that by the challenged statutory regulation the legislature in fact did interfere with the principle of the protection of trust in the law, which is one of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law, because it thereby interfered with the legitimate expectations of taxable persons under the AATPMI that they would be able to dispose of their received income above the taxation limit determined by the personal income tax legislation in force already at the moment when they receive such income (see Paragraphs 10 and 11). However, the legislature had real reasons substantiated in the predominant and legitimate public interest for the interference in these expectations. Consequently, in my judgment, the challenged legal norm is not inconsistent with Article 2 of the Constitution.

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE JAN ZOBEC

1. In this concurring opinion I only express two minor reservations with regard to the substantiation of the Decision. The first refers to the findings and positions from Paragraph 28 and its continuation in Paragraphs 29 and partly 30, while the second refers to the assessment of the arguments stated by the Government in favour of the retroactive effect of the challenged Article of the AATPMI.
2. Paragraph 28 states that “in the legislative file one cannot find particular substantiation of the public interest for the existence of the retroactive effect of the challenged statutory provision.” This is followed by: “As far as the allegation in the legislative file ‘that unsuccessful managers would be left without unjustified bonuses’ could be deemed to be the substantiation of the retroactive effect of the Act, it must be established that it does not demonstrate a public interest in the sense of the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution.” In my opinion, such allegation entails a clear substantiation of the retroactive effect of the Act. It states that the bonuses that unsuccessful managers unjustifiably received will be seized to the benefit of the state. To be left without a bonus presupposes its acquisition – one cannot be left without something that one does not even have. Therefore, only someone who has already received a bonus (or at least received the right to a bonus or the right to request a bonus) can be left without the bonus. A phrasing that would refer to future conduct, i.e. to the prevention of the payment of unjustified bonuses, would only read as follows: “that (unsuccessful) managers will not be paid (unjustified) bonuses” or “that (unsuccessful) managers will not receive (unjustified) bonuses”.

3. The legislature’s aim as regards the retroactive effect of the disputed statutory provision was therefore (not to dissuade [members of management] from being paid unjustified bonuses, but) that unsuccessful managers to whom unjustified bonuses have been paid would be left without such unjustified bonuses, i.e. the seizure thereof. This could in fact entail a public interest in the sense of the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution. But only if such benefit were also legitimate (constitutionally consistent). However, in my opinion (although at first sight nothing is wrong with the aim that something is seized from someone who received it unjustifiably), it lacks such quality.
4. Firstly, already because such aim is internally contradictory. If, namely, someone has received something unjustifiably, there is no need to adopt regulations that would by means of retroactive effect enable the seizure of that which was unjustifiably received. Whatever has been unjustifiably paid already had such attribute (i.e. unjustifiability) already when it happened, i.e. upon the payment itself. If this occurs subsequently, after the payment has already been effectuated, i.e. proclaimed to be unjustified ex tunc, we are dealing with retroactivity. The action (in this case the payment of a bonus) is then ex tunc legally qualified as unjustified.
5. When, however, a legislature decides to [start] such adventure (the game with the constitutional prohibition of retroactivity), by which it interferes with acquired rights (acquired at the latest when [a bonus or salary] is paid), it must, of course, firstly clearly define the criteria of unjustifiability – in the case at issue, also who the unsuccessful managers are from whom what has already been paid must be seized. Only after it does that could these criteria, which are an integral part of the aim (as the legislature explained, it namely did not aim, by means of such retroactivity, at all bonuses, but only at those that were unjustified – and even not at the seizure of such from everyone, but only from unsuccessful managers), be subject to an assessment of legitimacy (i.e. consistency with the Constitution). If the aim – of which these criteria were an integral part – passed such test, also the retroactive interference with acquired rights itself would then have to be subject to the strict test of proportionality – where again everything would be centred on the aim in the framework of which the criteria of the unjustifiability of bonuses would play an important role. However, in the Act there is no sign of any such criteria and of how which managers are unsuccessful should be assessed. Moreover, the Act does not even mention any unjustified bonuses or unsuccessful managers. The tax hits everyone – both unsuccessful and successful [managers] and applies to both justified (for instance, those that have been paid to successful managers during the crisis) and unjustified bonuses (paid to managers who caused deficits and losses amounting to millions).

6. The aim defined in the legislative file is thus illegitimate.<sup>1</sup> Illegitimate, because it is contrary to the concept of law. The law, although it stems from a purpose, becomes independent the moment it is created and then lives its own life, which is separated from who created the law. Or, as Radbruch says, although the law “emerged from the purpose, it wants to be in force, from the same moment on, regardless of its fulfilling this purpose, already on the basis of its mere existence; it wants to live in accordance with its own laws as if it was an end in itself”<sup>2</sup> The life of the law is thus autonomous and “outside and above the influential field of state purposes.”<sup>3</sup> As an ordinary citizen, I can certainly be disposed, like the vast majority of others, to the [aim] that “unsuccessful managers would be left without unjustified bonuses”. However, as a lawyer, and especially as a judge of the Constitutional Court, I can never be [disposed thereto] if the price [of such aim] entails a breakdown of the concept of law which requires the generality and equality of a norm in relation to those whom the norm concerns, and if that entails a deviation from that aspect of legal certainty that requires the validity of positive law, even if this is unreasonable for the state.
7. In the case at issue, only the seizure of “unjustified bonuses from unsuccessful managers” could be reasonable for the state (and not also the seizure of earned bonuses). However, such reasonableness (the legislature’s intent) is not expressed in the Act and thus also does not exist therein. As stated above, the tax hits everyone – unsuccessful and successful [managers] and unjustified and justified bonuses. If it could still be possible from the state administration (the tax authorities) to expect that it will adapt to (and try to comply with) the state’s will, this cannot in any way be expected from the judiciary, which has the final word with regard to the interpretation and application of the challenged statutory provision. Quite the contrary. The essence of judicial independence is namely in that it entails the outer and practical manifestation of the all-encompassing independence, autonomy, and freedom of law – including freedom from he who created it.<sup>4</sup>
8. This is where the whole sense of the rule of law is hidden. It namely entails that no one is above the law, not even the legislature. Therefore, non sub homine sed sub Deo

1 In this regard, I leave aside the question of whether it is legitimate to use tax legislation in order to seize from a taxable person property which in the opinion of the legislature has been acquired unjustifiably. Or in other terms, I am not hereby adopting a position with regard to whether taxes can be a means to expropriate (nationalise) [property] and also not with regard to the question of whether such can entail a means for penalisation. In this respect, let me only mention that in Article 1, Section 9, Clause 3 the U.S. constitution explicitly determines the prohibition of the adoption of “Bills of Attainder”.

2 G. Radbruch, Filozofija prava, translation A. Maček, GV Založba, Ljubljana 2007, p. 217.

3 Ibidem. Or very clearly and succinctly in the Second Minute of the Five Minutes of Legal Philosophy: “No, this tenet does not mean: Everything that benefits the people is law. Rather, it is the other way around: Only what law benefits the people.” (Ibidem, p. 268).

4 According to Ihering, the judiciary has the exclusive task of realising the law. Therefore, the motto of the judiciary is: the law and nothing but the law. The judiciary has its sight throughout directed exclusively at the law. And a judge is the person in whom the law is revived and channelled, through his words, into reality. See R. von Ihering, Law as a Means to an End, translation I. Husik, The Boston Book Company, Boston 1913, pp. 289, 290.

et lege applies also with regard to the legislature and its will. Not even the almighty legislative power is above the law. Or, if I may evoke Ihering once again: The law has (and must have) the power to develop, instead of fear, worries, and anxiety, a firm and unwavering feeling of security and reliability, which in the opinion of the mentioned legal scholar is an appropriate expression of the state of mind that law and faith allow to a human: the law provides him the feeling of security and peace in his relations to other persons, and faith in his relation to God.<sup>5</sup> Therefore, it can never be the legislature's will that rules, but rather it is the law that rules. The legislature has in this respect only the privilege to create a law, whereby it is (only) given the indirect possibility to weave its will into the law and thus achieve its aim through the law. But no more than that – therefore only through the law, which entails that it only has an indirect possibility (and not a direct authorisation) to implement its intention. In a state governed by the rule of law based on the separation of powers it is the judiciary that will state whether it has succeeded in doing so, whether it has taken advantage of the constitutional possibility. It will state that after it has interpreted the law – sovereignly, independently, and freely, i.e. such as is also the law that it is interpreting (and also creating through its case law), and not [after the law has been interpreted] by anyone else. Not even by the legislature (by interpretations of one kind or another, which are more or less “obligatory”).

9. Since the legislature thus did not demonstrate a legitimate substantiation of the retroactive effect of the disputed statutory provision, in my opinion the reasoning of the Decision should have ended at this point. But it did not. In the following sections (from paragraph 33 onwards) it also dealt with the arguments presented by the Government in order to justify such retroactive effect. The Constitutional Court admittedly rejected them. But even if it had not, they should not have influenced the decision – if they had, such decision would be inconsistent with the principle of the separation of powers. Because if the legislature has decided that individual statutory provisions have retroactive effect, then it is only the legislature who can explain the first condition that must be fulfilled for the exceptional admissibility of retroactive effect. It is only its intention that counts – not the intention of the Government or anyone else. For such reason, treating the arguments of the Government only weakens (and in this respect even nullifies) the principle of the separation of powers. The executive power is not called upon to explain, in place of the legislature, which aim the other (the legislative) branch of power pursued by a certain measure and whether such aims entail a public interest. Only the legislature itself can do that, i.e. the one who adopted the law and who must (precisely for such reason) well know why it acted in such manner. Since only it is only its intention that is relevant, it is only the legislature that can tell the Constitutional Court what it had pursued by such retroactivity.

OPINION

At a session held on 18 March 2010 in proceedings to review the constitutionality of a treaty, initiated upon the proposal of the Government of the Republic of Slovenia, the Constitutional Court The Arbitration Agreement issued the following opinion:

- I. The Basic Constitutional Charter on the Sovereignty and Independence of the Republic of Slovenia is an applicable constitutional act and as such a permanent and inexhaustible constitutional source of the statehood of the Republic of Slovenia.
- II. Section II of the Basic Constitutional Charter on the Sovereignty and Independence of the Republic of Slovenia protects the state borders of the Republic of Slovenia and in conjunction with Article 4 of the Constitution entails the applicable and relevant constitutional determination of the territory of the Republic of Slovenia.
- III. In the part in which Section II of the Basic Constitutional Charter on the Sovereignty and Independence of the Republic of Slovenia protects the state borders between the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Croatia it must be interpreted within the meaning of the international law principles of uti possidetis iuris (on land) and uti possidetis de facto (at sea).
- IV. In accordance with Section II of the Basic Constitutional Charter on the Sovereignty and Independence of the Republic of Slovenia, the land border between the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Croatia is constitutionally protected where the border between the republics of the former Socialist Federative Republic of Yugoslavia was drawn, whereas the maritime border is protected along the line up to the High Sea to where the Republic of Slovenia de facto exercised its authority before its independence.
- V. The Arbitration Agreement between the Government of the Republic of Slovenia and the Government of the Republic of Croatia does not determine the course of the state borders between the Parties to the Agreement, but it establishes a mechanism for the peaceful settlement of the border dispute.
- VI. Article 3 (1) (a), Article 4 (a), and Article 7 (2) and (3) of the Arbitration Agreement between the Government of the Republic of Slovenia and the Government of the Republic of Croatia, which must be interpreted and reviewed as a whole in terms of content, are not inconsistent with Article 4 of the Constitution in conjunction with Section II of the Basic Constitutional Charter on the Sovereignty and Independence of the Republic of Slovenia.

Reasoning

A

1. The Government of the Republic of Slovenia filed a proposal with the Constitutional Court that the Constitutional Court issue an opinion on the conformity of Article 3 (1) (a) of the Arbitration Agreement between the Government of the Republic of Slovenia and the Government of the Republic of Croatia (hereinafter referred to as the Agreement) with Article 4 of the Constitution in conjunction with Section II of the Basic Constitutional Charter on the Sovereignty and Independence of the Republic of Slovenia (Temeljna ustavna listina o samostojnosti in neodvisnosti Republike Slovenije – hereinafter referred to as the BCC). The Government is of the opinion that the Agreement is entirely in conformity with the BCC and the Constitution; it filed the proposal with the Constitutional Court that it issue an opinion due to the fact that a part of the expert public has allegedly expressed reservations and concerns regarding the constitutional conformity of the individual parts of the Agreement. In the opinion of the Government, the second paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution enables the Government to file a proposal for the review of the constitutionality of the Agreement although it is of the opinion that the Agreement is not inconsistent with the Constitution. With reference to such, the Government refers to the position of the Constitutional Court in Opinions No. Rm-1/97 of 5 June 1997 (Official Gazette RS, No. 40/97, and OdlUS VI, 86) and No. Rm-1/02 of 19 November 2003 (Official Gazette RS, No. 118/03, and OdlUS XII, 89).
2. The position of the Government is that Section II of the BCC established the land border between the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Croatia, and the border so-established only needs to be demarcated in nature. Therefore, the power of the Arbitral Tribunal to determine the course of the land border is allegedly not inconsistent with Section II of the BCC and Article 4 of the Constitution, but allegedly only entails the precise determination of the land border. With reference to the maritime border, the Government proceeds from the regulation in the Socialist Federative Republic of Yugoslavia (hereinafter referred to as the SFRY) whereby the regime regulating the sea and the maritime zones was determined uniformly, therefore the maritime border between the Republic of Slovenia and Croatia was not determined. Consequently, also the power of the Arbitral Tribunal to determine the course of the maritime border is allegedly not inconsistent with Section II of the BCC and Article 4 of the Constitution. The possible doubts regarding the unconstitutionality of Article 3 (1) (a) of the Agreement are allegedly resolved also by Article 3 (1) (b) and (c), which require the Arbitral Tribunal to determine Slovenia's junction to the High Sea and the regime for the use of the relevant maritime areas. These two provisions of the Agreement allegedly ensure the preservation of the right of Slovenia, which it already had in the former SFRY, to territorial junction to the High Sea.

3. In order to support its position that the Agreement is not inconsistent with the Constitution, the Government refers to Opinion of the Constitutional Court No. Rm-1/00 of 19 April 2001 (Official Gazette RS, No. 43/01, and OdlUS X, 78), in which the Constitutional Court adopted the standpoint that “the BCC and the Constitution do not prohibit the conclusion of treaties that would regulate border issues [...] provided that such a treaty remains within the framework of Article 4 of the Constitution”. When reviewing whether the Agreement is in conformity with the Constitution, also the position of the Constitutional Court from the above-cited Opinion that the border between Slovenia and Croatia is “presumably known, however, not yet concretised in a border treaty and demarcated in nature” must be, in the opinion of the Government, taken into account.
4. The Government furthermore states that the Agreement is not a treaty on the common state land and maritime border, but is a foundation for submitting the settlement of the border dispute to an independent international judicial body, which is allegedly also in conformity with general principles and rules of international law, which on the basis of Article 8 of the Constitution are binding on Slovenia and are a part of its legal order.
5. In the supplementation to its application, the Government supplemented its proposal with certain specific reservations and concerns voiced by the expert public regarding the constitutionality of Article 3 (1) (a) of the Agreement. These concerns of the expert public, as stated by the Government, in their substance primarily refer to the question of whether the decision of the Arbitral Tribunal would entail merely a precise determination of the border, which is presumably already known, or whether such would concern a new determination or alteration of the border, which would allegedly require a prior amendment to the BCC. In the above-mentioned concerns, the expert public furthermore states that the Agreement entails a special manner of establishing the border between Slovenia and Croatia, whereby the Agreement nowhere refers to the existing border as determined by the BCC. The BCC namely determines that the border with Croatia is where the border between the republics within the former Yugoslavia was. Differently than the BCC, the Agreement determines the rules and principles of international law as the criteria for determining the course of the border.

B – I

6. The second paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution reads as follows: “In the process of ratifying a treaty, the Constitutional Court, on the proposal of the President of the Republic, the Government or a third of the deputies of the National Assembly, issues an opinion on the conformity of such treaty with the Constitution. The National Assembly is bound by the opinion of the Constitutional Court.” In addition to the powers stated in the first paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution, such regulation vests in the Constitutional Court special competence for the a priori constitutional review of treaties.

7. A proposal for the a priori review of the constitutionality of a treaty may be filed by three applicants, as determined by the Constitution, i.e. the President of the Republic, the Government, or a third of the deputies of the National Assembly. In the case at issue, the proposal was filed by the Government, which is of the opinion that the Agreement is not inconsistent with the Constitution or the BCC.
8. In accordance with the first paragraph of Article 162 of the Constitution, proceedings before the Constitutional Court are regulated by law. Article 70<sup>1</sup> of the Constitutional Court Act (Zakon o Ustavnem sodišču – Official Gazette RS, No. 64/07 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the CCA) reiterates the powers of the Constitutional Court from the second paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution, whereas it does not contain other explicit procedural provisions with reference to expressing an opinion when reviewing treaties. Therefore, in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 49 of the CCA, the provisions of Chapter IV of this Act, which provides for the review of the constitutionality and legality of regulations, are to be applied, mutatis mutandis, for procedures for the review of a treaty (see Constitutional Court Opinion No. Rm-1/97).
9. In proceedings for the review of the constitutionality of a regulation, the Constitutional Court reviews the constitutionality of the provisions of the regulation which an applicant, as provided for in Articles 23 or 23a, or a petitioner, as provided for in Article 24 of the CCA, alleges are inconsistent with the Constitution. The Constitutional Court may not extend ex officio its review of the constitutionality to provisions which are not challenged, except in cases in which such is allowed by the principle of connectivity provided for in Article 30 of the CCA.<sup>2</sup> In addition to the challenged provisions, a request or petition must also contain the provisions of the Constitution or law with which the challenged provisions are allegedly inconsistent. Moreover, an applicant or a petitioner must also state the reasons why the challenged provision is allegedly unconstitutional or unlawful.<sup>3</sup> A matter that should be decided by the Constitutional Court should be formulated as a dispute on the constitutionality or legality of the challenged provisions. If an applicant initiating proceedings does not have any doubts regarding the constitutionality or legality of the challenged provisions, there is no need for legal protection provided by a Constitutional Court decision.
10. Reasons for a different position do not exist with reference to the procedure for the a priori review of treaties. When expressing an opinion on the constitutionality of a

1 Article 70 of the CCA reads as follows: "In the process of ratifying a treaty, the Constitutional Court, on the proposal of the President of the Republic, the Government, or a third of the deputies of the National Assembly, issues an opinion on the conformity of such treaty with the Constitution. The Constitutional Court adopts such opinion at a closed session."

2 The principle of connectivity allows the Constitutional Court to also review the constitutionality and legality of other provisions of the same or other regulation or general act issued for the exercise of public authority for which a review of the constitutionality or legality has not been proposed, if such provisions are (a) mutually related or (b) if such is necessary to resolve the case.

3 The content of applications is provided for in Article 24b of the CCA and Annexes to the Rules of Procedure of the Constitutional Court (Poslovnik Ustavnega sodišča – Official Gazette RS, No. 86/07).

treaty, the Constitutional Court also reviews only the provisions of the treaty whose review is requested by the entitled applicant; it reviews other provisions only under conditions which apply for the principle of connectivity. As a general rule, the Constitutional Court reviews the matter only from the viewpoint of the provisions of the Constitution which were referenced by the applicant. In instances in which an applicant is the Government, it cannot be required from the Government that it alleges the unconstitutionality of a treaty – the Government is namely, as a general rule, a signatory to treaties, whereas at the same time the second paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution gives the Government the right and power to propose the [constitutional] review of every treaty. However, the fact that it cannot be required from the Government that it be subjectively convinced that a treaty is unconstitutional does not entail that the Government does not need to provide a statement of reasons for its proposal. Regardless of its standpoint on the conformity of the relevant treaty with the Constitution, the Government must state which provisions of the treaty the Constitutional Court should review as well as which provisions of the Constitution it must take into consideration when doing so. The Government also has to state reasons why individual provisions of a treaty could be disputable from the constitutional point of view. Although the Government does not have reservations regarding the conformity of the treaty with the Constitution, it must nevertheless state in the proposal which reservations regarding the constitutionality of the treaty otherwise exist (e.g. those of the parliamentary opposition or expert public).

11. The power of the Constitutional Court in the procedure provided for by the second paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution is limited to the review of treaties which are in the ratification procedure. A condition for such a procedure to be initiated before the Constitutional Court is that the procedure for the ratification of the treaty has been initiated in the National Assembly. It proceeds from the second paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution, which determines that in the process of ratifying a treaty the Constitutional Court issues an opinion “on the conformity of such treaty with the Constitution”, that the subject of the review is the content of the treaty, i.e. its individual provisions. The subject of the review cannot be the ratification procedure. Possible deficiencies in the ratification procedure<sup>4</sup> may concern the act on the ratification, however such deficiencies cannot be alleged in the procedure for the a priori review of a treaty.<sup>5</sup> As is the case for the review of the constitutionality and legality of regulations, also in cases calling for the a priori review of the constitutionality of a treaty, the Constitutional Court does not assess whether the treaty is appropriate.

4 The procedure for the ratification is regulated in the Constitution by Articles 86 and 3a. Article 86 as a general rule determines that the National Assembly ratifies treaties by a majority of votes cast by those deputies present, whereas Article 3a as a special provision determines that treaties by which Slovenia may transfer the exercise of part of its sovereign rights to international organisations and may enter into a defensive alliance with states, must be ratified by a two-thirds majority vote of all deputies. In both procedures only a treaty whose substance is in conformity with the Constitution may be ratified.

5 The procedure for ratification can only be reviewed if it were regulated in a treaty, thus if the treaty regulated such procedure in its provisions.

Therefore, the Constitutional Court does not provide a value judgment or an assessment of the implementation of the public interest which is pursued by a treaty.

B – II

12. The Agreement, which in the original English version is entitled Arbitration Agreement between the Government of the Republic of Slovenia and the Government of the Republic of Croatia, was signed by the President of the Government of the Republic of Slovenia and the President of the Government of the Republic of Croatia on 4 November 2009 in Stockholm, Kingdom of Sweden. At a session held on 17 November 2009, the Government determined the text of the draft Act on the Ratification of the Agreement and submitted it for adoption to the National Assembly. During the procedure for the ratification of the Agreement, the Government submitted the proposal that the Constitutional Court review whether Article 3 (1) (a) of the Agreement is in conformity with Article 4 of the Constitution in conjunction with Section II of the BCC.

13. The proposed criteria for the constitutional review are Article 4 of the Constitution and Section II of the BCC. Article 4 of the Constitution reads as follows:

“Slovenia is a territorially unified and indivisible state.”

Section II of the BCC reads as follows:

“The state borders of the Republic of Slovenia are the internationally recognised state borders between the hitherto SFRY and the Republic of Austria, the Republic of Italy and the Republic of Hungary in the part where these states border the Republic of Slovenia, and the border between the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Croatia within the hitherto SFRY.”

14. The proposed subject of the review is Article 3 (1) (a) of the Agreement, which in the original English version reads as follows:

“The Arbitral Tribunal shall determine the course of the maritime and land boundary between the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Croatia.”

In the draft Act on the Ratification of the Agreement, the above-cited provision in the Slovene translation reads as follows:

15. Article 3 (1) (a) of the Agreement specifies the power of the Arbitral Tribunal to determine the course of the border between the Parties to the Agreement. It does not in and of itself proceed from this provision where the Arbitral Tribunal will determine the course of the border or which criteria it will apply in this regard. Article 3 (1) (a) is therefore inseparably connected with Article 4 (a) of the Agreement,

---

6 Article 3 (1) of the Agreement, which determines the task of the Arbitral Tribunal, in the original English version reads as follows: “(1) The Arbitral Tribunal shall determine: (a) the course of the maritime and land boundary between the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Croatia; (b) Slovenia’s junction to the High Sea; (c) the regime for the use of the relevant maritime areas.” In the translation, as proposed in the draft Act on the Ratification of the Agreement, Article 3 (1) of the Agreement reads as follows: “(1) Arbitražno sodišče določi: (a) potek meje med Republiko Slovenijo in Republiko Hrvaško na kopnem in morju; (b) stik Slovenije z odprtim morjem; (c) režim za uporabo ustreznih morskih območij.” which determines what the Arbitral Tribunal will have to apply when determining the course of the border. Article 4 (a) of the Agreement in the original English version reads as follows:

In the draft Act on the Ratification of the Agreement, the above-cited provision in the Slovene translation reads as follows:

“Arbitražno sodišče uporablja pravila in načela mednarodnega prava za odločanje po točki (a) prvega odstavka 3. člena.”<sup>7</sup>

16. For the effects of the decision of the Arbitral Tribunal also Article 7 (2) and (3) of the Agreement are essential. It follows from these provisions that the decision of the Arbitral Tribunal will not merely be an opinion or a recommendation, but a decision that will be definitive and legally binding for the Parties to the Agreement and will thus have the nature of a judicial decision. Article 7 (2) and (3) of the Agreement in the original English version read as follows:

“(2) The award of the Arbitral Tribunal shall be binding on the Parties and shall constitute a definitive settlement of the dispute.

(3) The Parties shall take all necessary steps to implement the award, including by revising national legislation, within six months after the adoption of the award.”

In the draft Act on the Ratification of the Agreement, the above-cited provisions in the Slovene translation read as follows:

(3) Pogodbenici v šestih mesecih po sprejetju razsodbe storita vse potrebno za njeno izvršitev, vključno s spremembo notranje zakonodaje, če je to potrebno.”

17. Article 3 (1) (a), Article 4 (a), and Article 7 (2) and (3) of the Agreement are mutually inseparably connected, as only their joint legal effect entails that the Arbitral Tribunal, applying the rules and principles of international law, will definitively and with legally binding effect determine the course of the state border between the Parties to the Agreement – the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Croatia – on land and at sea. As the above-mentioned provisions of the Agreement are mutually connected, the Constitutional Court, on the basis of Article 30 of the CCA, decided to extend the procedure for the review of the constitutionality of Article 3 (1) (a) also to Article 4

7 Article 4 of the Agreement, which determines applicable law and other criteria which the Arbitral Tribunal is to apply when deciding, in the original English version reads as follows: “The Arbitral Tribunal shall apply (a) the rules and principles of international law for the determinations referred to in Article 3 (1) (a); (b) international law, equity and the principle of good neighbourly relations in order to achieve a fair and just result by taking into account all relevant circumstances for the determinations referred to in Article 3 (1) (b) and (c).” In the translation, as proposed in the draft Act on the Ratification of the Agreement, Article 4 of the Agreement reads as follows: “Arbitražno sodišče uporablja: (a) pravila in načela mednarodnega prava za odločanje po točki (a) prvega odstavka 3. člena; (b) mednarodno pravo, pravičnost in načelo dobrososedskih odnosov za doseglo poštene in pravične odločitve, upoštevajoč vse relevantne okoliščine, za odločanje po točkah (b) in (c) prvega odstavka 3. člena.”

(a) and Article 7 (2) and (3) of the Agreement. The Constitutional Court interpreted and reviewed the above-mentioned provisions of the Agreement as a whole.

B – III

18. The formation and cessation of states and the questions of the state territory and state borders are questions which are primarily in the domain of international law. It is in the nature of the matter that state borders concern two or more states and are in general a result of their mutual agreement. State borders exist as de facto effective demarcation lines between sovereign states, when determined at the level of international law, either by a treaty, by a decision of an international body, or by exercising de facto authority which a neighbouring state does not oppose. In the Republic of Slovenia, the state borders are also regulated in national law, namely in Section II of the BCC; also Article 4 of the Constitution refers to the state territory. State borders, as established in national law, do not bind other states and do not have international law effects in and of themselves. Thus, regarding the state borders of the Republic of Slovenia one must distinguish between international law and national law positions. These concern two separate legal systems, however when interpreting national law one must proceed from international law, as state borders are by nature a question of international law. The formation of a new state is in international law to a great extent a question of fact,<sup>8</sup> however, its recognition and acceptance by the international community also depend on the fact whether the state respected the rules and principles of international law upon its formation. Especially the rules and principles of international law which refer to the formation of new states following the dissolution of a common state, as was the case of the former SFRY, are relevant. Such concern the rules and principles of international law which regulate fundamental relations between newly established and already existing neighbouring states or between newly established states themselves, especially concerning their territory and state borders.
19. In order for a state border to be justified under international law, it is of key importance that a state demonstrates legal title (iustus titulus). International law titles (French titre) on which the course of the state borders is based have two functions. Firstly, legal title is a basis for exercising state sovereignty<sup>9</sup> and indicates from where a

8 From the perspective of international law, the formation of a new state as a subject of international law is to a great extent questio facti. In order to speak of the state, four conditions must be met: there must exist (1) a population, i.e. a group of individuals that permanently reside in a certain (2) territory; in this territory (3) a government must be established which (4) is not legally subordinate to any other government. Article I of the Montevideo Convention on Rights and Duties of States of 1933 provides that the state should possess the following qualifications: (1) a permanent population; (b) a defined territory; (3) government; and (4) capacity to enter into relations with the other states. See I. Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law, Seventh Edition, Oxford University Press, Oxford 2008, pp. 70–72.

state draws legal entitlement to its territory and sovereignty. Secondly, legal title demonstrates and protects also the specific course of the border demarcated in nature.<sup>10</sup>

20. Within the former SFRY the Republic of Slovenia had external state borders with the Republic of Austria, the Republic of Italy, and the Republic of Hungary. In the former SFRY the state borders with these three states were determined by treaties.<sup>11</sup> After the dissolution of the common state, these external Yugoslav borders became the state borders of the Republic of Slovenia. Under international law, the Republic of Slovenia succeeded to these borders on the basis of the rules and principles of international law which determine the inviolability of state territory and the continuity of state borders. These rules and principles are provided for in certain most important universal and regional documents. The Charter of the United Nations of 1945 (hereinafter referred to as the UN Charter), among the principles of how its Members should act, determines the principle of the sovereign equality of all its Members and the prohibition of the threat or use of force against the territorial inviolability or political independence of any state. Respect for territorial inviolability is furthermore emphasised by the Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Cooperation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations of 10 The most common legal titles are border treaties. A special aspect of the transfer of sovereignty in a certain territory by a treaty is cession, which entails the peaceful transfer of territory from one sovereign state to another. The cession has often taken place within the framework of peace treaties following a war. Other legal titles are, for instance, peaceful occupation (connected to terra nullis), accretion, and prescription. In the last decades the principle of uti possidetis is increasingly more important for newly emerging states. More D. Türk, ibidem, pp. 407–421, and M. N. Shaw, International Law, Fifth Edition, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge 2003, pp. 414–451.

11 Within the former SFRY the internationally recognised borders were determined by treaties. The Slovene-Austrian state border was determined by the Treaty of Peace of Saint-Germain of 1919 (also taking into account the results of the plebiscite held in 1920). This was again affirmed by the Austrian State Treaty (hereinafter referred to as the AST) of 1955. The precursor of the SFRY – the Federative Peoples' Republic of Yugoslavia (FPRY) – was not an original signatory to the AST, however, on 14 November 1955 it acceded to the AST. With its accession to the AST Yugoslavia became party to the AST. With its accession to the AST, Yugoslavia recognised the old border as determined by the Treaty of Peace of Saint-Germain and declared that it would respect the inviolability of the territorial integrity and independence of Austria (for more on the AST, see B. Bohte, M. Škrk, Pomen avstrijske državne pogodbe za Slovenijo in mednarodnopravni vidiki njenega nasledstva [The Significance of the Austrian State Treaty for Slovenia and International Law Aspects of its Succession], Pravnik, Vol. 52, No. 11–12 (1997), pp. 601–630). The state border with Italy was determined by the Paris Peace Treaty of 1947, with the exception of the part of the border that divided Yugoslavia and the Free Territory of Trieste (hereinafter referred to as the FTT). Following the implementation of the Memorandum of Understanding (i.e. the London Memorandum) of 1954, the demarcation line between Zones A and B of the FTT became the demarcation line between Italy and Yugoslavia. The border with Italy came into effect under international law in 1975 following small modifications on land and the determination of the maritime border by signing the so-called Osimo agreements (for more, see B. Bohte, M. Škrk, Predgovor, Pariška mirovna pogodba [Foreword, Paris Peace Treaty], Ministrstvo za zunanje zadeve RS, Ljubljana 1997, pp. v–xii). The state border with Hungary was determined by the Peace Treaty of Trianon of 1920, which in 1947 was affirmed by the Paris Peace Treaty.

1970 (hereinafter referred to as the Declaration of Seven Principles).<sup>12</sup> The Helsinki Final Act on Security and Cooperation in Europe of 1975 (hereinafter referred to as the Helsinki Act) is especially important for peaceful coexistence between the states of Europe, which among the principles guiding relations between European states also determines the inviolability of frontiers and the territorial integrity of states. Considering the fact that in the territory of the former SFRY the new states were established as a result of its dissolution, both Vienna Conventions, which refer to the law of treaties, must especially be taken into account. Treaties governing state borders are namely concluded for an indefinite period of time; such concern so-called permanent treaty regimes. This entails that in accordance with Article 62 (2) (a) of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties of 1969,<sup>13</sup> a fundamental change of circumstances may not be invoked in cases of such treaties (i.e. the rebus sic stantibus clause) as grounds for terminating or withdrawing from a treaty. Article 11 of the Vienna Convention on Succession of States in respect of Treaties of 1978<sup>14</sup> moreover determines the generally applicable principle of international law that a succession of states does not as such affect a boundary established by a treaty.

21. The duty to respect the territorial integrity of the neighbouring states and the inviolability of state borders, and especially the duty to respect treaties which determine the state borders, thus follow from the rules and principles of international law which applied during the time Slovenia was gaining independence and which were binding on Slovenia as a newly emerging state. The dissolution of the state and the establishment of the new states do not influence the applicability of the treaties which, before the establishment of the new states, determined the borders between the hitherto existing states (i.e. the principle of the continuity of the state borders) or which referred to other territorial issues (i.e. territorial provisions). The tendency towards legal safety in international relations is reflected in the rules on the continuity of state borders.
22. From the viewpoint of international law, the establishment of new states following the dissolution of a common state, as was the case of the SFRY, is a special situation which concerns the state borders between newly established states. Before independence these states did not have borders determined in accordance with international law; there existed only certain internal demarcations which merely served the purpose of administrative division between the individual parts of the territory. For instances of the dissolution of states in which administrative borders between the individual constitutive parts of the federal territory were determined, international law determines that legal title for the course of the borders between newly established states is the principle of uti possidetis iuris. This principle entails that until a possible different agreement is reached, the internationally recognised border between the new states lies where the administrative border within the former common state had been. The principle of uti possidetis iuris was applied when the states of Latin America and Africa, after the former colonial powers had withdrawn, were gaining independence, and the International Court of Justice recognised this principle as a general principle of international law, as it is logically connected with the act of achieving independence.<sup>15</sup> The purpose of the principle is to protect the integrity of the borders which the newly established states succeeded to from the former common state and to prevent the threat to the independence and stability of the new states. The principle of uti possidetis iuris secures the territorial status quo which existed when independence was achieved; the International Court of Justice namely underlined that this principle “stops the clock” or “freezes the territorial title”.<sup>16</sup> Its primary aim is to secure respect for the territorial boundaries which existed at the time when independence was achieved.<sup>17</sup>

23. From the legal point of view, the principle of uti possidetis iuris secures and protects legal title to territory. If or until the states reach an agreement on the common border, the principle of uti possidetis iuris is an international law foundation of the states' sovereignty. The principle presupposes that between the former federal units of the federal state there existed a legally determined delimitation, thus that these units did not merely exercise a “bare” de facto authority but they had the right or legal basis to exercise authority in their territory. The International Court of Justice has underlined numerous times that in the name of this principle the word iuris does not refer to international law but to the constitutional or administrative law of the pre-independence sovereign state.<sup>18</sup> The principle of uti possidetis iuris thus entails that the border between newly established states is where the legal delimitation of authority between individual administrative units within the common state had existed. If a different agreement is not reached, a newly established state succeeds to the territory which was under its authority as a constituent part of the common state.
24. In order to understand the effects of the international law principle of uti possidetis iuris in the case of the dissolution of the SFRY, it is necessary to proceed from the constitutional position of Slovenia in the former common state. What is particularly relevant are the introductory provisions and basic principles of the Constitution of the former SFRY of 1974.<sup>19</sup> In Article 1 of the federal Constitution, the SFRY was defined as “a state community of voluntarily united nations and their [...] Republics”, whereas in Article 2 the republics and autonomous provinces which comprised Yugoslavia were listed. Of key importance was Article 5 of the Constitution, which determined that the territory of the SFRY “consists of the territories of the [...] Republics” and that “the territory of a Republic may not be altered without the consent of that Republic”. Already before the normative part, in the preamble and basic principles, the Constitution of 1974 underlined that the relations in the federation were based on the consolidation of the rights and responsibilities of the republics and autonomous provinces. With reference to such, it proceeded from the right of every nation to self-determination, including the right to secession, on the basis of which nations were united in a federative republic. The SFRY was thus not divided into republics only after it was established, but the republics constituted the federal state by joining it.<sup>20</sup> It is especially important that the federal constitution proceeded from the principle that the sovereignty rested primarily in the republics, whereas the sovereignty rested in the federal state only inasmuch as the republics transferred the exercise of the sovereignty by the unanimous and voluntary decision to join the federal state. In the basic principles of the Constitution (Section I) it was namely determined that the nations and nationalities exercised their sovereign rights in the republics, whereas they exercised these rights in the federation when in their common interests it was so specified by the federal Constitution. The Constitution of the SFRY of 1974 thus strongly emphasised the role of the republics at the expense of the federation. The federation and its powers were established “on the basis of the right of every nation to self-determination and original state authority and powers of the republics as primary bearers of the state authority.”<sup>21</sup> The presumption of the state power was to the benefit of the republics and also the constitutions of the republics followed such. The SFRY was established as a federal state on the basis of the decisions of the republics and provinces to join the common state. The fact “that the Republic of Slovenia has been a state under the constitutional order [...] [of the SFRY] and has exercised only a part of its sovereign rights within the [SFRY]” was also declared in the preamble to the BCC at the constitutional level.

25. The emphasised state sovereignty of Slovenia (and the other republics) within the SFRY entailed that the republics also had a certain territory where such sovereignty was exercised. It clearly proceeds from the constitutional regulation of the SFRY that the territory of the republics and the determination of the delimitations between the republics did not fall within the competence of the SFRY but was left to agreement between the republics. As the Constitution of the SFRY determined that the republic borders could be altered only with the consent of the republics concerned, it is clear that the borders between the republics, at least the land borders, had to be known. This entails that on 25 June 1991, when the Republic of Slovenia declared its sovereignty and independence, the Slovene-Croatian state border on land was known, and namely its course ran along the borders of the frontier municipalities or cadastral municipalities.<sup>22</sup> This border was naturally not an interstate border, but only an administrative delimitation which, notwithstanding its weaker legal status, indicated to where the republic sovereignty of Slovenia as a federal unit extended.

26. Upon independence, the land border between Slovenia and Croatia, as it existed within the former SFRY, became an internationally recognised state border, substantiated by the international law principle of uti possidetis iuris. Therefore, the rules and principles of international law apply for such – especially the principle of the inviolability of state borders, according to which borders can only be altered unanimously, by a treaty between the states. The key characteristic of the principle of uti possidetis iuris is that it does not have the character of a peremptory norm of international law (ius cogens), but the states involved may always determine the course of the state border by a treaty, either to confirm a border as it proceeds from the principle of uti possidetis iuris, or to determine its course differently, taking into account different circumstances. Until a different agreement between the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Croatia is reached, their state border on land is where the border between the republics within the former SFRY had been, i.e. along the borders of municipalities or cadastral municipalities, as they existed on the day of the establishment of the new states. Upon independence the internal land border between the republics became the external state border, which, in accordance with the rule of the preservation of the territorial status quo, may only be altered with their consent.
27. Also the Arbitration Committee of the Conference on Yugoslavia (i.e. the Badinter Committee) after the dissolution of Yugoslavia in its Opinion No. 3 based the establishment of the new states on the principle of uti possidetis iuris.<sup>23</sup> In its starting point this Opinion was based on the standpoint of the International Court of Justice that the principle of uti possidetis iuris is a general principle of international law, which is connected with achieving independence, whenever such occurs. The Committee adopted a standpoint supporting the inviolability of the existing external state borders of the former SFRY, whereby it underlined that such follows from the UN Charter, the Declaration of Seven Principles, the Helsinki Act, and the Vienna Convention on Succession of States in respect of Treaties. Regarding the internal republic borders, it furthermore adopted the standpoint that “except where otherwise agreed, the former boundaries become frontiers protected by international law. This conclusion follows from the principle of respect for the territorial status quo and, in particular, from the principle of uti possidetis.” The Badinter Committee considered that the principle of uti possidetis applies all the more readily, as the Constitution of the SFRY of 1974 stipulated that the republics’ territories and boundaries could not be altered without their consent.<sup>24</sup>

22 Municipal territories in the former [Yugoslav] Republic of Slovenia were provided for by the Act Regulating the Procedure for the Establishment, Unification, and Alteration of a Municipal Boundary and Municipal Boundaries (Zakon o postopku za ustanovitev, združitve oziroma spremembo območja občine ter o območjih občin – Official Gazette SRS, No. 28/80 etc.).

23 The Opinion is published in the European Journal of International Law, Vol. 3 (1992), pp. 184–185.

28. Thus there are various international law titles concerning the course of the state borders of the Republic of Slovenia. Regarding the borders with Austria, Italy, and Hungary, the legal titles are the treaties which the SFRY had concluded with these states and which Slovenia succeeded to in accordance with international law. Regarding the land border with Croatia, the legal title is the principle of uti possidetis iuris. This principle presupposes the territorial delimitation within the former common state and protects the territorial status quo after independence. In the definite nature of the legal title in the sense of lex certa there is an important difference between treaties and the principle of uti possidetis. In instances of treaties, state borders are determined in the manner which is usual at the level of international law; namely, in order to say that a state border is determined, its course must be described with words, determined by geographic coordinates, and thereafter the border must be drawn on a reference map. Parties to the agreement must consent to all these elements, which they demonstrate by concluding a treaty whose essential elements are these elements that define a state border. Permanent or ad hoc international tribunals determine the course of the state borders in the same manner in instances in which the states cannot themselves reach an agreement thereon and unilaterally transfer the power to determine the borders to such tribunals. The last act of determining the borders is always their demarcation in nature and by boundary stones.
29. Differently than in instances of treaties (and the judgments of international tribunals), the definite nature of the principle of uti possidetis iuris depends on the fact of how clearly and precisely the border was determined before the new states were established. In the case of the dissolution of the SFRY, the principle of uti possidetis iuris presupposes the existence of the delimitation between Slovenia and Croatia within the former SFRY, however, in certain parts, regardless of the commitment of both states to this principle, it does not provide a clear answer on the course of the otherwise internationally recognised state border. The land border before independence was known (its course ran along the borders of the municipalities or cadastral municipalities), however, the republics never determined its course in a manner in which the borders were determined at the international level, namely by an agreement in which the borders would be clearly described, demarcated, and drawn on a map. The deficiency of the principle of uti possidetis iuris is evident with regard to those sections of the border where the borders of the municipalities or cadastral municipalities in the former republics overlapped or were not completely clear for some other reason already at that time. In cases of such disputable sections of the land border, the states can agree that the principle of uti possidetis iuris is a relevant criteria and that it is necessary to proceed from the territorial status quo on the day when the states became independent, however, this does not lead to a solution if they do not agree on what the specific course of the border demarcated in nature between the municipalities was or have different ideas regarding the territorial situation that the principle of uti possidetis iuris should protect. The situation could be even more complicated, as due to the unclear legal delimitation de facto authority (police, courts, etc.) may have overlapped in certain areas.<sup>25</sup> If the states interpret the application of the principle of uti possidetis iuris differently, it is clear that this principle can only be a temporary legal title concerning the course of the state borders. Especially with regard to the disputable sections, the states should agree on the definitive precise course of the border demarcated in nature, either directly by a treaty or by transferring this decision to an international judicial body. In comparison with the principle of uti possidetis iuris, clarity, which for determining the course of the border is entailed by a treaty or judicial decision, is an important element of the stability of the state borders.

30. From the viewpoint of international law, the separate question of the maritime border between the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Croatia arises. Differently than the land border, the maritime border between the republics within the former SFRY was not determined. Quite on the contrary, it proceeds from the former federal legislation that the SFRY had sovereignty at sea.<sup>26</sup> The sea was a unified federal territory on which the republics did not have their own, independent of the federation, legal title to exercise authority. This naturally does not entail that the republics did not exercise any de facto authority at sea or that the exercise of authority was not divided between them.<sup>27</sup> Upon gaining independence, the Republic of Slovenia

25 Also the specific history of the FTT from the perspective of international law and delimitation between the republics following the cessation of Zone B of the FTT, which de facto became a part of Yugoslavia with the Memorandum of Understanding of 1954, contributed to an unclear legal delimitation between Slovenia and Croatia at certain sections of the border.

26 The Act Concerning the Coastal Sea and the Continental Shelf of the SFRY (Zakon o obalnem morju in epikontinentalnem pasu Socialistične federativne republike Jugoslavije – Official Gazette SFRY, No. 49/87) in the first paragraph of Article 1 reads as follows: “The sovereignty of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (hereinafter referred to as the SFRY) shall extend to the coastal sea of the SFRY, to the airspace above it, and to the seabed and subsoil of that sea.”

27 Slovenia exercised de facto authority in the Bay of Piran before 25 June 1991, which in the former SFRY had the status of internal waters, which is evident from numerous documents published in the White Book on the Border between the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Croatia (Bela knjiga o meji med Republiko Slovenijo in Republiko Hrvaško), Ministrstvo za zunanje zadeve, Ljubljana 2006. In addition to a number of judicial and minor offence decisions of the Slovene authorities, the fact that in the former SFRY the Bay of Piran was considered a sea under Slovene authority is demonstrated also, for instance, by the Marine Fisheries Ordinance of 11 December 1987 (Odlok o morskem ribištvu – Official Publications of the Municipalities of Ilirska Bistrica, Izola, Koper, Piran, Postojna, and Sežana, No. 42/87; the Ordinance was adopted on the basis of the Marine Fisheries Act [Zakon o morskem ribištvu], Official Gazette SRS, Nos. 25/76 and 29/86), in accordance with which Slovene fishing waters extended from Cape Savudrija to Cape Debeli Rtič, and by the Long-Term Plan of the Socialist Republic of Slovenia for the 1986-2000 period (Dolgoročni plan SR Slovenije za obdobje od leta 1986 do leta 2000 – consolidated cartographic part – Official Gazette SRS, No. 36/90) in which became a coastal state. In view of the fact that a coastal state cannot exist without an appropriate area of sea, this entails that a part of the Adriatic Sea and the territory under this sea are a part of its state territory. What part of the sea with the pertinent maritime zones is Slovene state territory is in the first place a question which should be resolved applying the rules and principles of international law. However, they are effective only inasmuch as the states observe them when concluding border treaties or inasmuch as they are a basis for the decisions of international tribunals.

31. In the event of the dissolution of a state such as the SFRY, the question of succession at sea is open until a final agreement on the border is concluded. Also with reference to succession at sea, international law determines as a starting-point principle that the territorial status quo is protected by the principle of uti possidetis. In view of the fact that the border between Slovenia and Croatia within the former SFRY was legally not determined, the territorial situation at sea on the day of gaining independence is not protected by the principle of uti possidetis iuris, but is protected by the principle of uti possidetis de facto. This principle is applied in instances in which delimitation within the former common state was not determined, but de facto existed.<sup>28</sup> A de facto existing border is even more relevant under international law if it is based on express or tacit agreement between the states.<sup>29</sup> Given that before 25 June 1991 the Republic of Slovenia exercised de facto authority in the Bay of Piran, and especially given that from the conduct of the Republic of Croatia before independence it can be concluded that it expressly agreed therewith or tacitly consented to such, thus the international law principle of uti possidetis de facto protects the factual situation on the day of achieving independence. However, from the viewpoint of precision and the stability of the state borders, also this principle does not ensure permanently satisfactory results, especially not in the event of a dispute when each state has its own idea regarding the facts before independence. A definitive settlement of the border issue is therefore possible only by a treaty regulating borders or a treaty on transferring a decision to an international judicial body.

the Bay of Piran is drawn in thirteen cartographic maps as a part of the Republic of Slovenia. The fact that also the federal government deemed the Bay of Piran to be Slovene sea follows, for instance, from the survey of lighthouses of the Hydrographic Institute of the Yugoslav Navy in Split of 1978, in which the Savudrija lighthouse (listed under number 178, E2642) was placed among the lighthouses of Slovene Primorje. Before 25 June 1991 the Republic of Slovenia also exercised its authority outside the Bay of Piran, as the Koper border police supervised the maritime border with Italy up to Point T 5. See the White Book on the Border between the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Croatia, ibidem, pp. 10–13, and Ž. Štefan, Od zaščitnikov do pomorskih policistov: zgodovina in razvoj slovenske pomorske policije, Ministrstvo za notranje zadeve Republike Slovenije, Ljubljana 1997, pp. 77 and 109.

28 Cf., D. Türk, ibidem, p. 414.

29 Such was also the position of the International Court of Justice in Case concerning the Frontier Dispute (Nicaragua/Honduras), Judgment of 8 October 2007. The Court observed that the principle of uti possidetis iuris might in certain circumstances, such as in connection with historic bays and territorial seas, play a role in a maritime delimitation. In cases in which the court establishes that the border, in the sense of the principle of uti possidetis iuris, was not determined before independence, it may justify the maritime border if it establishes certain circumstances (in the case at issue, the question whether there was a tacit agreement between the states has been raised) also on the principle of de facto delimitation (see especially paragraphs 232 and 253 of the reasoning).

B – IV

32. From the viewpoint of national law, with the adoption of the BCC the Republic of Slovenia became a sovereign and independent state. The BCC was adopted on 25 June 1991 as the fundamental constituting state act of the Republic of Slovenia. With its adoption the Republic of Slovenia definitively broke its ties with the SFRY and established itself as a sovereign state.<sup>30</sup> Section I of the BCC declared that the Republic of Slovenia is a sovereign and independent state and determined that the Constitution of the SFRY ceased to be in force for the Republic of Slovenia and that the new state assumed all rights and duties which under the republic or federal constitution were transferred to the authorities of the SFRY. An essential element of statehood is also a territory in which the state is the highest legal and de facto authority. The territory of the Republic of Slovenia was defined by Section II of the BCC, and namely so that it defined its state borders. As an internal act, the BCC did not have direct effects at the level of international law, even though its influence at the international level cannot be denied. With its adoption, the state declared to the world that it had met the international law criteria for the existence of a state, which was important for recognition by other states. The aim of the BCC was thus to constitute at the constitutional level and to declare at the international level a new sovereign state, which would be an equal subject in the international community.
33. From the formal perspective of the hierarchy of legal acts, the BCC was adopted as a legal act at the constitutional level.<sup>31</sup> The constitutional power of the BCC, however, was not limited only to the moment of its adoption, but it is permanently applicable law. This is additionally confirmed by the fact that also the Constitution in its preamble refers to the BCC, where the BCC is explicitly defined as one of the starting points of the Constitution.<sup>32</sup> The Constitution, which by its authority as the highest legal act determines the organisation of the state power and by its determined human rights and fundamental freedoms, also its limits,<sup>33</sup> draws its power also from the BCC. The 30 With reference to state sovereignty, we can be distinguished between internal and external sovereignty. Internal sovereignty entails that the state is the highest legal authority in its territory, whereas external sovereignty entails that it is not dependant on any other state. See R. Jennings, A. Watts (Editor), Oppenheim's International Law, Ninth Edition, Longman, London in New York 1996, pp. 120–123. On the concept of the state, see also J. Crawford, The Creation of States in International Law, Second Edition, Oxford University Press, Oxford 2006, pp. 3–254. On the concept of the state and sovereignty, see also L. Pitamic, Država [The State], Cankarjeva založba, Ljubljana 1997, pp. 1–44.

31 This is also affirmed in Sections IV and V of the BCC, in which the charter calls itself “a constitutional act”.

32 The preamble to the Constitution reads as follows: “Proceeding from the Basic Constitutional Charter on the Sovereignty and Independence of the Republic of Slovenia, and from fundamental human rights and freedoms, and the fundamental and permanent right of the Slovene nation to self-determination; and from the historical fact that in a centuries-long struggle for national liberation we Slovenes have established our national identity and asserted our statehood, the Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia hereby adopts the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia.”

33 It is precisely because of the importance of human rights and fundamental freedoms that there should be no confusion between the state and the sovereignty of the people. State sovereignty is connected to the existence of the state as a sovereign and independent subject, which is only a subject of international law, whereas BCC is a formally applicable constitutional act and as such a permanent and inexhaustible constitutional foundation of the statehood of the Republic of Slovenia.

34. From the viewpoint of its substance, upon its adoption the BCC did not only have declaratory international law effects, but as a constitutional act it mainly had internal constitutive legal effects. The constitutional effect of Section II of the BCC was that it defined the state borders and thereby determined the territory on which the Republic of Slovenia became a sovereign and independent state. It is immediately clear that Section II of the BCC did not determine the borders in a manner that is usual in treaties, as it did not describe their course or determine them by geographic coordinates. However, as the provision refers to the internationally recognised external state borders of the former SFRY and to the border with Croatia, as it existed within the former SFRY, the borders were determined also in national constitutional law. Section II of the BCC thus constitutionalised the state borders of the Republic of Slovenia.
35. The constitutionalisation of the state borders in Section II does not merely entail a definition of the initial territorial state of affairs, thus the determination of the territory on which the Republic of Slovenia became a sovereign state on 25 June 1991. Namely, when interpreting Section II of the BCC also the provisions of the Constitution must be taken into account, which in relation to the BCC is lex posterior. Only by a joint consideration of the provisions of the Constitution and the BCC can the substantive law effects of Section II of the BCC be definitively determined. Thereby, it is immediately clear that the Constitution did not explicitly abrogate in any way any provision of the BCC. Quite on the contrary, the Constitution in its preamble explicitly refers to the BCC and defines it as one of its starting points, whereby the formal applicability of the BCC was undoubtedly also extended into the present and the future. Furthermore, for the question of the substantive application of Section II of the BCC, particularly Article 4 of the Constitution is relevant.
36. Article 4 of the Constitution, which determines that Slovenia is a territorially unified and indivisible state, has in and of itself two meanings. On one hand, territorial unity refers to the type of organisation of the state. This entails that Slovenia is a unitary state and may not be organised as a federal state; in the state the establishment of territorial units that would have the status of federal units is not allowed. On the other hand, the indivisibility of the state refers to the sovereignty of the state in its territory. The state authorities exercise their authority in the entire state territory, therefore, it is not allowed to renounce to the benefit of another state a part of the state territory the sovereignty of the people refers to the quality of such state power. With reference to the concept of the sovereignty of the people, what is determined in the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution comes to the foreground, namely that in Slovenia power is vested in the people and that this power is exercised by citizens directly and through elections, consistent with the principle of the separation of legislative, executive, and judicial powers. Human rights and fundamental freedoms are especially important for a correct understanding of the concept of the sovereignty of the people, and these are also stated as a starting point in the preamble to the Constitution; even before that, upon its establishment, Slovenia bound itself in Section III of the BCC to guarantee the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

or the exercise of the functions of the sovereign authority in this territory.<sup>34</sup> In another meaning, Article 4 of the Constitution presupposes that the territory of the Republic of Slovenia is known and defined by the state borders and it is precisely this that was the aim of Section II of the BCC. The Constitution was adopted on 23 December 1991, thus six months following the BCC, and the territory whose unity and independence are ensured by Article 4 of the Constitution was undoubtedly the territory determined by the state borders defined in Section II of the BCC. If Article 4 of the Constitution is to be an effective constitutional provision also today, then also Section II must be considered applicable law which has a legally relevant substance still today.

37. Upon its adoption, the BCC undoubtedly mainly had a legal-historical task to constitute the state of the Republic of Slovenia and in this sense it is a formally applicable constitutional basis of the state sovereignty still today. However, Section II of the BCC is not only a formally applicable provision, but because of Article 4 of the Constitution it is still today a substantively effective constitutional provision which must be taken into account when the borders with neighbouring states are altered at the level of international law. Article 4 of the Constitution and Section II of the BCC are mutually connected, namely that the content of Article 4 of the Constitution depends on Section II of the BCC, which draws its current applicability from Article 4 of the Constitution. The preamble to the Constitution underlines the continuous legal applicability of the BCC, whereas it proceeds from Article 4 of the Constitution that Section II of the BCC is living law in terms of its substance. Section II of the BCC is not exhausted in terms of substance, but together with Article 4 of the Constitution it entails an applicable and relevant constitutional definition of the territory of the Republic of Slovenia.
38. In the above-mentioned sense, these constitutional provisions entail a constitutional obstacle to altering the state borders. In a territorially fairly small state, as is the Republic of Slovenia, such provisions also have a guarantee function; by these provisions the constitution framers established the state territory and state borders as one of the fundamental values which must be protected at the constitutional level. A treaty which would alter the course of the state borders would also entail an alteration of the territory on which the BCC on 25 June 1991 established the state sovereignty of the Republic of Slovenia and would therefore be inconsistent with Section II of the BCC. Regarding Austria, Italy, and Hungary, the altered borders would be internationally recognised state borders, however, they would no longer be the “internationally recognised state borders [of] the hitherto SFRY”, as determined by Section II of the BCC. Regarding Croatia, a treaty establishing the border would entail the alteration of the “border [...] within the hitherto SFRY” if the border were not determined where the border between the republics in the SFRY had been, as the Republic of Slovenia understood the border when declaring independence and as the Republic of Slovenia constitutionalised it in Section II of the BCC. For the constitutional review of the Agreement this entails that Article 4 of the Constitution and Section II of the BCC constitute a whole and are together a major premise for constitutional deciding. Nonconformity with Section II of the BCC would at the same time also entail nonconformity with Article 4 of the Constitution.

39. Considering the legal nature of the BCC and its historical role as a constitutive act of the state of the Republic of Slovenia, the BCC as a constitutional act is nevertheless different than the Constitution in the sense that it cannot be amended through direct interventions in its text. Such intervention with the BCC would not only entail amending the text retroactively, but also de facto changing the legal and factual context in which it was adopted. Therefore, it is completely logical that the BCC, differently than the Constitution, does not envisage a procedure for amending it. Nevertheless, from the substantive point of view, Section II of the BCC is not an unchangeable constitutional provision. Its content can be amended by an act at the constitutional level, i.e. an act adopted in the procedure for amending the Constitution, however, not by directly intervening in the BCC, but by amending the Constitution. Such constitutional amendment can explicitly amend Section II of the BCC, or it may only be an amendment in accordance with the interpretative principle that a later regulation amends an earlier one (lex posterior derogat legi priori).

40. Proceeding from the finding that Section II of the BCC constitutionalised the state borders of the Republic of Slovenia and that also today it is an applicable and relevant constitutional law, the question arises what exactly is the substance of this constitutional provision. In the Republic of Slovenia the state territory and state borders are also a constitutional subject-matter, however, the question is in what sense and scope, as well as what this entails regarding amending such.
41. In addition to the role and aim of the BCC in its entirety, when interpreting Section II also the circumstances of law and fact that influenced the adoption of the BCC must be separately taken into account. In addition to the already mentioned constitutional and statutory law of the former SFRY and the former republic of Slovenia, the Constitutional Court, when interpreting Section II of the BCC, considered to be of a key importance the rules and principles of international law that regulated the fundamental relations after the dissolution of the SFRY, particularly regarding the territory and state borders between the newly established and neighbouring states, as well as between the newly established states themselves. With the adoption of the Constitution, the supremacy of international law over constitutional law was not recognised in the constitutional system of the Republic of Slovenia, however, the interpretation of Section II of the BCC must proceed from the fact that questions of the formation of new states and determining their state borders lie primarily within the sphere of international law and that these generally binding rules and principles of international law existed when Slovenia became a sovereign and independent state. When interpreting Section II of the BCC in the light of the rules and principles of international law which regulate questions of the territorial integrity and continuity of state borders, the Constitutional Court also considered the preamble to the BCC and the Constitutional Act Implementing the BCC (Ustavni zakon za izvedbo temeljne ustavne listine o samostojnosti in neodvisnosti Republike Slovenije – hereinafter referred to as the CAIBCC) of 25 June 1991, as well as national and international instruments and political documents, from which it proceeds that already in the process of gaining independence, the state committed itself to respecting international law, as such was important for obtaining recognition by other states.

42. As regards Austria, Italy, and Hungary, Section II of the BCC determines that the state borders are “the internationally recognised state borders between the hitherto SFRY [...] in the part where these states border the Republic of Slovenia”. As the internationally recognised state borders of the hitherto SFRY are defined as the state borders of the Republic of Slovenia, the BCC refers to treaties which were valid legal titles concerning the course of the state borders before independence and also determined precisely where the borders ran their course. In this sense, Section II of the BCC was a unilateral declaration by which the existing international state of affairs on 25 June 1991 was affirmed regarding the state borders with Austria, Italy, and Hungary. Affirming the existing internationally recognised state borders in national law was not absolutely necessary, as already from the rules and principles of international law which applied during the time Slovenia was gaining independence and which bound Slovenia as a newly emerging state, there follows the requirement that the territorial integrity of the neighbouring states and the inviolability of the state borders be respected, and especially the requirement that the treaties that determine the state borders be respected, as the cessation of the former state and the establishment of the new states do not have an influence on the applicability of the treaties regulating the state borders. From the perspective of international law, the aim of Section II of the BCC was primarily to demonstrate the commitment to international law in the process of gaining independence. This also clearly proceeds from the Declaration of Independence (Deklaracija ob neodvisnosti) of 25 June 1991, which the former Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia adopted together with the BCC; the Declaration in Section IV, inter alia, determines that “the Republic of Slovenia [as an international and legal entity] pledges to respect all the principles of international law and, in the spirit of legal succession, the provisions of all international contracts signed by Yugoslavia and which apply to the territory of the Republic of Slovenia”. A similar provision is contained in Article 3 of the CAIBCC, which was also adopted together with the BCC, and reads as follows: “Treaties concluded by Yugoslavia which apply to the Republic of Slovenia remain in force on the territory of the Republic of Slovenia.”
43. In the part which refers to Croatia, Section II of the BCC determines that “the border [...] within the hitherto SFRY” is the state border between the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Croatia. Proceedings from the supposition that the Republic of Slovenia gained independence in accordance with the generally applicable rules and principles of international law, the text of Section II of the BCC in the part which refers to Croatia is to be understood within the meaning of the international law principle of uti possidetis. This actually already proceeds from the preamble to the BCC, in which the Republic of Slovenia declared its commitment to “respect [...] [the] sovereignty and territorial integrity [of other Yugoslav republics]”. Also the Constitutional Court in Opinion No. Rm-1/00 with reference to the border with the Republic of Croatia has already adopted the position that “in terms of international law, at the moment of the establishment of the independent and sovereign Slovenia, its former republic border “within the former SFRY” became its state border, on the basis of the principle of uti possidetis.” Following a detailed definition of this principle, the Constitutional Court, “considering such interpretation of the BCC”, thus in the sense of the principle of uti possidetis, reviewed the Agreement between the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Croatia on Border Traffic and Cooperation.<sup>35</sup> Moreover, affirmation of the principle of uti possidetis at the constitutional level was not necessary, as this is a general principle of international law which takes effect automatically when a new independent state is established. Also in this part the significance of Section II of the BCC from the perspective of international law is primarily a unilateral recognition of the territorial status quo between the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Croatia until the states determine the course of the border by a treaty.

44. A unilateral constitutional commitment to respect the existing treaties and the principle of uti possidetis was also important for the international recognition of the Republic of Slovenia, which is clear from certain political instruments which were drawn at the level of the hitherto European Economic Community (hereinafter referred to as the EEC) during the process of obtaining independence. From the Guidelines for the Recognition of New States in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union of 16 December 1991, and from the Declaration on Yugoslavia of 16 December 1991,<sup>36</sup> it is namely clear that the Member States of the hitherto EEC were willing to recognise the new states only if they committed themselves to international law, inter alia, explicitly also to the principle of the inviolability of all borders which may only be altered peacefully and by common consent.
45. The question what was constitutionalised by Section II of the BCC must thus be answered that it constitutionalised the state borders, inasmuch as they were determined and secured by international law when the Republic of Slovenia became a sovereign and independent state. Under international law, the Republic of Slovenia succeeded to its borders from the former SFRY, however, by Section II of the BCC it determined them at the constitutional level. To paraphrase, Section II of the BCC is a constitutional reflection of international law regulating the question of the borders at the moment when Slovenia became a sovereign and independent state. The constitutionalisation of the state borders furthermore entails that the borders at the constitutional level are determined as they were defined and protected in accordance with international law at the moment of the formation of the new state, thus when the BCC was adopted; the precision of their course at the constitutional level depends on how precisely they are determined at the level of international law.

35 Act on the Ratification of the Agreement between the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Croatia on Border Traffic and Cooperation (Zakon o ratifikaciji Sporazuma med Republiko Slovenijo in Republiko Hrvaško o obmejnem prometu in sodelovanju – Official Gazette RS, No. 43/01, MP, No. 20/01).

46. Regarding the state borders with Austria, Italy, and Hungary, there can be no doubt that Section II of the BCC determined the course of the borders as they are determined (i.e. described, determined by coordinates, and drawn on maps) in treaties of the SFRY which Slovenia succeeded to. A treaty that would alter the course of these borders, as they existed on the day the BCC was adopted, would thus be inconsistent with Section II of the BCC in conjunction with Article 4 of the Constitution. The border with the Republic of Croatia has never been determined at the international level, whereas between the republics within the former SFRY it had never been determined “in a manner in accordance with international law”. The land border did exist and was known, however it was not determined by an agreement between the republics which would clearly describe its course in its entire length and determine such by geographic coordinates. Following independence, the hitherto republic border on land became an internationally recognised border which has its international law basis in the principle of uti possidetis iuris. Section II of the BCC, which is a constitutional expression of this principle of international law therefore determined the Slovene-Croatian land border as the border was determined and protected by the principle of uti possidetis iuris following independence.
47. Differently than the land border, the maritime border between Slovenia and Croatia within the former SFRY was not determined,<sup>37</sup> but the sea was under the direct sovereignty of the federation. Therefore, the question arises how to interpret Section II of the BCC, which determines the state border between the states as “the border within the hitherto SFRY”. As the sea was under direct Yugoslav sovereignty, the states of Slovenia and Croatia cannot demonstrate their legal titles at sea. This entails that succession in accordance with the principle of uti possidetis iuris does not apply. On the other hand, what should be taken into consideration is that the Republic of Slovenia is a coastal state and it was a coastal republic already as a part of the former SFRY and de facto exercised its authority in a part of the Adriatic Sea and also had access to the High Sea. The interpretation that the hitherto Slovene Assembly adopted the BCC by which it determined the state territory and that this BCC does not include the sea, is not acceptable precisely for this reason. From the point of view of international law, also maritime territory is a matter of succession which is secured by the principle of uti possidetis iuris until a treaty is adopted. If a state cannot demonstrate a legal delimitation within a former common state, the state border after independence enjoys legal protection on the basis of the secondary principle of uti possidetis de facto. Due to the fact that the interpretation that 37 The maritime border is determined only between the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Italy, and namely by the Treaty between the Socialist Federative Republic of Yugoslavia and the Republic of Italy with Annexes from I to X of 10 November 1975 (Official Gazette SFRY, MP, No. 1/77; the Act on Notification of Succession [Akt o notifikaciji nasledstva], Official Gazette RS, No. 40/92, MP, No. 11/92). The Republic of Slovenia is a legal successor to this treaty.

the Republic of Slovenia gained independence without the sea is not acceptable from the legal point of view, Section II of the BCC as regards the maritime border must be interpreted in the sense of the international law principle of uti possidetis de facto.<sup>38</sup> This entails that, in accordance with Section II of the BCC, the maritime border between the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Croatia is along the line on the sea surface<sup>39</sup> to where Slovenia de facto exercised its authority before its independence.

48. The fact that Section II of the BCC constitutionalised the state borders in accordance with the principles of uti possidetis iuris and uti possidetis de facto entails that the state borders between the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Croatia are determined at the constitutional level. However, such constitutionalisation does not entail that also their precise course demarcated in nature is determined. In view of the long-lasting dispute between the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Croatia about the course of the border (at certain border sections), although it is determined in the basic constitutional charters on the sovereignty and independence of 38 Such understanding of Section II of the BCC also proceeds from the acts of the National Assembly and the Government, which were adopted after 25 June 1991, but they demonstrate how the legislative and executive branches of power understand the position regarding the sea on 25 June 1991 from the perspective of international law. In the Memorandum on the Bay of Piran (Memorandum o Piranskem zalivu) of 7 April 1993, the Government voiced its support for “the preservation of the integrity of the Bay of Piran under [Slovene] sovereignty and jurisdiction”. The Memorandum rejects the application of the criterion of a medium line, which would be an unfair and unrealistic solution: “Consideration must be given to the fact that the Republic of Slovenia exercised its jurisdiction and authority in the Bay of Piran in the former SFRY and that such was also the situation when both states declared independence on 25 June 1991. In view of such situation, the most appropriate course of action is certainly to apply the principle of uti possidetis, which confirms the de facto exercise of authority of the Republic of Slovenia as a former republic within the former SFRY over the entire Bay of Piran from the legal point of view.” The positions and resolutions adopted with reference to the Bay of Piran by the National Assembly or the Committee for International Relations (Odbor za mednarodne odnose – hereinafter referred to as the Committee) during its 1992-1996 term of office are similar. At a session held on 26 May 1993, the Committee adopted the following position: “With reference to the Bay of Piran, the National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia reiterates that in modern history Slovenia had undisputed jurisdiction over the Bay of Piran. It appropriately administered such and provided for its protection and preservation. The Bay of Piran belongs to the Republic of Slovenia also in accordance with the international law principle of uti possidetis.” At a session held on 28 June 1994 the Committee furthermore adopted the draft position that “Slovenia continues to respect the principle of uti possidetis, which particularly entails the full sovereignty of Slovenia over the Bay of Piran.” The last such resolution of the National Assembly was adopted on 18 February 2009 – The Resolution on the Protection of Slovene Interests with regard to the Accession of the Republic of Croatia to the North Atlantic Treaty (Sklep o zaščiti slovenskih interesov ob pristopanju Republike Hrvaške k Severnoatlantski pogodbi) – in which the National Assembly rejects “any modifications of the situation that existed on land and at sea on 25 June 1991” and draws attention to the fact that on that day “the Slovene authorities, inter alia, exerted their jurisdiction in the settlements on the left bank of the Draginja river, on the territory on the left bank of the Mura river at Hotiza [and that] the Republic of Slovenia had a territorial junction to international waters and exercised its jurisdiction in the entire Bay of Piran.”

39 When applying the term “boundary line”, what must be taken into consideration is that state borders appear as lines only on the surface of the Earth. As they also stretch into the air space and under the land surface, the state borders are in fact surfaces which two-dimensionally delimitate the area of the sovereignty of the neighbouring states.

both states that the border between them is where it was within the former common state,<sup>40</sup> and although considering Opinion No. 3 of the Badinter Committee both states are bound under international law to respect the principle of uti possidetis until they agree otherwise, it is evident that this principle in and of itself does not give a completely clear, let alone acceptable answer for both states regarding the course of the state border demarcated in nature.

49. Regarding the land border between the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Croatia, the lack of clarity regarding its course can arise at those sections where a clear legal title cannot be demonstrated or where the states, regardless of their commitment to the same principle, interpret the principle of uti possidetis iuris differently. The principle of uti possidetis iuris as a legal title presupposes the existence of a delimitation between the republics within the former SFRY, however, it does not provide a clear answer regarding the course of the currently internationally recognised state border. The imprecision regarding the exact course of the border, which was transposed also in the national constitutional system through Section II of the BCC, is built into this principle. With regard to the border with Croatia, the principle of uti possidetis iuris and Section II of the BCC entail only an incomplete legal basis which presupposes that the states will agree on its course demarcated in nature, either directly by a treaty or by transferring this task to an international judicial body. In this sense, in Opinion No. Rm-1/00 the Constitutional Court has already adopted the position that the text of Section II of the BCC entails that the border is “presumably known, however, not yet concretised in a border treaty and demarcated in nature”. Similarly as in the case of a land border, the principle of uti possidetis de facto also does not give a clear answer regarding the precise course of the maritime border. The imprecision regarding a precise course of the maritime border can be even more explicit, as the principle of uti possidetis de facto does not proceed from a legal delimitation of the power between the republics within the former SFRY but is based on the delimitation of de facto exercise of this authority. The disputable nature of this border is a result of the circumstance that the states interpret the state of the facts before independence differently, and even more so of the circumstance that the Republic of Croatia does not at all recognise this principle as a starting point for determining the course of the maritime border.
50. Regardless of the above-mentioned deficiencies of the principles of uti possidetis iuris and uti possidetis de facto, the land border between the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Croatia is constitutionalised in Section II of the BCC as the border that had its course along the borders of the hitherto municipalities or cadastral municipalities, whereas the maritime border as the border that has its course along the line up to where the Republic of Slovenia de facto exercised its authority within the former SFRY. In both instances the state border between the states has to be concretised at the level of international law, thus common consent regarding its course demarcated in nature must be reached. Section II of the BCC therefore entails a known delimitation between the states, although it is not precisely determined either on land or at sea. In comparison with the precisely determined borders with Austria, Italy, and Hungary, this provision, in the part which refers to Croatia, is not adequately determined and will be complete in terms of substance only when the land and maritime borders are described and determined geographically.

40 A similar provision as Section II of the BCC is contained in Section V of the Croatian Ustavne odluke o suverenosti i samostalnosti Republike Hrvatske of 25 June 1991: “Državne granice Republike Hrvatske su međunarodno priznate državne granice dosadašnje SFRJ u dijelu u kojem se odnose na Republiku Hrvatsku, te granice između Republike Hrvatske i Republike Slovenije, Bosne i Hercegovine, Srbije i Crne Gore u okviru dosadašnje SFRJ.”

51. The constitutionalisation of the state borders, on one hand, entails that the National Assembly may not ratify by a law a treaty which would alter the state borders as they are determined in Section II of the BCC. Regarding the border with Croatia, on the other hand, the constitutionalisation does not entail the prohibition that the course of the border is demarcated in nature. Section II of the BCC enables further determination of the course of the state border on land and at sea between the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Croatia, however, the legislature is thereby limited by the principles of uti possidetis iuris (on land) and uti possidetis de facto (at sea). The position of the Constitutional Court in Opinion No. Rm-1/00 must also be understood in this sense, namely that “the BCC and the Constitution do not prohibit the conclusion of treaties that would regulate border issues” and that a treaty “could also contain provisions on the state borders, which would in and of itself not be contrary to the BCC and the Constitution provided that it remains within the framework of Article 4 of the Constitution [...]”. Owing to the connection between Article 4 of the Constitution and Section II of the BCC, it must be added that a treaty regarding the state border should also be within the frameworks of Section II of the BCC.

B – VI

52. As regards the fact that the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Croatia “through numerous attempts [...] have not resolved their territorial and maritime border dispute in the course of the past years” – as is admitted in the preamble to the Agreement<sup>41</sup> – the states have agreed that the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Croatia establish an arbitral tribunal whose task will be, inter alia, to determine the course of the land and maritime border between the states. The outcome of this agreement is the Agreement between the Government of the Republic of Slovenia and the Government of the Republic of Croatia, which was signed by the Presidents of the Governments on 4 September 2009 in Stockholm. On behalf of the Republic of Slovenia, the National Assembly ratifies the Agreement.<sup>42</sup> In accordance with Article 3 (4)

41 The preamble to the Agreement in this part in the original English version reads as follows: “[...] Whereas through numerous attempts the Parties have not resolved their territorial and maritime border dispute in the course of the past years, [...]”.

42 In Opinion No. Rm-1/97 the Constitutional Court already clarified that from the viewpoint of international law, ratification is a unilateral declaration of the intention of one contracting party addressed to the other contracting party, to the effect that it accepts the content of a signed treaty as binding. Such declaration of intention is delivered by the state on the occasion of exchanging instruments of ratification. According to the fifth of the Agreement, the Arbitral Tribunal has the power to interpret the Agreement.<sup>43</sup> As the ratification procedure is interrupted by the procedure for the review of constitutionality before the Constitutional Court, the Agreement must also be interpreted by the Constitutional Court for the purposes of the constitutional review.

53. When reviewing the provisions of the Agreement, also the aim of the a priori review of the constitutionality of treaties must be taken into account. The Constitutional Court has already adopted positions thereon in Opinion No. Rm-1/97 and later reiterated them in Opinions No. Rm-1/00 and No. Rm-1/02. The constitutional order namely does not accept the supremacy of international law over constitutional provisions. In the hierarchy of legal acts, treaties are above statutory provisions,<sup>44</sup> however, they must be in compliance with constitutional provisions. A priori review of the constitutionality of a treaty in the ratification procedure has a preventive purpose. Its aim is to prevent the National Assembly from ratifying a treaty whose implementation would entail that either directly applicable unconstitutional norms would enter into national law (which would require direct unconstitutional functioning of state or other authorities by concrete actions or by the issuance of individual acts) or that the state would bind itself to adopt general legal acts in national law which would be inconsistent with the Constitution in order to adhere to a treaty. The preventive purpose of the a priori review is that in time, namely before ratification, the state is prevented from assuming international obligations which would be inconsistent with the Constitution and which the state therefore could not fulfil.<sup>45</sup> The Constitutional Court therefore had to review whether Article 3 (1) (a), indent of Article 107 of the Constitution, such instruments are issued by the President of the Republic. The President of the Republic may issue such instrument of ratification after the National Assembly has adopted a law on the ratification of a treaty. The instrument of ratification is an international act, whereas the law on ratification is an act under national law, whose importance is twofold. On one hand, it is an authorisation granted to the President of the Republic, allowing him to issue an instrument of ratification and, on the other hand, it is a normative act by which obligations under international law are transformed into the national law of the state. Thus, with its implementation, the provisions of a treaty are integrated into the national legal order under the condition that they have been ratified in accordance with national law of the Republic of Slovenia.

- 43 Article 3 (4) of the Agreement in the original English version reads as follows: "The Arbitral Tribunal has the power to interpret the present Agreement."
- 44 In accordance with Article 8 of the Constitution, laws and regulations must comply with generally accepted principles of international law and with treaties that are binding on Slovenia. In accordance with the second paragraph of Article 153 of the Constitution, laws must be in conformity with generally accepted principles of international law and with valid treaties ratified by the National Assembly, whereas regulations and other general legal acts must also be in conformity with other ratified treaties.
- 45 By treaties the Republic of Slovenia binds itself as a state in relation to other parties to such treaties, these being other states or subjects of international public law. By treaties the state undertakes international obligations to which international law applies. The conclusion and implementation of treaties is mainly regulated by the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, which is also binding on Slovenia. An obligation undertaken on the basis of a treaty binds the state to fulfil such obligation. In accordance with Article 26 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, every treaty in force is binding upon the parties to it and must be performed by them in good faith (bona fide). This is the principle of pacta sunt servanda, which is one of the fun-

Article (4) (a), and Article 7 (2) and (3) of the Agreement individually or together bound the state to assume an unconstitutional international obligation.

54. Article 3 (1) (a) of the Agreement, in accordance with which the Arbitral Tribunal is to determine the course of the land and maritime border, entails that the Arbitral Tribunal will have to describe the course of the border line demarcated in nature and determine such by geographic coordinates. As the course of the border between the republics in the former SFRY, and also subsequently, has never been determined in such a precise manner relevant from the perspective of international law, the Arbitral Tribunal will determine the course of the border originally. The award of the Arbitral Tribunal regarding the land border will entail the concretisation of the border in international law, as it was known and determined within the former SFRY in national law, whereas regarding the maritime border such will entail a division of the former legally unilateral, although de facto divided, Yugoslav sea in the north Adriatic at the international level.
55. When determining the course of the border, the Arbitral Tribunal is bound by the subject-matter of the dispute as specified by the Parties to the Agreement, whereby the Parties are not limited in specifying the dispute. By an award the Arbitral Tribunal will determine the course of the border on those sections of the border which the states will specify as disputable; in determining the border line, the Arbitral Tribunal will also stay within the territorial frameworks as specified by the Parties. On sections regarding which the Arbitral Tribunal will decide, the border will be determined by its award, whereas in the remaining (i.e. the majority) undisputed part, it will still be based on the principle of uti possidetis. This proceeds from Article 3 (3) of the Agreement, which determines that “the Arbitral Tribunal shall render an award on the dispute”,<sup>46</sup> whereas Article 3 (2) of the Agreement in accordance with this determines that “the Parties shall specify the details of the subject-matter of the dispute within one month. If they fail to do so, the Arbitral Tribunal shall use the submissions of the Parties for the determination of the exact scope of the maritime and territorial disputes and claims between the Parties.”<sup>47</sup> The Agreement damental principles of international contract law. If the fulfilling of an international obligation requires the adoption or amendment of a corresponding normative rule, which should apply in the national legal order, in accordance with international law, the state is obliged to fulfil the said obligation in such manner. Failure to fulfil an obligation constitutes a violation of the treaty and a breach of international law. The fulfilment of a treaty can be realised already by the fact that its provisions pass directly into the national legal order of the state at the time of the entry into force of such treaty. If the provisions of a treaty are not directly applicable, it is necessary, with a view to fulfilling contractual obligations, that appropriate measures be taken by national law – i.e. the adoption of appropriate legal instruments (see Constitutional Court Opinion No. Rm-1/97).

46 Article 3 (3) of the Agreement in the original English version reads as follows: “The Arbitral Tribunal shall render an award on the dispute.”

47 Article 3 (2) of the Agreement in the original English version reads as follows: “The Parties shall specify the details of the subject-matter of the dispute within one month. If they fail to do so, the Arbitral Tribunal shall use the submissions of the Parties for the determination of the exact scope of the maritime and territorial disputes and claims between the Parties.”

thus gives the Parties to the Agreement the right and duty to carefully specify their understanding of the matter from the viewpoint of international law and submit all relevant evidence. This is essential in order for the Arbitral Tribunal to reach a legally substantiated and convincing award. In drafting and specifying the subject-matter of the dispute, it is naturally also of key importance that the Republic of Slovenia, when defining its international law positions, also consider to the greatest extent possible the constitutional starting points that proceed from this Opinion and that implicitly proceed from the above-mentioned positions of the National Assembly and the Government. With reference to such, the constitutional starting points do not limit the Republic of Slovenia to specifying, on the basis of Article 3 (2) of the Agreement, with reference to the disputable parts of the land border, the scope of the territories regarding which the Arbitral Tribunal shall determine the course of the border, whereas regarding the maritime border such starting points do not limit the Republic of Slovenia to submitting an appropriate proposal for a fair and just division of the north part of the Adriatic Sea as well as a proposal for a junction of the territorial sea of the Republic of Slovenia to the High Sea.

56. Article 3 (1) (a) of the Agreement is a provision bestowing authority which only provides for the power of the Arbitral Tribunal to determine the course of the land and maritime border between the Parties to the Agreement. Section II of the BCC, which in the sense of the principles of uti possidetis iuris and uti possidetis de facto constitutionalised the course of the border between the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Croatia, does not prohibit the state from determining the course of this border demarcated in nature in an agreement with the neighbouring Croatia. Quite on the contrary, by determining the course of the border demarcated in nature, Section II of the BCC is to be concretised at the international level. Section II of the BCC to an even lesser extent limits the state in any way in selecting the manner in which the course of the border demarcated in nature is to be determined. Section II of the BCC does not determine which international law path the state should select in order to determine the course of the state border; from the point of view of constitutional law, any mechanism of international law for determining the course of the border would be acceptable. Therefore, the states may select any possibility – they may conclude a treaty by which they directly determine the entire length of the course of the border; they may conclude several treaties by which they directly determine the border in sections; also treaties leaving the determination of the course of the border in its entirety or only in individual sections to a permanent international tribunal or other ad hoc international judicial body would be constitutionally admissible. In view of the fact that from the viewpoint of Section II of the BCC, the only relevant question is where the course of the state borders runs and not also how course of the state borders should be determined, Article 3 (1) (a) of the Agreement is not inconsistent with Article 4 of the Constitution in conjunction with Section II of the BCC.
57. Article 4 (a) of the Agreement will be of key importance for the deciding of the Arbitral Tribunal in terms of content; in accordance with this provision, the Tribunal will apply “the rules and principles of international law” for the determination of the maritime and land border. The rules and principles of international law will be the criteria for determining the course of the border, however, it follows from other provisions of the Agreement that the Arbitral Tribunal will also consider certain other circumstances of law and fact when interpreting and applying the rules and principles of international law. Thus the Agreement in Article 5 determines the critical date, namely that “no document or action undertaken unilaterally by either side after 25 June 1991 shall be accorded legal significance for the tasks of the Arbitral Tribunal or commit either side of the dispute and cannot, in any way, prejudice the award.”<sup>48</sup> The Arbitral Tribunal will thus have to consider only circumstances of law and fact as they existed in the disputed areas before 25 June 1991, which is determined in the Agreement as the critical date, and in the light of this, interpret and apply the rules and principles of international law. It will also have to consider the preamble to the Agreement<sup>49</sup>, in which the Parties to the Agreement affirmed their commitment to “a peaceful settlement of disputes, in the spirit of good neighbourly relations, reflecting their vital interests”.<sup>50</sup> Also these aspects of inter-state relations will be important when interpreting the relevant rules and principles of international law.

58. Also Article 4 (a) of the Agreement does not determine the course of the state borders between the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Croatia. The provision determines the relevant law for the determination of the course of the border, which cannot be alleged to be unconstitutional. In accordance with Article 4 (a) of the Agreement, the Arbitral Tribunal will have to substantiate its decision by means of the rules and principles of international law, which it is to interpret in the spirit of good neighbourly relations and the vital interests of the Parties to the Agreement. One of the basic and decisive principles of international law for the deciding of the Arbitral Tribunal will undoubtedly be the principle of uti possidetis. The Constitutional Court cannot discuss what the decision of the Arbitral Tribunal might be; in its nature, such will be a judicial decision whose precise content cannot be predicted. Also a precise analysis of the rules and principles of international law and their application in the hitherto international case law could not provide a clear answer as to where the Arbitral Tribunal will determine the border between Slovenia and Croatia. Guessing what the decision of the Arbitral Tribunal will be cannot be a task of the Constitutional Court. For a constitutional review of Article 4 (a) of the Agreement it suffices to establish that the provision does not determine the course of the border and that the rules on the basis of which the Arbitral Tribunal is to determine the course of the border are not unconstitutional.

48 Article 5 of the Agreement in the original English version reads as follows: “No document or action undertaken unilaterally by either side after 25 June 1991 shall be accorded legal significance for the tasks of the Arbitral Tribunal or commit either side of the dispute and cannot, in any way, prejudice the award.”

49 In accordance with the second paragraph of Article 31 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, the preamble to the treaty is relevant for the interpretation of its normative provisions.

50 The Preamble to the Agreement in this part in the original English version reads as follows: “[...] Affirming their commitment to a peaceful settlement of disputes, in the spirit of good neighbourly relations, reflecting their vital interests, [...]”.

59. The legal effects of the award of the Arbitral Tribunal are determined in Article 7 (2) and (3) of the Agreement. The second paragraph determines that the award is binding on the Parties and constitutes a definitive settlement of the dispute, whereas the third paragraph requires the Parties to take all necessary steps to implement the award, including by revising national legislation, as necessary, within six months after the adoption of the award. The award of the Arbitral Tribunal will thus be definitive, binding, and will have direct legal effects. For its applicability and implementation, either by concrete actions or by adopting the necessary regulations, additional ratification by the National Assembly will not be necessary. The provisions do not determine the course of the state borders; it also does not proceed from Section II of the BCC or Article 4 of the Constitution that the state may not bind itself to respecting the treaty or the award of the arbitral tribunal which it co-established by this treaty. Therefore, also Article 7 (2) and (3) are not inconsistent with Article 4 of the Constitution in conjunction with Section II of the BCC.
60. On the basis of the joint effect of the above-mentioned provisions of the Agreement, it is clear that the Agreement does not determine the course of the state borders between the Parties to the Agreement. The Agreement as such is an instrument whose purpose is to establish a mechanism for the peaceful settlement of the border dispute, as the states cannot by themselves agree on the course of the common state border. The peaceful settlement of disputes is a duty of states at the international level, and in the preamble to the Agreement the Parties to the Agreement even refer to Article 33 of the UN Charter, which enumerates the peaceful means for the settlement of disputes.<sup>51</sup> The aim of the Agreement is to establish the Arbitral Tribunal, define its tasks, determine the rules for its deciding and the legal effects of its decision, and to determine the procedure for its operation. As the provisions of the Agreement which regulate these issues are not unconstitutional, the Constitutional Court decided that the reviewed provisions of the Agreement are not inconsistent with Article 4 of the Constitution in conjunction with Section II of the BCC.
61. The second paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution determines that the National Assembly is bound by the opinion of the Constitutional Court. In Opinion No. Rm-1/97 the Constitutional Court has already adopted the position that an opinion issued in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution is not a consultative opinion. The National Assembly is bound by the opinion of the Constitutional Court, which entails that the National Assembly may decide on ratification only after it is served with the opinion of the Constitutional Court. As the Constitutional Court decided that Article 3 (1) (a), Article (4) (a), and Article 7 (2) and (3) of the Agreement are not inconsistent with the Constitution and the BCC, the decision on the ratification of the Agreement is a matter of the political deciding of the National Assembly.
62. The fact that the state borders are protected at the constitutional level in the Republic of Slovenia, whereas the course of the land and maritime border demarcated in nature will be determined by the Arbitral Tribunal, call for a caution from the Constitutional Court. At this very moment it is not possible to predict where the Arbitral Tribunal will determine the course of the state border. Due to the fact that in doing so it will not be bound by the constitutional law of the Republic of Slovenia (nor by law of the Republic of Croatia), but will perform its task on the basis of the rules and principles of international law, which are in and of themselves not unconstitutional, it is indeed possible that the Arbitral Tribunal will determine the course of the border differently than proceeds from Section II of the BCC. This would not change the fact that the Agreement is not unconstitutional, as it is an instrument which only determines the path towards the resolution of this problem; furthermore, this would not entail that the award of the Arbitral Tribunal would be unconstitutional or even that it could be a subject of the review before the Constitutional Court. The award of the Arbitral Tribunal will entail an extraordinary legal situation, as this decision will be a legal instrument which will only exist in the sphere of international law and therefore it will not at all be possible to speak of its unconstitutionality in the sense of the inconsistency of national regulations with the Constitution.

63. This exceptional situation with regard to international law entails that the Republic of Slovenia could also find itself in an exceptional situation with regard to national law. On one hand, it would be bound to respect the Agreement and would have to implement the award of the Arbitral Tribunal, including by revising national legislation as necessary. On the other hand, the statutory implementation of such award could entail that laws would be inconsistent with Article 4 of the Constitution in conjunction with Section II of the BCC if in the award of the Arbitral Tribunal the border were determined differently than proceeds from Section II of the BCC. In order to avoid such an exceptional legal situation, which at this moment cannot be predicted, the Constitutional Court calls on the National Assembly to weigh whether it would be reasonable to amend the Constitution in order to prevent any unconstitutionality of the national legislation (laws which regulate municipal territories, courts, administrative units, constituencies, etc.) by which, on the basis of the Agreement, the award of the Arbitral Tribunal is to be implemented.

C

64. The Constitutional Court issued this opinion on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution, Article 70 of the CCA, and the third indent of the third paragraph of Article 46 of the Rules of Procedure of the Constitutional Court, composed of: Jože Tratnik, President, and Judges Dr Mitja Deisinger, Mag. Marta Klampfer, Mag. Marija Krisper Kramberger, Mag. Miroslav Mozetič, Dr Ernest Petrič, Jasna Pogačar, Mag. Jadranka Sovdat, and Jan Zobec. Points I to IV of the operative provisions of the Opinion were adopted unanimously, and Points V and VI of the operative provisions were adopted by eight votes against one. Judge Mozetič voted against and submitted a dissenting opinion. Judges Deisinger and Zobec submitted concurring opinions.

Jože Tratnik
President

1. I agree with points I to IV of the operative provisions of the Opinion, but I cannot agree with points V and VI. I could agree with these points only if I understood the Arbitration Agreement solely as “an instrument whose purpose is to establish a mechanism for the peaceful settlement of the border dispute”, meaning that it is not an instrument whose purpose is to determine the course of the state borders (see point 60 of the reasoning of the Opinion). This is the view of the majority, which follows from the wording of the Agreement and does not take into account its fundamental purpose.
2. In my opinion, such understanding ignores the fact that the main purpose of the Agreement is to “originally” determine the border between the Parties to the Agreement, which is to be determined by the Arbitral Tribunal which is to be established by this Agreement. Its decision will be binding and will constitute a definitive settlement of the dispute (the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Agreement). The Parties to the Agreement undertake, within six months of the award, to take all necessary steps to implement the award, including by revising national legislation if necessary (the third paragraph of Article 7 of the Agreement).
3. The purpose of the Agreement is therefore not the mere establishment of the Arbitral Tribunal, the determination of its tasks, the establishment of the rules of procedures for deciding, and the determination of the legal effects of its decisions, but the original determination of the border between the Parties to the Agreement. This purpose is clear from the Agreement itself, as it constitutes its sole task, and that is the determination of the border between the two countries. I cannot simply ignore this fact when assessing the Agreement. Undoubtedly, the Agreement itself does not determine the border; the border will be determined by the Arbitral Tribunal. The Agreement authorises the Arbitral Tribunal to determine the state border between the Parties to the Agreement. Given the legal nature and authority of the Arbitral Award, it is in my opinion indisputable that this decision will interfere with the state border with Croatia, which was constitutionalised by the BCC and Article 4 of the Constitution. This constitutes an interference with the Constitution. This competence of the Arbitral Tribunal is based on the Arbitration Agreement, and therefore, in my opinion, it cannot be reviewed separately from that fact. If treated separately from this fact, it is of course not inconsistent with the Constitution.
4. In my view, the conclusion that necessarily follows from the reasoning of the Opinion (in particular from sections B – III, B – IV, and B – V), the majority of which I agree with, is that the National Assembly should amend the Constitution even before the ratification of the Agreement as the state borders of the Republic of Slovenia are regulated in national law under Section II. of the BCC “and constitutionalised” and are therefore a part of the Constitution. Otherwise, the National Assembly, as the institution empowered to amend the Constitution, will find itself in a situation where due to the decision of the same Assembly, but now in its legislative capacity, it will have to amend the Constitution. The decision of the legislature (the ratification of the Arbitration Agreement), which was adopted by a majority of the votes cast by the deputies present at the session where the quorum was attained, binds the legislature, as the institution empowered to amend the Constitution, to amend or supplement the Constitution by a two-thirds majority of all deputies. I think that therefore the National Assembly cannot adopt such a decision or, if it does so, such would be inconsistent with the Constitution.

5. It follows from the Opinion that the BCC in conjunction with Article 4 of the Constitution constitutionalised the state borders of the Republic of Slovenia (point 34), that these provisions entail a constitutional obstacle to altering the state borders, that in a territorially fairly small state such provisions also have a guarantee function and that the constitution framers established the state territory and state borders as one of the fundamental values which must be protected at the constitutional level (point 38). The Opinion continues: "A treaty which would alter the course of the state borders would also entail an alteration of the territory on which the BCC on 25 June 1991 established the state sovereignty of the Republic of Slovenia and would therefore be inconsistent with Section II of the BCC." Next, in point 46 the Opinion clearly emphasises that a treaty that would alter the course of the borders between Slovenia, Italy, Austria, and Hungary which were already determined in treaties would be inconsistent with Section II of the BCC in conjunction with Article 4 of the Constitution. This means that the National Assembly should not ratify such a treaty without a previous amendment to the Constitution (as the institution empowered to amend the Constitution). If there were no amendment to the Constitution, the National Assembly should reject the ratification of such a treaty.
6. Regarding the state borders between Slovenia and Croatia, the situation is somewhat different. Here the state border is not defined by a treaty. However, the Opinion emphasises that the border between the two states (in national law) was determined at the constitutional level "in accordance with the principles of uti possidetis iuris and uti possidetis de facto" (point 48). In addition, the Opinion emphasises in point 50 that "the land border between the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Croatia is constitutionalised in Section II of the BCC as the border that had its course along the borders of the hitherto municipalities or cadastral municipalities, whereas the maritime border is constitutionalised as having its course along the line up to where the Republic of Slovenia de facto exercised its authority within the former SFRY." In point 51 of the Opinion it is also pointed out that the constitutionalisation of the state borders on one hand entails that the National Assembly may not ratify by a law a treaty which would alter the state borders as they are determined in Section II of the BCC. On the other hand, this does not entail the prohibition that the course of the state border between Slovenia and Croatia is determined in nature, since such has not yet been determined in nature. I of course share these views, since otherwise it would not be possible to determine this state border in nature. However, this does not mean that such views should only apply to "real" treaties regulating the state border and not to cases in which a state border which could not be determined by consent to a treaty is regulated by the award of an arbitral tribunal set up by the states in a special treaty in which they undertake to respect and implement its decision.

7. It clearly follows from the part of the Opinion which I agree with that the state borders of the Republic of Slovenia are raised to the constitutional level and that therefore the determination and alteration of the state borders also require amendments to the Constitution. However, being raised to the constitutional level or the constitutionalisation of such entails that in national law they are a part of the Constitution. They are part of the materia constitutionis. The procedure for amending the Constitution is defined in the Constitution and is clear. Undoubtedly, the determination or alteration of the state borders is first of all an important question of international law and state borders are altered in a manner consistent with international law only by a treaty or by transferring the solution of this issue to an international judicial body. However, a treaty must be incorporated into national law in order to become a part of it, which in Slovenia occurs by ratification by means of an act. The National Assembly may not ratify a treaty if such is inconsistent with the Constitution. If, however, it would like to ratify such a treaty, it must in advance amend the Constitution (as the institution empowered to amend the Constitution). Such a conclusion is a logical consequence of the finding that the state borders are constitutional subject-matter (i.e. part of the Constitution).
8. It follows from the Opinion that a treaty determining the alteration of the state border may not be ratified without prior amendment of the Constitution. This standpoint, according to the majority, does not apply in the case of the ratification of the Arbitration Agreement, since the latter does not determine the state border and therefore does not in itself amend the Constitution. I wrote already in points 2 and 3 of this separate opinion that this position is too narrow and that I cannot agree with it. The result of the Arbitration Agreement will be an original determination of the state border. This is exactly the same as for the determination of the state border by a treaty. The difference is that in this latter case the determination of the state border is a result of the mutual agreement of both states and in the former case it will be the result of the arbitration award of the Arbitral Tribunal to which both states concerned transferred the authority to reach this decision. Another important difference is also the fact that a treaty regarding the alteration (or determination) of the state border additionally needs to be ratified, whereas this is not necessary for the arbitration award, since the states concerned have already declared in the Agreement by which they established the Arbitral Tribunal that they will accept the arbitral award and that they will respect and enforce it. Therefore, as I wrote already in point 7 of this separate opinion, I see no valid reason for the different treatment of the treaty concerning the establishment of the Arbitral Tribunal, which results not only in the establishment of the Arbitral Tribunal, but above all in the original determination of the state border (of course, by the Arbitral Tribunal).
9. Therefore, it is in my opinion necessary, with regard to the consequences (or the result of the determination of the state border) of the Arbitration Agreement and considering the legal nature of the arbitration award, which stems from the Arbitration Agreement, that considering the ratification of the Arbitration Agreement the procedure should be the same as with a treaty on a state border, i.e. that it should not be ratified without a corresponding amendment of the Constitution. Any other solution does not seem logical to me and is inconsistent with the Constitution. After the arbitration award is adopted, there will be an amendment to the Constitution, not just legislation. If, however, there is no amendment to the Constitution or if the laws implementing the arbitral award are abrogated due to their inconsistency with the Constitution, this will consequently breach the international obligations of the state which it has already undertaken on the basis of the Arbitration Agreement.

10. In view of the above, I could not vote for points V. and VI. of the operative provisions of the Opinion. I, as well as the majority, do not take sides whether the Agreement is good or not. I as well cannot know and I do not want to guess what the decision of the Arbitral Tribunal will be. In my opinion, this is not really important. Any decision will encroach upon the Constitution, as it will determine the state border. This also applies to the border with the Republic of Croatia. Even this border is constitutionalised. Certainly, this does not mean that it is not allowed to determine it by a treaty or with the assistance of an international judicial body, this is even necessary as it is not yet determined in international law by consent between the two states. Therefore, it is undisputed that an agreement concerning the establishment of such an international judicial body in itself cannot be inconsistent with the Constitution. However, the result of a treaty determining the state border or the decision of such international judicial body will entail the determination of the state border. Nevertheless, in the Republic of Slovenia the state borders are constitutional subject-matter, i.e. part of the Constitution. Therefore, the legislature, without being so authorised by the institution empowered to amend the Constitution, should not alter the state borders nor determine them in a more precise way, since it would thus interfere with the Constitution. Therefore, the caveat stated in points 62 and 63 of the Opinion will be of any significance only if it were (or if it will be) understood in this manner by the deputies. Amending the Constitution makes sense only if it is done prior to the ratification of the Arbitration Agreement. Later, the question will no longer be whether to amend the Constitution, as it will have to be amended if it was meant seriously (which I do not doubt) that the state borders of the Republic of Slovenia are constitutionalised in the national law. And if I may draw attention once again to point 38 of the Constitutional Court Opinion: “these constitutional provisions [Section II of the BCC and Article 4 of the Constitution] entail a constitutional obstacle to altering the state borders. In a territorially fairly small state, as is the Republic of Slovenia, such provisions also have a guarantee function; by these provisions the constitution framers established the state territory and state borders as one of the fundamental values which must be protected at the constitutional level.”

Mag. Miroslav Mozetič

1. With this concurring opinion I wish to additionally substantiate what, in my opinion, paragraph IV of the operative provisions of the Opinion entails.
2. In Paragraph 47 of the statement of reasons of the Opinion the Constitutional Court establishes that “the Republic of Slovenia is a coastal state and it [...] de facto exercised its authority in a part of the Adriatic Sea and also had access to the High Sea”. This is concretised in footnote 27 and it also follows from the acts mentioned in footnote 38. The standpoint in paragraph 54 is important, namely that the award of the Arbitral Tribunal will entail a division of the former legally unilateral, although de facto divided, Yugoslav sea in the north Adriatic at the international level. From this proceeds the obligation of the Republic of Slovenia to submit an appropriate proposal for a fair and just division of this part of the Adriatic Sea as well as a proposal for a junction of the territorial sea of the Republic of Slovenia to the High Sea (Paragraph 55 of the reasoning of the Opinion).
3. a/ This position of the Constitutional Court can be substantiated on the basis of national and international law. Slovenia as part of the former Yugoslavia had territorial access to the High Sea, as was also explicitly admitted by Croatia in one of its notes. In Note of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Croatia No. 5893/03 of 18 November 2003, Croatia unambiguously stated that Slovenia had had territorial access to the High Sea when it was part of the former SFRY.<sup>1</sup> In compliance with the principle of respecting the status as on 25 June 1991, Slovenia thus still has territorial access to the High Sea.
- b/ Slovenia is the only successor to the Treaty between the Government of the SFRY and the Government of the Republic of Italy with Annexes I to X of 10 November 1975 (i.e. the Osimo Treaty). According to the Osimo Treaty, which defines the border between Slovenia and Italy, this border extends to point T5 in the south, which is the point of Slovenia’s territorial access to the High Sea. It is precisely the Osimo Treaty that establishes Slovenia’s right to a territorial junction to the High Sea in an international context. When in 1954 Yugoslavia acquired Zone B of the Free Territory of Trieste, the purpose of the Osimo Treaty was that Slovenia acquire access to the sea<sup>2</sup> to a full extent with access to the High Sea at point T5. The territorial junction of Slovenia to the High Sea is thus based on international law.
- c/ Slovenia is a successor to the 1968 Agreement between the Government of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Government of the Italian Republic on the Delimitation of the Continental Shelf between the Two Countries. Slovenia has notified Italy (Note of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Slovenia No. ZSD-JVE-46/03 of 24 July 2003 – Annex 6) as well as Croatia of the succession to this Agreement. Italy has taken note of Slovenia's succession to the Agreement (Note of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Italian Republic No. 003889/205 of 22 December 2003)<sup>3</sup>, thus recognising Slovenia the continental shelf to the south of T5. With the continental shelf, Slovenia logically also has territorial access to the High Sea. In accordance with Article 3(1)(c) of the Agreement, the Arbitral Tribunal will determine the external borders of the continental shelf of Slovenia.

- d/ Prior to 25 June 1991, Slovenia exercised jurisdiction in the Bay of Piran and beyond the Bay to point T5 by the supervision of the Koper Border Police Station at the Yugoslav-Italian maritime border.<sup>4</sup>
- e/ The Bay of Piran had within the SFRY the status of internal sea waters (Official Gazette SFRY, No. 49/87). It retained such status also after independence. In accordance with Article 5 of the Maritime Code (Official Gazette RS, No. 120/06 – official consolidated text), all bays constitute internal sea waters, thus also the Bay of Piran. In the same manner, the Republic of Croatia retained all bays as internal waters.<sup>5</sup> Until 25 June 1991, the Bay of Piran was formally treated as part of Slovenia. For instance, also the territory of the entire Bay of Piran was determined as a cadastral municipality within the borders of the territory of the Republic of Slovenia by the Long-Term Plan of the Socialist Republic of Slovenia for the 1986-2000 period (consolidated cartographic part) with fourteen maps (Official Gazette SRS, No. 36/90). Furthermore, in the Atlas of the Environmental Agency of the Republic of Slovenia the entire Bay of Piran is determined to be Slovene and the border of Slovene territorial waters up to the junction to the High Sea is demarcated. The Agency has data from official registers which were collected on the basis of the Water Framework Directive (WFD) and the land survey data of the Republic of Slovenia, whereby they represent the border of the cadastral municipality Morje [Sea]. A delimitation inside the Bay of Piran is not applicable also in accordance with international law, as the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea (Official Gazette SFRY, MP, No. 1/86) in item 6 of Article 10 determined that the delimitation does not apply to “historic” bays, whereas the Bay of Piran has all the characteristics of such a bay.<sup>6</sup>

4 Data from the White Book, pp. 10 – 11, footnote 27 of the Opinion. The Marine Fisheries Ordinance of the Coastal Communities, adopted 11 December 1987, defines in Article 7 the fishing sea waters of Slovenia as “extending from Cape Savudrija to Cape Debeli Rtič”. The Republic of Croatia and the communities of Umag and Buje did not contest this Ordinance or such fishing practice before the Brioni Agreement (7 July 1991), which was intended to maintain the existing state of affairs as of 25 June 1991 at sea (Prof. Dr Darja Miheli, Zgodovinski inštitut Milka Kosa, ZRC SAZU, Ljubljana, www.delo.si/clanek, 27 October 2008).

6 There are instances of historic bays in the functioning of certain states in which it is not necessary that they belong to only one state (Prof. Dr Mirjam Škrk, Seveda nam je blokada nekaj prinesla [Of Course We Gained Something from the Blocade], Priloga Večera, 3 October 2009).

4. The starting points regarding Slovenia's junction to the High Sea are entirely in compliance with Articles 3 and 4 of the Agreement. As stated in paragraph V of the operative provisions and in the statement of reasons, the Agreement establishes a mechanism for the peaceful settlement of the border dispute and is thus from a legal perspective a procedural act. Only one provision of the Agreement is an exception, namely Article 3(1)(b), which entails a completely definite provision of substantive law. This provision namely already determines that Slovenia has a junction to the High Sea, whereas the task of the Arbitral Tribunal is merely to precisely determine the junction of Slovene territorial sea to the High Sea.<sup>7</sup> It is important that pursuant to Article 3(1) of the Agreement, the Arbitral Tribunal shall determine Slovenia's junction<sup>8</sup> to the High Sea, thus the Arbitral Tribunal does not decide thereon or establish such, as such is already determined in the above-cited provision of the Agreement. With reference to such, the term "Slovenia" entails its territory on land, the internal waters and territorial sea, the seabed, and the ground under and the airspace above all this territory. The junction to the High Sea entails a direct junction of the territorial sea to the open sea, whereas the open sea starts at Point T5. The western border of the territorial sea up to point T5 of the Republic of Slovenia, as the only legal successor to the Osimo Treaties, is already determined, therefore the task of the Arbitral Tribunal is merely to determine the eastern border of the territorial sea and the width of the junction to the international waters, which must enable normal transit of all vessels. Such interpretation is also completely in compliance with the applicable law in accordance with Article 4(b) of the Agreement, which requires the application of equity and the principle of good neighbourly relations in order to achieve a fair and just result by taking into account all relevant circumstances, which are precisely what was mentioned above.
5. Upon determining the course of the maritime border the Arbitral Tribunal will also have to decide regarding the coastal area. In the area of the former Zone B of the Free Territory of Trieste the border is namely undefined to the greatest extent, therefore the Arbitral Tribunal will have to determine the course of the border originally.

7 The former Croatian Minister for Foreign Affairs and professor of international law, Fellow of the Croatian Academy of Sciences and Arts, Dr Davorin Rudolf claims that the Agreement envisages that Slovenia must obtain access to the high seas ("[...] sporazumom unaprijed predviđeno da Slovenija mora dobiti izlaz na otvoreno more [...]"), www.index.hr/vijesti/clanak, 30 October 2009.

8 Different interpretations of the English word "junction" have emerged in professional circles. In the dictionary Veliki angleško-slovenski slovar [The Large English-Slovene Dictionary] (Grad, Škerlj, Vitorovič, DZS, Ljubljana, 1986) the term is translated as a "spoj, stik" [joint, contact], by the Google translation engine as a "spoj" [joint], in the Evroterm database as a "točka združitve" [point of junction] and in the translation programme Presis as "priključek" [connector]. The term "junction" is not only a legal concept, as it has different meanings in different contexts. It has to be put into the context of the Agreement, especially with regard to Article 4(b). Regarding this, the term "junction" is appropriate, as it also allows for a certain derogation from some rules of international law, because, in any case, international law cannot rule out a fair and just decision, i.e. to establish a junction of Slovenia with the High Sea. The term "junction" in this context entails a fusion of the territorial sea with the High Sea.

The principle of uti possidetis iuris will in this case be subordinate to the rules and principles of international law (Article 4(a) of the Agreement), thus concretely to the Osimo Treaty and to the London Memorandum, with a special statute as a constituent part of the Memorandum. From the 12th century on, the Municipality of Piran comprised also the cadastral municipalities of Kaštel and Savudrija,<sup>9</sup> which were separated by the ordinance of the Military Administration of the Yugoslav Army in 1947. After the termination of the Free Territory of Trieste a civil political and administrative unit of Piran should have been established within the above-mentioned historical framework, whereas by virtue of Article 7 of the above-mentioned special statute, the division of civil administrative units was prohibited. When interpreting the Osimo Treaty and the instruments connected therewith, the Arbitral Tribunal will not be able to overlook the foundation of these international documents. In 1954, Yugoslavia acquired Zone B of the Free Territory of Trieste, whereas Zone A of the Free Territory of Trieste with Slovene ethnic territory and over 140,000 of our Slovene compatriots thereafter belonged to Italy.<sup>10</sup> In view of the fact that in the entire territory of the Free Territory of Trieste the official languages were only Italian and Slovene, the delimitation of the former Zone B of the Free Territory of Trieste should have been different. The Republic of Slovenia will have to appropriately define such in the subject-matter of the dispute in accordance with Article 3 (2) of the Agreement. In such a broader definition of the territory in which the Arbitral Tribunal is to determine the course of the land border there are no limits, as is particularly underlined in Paragraph 25 of the Opinion.

JOINED BY JUDGE MAG. MARIJA KRISPER KRAMBERGER

1. I did not decide to write a separate opinion because I object to any of the main standpoints of the majority. On the contrary, I was motivated only by my concurrence with the standpoint according to which “[t]he award of the Arbitral Tribunal regarding the land border will entail the concretisation of the border in international law, as it was known and determined within the former SFRY in national law, whereas regarding the maritime border such will entail a division of the former legally unilateral, although de facto divided, Yugoslav sea in the north Adriatic at the international level” (Paragraph 54 of the reasoning). I also agree with the finding that “[o]ne of the basic and decisive principles of international law for the deciding of the Arbitral Tribunal will undoubtedly be the principle of uti possidetis” (Paragraph 58 of the reasoning). However, unlike the majority I believe that a consistent derivation of these findings and observations entails nothing more than the exclusion of the possibility that the arbitral award would be inconsistent with Article 4 of the Constitution in conjunction with Section II of the BCC. Two premises led me to this realisation.

9 Croatia as well invokes historical reasons regarding the disputed border with Bosnia and Herzegovina at Neum, i.e. that Croatia has been entitled to two islands, Veli and Mali Školj, already since the times of the Dubrovnik Republic and the Austro-Hungarian Empire (www.dnevnik.si/novice, 6 October 2006).

2. The first is the interpretation of Section II of the BCC and the comparison of this interpretation with the substantive provisions of the Agreement (“Applicable Law” – Article 4) which suggests that the criteria by which the borders with the Republic of Croatia are set out in the BCC are, in essence, no different from the criteria by which the border will be determined by the Arbitral Tribunal, i.e. the rules and principles of international law. If there is no inconsistency between these premises on the basis of which the course of the border in nature is concretised (between Section II of the BCC, on one side, and Article 4 of the Agreement, on the other), then it is logically impossible that the criteria that will be applied by the Arbitral Tribunal, not for determining the border (as such is already defined by the BCC and by the provisions of the Agreement, which are consistent with the BCC), but for its concretisation in nature, would be inconsistent with the Constitution. As there would be nothing wrong from the point of view of constitutional law if the Agreement entrusted the Arbitral Tribunal with the determination of the border in accordance with the BCC, there is nothing wrong if this international judicial body is charged with the task of determining the border pursuant to the substantive provisions of the Agreement, which are not inconsistent with the Constitution. In my opinion, the finding that by adopting the BCC the Republic of Slovenia “declared to the world that it had met the international law criteria for the existence of a state, which was important for recognition by other states” and that the aim of the BCC was “to constitute at the constitutional level and to declare at the international level a new sovereign state, which would be an equal subject in the international community” (both in Paragraph 32 of the reasoning) seems of outstanding importance to me. Our state thus gained independence and became a sovereign state in accordance with the rules and principles of international law. The substantive provisions of the Agreement therefore cannot be inconsistent with Section II of the BCC understood in this manner. Especially not given the fact that there is a safeguard included in the Agreement against a certain degree of the unpredictability of the arbitral award of the Arbitral Tribunal ordering this international judicial body as a separate and independent duty (irrespective the applicable substantive law defined in Article 4 of the Agreement) to ensure Slovenia’s junction to the High Sea (Article 3(1)(b) of the Agreement). Therefore, even if the “applicable law” as defined in Article 4 of the Agreement allowed for any possibility that the Republic of Slovenia (in spite of the principle of uti possidetis de facto) would not have a junction to the High Sea (e.g. on the basis of the principle of natural prolongation)<sup>1</sup>, the final award would not deprive the state of a junction to the High Sea – this junction is namely protected as a duty of the Arbitral Tribunal particularly emphasised in Article 3(1)(b).

1 Concerning the principle of equity in the case law of international tribunals on the resolution of disputes

3. The second premise must answer the question of the competence and qualification of the Arbitral Tribunal, i.e. it must take into consideration the possibility that this Tribunal will determine a border which is inconsistent with the BCC. In any case, I agree with the majority that “the decision of the Arbitral Tribunal [will be,] in its nature, [...] a judicial decision whose precise content cannot be predicted” (Paragraph 58 of the reasoning). This is quite logical. If the outcome of the arbitration proceedings were predictable, the Agreement would not have been concluded, as any endeavour on the part of the Tribunal would be completely unnecessary. The purpose of entrusting such determination to the Arbitral Tribunal lies precisely in the fact that its ruling is unpredictable. Is not this the very essence of such disputes? Without an uncertain outcome of the dispute, when it is already clear in advance which of the conflicting parties is right, there can be no dispute. This applies as well to large, international legal disputes between states, as well as to completely ordinary “civil” disputes. What is essential for the review of the constitutionality of the Agreement is therefore not (and as the BCC does not determine the actual course of the border with Croatia in nature, it cannot be) where the border will actually be concretised at the level of international law, but according to which rules this will happen. There can be only one constitutional law dimension of the predictability of the award of the Arbitral Tribunal – and that is the one determined in Article 4 of the Constitution in conjunction with Section II of the BCC. If the award is not inconsistent with these constitutional acts, it cannot be problematic from the point of view of constitutional law. That this will be the case arises from the fact that the substantive provisions of the Agreement together with the safeguard provided in Article 3(1)(b) essentially overlap with the interpretation of Section II of the BCC by the Constitutional Court.
4. I understand the concerns of those who warn about the possibility of disappointment. This is certainly not impossible – on the contrary, it is embedded in the resolution of the dispute by the Arbitral Tribunal. It is highly probable that in the end at least one of the parties to the arbitration proceedings, although they have the same constitutional law views regarding the border, will be disappointed and dissatisfied with the award.<sup>2</sup> However, it should be noted that the border, although it might not be concretised in accordance with our notions of where it should run based on the principles of international law uti possidetis iuris (on land) and uti possidetis de facto (at sea), which are also the criteria determined in Section II of the BCC, will still be a border determined on the basis of these principles – and therefore it will not be contrary to the Constitution. The substantive provisions of the Agreement are (may be) vague to the extent to which Section II of the BCC is vague regarding the definition regarding maritime borders and the principle of natural prolongation as one of the criteria of the principle of equity, see J. Metelko, Pravičnost u sukcesiji država, Pravni fakultet u Zagrebu, Zagreb, 1992, pp. 37-88.

2 This is vividly explained by the epigraph of the excellent monography by A. Uzelac, Istina u sudskom postupku, Pravni fakultet u Zagrebu, Zagreb, 1997, citing C. S. Pierce: “There is no distinction of meaning so fine as to consist in anything but a possible difference of practice.”

(determination) of the border in order to still remain consistent with the Constitution.<sup>3</sup> At this point, it may therefore be said: there will be nothing wrong with the award of the Arbitral Tribunal from the aspect of constitutional law as long as it falls within this range of latitude. Concretising the border, which is allegedly known, can never be unconstitutional if it is only carried out within this range, i.e. within what is supposedly known and guaranteed by constitutional acts (and by the substantive provisions of the Agreement, which are consistent with the latter). The state border with the Republic of Croatia is certainly constitutionalised, but (unlike the borders with other states, which are determined and concretised by treaties) not demarcated down to every boundary stone, every angle is not marked, nor are the geographical coordinates determined. Only the manner of concretely determining where the border runs in nature is constitutionalised. And as long as the concrete determination of the border moves within this framework of constitutional law, the border so defined cannot be contrary to the Constitution.

5. The question, however, is what if the award oversteps this framework and extends into a field outside that defined in Section II of the BCC and in the substantive provisions of the Agreement, which are essentially consistent with this Section. At first glance, it appears that this situation would be unconstitutional. In theory this would be possible, however actually, and I think even legally, it is not by any means. Firstly, because the Arbitral Tribunal should simply be trusted – trusted in a way that the courts should be trusted in a state governed by the rule of law, trusted to such an extent that what is decided is taken to be true. And secondly, because it also is true.<sup>4</sup> If the border is disputed, because each of the parties in the dispute has their own views on where its

3 I completely agree with the finding that “Section II of the BCC is a constitutional reflection of international law regulating the question of the borders at the moment when Slovenia became a sovereign and independent state” (Paragraph 45 of the reasoning) and that “Section II of the BCC enables further determination of the course of the state border on land and at sea between the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Croatia, however, the legislature is thereby limited by the principles of uti possidetis iuris (on land) and uti possidetis de facto (at sea).” I also concur with the subsequent position that “the position of the Constitutional Court in Opinion No. Rm-1/00 must also be understood in this sense, namely that ‘the BCC and the Constitution do not prohibit the conclusion of treaties that would regulate border issues’ and that a treaty ‘could also contain provisions on the state borders, which would in and of itself not be contrary to the BCC and the Constitution provided that it remains within the framework of Article 4 of the Constitution’” (all Paragraph 51 of the reasoning).

4 No one has direct access to the truth. Even if we say that truth is the accordance of representations with an objective reality, we have said only what the truth is (and even then in a tautological manner: “I have realised the truth when I have realised the truth.”), but we have not said anything about how to identify the truth. The truth, therefore, can not be defined by substantive criteria – none of these have yet provided a satisfactory answer – but by procedural ones. The truth is, therefore, what is generally or intersubjectively accepted as a consensus (the consensual concept of truth), or what a court finds in proceedings which externally legitimise its outcome with its postulates of a fair trial (open, free, based on a discussion of reasonable arguments, which is identified by the adversariality, public nature, directness, and impartiality and independence of the tribunal) – in an ideal verbalised situation, this would be a constituted and in this situation legitimised truth (in a state governed by the rule of law, it is self-evident that the judgments of the courts are accepted as true by any reasonable man, i.e. as the intersubjective truth). Cf. A. Uzelać, ibidem, pp. 202, 208, 214, et seq.

course should be on the basis of undisputed rules on its concretisation in nature, the dispute may be resolved only in two ways: either by an agreement, or through a third party – an arbitrator. Both methods should be consistent with the Constitution. Regarding the Agreement, both parties must act in accordance with an interpretation of Section II of the BCC and Article 4 of the Constitution that is consistent with the constitutional case law, but if they decide to settle the dispute with the assistance of a third party, they must agree that when resolving the dispute this international judicial body will be bound in the same way and to the same degree as that by which the borders are constitutionalised. What the truth is here (which in itself is not recognisable by means of direct insight), can be said only after both sides of the dispute agree upon it (i.e. the agreement), or when their consent is replaced by a definitive and binding award of the Arbitral Tribunal, which draws its legitimacy also from determining the border in a manner that is consistent with the Constitution. The same logic applies as for resolving any other dispute (i.e. what is established by a court is not the truth because it is a reflection of the objective reality, but rather because the matter has been ruled on definitively, irrevocably, and finally by a court, and because in a state governed by the rule of law, where courts decide according to the procedure and criteria ensuring that the claims, proposals, and arguments of parties will be reasonably and therefore objectively decided upon, the judgments of the courts must be obeyed). Therefore, the border, no matter where it is concretised in nature, will not be unconstitutional – it will not be, because it will be determined by a trustworthy international judicial body in a manner not inconsistent with the constitutional acts. It would be completely different if the Agreement provided that the Arbitral Tribunal shall determine the border in accordance with the state of affairs when the Agreement was concluded – such a manner of determining the border would be inconsistent with Article 4 of the Constitution in conjunction with Section II of the BCC, as it is common knowledge that after 25 June 1991 Croatia expanded its actual authority. Similar would hold true if the Arbitral Tribunal was given the power to determine the border ex aequo et bono. This term “usually refers to external and abstract justice and its meaning can be only theoretically discussed as there is virtually no case law with regard to its application in border disputes”.<sup>5</sup> It is therefore also not precluded that a border determined in such a manner would be inconsistent with the constitutional acts.

6. I therefore do not share the constitutional law concerns of the majority that “the statutory implementation of [the] award could entail that laws would be inconsistent with Article 4 of the Constitution in conjunction with Section II of the BCC if in the award of the Arbitral Tribunal the border were determined differently than proceeds from Section II of the BCC” (Paragraph 63 of the reasoning – such concern necessarily involves a degree of distrust in the ability of the Arbitral Tribunal to decide the dispute on the basis of the constitutionally consistent set of criteria that are defined in the Agreement) and do not see the need for recommendations that the National Assembly “weigh whether it would be reasonable to amend the Constitution in order to prevent any unconstitutionality of the national legislation (laws which regulate municipal territories, courts, administrative units, constituencies, etc.) by which, on the basis of the Agreement, the award of the Arbitral Tribunal is to be implemented” (Paragraph 63 of the reasoning).<sup>6</sup> Such intervention of the institution empowered

- 6 Such a recommendation also seems illogical to me: it is not a duty of the Constitutional Court to advise the legislature to adapt the Constitution to legal acts of lower rank, but vice versa – the Constitution is always the unalterable higher premise. If the majority is of the opinion that even a completely appropriate award of the Arbitral Tribunal might entail such a concretisation of the state border which would be inconsistent with the constitutional interpretation of Section II of the BCC, if therefore according to the opinion of the majority the substantive provisions of the Agreement also allow for such a result of the proceedings before the Arbitral Tribunal according to which the state border with the Republic of Croatia would be established without any consideration of the principle of uti possidetis, and if there is a real danger that an international judicial body will disregard a duty imposed upon it by Article 3(1)(b) of the Agreement (to determine Slovenia's junction to the High Sea), then I reject the finding that Article 3(3)(a), Article 4(a), and Article 7(2) and (3) of the Agreement are not inconsistent with Article 4 of the Constitution in conjunction with Section II of the BCC. Precisely because they must be, as delineated in Point VI of the operative provisions of the Opinion, interpreted and reviewed as a whole in terms of content, they would be, in my opinion, contrary to the Constitution. Their combined effect entails that the borders would be determined contrary to their definition determined in Section II of the BCC, that their determination would be binding and definitive for the Republic of Slovenia, and that within six months after the adoption of the award, our state would be obliged to take all necessary steps for its implementation, including the revision of the national legislation, if necessary. So if there is a real possibility that these provisions with their combined effect would lead to a situation where the award with its direct legal effects would definitively and bindingly break through the constitutional guarantee of the state borders with the Republic of Croatia (since the award does not require ratification, all such concerns regarding the realistic possibility that its content would be inconsistent with the constitutional documents must be dealt with in the preliminary review proceedings – there will be no “make-up exam”), then it is not possible to state that the award as an independent instrument of international law that does not require ratification would “only exist in the sphere of international law” and that “therefore it will not at all be possible to speak of its unconstitutionality in the sense of the inconsistency of national regulations with the Constitution” (Paragraph 62 of the reasoning). In so far as the state borders are constitutionalised (and thus legally internalised), then it is clear even without special analysis that the award, if it deviated from the constitutional provisions determining the state border, would indeed also have internal legal effects – to exactly the same extent that Article 4 of the Constitution and Section II of the BCC entail them. An award which was the result of criteria other than those guaranteed by constitutional provisions which are – and in the manner as they are – interpreted in this Opinion of the Constitutional Court, would necessarily be unconstitutional. In such a case only two options would be available, but both are bad: either to amend the Constitution to comply with the international obligation or to commit a breach of international law. The first option seems to me (“only”) legally unacceptable, because it means that in the preliminary (a priori) constitutional judicial review of a treaty, which aims exactly at preventing the possibility of the occurrence of such a quandary, the Constitutional Court failed. I cannot accept that the Constitutional Court, being aware of the real possibility that such a quandary might occur, would, rather than decide in the opinion that the contested provisions of the Agreement are inconsistent with the Constitution, suggest that the National Assembly consider whether it would be sensible to amend the Constitution so that the unconstitutionality of national legislation could not even occur. Hence, if this option actually exists, then it is completely logical that the Agreement, which would be the direct cause of the realisation of this option, cannot be consistent to amend the Constitution would not be intended to achieve that the state borders with the Republic of Croatia would also in nature be consistent with the Constitution and the BCC (that they are not inconsistent with these constitutional acts is provided for by the substantive provisions of the Agreement in conjunction with the duty of the Arbitral Tribunal to determine Slovenia's junction to the High Sea), but would rather be required only in the imaginary case of potential unwarranted conduct of the Arbitral Tribunal such that it determined the state border by some other constitutionally inconsistent criteria, criteria that are (hence also) inconsistent with the substantive provisions of the Agreement or due to the failure to complete the duty determined in Article 3(1)(b) of the Agreement to determine the junction of Slovenia with the High Sea. An interference by the institution empowered to amend the Constitution, indicated in Paragraphs 62 and 63 of the reasoning, would entail nothing other than the deconstitutionalisation of the borders. Its constitutional message would namely be that the definition of the borders determined in Section II of the BCC no longer applies, that the borders may also be determined in some other manner, without regard to the principles of international law uti possidetis iuris and uti possidetis de facto. All this is only due to the merely theoretical possibility that this international judicial body will not carry out the duty entrusted to it under the Agreement, or otherwise that its award would be arbitrary. I reject such a possibility – and together with it also reject the warnings to the institution empowered to amend the constitution in Paragraphs 62 and 63 of the reasoning.

7. To conclude, I would like to add my own, very personal view of the importance of Section II of the BCC (as interpreted by the Constitutional Court in this Opinion) and its relation to the conclusion of treaties concerning the border. Since the Republic of Slovenia proclaimed by this constitutional document "urbi et orbi" that it met the criteria recognised by international law for the existence of a state, and as the BCC is a permanent and inexhaustible constitutional source of the statehood of the Republic of Slovenia, it therefore cannot be understood otherwise than as, inter alia, a lasting commitment of the state to international law. I therefore see in the conclusion of the Agreement the last and final act of the independence of our state, an act that will bring a lasting solution to the border issue in a manner consistent with the Constitution and thus bring peace to our neighbourly relations. Therefore I will be bold and adopt the standpoint that any suspension of the solution of this extremely important issue (which over time can lead to irreversible adverse consequences for our state) would in its essence be contrary to the Constitution. It is contrary to the Constitution firstly because it would oppose the requirements of a definitive determination and stability of the state borders, requirements clearly conveyed by the purpose of Section II of the BCC (to determine and stabilise the border in a manner with the Constitution. I am afraid that on the basis of such hypothesis the Constitutional Court would not accomplish the aim of a preliminary review – to prevent legal provisions inconsistent with the Constitution from entering into the national legal order or to prevent a breach of international law. Another (even worse) option is to act contrary to an obligation of international law.

consistent with international law), secondly because it is not in accordance with the principles of international law that the state committed itself to respecting – already in the process of gaining independence – the principles that are built into the very formation (the gaining of independence) of the Republic Slovenia and which can be inferred precisely from Section II of the BCC (the inviolability of the state territory and the territorial integrity of states, the peaceful settlement of disputes, the prohibition of the threat of force or use of force directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, the principles of the peaceful co-existence of states and good neighbourly relations – borders that are irrevocably fixed and stable are a prerequisite for these principles, and vice versa: undefined, unclear and disputed borders are a permanent source of conflicts, disputes, provocations, incidents, and all sorts of tension and a serious obstacle to peaceful and good neighbourly relations between the two states), and finally also because the Republic of Croatia has since independence extended its actual authority to a substantial part of the territory which in terms of the international legal principle of uti possidetis belongs to the Republic of Slovenia<sup>7</sup> (without the need for any special argumentation, it is clear that the Agreement is the first step towards remedying this unconstitutional state of affairs due to the Croatian occupation of Slovene territory).

<sup>7</sup> According to the relevant White Paper of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Slovenia, since 25 June 1991 the Republic of Croatia has arbitrarily appropriated a total of 1318 hectares of Slovene territory (Dragonja: 113 hectares, Snežnik: 70 hectares, Sekulić: 335 hectares, Mura: 800 hectares), and entered this territory into their regulations and maps, and the Republic of Slovenia has protested against these acts in diplomatic notes and by blocking individual chapters of Croatia's accession negotiations. The President of the Republic of Croatia has therefore issued a statement of non-prejudice and in the Agreement these documents and maps should not be taken into account. Merely according to the data of the Mission of the Republic of Croatia to the European Union, its territory increased by 520 hectares from the year 2002 to the year 2009.

Order No. U-I-214/00, dated 14 September 2000

ORDER

At a session held on 14 September 2000 in proceedings to examine the petition of Ante Belobrajdič, Koper, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. The petition to initiate proceedings to review the constitutionality of Points I and II of the Constitutional Act Amending Article 80 of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia (Official Gazette RS, No. 66/2000) is rejected.
2. The petition to initiate proceedings to review the constitutionality of the Ordinance on the Promulgation of the Constitutional Act Amending Article 80 of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia (Official Gazette RS, No. 66/2000) is rejected.
3. The petition to initiate proceedings to review the constitutionality of the Decree Calling Regular Elections to the National Assembly (Official Gazette RS, No. 67/2000) is dismissed.

A

1. The petitioner challenges the Constitutional Act Amending Article 80 of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia (hereinafter referred to as the CA80), claiming that Points I and II thereof are contrary to the provisions of the fourth paragraph of Article 80 and the first paragraph of Article 90 of the Constitution. The petitioner argues that as the fourth paragraph of Article 80 of the Constitution, which requires that the National Assembly adopt a law regulating the electoral system by a two-thirds majority vote of all deputies, remained in force, the two provisions now contradict each other. He argues in particular that the National Assembly should respect the will expressed in the referendum on the electoral system and it should also respect the first paragraph of Article 90 of the Constitution, which provides that the deputies are bound by the results of a referendum. By adopting the CA80 the National Assembly allegedly circumvented this constitutional provision, believing that it was not bound by the referendum decision. This is allegedly also contrary to the definition enshrined in the Constitution that Slovenia is a democratic state and a state governed by the rule of law.

2. The petitioner also challenges the Ordinance on the Promulgation of the Constitutional Act amending Article 80 of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia (hereinafter referred to as the ORCA80) and the Decree Calling Regular Elections to the National Assembly (hereinafter referred to as the Elections Decree), but he does not describe their alleged unconstitutionality or illegality and does not state the reasons for which they are unconstitutional or illegal.
3. The petitioner substantiates his legal interest with the fact that, as a citizen, he is also a voter and that it is in his interest for the two-round system for which he voted in the referendum to be enacted.

B

4. One of the procedural requirements for initiating a procedure before the Constitutional Court is the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court. The jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court is regulated in Article 160 of the Constitution and Article 21 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA). Neither a power to review the mutual consistency of constitutional provisions nor the power to review the constitutionality of the provisions of a constitutional act are listed among the powers of the Constitutional Court in the mentioned provisions.
5. The Constitutional Court has already considered the question of the power to review the constitutionality of the provisions of a constitutional act in case No. U-I-332/94 (OdlUS V, 42). In that case, the petitioner challenged the constitutionality of certain provisions of the Constitutional Act Amending the Constitutional Act Implementing the Basic Constitutional Charter on the Independence and Sovereignty of the Republic of Slovenia (Official Gazette RS, No. 45/94). The Constitutional Court rejected that petition for lack of jurisdiction (Order No. U-I-332/94, dated 11 April 1996). In the reasoning of the Order of rejection, the Constitutional Court defined the criteria that would have to be fulfilled for the Court to be able to review the constitutionality of provisions that would be, and despite the fact that they would be, contained in a constitutional act (Paragraphs 3 and 4 of the reasoning of the Order).
6. In proceedings to examine the petition in case No. U-I-332/94, the Constitutional Court held that Article 174 of the Constitution merely provides that “a constitutional act shall be adopted in order to implement the Constitution and to ensure a transition to the application of the provisions of the Constitution.” At the same time it emphasised that such does not entail that this is the only kind of constitutional act and that the National Assembly could not adopt a constitutional act with a different intention and content, provided it was constitutional in nature. It follows from the above that, already in the procedure to examine the abovementioned petition, the Constitutional Court established the formal criterion as the criterion for determining its own jurisdiction with regard to the constitutional act in accordance with Article 174 of the Constitution, while in the remaining instances concerning the regulation of specific subject matter by a constitutional act the substantive criterion is applicable as well.

7. In the hitherto practice of the constitution framers (following the adoption of the Constitution currently in force), the constitutional act has been used to enact amendments to the Constitution in accordance with Article 169 of the Constitution. The constitution framers applied a constitutional act as the act amending the Constitution to amend Article 68 of the Constitution (the Constitutional Act Amending Article 68 of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia, Official Gazette RS, No. 42/97). The constitutional act is thus used as an act amending the Constitution, and its provisions are therefore constitutional provisions regardless of their content or nature. Furthermore it is also used as an act determining the implementation and transition to the application of constitutional provisions (including those that entail amendments to the Constitution adopted by the constitutional act). The provisions of such a constitutional act are provisions that contain constitutional subject matter if they regulate the implementation or transition to the new constitutional regulation. The constitutional act is, however, also used as an act that may be adopted by the constitution framers with a different intention and different content – in other words, not with the intention of amending the constitutional provisions or implementing the constitutional provisions and transitioning to their application. Only with regard to this kind of constitutional act a substantive criterion, i.e. the content and nature of the provisions of the constitutional act, is decisive for determining the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court.
8. The challenged constitutional act (the CA80) contains two points. The provision of Point I amends the wording of the Constitution, and thus entails an amendment to Article 80 of the Constitution. It is true that the constitution framers used the term “supplement” and not the constitutional term “amendment”; however, in the opinion of the Constitutional Court, the provision of Point I of the CA80 entails an amendment to Article 80 of the Constitution. This Article divides the regulation of the subject matter regarding elections between the Constitution and the laws. The Constitution specifies the electoral system in general terms but leaves the implementation of the system thus specified to the laws. The Constitution provides for a similar division with regard to a legislative referendum (Article 90) and uses the same formulation in both instances when referring to the statutory regulation (the fourth paragraph of Article 80 and the fifth paragraph of Article 90 of the Constitution). The decision as to where the constitutional regulation ends and where the statutory regulation begins is at the discretion of the constitution framers. As the challenged Point I amends subject matter that has already become integral to the subject matter of the Constitution, Point I itself has undoubtedly become a component of the Constitution. Thus, from the point of view of whether the Constitutional Court has jurisdiction or not, the challenged provision of Point I of the CA80 entails a constitutional provision already according to the formal criterion. As such, it cannot be subject to constitutional review; therefore, the Constitutional Court rejected the petition to review the CA80 insofar as it relates to Point I thereof, for lack of jurisdiction (Point 1 of the operative provisions). The Constitutional Court also reached the same decision in, for example, Order No. U-I-195/97, dated 29 January 1998 (OdlUS VII, 19).

9. The provisions of Point II of the CA80 first provide that the elections of deputies to the National Assembly in the year 2000 and [subsequent elections held] until an amendment to the law regulating elections to the National Assembly enters into force shall be held in accordance with the National Assembly Elections Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 44/92 etc. – hereinafter referred to as the NAEA), and subsequently specify the manner of application or the non-applicability of some of the provisions of the NAEA. Unlike Point I of the CA80, the provisions of Point II thereof do not entail an amendment to the wording of the Constitution. Taking into account Paragraphs 6 and 7 of the reasoning of this decision, it is therefore necessary to first establish what kind of constitutional act those provisions constitute in order to decide whether the Constitutional Court has jurisdiction to review them.
10. As the Constitutional Court has already indicated in Paragraph 8 of the reasoning of this Order, the Constitution divides the regulation of the subject matter regarding elections between the constitution framers and the legislature. The Constitution itself specifies the electoral system in general terms and leaves the implementation of the system thus specified to a law – the NAEA (the fourth paragraph of Article 80 of the Constitution). The latter can certainly be subject to constitutional review. In view of the division of the subject matter between the Constitution and the laws, the content of Point II of the CA80, except for the last paragraph, essentially constitutes statutory subject matter, as it does not regulate (amend or supplement) the subject matter that was initially part of the constitutional regulation of the electoral system. As such, it should be regulated by a special law as envisaged by the fourth paragraph of Article 80 of the Constitution. It is also evident from the content of the first paragraph of Point II of the CA80 that the intention of the constitution framers was to explicitly provide that the elections of the deputies to the National Assembly in the year 2000 be held in accordance with the NAEA and the amendments determined by the constitution framers in that provision. These amendments were intended to apply to the elections in 2000 and until an amendment to the law regulating elections to the National Assembly had entered into force. The provisions of Point II of the CA80 therefore regulate subject matter that is, and will continue to be, subject to statutory regulation. According to the substantive criterion, such provisions could therefore be subject to review in proceedings before the Constitutional Court, unless their purpose was to ensure the transition to the new constitutional regulation.
11. As the Constitutional Court has already established in Paragraph 8 of the reasoning of this Order, Point I of the CA80 entails an amendment to the constitutional regulation of the electoral system. It introduced elections according to the principle of proportional representation with a four-percent electoral threshold and enacted the requirement that the voters must have a decisive influence on the allocation of seats to the candidates. It thus entails an amended constitutional regulation which, with regard to the existing electoral legislation, required that its implementation be determined and the transition to the application of the amended regulation ensured. This is precisely what the constitution framers did with the provisions of the first paragraph of Point II of the CA80 in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 174 of the Constitution. The Constitutional Court deems that they concern provisions that regulate questions regarding the transition to the new constitutional regulation and they will also be included in the NAEA. They are therefore (already according to the formal criterion) constitutional norms by nature, the review of which does not fall within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court. Consequently, it also rejected the petition to review the constitutionality of the CA80 insofar as it relates to Point II thereof (Point 1 of the operative provisions).

12. An act amending the Constitution (Article 169 of the Constitution), adopted by the National Assembly by a two-thirds majority, is a constitutional act. As regards the entry into force of the constitutional amendments adopted by such act, Article 171 of the Constitution provides that these amendments enter into force upon their promulgation. The promulgation is in itself an act based directly on the Constitution or, in instances of implementing or any other kind of constitutional act, on the constitutional act itself. In order to perform the act of promulgation, the National Assembly is not required to adopt any special regulation. Therefore the challenged ORCA80 may not be deemed a regulation the constitutionality of which the Constitutional Court would be competent to review. It is an individual act through which promulgation is performed. As individual acts may not be subject to constitutional review in proceedings initiated upon a petition, the Constitutional Court rejected the petition to review the constitutionality of the ORCA80 (Point 2 of the operative provisions).
13. In accordance with the NAEA, regular elections are called by the President of the Republic (Article 14). In accordance with the Constitution, regular elections are called every four years and the Constitution determines exhaustively the instances and conditions for an extension of the deputies' terms of office (the first and second paragraphs of Article 81). The NAEA expressly determines the deadline for calling and holding elections. It also determines the content of the act calling the elections (Article 16). It is an act issued by the President of the Republic and entails the commencement of the electoral process. The petitioner does not expressly describe the unconstitutionality or illegality of the Elections Decree; however, it is evident from the petition that he proposes its abrogation in relation to the part of the petition concerning the abrogation of the CA80. As a consequence of the abrogation of the challenged constitutional act, the Constitutional Court should also have abrogated the calling of the elections. As the Constitutional Court rejected the petition to review the constitutionality of the CA80, in light of the provisions of the CA80, the petition to review the constitutionality of the Elections Decree is manifestly unfounded. Therefore it was dismissed as such by the Constitutional Court (Point 3 of the operative provisions).
14. As the Constitutional Court rejected the petition in part for lack of jurisdiction and in part as manifestly unfounded, it did not consider the issue of the petitioner's legal interest.

C

15. The Constitutional Court adopted this Order in accordance with Article 21 and the second paragraph of Article 26 of the CCA, and the first indent of Article 52 of the Rules of Procedure of the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Slovenia (Official Gazette RS, No. 89/98), composed of: Franc Testen, President, and Judges Dr Janez Čebulj, Dr Miroslava Geč-Korošec, Lojze Janko, Milojka Modrijan, Dr Mirjam Škrk, Dr Lojze Ude, and Dr Dragica Wedam-Lukić. The decision was reached unanimously.
