1. In this concurring opinion I wish to emphasise, above all, my perspective on the broadening of human rights into the sphere of corporations. Let me state at the outset that I have some reservations with regard to this matter. In regulated and substantively functioning constitutional democracies based on the rule of law, human rights are not primarily jeopardised so much by the state and its domineering apparatus as they are jeopardised by organised (international) crime, terrorism, and corporations with anonymous and (even transnationally) intertwined capital that is therefore difficult or impossible to trace. It is completely ordinary that a corporation has its management in one country, its production in another (where standards for the protection of human rights are lower), is supplied with raw materials and components from a third one, its shareholders are in still other countries, and its products are sold worldwide, while its registered office and profits are to be found in some tax haven. The inexhaustible power and capacity of the state to produce mass evil, which was demonstrated during the Second World War and by the expansion of communist dictatorships in its aftermath, are today demonstrated by other non-governmental institutions and entities. Already more than 230 years ago, John Adams reached the conclusion that when economic power becomes denser and concentrated in the hands of a small group of individuals, also the political power consequently flows towards them and away from the people, which eventually results in oligarchy and tyranny. Or, as phrased by Andrew Clapham, the emergence of new, fragmented centres of power like associations, interest groups, political parties, trade unions, corporations, multinational corporations, and quasi-official bodies entails that today an individual perceives power, repression, and alienation in a multitude of different new bodies and institutions. Such social “development” requires that the definition of the public sphere be accordingly adapted – so as to include these new entities, institutions, and bodies, together with their activities.<sup>1</sup>

2. Legal entities, as the greatest legal abstraction, are the first of the instruments that enable what Adams draws attention to – especially when capital is detached from its original holders, liberates itself, and starts to live a life of its life (which is what happens in the majority of corporations). The position of Susan Strange, who underlines the need to conceptualise the power that is beyond the political power and which necessarily includes the economic power and who concludes therefrom that markets are more important than states,<sup>2</sup> is demonstrated by the current situation of the debt crisis that is destroying national economies and together with them the public stability of countries. Subsequently, human rights, the protection of which – and especially also their content – depends on the economic power of the state, are also being destroyed.<sup>3</sup> Therefore, it would be difficult for me to contribute my vote to a decision that recognised human rights to legal entities without specifically underlining that the constitutional (and not human) rights of legal entities are protected for the sake of individuals, free human beings, and not for the sake of legal entities, which are nothing other than a virtual product of abstract legal thought.
3. Due to the increase in their influence on states, national economies, important social sub-systems (including the media that significantly influence the shaping of public opinion), and consequently on the lives of individuals and their capacity and suitability to be connected into different influential economic and political interest networks, corporations and specifically multi- and transnational corporations are becoming centres of power which attain or exceed the power of individual states.<sup>4</sup> The classic approach under which also these (capital) subjects have rights equal to those of individuals and that are in a horizontal (equal) relation with them, while against the state they are only powerless subjects which need protection from the state, a possible violator of human rights, is the least questionable due to all these generally known properties which render these subjects comparable with the state with regard to their power and factual influence. I dare to say that in order to assess the interferences of corporations (especially transnational ones), the vertical approach is more suitable than the (classic) horizontal approach. Therefore, I agree with the position that the inclusion of these subjects – at least corporations in majority state ownership) – into the notion of the public sphere should be considered.<sup>5</sup> I also think

2 See S. Strange, The Retreat of the State, The Diffusion of Power in the World Economy, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge 1996, p. 16 et seq.

3 In this regard, the situation in Cyprus and Portugal and the most recent decision of the Portuguese Constitutional Court are instructive, by which it was determined that four of the nine disputed austerity measures which refer to retired persons and public officials were unconstitutional, whereby the state finances will be deprived of EUR 1.5 billion, which entails that the state will not be eligible for its EUR 78 billion bailout from the IMF and the ESM. The Decision of the Court is accessible at: <http://www.tribunalconstitucional.pt/tc/acordaos/20130187.html>.

4 In extreme cases, transnational corporations even assume some attributes of a state. Cf. S. R. Ratner, Corporations and Human Rights – A Theory of Legal Responsibility, The Yale Law Journal, No. 111; 2001, pp. 500, 524 et seq.

5 This is the direction in which also the case law of the German Federal Constitutional Court is developing (cf. the Judgment in the case Fraport 1BvR 699/06, dated 22 February 2011).

that a new balance in the state–corporation relation should be sought, as well as a different methodological approach for resolving conflicts between them, especially when the aim of state interferences with their rights is the protection of individuals' human rights (for instance, those of workers, consumers, a certain category of the population, etc.) or, as in the case at issue, the effective supervision and prevention of conduct which limits the competition, the prevention of damage to the economy and consumers, the effective fulfilment of the state's obligations under EU law, and laying the foundations of economic development.<sup>6</sup>

4. It is true that the human right to free economic initiative is implemented through commercial legal entities. For the majority of corporations it is also true, however, that contact with the human substratum, which is the original holder of this human right, is extremely weak, often also undiscoverable, unrecognisable, and lost. As the right determined by the first paragraph of Article 74 of the Constitution is recognised to legal entities only because (and insomuch as) individuals exercise their human right to free economic initiative through it, it also seems logical to me that the constitutional charge of this right of commercial legal entities is weaker the more individuals – as the real, right, or, if you prefer, ultimate holders of this human right – are distant from the respective legal entity. Therefore, the more this legal abstraction – and, on the other hand, the economic, capital, social, and political reality – liberates itself and moves away from its human substratum (for instance by the state entering into deciding on the proprietorial structure) due to which it even enjoys some (those more constitutional) rights, the weaker the protection of its constitutional rights. They are namely nothing but mere measures for the implementation of the human right to free economic initiative, which is, as an emanation of human dignity and freedom, a goal in itself. The original and the real holder of the right to free economic initiative is the individual, the individual human being – not some imaginary legal form.
5. Such a starting point is correctly reflected by some parts of Paragraphs 18, 20, and 38 of the reasoning of the Decision – those which specifically underline what is essential in my opinion: the rights to spatial and communication privacy are nonetheless guaranteed by the Constitution, but less intensely than the privacy of natural persons is protected. I am of the opinion that they are even essentially less protected and also not unconditionally – they are not ends in themselves, but are only one of the instruments for the implementation of the human right to free economic initiative. I think it should be underlined in Paragraph 18 of the reasoning that some of the rights that the Constitution guarantees to natural persons as human rights are, nonetheless, to be recognised also to legal entities as constitutionally guaranteed rights – but not because legal entities and their respective constitutional rights are as such ends in themselves, but because through them natural persons' human rights are protected. What is equally important is also the position that Paragraph 20 of the reasoning finishes with: "As legal entities are artificial forms which are constitutionally protected in order for the sphere of individuals' freedom to be widened and protected, the level of their protection can from the outset be lower than for natural persons."

6 Only free competition enables full exercise of constitutionally protected free economic initiative, while free and fair competition is also the objective of Articles 101 and 102 of the TFEU, which means that it is a value which is directly guaranteed in the founding treaties of the European integration and must therefore also be regarded as one of the fundamental values of Slovene constitutional law.

6. Precisely for this reason it is difficult for me to concur with the conclusion with which the next paragraph of the reasoning ends, whereby the Constitutional Court says that in the narrowest circle of spatial privacy also a legal entity can expect the same constitutional protection of spatial privacy as a natural person. In my opinion, it cannot. A legal entity cannot expect such already because legal entities are purpose-made and therefore instrumental forms – companies are means for exercising the individual's right to free economic initiative. The means (economic legal entities), however, do not equal the aim (the individual and his right to free economic initiative). As legal entities are purpose-made, the range and scope of their rights (in the case at issue, regarding spatial and communication privacy), which only serve their (constitutionally protected) purpose, is also determined by this purpose – however not because of the legal entity, an imaginary legal abstraction, but because of its human substratum. Only that is the true bearer of the human right that it implements in a corporate manner through the legal entity. The protection of spatial and communication privacy thus only has constitutional legitimacy in that it protects the aim – the individual, his liberty, his dignity, and, with regard to companies, his right to free economic initiative (which is implemented in a corporate manner through this purpose-made form). Even if we say that legal entities enjoy constitutional protection of privacy, their right to privacy is instrumental – it is intended for the exercise of the purpose of the legal entity and its human substratum and is limited thereby.<sup>7</sup> Therefore, also the scope of protection of a religious community's private sphere is something completely different than the protection of some hypermarket corporation in predominantly state ownership.
7. If that is my opinion, perhaps someone could wonder why I voted in favour of the Decision in the first place. If Articles 36 and 37 only protect the spatial and communication aspect of individuals' privacy, while legal entities only enjoy constitutional protection as purpose-made forms through which some human rights and freedoms are exercised (free economic initiative, freedom of religion, the right of association, etc.), then the only human right that can be constitutionally protected is that one whose instrument is an individual legal entity. When legal entities are at issue, this right is that which is determined by Article 74 of the Constitution, and not also the constitutional guarantees determined by Articles 36 and 37 of the Constitution that protect an individual's personal matters which he or she wishes to remain hidden and which by the nature of the matter or with regard to moral conceptions, or which with regard to societal customs are regarded as hidden – whereby the subject of protection are not premises, technical measures, and communication as such, and also not an individual's personal matters, but the individual and his privacy.

7 Such proceeds from Paragraph 20 of the reasoning of the Decision, where the Constitutional Court says: "It is not possible to imagine how a legal entity could plan its activities and attain its objectives in an undisturbed manner if it did not have the possibility to protect the fact of and data on its activities from (arbitrary) interferences by the state or from interferences by other individuals, or if it was not guaranteed a certain space safe from unwanted intrusions, and the possibility of safe and private communications, including at a distance." In my opinion, the privacy of the legal entity is only protected through the purpose of the legal entity, i.e. it existing as a means for ensuring free economic initiative. Thereby, also the content and the scope of the individual legal entity's protected privacy are determined.

8. However, it is precisely for this reason that I support the Decision. The disputed measures namely do not allow only interferences with the legal entity (to which, because it only represents a means, I do not feel unconditional legal empathy), but they also enable intrusions into individuals' privacy – the privacy of those individuals who work for the legal entity that is subject to a search. The legal entity namely functions through individuals who are obliged to spend an important part of their lives on its premises. Its communication is also not carried out by some imaginary legal abstraction, but by individuals who act on its behalf (partners, management, employees, etc.). And even though what is at issue are business premises and business communication where, due to the openness of these premises and the outward-oriented communication, the expected privacy is essentially lower than in a domestic environment (where the individual has exclusive authority over the space of the dwelling and over all materials in it), it is not possible to entirely and in advance exclude certain aspects of an individual's privacy both with regard to the premises where he or she performs his or her work (profession) and with regard to his or her business or professional communication. The business premises of legal entities are, to a certain extent, also the private space of their employees (even though to a much lesser extent than dwellings, which are hidden from public view and where everyone can justly expect to be left undisturbed), and business communication can also mix with private communication.<sup>8</sup> If employees spend more than eight hours on the premises of the legal entity daily, for instance in their offices, it is understandable that they cannot leave all objects pertaining to privacy at home – they bring some of them “to work” and can leave them there (in a drawer, on a shelf, on a computer, etc.). The mixing, overlapping, and blending of what is professional and what is private happens especially in unincorporated companies. In order to prevent the occurrence of abuses and arbitrariness where, in the framework of the search of a company, the search of an individual's private possessions would in fact be conducted, I believe it right for there to exist prior judicial control of such actions. Such control is an effective safeguard against arbitrary interfer-

Germany*, dated 16 December 1992, from which there likewise proceeds an important emphasis that the right to private life includes, to a certain extent, the right to establish and to develop relations with other people, from which it is not possible to exclude professional or business activities, especially because it is not always possible to clearly delimit an individual's activities with regard to which sphere they pertain to.

ences by the state and at the same time it cannot entail a considerable impediment to the effectiveness of the Agency's work. Here also, with the legal construct of the constitutional rights of the imaginary legal form, we in fact protect specific individuals and their tangible and "living" rights to privacy – without thereby seriously hindering the effectiveness of preventing trusts and abuses of a dominant position. For such reason, I voted for the Decision in spite of my disagreement with the conceptual approach on which the Decision is based.

DECISION

At a session held on 13 February 2014 in proceedings to decide upon the constitutional complaint of Igor Benedik, Kranj, represented by Mag. Mitja Jelenič Novak, attorney in Ljubljana, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

The constitutional complaint against Judgment of the Supreme Court No. I Ips 216/2010, dated 20 January 2011, in conjunction with Judgment of the Higher Court in Ljubljana No. II Kp 425/2009, dated 4 November 2009, and Judgment of the District Court in Ljubljana No. K 79/2008, dated 5 December 2008, is dismissed.

*ReasoningA

1. The complainant was found guilty of the criminal offense of the possession and distribution of pornographic material determined by the third paragraph of Article 187 of the Penal Code (Official Gazette RS, No. 95/04 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the PC) in conjunction with the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Penal Code (Official Gazette RS, No. 55/08, 66/08 – corr., 39/09, and 91/11) by the judgment of the District Court in Kranj. He was handed a suspended sentence; however, the Higher Court in Ljubljana amended the judgment with regard to the criminal sanction and pronounced a six-month prison sentence on the complainant. The Supreme Court dismissed his request for the protection of legality.
2. The complainant alleges a violation of the rights determined by Articles 37 and 38 of the Constitution, since the judgment was allegedly based on evidence obtained in violation of the right to communication privacy. He states that the Swiss law enforcement authorities conducted a systematic review of the content of communications by Razorback network users without there being a reasonable suspicion regarding any of the users or at least reasonable grounds for suspicion that they own or exchange child pornography, and that therefore an appropriate court order to obtain such data should have been issued. The complainant also alleges that the Police obtained the data on who the user of a certain dynamic IP address was<sup>1</sup> first by means of a request of the Police under the third paragraph of Article 149.b of the Criminal Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 96/04 – official consolidated text, and 101/05 – hereinafter referred to as the CrPA), and subsequently obtained the same data also on the basis of the order of the investigating judge issued under the first paragraph of Article 149.b of the CrPA.<sup>2</sup> In the view of the complainant, a prior court order should have been issued also for these data, since such entail both personal data as well as traffic data in electronic communications networks, and in addition, an individual has a legitimate expectation of privacy with regard to a dynamic IP address.<sup>3</sup> The complainant alleges that the Police should have obtained a court order also for a review of the files on the computer that was seized during the house search. As the Police did not have a court order for any of the three investigative actions, the complainant states that the evidence was obtained in violation of Articles 37 and 38 of the Constitution, therefore, the judgment should not be based on this evidence and such should be removed from the file.

3. By Order of the Panel No. Up-540/11, dated 25 October 2010, the Constitutional Court accepted the constitutional complaint for consideration. Pursuant to the first paragraph of Article 56 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 64/07 – official consolidated text, and 109/12 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), the Supreme Court was notified of the acceptance of the constitutional complaint.
4. On the basis of Article 5 of the CCA, the Constitutional Court requested that the office of the Information Commissioner [hereinafter referred to as the Information Commissioner], who publicly expressed its position regarding the issue of the transmission of data on subscribers of electronic communication services at the request of the Police, issue a more detailed explanation of its opinion.<sup>4</sup> In its comprehensive reply it explained that in its view the key issue is whether access to data on the identity of the communicating individual falls within the scope of communication privacy and is therefore regulated by the strict conditions determined by the second paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution. It argues that law enforcement authorities do not care who the subscriber or user of a particular means of communication is, but

1 An IP address is a number that precisely determines a device connected to the internet (the abbreviation IP stands for Internet Protocol).

2 At the time of obtaining the data regarding the IP address and its user (20 February 2006 and 7 June 2006) the cited Criminal Procedure Act was in force, but the wording of Article 149.b thereof remained unchanged until the Act Amending the Criminal Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 91/11) came into force.

3 IP addresses are assigned as either a static or a dynamic address. The allocation of a static IP address entails continuous use of a single IP address, while the allocation of a dynamic address entails the random allocation of a new/different IP address upon every connection to the internet.

4 E.g. in their Opinion on the Transmission of Data Regarding Dynamic IP Addresses to the Police, No. 0712-259/2009/2, dated 11 June 2009, and similarly also in the appeal to the deputy groups, dated 4 October 2012, available at: <https://www.ip-rs.si/novice/detajl/apel-informacijskega-pooblastenca-k-previdnosti-glede-poo-blastil-za-posege-v-komunikacijsko-zasebn/?cHash=d89468d16600c1ae9be3cd80e9b23275>, and in Opinion No. 0712-1/2012/2854, dated 4 June 2013.

are interested in who actually communicated with such. The reason for obtaining the identity of an individual is precisely that he communicated by means of more or less publicly accessible websites. Therefore, the Information Commissioner deems that it is necessary to change the rhetoric on the admissibility of obtaining data regarding individuals with a given IP address, be it static or dynamic, towards a discussion of what information is actually sought. In its opinion, it is impossible to separate traffic data from subscriber data as traffic data alone does not make any sense if one does not ascertain who the person behind these data is, and the Information Commissioner deems such to be an extremely important element of communication privacy. It also opines that communication privacy entails not only the content of the communication, but also the facts and circumstances related to the communication, which also include information on who communicated when and with whom. It also highlighted that the provisions of the Electronic Communications Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 13/07 – official consolidated text, 110/09, and 33/11) in force at the time in question, which are in its opinion in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution, require a court order regarding all data related to electronic communications, irrespective whether such relates to traffic or identification data (e.g. who is using a certain IP address or telephone number). In its view, the third paragraph of Article 149.b of the CrPA, which requires only a written request of the Police to obtain data on who was communicating, is constitutionally problematic. Its criticism expressed publicly regarding the draft proposal of the seventh paragraph of Article 166 of the new Electronic Communications Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 109/12 and 110/13 – hereinafter referred to as ECA-1), which initially required only a written request of a state body for access to data on a subscriber of electronic communication services, must also be understood in this light.<sup>5</sup> The Information Commissioner also highlights the issue that it has not yet dealt with in its opinions, namely whether an individual who publicly discloses the content of his or her communication (e.g. an individual who expresses his or her opinion publicly to a more or less wide circle of readers on the web) continues to enjoy the protection determined by Article 37 of the Constitution regarding traffic data.

5. The opinion of the Information Commissioner was sent to the complainant, who did not respond.
6. In the framework of deciding on the constitutional complaint, the Constitutional Court inspected court file No. K 79/2008 of the District Court in Kranj.

B – I

7. In the constitutional complaint the complainant states that the judgment is based on evidence obtained in violation of Articles 37 and 38 of the Constitution, but the substance of his submissions claiming that the Police should have obtained a court order for all three investigative actions only refers to the violation of Article 37 of the Constitution. Based on the above, the Constitutional Court reviewed the judgment in the light of Article 37 of the Constitution.

B – II

Review of the objections regarding access to the complainant's IP address by the Swiss Police

8. The complainant opposes the standpoint of the Supreme Court that the dissemination of child pornography via the internet by using the eMule application (and in this way providing content to all interested parties) cannot be defined as circumstances and facts related to the private communication of a particular computer user. In the assessment of the Supreme Court, such a manner of communication, given the general accessibility of websites and the fact that the Police could check the data without special interventions in internet traffic and only on the basis of monitoring those clients that shared the controversial content, enables a practically unidentifiable number of random contacts, therefore one cannot speak of private communication protected by Article 37 of the Constitution. The complainant alleges that the information on the dynamic IP address is a sui generis identification datum that exists in the space between personal and traffic data and its holder legitimately expects privacy thereof, therefore it cannot be obtained without a court order. With respect to these claims, the Constitutional Court reviewed whether the stated standpoint of the Supreme Court is in accordance with Article 37 of the Constitution.
9. The component of privacy that concerns the freedom of communication is protected twice by the Constitution: in Article 35, which sets out the general rule that everyone has the right to privacy and that privacy is inviolable, and in particular in the first paragraph of Article 37, which provides for the privacy of correspondence and other means of communication.<sup>6</sup> Under the latter paragraph the Constitution guarantees free and uncontrolled communication and therewith the confidentiality of relationships an individual enters into when communicating. The conditions for restrictions of the right to the privacy of correspondence and other means of communication are determined by the second paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution, namely a restriction of the freedom of communication is admissible if:
  - (1) it is prescribed by law,
  - (2) it is allowed on the basis of a court order,
  - (3) the duration of the interference is explicitly limited, and
  - (4) if such is necessary for the institution or course of criminal proceedings or for reasons of national security.
10. In the framework of the right to respect for private and family life, the right to communication privacy is also determined by the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94

<sup>6</sup> Cf. Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-25/95, dated 27 November 1997 (Official Gazette RS, No. 5/98, and OdlUS VI, 158).

– hereinafter referred to as the ECHR) in Article 8<sup>7</sup> and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (Official Gazette SFRY, No. 7/71, and Official Gazette RS, No. 35/92, MP, No. 9/92 – hereinafter referred to as the ICCPR) in Article 17.<sup>8</sup> It follows from the settled case law of the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR) that protection under Article 8 of the ECHR is afforded not only to the content of the message but also the circumstances and facts related to the communication.<sup>9</sup> The ECtHR dealt with the right to respect for one's private life in relation to online communication in the judgment in the case K.U. v. Finland from the perspective of the victim.<sup>10</sup> It decided that Finland did not adequately protect the right to respect for the applicant's private life as the confidentiality requirement had been given precedence over his physical and moral integrity, and consequently had violated the applicant's right determined by Article 8 of the ECHR.<sup>11</sup>

11. The second paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution provides a higher level of protection than Article 8 of the ECHR as it requires a court order for any interference with the right to communication privacy.<sup>12</sup> The constitutional review of the case must therefore be performed on the basis of the Constitution. The right to communication privacy determined by the first paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution primarily protects the content of the communicated message. Therefore, it ensures protection of the individual's interest that no one will gain knowledge of the content of the message transmitted through any means that enable the exchange and dissemination of such data without his or her consent, as well as the interest of individuals to decide freely to

7 Article 8 of the ECHR determines that: "(1) Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.(2) There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others."

8 Article 17 of the ICCPR determines that: "(1) No one shall be subjected to arbitrary or unlawful interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to unlawful attacks on his honour and reputation. (2) Everyone has the right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks."

9 Cf. judgment in the case Malone v. The United Kingdom, dated 2 August 1984, para. 84; the same in the judgment in the case P.G. and J.H. v. The United Kingdom, dated 25 September 2001, para. 42.

10 In the cited judgment, dated 2 December 2008, the ECtHR reviewed a case where an unknown perpetrator posted an ad on an Internet dating site posing as the 12-year old applicant, announcing that he was looking for an intimate relationship with a boy of his age or older to show him the way. The Police requested the identity of the holder of the IP address directly from the service provider, but unsuccessfully. Subsequently, a court also refused to issue a court order since there was no explicit legal provision authorising the disclosure of the holder due to such criminal offenses. The actual perpetrator was thus never found.

11 In the cited judgment the ECtHR emphasised that the freedom of expression and confidentiality of communications are important considerations that must be respected also on the internet, but such protection cannot be absolute. In instances such as in the case at issue, the physical and moral integrity of a minor is at stake, which requires that the state acts especially diligently and sets up a system that efficiently deters the commission of criminal offences. In the view of the ECtHR, on such occasions the freedom of expression and confidentiality of communications must yield to the prevention of crime and the protection of the rights of others.

12 Cf. in detail, Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-40/12, dated 11 April 2013 (Official Gazette RS, No. 39/13).

whom, to what extent, how, and under what conditions they will transmit a particular message.<sup>13</sup> In addition to the message content, the circumstances and facts related to the communication are also protected. In accordance with this view, in Decision No. Up-106/05, dated 2 October 2008 (Official Gazette RS, No. 100/08, and OdlUS XVII, 84) the Constitutional Court extended the protection provided by Article 37 of the Constitution also to such data regarding telephone calls that by their nature constitute an integral part of communication so that such data cannot be obtained without a court order.<sup>14</sup> The mentioned Decision refers otherwise to telephone communication, but the same conclusion can be applied mutatis mutandis to other types of communication at a distance. The crucial constitutional review test for the review of the Constitutional Court whether a particular communication is protected under Article 37 of the Constitution is the test of the legitimate expectation of privacy.<sup>15</sup>

12. Communication via the internet takes place, in principle, in an anonymous form, which is essential for the free development of personality, freedom of speech, and the expression of ideas, and, consequently, for the development of a free and democratic society. The privacy of communication protected by the strict conditions determined by the second paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution is therefore a very important human right that is becoming increasingly important due to technological advances and the related growing possibilities of monitoring such. It entails individuals' legitimate expectation that the state will leave them alone also in their communication through modern communication channels and that they do not necessary have to defend themselves for what they do, say, write or think. If there is a suspicion of a criminal offense the Police must have the ability to identify the individuals who have participated in a certain communication related to an alleged criminal offense, because the perpetrators are harder to trace due to this principle of anonymity on the internet. The conditions under which the Police can carry out investigative actions and whether they need a court order, however, depend on whether such entail an interference with the right to communication privacy.
13. As was pointed out above, in addition to the content of communications, Article 37 of the Constitution also protect traffic data. Traffic data signifies any data processed for the transmission of communications in an electronic communications network or for the billing thereof.<sup>16</sup> Such entails that the IP address is a traffic datum. The 14 These are so-called traffic data, e.g. regarding the last calls made and unanswered calls evident from the phone memory.

15 Cf. Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-25/95.

16 Such are, for example, data relating to the routing, duration, time or volume of messages, the protocol used, the location of the terminal equipment of the sender or the recipient, the beginning, end, and duration of a connection, and similar. Cf. Point 25 of Article 3 of the Electronic Communications Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 43/04), which was in force at the time the data was accessed, but the current ECA-1 defines traffic data, mutatis mutandis, in the same manner (Point 45 of Article 3).

Constitutional Court must therefore answer the question whether the complainant legitimately expected privacy regarding this datum.

14. Two factors must be weighed in relation to this review: the expectation of privacy regarding the IP address and the legitimacy of this expectation, where the latter must be of such nature that the society is willing to accept it as legitimate.<sup>17</sup> The complainant in the case at issue communicated with other users of the Razorback network by using the eMule application to exchange various files, including those that contained child pornography.<sup>18</sup> With regard to the general anonymity of internet users and also the content of the files, the Constitutional Court has no doubt that the complainant expected that his communications would remain private, and he also certainly expected that his identity would not be disclosed. The question therefore is whether such expectation of privacy was legitimate. The complainant has not established that the IP address through which he accessed the internet was hidden in any way, and thus invisible to other users, or that access to the Razorback network (and thus to the content of the files) was in any way restricted, for example by passwords or other means. Namely, that by such conduct he as a user had clearly expressed his intention that he wanted to keep his communications and identity private or that he legitimately expected privacy therewith. In other words, the subject of protection afforded by Article 37 of the Constitution is communication regarding which the individual legitimately expects privacy and makes that clear to the outside world. In contrast, in the complainant's case anyone interested in exchanging such could have accessed the contested files, and the complainant has not demonstrated that his IP address was in any way concealed or inaccessible by other users of this network. This leads to the conclusion that this entailed an open line of communication with a previously undetermined circle of strangers using the internet worldwide who have shown interest in sharing certain files, while at the same time access to the IP addresses of other users was not limited to users of this network. Therefore, in the view of the Constitutional Court, the complainant's expectation of privacy was not legitimate; that which a person knowingly exposes to the public, even if from a home computer and the shelter of his or her own home, cannot be a subject of the protection afforded by Article 37 of the Constitution. In view of the foregoing, the contested standpoint of the Supreme Court does not raise concerns regarding constitutional law. Obtaining the data regarding the complainant's dynamic IP address does not interfere with his right to communication privacy determined by the first paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution taking into account all the circumstances of the case, therefore a court order was not necessary to access it.<sup>19</sup> By his conduct 18 In criminal law theory, the term "child pornography" is gradually being abandoned and the term "child sexual abuse images or materials" is increasingly being used. However, given that the ordinary courts in these proceedings used the term "child pornography" and that the same term is used in the Penal Code, the Constitutional Court also used it in this Decision for reasons of clarity.

19 Cf. also Decision of the Austrian Constitutional Court No. B 1031/11, dated 29 June 2012, in which the Court dealt with a case in which the complainant chatted in an online chat (chatroom) and one of other participants the complainant himself waived his right to privacy and therefore could not have a legitimate expectation of privacy therewith.

15. As a result of the decision that the conduct of the Police did not constitute an interference with the applicant's communication privacy determined by the first paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court also points out that it did not need to answer the question of whether it is always necessary to assess the admissibility of interferences in communication privacy strictly according to the provisions of the Constitution and not taking into the account that the interferences were the result of the conduct of the competent authorities of other states that might be bound by different conditions as regards the protection of individual human rights.

Review of the objections regarding access to data on the user of a certain IP address

16. The complainant also challenges the standpoint of the Supreme Court that by its request to the service provider under the third paragraph of Article 149.b of the CrPA the Police did not acquire traffic data, but only data regarding a particular user of a determined means of communication. In the view of the Supreme Court, it is irrelevant from this respect whether the IP address was static or dynamic, as the obtained data did not reveal anything more than what was requested, i.e. only the data regarding the user of the computer through which an individual accessed the internet. The complainant argues that the data regarding the user of a dynamic IP address is at the same time personal and traffic data, which entails that the Police can obtain it only on the basis of a court order. As the Police obtained the data regarding the user on the basis of a request, the complainant opines that the evidence was obtained in violation of Article 37 of the Constitution.
17. In the case at issue, on 7 June 2006, on the basis of the third paragraph of Article 149.b of the CrPA,<sup>20</sup> the Police sent a request to the service provider for data regarding the user to whom IP address 195.210.223.200 was assigned on 20 February 2006 had a suspicion of a criminal offense. The other participant filed a criminal complaint with the Police and gave them the web address of the chatroom and the alias (nickname) of the complainant. The Police first obtained the data on the IP address used for the communication and subsequently the data on the user (name, surname, and address) of this IP address without a court order. The Court decided, on the basis of similar constitutional requirements as those resulting from the second paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution, that if security authorities legally obtain the content of a message from communication available to the public or communication that is closed to the public but the content is transmitted to them by one of the participants in this communication, such communication is not a subject of protection afforded by the secrecy of communications.

- 20 The third paragraph of Article 149.b of the CrPA determined the following: "If there are grounds for suspicion that a criminal offense for which the perpetrator is prosecuted ex officio was committed or is about to be committed and it is necessary for the discovery of the offense or the perpetrator to obtain data regarding the owner or subscriber of a particular means of communication in the electronic communications traffic that are not published in directories of subscribers and regarding the period within which such means was or is in use, the Police may request in writing from the electronic communications networks service provider such data even without the consent of the individual to whom such data refer."

at 13:28. In the response, they received data regarding the user's name, surname, and address, while the time of the communication set to the nearest second was already known.<sup>21</sup> Then on 14 December 2006 the Police also obtained an order issued by the investigating judge on the basis of the first paragraph 149.b of the CrPA<sup>22</sup> and the service provider also provided the traffic data on the basis of this order.<sup>23</sup> The main issue for the Constitutional Court at this point is therefore whether obtaining the data regarding the identity of the user of a determined IP address falls within the framework of communication privacy.

18. In accordance with the position of the Constitutional Court in Decision No. Up-106/05, Article 37 of the Constitution also protects traffic data, i.e. data regarding, for example, who, when, with whom, and how often someone communicated. The identity of the communicating individual is one of the important aspects of communication privacy, therefore it is necessary to obtain a court order for its disclosure in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution. Despite this standpoint, the Constitutional Court decided that the complainant's allegation of a violation of Article 37 of the Constitution is unfounded in the case at issue. By his conduct, the complainant has himself waived protection of his privacy by publicly revealing both his own IP address as well as the content of his communications, and therefore can no longer rely on it as regards the disclosure of his identity. Since by such he also waived the legitimate expectation of privacy, the data regarding the identity of the IP address user no longer enjoyed protection in terms of communication privacy, but only in terms of information privacy determined by Article 38 of the Constitution. Therefore, by obtaining the data on the name, surname, and address of the user of the dynamic IP address through which the complainant communicated the Police did not interfere with his communication privacy and therefore did not require a court order to disclose his identity.<sup>24</sup> In view of the foregoing, the contested position of the Supreme Court is not inconsistent with Article 37 of the Constitution, and the complainant's complaints in this part are unfounded.

21 The subscriber or the party to the contract with the service provider was the father of the complainant.

22 The first paragraph of Article 149.b of the CrPA determined the following: "If there are grounds for suspicion that a criminal offense for which the perpetrator is prosecuted ex officio was committed, is being committed, is about to be committed or organised and it is necessary for the discovery of the offense or the perpetrator to obtain data regarding traffic in an electronic communications network, the investigating judge may, on the basis of a reasoned proposal of the state attorney, order that the electronic communications networks service provider provide data regarding the participants, the circumstances, and facts of electronic communications traffic, such as the following: the number or other form of identification of the users of the electronic communications service, the type, date, time, and duration of the call or other electronic communications service, the amount of data transferred, and the place from which electronic communication was carried out."

23 The complainant's allegation that the Police obtained the same data first on the basis of their own request and subsequently also on the basis of the order of the investigating judge is therefore clearly not substantiated.

24 The issue whether traffic data, i.e. the circumstances and facts related to communication, encompasses the name, surname, and address of the person communicating via a certain, already known IP address was dealt with also by the Austrian Constitutional Court. In the above-cited Decision No. B 1031/11, dated 29 June 2012, it held, inter alia, that the Police may obtain data on who the user of a specified IP address is without a court order.

Review of the objections regarding the review of the computer files found on the complainant's computer

19. The complainant's final objection refers to the issue of whether the Police should have a specific court order for the review of the computer files on the complainant's computer. In this regard, the complainant objects to the standpoint of the Supreme Court that an additional court order is not required for such review, because the Police seized the computers on the basis of a search order and the computers were first sealed and subsequently also inspected and the files were copied in the presence of the complainant.
20. In accordance with Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-106/05, a review of data stored on an electronic device entails an interference with an individual's communication privacy determined by Article 37 of the Constitution.<sup>25</sup> This entails that such data storage media cannot be reviewed without a court order.<sup>26</sup>
21. In the case at issue, following a motion of the Police, dated 10 January 2007, the investigating judge issued a search order for a house search of the complainant's apartment on 12 January 2007 and the search was carried out on 25 February 2007.<sup>27</sup> It clearly follows from the motion of the Police for the search order that the Police wanted to review in particular the hard disks of computers and any other data storage media. When deciding whether to issue the order, the investigating judge was therefore aware of the fact that during the house search the Police would seize computer equipment and that they would also review such equipment. The foregoing is also clear from the search order, from which it follows that it was issued precisely with the intent to review the data stored on the computer and other data storage media (CDs and DVDs). Such entails that the interference with communication privacy was allowed by a judge by a court order, and despite the absence of detailed statutory regulation, in accordance with the constitutional guarantees the Police also allowed the complainant to be present in both instances when his computer was reviewed. In view of the foregoing, the contested standpoint of the Supreme Court is in accordance with the requirements of the second paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution. The search order for the house search was issued with the intent to seize and review electronic data storage media, and the complainant was present in both instances of the review of the computers and electronic data. The Constitutional Court therefore decided that the review of the files on the complainant's computer did not violate his right to communication privacy.
22. Taking into account all the arguments, there is no violation of the right to the protection of the privacy of correspondence and other means of communication de-terminated by Article 37 of the Constitution, therefore the Constitutional Court dismissed the constitutional complaint.

<sup>26</sup> Given the rapid development of communication technologies, such are no longer just personal computers, but also a variety of electronic devices that can store data.

<sup>27</sup> Investigative actions were therefore carried out at a time when the CrPA did not have specific provisions on the inspection of electronic devices. Articles 219a and 223a were in fact introduced in the wording of the Act only by the Act Amending the Criminal Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 77/09), which came into force 17 October 2009.

DISSENTING SEPARATE OPINION OF JUDGE DR JADRANKA SOVDAT

1. The development of information technology and the internet has reached such a magnitude in the last two decades that it legitimately begs the question whether the legal regulation of specific issues associated therewith is able to follow this development. The world of information technology is often incomparable with the world as we know it in the physical form. On the one hand, we benefit from all the advantages that this technology has brought. On the other hand, inter alia, the question arises whether when communicating using computer technology by means of the internet we need to relinquish (at least partially) communication privacy. Are we, as a free people, willing to relinquish it and come to terms with this? If we are not willing to relinquish this, under what conditions are interferences in this right admissible in order to be able to speak of the effective protection of the right to communication privacy, which is an integral part of one of the core human rights, namely the right to privacy? All these questions could arise regarding this Decision. The answers offered therein therefore go far beyond the importance of deciding just this particular case.
2. The Decision is based on three standpoints regarding respect for the right to communication privacy determined by the first paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution.
  - 1) According to the first standpoint (Point 14 of the reasoning of the Decision), the complainant could not legitimately expect privacy in communication by using an online network that anyone could access; he exposed himself to the public, therefore this communication cannot be protected by the first paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution.
  - 2) According to the second standpoint (Point 18 of the reasoning of the Decision), by waiving the protection of the privacy of the communication content, the complainant also waived the expectation of privacy regarding the disclosure of his identity, and therefore could no longer expect communication privacy with regard to the data on who the person behind the few digits of the dynamic IP address is.

- 3) According to the third standpoint (Point 21 of the reasoning of the Decision), after obtaining a court order for a house search, from which it follows that such is to be conducted precisely with the intent to review the data stored on the computer and other data storage media, the Police do not need an additional court order to perform a review of the mentioned media, naturally necessarily in the presence of the individual who was using the computer and its peripherals.
3. The conclusion that the Swiss Police did not need a court order to obtain a dynamic IP address thus follows from the first standpoint in this case. The conclusion that the Slovene Police did not need a court order to obtain the data on the identity of the person to whom a certain IP address was assigned when communicating on the internet follows from the second standpoint. The logical conclusion that with one order a judge can allow entry to premises, the seizure of computer equipment, and a review of the content of online communication follows from the third standpoint. I agree with the third standpoint and the arguments related to it. I have some concerns regarding the first standpoint in relation to the circumstances of the case, even though I agree with its essential basis. I, however, cannot agree with the second standpoint, which I find crucial for the decision in this case; therefore I voted against the Decision.
4. In relation to the first standpoint. I agree, of course, with the established constitutional standpoint that the essential starting point for the protection of communication privacy is a legitimate expectation of privacy and that communication privacy protects an individual regarding both the content of the communication as well as the circumstances and facts related to communication (for the latter, the term traffic data is also used). The resulting continuation is therefore logical: if I communicate with an undetermined circle of people, such can be compared with the public; consequently, I cannot legitimately expect privacy regarding the communication. I concur. Namely, had I sent a draft of this separate opinion to journalists from my official e-mail address (which clearly also establishes my “real” name), it would be absolutely clear that I cannot expect privacy either regarding the content of the communication or in terms of its traffic data, including data on who I am as the person communicating and with whom I communicated. It therefore follows logically from this standpoint that in this case the Swiss Police did not need a court order to obtain the data regarding the content of the communication and the traffic data, and thus also regarding the dynamic IP address number. It is, however, true that not much is known about the manner by which the Swiss Police gained access to these data. Therefore, the question arises whether the Constitutional Court should already in this case deal more with the issue of the use of evidence obtained abroad in criminal proceedings before the courts of the Republic of Slovenia. The Constitutional Court did state in Point 15 of the reasoning of the Decision that despite reviewing the case according to the Constitution it did not definitively take a position regarding the issue of by what criteria the admissibility of the use of such evidence must be assessed with regard to the protection of human rights.<sup>1</sup> It will certainly have the opportunity to do so with respect to one of the constitutional complaints which had been accepted for consideration some time ago precisely for this purpose. I did not deal in depth with the mentioned issue, as the key reasons for my dissent with the Decision lie in the second standpoint.

5. Namely, I cannot agree with the argument that brought my colleagues to the decision that after the Slovene Police were notified of the content of the communication as well as its time and dynamic IP address number, the Police did not need a court order to obtain data on what person this IP address was assigned to. We can certainly arrive at such a standpoint from the starting point that the protection of the communication privacy of traffic data is always connected with the protection of the privacy of the content of the communication – as long as an individual enjoys protection of communication privacy regarding the content of communication, he enjoys such protection also with regard to all the traffic data of this communication. When this protection can no longer be expected with regard to the content – because it was already exposed to the public – such allegedly also entails that there is no expectation of privacy with regard to the traffic data of this communication. This, in my opinion, consequently, leads to the standpoint that with regard to traffic data an individual does not enjoy independent protection of communication privacy or protection separate from the content of communication. Therefore, I cannot agree with this standpoint. The individual in this case namely did not appear in public under his own name, it was the few digits of the dynamic IP address that appeared in public.
6. If we agree that the Swiss Police could obtain the number of a dynamic IP address without a court order, it must still be taken into account, however, that the IP address was expressed in the form of a couple digits, but it did not entail the identification of the person who was communicating. In my opinion, if the Slovene Police had wanted to identify the person that the dynamic IP address represented, they would therefore need to obtain a court order, as clearly follows from the second paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution. Since they did not have a court order, there was a violation of Article 37 of the Constitution. With regard to this, the following question could arise: Is there a constitutional obligation to exclude the evidence obtained by this violation of the complainant's right to communication privacy (as required by the complainant), and what in this context is the meaning of the evidence obtained on the basis of the issued court order? Sooner or later, the Constitutional Court will probably have to deal with the issue of whether the exclusion of evidence established by the Criminal Procedure Act (Official Gazette of RS, No. 101/05 - hereinafter referred to as the CrPA)<sup>2</sup> in the second paragraph of Article 18 has a constitutionally absolute effect.<sup>3</sup> I did not, however, deal in depth with this issue due to the adopted decision.

3 An excellent basis for further constitutional discussion of this issue was recently presented by Assistant Professor Dr Gorkič; See P. Gorkič, Načelo sorazmernosti in izločanje nezakonitih dokazov v slovenskem pravu: drugi del [The Principle of Proportionality and the Exclusion of Illegal Evidence in Slovene Law: Part II], Pravna praksa, No. 5 (2014), Annex, pp. II-VIII. The article has already attracted a first response; see also M. Šošič,

7. In this case, the question could also be raised whether at the time the relevant Police conduct took place there existed a statutory regulation on the basis of which internet service providers could store the data that they provided to the Police. If there was no statutory basis for their storage for specific purposes, the contested decision was controversial already from the viewpoint of the first paragraph of Article 38 of the Constitution. The complainant did assert a violation of this right, but did not focus the constitutional complaint with regard to this issue. Nevertheless, the first rule that holds for all interventions in human rights before a review of their constitutional admissibility even begins is the following: the interference must be determined by law. The Constitutional Court avoided a review of the alleged violation of the rights determined by the first paragraph of Article 38 of the Constitution (Point 7 of the reasoning of the Decision). This can be questionable since the complaint alleging a violation of the first paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution was rejected. Above all, it seems important to me to emphasise that the legal situation regarding the supply of traffic data that is retained by service providers is different today. It is different to such an extent that, according to the provisions of Articles 166 and 168 of the Electronic Communications Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 109/12 – hereinafter referred to as ECA-1), the service provider must not give the Police access to the data stored on the basis of this Act (it is precisely this Act that regulates the legal basis for their storage) without a court order. On the one hand, the Police must have the possibility to effectively detect criminal offences, but, on the other, they must be limited by the requirement that they exercise their statutory powers by respecting human rights and fundamental freedoms. Such must hold in a state governed by the rule of law that respects human rights and fundamental freedoms and ensures their protection (the first paragraph of Article 5 of the Constitution). In accordance with this, in the process of detecting a criminal offense the Police may interfere with the communication privacy of an individual in relation to the traffic data of communication, but under the conditions determined by the Constitution in the second paragraph of Article 37; the first among them is precisely the requirement of there being a judicial review of the actions of the Police.
8. In case No. U-I-65/13, in which the procedure for the review of the constitutionality of certain provisions of the ECA-1 was initiated by a request of the Information Commissioner (who contested the obligation to retain [traffic data]), we stayed the proceedings by the Constitutional Court Order dated 8 October 2013 pending the decision of the Court of Justice of the European Union on the validity of the Directive that was implemented by the ECA-1 regarding the mandatory retention of traffic data by service providers (inter alia for the purpose of detecting serious criminal offences).<sup>4</sup>

Nekaj argumentov proti utilitaristični doktrini izločanja dokazov [Some Arguments against the Doctrine on the Utilitarian Exclusion of Evidence], Pravna praksa, No. 8 (2014), pp. 15-16.

4 At the time this order was adopted, the two proceedings before the European Court of Justice, initiated by an Irish court and the Austrian Constitutional Court (the proceedings in Cases C-293/12 and C-594/12) that were of the same nature were already so far along that if the Constitutional Court had referred a question for a preliminary ruling it could not have been answered during these proceedings.

We are still waiting for the decision of the Court of Justice of the European Union. The opinion of the Advocate General is, however, already available. Clearly, we cannot know whether the Court of Justice of the European Union will follow it, but it seems important to me on its own merit. In his Opinion, Advocate General Villalón, the former President of the Spanish Constitutional Court, pointed out the right to privacy protected by Article 7 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union (OJ C 326, 26.10.2012), and specifically emphasised that the Directive should, if it is to remain in force, also define the fundamental principles which are to govern the determination of the minimum guarantees for access to the data collected and retained and their use, which the Directive left to be regulated by the Member States. He highlighted as necessary among these principles precisely the requirement that any access to the data should be subject to review by the judicial (or at least) independent authorities.<sup>5</sup> Despite the fact that our regulation as determined by the second paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution is one of the strictest, this indicates that such are in fact serious interferences with communication privacy – the requirement of a court order stems precisely from this in order to prevent abuse. The ECA-1 already meets this requirement and in relation to the third paragraph of Article 145.b of the CrPA is clearly a subsequent and more specific regulation. By the nature of things, subsequent and more specific statutory provisions repeal earlier statutory provisions regulating the same subject matter, no matter in which statute they are formally enacted. The Police, who must act lawfully, must therefore consider the ECA-1 as the applicable law. The service providers must also act in accordance with this Act when providing traffic data to the Police, otherwise also they would be acting illegally. Therefore, I am afraid that the message of this Decision is exactly contrary to the already achieved level of human rights protection that the legislature established with the ECA-1.

9. The Constitutional Court did not build its arguments why this case does not entail a violation of the right to communication privacy on the reasoning of the Supreme Court based on Article 145.b of the CrPA. This is good, because otherwise it would convey the message to the legislature that in the future the regulation contained in this provision would not be constitutionally disputable. The Constitutional Court has, on the contrary, clearly stated that the identity of the individual communicating is one of the important aspects of communication privacy, therefore it is necessary to obtain a court order for its disclosure in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution (Point 18 of the reasoning of the Decision). Only when an individual publicly discloses his communication, such that the content of the communication is no longer confidential, can he no longer expect protection under Article 37 of the Constitution even with regard to his identity, which was concealed (by a combination of digits) and was not as such exposed to the public. Although I do not agree with the standpoint that by leaving a digital trail of computer-based communication (a dynamic IP address) an individual already waived (in this part) his right to privacy, I would like to emphasise that this standpoint is fundamentally different from the standpoint of the Supreme Court and is less dangerous in terms of the protection of an individual's right to communication privacy with regard to the traffic data of communication than the standpoint of the Supreme Court.

10. The Supreme Court namely held that the Police had not obtained traffic data in an electronic communications network, but only data regarding a particular user of a particular means of communication. This entails that the Supreme Court took the traffic data out of the communication and reviewed it completely independently – regardless of the communication. When you do that, of course, the name and surname of the person and their address remain the only personal data that are not protected by communication privacy. Acting in such manner, we can quickly arrive at a situation where only the communication content is protected, while traffic data on the communication will not be afforded any protection at all, as they can easily be removed one by one from the communication and dealt with as “only” a personal datum. However, this in my opinion cannot be done, because this is essentially a denial of the fundamental logic of the protection of the right to communication privacy, which in its essence protects the expected privacy regarding who communicated with whom (the personal element), when (the temporal element), and about what (the element regarding the content). In my opinion, all these fundamental elements of communication are of equal importance and should all be constitutionally protected. It is therefore good that the Constitutional Court did not follow the standpoint of the Supreme Court regarding the reasons why in this case there was no violation of communication privacy. In this respect, I agree with the Information Commissioner, who on our request gave an opinion regarding the observations in this case. The Police, of course, as they state, “do not care who the owner of a means of communication is, but are interested in identifying the user who communicated, and precisely because he or she communicated with someone, no matter how the question sent [by the Police] to the service providers was formulated,” “[t]he trigger for obtaining the identity of an individual on the basis of data from the service provider is namely precisely in the communication, otherwise they would not be looking for the individual [...],” “these data (who communicated and with whom) actually have a greater weight than the time of the communication alone” and even “the content of the communication also has no special value if we do not know who communicated with whom.” Therefore, the Information Commissioner considers that it is impossible to separate the traffic data from the subscriber data, which in its very essence constitutes an opposite logic to the one determined by the third paragraph of Article 145.b of the CrPA.
11. Given the above, it seems important to me to emphasise that the message of this Decision is not the same as was the message of the Supreme Court judgment, according to which the Police can usually have access to the data stored by internet service providers regarding who was using a particular IP address without a court order. The message of this Decision is different: the Police could request data on whom a particular IP address has been assigned to without a court order just because an individual cannot expect privacy regarding this data due to his or her public communication. This is precisely the point regarding which I do not agree with my colleagues who voted for the Decision. In my opinion, he or she could have expected privacy, as we all may expect it. That is why in order to interfere with such communication privacy the Police must obtain a court order in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution. If a reasonable suspicion that such a serious offense as the one at issue in the present case was committed is established, there is absolutely no reason why the judiciary would not issue such a court order. A court order, without which today, in my opinion, the service providers in any case cannot provide data to the Police in accordance with the provisions of the ECA-1 regarding online communication, is a guarantee ensuring communication privacy on the internet, which we should not just relinquish. The judge must, of course, carefully assess before issuing a court order whether the Police have proved all the conditions for justifying an interference with the right determined by the first paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution; in this responsible role they act as guarantors of human rights and independent supervisors of the actions of the executive branch of power.

DISSENTING SEPARATE OPINION OF JUDGE DR DUNJA JADEK PENSA

1. I wish to explain in this opinion why I could not agree with the majority that the complainant himself waived the protection of his privacy by engaging in an established mode of communication and, therefore, can no longer rely on his privacy when it comes to the disclosure of his identity.<sup>1</sup> This standpoint is in my opinion questionable, since it states that the anonymity of a particular type of electronic communication does not exist in relation to the Police. This is because
  - (1) the Police are entitled to have access at their own discretion to data that identifies a person who can be connected to a specific communication on the basis of retained traffic data<sup>2</sup> and
  - (2) such entails that the Police investigation thereof is not bound by the conditions determined by the second paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution.
2. There is no doubt that interferences in the constitutionally guaranteed inviolability of privacy may be legitimate in instances where there are values of a higher rank that are affected. These are justified precisely by a legitimate concern for the values of a higher rank than the inviolability of the privacy of an individual and the matching obligation of the state to protect these values “more” than the privacy of an individual. However, if such entails an interference with communication privacy, the Constitution limits the interferences to individual instances in which

2 Such was the case at issue: the Police obtained data that linked the dynamic IP address to a certain person from the service provider on the basis of a letter.

- (1) this possibility is specifically determined in a law,
- (2) there are facts demonstrating that such is “necessary for the institution or course of criminal proceedings or for reasons of national security,”
- (3) the admissibility of the interference (whose effect is the hollowing-out of the constitutionally guaranteed privacy of correspondence for a limited period of time) is decided on by a court (compare with the second paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution),
- (4) the court must, of course, verify before issuing an order whether constitutional guarantees are fulfilled in each particular case.

The purpose of the constitutional guarantees under which there may be an interference with communication privacy is two-fold. Firstly, at the constitutional level such reinforces the integrity of the privacy of correspondence (the first paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution), thereby strengthening confidence in the expectation of privacy in this area of life. The wording of the second paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution namely also determines that only if the conditions for the interference with communication privacy written hereunder are satisfied may “the protection of the privacy of correspondence and other means of communication [...] be suspended for a set time.” And secondly, the constitutional guarantees are intended to avoid excessive interference or perhaps even abuses by the executive branch of power (the Police) when interfering with communication privacy. Let me put this briefly. The first paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution ensures the inviolability of communication privacy; the second paragraph defines the boundaries of this inviolability. The inviolability of communication privacy and its boundaries constitute a meaningful whole. In addition, both are equally important for building a legitimate expectation of communication privacy in the country.

3. If we ourselves expose our communication to the public, the content is no longer private. In such a case, we (logically) cannot rely on communication privacy nor (consequently) expect privacy and the application of the guarantees provided by objective law (also) for strengthening the expectations of communication privacy in society. I therefore agree with the majority position that the data the complainant himself disclosed to the public in one way or another (i.e. by public disclosure of the content of controversial internet communications,<sup>3</sup> and the disclosure of the dynamic IP address<sup>4</sup> that identifies the website and which could be assigned at a given time due to the connection) by itself cannot be a subject of the protection afforded by Article 37 of the Constitution. Where do I see a problem?
4. None of the data publicly disclosed by the complainant disclosed his identity. The dilemma of the anonymity of the communication at issue struck me as crucial as the possibility of the Police to monitor (ex post) electronic communication between individuals finally buries the idea that this is an area in which the state will “leave individuals alone”; that is the point where the veil of anonymity is lifted and Police monitoring concentrates on a specific person to whom certain communication can be attributed to (ex post) on the basis of stored data on electronic communication. From this viewpoint, anonymity is the only thing that prevents the Police from linking a particular communication with a particular person. In my opinion (an explanation follows below), this point coincides with the moment of disclosure of the link between a dynamic IP address and an individual who is identified on the basis of his or her name and address, which in the opinion of the majority are protected only as personal data.<sup>5</sup> Let me add at this point that an individual distancing him- or herself from thoughts expressed in some manner (for example, by using a pseudonym) is not unusual. The motives of an individual for maintaining anonymity are, of course, diverse. They may be legitimate (as such is, for example, explicitly expressed in intellectual property law<sup>6</sup>) or not (such as, for example, intimidation by anonymous threats).

3 The position regarding the public disclosure of the content of the communication is based on the finding that anyone could access the disputed files (cf. Point 14 of the reasoning of the majority Decision).

4 The position of the majority Decision on the complainant’s public disclosure of the dynamic IP address is based on (1) the finding that the content of the communication is publicly available, and (2) the absence of his statements regarding the concealment of the dynamic IP address from which this communication was made (cf. Point 14 of the reasoning of the majority Decision).

5. The standpoint of the majority summarised at the outset is justified, as I understand it, by the manner of communication. According to this standpoint, the manner of communication established in the present case by itself negates privacy and the legitimate expectation of privacy, including the legitimate expectation of the anonymity of communication.
6. I could not agree with this key standpoint. I believe, namely, that it is necessary to look for the answer to the question of whether the manner of communication established in the present case negates (in general and always) the existence of an objectively legitimate expectation of privacy (including the guaranteed anonymity of communication) from the viewpoint (standard) of a reasonable and adequately informed individual, taking into account all the circumstances of the case. Among “all” the circumstances of the case are first of all the provisions of objective law that govern the protection of the confidentiality of the traffic data of electronic communications at the relevant time. This is because the purpose of these provisions, as I understand it, is the message the legislature gives beforehand to individuals:
  - (1) it either assures them that the state will “leave them alone” in the area of electronic communications,<sup>7</sup>
  - (2) or gives a prior warning that they will not be “left alone,” in other words that in relation to the Police, the privacy of this type of communication is not inviolable.

5 The Constitutional Court did not carry out a review of the constitutional complaint in the light of Article 38 of the Constitution (cf. Point 7 of the reasoning of the majority Decision).

6 Cf. the third paragraph of Article 7 of the Berne Convention for the Protection of Literary and Artistic Works (Official Gazette SFRY, MP, No. 14/75, Official Gazette RS, MP, No. 9/92); cf. also the second paragraph of Article 18 of the Copyright and Related Rights Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 16/07 – official consolidated text, et seq.).

7 It is evident that the Constitution does not require that the confidentiality of such communications be ensured in an absolute manner, and that the regulation therefore may contain conditions under which it is permissible to interfere with the confidentiality of such communications. However, these conditions must be in conformity with the second paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution.

Such regulation is then the one that, in my view, from the perspective of the user of electronic communication, can justify (1) either the existence of an objective expectation of privacy, including the anonymity of electronic communications (2) or the negation of such expectation.

7. At the time the data at issue were obtained (i.e. in August 2006) the Electronic Communications Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 43/04 and 86/04 – hereinafter referred to as the ECA) was in force. In the ECA service providers were obliged to erase (and not store)<sup>8</sup> the traffic data processed and stored by the service provider as soon as they were no longer necessary for the transmission of messages (the first paragraph of Article 104 of the ECA). As was stated in the draft of this act, all forms of supervision, including storage, were prohibited and the duty to erase the traffic data was imposed precisely in order to protect the confidentiality of communications.<sup>9</sup> On the basis of explicit statutory provisions, confidentiality also applied to traffic data (Point 2 of the first paragraph of Article 103 of the ECA); it covered all users of communication services, not only persons who had concluded a contract for the procurement of such services (Article 101 of the ECA); it bound the service provider and anyone who was involved in carrying out the service provider's activities. An interference with this inviolability of the confidentiality of communications, which was protected on an abstract level, was allowed by the lawful interception of communications on the basis of an order issued by the competent authority (Article 107 of the ECA). The letter from the Police that was the basis for obtaining the required data in the present case does not fall, as I understand it, under the category of a competent authority. Since the legal order must be consistent, I assign a character of specificity to the regulation in the ECA of the conditions under which the Police were allowed to access the data on electronic communications (specifically, obtaining an order issued by the competent authority). Therefore, even if the third paragraph of Article 149.b of the Criminal Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 96/04 – official consolidated text, and 101/05 – hereinafter referred to as the CrPA) might be interpreted in a manner that follows from the judgment of the Supreme Court, it should not be applied in the field regulated by the ECA. I would like to add that the first Article of the ECA also explicitly stated that this is the act regulating “the protection of the privacy and confidentiality of electronic communications.” The legal order would be duplicitous if, on the one hand, it ensured in the law the confidentiality of electronic communications, including, as I understand it, the protection of the anonymity of participants, building high standard guarantees in this regard for the protection of confidentiality in the state, while on the other hand tolerating disrespect for these standards or even allowing Police supervision of electronic communications beyond these standards. Let me add that the service provider, who is a private entity, was not obligated under the first paragraph of Article 145 of the CrPA to report criminal offenses when informed of them or otherwise after gaining knowledge of them. It was, however, obliged to comply with the provisions of the ECA regarding the protection of the confidentiality of electronic communications, which of course includes strict compliance with the conditions under which the Police were exceptionally allowed to access the data regarding such communication.

8 Data retention was ordered by the Amendments to the Electronic Communications Act Act that entered into force on 27 December 2006 (Official Gazette RS, No. 129/06 - hereinafter referred to as the ECA-A).

9 Gazette of the National Assembly, No. 26/04, p. 91

8. With regard to the summarised guarantees of objective law on the protection of the confidentiality of electronic communication, taking into account the criterion of a reasonable and adequately informed individual, I could not attribute to the manner of communication, as was established in the present case, the meaning of a sufficient reason for denying the expectation of privacy, albeit only with regard to the anonymity of users of the services of internet providers. I did not find in the objective law also applicable to the manner of communication at issue certain grounds for denying the expectation of the anonymity of the established manner of communication. Quite the contrary. Therefore, in my opinion the established manner of communication is not a reason that would undermine by itself the user's legitimate expectation of the anonymity of communication.
9. The traffic datum – the dynamic IP address that was assigned randomly at a given moment – as I understand it, reveals how the internet was used on some computer, because it is inextricably attached to a specific connection. Subsequent attribution of these data to persons identified through an evaluation (of also other stored data on individual specific connections)<sup>10</sup> builds a meaningful whole with this datum, which is, technically speaking, functioning as a connection “at a distance.” This is because only the two data jointly communicate how the internet was used in a non-anonymised way, i.e. regarding internet use in connection with an identified person. This essential circumstance in my opinion negates the notion of the neutrality of the datum regarding a specific user of services for a certain (known) dynamic IP address that the Police sought through the service provider. Namely, the neutrality of the datum in terms of denying its ability to communicate nothing more than the name and address of a certain person (who has a subscription contract with the service provider). Precisely because this datum is inseparably attached exactly to a specific communication, the traffic datum is attributed to the field of communication privacy protection.<sup>11</sup> The Police, as I understand it, did not ask for data that would be accessible in any personal data filing system kept by the service provider. To my knowledge, such a filing system does not exist. Therefore, I could not agree with the separation of a specific internet connection, designated with a certain dynamic IP address, from the person that can be identified by using the data stored by the service provider. This is all the more so as, to my knowledge, this identification is, due to randomly assigned dynamic IP addresses, carried out at the service provider by accessing other stored traffic data (for which it was not claimed that they became publicly accessible due to the manner of communication).

10. Even if the service provider communicated to the Police “only” the data identifying a person who has a subscription contract with it, by doing so, as I understand it, the service provider in fact communicated (to put it simply) traffic data in an electronic communications network regarding this person. The Police also, as I have already explained, wanted to determine more than just the name and surname of a certain person who had concluded a contract. Since, as I understand it, they asked for traffic data associated with a particular person they would have to proceed according to the first paragraph of Article 149.b of the CrPA and obtain an order from the investigating judge. Let me repeat that according to the ECA the Police were not authorised to have access to any data on electronic communications without “an order of the competent authority.” The interpretation of the third paragraph of Article 149.b of the CrPA according to which the Police were allowed to inquire about such on the basis of their own written request, because such was intended merely to obtain the data regarding the owner of a particular means of communication for electronic communications traffic that just were not made public is, in my opinion, therefore erroneous. Let me repeat. It is erroneous because such was not merely intended to obtain data regarding the owner of a particular means of communication for electronic communications traffic that just were not made public, and as it is contrary to completely clear provisions of the ECA. In addition, because the Police did not obtain an order from the competent authority in this case, one of the pieces of evidence was, in my opinion, obtained in violation of the law, and a different standpoint would also violate Article 37 of the Constitution.
11. At this point of the decision-making process the following two questions occurred to me: (1) whether due to the circumstance of the violation of the integrity of the right determined by the first paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution the duty to exclude the evidence obtained by the violation automatically arises, and (2) what is the significance of the described shortcomings for other subsequently obtained evidence that was, as opines the majority and I agree therewith, obtained without a violation of the law and the Constitution. The circumstances of the case at issue put the dilemma implied in these two questions at the forefront for me.<sup>12</sup> I regret that in this case the Constitutional Court did not pronounce a standpoint regarding this dilemma.
12. The conclusion: The characteristics of the environment that enable (and encourage) modern electronic communication in today’s stage of development offer favourable opportunities for electronic communication to serve as a tool of control exerted by the state, its bodies, but also by unauthorised individuals to the extent that the communication reveals much more regarding the participants than just the data identifying the participants of the communication. Regarding this, two points seem clear.

12 For more detail regarding this dilemma, see P. Gorkič, Načelo sorazmernosti in izločanje nezakonitih dokazov v slovenskem pravu: drugi del [The Principle of Proportionality and the Exclusion of Illegal Evidence in Slovene Law: Part II], Pravna praksa, No. 5 (2014), Annex, pp. II-VIII. Cf. also M. Šošič, Nekaj argumentov proti utilitaristični doktrini izločanja dokazov [Some Arguments against the Doctrine on the Utilitarian Exclusion of Evidence], Pravna praksa, No. 8 (2014), p. 15.

Firstly, access to this type of communication and the possibility of surveilling it (by the state or as well by unauthorised individuals), both facilitated by technical progress, seriously endanger the idea that such communication is at all (still) private; if the effectiveness of surveillance is proportional to the amount of data stored and to the easy availability of such data to law enforcement bodies, the expectation of the privacy of such communications is inversely proportional to it. And secondly, if it is to prevail that the communication between individuals taking place on the internet in today's stage of development is to be considered private, the law should in my opinion clearly and consistently restrict the possibility of the surveillance of such communication to instances where it is established that there are values of a higher rank that are affected. It is precisely the limitations of surveillance that can justify surveillance and the limitation of surveillance can build the expectation that an individual, despite the real possibilities of the surveillance of this area of one's life, will be "left alone". Namely, that which can be monitored cannot reasonably be regarded as private. A social consensus regarding the correct (legal) framework for the possibility of (i) the retention of data to facilitate subsequent monitoring (inter alia) of electronic communication, and (ii) access to the stored data is thus still being sought. As I understand it, the starting point of today's debates remains the effort to maintain the expectation of the privacy of such communication, inter alia, by restricting the access to such communication by way of [requiring] approval by an independent body, possibly the court,<sup>13</sup> as our Constitution (already) guarantees in the second paragraph of Article 37.

Decision No. U-I-92/01, dated 28 February 2002

DECISION

At a session held on 28 February 2002 in proceedings to review constitutionality initiated upon the petition of Edvard Krajnc, Vojnik, and Mag. Matevž Krivic, Medvode, following a public hearing held on 17 January 2002, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. The fourteenth indent of Article 6 of the Population, Household, and Housing Census in the Republic of Slovenia 2001 Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 66/2000 and 26/01) is not inconsistent with the Constitution.
2. Articles 10, 11, 12, 13, 15, 24, 25, 28, and 29 of the Population, Household and Housing Census in the Republic of Slovenia 2001 Act are not inconsistent with the Constitution.
3. Articles 5 and 23 of the Population, Household and Housing Census in the Republic of Slovenia 2001 Act are abrogated, except for the part of the first paragraph of Article 23, which reads as follows: "Data collected by census may only be used for statistical purposes".
4. The abrogation referred to in the previous point shall take effect on the next day following the publication of this Decision in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia.

Reasoning

A

1. The petitioner, Edvard Krajnc (hereinafter referred to as the first petitioner), challenges the third paragraph of Article 5 of the Act amending the Population, Household, and Housing Census in the Republic of Slovenia 2001 Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 26/01 – hereinafter referred to as the PHHC1A-A),<sup>1</sup> as it is inconsistent with Article

<sup>1</sup> This refers to Article 6 of the Act on the Population, Household, and Housing Census in the Republic of Slovenia 2001 (Official Gazette RS, No. 66/2000). By the challenged provision of the PHHC1A-A, the collection of data regarding religion was also introduced in Article 6 of the Act on the Population, Household, and

7, and the first and second paragraphs of Article 41 of the Constitution. The first petitioner claims that, in view of the constitutional definition of the separation of the state and religious communities, and the constitutionally guaranteed freedom of professing religious or other beliefs, the challenged provision of the Act, which provides that religious and personal data is collected, is unconstitutional. He claims that the state is prohibited from asking individuals about these beliefs or from collecting data on these beliefs on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution, which guarantees that no one shall be obliged to declare his religious or other beliefs, in conjunction with the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution.

2. The first petitioner believes that there is a serious risk that religious communities could interpret the challenged provision of the Act to mean that the Constitution does not provide for a separation between religious communities and the state, and that they could interpret the obtained data to suit their current needs.
3. The petitioner, Mag. Matevž Krivic (hereinafter referred to as the second petitioner), challenges the same provision of the Act. He questions whether inquiring about religious belief is at all reasonable since the respondents are not obliged to respond to such a question. Therefore, in his opinion, data obtained in such a manner is not of interest or relevance for the statistical purposes of the state. Furthermore, he believes that people in general, especially the average person, consider the census to be obligatory and decreed by the government, and so it is not possible to entirely eliminate the intentional or unintentional “pressure” on those being questioned, although the Act provides that individuals must be informed that they have the right to not answer. He also alleges that, since the question focuses on religious beliefs despite only enquiries on (legal) affiliation with a religious community being permitted, it is incorrectly formulated.
4. The second petitioner initially also alleged that the question on national (ethnic) origin (thirteenth indent of Article 6 of the PHHC1A) is constitutionally disputable. At the public hearing, he declared that his petition was not to be understood as a challenge to the constitutionality of the thirteenth indent of Article 6 of the PHHC1A. In the subsequent written submission, he explicitly stated that he did not challenge its constitutionality.
5. Moreover, in his petition, the second petitioner also referred to Articles 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 12, 13, 15, 23, 24, 25, 28, and 29 of the PHHC1A as being constitutionally disputable. At the public hearing, he stated that he does not challenge Articles 3, 6, 7, 8 or 9. However, he alleged that Article 10 was constitutionally disputable. He states that the challenged provisions (particularly those of Articles 11, 12, 13, 15, 24, 25, 28, and 29) are vague, incomplete, that they enable personal data from various databases to be integrated, and that they do not provide for the appropriate protection of personal data. In his opinion, Articles 5 and 23 enable the collection of data to be used for other databases or other purposes (to establish a building and housing register and a household register), thereby allowing personal data to be abused or used for undetermined purposes, and rendering its protection impossible. Therefore, the constitutional right to protection of personal data (Article 38 of the Constitution) is, in his opinion, violated.

Housing Census in the Republic of Slovenia of 2001 (Official Gazette RS, No. 66/2000 and 26/01 – hereinafter referred to as the PHHC1A, indent 14). For reference purposes, the numbering of the articles determined in the PHHC1A is used below.

6. The National Assembly replied to both petitions; it believes that they are unfounded. It is argued that the PHHC1A fully respects the provisions of the first and second paragraphs of Article 41 of the Constitution (regarding the question about religion) and Article 61 of the Constitution (regarding the question about national ethnic origin). In reference thereto, the National Assembly cites Articles 10 and 35 of the PHHC1A in particular. Furthermore, it argues that the provisions of Article 3 of the Personal Data Protection Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 59/99 etc. – hereinafter referred to as the PDPA) regarding the protection of the particularly sensitive data were also taken into account. Moreover, the National Assembly believes that the provisions of the PHHC1A, which allow the Statistical Office of the Republic of Slovenia (hereinafter referred to as the Office) to use data from other official and administrative databases for the purposes of the census, are consistent with Article 38 of the Constitution. In reviewing such, the PDPA must also be taken into account, since it regulates in detail the processing of personal data, and the conditions under which the collected data may be used for other purposes. The National Assembly consequently believes that it is entirely constitutional for the census to be used not only for the collection of statistical data but also data for other purposes, as provided by law.
7. In its opinion, the Government states that the petitions are unfounded. As for the disputed questions, it states that data regarding religious beliefs and national origin is relevant and necessary for state statistical purposes. It states that statistical research is carried out not only in the interests of the state, but also as an internationally recommended state activity and part of the obligations that arose upon the process of accession to the European Union. The view of the Government is that the results of the state's statistics analysis and censuses are useful not only for the state, public sector, and international community, but also for the private sector and for individuals and their associations (for civil society institutions). In the Government's opinion, the integration of public records is a tradition in Slovenia; through this integration process the principle of efficiency and economy in the processing of data is implemented. As a result, specific data is not collected separately for each purpose – the data that has already been collected is used for various purposes. At the public hearing, the Government's representative submitted a draft form for carrying out the census.

B – I

8. The Constitutional Court accepted the petitions for consideration. As the conditions provided in the fourth paragraph of Article 26 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA) were met, it proceeded to decide on the merits of the case.
9. Regarding the initial allegations of the second petitioner, the Constitutional Court also discussed the constitutionality of the thirteenth indent of Article 6 of the PHHC1A at the public hearing. Since the petitioner had explicitly stated that he did not challenge this provision, and the Constitutional Court had determined that the conditions provided in Article 30 of the CCA were not met, it did not review the constitutionality of the thirteenth indent of Article 6 of the PHHC1A.

B – II

10. The first petitioner states that the fourteenth indent of Article 6 of the PHHC1A, which was introduced by the third paragraph of Article 5 of the PHHC1A-A, is inconsistent with Article 7 of the Constitution (the principle of separation of the state and religious communities). The petitioner does not provide reasoning as to why the challenged provision is inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution. He simply alleges that religious communities may manipulate the challenged provisions of the Act to serve the benefit of their immediate interests and needs, which could endanger the actual meaning of the provision of the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution.
11. The first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution provides that the state and religious communities are separate. This provision of the Constitution includes only a general principle of separation of the state and religious communities (see Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-68/98, dated 22 November 2001, Official Gazette RS, No. 101/01). Scholars consider in particular that the key elements of the separation of the state and religious communities are the autonomy of religious communities (in their own areas), the secularisation of public life, and state neutrality towards religious communities.<sup>2</sup> A religiously and ideologically neutral state is therefore impartial, neither supporting nor hindering religion and other ideologies.<sup>3</sup> However, it does not follow from the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities that the state should have no interest in data on the religious beliefs of its inhabitants. In view of the legislature's intention<sup>4</sup> regarding the collection of such data – for statistical purposes – and considering the provisions on processing and protection of such data, the conclusion could be drawn that the challenged provision does not violate the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities.
12. The challenged provision of the PHHC1A does not regulate the relationship between the state and religious communities, does not interfere with their relationships, and does not refer directly thereto. If the petitioner was concerned about the possible subsequent interpretation of census data by religious communities, it is the view of the Constitutional Court that such interpretation of data, which is entirely private in terms of separation of the state and religious communities, does not in itself interfere with the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution. The data will eventually be made public. It is clear that the same data may be interpreted differently and this is an everyday occurrence for practically all data. The mere possibility of the collected data being interpreted differently does not mean that the Act, which regulates the collection of such data, is unconstitutional. The issue of unconstitutionality regarding the manner and purpose of the collection of specific data refers to the review of constitutionality in terms of Article 41 of the Constitution, and does not refer to consistency with Article 7 of the Constitution. The challenged provision of the PHHC1A is therefore not inconsistent with Article 7 of the Constitution.

B – III

13. The petitioners challenge the aforementioned provision of the Act on the grounds that it interferes with the constitutional right to freedom of conscience referred to in the first and second paragraphs of Article 41 of the Constitution. The petitioners infer from this constitutionally guaranteed right that individuals are not obliged to declare their religious beliefs, and that the state may not inquire about their religious beliefs or even whether they wish to declare the same. The unconstitutionality of the challenged provision of the Act, in their opinion, lies in the fact that it even provides for the possibility of posing such question. In the opinion of the petitioners, posing a question on religious beliefs is, in itself, unconstitutional (and inconsistent with the second paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution), as it interferes with freedom of conscience. It is argued that the second paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution prohibits the state from posing such questions and collecting such data.
14. The first and second paragraphs of Article 41 of the Constitution read as follows: “Religious and other beliefs may be freely professed in private and public life. No one shall be obliged to declare his religious or other beliefs.”
15. Article 41 of the Constitution (freedom of conscience) protects the freedom to declare religious and other beliefs. It is a fundamental human right and freedom that is also related to other constitutional rights, such as the right to personal dignity and safety (Article 34 of the Constitution), the protection of the right to privacy and personality rights (Article 35 of the Constitution), the protection of personal data (Article 38 of the Constitution), freedom of expression (Article 39 of the Constitution), the right of assembly and association (Article 42 of the Constitution), and the rights and duties of parents (Article 54 of the Constitution).
16. The United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights from 1948 (hereinafter referred to as the UN Universal Declaration)<sup>5</sup> guarantees everyone the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion (Article 18). In accordance with the UN

5 Človekove pravice [Human Rights], Zbirka mednarodnih dokumentov, Part I, Univerzalni dokumenti, Društvo za ZN za Republiko Slovenijo, Ljubljana, 1995, pp. 1–7.

Universal Declaration, this right includes freedom to have or accept a religion or belief of their own choosing, and the freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest one's religion or belief through worship, observance, practice and teaching. Following the model of the UN Universal Declaration, the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion is also guaranteed by Article 9 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR) and Article 18 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (Official Gazette SFRY [Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia], No. 7/71, and Official Gazette RS, No. 35/92, MP, No. 9/92 – hereinafter referred to as the Covenant).

17. From freedom of religion (first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution and Article 9 of ECHR)<sup>6</sup> and the aforementioned provisions of the Constitution and binding instruments of international law (Article 8 of the Constitution), three distinct entitlements also arise for individuals: the right to profess any religion; the right to change one's religion; and the right not to have a religion<sup>7</sup> (Decision No. U-I-68/98). Freedom of religion guarantees that individuals, either alone or in community with others, in public or private, freely manifest their religion or belief in teaching, observance, worship and practice,<sup>8</sup> which is defined in a foreign legal theory as positive freedom of religion.<sup>9</sup> On the other hand, freedom of religion guarantees individuals the right not to profess their religion, or whether they follow one at all, which foreign legal theory defines as negative freedom of religion.<sup>10</sup> Freedom of religion as a forum internum includes the right to religious affiliation or non-affiliation, the right to change religion and the right to choose religion freely.
18. The state may not interfere with freedom of conscience.<sup>11</sup> This above all means that it may not require anyone, either directly or indirectly, to accept a certain religious or other belief, and it may not use coercive measures or offer privileges for affiliation or non-affiliation with a specific religious or other belief. If the state did so, such conduct would constitute an interference with freedom of conscience and religion.

6 Article 9 of the ECHR (Freedom of Thought, Conscience and Religion) reads as follows:

- (1) Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion. This right includes the freedom to change one's religion or belief, and the freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or in private, to manifest one's religion or belief through worship, teaching, practice and observance.
- (2) Freedom to manifest one's religion or beliefs shall be subject only to such limitations that are prescribed by law and necessary in a democratic society for the interests of public safety, to protect public order, health and morals, or to protect the rights and freedoms of others."

7 R. St. J. Macdonald et al., The European System for the Protection of Human Rights, 1993, p. 452.

8 See the first paragraph of Article 9 of the ECHR and Article 18 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

9 Müller – Volbeler J., Positive und negative Religionsfreiheit, JZ 20/1995, p. 998.

10 Ibidem.

11 The third paragraph of Article 18 of the Covenant provides that the freedom to manifest one's religion or beliefs may be subject only to such limitations that are prescribed by law and necessary to protect public safety, order, health or morals, or the fundamental rights and freedoms of others. The second paragraph of Article 9 of the ECHR also contains similar admissibility of limitations. See Note 6 above.

19. The second paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution explicitly provides that no one shall be obliged to declare his religious or other beliefs. If there is no obligation to declare religious or other beliefs, this means that it is not permissible to force one to do so. Furthermore, Article 18 of the Covenant explicitly determines that no one may be coerced into having their freedom restricted in terms of having or adopting a religion or belief. The use of coercion to change a person's religious beliefs or force a person into revealing their religious beliefs would interfere with freedom of conscience.<sup>12</sup>

A statute which determines that individuals are obliged to declare their religious beliefs would violate freedom of conscience and would therefore be unconstitutional (i.e. inconsistent with the second paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution).<sup>13</sup>

20. According to the aforementioned criteria, it is necessary to review whether the challenged provision of the PHHC1A interferes with freedom of conscience, particularly the negative aspect of this freedom, i.e. that no one is obliged to declare their religious beliefs.

21. It follows from the challenged provision that data on the religion of the respondents is also collected by census; however, other provisions of the Act must also be taken into account. In accordance with the first paragraph of Article 10, data is generally collected directly from individuals (first paragraph of Article 10). Data concerning absent household members may also be provided by the household member who is the most familiar with such data, whereas for children aged 15 years or younger, such data may be provided by one of the parents, adoptive parents or guardians (first sentence of the second paragraph of Article 10). All of the data, except for the data on religion, may be collected from the parents, adoptive parents or guardians, or other household members. Such data must be provided in person by persons aged 14 years or older, or may be provided by other persons, but only with the written approval of the person absent during the census (second sentence of the second paragraph of Article 10). The provision of Article 10 of the PHHC1A guarantees that data on religion is collected only with the written approval of persons aged 14 years or older.

The written approval of a person absent during the census must be accompanied by the absent person's written declaration of his religion. If there is no written declaration regarding his religion and no written approval for providing such data, the persons collecting data may not require such data from other adult household members or collect it even if adult household members wish to provide such. Persons who might be absent at the time the census is conducted can avoid any possible abuse and pressure by family members, which the second petitioner alleges could pose a risk, if they inform the person collecting data that they themselves will answer the census questions and provide the required data. Article 35 provides that data on religious affiliation that is collected contrary to the second and third paragraphs of Article 10 of the PHHC1A is a minor offence punishable by a fine. This ensures that the respondents will be free to decide whether to freely declare their religious beliefs or even to answer this question at all.

13 See Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-68/98.

22. The second petitioner claims that this provision, in so far as it refers to minors, violates the right to freedom of conscience. This question could only arise in relation to minors younger than 14 years of age, as the parents, adoptive parents or guardians may only provide data on behalf of these minors. This provision is not constitutionally disputable. The Constitution itself provides that children enjoy human rights and fundamental freedoms, including the right to freedom of conscience, consistent with their age and maturity (Article 56 of the Constitution). Furthermore, it imposes on parents the right and duty to maintain, educate and raise their children (first paragraph of Article 54). These issues are regulated similarly in terms of content in the Convention on the Rights of the Child, particularly Articles 5 and 14 thereof (Official Gazette SFRY, MP, No. 15/90, and Official Gazette RS, No. 35/92, MP, No. 9/92). The third paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution specifically emphasises that parents have the right to provide their children with religious and moral upbringing in accordance with their beliefs; this upbringing must be consistent with their age and maturity. Parents may influence their children's religious beliefs before the child has reached 14 years of age, which is certainly not set too high. However, this provision does not mean that parents, adoptive parents or guardians may not leave their children to decide on these issues or that they may not discuss these issues with them before answering the question. A regulation which prevents parents from raising their children as they see fit could also represent an interference with family relations. Mature parents do not require inference from the state in order to raise their children to think independently. The same also applies to religious upbringing. Therefore, the reasoning which a priori considers the question regarding religion as the reason for family disagreements is a reflection of an intolerant attitude towards this question. Moreover, the second petitioner did not substantiate why the determined age limit was set too high.
23. The challenged statutory provision does not force individuals (either directly or indirectly) to declare their religious beliefs or to disclose their religious beliefs if they do not wish to do so. However, the question arises as to whether an interference with the right determined in the second paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution occurs when the state uses a census to ask individuals about their religious beliefs, even though they are not obliged to answer such a question.
24. The provisions which protect human dignity, personality rights, a person's privacy, and safety, and which prohibit interference with the above-listed rights, hold a special position among human rights and fundamental freedoms. In accordance with the principle that everything which is not explicitly permitted is prohibited in this area, the Constitution prohibits interferences with the above-listed rights, except for those which are explicitly permitted. Individuals may be deprived of the right to privacy only when and where this right collides with the statutorily demonstrated stronger interest of others (Decision No. U-I-25/95, dated 27 November 1997, Official Gazette RS, No. 5/98, and OdlUS VI, 158). One of the aspects of a person's privacy is also religious or other beliefs, which enjoy special protection pursuant to Article 41 of the Constitution.

25. For the purpose of protecting the right to privacy, the Constitution explicitly guarantees the protection of personal data (first paragraph of Article 38). Information technology substantially facilitates the processing of data and information; however, through its expansion into all areas of life, it increases the risk of individuals no longer having the opportunity to decide for themselves when, how, and the extent to which their personal information will be provided to others. In order to prevent such risk, the Constitution (1) prohibits the use of personal data contrary to the purpose for which it was collected, (2) subjects the collection, processing, designated use, supervision, and protection of the confidentiality of personal data to statutory regulation, and (3) grants everyone the right to access the collected personal data that relates to them, and the right to judicial protection in the event of any misuse of such data. According to the settled Constitutional Court case law, interferences are permitted provided that they are consistent with the principle of proportionality. This means that the limitation must be required and necessary in order to reach the pursued, constitutionally legitimate aim, and must be in proportion to the importance of such aim (third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution).
26. The Convention on the Protection of Individuals Regarding the Automatic Processing of Data (Official Gazette RS, No. 11/94, MP, No. 3/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CDP) determines similar requirements. In addition to the requirement that personal data must be collected and processed fairly and lawfully, the CDP also requires the adoption of measures which guarantee that personal data be stored for definitive and lawful purposes, and that only such data be processed which is appropriate, suitable and not exaggerated in view of the purpose of its collection (Article 5 in conjunction with Article 4). The CDP determines even stricter conditions for personal data which refer to racial origin, political, religious or other beliefs, medical condition, sexual preference, and criminal judgments (including convictions). According to Article 6 of CDP, such data may not be processed automatically if national legislation does not determine appropriate protection thereof.
27. It follows from the aforementioned provisions of the Constitution and CDP that each instance of the collection and processing of personal data represents an interference with the constitutional right to protection of privacy and with the right of individuals to keep their personal data private if they do not wish others to have access to such (information privacy). However, the right to information privacy is not unlimited or absolute. Therefore, individuals must accept restrictions of or allow interferences with their information privacy in the overriding general interest, provided that the constitutionally determined conditions have been fulfilled. Interference is permitted if a statute precisely defines which data may be collected and processed, the purpose for which it may be used, and prescribes control over the collection, processing, and use, as well as protection of the confidentiality of the collected personal data. According to the settled case law of the Constitutional Court, interference is allowed provided that it is in compliance with the principle of proportionality. This means that the limitation must be required and necessary in order to reach the pursued, constitutionally legitimate aim, and must be in proportion to the importance of such aim (third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution).

28. The census shall be conducted in a manner such that respondents must correctly and fully answer specific questions contained in the census questionnaire without being obliged to answer the question on religion (first paragraph of Article 10 of the PHHC1A). A specimen census questionnaire, which was submitted at the public hearing by the Government's representative, has shown that respondents may choose the answer: "I do not wish to answer this question". Although they are not obliged to answer the question about religion, individuals are nevertheless, by the question alone, put in a position where they must decide whether or not to answer it, and their answer or the fact that they did not wish to answer the question will be noted on the census questionnaire. This means that census data will also be collected on the proportion of respondents who did not wish to answer the question about religion. This fact was also confirmed at the public hearing by the Government's representative, who stated that the fact that the specific number of individuals who choose not to answer the question also represents data. Each respondent will be required to at least provide information as to whether they are willing to answer the question about religion. Therefore, the very fact that the individual is asked about religion in a census must be considered an interference with the right referred to in the second paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution. However, a review must be conducted on whether such interference was admissible in the present case.
29. On the basis of the second paragraph of Article 38 of the Constitution, the collection, processing, designated use, supervision, and protection of the confidentiality of personal data shall be provided by law. Article 23 of the PHHC1A provides that data determined by statute, except for the data required for establishing the buildings and housing registers,<sup>14</sup> shall be collected and used only for statistical purposes.
30. According to the provisions of the National Statistics Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 45/95 etc. – hereinafter referred to as the NSA, third paragraph of Article 33), the purpose of statistics is to provide and demonstrate aggregate data on mass phenomena. The purpose of the collection and use of data determined by the PHHC1A is not constitutionally disputable. However, the question arises in this regard as to whether a purpose determined in such manner is imprecise, generalised or undefined since it does not guarantee that the data is linked to a specific and predetermined purpose. The answer to the aforementioned question must be based on the role and meaning of statistics for national policy.<sup>15</sup> Ensuring social, economic, and cultural development is a fundamental and permanent task of the state. Comprehensive and continuous information which is as precise and up to date as possible is required in order to carry out these tasks. Censuses (Article 26 of the NSA lists them as an example of comprehensive periodic statistical research) represent a milestone in the history of every state, since a comparison of the results of consecutive censuses creates an image of the development of the population over the decades and centuries. It is at the heart of statistics that data, following statistical processing, is used for various purposes and tasks which are not specifically predetermined. Data collected by census is a fundamental aid to the state in decision-making in numerous areas and when predicting future development. This data is therefore used to plan the number and location of various institutions (kindergartens, schools, hospitals, homes for the elderly) and to evaluate future public transport requirements; it is also used for housing construction, employment programs and numerous other areas. The collected data also serves as a basis for numerous other research projects and studies. Therefore, with regard to data collection for statistical purposes, it is not possible to require the data to be narrowly and specifically linked to a specific purpose. Consequently, specific data is collected, processed, and stored for possible subsequent usage. The requirement for the purpose to be described specifically (precisely) and the strict prohibition of the collection of personal data for possible subsequent usage, may only apply to the collection of data for non-statistical purposes (in case of which the purpose of such collection and use are precisely determined in advance), and may not apply to the collection of data by census that creates a database for further statistical research as well as a database for policy planning based on reliable findings on the number and social structure of the population.<sup>16</sup>

14 The Constitutional Court has separately evaluated the admissibility of the use of the data collected for this purpose (see chapter B – V of the present reasoning).

15 The second paragraph of Article 1 of the NSA determines that, through national statistics, the bodies and public administration organisations, the private sector, and the public are provided with data on conditions and trends in the areas of the economy, demographics, society, the environment, and natural resources.

31. Owing to the nature of the collection of data for statistical purposes, it is not possible to predetermine all the ways in which the collected data will be used and integrated. When reviewing whether specific data is appropriate, account must be taken of the specific purpose for which it may be used. The collection of data on religion is appropriate and necessary in order to reach a statutorily determined purpose, i.e. to provide aggregate data on mass phenomena within the society. As the census is conducted for statistical purposes and this purpose cannot be interpreted strictly, and furthermore as data is collected, processed, and stored for possible subsequent usage not only for the needs of the state authorities or organisations of public importance, but also for the needs of the economy and the general public, the assessment as to whether the collection of the aforementioned data is necessary also cannot be narrow. It is appropriate that the census collects data which is not only important for further economic development and planning, but also data on the structure of the population from a cultural, historical, and sociological perspective. A census is usually conducted every ten years, meaning that such data also becomes important for historical and other socially useful and necessary studies. In the present review, the Constitutional Court cannot ignore the fact that this period is also the first decade of Slovenia's independence as a sovereign state. From a historical perspective, this period almost entirely coincides with the period in which democratic social order was introduced in Slovenia. These circumstances give the data obtained by this census a particularly significant meaning. More specifically, it presents not only an opportunity to preserve periodic verifications of data of the same kind as that which was collected in the previous census in 1991, but also an opportunity for the state to store the obtained data as part of its national heritage for future verifications and studies.

32. The Constitutional Court is not required to review whether it would be more appropriate if the question referred to “affiliation with a religious community”, as alleged by the second petitioner, who substantiates his viewpoint with the fact that it is only permitted to inquire about facts and not (personal) beliefs. It is possible to confirm the petitioner’s viewpoint in so far as it refers to the questions which respondents are obliged to answer, and that if they refuse to do so they can even be criminally sanctioned. However, as has been stressed several times before, respondents are not obliged to answer the question about religion.<sup>17</sup> Furthermore, it cannot be deemed crucial for the present review whether or not data on religion is collected by censuses in other countries. Owing to the nature of the collection of data for statistical purposes, the Constitutional Court also cannot review the extent to which the collected data is reliable, or the extent to which, or for what statistical purposes, it will be appropriate to process such.
33. However, the question arises as to whether it would be possible to collect data on religion in a different manner which would represent less of an interference with the constitutional rights of the persons affected. A similar question regarding interference with information privacy may arise in relation to all the data collected by census. Since the constitutionality of the collection of other data is not the subject of review in the present case, the Constitutional Court was not required to provide an answer to this question. However, when reviewing the question regarding religion and taking, as a starting-point, that it is clear that the collection of data by census cannot in itself be inconsistent with the Constitution, the Constitutional Court also had to consider the fact that much of the other data included in the PHHC1A can also be collected by other methods. Without doubt, there are other methods of statistical research or data collection which are conducted anonymously and on the basis of samples. The Government also acknowledged this fact in its opinion. However, these methods cannot replace a census as a complete database, and are predisposed to containing errors. A census includes the entire population and not just a selected sample. The way in which the data obtained from the collected sample is extrapolated to the entire population is a particular problem. Such extrapolation can be subjected to substantially greater manipulation than the interpretation of data collected from the entire population. There is no perfect alternative to a census. This is also acknowledged by the positions of the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations, dated 19 July 1995, which recommended that the member states of the UN carry out a census of the population and housing, and thereby respect international and regional recommendations.<sup>18</sup> A census is usually conducted

17 The Constitutional Court of Germany also decided similarly. It found that the duty to provide accurate data on “legal affiliation or non-affiliation with a religious community” does not interfere with the right to expression as it concerns the provision of facts, which has nothing to do with forming an opinion (see Para. B. I. of the reasoning of the decision of the Constitutional Court of Germany).

18 Priporočila za popise prebivalstva in stanovanj okoli leta 2000 v državah članicah Ekonomske komisije Združenih narodov za Evropo, Statistični urad Republike Slovenije, 1999 [The Recommendations for the Censuses of Population and Housing conducted in around the year 2000 in the Member States of the United Nations Economic Com-every ten years, which also gives the collected data historical significance. Furthermore, data on phenomena that are not widespread among the population cannot be obtained by research conducted on a selected sample. Therefore, the collection of data by other methods is not yet an appropriate alternative to collecting data by census.

34. Collecting data on religion by census also does not represent a disproportionate interference with the protection of information privacy in the narrower sense. The right of individuals to refuse to answer such a question, and the duty of the persons collecting data to inform individuals of this right, are guaranteed. Furthermore, it is guaranteed that data regarding the religion of persons older than 14 years of age who are not present at the time the census is carried out may be collected only on the basis of their written consent (Article 10 of the PHHC1A). This ensures that individuals decide themselves whether or not to allow the interference with their privacy, i.e. whether to provide such data or not (see Paragraph 21 of the present reasoning). It is of course clear that the census must be conducted in a manner such that individuals are free to decide whether or not they will answer these questions. It must be ensured that the personal data collected by census be used exclusively for statistical purposes and that it is stored in anonymous form. This applies to all data collected by census. Provided that the census is conducted in this manner, individuals are in a position similar to that of interviewees who take part in a study as part of a sample. The PHHC1A guarantees such position.<sup>19</sup> In the present case, while reviewing whether the question about religion interferes to a disproportionately severe extent with the right to protection of information privacy, the Constitutional Court was also required to take into consideration the fact that some religious communities, as forms of association for expressing religion or ideology with others, also wanted data regarding religion to be collected by census, and that none of the religious communities were opposed to this. Such preference represents an element of the positive aspect of freedom of religion for religious communities. It is true that this cannot represent a constitutional basis and that it would therefore be constitutionally necessary to also establish such data by census; however, it is an important factor in assessing whether the Constitutional Court can abrogate the provision which envisages collecting such data after the legislature had already decided that the state shall collect such. The positive aspect of freedom of religion is inter alia expressed in the requirement that the state, and thereby the Constitutional Court, when deciding on a matter, must guarantee tolerance between the followers of different beliefs.

mission for Europe, Statistical Office of the Republic of Slovenia, 1999] (Metodološko gradivo [Methodology Papers], No. 7). The recommendation classifies the census into core and non-core topics. The core topics should be collected by all states, whereas the collection of non-core topics (which include data on national origin, language and religion) is left to the decision of each individual state (p. 12). Regarding the question of religion, the report states that those states which collect such data usually inquire about formal membership of a church or religious community, participation in the life of the church or religious community, and religious beliefs. The recommendation states that if only one question is posed, the question should be about formal membership of a church or a religious community, but that the answer "none" should also be permitted (p. 26).

B – IV

35. Since the nature of the collection of data for statistical purposes is such that it is not possible to define in advance all the possibilities for the use and integration of the collected data, it must be ensured that individuals do not become a casualty of such data in its collection and processing. It must primarily be ensured that the collected data and its integration with data from other databases cannot be used to piece together the personality of an individual. In order to ensure the right to information privacy, special measures for carrying out and organizing the collection and processing of data are also required due to the fact that there is a risk that the data could be ascribed to individuals during collection, and partly also during storage. At the same time, a regulation is required that will ensure deletion of the data required to aid the census process (i.e. identifiers) and which could easily enable deanonymisation (e.g. name, address and identification number) and deletion of the list of persons who carry out the census. In order to protect the right to information privacy, it is necessary to protect the data obtained for statistical purposes as a secret for as long as the data is or can be linked to a specific person. Furthermore, it must be ensured that data collected for statistical purposes be used only for these purposes, which means above all that such data may not be provided to other users in a form which could enable the identification of the persons to whom it refers. It is equally crucial to re-establish data anonymity as soon as it is possible to do so, and to implement measures which prevent the re-personalisation of data.
36. The second petitioner believes that the provisions of the PHHC1A do not guarantee such. It is alleged that Articles 10 to 13 are unconstitutional as they allow the collection of personal data not only from the census respondent but also from other persons (from other household members), and from all the existing official and administrative databases of the public and private sectors. Furthermore, he claims that the provisions of Articles 24, 25, 28, and 29 do not suffice for the effective protection and security of the collected personal data, as they ensure protection only in a declaratory fashion.
37. The PDPA, the application of which is also explicitly provided by the PHHC1A, provides that personal data is, as a general rule, collected directly from individuals (first paragraph of Article 8). A statute may determine in specific cases that personal data also be collected from other persons, or obtained from existing databases of personal data, in the event of which also the person or database, the type of personal data, and the manner in which the data is to be collected must be determined by such statute; furthermore, the purpose for which the data was collected must also be taken into account (second paragraph of Article 8). Particularly sensitive data, which also includes data regarding religion, may be collected from other persons or obtained or integrated from the existing databases only with the written consent of the individual to whom such data refers. Written consent is not required if the data is intended for use for statistical or scientific research purposes in a manner that does not allow for individuals to be identified (third paragraph of Article 8).
38. Articles 11, 12, 13, and 28 of the PHHC1A regulate the collection and integration of personal data from various databases that contain personal data. It is alleged that the forementioned articles are unconstitutional because the Act does not provide effective measures to ensure the effective protection and security of the collected data. As stated in Paragraph 37 of the present reasoning, these provisions originate from the provisions of Article 8 of the PDPA. The obligation of the Office to apply the provisions of the PDPA is also imposed by the second paragraph of Article 32 of the NSA.<sup>20</sup> The PHHC1A therefore determines the type of personal data and the databases from which data may be collected. It follows from Article 11 that only data which is necessary in order to conduct the census may be collected. Such data is determined by Article 6 of the PHHC1A, which determines which data may be collected by census. Data controllers of personal data databases are obliged to supply such data to the Office; however they are not obliged to provide all the data that they keep in their databases – only data which is necessary for conducting the census.

39. It is only possible to collect data by census that is determined by the PHHC1A and for the purpose determined by the PHHC1A, and can be collected either directly from individuals, or from other persons (close members of the household), or from other databases that contain personal data. By integrating data collected in such a manner, the Office creates a post-census database (collection) (Article 28 of the PHHC1A). The PHHC1A determines that the protection and security of personal data collected in this manner is ensured in accordance with the statute which regulates the protection of personal data (Articles 24 and 25). The provision, which is the same in terms of content, can also be found in the NSA, which applies to all statistical research carried out by the Office (first paragraph of Articles 41 and 42).
40. First, Article 9 of the PDPA, which provides that personal data may be processed only for the purposes determined by the statute, must be taken into account. The PHHC1A determines that data collected by census be used for statistical purposes. The third paragraph of Article 33 of the NSA determines that the statistical purpose is the provision and production of aggregate data on mass phenomena. Data collected by census may therefore not be used for other purposes. From this, it can be inferred that there is a prohibition on the publication of personal data (Article 29 of the PHHC1A) and a prohibition on providing data from statistical registers to users (also from a database created according to Article 28 of the PHHC1A) in a form and in such a manner to enable the identification of the persons to whom the data refers (second paragraph of Article 33 of the NSA). Data collected by the census may therefore be published and provided to other users only in aggregate form (Article 30 of the PHHC1A), i.e. in a form and manner which precludes the identification of the persons to whom the data refers (fifth paragraph of Article 34 of the NSA).
41. The provisions according to which all data collected by census is an official secret and according to which it is the duty of all persons who take part in conducting the census to protect all data as an official secret (Articles 26 and 27 of the PHHC1A), as well as the criminal provisions for violations in relation to official secrets, are also important for personal data protection. Article 43 of the NSA provides the same mutatis mutandis. Article 48 of the NSA, which determines that administrative and other state authorities, local community authorities, providers of public services, and bearers of public authority may not use statistical data to determine the rights and obligations of the persons to whom such data refers, is also important for the protection of individuals.

42. The PHHC1A obligates the Office and all persons conducting the census to determine, in accordance with the PDPA, appropriate measures for the protection of personal data and ensure that such measures be respected (Article 24). Pursuant to the provisions of Article 13 of the PDPA, these are mainly organisational and logicaltechnical procedures and measures, which protect personal data, prevent data from being destroyed, accidentally or intentionally and without authorisation, altered or lost and processed without authorisation, in the following manner: by securing the premises, equipment and system software; by protecting the applied software through which personal data is processed; by preventing unauthorised access to personal data during its transmission; and by enabling a subsequent determination of when particular data was used or entered into the database of personal data, and by whom. Procedures and measures for the protection of personal data are prescribed by the Office (Article 15 of the PHHC1A).
43. The provision of the first paragraph of Article 10 of the PDPA, which provides that personal data may be stored for only as long as required to achieve the purpose for which it was processed, is important in order to ensure the protection of personal data or the right to information privacy. The PHHC1A does not contain any explicit provisions in relation to the duration of storing the collected personal data. It only determines the purpose for which the data is collected and the timeframe within which it must be processed and made accessible to the public, naturally only in an aggregate form. Therefore, Article 31 determines that the Office is obliged to publish full and detailed results of the census within two years of the completion thereof. Upon the expiration of this time limit, the purpose of the census is achieved. The second paragraph of Article 10 of the PDPA provides that, after fulfilling the purpose for which the personal data is processed, it must be deleted from the database or access to it must be blocked, unless otherwise provided by law for a specific type of personal data, and must therefore be taken into account in order to answer the question as to how long personal data may be stored. Point 9.1 of the Recommendation similarly provides that, in every research project, it must be determined as precisely as possible whether data will be deleted upon completion of the project and, if so, which data will be deleted, which data will be stored in anonymous form, and which data will be stored in the form it was collected, and under what conditions. The PHHC1A does not determine whether personal data is deleted or access to it blocked, or which personal data is deleted, blocked or stored in the form in which it was collected. This therefore represents a legal gap which may be filled by interpretation. The purpose of processing personal data collected by census is achieved when this data is published in aggregate form after its processing (Articles 30 and 31 of the PHHC1A). Pursuant to the first paragraph of Article 10 of the PDPA, personal data may be stored only as long as this is necessary to achieve such purpose. When the purpose is achieved it is deleted from the database of personal data or access to it is blocked (second paragraph of Article 10 of the PDPA), unless otherwise provided by statute. A statute which might provide otherwise is the PHHC1A. More specifically, the PHHC1A could have explicitly determined the duration and manner in which personal data is stored. As it did not provide such, Article 10 of the PDPA must be applied. It follows from Article 31 of the PHHC1A that the Office must complete the processing of the collected personal data within two years after the completed census. By publishing the census results, the purpose of processing data collected by the census is achieved. The Office must therefore comply with the second paragraph of Article 10 of the PDPA upon the expiration of the two year time-limit determined in Article 31 of the PHHC1A.

44. Given the aforementioned, the challenged provisions of Articles 11 to 13, 15, 24, 25, 28, and 29 are not inconsistent with the Constitution. The protection of personal data collected by census is ensured to an appropriate degree if the other provisions of the PHHC1A and NSA, and particularly the provisions of the PDPA, are respected.

B – V

45. The second petitioner challenges Article 5 and the part of Article 23 of the PHHC1A which refers to the definition of a special (additional) purpose for the collection of census data, i.e. for the purpose of establishing the building and housing register and the household register. Article 5 determines that buildings are given identification numbers for the purpose of establishing the building and housing register; Article 23 specifies the data which will be used for establishing the building and housing register and the household register. In the petitioner's opinion, it is inadmissible to use the collected data for other purposes, especially for carrying out administrative tasks.
46. Article 23 of the PHHC1A provides that census data which is collected for statistical purposes and which is precisely specified in the second paragraph of Article 23 may also be used for the purpose of establishing the aforementioned administrative databases. The establishment of the building and housing register and the household register does not fall within the competence of the Office. This is evident from the fourth paragraph of Article 23 of the PHHC1A. The housing register is regulated by the Housing Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 18/91 etc. – hereinafter referred to as the HA), whereas the household register is regulated by the Residence Registration Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 9/01 – hereinafter referred to as RRA). The aforementioned acts include provisions regarding the data which is collected in the registers, and provisions regarding the database controllers. This refers to the databases required by administrative bodies for carrying out their administrative tasks.
47. Pursuant to the third paragraph of Article 19 of the RRA, the household register is kept in the framework of the permanent residence register. This register contains certain data which is anyway kept in the permanent residence register. The provisions of Article 18 of the RRA regulate the function of the database controller of the permanent residence register, the purpose and the method of data collection and processing, storage, designated use, and provision of data to other users. Under the conditions determined in the RRA and taking into account the provisions of the PDPA, the seventh paragraph of Article 18 of the RRA permits extensive access to personal data which is kept in the permanent residence register and other registers (e.g. the household register) to those using such data for the purpose of carrying out administrative and other tasks.

48. Pursuant to Article 10 of the HA, the housing register is kept for the municipality area. The register is kept and maintained by the municipality (Article 97 of HA). The state keeps a central housing register, maintains a complete information system in relation to housing and ensures its development (Article 75 of the HA). Furthermore, Article 10 of the HA determines which data is collected and in what manner, and regulates the access of users to such data.
49. The question is whether it is allowed to provide other users with personal data that can be ascribed to individual, which was obtained for statistical purposes in order for them to carry out administrative and other tasks, and whether the provision of such data entails an interference with the right to information privacy.
50. The aforementioned is clearly contrary to the principles and purpose of national statistics, as determined by the NSA. The purpose of national statistics is to provide various users (first paragraph of Article 1 of the NSA) with data in aggregate form on mass phenomena in different areas of life. The purpose of national statistics is not to provide data to state authorities, local community authorities or bearers of public authorities for the performance of their administrative or other tasks. Therefore, in several places, particularly the second paragraph of Article 33, the NSA determines that the Office may not provide data from statistical registers to users in a form and manner which allows the individuals to whom the data refers to be identified (also provided by the fifth paragraph of Article 34). Furthermore, the NSA determines that data from statistical registers may only be used for statistical purposes. Thereby, trust in the objectivity, impartiality, and independence of national statistics is ensured (first paragraph of Article 2 of the NSA). In this way, it is possible for national statistics to have access to all sources of data in order to provide for aggregate (de-individualised) data, and individuals are guaranteed protection of their right to information privacy. It is evident from the legislative materials of the NSA adoption procedure that the legislature wanted to enact the principle of the separation of statistics from the performance of administrative tasks. In these legislative materials, explicit reference is made to the fact that national statistics collects data and uses such data exclusively for statistical purposes. However, for the purpose of performance of administrative tasks the state must collect data itself.<sup>21</sup>
51. The regulation in the PHHC1A which allows for data collected by census for statistical purposes to also be used for other purposes is inconsistent with the Constitution (second paragraph of Article 38). The collection, processing, designated use, supervision, and protection of the confidentiality of personal data is regulated by law. The fundamental requirement, which follows from the principles of a state governed by the rule of law, is that the law must be clear and comprehensible to every citizen. The simultaneous collection of data, together or in parallel, for various purposes with different requirements, conditions and with different possibilities how the collected data may be integrated and used, may result in vagueness and doubts over the purposes for which the data will be used. The collection and use of data for statistical purposes is entirely different from the collection of data for the purpose of carrying out administrative tasks. Therefore it does matter whether data which is collected for statistical purposes and should only be used for statistical purposes is also used for the purpose of carrying out administrative tasks. The purpose of data collection and use should be clearly and specifically determined when collecting data in order to carry out administrative tasks. Thus, it should be clear from the law as to what the specific purpose for using the data is, and who will be able to use it. The purpose may not be specified in general but so as to be clear for which administrative and other tasks the data will be used. Such requirement also follows from Article 48 of the NSA, which determines that statistical data may not be used to determine the rights and obligations of individuals to which such data refers (similarly to point 4.1 of the Recommendation). Furthermore, it is not sufficiently clear from the provisions of the PHHC1A as to what the connection is with the statute regulating this area, which should constitute the legal basis for establishing the aforementioned registers and should regulate all the issues that are defined in the second paragraph of Article 38 of the Constitution. Therefore, the provision that data collected by census may be used for no more than two years after the census (fourth paragraph of Article 23 of the PHHC1A) also indicates that the legislature wanted to enable the use of the collected data in order to establish the aforementioned registers if need be and if the competent ministries so decided. This method of collecting and using personal data collected for statistical purposes does not guarantee the protection of information privacy, as it does not meet the requirements determined in Paragraph 35 of the present reasoning. Furthermore, it is evident from the draft PHHC1A-A, which argued for the collection of specific data in order to establish the building and housing register, that such data is envisaged to be collected for possible subsequent usage. It reads as follows: "There is an ongoing discussion among the competent institutions regarding the concept of creating a building and housing register and the activities that are required before such register is established. These entail the physical identification of housing units or other partial units in multi-housing buildings, meaning that every apartment is affixed with a plate with a serial identifier which is connected to a superior code (a house number and the connection to the centroid). Such identification would enable everyone who collects any data regarding apartments, their maintenance or inhabitants, to "hang" such data or bind them to physically permanently maintained identifiers. The result is the model of the core of identifiers of buildings and housing registers which will enable the periodic receipt of data from the various operating databases related to the apartments. In order to do this, it is necessary for the Government to adopt a decree specifying the manner in which the identifiers of buildings and housing, and the connection between identifiers used for different databases, are to be determined.”

52. The provisions of Article 23 of the PHHC1A which also permit the use of data collected by census for other purposes and not only for the statistical purposes for which it is collected, and the provision of Article 5 of the PHHC1A, do not guarantee protection of the right to information privacy and are therefore inconsistent with Article 38 of the Constitution. Consequently, the Constitutional Court abrogated that part of these provisions.

C

53. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of Articles 21 and 43 of the CCA and the sixth indent of Article 52 of the Rules of Procedure of the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Slovenia (Official Gazette RS, No. 49/98), composed of: Dr Dragica Wedam-Lukić, President, and Judges Dr Janez Čebulj, Dr Zvonko Fišer, Lojze Janko, Dr Ciril Ribičič, Dr Mirjam Škrk, Franc Testen, and Dr Lojze Ude. Point 1 of the operative provisions was adopted by five votes to three. Judges Fišer, Ribičič, and Ude voted against and submitted dissenting opinions, and Judge Wedam-Lukić submitted a concurring opinion. Point 2 of the operative provisions was adopted by seven votes to one. Judge Ude voted against and submitted a dissenting opinion. Point 3 of the operative provisions was adopted by six votes to two. Judges Čebulj and Testen voted against. Judge Čebulj submitted a dissenting opinion.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE DR ČEBULJ, JOINED BY JUDGE TESTEN

In the present case, I voted against Point 3 of the operative provisions (and consequently against Point 4), by which the Constitutional Court abrogated Articles 5 and 23 of the Population, Household and Housing Census in the Republic of Slovenia 2001 Act (hereinafter referred to as the Act).

Article 5 determined that buildings are given an identification number for the purpose of establishing the building and housing register, and Article 23 determined the data to be used for the purpose of establishing the building and housing register and the household register. In this way, the Act allowed for the data collected for the census to be used for an additional purpose. This purpose was not only to obtain the census results, but also to establish both of the aforementioned registers. The majority of the Constitutional Court judges took the view that this was inconsistent with Article 38 of the Constitution (Paragraphs 45 to 52 of the Decision’s reasoning). I do not agree with this conclusion and its reasoning.

The Constitutional Court simply notes that the establishment of both registers does not fall within the competence of the Statistical Office. It also notes that the Housing Act and the Residence Registration Act serve, respectively, as the statutory basis for establishing the registers. The aforementioned acts provide which data is kept in registers, the designated use of data, and provisions regarding the database controllers (Paragraphs 46 and 47 of the reasoning). It is, of course, a fact that such data is used for administrative purposes. However, the challenged Article 23 did not determine that such data be used for administrative purposes.

In the present review, the question was raised before the Constitutional Court as to whether it is allowed to provide other users with personal data that can be ascribed to individuals, which was obtained for statistical purposes in order to carry out administrative tasks, and whether the provision of such data represents an interference with the right to privacy (Paragraph 49 of the reasoning).

The Constitutional Court stated that the regulation in the Act which enables data collected by census for statistical purposes to also be used for other purposes is inconsistent with the second paragraph of Article 38 of the Constitution. However, in the continuation of the same part of the reasoning, at the beginning of which the aforementioned statement was written (Paragraph 51 of the reasoning), the Constitutional Court wrote: “The collection and use of data for statistical purposes is entirely different from the collection of data for the purpose of carrying out administrative tasks. Therefore it does matter whether data which is collected for statistical purposes and should only be used for statistical purposes is also used for the purpose of carrying out administrative tasks. In such case the purpose of the collection and use of data should be clearly and specifically determined. It should therefore be clear from the law as to what the specific purpose for using the data is, and who will be able to use such. The purpose may not be specified in general but so as to be clear for which administrative and other tasks the data will be used for.”

It follows from the above-cited quote that the Constitutional Court does not state that the use of data collected for statistical purposes for other purposes is inconsistent with the second paragraph of Article 38 of the Constitution. It is therefore not a matter of inconsistency with the part of the first paragraph of Article 38 which prohibits the use of personal data for a purpose that is different to that for which it was collected. This is not corroborated by the statement (Paragraph 50 of the reasoning) that this is contrary to the principles and purpose of statistics. In my opinion, the purposes are incompatible if the (subsequent) purpose of use is such to (be able to) change the contents or the meaning of data. However, this is not the case here.

It is alleged that an inconsistency exists only in the fact that it is not evident from the statute for which specific purposes the data will be used, and who will be allowed to use data.

Article 23 of the Act determined in detail the purpose for which the collected data may be used. It would be used for the purpose of establishing both registers. It also determined who could use them: the bodies in charge of establishing the registers. Lastly, it determined how long these bodies would be allowed to use such data: up to two years after the completed census. With regard to the second paragraph of Article 38 of the Constitution, this suffices. This provision does not require that all the elements be determined and regulated in one single statute (in this case, the elements include: the purpose of using the data once it is contained in the registers; the users of the data that will be contained in the registers; and ensuring data protection). Furthermore, the Constitutional Court did not require such (see Paragraphs 35 to 44 of the reasoning). Whether these issues, which are regulated in the Housing Act or in the Residence Registration Act, are regulated in accordance with the requirements of Article 38 of the Constitution could be the subject of a separate constitutional review which does not influence the constitutionality of Article 23 of the Act.

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE DR WEDAM-LUKIĆ

I voted for all the points of the operative provisions of the Decision and I also entirely agree with its supporting reasons. In this concurring opinion, I merely wish to explain some further reasons which influenced my decision.

Whilst I had no doubts regarding Points 2 and 3 of the operative provisions, I initially, however, had some difficulties in deciding whether the fact that religion is inquired about during the census (fourteenth paragraph of Article 6 of the Population, Households and Housing Census in the Republic of Slovenia 2001 Act) is consistent with the Constitution (Point 1 of the operative provisions).

During the discussion, I stressed on several occasions that the key question was which data may be collected by census: either data which the state needs in order to carry out its tasks, especially for planning future development, or data which also forms the basis for other research and studies. The question arose as to whether, with regard to Article 7 of the Constitution, data on religion could be of any importance for carrying out state tasks (in this sense, data on religious affiliation would perhaps be even more problematic). The aforementioned thesis was not supported during the discussion. The joint position was adopted that the collection of data on religion by census is not inconsistent with Article 7 of the Constitution, and that it does not represent data in which the state should have no interest and about which it should not inquire, under the condition that everyone is guaranteed the right not to answer such question. In reviewing whether this is a violation of the second paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution (freedom of conscience) or Article 38 of the Constitution (protection of personal data), the only difference between the present majority decision and the decision defended by the minority was the fact that, in the opinion of the minority, such interference did not pass the test of proportionality in the narrower sense, since the same aim could be achieved through less stringent means:

through surveys in which anonymity would be ensured during the data collection phase, or through sample research in which more appropriate answers could be obtained by posing additional questions. I did not find such reasoning convincing. The difference between a census and a survey lies in the fact that an individual must take part in a census (even if they are not required to answer specific questions), whereas participation in a survey is not obligatory. This is also the reason why the Constitutional Court deemed that inquiring about religion by way of a census is an interference with the right of an individual to information privacy, even if answering this question is not obligatory. As stated in the reasoning of the majority decision, an important difference is also the fact that the census includes the entire population and so it is possible to detect phenomena which would be difficult or even impossible to detect through sample based research. Therefore, a census can only be likened to research conducted on the entire population and, in such case, I do not see convincing reasons to support the position that this research would entail a lesser interference with the right of the individual to information privacy. As the Constitutional Court declared in Point 2 of the operative provisions, which was upheld by all the judges but one, the Act ensures appropriate protection of data collected by census. Naturally, if the Constitutional Court had decided differently in this Point of the operative provisions, the question would have arisen as to whether the collection of other data, which the respondent is obliged to provide, also entails a disproportionate interference with the right of the individual to information privacy.

In deciding as to whether the collection of any personal data by census is admissible, I believe it is crucial that the collected data be used solely for statistical purposes and that the use of specific data regarding a specific person be rendered impossible. Therefore, I also consider the decision in Point 3 of the operative provisions to be essential, by which the Constitutional Court abrogated the provisions which allowed for some data collected by census to be used for establishing the building and housing registers. In my opinion, a census, as the most comprehensive method of data collection, passes constitutional review only under the condition that it remains within the limits determined by the fundamental purpose for which it is conducted. More specifically, any “mixing” of censuses and the collection of data for other purposes could endanger the standards which must apply to the collection of data by census in order for such to remain consistent with the Constitution.

Lastly, I would like to stress that I am aware of the fact that the question about religion (and national origin, which the Constitutional Court did not review) had already been politicised before the census was carried out, and that this fact may have influenced the reliability of the data collected. Nevertheless, I believe that experts should resolve this issue and take this into account in the interpretation of the collected data; however, this cannot be of relevance to the decision of the Constitutional Court.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE DR UDE,
JOINED BY JUDGE DR RIBIČIČ, EXCEPT FOR PARAGRAPH 5 OF THIS DISSENTING OPINION

I voted against Points 1 and 2 of the operative provisions of the Decision; at the same time, I argued in favour of the Constitutional Court reviewing the constitutionality of the question about national origin determined in the thirteenth indent of Article 6 of the PHHC1A. I provide below the reasons for my position:

1. The Constitutional Court should also review the constitutionality of the question about national origin determined in the thirteenth indent of Article 6 of the PHHC1A. After accepting the petition for consideration, the Constitutional Court held a public hearing, where it discussed in an adversarial manner the question about national origin. It is true that the petitioner, M. Krivic, explicitly stated that he did not challenge the aforementioned provision (as regards this question, his petition was unclear); however I believe this not to be a sufficient reason to take this position, which was explained in Paragraph 9 of the reasoning and according to which the Constitutional Court will not review the constitutionality of the question about national origin. Furthermore, the conditions for reviewing the question about national origin sua sponte on the basis of correlation, as determined in Article 30 of the Constitutional Court Act, are met. This Article provides that, according to the rule of correlation, the Constitutional Court may also review the constitutionality of other provisions of the same regulation sua sponte if the challenged provisions, and such other provisions the Constitutional Court itself decides to review by applying the rule of correlation, are mutually related and should this be required to resolve the case. In my opinion, the questions on religious belief and national origin are mutually related, not only because they are included in the same census but also because they are substantively related, as they refer to the personal beliefs of an individual. Often these questions even overlap. Different religions, such as Catholicism, Eastern Orthodoxy, Protestantism, and Islam, were characteristic of the former Yugoslav nations and nationalities. Although one of the petitioners (M. Krivic) believes that the constitutional regulations which refer to the right to profess religious beliefs and the right to declare national origin differ in terms of substance, I am of a different opinion. Regarding the right to freedom of conscience (Article 41 of the Constitution), it is true that the second paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution explicitly provides that no one shall be obliged to declare his religious or other beliefs. Article 61 does not include any such explicit provision; however, it clearly follows from this constitutional provision, which reads that everyone has the right to freely express affiliation with his nation or nationality, that individuals are also not obliged to express such affiliation. It is clear that the right to “free expression of one’s affiliation with his nation or national community” also includes the right not to express such affiliation in a census. This is also how this right is treated in point 29 of the census questionnaire. Moreover, there is also no consensus in the public regarding the question whether asking individuals about their national origin in a census is constitutionally admissible. To avoid this question when reviewing the constitutional admissibility of a census, which is generally conducted every ten years, leads to this discussion becoming merely academic.

2. In my opinion (as also established by the majority decision), every instance of the collection and processing of personal data is an interference with the constitutional right to the protection of privacy and personality rights referred to in Article 35 of the Constitution, whereas questions about religious belief and national origin also represent an interference with the constitutional right to freedom of conscience referred to in Article 41 of the Constitution and the constitutional right to expression of national affiliation referred to in Article 61 of the Constitution. However, the majority took the view that an individual must accept limitations to privacy of information and must allow interferences therewith if this is in the overriding general interest or if constitutionally determined conditions have been met. The majority decision established that interference is admissible since the (statistical) purpose of the collection, providing “aggregate” data on mass phenomena, is not disputed, and that the interference is required and necessary because this data could not otherwise be obtained (Paragraph 33 of the reasoning). In the opinion of the majority, the interference is also not disproportionate as an individual may decline to answer the question about religious belief (here I note that the constitutional decision refers only to the question about religious belief and not also to the question about national origin, which was because the majority avoided a review of the constitutionality of this question).

Owing to the fact that the questions, both of which are problematic in my opinion, concern data on an individual’s personal beliefs, which could not be collected in an appropriate statistical manner, I do not find the majority’s reasoning to be convincing. If an individual chooses not to answer the question about religious beliefs and the question about national origin, the statistical data will not be able to precisely represent these two phenomena. The statistical purpose of including both questions in the census questionnaire is therefore not achieved, and consequently such question is neither necessary nor required. The assertion that data could not otherwise be obtained (through sampling) is not true.

The statement (Paragraph 33 of the reasoning) that data on phenomena that are not widespread among the population cannot be obtained through research conducted on a selected sample is, in this case, also entirely without basis. Data on the religious beliefs and national origin of the inhabitants of the Republic of Slovenia is certainly not the kind of data which would refer to small groups. Data on religious beliefs could therefore be collected in a different manner and anonymously, within the meaning of point 2.2 of Recommendation No. R (83) 10 of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe on the Protection of Personal Data Used for the Purposes of Research and Statistics. Lastly, it is worth noting that only a few other countries have included a question on religious belief in their statistical censuses.

3. In the process of preparing the questionnaire and the subsequent discussion of its contents, it became clear that both items of data were not being collected primarily for statistical purposes. The data were to be used by certain political groups and institutions to meet various objectives and to prove that their specific requests were reasonable (e.g. regarding religious education in schools, affording special rights to the members of individual nations and nationalities); furthermore, the collection of such data could also serve as a basis for exerting pressure on individual groups to declare their affiliation to a certain nation, etc. Previous debates held among the Slovene public on the constitutionality of these two questions have proven these intentions. It is clear that a statistical census is not intended for a public declaration of religion and national origin; however, regarding these two questions, this is the fate of this census in terms of its content and scope. If both questions were excluded, this would by no means entail an interference with the right to freely express one's religion in public life or to freely express affiliation with one's nation or national community. This constitutional dispute concerns the negative, and not the positive, aspects of both rights.

In my view, it is particularly important to draw attention to the fact that these two questions might be very sensitive for married persons who have different national affiliations (and thereby, usually, also different religious affiliations). In particular, pressure could be felt by their children. It is true that Article 10 of the PHHC1A contains the provision that data on religious beliefs and national origin may be provided on behalf of members of a household who are absent during the census and are 14 years old on the day the census is conducted, only if their written consent is submitted that such data be provided for the purposes of this census, along with a written statement on their nationality and religion. It is sociologically and psychologically naive to expect parents, in each case, to respect the right of a minor in their charge to free expression of his religious belief and national origin. We can only imagine the traumas that this would cause in some families. Therefore, it is difficult to discuss the proportionality of the interference, particularly since it is clear that the statistical purpose of both questions will not be achieved.

4. I would also like to draw attention to some other issues. The counting of the members of the Slovenian minority in Carinthia in Austria has always resulted in assimilation and a partial denationalisation of the Slovenian minority. After the Austrian Constitutional Court had issued a decision on the setting up of local road signs, the Governor of Carinthia, J. Haider, immediately ordered that the number of members of the Slovenian minority be counted. It is clear that this cannot be said to be the case for the situation in Slovenia. In Slovenia, the census may even serve the interests of nations and nationalities which are not in the majority. Nevertheless, it is clear that the results of such a census serve political rather than statistical interests.
5. The Constitutional Court decided on the constitutionality of Articles 10, 11, 12, 13, 15, 24, 25, 28, and 29 without having first conducted an exhaustive analysis and examination, thus deciding completely superficially by invoking the formal consistency of these provisions with the Constitution and other statutes, particularly the Personal Data Protection Act (hereinafter referred to as the PDPA). I therefore cannot agree with a dismissal of the constitutional petition regarding these Articles, even though I have been unable to conduct an exhaustive analysis myself. The majority decision established that the legislature had respected the requirements of Article 38 of the Constitution, which: prohibits personal data from being used for a purpose contrary to that for which it is collected; states that the collection, processing, designated use, supervision, and protection of the confidentiality of personal data shall be provided by law; and provides that everyone has the right to access collected personal data that relates to them and the right to judicial protection in the event of any abuse of such data, not only regarding the provisions on the collection and integration of data from various collections (Articles 11, 12, 13, and 28 of the PHHC1A) but also regarding the determination of the period of storage (Article 10 of the PHHC1A) and regarding the provisions on the processing, storage, and provision of data (Articles 24 to 27 of the PHHC1A). The provisions which refer to the processing, storage, and provision of data (Articles 24 to 27 of the PHHC1A) only paraphrase constitutional requirements. They refer to the PDPA, specifically Article 9, which again only generally determines that personal data may only be processed for purposes determined by law. Furthermore, Article 13 of the PDPA does not include specific measures for the protection of personal data, but only refers to them as examples, and authorises all persons providing such protection to determine those measures in accordance with the PDPA. The entire statutory regulation is therefore general in nature, and does not include clearly determined obligations for the database controllers, leaving the regulation of this area to implementing regulations.

At the very least, the regulation in Articles 24 to 27 could be criticised for not fulfilling the constitutional obligation referred to in Article 38 that the collection, processing, designated use, supervision, and protection of the confidentiality of personal data shall be provided by law. Moreover, if we also consider that the automatic processing of all data is increasingly gaining ground, and that proceedings regarding the petition for the review of the constitutionality of the Central Population Register Act (which contains challenged provisions on the personal identification number of citizens (EMŠO) and that this identification number is also indicated on the census questionnaire) has been pending before the Constitutional Court for three years, it is then possible to draw the conclusion that the issues arising from the collection, processing, supervision, and protection of the confidentiality of personal data have certainly not been studied to a sufficient extent for the Constitutional Court to take a clear and precise position on all the aforementioned issues. However, it is true that the petition was also not sufficiently reasoned in this regard.

I join the Dissenting Opinion of Judge Dr Lojze Ude, except for the Paragraph 5 herein.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE DR FIŠER

I voted against Point 1 of the operative provisions in the present case, and hereby submit a Dissenting Opinion with regard to this part of the decision of the Constitutional Court.

1. First, I must explain that I argued in favour of the Constitutional Court reaching a decision, either way, on the constitutionality of the thirteenth (in addition to the fourteenth) indent of Article 6 of the PHHC1A regarding the question about national (ethnic) origin, notwithstanding the fact that it could be unclear whether the petition for the review of the constitutionality of the challenged statute was expressly lodged in this sense and, if so, whether it might have been subsequently withdrawn. Two fundamental arguments point in this direction: first, a public hearing on the census question about national origin, as well as several other questions, was held before the Constitutional Court. Although proceedings before the Constitutional Court indeed have many particularities, certain fundamental procedural rules cannot be ignored. The question of what precisely is being challenged in this case should be clearly determined and resolved promptly and in its entirety by the order, by which the petition is accepted in accordance with the third paragraph of Article 26 of the CCA. As soon as the proceedings are at the stage where adversarial discussion of the matter at issue may commence, it is necessary to decide on the issue that is being challenged in the proceedings. At this point, the petitioner may no longer, in principle, withdraw or amend his petition; I say “in principle”, because there are, of course, cases where such a position cannot be defended (e.g. in cases where the factual situation has fundamentally changed, and particularly in cases where the challenged regulation is brought into line with a statute or the Constitution).

Notwithstanding the aforementioned, the conditions for reviewing the question on national (ethnic) origin sua sponte were nevertheless fulfilled on the basis of the correlation referred to in Article 30 of the CCA, since the provisions are mutually related. In both cases, with regard to religion (in conjunction with Articles 7 and 41 of the Constitution) and national origin (naturally, in conjunction with Article 61 of the Constitution), it is a matter of dealing with particularly sensitive data. This clearly indicates the need for both of the problematic categories to be treated equally and decided upon in the same way (not necessarily equal in terms of content, although I am of a different opinion, as explained below).

2. In terms of content, I believe that the question posed during the census about religion (and the question about national origin, with some differences which are, in my opinion, irrelevant for the final decision) represents an inadmissible interference with the Constitution, primarily Article 35 therein and namely the provision which protects a person's privacy.

The rights contained in Articles 7, 41, and 61 of the Constitution have no direct or indirect connection with the census. In other words, there can be nothing added to rights and they cannot be deprived of anything by the census; the existence and exercise of these rights are in no way connected to the census or the results thereof.

Moreover, it is necessary to strictly separate the aforementioned rights, individual or group rights, their positive or negative aspects, on the one hand, from the census and its results on the other. A different standpoint would entail the abuse of the census as an institution, which would be by its nature constitutionally inadmissible.

A census is clearly a compulsory activity that is carried out by the state for some of its needs (which are not defined clearly enough, however this may be a surmountable issue in so far as it does not concern questions about personal beliefs) and which requires a high degree of cooperation of the respondents. The respondent does not gain anything therewith, neither legally nor factually. On the contrary, some violations of the duty to cooperate are even sanctioned as minor offences. In this context I will not discuss the question whether such sanctioning is truly necessary; however, I did not overlook the fact that the respondents are not prosecuted for a minor offence in relation to both discussed questions. Nevertheless, the circumstances under which the census is carried out are undoubtedly such that respondents are placed almost entirely in the position of a subject of some proceedings, which is clearly not in their interests. It is clear that this represents interference with the person's right to privacy. It is a question of whether, viewed from this perspective, the census would even pass a review of its constitutionality; it could if it were based on different premises; however, the legislature did not make any efforts whatsoever in this regard, and such premises are not even provided by the general legislation governing the national statistics. On the contrary, in the census act, the legislature made some serious errors which led to the abrogation of a part of the PHHC1A, which is referred to in Point 3 of the operative part of Decision of the Constitutional Court; however, many doubts were raised despite the fact that the remaining challenged provisions had passed the constitutional review (see Point 2 of the operative part of Decision). The fact is that the remaining census questions referred to in Article 6 of the PHHC1A were not challenged, and the conditions under which they could have been reviewed on the basis of correlation were not fulfilled.

3. When compared to the other questions referred to in Article 6 of the PHHC1A, the questions about religion and national (ethnic) origin are not questions about facts (the opening sentence of this provision uses the term "data"), but questions about the personal (subjective and intimate) beliefs of individuals. Such beliefs may represent a very difficult and delicate issue for some, for others they may be entirely straightforward, and it can be traumatic in some communities. The views held and decisions made by an individual may be completely different from the prevailing positions or expectations of their surroundings, not to mention possible interests which are not in any way connected with the beliefs of the individual. The risk of manipulation is evident; however, I agree with the position that this cannot serve as an argument against conducting a census.

In any event, this entails a clear and serious interference with the privacy of the respondents, regardless of what they declare to be their belief, and even if they choose not to answer. The difference between both groups of questions (facts, on the one hand, and personal beliefs on the other) is substantial and very important – even crucial – for the review. First and foremost, the state should not inquire into the personal beliefs of its citizens during a census.

The state should be particularly reserved in this regard, and any interference with privacy should pass the strict test of proportionality without a shadow of a doubt (notwithstanding my general principled reservations towards such a test, which often proves to be an unreliable and unimportant aid, as in the case in question).

The Constitutional Court carried out a review on possible violations of Articles 7 and 41 of the Constitution, but only regarding the constitutionality of the question about religion. After it had established that the question entailed an interference with the right determined in the second paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution (and I agree that it does), it attempted to carry out a test of proportionality, but modified it to a certain extent. The Constitutional Court did not review the necessity to interfere with the constitutional right, which is the first part of the test, but was satisfied with the finding that the census data had been properly collected (which is undoubtedly true). However, the difference between the necessity and appropriateness of the interference is sufficiently clear to not require separate demonstration. It makes no difference if the review of the remaining two parts yielded positive results, as such results cannot compensate for the deficiency in the first part. As a result, my conclusion differs from the majority decision: the test of proportionality was not passed in this review; therefore, to pose a question about religion is inconsistent with the Constitution.

4. I would be willing to consider whether the test would be passed if the census were to be designed and carried out in a manner that better protects the privacy of the respondents from the very outset. This could be achieved if the same level of anonymity is applied to the census as for other methods of data collection for statistical research. In this manner the obligatory nature of the census could, in my opinion, be substantially reduced. However, the opposing party should first endeavour to present any stronger existing arguments (at present, they are not evident) in support of posing these two disputable census questions on the subjective beliefs of the respondents.
5. Owing to the fact that the question represents, in my opinion, an inadmissible interference with the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution, even if posed in a narrower sense, it becomes even clearer that it is contrary to Article 35 of the Constitution to have two questions which fall into the category of particularly sensitive data, further increasing the disputability of the interference which resulted therefrom.

OPINION

At a session held on 19 November 2003 in proceedings to review the constitutionality of the Agreement between the Republic of Slovenia and the Holy See on Legal Issues regarding the consistency of the provisions of Article 1, the second paragraph of Article 2, the first paragraph of Article 3, the first paragraph of Article 10, and the second paragraph of Article 14 of this Agreement, initiated upon the proposal of the Government of the Republic of Slovenia, the Constitutional Court

- I. Article 1 of the Agreement between the Republic of Slovenia and the Holy See on Legal Issues (hereinafter referred to as the Agreement), according to which the Republic of Slovenia and the Holy See confirm the principle that the state and the Catholic Church are each independent and autonomous within their own organisation and that the Catholic Church performs its activities freely under canon law, in accordance with the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia, is not inconsistent with the principle of sovereignty enshrined in Article 3 of the Constitution or with the principle of the separation of the State and religious communities enshrined in the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution insofar as it is interpreted to entail that the Catholic Church will respect the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia when performing its activities in the Republic of Slovenia, as follows from Paragraphs 32 and 33 of the reasoning of this Opinion.
- II. The constitutionally consistent interpretation of Article 1 of the Agreement is the starting-point for reviewing the consistency of the second paragraph of Article 2, the first paragraph of Article 3, the first paragraph of Article 10, and the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Agreement.
- III. The second paragraph of Article 2 of the Agreement, according to which the Republic of Slovenia recognises the legal personality of territorial and personal Church institutions based in the Republic of Slovenia, which have such personality pursuant to the norms of canon law and which the Church authority must register with the competent state authority in accordance with the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia, is not inconsistent with the principle of the equality of religious communities enshrined in the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution or with the principles of a state governed by the rule of law enshrined in Article 2 of the Constitution.

- IV. The first paragraph of Article 3 of the Agreement, according to which the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia guarantees the Catholic Church the free pursuit of activities, liturgy, and catechesis, is not inconsistent with the principle of sovereignty enshrined in Article 3 of the Constitution, the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities enshrined in the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution, or the principles of a state governed by the rule of law enshrined in Article 2 of the Constitution.
- V. The first paragraph of Article 10 of the Agreement, according to which the Catholic Church has, in accordance with the legislation of the Republic of Slovenia and canon law, the right to establish and manage schools of all types and levels, dormitories for secondary school and university students, and other educational institutions, is not inconsistent with the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities enshrined in the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution.
- VI. The second paragraph of Article 14 of the Agreement, according to which the Republic of Slovenia and the Holy See will endeavour to continue discussing outstanding issues that are not subject of this Agreement, with the intention of settling them by mutual agreement, is not inconsistent with the principle of sovereignty enshrined in Article 3 of the Constitution or the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities enshrined in the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution.
- VII. When implementing the Agreement, the state authorities of the Republic of Slovenia will be required to respect the content of the provisions of the Agreement as determined by the interpretation of the Constitutional Court.

Reasoning

The Statements of the Government of the Republic of Slovenia

1. The Government proposed that, on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution and Article 70 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), the Constitutional Court issue an opinion on the consistency of the preamble and the entire Agreement (Articles 1 to 14) with the Constitution, especially with Articles 7 and 41 thereof. In the Government's opinion, by reviewing the constitutionality of the Agreement "any possible doubt about its constitutional consistency" would be resolved, although the applicant deems that the Agreement is not inconsistent with the Constitution. The Government also informed the Constitutional Court that it had proposed that the National Assembly postpone the ratification of the Agreement until the decision of the Constitutional Court.

2. Upon the Constitutional Court's request, the Government supplemented its proposal to issue an opinion with the statement that the Constitutional Court review two issues in terms of their consistency with Article 7 of the Constitution: first, whether the entire Agreement (or several of its provisions) entails that the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia and canon law are rendered equal and, second, whether the Agreement entails the unequal treatment of different religious communities. The Government believes that Articles 1, 2, 3, 8, 9, 10, and 12 of the Agreement undoubtedly reflect the "primacy of the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia and that the Agreement does not introduce anything new regarding the legal position of the Catholic Church in Slovenia and does not require existing legislation to be amended." As, in the opinion of the Government, there are no provisions in the Agreement that would give the Catholic Church a privileged position in comparison to other religious communities in the country, it does not violate the principle of the equality of religious communities enshrined in the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution.
3. Upon the Constitutional Court's request, the Government supplemented its proposal and defined the specific provisions of the Agreement (the preamble, Articles 1, 2, 3, 10, and 14) that were alleged to be constitutionally disputable "according to some opinions and positions expressed in the media in connection with the coordination within the coalition during the preparation of the bases and upon the signing of the mentioned Agreement".
4. The preamble was alleged to be inconsistent with the Constitution as it does not expressly provide that the Agreement only confirms the already established legal position of the Catholic Church in the Republic of Slovenia. Such allegedly allows for "different interpretations of the Agreement". The Government, on the contrary, believes that in particular the reference to Articles 7 and 41 of the Constitution in the Preamble [of the Agreement] demonstrates that it was not the intention of the contracting parties to interfere with the constitutional order of the Republic of Slovenia through the Agreement. The Government requested an opinion on Article 1 of the Agreement due to concerns as to whether the Agreement's wording could be construed to mean that the Republic of Slovenia recognises that the Catholic Church is not bound by the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia, and as to whether it allows, or even affords, that equal importance be given to the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia and canon law. In this regard, the Government explains that the first paragraph of this Article refers to the relation between the Republic of Slovenia and the Holy See as two subjects of international law to which the principle of independence and autonomy applies; in this paragraph, the term Catholic Church means the Universal Church, which is represented by the Holy See in international relations. The second paragraph of Article 1 refers to the Catholic Church in the Republic of Slovenia, emphasising on the one hand the freedom to pursue activities in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution, and on the other hand that such activities must be in accordance with the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia. Therefore, according to the Government, the wording of Article 1 does not interfere with the territorial and personal sovereignty of the Republic of Slovenia; on the contrary, it determines that the activities of the Catholic Church must be at all times consistent with the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia. Article 2 of the Agreement was alleged to be inconsistent with the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution, as it does not explicitly provide that the Catholic Church and its institutions are legal entities [Translator's note: Regularly, pravna oseba is translated as legal entity; however, canon law uses the term juridic person. Therefore whenever there are references to canon law the term juridic person is used.] under private law as provided in the Agreement on the Legal Position of the Evangelical Church in the Republic of Slovenia (signed on 25 January 2000). In the Government's opinion, it follows from the entire context of the Agreement and the rules of interpretation that the instances in question concern legal personality under private law. The first paragraph of Article 3 of the Agreement was alleged to be inconsistent with the Constitution as it does not (explicitly) determine that all the activities of the Catholic Church in the Republic of Slovenia must be performed in accordance with its legal order. The Government believes that the first paragraph of Article 3 [of the Agreement] summarises the essence of Article 7 of the Constitution regarding the free pursuit of the activities of religious communities, which must be performed in accordance with the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia already on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 1 of the Agreement. It was argued that the Constitutional Court should review the consistency of Article 10 of the Agreement with the Constitution due to allegations that the content of this Article allows the Catholic Church to interfere with the legal regulation of public schools. In the Government's opinion, Article 10 does not interfere with the regulation of public schools as it only refers to schools that are established and managed by the Catholic Church in accordance with the legislation of the Republic of Slovenia. In connection with the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Agreement, the Government suggests that the Constitutional Court establish, whether, on the basis of that provision, the Republic of Slovenia is obliged to engage in bilateral resolution of all open issues, namely also including those that fall under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Republic of Slovenia and with regard to which the Holy See may neither cooperate nor co-decide. The Government states that, through that provision, the Republic of Slovenia did not undertake to resolve such open issues by agreement, but only to endeavour to discuss them. In the Government's opinion, the aforementioned provision of the Agreement has thus not exceeded the boundaries of courtesy that are common in treaties.

5. On 19 April 2002, the Constitutional Court received a supplemented proposal to issue an opinion, which was sent by the Minister of the Interior, the Minister of Work, Family and Social Affairs, and the Minister of Culture. In their supplement they state that, at its session held on 18 April 2002, the Government rejected their proposal to also send the documents titled "Opinion of the minority in the Government on the consistency of the Agreement with the Holy See with the Constitution" as an appendix to the supplemented Government proposal. The Constitutional Court could not consider the mentioned document as part of the applicant's submissions as it had been expressly rejected by the applicant.

The Content of the Agreement and the Purpose of its Conclusion

6. It is evident from the title of the Agreement, which was signed by the authorised representatives of the Holy See and the Republic of Slovenia, that it regulates specific legal issues referring to the position of the Catholic Church in the Republic of Slovenia. The preamble, which consists of four indents, reveals the circumstances that led to the conclusion of the Agreement. The first and fourth indents refer respectively to the political and historical circumstances that led to the conclusion of the Agreement, i.e. the establishment of diplomatic relations between the Republic of Slovenia and the Holy See, which followed the recognition by the Holy See of the sovereignty and independence of the Republic of Slovenia by Note No. 226/92RS, dated 23 January 1992 (Decree on the Ratification of the Agreement on the Establishment of Diplomatic Relations between the Republic of Slovenia and the Holy See, Official Gazette RS, No. 32/92, MP, No. 7/92), and to the centuries-old historical connection between the Slovene people and the Catholic Church. The second and third indents refer to the legal acts that were taken into account by the contracting parties when concluding the Agreement. For the Republic of Slovenia, this legal act is the Constitution, in particular Articles 7 and 41 thereof, and for the Holy See, these legal acts are canon law norms and the documents of the Second Vatican Council. The Constitutional Court considered canon law norms to be the norms contained in the Code of Canon Law (hereinafter referred to as the CCL).<sup>1</sup> At the same time, the mentioned indents emphasise the importance of human rights and the internationally recognised principles of freedom of thought, conscience, and faith.
7. The Catholic Church actively engages not only in the area of religious matters (res spirituales) but also in other areas of social life that fall under the jurisdiction of the state (known as mixed matters – res mixtae). It follows from the wording of the Agreement that, in addition to recognising the autonomy and independence of the activities of the Catholic Church in spiritual matters, its purpose is to regulate legal issues in those areas where the activities of the Catholic Church and the state overlap or intertwine. The Agreement therefore regulates the recognition of the legal personality of Church institutions (Article 2); the performance of public religious services (the second paragraph of Article 3); the establishment of religious associations (Article 8); the establishment and management of schools (Article 10); the maintenance of cultural monuments owned by the Church (Article 11); pastoral activities in hospitals, nursing homes, prisons, and other institutions, where the free movement of persons is restricted (Article 12); and the establishment of charity and social Church institutions and organisations (Article 13). The intention to regulate these issues by the Agreement is also evident from the documents of the Mixed Umbrella Commission of the Roman Catholic Church and the Government of the Republic of Slovenia. The intention to reach an agreement between the state and the Catholic Church “in matters in which both are active” is explicitly emphasised in point 7 of the document entitled “The Constitutional Provision on the Separation of the state and Religious Communities as the Basis for the Work of the Mixed Umbrella Commission” (hereinafter referred to as the documents of the Mixed Umbrella Commission).<sup>2</sup>

1 On 25 January 1983, Pope John Paul II proclaimed the new (amended) Code of Canon Law. Its translation into Slovene, dated 27 November 1983, was published by the Archiepiscopal Ordinary's Office in Ljubljana, Ljubljana 1983.

Jurisdiction and Scope of Review by the Constitutional Court

8. On the basis of the second paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court is vested with the special competence of preliminary (a priori) constitutional review of treaties. This power only refers to reviewing the consistency with the Constitution, not with ratified treaties and the general principles of international law. The purpose of the preliminary constitutional review of treaties is to prevent that, upon the ratification of a treaty, the state assumed an obligation arising from international law that would be inconsistent with the Constitution, or that, following its ratification, it were forced to bring the treaty into line with the Constitution, which could lead to serious complications. In Opinion No. Rm1/97, dated 5 June 1997 (Official Gazette RS, No. 40/97, and OdlUS VI, 86), the Constitutional Court held that an obligation arising from international law would be contrary to the Constitution if, upon the entry into force of the treaty in the domestic law, it created directly applicable unconstitutional legal norms or obliged the state to adopt an internal legal act that would be contrary to the Constitution. As a treaty is the result of an agreement between the contracting parties, the Constitutional Court can neither abrogate or annul specific provisions of the treaty nor can it require the National Assembly to bring it into line with the Constitution. In deciding on the consistency of a treaty with the Constitution, the Constitutional Court cannot address the question of the appropriateness of specific solutions, and is even less able to address the question of whether the specific solutions are advantageous for the state. The provisions of a treaty in the wording in which it has been submitted for ratification are the subject of review in proceedings to issue an opinion on the consistency of a treaty with the Constitution. As is evident from the proposal and its appendices, by letter No. 08000/20013, dated 24 January 2002, the Government referred the Draft Law on the Ratification of the Agreement for discussion and adoption to the National Assembly, and simultaneously proposed that it postpone the ratification until the Constitutional Court has issued its opinion.

2 Point 7 reads as follows: “Therefore the Mixed Umbrella Commission considers it useful that, given the full consideration of mutual independence and autonomy, the State and the Catholic Church cooperate and enter into agreements respecting the Constitution, international documents on human rights, and the laws of the Republic of Slovenia in matters where their activities meet. The Mixed Umbrella Commission will endeavour to regulate the legal position of the Roman Catholic Church in the form of an agreement between the Church and the State. The final aim of that endeavour is the overall guarantee and respect for the right to religious belief and a rich spiritual life of the citizens.”

9. The Agreement is being concluded between the Republic of Slovenia as an independent and autonomous state and the Holy See as a sui generis subject of international law.<sup>3</sup> The treaties that the Holy See, as the highest and sovereign authority of the universal Catholic Church, enters into refer to issues that are directly related to the Catholic Church in the contracting states in which particular churches are located (see Can. 368). Among the special functions of the pontifical legates, Can. 365 of the CCL also determines the conclusion “and implementation of concordats and other agreements of this type”. The Agreement that is the subject of this constitutional review belongs to “agreements of this type”. Notwithstanding the particularities of agreements between states and the Holy See (known as concordats, conventions, covenants, modi vivendi, protocols, or agreements), the prevailing theory of international law treats them as proper treaties that not only confirm the existing rights of contracting parties (e.g. the free pursuit of the activities of the Church), but can also create new rights and obligations for both sides.<sup>4</sup> The rules of the Vienna Convention on the Law of the Treaties (Official Gazette SFRY [Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia], No. 30/72 – hereinafter referred to as the VCLT), which was also signed and ratified by the Holy See, apply to the interpretation of these agreements in the same way as to treaties concluded between states.<sup>5</sup>
10. The Constitutional Court reviewed the consistency of the challenged provisions of the Agreement with the provisions of the Constitution that the applicant explicitly stated or that logically follow from the proposal’s statement of reasons. The Agreement refers to the relationship between the Catholic Church as a religious community and the Republic of Slovenia as a state. This relationship is regulated by Article 7 of the Constitution, the first paragraph of which provides that the state and religious communities are separate (the so-called principle of the separation of the state and religious communities), and the second paragraph of which ensures religious communities equal rights and the free pursuit of their activities (the so-called principle of the equality of religious communities and the principle of the free pursuit of religious communities’ activities). The principles of the equality of religious communities and the free pursuit of their activities originate from the constitutional right to freedom of conscience determined in the first and second paragraphs of Article 41 of the Constitution, as this human the exercise of right can only be guaranteed on the basis of the equality of all religious communities and the free pursuit of their activities. Notwithstanding the institutional relationship between the state and religious communities, the constitutional right to freedom of religion, which encompasses its positive<sup>6</sup> and negative<sup>7</sup> aspects, entails the foundation of the entire regulation of the position of religious communities, as such concerns respect for this fundamental constitutional right, which is also protected by numerous international instruments.<sup>8</sup> Therefore, the finding that a specific provision of the Agreement is consistent with the principle of the equality of religious communities and the principle of free pursuit of their activities enshrined in the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution also involves a finding of consistency with Article 41 of the Constitution, which was not specifically stated by the Constitutional Court in the operative provisions.

3 The CCL determines that the “the term Apostolic See or Holy See refers not only to the Roman Pontiff but also to the Secretariat of State, the Council for the Public Affairs of the Church, and other institutes of the Roman Curia, unless it is otherwise apparent from the nature of the matter or the context of the words” (Can. 361). The Holy See with the Pontiff at the head is not only the highest authority of the Universal Catholic Church, but also of the State of the Vatican City.

4 Concordats, Encyclopedia of public international law, Volume one, 1992, p. 729.

5 On 30 September 1969, the Holy See signed the Vienna Convention and, on 25 February 1977, ratified multilateral treaties deposited with the Secretary-General, Status as at 31 December 2000, Volume II, United Nations, Chapter XXIII, p. 263.

11. The Government proposed that the preamble be reviewed as it does not include confirmation or a statement that the existing legal position of the Catholic Church in the Republic of Slovenia is being confirmed by the Agreement. With regard to the content of a preamble, there are no rules in international practice that would require preambles to include anything more than the determination of the contracting parties and their representatives and a declaration of the agreement that follows from the wording of the treaty. Aust<sup>9</sup> states that, from a legal perspective, it is sufficient for the preamble to state that the parties agreed on the content arising from the wording of the treaty; however, where parties want to express more in the preamble of a treaty, the purpose of such preamble is to present the principal content of the treaty by also including the so-called background of the treaty, and to define its purpose. Andrassy<sup>10</sup> states that a treaty usually includes a preamble wherein the contracting parties, their representatives, and other circumstances relevant for the conclusion of the treaty are indicated. Its content and the answer to the question of whether the statements contained therein are binding on the contracting parties depend entirely on the parties' decision. They are not bound by any rule stipulating that all the essential aspects of a concluded treaty must be outlined in its preamble. It therefore follows from the legal nature of the preamble that it is not possible to challenge what has not been included therein, unless the elements that were omitted are obligatory constituent parts of the preamble of every treaty. The Agreement, however, does include such elements. The fact that the contracting parties did not include a specific statement or circumstance in the Agreement's preamble cannot entail an independent argument for the unconstitutionality of the preamble itself. For the mentioned reasons, it is not possible to conduct the proposed review of the preamble to the Agreement.

6 Religious and other beliefs may be freely professed in private and public life (the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution).

7 No one shall be obliged to declare their religious or other beliefs (the second paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution).

12. The fact that the content of the preamble is an important part of the treaty is demonstrated when it is being interpreted. This follows from the first paragraph of Article 31 of the VCLT, which as a general interpretation rule determines that a treaty shall be interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty and in the light of its object or purpose; the second paragraph of the same article clarifies that the context for the purpose of the interpretation of a treaty shall include its preamble as well as its text (and annexes). In accordance with the cited rule, when interpreting specific provisions of the Agreement the Constitutional Court has taken into account not only the Constitution but also the acts stated in the Agreement's preamble, i.e. canon law, the documents of the Second Vatican Council, particularly the Declaration on Religious Freedom (Dignitas humanae) and the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (Gaudium in Spes – hereinafter referred to as the Pastoral Constitution), both dated 7 December 1965,<sup>11</sup> and the internationally recognised principles with regard to ensuring freedom of religion, especially the principles of the ECHR and the Covenant [on Political and Civil Rights]. In this context, it has also taken into account the documents of the Mixed Umbrella Commission.

B – II

Review of Article 1 of the Agreement

13. Article 1 of the Agreement reads as follows:

“The Republic of Slovenia and the Holy See confirm the principle that the state and the Catholic Church are both independent and autonomous in their organisation, and undertake not only to fully comply with this principle in their mutual relations but also to cooperate in the advancement of the human person and the common good.

In the Republic of Slovenia, the Catholic Church performs its activities freely under canon law, in accordance with the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia.”

14. The Government proposed that the quoted provision be reviewed as it was concerned that the principle according to which the state and the Catholic Church are, each within its own organisation, independent and autonomous (hereinafter referred to as the “principle of independence and autonomy”) may be construed to mean that the Republic of Slovenia recognises the independence of the Catholic Church from the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia. Such is allegedly inconsistent with the Constitution, particularly with the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities (the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution) and with the principle of sovereignty (the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution).
15. The question of how to interpret the wording of Article 1 of the Agreement is vital for the review. As the wording of this provision does not provide a clear answer thereto, the Constitutional Court had to determine its meaning through interpretation. In this respect it had to base its review on the sources that are cited in its preamble as the basis of the Agreement. In establishing the meaning and possible interpretation of the wording, the Court, in addition to the Constitution, therefore also had to take into account the law of the Catholic Church (canon law and the documents of the Second Vatican Council), which is the foundation of the “principle of independence and sovereignty”. In accordance with Article 31 of the VCLT, the Constitutional Court has taken into account the preamble’s provision from which it follows that, when concluding the Agreement, each contracting party took its own law into account.<sup>12</sup>

16. It follows from the documents of the Mixed Umbrella Commission that the Government adopted the following two premises when concluding the Agreement: (1) the previous negative comprehension of the separation of the state and religious communities has been surpassed by the new democratic system; and (2) it is necessary to opt for a positive comprehension of this principle within the meaning of the equality of all religious communities and the free pursuit of their activities. The documents emphasise that the meaning of the separation of the state and religious communities lies in “the state neither being affiliated with any religious community nor privileging or discriminating against any of them, and that religious communities are independent and autonomous in their respective areas.”
17. The legal position of religious communities, which includes the Catholic Church, in the Republic of Slovenia is primarily founded on three constitutional principles: the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities (the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution), the principle of the equality of religious communities and the principle of the free pursuit of their activities (the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution).<sup>13</sup> The Constitution has determined the relation be-

12 The second indent of the preamble reads as follows: “whereas the Republic of Slovenia takes into account its Constitution, particularly Articles 7 and 41 thereof, and the Holy See takes into account the documents of the Second Vatican Council and the norms of canon law.”

13 The legal position of religious communities in Slovenia is still regulated in more detail by the Legal Status of Religious Communities in the Socialist Republic of Slovenia Act, the principal text of which was adopted in the previous socialist order in 1976 (Official Gazette SRS, Nos. 15/76 and 42/86, and Official Gazette RS, No. 22/91 – hereinafter referred to as the LSRCA). The amendments to this Act that were adopted in 1991, just before the adoption of the independence legislation (the Basic Constitutional Charter on the Independence and Sovereignty of the Republic of Slovenia, Official Gazette RS, No. 1/91-I, and the Constitutional Act for the Implementation of the Basic Constitutional Charter on Independence and Sovereignty of the Republic of Slovenia, Official Gazette RS, No. 1/91-I), were a crucial step forward in the understanding of the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities defined in the previous socialist order, in which the state had limited the activities of religious communities exclusively to the private sphere. See Kerševan, Sporazumi s Svetim sedežem in družbeni položaj Rimskokatoliške cerkve (RKC) v Sloveniji [Agreements with the Holy See and the Social Position of the Roman Catholic Church in Slovenia], Čarnijev zbornik (1931–1996), Ljubljana 1998, p. 83. The abovementioned amendments to the LSRCA eliminated the obstacles preventing religious communities from becoming more involved in society. Therefore, the provisions which had explicitly prohibited religious communities from playing an active role in the area of education and from performing any activity of “general or special social importance” ceased to have effect. The legal and actual position of religious communities in the Republic of Slovenia (e.g. the payment of the employer’s contributions for old-age, disability and health insurance to priests and monks of all religious communities, benefits in the form of tax and customs exemptions, the Faculty of Theology joining the state university, the partial financing of private schools, the recognition of the pupils’ end of year reports, access to hospitals, tween the state and religious communities merely in principle, while the significance and content of the mentioned principles are still being established.<sup>14</sup>

18. The principle of the separation of the state and religious communities is generally established as a fundamental modern principle in most modern constitutions and legislation. The essential components of this principle are: (1) that the state is not bound by any religion; (2) that there is no state religion or state church; and (3) that religious communities have autonomy over their affairs. The position of the constitution framers regarding the establishment of this principle is demonstrated in the preparatory materials for the Constitution. The substantiation of the first written record on the principle of separation is provided in the explanatory memorandum for the Draft Constitution, dated 29 October 1990.<sup>15</sup> The principle was intended to emphasise “that the Church may not perform functions that are reserved for the state or state authorities (e.g. such as marriages, the keeping of registers, issuance of public documents). Such, however, does not limit Church activities in certain areas, such as charity activities, education, etc., which may be carried out by the Church under the same conditions as by citizens. Such also does not prevent Church institutions from becoming part of various public institutions, e.g. theological faculties joining existing universities, provided that the legislation in the relevant areas is respected.”<sup>16</sup> The explanatory memorandum for the Proposal of the Constitution, dated 12 December 1991, which contained the proposed wording of Article 7 that does not differ from its present wording, stated that this provision “introduces the principle of a secular state. Due to the point of view according to which church(es) and various other religious communities should be treated equally, the first paragraph is formulated in a more general sense, while in addition to equality of religious communities the second paragraph guarantees free pursuit of their activities.”<sup>17</sup>

19. The Constitutional Court already considered the content of this principle in Decision No. U-I-68/98, dated 22 November 2001 (Official Gazette RS, No. 101/01, and OdlUS X, 192). It held that, on the basis of the general principle of the separation of the state and religious communities, the state is obliged to be neutral, tolerant and to perform its activities in a non-missionary manner. In the cited decision, particular emphasis was devoted to state neutrality towards all religions, which it may not identify with, as an essential component of this principle. The Constitutional Court also adopted the posi-

- 14 Šturm emphasised the importance of the Mixed Umbrella Commission documents for interpreting the constitutional provision on the separation of the state and religious communities in: Lovro Šturm (ed.), Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije [The Commentary on the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia], Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, 2002, p. 124.
- 15 The first paragraph of Article 5 read as follows: “The Church is separate from the state.”

tion that the state is under no obligation to support or further the activities of religious communities. However, the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities does not imply that all forms of support and assistance are excluded, provided, of course, that the equality of all religious communities is guaranteed. The Constitutional Court also explained the content of this principle in a similar manner in Decision No. U-I-92/01, dated 28 February 2002 (Official Gazette RS, No. 22/02, and OdlUS XI, 25).

20. The principle of the separation of the state and religious communities entails that the state is not bound by any religion, that it may not grant any religion the status of a state religion, and that it does not have its own world view. This therefore entails that, with regard to the regulation of affairs that fall under its jurisdiction, the state may not identify with any religion or be bound by the positions of any religion. The state may, however, develop common civil values, particularly those which enable people with different (religious) values to live together [in peace]. These values are laid down by international instruments as fundamental values and human rights. State neutrality in respect to all religions and other beliefs (including those held by atheists) also entails that the state neither encourages nor prohibits any ideologies, and that it guarantees individuals the right to freely pursue individual and group activities in this area.<sup>18</sup> It must therefore also base the statutory regulation of issues that fall under its jurisdiction on these foundations. One of the essential elements of the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities in countries where this is consistently applied (e.g. France, the United States of America, and Japan) is also that the state provides no financial or other support to religious activities.<sup>19</sup>
21. It follows from the above that the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities (the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution), as part of the democratic system (Article 1 of the Constitution) that protects human rights and fundamental freedoms (the first paragraph of Article 5 of the Constitution), guarantees religious communities the complete freedom to pursue their activities in their religious (spiritual) area. At the same time, it prevents the state from expanding its powers into areas that are exclusively religious by nature or concern the internal affairs of religious communities (the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution). Regarding those areas in which the activities of religious communities interfere with state powers, the freedom of religious communities to pursue their activities, as a constituent part of the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities, is limited by state sovereignty.
22. The Republic of Slovenia became an independent and sovereign state upon the entry into force and implementation of the Basic Constitutional Charter. The constitution framers defined this as a value, to which they refer in the preamble of the Constitution. They also expressly stated in the first paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution that Slovenia is a state of all its citizens and is founded on the permanent and inalienable right of the Slovene nation to self-determination. State sovereignty is a feature of state authority, on the basis of which it is the highest authority in the state territory (the so-called supremacy of state authority), which is externally independent from other authorities of the same kind and to which all other authorities are internally subordinated.<sup>20</sup> State sovereignty is divided into external sovereignty, which means the independence of state power or the state in respect to other subjects of the same kind, and internal sovereignty which reflects the fact that in its territory the state is the supreme, independent, original, uniform, and overall organisation to which everything on its territory is subordinated by the power of the state.<sup>21</sup> Neither the first nor the second aspect of state sovereignty are absolute: the external aspect due to the existence of public international law,<sup>22</sup> and the internal aspect due also to the fact that internal authority cannot be all-encompassing.<sup>23</sup> The limits of internal state sovereignty are determined by the constitutional regulation of the position of state authorities and their powers, which serves as a legitimate and legal basis for them to interfere with citizens and autonomous social subjects.<sup>24</sup>

23. The principle of state sovereignty therefore entails that “state authorities exercise their sovereign authority and perform all their authoritative functions throughout the entire state territory within the framework of a uniform constitutional, economic, fiscal, customs, and security defence system.”<sup>25</sup> Unless the Constitution is amended, the performance of specific authoritative functions may not be renounced by treaties.<sup>26</sup> The state’s legitimacy to exercise its authority derives from the principle of the sovereignty of the people, which is enshrined in the first sentence of the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution: “In Slovenia, power is vested in the people.” This entails that “political power cannot not exist as such but needs legally valid, legitimate grounds for its existence and operation, and this legitimacy may not be founded on any other authority (e.g. God, an ideology, historical goals, class interests) than the people themselves; the people are the only holders of power, which they exercise directly or indirectly.”<sup>27</sup> The principle of the sovereignty of the people entails that the people are the only holder of state authority and that “in the state, there cannot be several sovereign state entities.”<sup>28</sup>
24. The principle of state sovereignty prevents the Republic of Slovenia from transferring its sovereign powers determined in the Constitution to another state, institution, or religious community. An exception regarding such transfer of the exercise of part of its sovereign rights is only permitted by Article 3a of the Constitution (Constitutional Act amending Chapter I and Articles 47 and 68 of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia, Official Gazette RS, No. 24/03), which refers to Slovenia's integration into international organisations and defence alliances.

25. In light of the above, it would be inconsistent with Article 3 of the Constitution if the Republic of Slovenia renounced part of its sovereignty and transferred its powers to another institution with regard to matters which, in accordance with the Constitution, fall under national jurisdiction. The principle of the separation of the state and religious communities does not prevent religious communities from performing activities in different areas of social life (e.g. education, charity, social, health, and economic activities). However, due to the principle of sovereignty (i.e. internal state sovereignty), only the state may set the limits within which and the conditions under which the carrying out of tasks pertaining to the competence of the state may be entrusted to the private sphere. The principle of sovereignty concurrently determines the limits of the independence of a religious community, which is guaranteed by the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution. The role the religious communities play and the position they hold in areas in which their powers and state powers converge depend on the organisation of the state, which must ensure the basic equality of all citizens, regardless of whether they are believers or not (the first paragraph of Article 14 and the second paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution). Therefore, a review of Article 1 of the Agreement in terms of its consistency with the principle of sovereignty enshrined in Article 3 of the Constitution is also crucial for a review of its consistency with the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution.
26. The content of the "principle of independence and autonomy",<sup>29</sup> which the Catholic Church adopted at the Second Vatican Council in the Pastoral Constitution, is relevant for understanding the meaning of the first and second paragraphs of Article 1 of the Agreement. In the Pastoral Constitution, the Second Vatican Council defined "how it conceives of the presence and activity of the Church in the world of today".<sup>30</sup> Chapter IV, particularly Article 76 of the Pastoral Constitution, in which the relation between the political community and the Church is defined, is important for determining the meaning of this principle. The third paragraph of Article 76 begins with the following wording: "The Church and the political community in their own fields are autonomous and independent from each other. Yet both, under different titles, are devoted to the personal and social vocations of the same men. The more that both foster sounder cooperation between themselves with due consideration for the circumstances of time and place, the more effective will their service be exercised for the good of all."<sup>31</sup>

29 The mentioned principle is included in the agreements reached between the Holy See and Italy, Poland, Croatia, Latvia, and Lithuania. This principle was also included in the agreement between the Holy See and the Czech Republic; however, the Czech parliament did not ratify the agreement. The agreement between the Holy See and Estonia does not include this principle.

30 Koncilski odluki, op. cit., the first paragraph of Article 2, p. 570.

31 Ibid., p. 650.

27. As a supranational religious organisation (as the Universal Church), the Catholic Church operates in states with different constitutional systems. On the basis of the provisions of the Pastoral Constitution, the Catholic Church considers the “principle of independence and autonomy” to be universal and the same in every government system irrespective of whether it operates in states where the Catholic Church has a special role or where the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities is not expressly determined (e.g. Germany, Austria, Italy, Spain, and Portugal), or in states where the principle of the separation of the Church and the state has been adopted, although not necessarily literally or in the same (milder or more consistent) form (e.g. France, the USA, Belgium, and the Netherlands). This universality is emphasised in the first paragraph of Article 76 of the Pastoral Constitution, which reads as follows: “It is very important, especially where a pluralistic society (societas pluralistica) prevails, that there be a correct notion of the relationship between the political community and the Church.” It is characteristic for the Pastoral Constitution that the powers of the Church as well as the powers of the political community are determined therein: “It is only right, however, that at all times and in all places, the Church should have true freedom to preach the faith, to teach her social doctrine, to exercise her role freely among men, and also to pass moral judgment in those matters which regard public order when the fundamental rights of a person or the salvation of souls require it. In this, she should make use of all the means – but only those – which accord with the Gospel and which correspond to the general good according to the diversity of times and circumstances” (the last sentence of the fifth paragraph of Article 76); and political authority must always be “exercised within the limits of the moral order and directed toward the common good” (the fourth paragraph of Article 74 of the Pastoral Constitution).
28. Church law draws a distinction between the Church as a legal institution and the Church as an institution of Divine Law. “This duality is also reflected in the Church’s legal dimension, as canon law is composed of human law established by the church authority (the Roman Pope, ecumenical councils, bishops, etc.) and of Divine Law, which we understand to be a set of guiding premises that are explicitly or implicitly determined by God himself and to which the specific solutions of canon law must strictly abide.”<sup>32</sup> In conformity with the Church teaching, divine natural law is eternal and unalterable. “Regarding the hierarchy of legal sources, Divine law is in every respect above human law insofar as it comes from God. It is therefore not possible for anyone to either partially or entirely annul the provisions of Divine law or polemicize against them.”<sup>33</sup> According to canon law, the “principle of independence and autonomy” could be construed to mean that the Catholic Church is independent and autonomous from state regulation in all matters which are considered to be of a religious (spiritual) nature and fall under Divine law, including so-called mixed matters.

32 Košir, Uvod v kanonsko pravo [An Introduction to Canon Law], Ljubljana 1997, p. 28.

33 Ibid., p. 29.

29. Modern states that recognise and protect human rights do not regulate the religious life of their citizens.<sup>34</sup> The state must allow religious communities to freely pursue their activities (the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution) when the exercise of the constitutional right to freedom of conscience is involved. The state must therefore guarantee individual and collective religious freedom to all citizens. Furthermore, Article 41 of the Constitution guarantees that religious freedom and other beliefs are fully respected in private and public life. On the other hand, the Catholic Church does not demand a dominant position with regard to the state. In secular matters, it respects national law and either observes it or attempts to reach a different agreement.<sup>35</sup> This is also shown in specific provisions of the Agreement in which it is explicitly stated and clearly defined that the Catholic Church will act in “accordance with the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia” regarding the registration of church institutions as legal entities (the second paragraph of Article 2), the notification of public liturgy (the second paragraph of Article 3), the establishment of associations (Article 8), property relations (Article 9), and the establishment of private schools (Article 10). A different understanding of the relation between the state and the Catholic Church could only arise in areas which are considered by the Church to be religious matters from a religious perspective, but which the state deems to be secular matters, i.e. so-called mixed matters, such as public schools and marriage. The key issue is whether the first paragraph of Article 1 of the Agreement recognises the complete freedom of the Church to pursue activities in these so-called mixed areas.
30. The answer to this question must be sought in connection with the second paragraph of Article 1 of the Agreement, which provides that “in the Republic of Slovenia, the Catholic Church performs its activities freely under canon law, in accordance with the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia.” The provisions of the first and second paragraphs of Article 1 of the Agreement are linked in terms of content and so they must be interpreted on the basis of the same premises.<sup>36</sup> However, the grammatical interpretation of the second paragraph of Article 1 also does not give a clear answer to the question of what the relation between canon law and the law of the Republic of Slovenia in these so-called mixed areas is. The comma in the second paragraph of Article 1 of the Agreement indicates that the wording does not mean “and in accordance with the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia.”<sup>37</sup> The wording

34 Kerševan, Cerkev, Politika, Slovenci po letu 1990 [The Church, Politics, Slovenians after 1990], pp. 19–21 and 136.

35 Can. 1290 provides that: “The general and particular provisions which the civil law in a territory has established for contracts and their disposition are to be observed with the same effects in canon law insofar as the matters are subject to the power of governance of the Church, unless the provisions are contrary to divine law or canon law provides otherwise.”

36 That the second paragraph of Article 1 of the Agreement must be interpreted in conjunction with the “principle of independence and autonomy” determined in the first paragraph of this article also follows from the fact that otherwise it would be meaningless as the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution and the first paragraph of Article 3 of the Agreement guarantee the Catholic Church the right to freely pursue its activities in the Republic of Slovenia.

37 Such interpretation is also supported by the fact that the Holy See did not accept the wording contained in of this provision could thus be construed to mean that the Church is obliged to act in conformity with the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia only in those areas which it considers to be secular matters.

31. Such an interpretation of the wording of the second paragraph of Article 1 of the Agreement would entail that the state recognises the right of the Catholic Church to unilaterally interfere in areas which otherwise fall under the jurisdiction of the state. As a result, the Republic of Slovenia would renounce part of its (state) sovereignty, without there being a basis for this in the Constitution, which would therefore be contrary to Article 3 of the Constitution. Such an understanding would also be inconsistent with the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution, according to which the state must treat religious communities equally. If it renounces a part of its sovereignty to the benefit of one religious community, it would thereby grant that religious community a privileged position in comparison with other religious communities.
32. The wording of the second paragraph of Article 1 of the Agreement can also be interpreted as allowing the Catholic Church to perform activities in accordance with canon law in so-called mixed areas as long as such activities do not conflict with the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia. Such an interpretation is closer to the Italian original version of the Agreement, in which the wording “e nel rispetto dell'ordine giuridico della Repubblica di Slovenia”, if translated literally, reads “and in accordance with the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia”.<sup>38</sup> The Catholic Church also sees its independence and autonomy, and thus its relation to the state, as a dynamic process that takes into account the diversity of national systems, and it is prepared to adapt to the existing legal order of the state in which it operates. Note 1 of the Pastoral Constitution specifically emphasises that “the constitution must be interpreted according to the general norms of theological interpretation. Interpreters must bear in mind – especially in part two – the changeable circumstances which the subject matter, by its very nature, involves.”<sup>39</sup> The chapter that covers the life of a political community<sup>40</sup> and that, in Article 76, determines the “principle of independence and autonomy” also forms part of these matters, which are covered in part two of the Pastoral Constitution. Furthermore, the observance of the state legal order is also emphasised in the Declaration on Religious Freedom, with Article 4 thereof providing that all religious communities must have the right to liberty, “provided the just demands of public order are observed”. The protection of religious freedom also falls within the power of public authority, which must ensure such protection “through juridical norms which are in conformity with the objective moral order” (Article 7).

one of the drafts, which read as follows: “The Catholic Church pursues its activities freely in the Republic of Slovenia, in accordance with the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia and canon law.”

38 Article 33 of the VCLT, interpretation of treaties authenticated in two or more languages.

39 Koncilski odluki, op. cit., p. 570.

40 The second part also includes chapters covering the dignity of marriage and the family, the proper encouragement of cultural progress, economic and social life, and striving for peace and support for the association of nations.

33. If we interpret the provisions of both paragraphs of Article 1 on the basis of the premises outlined in the previous paragraph, this article can only be understood in the sense that, in performing its activities in so-called mixed areas, the Catholic Church will respect the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia. In doing so it has the right to strive, within this legal order and through constitutionally permitted means (also including endeavours to amend the provisions of the Constitution), to pursue its aims and to attempt to cooperate with the state in mixed areas.
34. If the “principle of independence and autonomy” is interpreted in such a manner, and if the wording of Article 1 of the Agreement is understood in conformity with this interpretation, then this provision of the Agreement is not inconsistent with Article 3 of the Constitution. The “principle of independence and autonomy”, when understood in such a manner, is also not inconsistent with Article 7 of the Constitution.
35. As the Constitutional Court found that the wording of Article 1 of the Agreement could be interpreted in two ways, one of which is inconsistent with the Constitution, it adopted a so-called interpretative opinion. The Constitutional Court had already proceeded in this manner in the preliminary review of a treaty in Opinion No. Rm-1/97.<sup>41</sup> As a result, it prevented that, in the event of the ratification of the Agreement, contents which were inconsistent with the Constitution would be adopted into the legal order upon the Agreement’s entry into force. There is no constitutional impediment, however, for a treaty provision to be adopted in the internal legal order insofar as it is interpreted in a constitutionally consistent manner, as it follows from this Opinion.
36. Furthermore, Article 1 of the Agreement is crucial for the understanding and meaning of the other provisions of the Agreement which were reviewed by the Constitutional Court (the second paragraph of Article 2, the first paragraph of Article 3, the first paragraph of Article 10, and, in particular, the second paragraph of Article 14). The Constitutional Court therefore based its review of these provisions on the premises defined in this part of the reasoning of the Opinion (Point II of the operative provisions of this Opinion).

B – III

Review of the second paragraph of Article 2 of the Agreement

37. Article 2 reads as follows:

“The Republic of Slovenia recognises the legal personality of the Catholic Church. The Republic of Slovenia also recognises the legal personality of all territorial and personal Church institutions based in the Republic of Slovenia, which are granted such personality pursuant to the legal norms of canon law. According to the legal system of the Republic of Slovenia, the Church authority must report such institutions to the state authority for registration.”

<sup>41</sup> The interpretative decision (la décision de non-contrariété sous réserve) was introduced in the constitutional review of treaties by the French Conseil Constitutionnel. Instead of finding that a treaty provision is inconsistent with the constitution, it interprets this provision in such a manner as to allow for the conclusion that this provision is not inconsistent with the constitution. Gaïa, Le Conseil constitutionnel et l’insertion des engagements internationaux dans l’ordre juridique interne, Economica, Paris 1991, pp. 123–127.

38. Article 2 of the Agreement allegedly also features among the constitutionally disputable articles; however, the Government expressed its doubts only in relation to its second paragraph. Therefore, the Constitutional Court proceeded to review only this provision. The provision of the second paragraph of Article 2 is allegedly constitutionally disputable as it does not determine that the Catholic Church and its organisations are recognised legal personalities under private law. By adopting the Agreement, the Republic of Slovenia allegedly violated the principle of the equality of religious communities enshrined in the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution, as the Agreement does not explicitly provide that the territorial and personal institutions of the Catholic Church in the Republic of Slovenia are legal entities under private law, as is provided for the Evangelical Church in the Agreement on the Legal Position of the Evangelical Church in the Republic of Slovenia.<sup>42</sup> As canon law also recognises public and private legal entities, there is a concern that the Catholic Church may assert that those legal entities that have the status of public legal entities under canon law<sup>43</sup> also acquire the status of entities under public law in accordance with the legislation of the Republic of Slovenia. There is also a concern that the provision is not sufficiently clear and precise, thereby constituting a violation of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution).

39. As in the majority of legal orders, in the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia the so-called numerus clausus principle also applies to legal entities, limiting the choice of possible types of legal entity and prohibiting combinations of different types of legal entities.<sup>44</sup> The existing legislation of the Republic of Slovenia (the first paragraph of Article 7 of the LSRCA) determines that religious communities are legal entities under civil law. They are sui generis civil-law legal entities.

40. Pursuant to canon law, juridic persons are either aggregates of persons or aggregates of things (Can. 115, first paragraph). Can. 114 determines that “[j]uridic persons are constituted either by the prescript of law or by special grant of the competent authority given through a decree. They are aggregates of persons [...] or of things [...] ordered for a purpose which is in keeping with the mission of the Church and which transcends the purposes of individuals”. The “territorial and personal Church institutions” referred to in the Agreement can therefore be groups of persons or groups of things that enjoy the status of a legal entity pursuant to canon law. It is evident

42 The Agreement on the Legal Position of the Evangelical Church in the Republic of Slovenia, which was signed by the authorised representatives of the Government and the Evangelical Church on 25 January 2000.

43 The first paragraph of Can. 116 provides that: “Public juridic persons are aggregates of persons or things which are constituted by competent ecclesiastical authority so that, within the purposes set out for them, they fulfil in the name of the Church, according to the norm of the prescripts of the law, the proper function entrusted to them in view of the public good; other juridic persons are private”. Public juridic persons are accorded legal personality either by the law itself or by a special decree of the competent authority expressly granting such, while private juridic persons are given legal personality only through a special decree of the competent authority expressly granting such (Can. 116, second paragraph). Particular churches (dioceses, Can. 373) and parishes (Can. 515) are, for example, deemed to be public juridic persons by law.

44 Trstenjak, Pravne osebe [Legal Entities], Gospodarski vestnik, 2003, pp. 66–67.

from the second paragraph of Article 2 of the Agreement that the state recognises their existence and does not require them to meet the requirements determined for civil-law legal entities by the law of the Republic of Slovenia in order to recognise their legal personality. For the recognition of their status under civil law, it is sufficient for the Church authority to report them to the competent state authority for registration pursuant to the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia.<sup>45</sup> In its Decision No. U-I-25/92, dated 4 March 1993 (Official Gazette RS, No. 13/93, and OdlUS II, 23), the Constitutional Court emphasised that, in relation to legal personality, Church organisations and institutions must abide by state regulations. The Agreement therefore provides no basis for the recognition of public-law status to territorial or personal Church institutions.

41. For the reasons mentioned above, the second paragraph of Article 2 of the Agreement is not inconsistent with the principle of the equality of religious communities enshrined in the second paragraph of Article 7 or with the principles of a state governed by the rule of law enshrined in Article 2 of the Constitution.

B – IV

Review of the First Paragraph of Article 3 of the Agreement

42. Article 3 of the Agreement reads as follows:

“The legal order of the Republic of Slovenia guarantees the Catholic Church the freedom to perform its activities, liturgy, and catechesis.

All extraordinary public liturgy and other public religious gatherings (pilgrimages, processions, meetings) are to be notified by the competent authority of the Catholic Church to the competent state authority in accordance with the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia.”

43. Article 3 of the Agreement allegedly also features among the constitutionally disputable articles. However, the Government expressed its doubts only in relation to its first paragraph. Therefore, the Constitutional Court proceeded to review only this provision. The second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution provides that religious communities have the right to pursue their activities freely. The Constitution itself thus guarantees to the Catholic Church the freedom to pursue activities in all religious matters, including the liturgy and catechesis. The first paragraph of Article 3 of the Agreement

<sup>45</sup> It is evident from the article of Dr Miha Juhart “Premoženskoppravna razmerja Cerkve v Sloveniji med svetovnjima vojnama” [The Property Relations of the Church in Slovenia between the World Wars] that there are no doubts about this; in the article, he explains that “in contemporary conditions it would probably not go amiss if a special register were introduced in relation to Church legal entities, which, by being made public, could improve the security of legal transactions. Even if such a special register is introduced, the determination of requirements for legal personality might be left entirely to the provisions of internal canon law, and the register would only make details of the internal Church organisation public. Together with the registration of a legal entity, the register could also provide other data which are important for legal transactions.” Published in: Država in Cerkve, izbrani zgodovinski in pravni vidiki, Mednarodni posvet 21. in 22. 6. 2001 [The State and the Church, Selected Historical and Legal Aspects, International Symposium held on 21 and 22 June 2001], Slovenska akademija znanosti in umetnosti, Ljubljana 2002, p. 129.

therefore only confirms the principle of the free pursuit of activities of religious communities determined in the second paragraph of Article 1 of the Agreement. By this provision the contracting parties sought to specifically emphasise the most important parts of the religious activities of the Catholic Church, i.e. the liturgy<sup>46</sup> and catechesis.<sup>47</sup>

44. The freedom to pursue activities in this area is a reflection of the “principle of independence and autonomy”, as it is apparent from the reasoning of this Opinion in relation to the review of Article 1 of the Agreement. The Constitutional Court reiterates that, in order to understand the first paragraph of Article 3 of the Agreement, it is necessary to take into account the constitutionally consistent interpretation of Article 1 thereof. Therefore, the first paragraph of Article 3 of the Agreement cannot be understood in the sense that it could constitute a basis for the liturgy and catechesis to be included in the public activities of the state, e.g. as an element of public education (Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-68/98). This provision refers only to the regulation of the operation of the Catholic Church in the areas in which it is free to act in accordance with the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities. This is also confirmed by the wording of the second paragraph of Article 3, which is an exception to its first paragraph. The wording of the first paragraph of Article 3 of the Agreement would undoubtedly be clearer if it were explicitly emphasised that the freedom to pursue activities refers “especially” or “particularly” to liturgy and catechesis. However, despite the aforementioned, this article can only be interpreted as referring exclusively to the religious activities of the Catholic Church in the Republic of Slovenia. Therefore, the concerns that through this provision the Republic of Slovenia recognises the “entire” operation of the Catholic Church to be free and renounces its powers are unfounded.
45. Consequently, the first paragraph of Article 3 of the Agreement is not inconsistent with the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities enshrined in the first paragraph of Article 7, the principle of sovereignty enshrined in Article 3 and the principles of a state governed by the rule of law enshrined in Article 2 of the Constitution.

Review of the First Paragraph of Article 10 of the Agreement

46. Article 10 of the Agreement reads as follows:

“In accordance with the legislation of the Republic of Slovenia and canon law, the Catholic Church has the right to establish and manage schools of all types and levels, dormitories for secondary school and university students, and other educational institutions.

46 The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy adopted at the Second Vatican Council provides that the liturgy is the summit toward which the activity of the Church is directed (Article 10) and that the “sacred liturgy does not exhaust the entire activity of the Church” (Article 9), Koncilski odluki, op. cit., pp. 65 and 66.

47 It follows from the Decree on the Pastoral Office of Bishops in the Church adopted at the Second Vatican Council that catechesis – catechetical instruction – is one of the primary tasks of bishops (Articles 13 and 14). Ibid., p. 265.

The state provides support to the institutions referred to in the previous paragraph under the same conditions as it provides support to other similar private institutions. The status of secondary school and university students and the pupils of these institutions is equal to the status of students and pupils in public institutions.”

47. The first paragraph is alleged to be constitutionally disputable, as it allows the Catholic Church to interfere with the legal regulation of public schools in the Republic of Slovenia.
48. The area of education is an area in which the Church’s mission and the jurisdiction of the state meet. The Church strives to ensure that Catholic teaching and education are performed in schools of every kind and level, i.e. also in public (state) schools.<sup>48</sup> The Constitutional Court already decided on this issue in Decision No. U-I-68/98. The Agreement does not cover this issue. Article 10 of the Agreement refers exclusively to the right to establish and manage schools, dormitories for secondary school and university students, and other educational organisations. In Article 10 of the Agreement, the Republic of Slovenia recognises the right of the Catholic Church to establish and manage, in accordance with canon law,<sup>49</sup> “schools of all types and levels, dormitories for secondary school and university students, and other educational institutions,” while the Catholic Church undertakes to respect the legislation of the Republic of Slovenia.<sup>50</sup> That the first paragraph of Article 10 of the Agreement relates to the establishment and management of private schools clearly follows from its second paragraph, which refers to the first paragraph and in which the Republic of Slovenia undertakes to provide support to private educational establishments founded by the Catholic Church, in the same manner as other similar private establishments and organisations.
49. Considering the above, the first paragraph of Article 10 is not inconsistent with the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities enshrined in the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution.

48 Book III of the CCL governs “The Teaching Function of the Church”. The Church has “the duty and innate right, independent of any human power whatsoever, to preach the gospel to all peoples” (Can. 747). Can 761 determines that “various means available are to be used to proclaim Christian doctrine: first of all preaching and catechetical instruction, which always hold the principal place, but also the presentation of doctrine in schools, academies, conferences, and meetings of every type.” First and foremost, it is the duty of parents to ensure their children receive a Catholic education, and they have the right to assistance from civil society in order to ensure this (Can. 793). All Catholic religious instruction and education imparted in any schools whatsoever are subject to the authority of the Church (Can. 804).

49 Canon law (Can. 800) grants the Catholic Church the right to establish and direct schools of every discipline, type and level. A Catholic school is a school that is directed by a competent ecclesiastical authority or a public ecclesiastical juridic person or which is recognised as such by an ecclesiastical authority by way of a written document (Can. 803). The local bishop has the right to issue prescripts which pertain to the general regulation of Catholic schools (Can. 805–806).

50 In accordance with Article 57 of the Constitution, the legislation of the Republic of Slovenia governing schooling facilitates and legally regulates the establishment and operation of private schools, which can be established as educational institutions by domestic and foreign natural persons and legal entities, unless otherwise provided for a particular activity or specific type of institution (Articles 1 and 2 of the Institutes Act, Official Gazette RS, No. 12/91, and the Organisation and Financing of Education Act, Official Gazette RS, No. 12/96, etc.).

B – VI

Review of the Second Paragraph of Article 14 of the Agreement

50. Article 14 reads as follows:

“The Republic of Slovenia and the Holy See shall resolve any disagreement that might arise due to the interpretation or application of the provisions of this Agreement amicably and through diplomatic channels.

The Republic of Slovenia and the Holy See shall endeavour to continue discussing outstanding issues that are not the subject of this Agreement, with the intention of resolving them by mutual agreement.”

51. The second paragraph is alleged to be constitutionally disputable, as it imposes on the Republic of Slovenia the obligation to bilaterally resolve all outstanding issues which are not covered by this Agreement, and the Republic of Slovenia allows the Holy See to participate in the decision-making process on issues that fall under its sovereign and exclusive jurisdiction.

52. By this provision the state undertakes to further attempt to settle any possible outstanding issue with the Holy See by mutual agreement. However, this provision can only be understood in the sense that the state is also restricted by the constitutional order when trying to reach further agreements. Thereby, it assumes the duty to negotiate so that, on the basis of the diplomatic negotiations conducted, it will endeavour to find amicable and mutually acceptable solutions for any outstanding issue that is not covered either sufficiently or at all by the Agreement. The second paragraph of Article 14, however, does not imply that, by assuming such obligation, the Republic of Slovenia also assumed the obligation in advance to reach an agreement in subsequent negotiations regarding a mutually acceptable solution, i.e. that it assumed the duty to reach an agreement. Therefore, such provision cannot in itself be inconsistent with the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities enshrined in the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution. This principle does not exclude the conclusion of agreements with specific religious communities. If the outcome of such an agreement remains within the constitutional limits defined by the Constitutional Court in this Opinion with regard to Article 1 of the Agreement, it will not be inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution.

B – VII

53. In this review, the Constitutional Court issued the opinion that the challenged provisions of the Agreement are not inconsistent with the Constitution and adopted an interpretative decision regarding Article 1 of the Agreement, which is vital for the review of the other provisions of the Agreement. The decisions of the Constitutional Court are binding (the third paragraph of Article 1 of the CCA). An opinion issued in a case concerning the review of the constitutionality of a treaty that is in the process of ratification has the same legal effects. As the Constitutional Court has already emphasised in its Opinion No. Rm-1/97, such opinion has an internal legal effect – it is binding on the state authorities of the Republic of Slovenia; however, in the area of international law, such a decision has no effect. In the implementation of the Agreement (either when concluding further agreements with the Holy See or adopting legislation), provided it is ratified and enters into force, the state authorities of the Republic of Slovenia will be required to take into account the content of the reviewed provisions of the Agreement as determined by the interpretation of the Constitutional Court. Such will also need to be taken into account by the National Assembly when ratifying the Agreement. As the Constitutional Court emphasised already in its Opinion No. Rm-1/00, dated 19 April 2001 (Official Gazette RS, No. 43/01, and OdlUS X, 78), any disagreement arising between the contracting parties during the implementation of the Agreement due to a different understanding of its content (particularly Article 1) by the other contracting party cannot be the subject of constitutional review, but is instead a matter for political debate in the National Assembly upon its ratification.

C

54. The Constitutional Court issued this Opinion on the basis of Article 70 of the CCA and the second indent of the third paragraph of Article 46 of the Rules of Procedure of the Constitutional Court (Official Gazette, Nos. 93/03 and 98/03 – corr.), composed of: Dr Dragica Wedam-Lukić, President, and Judges Dr Janez Čebulj, Dr Zvonko Fišer, Lojze Janko, Mag. Marija Krisper Kramberger, Milojka Modrijan, Dr Ciril Ribičič, Dr Mirjam Šrk, and Jože Tratnik. The Opinion was adopted unanimously.

Decision No. U-I-111/04, dated 8 July 2004

DECISION

At a session held on 8 July 2004 in proceedings to examine the petition and in proceedings initiated upon the request of the Mayor of the Urban Municipality of Ljubljana, and upon the petition of the Islamic Religious Community in the Republic of Slovenia, based in Ljubljana, represented by Mufti Osman Đogič, and Nevzet Porić, Ljubljana, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. The Order Calling a Subsequent Referendum on the Implementation of the Ordinance Amending the Ordinance on the Adoption of Spatial Planning Conditions for the V2 Trnovo – Tržaška Cesta Planning Unit (for the VR-2/6 Ob Cesti Dveh Cesarjev Planning Area) and the Order Amending this Order (Official Gazette RS, No. 41/04) are annulled.
2. The request for the review of the constitutionality of the Local Self-Government Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 72/93, 57/94, 14/95, 26/97, 70/97, 10/98, 74/98, 70/2000, and 51/02) and the petition to initiate proceedings for the review of its constitutionality are rejected.

A

1. The applicant [i.e. the Mayor] submitted a request to review the constitutionality of the Order Calling a Subsequent Referendum on the Implementation of the Ordinance Amending the Ordinance on the Adoption of Spatial Planning Conditions for the V2 Trnovo – Tržaška Cesta Planning Unit (for the VR-2/6 Ob Cesti Dveh Cesarjev Planning Area) and of the Order Amending this Order (Official Gazette RS, No. 41/04) (hereinafter [collectively] referred to as the Order Calling the Referendum) because she believes that holding the referendum and the consequences resulting from the possible rejection of the general act that is to be submitted to the referendum would be contrary to the Constitution. As the Local Self-Government Act (hereinafter referred to as the LSGA) does not provide for the possibility of a constitutional review of a referendum question prior to the calling of the referendum, she submitted the request on the basis of Article 33 of the LSGA. She believes that she is entitled, on the basis of the mentioned provision of the LSGA, to request a constitutional review of the Order Calling the Referendum as, within the preliminary procedure for deciding on an initiative to call a referendum, Article 47 of the LSGA grants her only the right to review the conditions determined by statute and the municipal charter that are of a “procedural-technical character”.

2. The applicant deems that the Constitutional Court may also conduct a substantive review of the Order Calling the Referendum. She deems that such a review is justified by the special circumstances (i.e. the exceptionality of the case, the serious unconstitutionality that might occur if in the referendum the citizens decided on the constitutional rights of a religiously defined social minority, and preventing a [referendum] decision on constitutional rights). The request for the referendum allegedly gained the support of the required number of voters as it was based on religious intolerance that was clearly and unambiguously expressed during the process of collecting signatures. Its initiators clearly and unambiguously expressed their view that the referendum entails “a referendum against the mosque” in the media, on the streets, on billboards in front of the offices of administrative units, and in written pamphlets inviting people to support the initiative to call the referendum.<sup>1</sup> The purpose of the referendum question was allegedly clearly evident from the reasoning of the request to call a referendum, in which its initiators stated that the construction of a mosque was not necessary and that Muslims could satisfy their religious needs in a simpler manner (i.e. in prayer rooms). The applicant emphasises that the initiators of the referendum publicly substantiated the initiative to call the referendum with statements in which they connected Muslims with terrorism, a different culture, way of life, and historical past, and expressed general distrust and fear of them. Thus, the referendum allegedly does not concern issues involving [the mosque’s] location or technical realisation, as the initiators began to emphasise such only in the last stage of the process of collecting signatures, after having realised, on the basis of the publicly expressed opinions of a number of legal experts, that the referendum question was constitutionally disputable.
3. The applicant submitted a comparative analysis of the consideration of legislatures’ actual intent in conducting a constitutional review, and referred in particular to decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States of America and to academic literature from the area of constitutional law. Concerning such, she also cited Constitutional Court decisions and separate opinions of individual judges, Constitutional Court Order No. U-II-3/03, dated 22 December 2003, and the analysis and commentary on that Order in the article “(Referendumske) meje in pasti ustavne demokracije [(Referendum) Limits and Traps of Constitutional Democracy]”.<sup>2</sup> As constitutional theory undoubtedly recognises the consideration of intent in a constitutional review, the Constitutional Court should allegedly not only review the text of the referendum question, which at first glance appears to be linguistically neutral, but should also consider that it in fact concerns the prevention of the exercise of the constitutional rights of a certain group of people.

4. The applicant believes that deciding in a referendum whether or not to build a mosque is contrary to the Constitution, in particular Articles 1, 7, 15, 2, 34, 35, 39, 41, 42, 61, and 63. The equality of religious communities determined by Article 7 of the Constitution and the principle of equality determined by Article 14 of the Constitution allegedly guarantee that adherents of the Islamic religion can exercise their religious rights in the same manner as adherents of other religions, and that for this purpose they can build places of worship. The free pursuit of the activities of religious communities is allegedly ensured only when religious communities can, in conformity with the Constitution and the laws, freely decide on the manner of their religious activity. If such activity is rendered impossible, the rights determined by Articles 34, 35, 39, 41, and 42 are allegedly violated. Such referendum is allegedly also contrary to the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution and Article 17 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR), which do not allow that the Islamic religious community be recognised rights to a lesser extent than other religious communities. From the principle of the separation of religious communities and the state (Article 7 of the Constitution) there allegedly follows the obligation of the state to ensure religious equality, not to privilege or discriminate against a certain religion or certain religions, to be neutral regarding all religions and beliefs, and to create conditions for the exercise of this constitutional right not only in private, but also in public premises. The reasoning of the initiative to call the referendum, the initiators' public appearances, and the public debates are allegedly an evident expression of religious intolerance, which is prohibited by Article 63 of the Constitution.
5. Furthermore, the applicant emphasises the findings of the Human Rights Ombudsman and the report of the European Commissioner for Human Rights on the situation in the area of human rights protection in Slovenia. She also suggests that the Constitutional Court review the constitutionality of the LSGA as, in the case of an initiative to call a referendum, it does not enable municipal authorities to initiate procedures for a preliminary review of such. She deems that the gap in the law interferes with the rights of local communities since all residents living in the local community, i.e. also those who belong to a social minority, have to be guaranteed the right to impede a referendum if they are affected thereby. As guardians of constitutionality and legality, municipal authorities should have the possibility to prevent an unconstitutional referendum.
6. On 16 April 2004, the Islamic Religious Community and its member Nevzet Porić (hereinafter referred to as the petitioners) lodged a petition to review the constitutionality of the LSGA. On 23 April 2004, they also lodged a petition to review the constitutionality of the Order Calling the Referendum and supplemented the previously lodged petition for the review of the constitutionality of the LSGA. The petitioners deem that they demonstrated legal interest to challenge the Order Calling the Referendum concerning the construction of the mosque. The challenged Order allegedly directly interferes with their rights and interests and, in particular, with the position of the Islamic Religious Community, which for thirty years has been trying to build a place of worship and cultural centre. In this regard, they assert that the Constitutional Court has already recognised legal interest to challenge acts calling a referendum. In Order No. U-I-29/91, dated 24 October 1991, it allegedly recognised such legal interest to an individual citizen, and in Decision No. U-I-144/94, dated 15 July 1994 (Official Gazette RS, No. 45/94, and OdlUS III, 95), it recognised such to a group of citizens and the Citizens' Initiative of Slovene Istria, based in Koper. In order to protect the constitutional rights and freedoms of entitled petitioners, the Constitutional Court allegedly has to recognise their right to challenge an act calling a referendum. Concerning such, it should allegedly also consider the fact that the legislation does not enable a preliminary constitutional review of an initiative to call a referendum at the local level, and thus not even a minimum level of protection of the constitutional rights and freedoms of the individuals or groups that are directly affected by a referendum is provided.

7. The petitioners emphasise that the case at issue concerns a conflict between the initiators of the referendum and the Islamic Religious Community. In deciding, the Constitutional Court should allegedly consider the position taken by the German Constitutional Court in the Lüth case. According to such, the constitution is a direct source of law that, as such, applies not only in relations between the individual and the state, but also in mutual relations between individuals and social groups. From the reasoning of the initiative to call the referendum, media reports, and public communications that the initiators of the referendum directed at the voters, it allegedly clearly follows that the calling of such a referendum entails a violation of constitutional provisions, particularly Articles 14, 39, 41, 42, 61, and 63 of the Constitution.
8. The petitioners propose a review of the constitutionality of the LSGA for the same reasons as the applicant. They emphasise that also a local referendum might lead to a violation of constitutional principles and rights. The reasons for which the initiators of the referendum oppose the construction of a mosque are allegedly explicitly constitutionally inadmissible. They allegedly concern the prevention of religious activity, which the majority of the population is not entitled to prevent nor is it entitled to impose its opinion on the members of a religious community. The intolerance that was already evident during the collection of the signatures to support the initiative to call the referendum allegedly even increased during the referendum campaign. Unconstitutional consequences would allegedly occur due to the rejection of the Ordinance [in the referendum]. The construction of a mosque, which Muslims have been awaiting for decades, would again be postponed for an indefinite time.

9. The Municipal Council of the Urban Municipality of Ljubljana informed the Constitutional Court that it supported the Mayor's request. It did not, however, reply to the petition of the Islamic Religious Community and Nevzet Porić to review the constitutionality of the Order Calling the Referendum.
10. The National Assembly did not reply to the request to review the constitutionality of the LSGA.
11. The Government asserted in its opinion, which was inter alia communicated to the Constitutional Court, that the LSGA does not give a municipal council the possibility to request the constitutional review of a request to call a referendum. Thus, a municipal council cannot oppose the calling of a referendum even if it is of the opinion that the posed question is not consistent with the Constitution and the law. Therefore, it would allegedly be reasonable to amend the LSGA with regard to this issue.
12. The first signer among the initiators of the initiative to lodge a request to call a referendum, Mihael Jarc, deems that the Constitutional Court has no jurisdiction to review the Order Calling the Referendum for reasons that he already stated in the reply submitted to the request of the Municipal Council of the Urban Municipality of Ljubljana in cases No. U-II-2/04 and No. U-I-76/04. In the cited cases the Constitutional Court held that it had no jurisdiction to decide. He stated that the rejection of the Ordinance in a referendum would not result in an unconstitutional situation, as this would entail that such unconstitutional situation already exists. The rights of the Islamic Religious Community would allegedly only be violated if the religious community did not have any place of worship and if it could not perform its religious rites at all. He asserts that the Islamic Religious Community owns thirteen places of worship in Slovenia and is thus able to perform religious rites in more modest circumstances. Only if the construction of a mosque were rejected in several repeated referenda and the Islamic Religious Community did not have other possibilities to perform religious rites would it be possible to assert that its rights were violated. He emphasised that the initiators of the referendum "do not explicitly oppose a mosque but its currently envisaged dimensions and location, namely for a number of especially substantiated reasons which have nothing in common with religious intolerance." He warns that in the Ordinance that is to be submitted to the referendum the mosque is not even formally mentioned and therefore if in the referendum the Ordinance were approved the Islamic Religious Community would have to obtain the land in an appropriate public tender procedure wherein also other religious communities in the Republic of Slovenia could compete.

B – I

13. The Constitutional Court joined the request and the petitions for joint consideration and decision-making. By Order No. U-I-111/04, dated 28 April 2004 (Official Gazette RS, No. 51/04), the Constitutional Court suspended the implementation of the Order Calling the Referendum.

14. The applicant challenges the Order Calling the Referendum. Hitherto the Constitutional Court has always considered an act by which a referendum is called to be a regulation and has reviewed it as such.<sup>3</sup> The Order Calling the Referendum is thus a regulation of a local community. According to the fifth paragraph of Article 33 of the LSGA, if a mayor considers a general act of a municipality to be unconstitutional, he or she suspends the publication of the act and proposes that the municipal council decide on it again at its next session, whereby the mayor must state the reasons for the suspension. If the municipal council confirms its original decision, the general act is published and the mayor may lodge a request for the review of its conformity with the Constitution with the Constitutional Court. As [in the case at issue] the Mayor suspended the publication of the Order Calling the Referendum and the Municipal Council voted on it again and decided to publish it, the procedural pre-conditions for the review of the Order Calling the Referendum determined by the fifth paragraph of Article 33 of the LSGA are fulfilled. Thus, on the basis of the fourth indent of the first paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court is competent to review its constitutionality.
15. Due to the position adopted in Order No. U-I-257/03, dated 26 January 2004, according to which, due to the special regulation of the preliminary review of the constitutionality of a referendum question in accordance with Article 16 of the [Referendum and Popular Initiative Act], the Constitutional Court declared as inadmissible the request of a group of Deputies to review the constitutionality of an order by which a subsequent legislative referendum had been called, it was necessary to examine whether the Mayor's request was admissible from this point of view. Therefore, the Constitutional Court had to answer the question of whether with regard to local referenda the LSGA provides for the special legal remedy of a preliminary review, the non-exhaustion of which entails a procedural impediment.
16. The second paragraph of Article 47 of the LSGA authorises a mayor to require the initiator of a request to call a local referendum to remedy inconsistencies in the referendum initiative if such is not drafted in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 47 of the LSGA,<sup>4</sup> or if it is contrary to the law or the municipality's charter. If the initiator fails to do so, the initiative is deemed to not have been submitted, and, pursuant to the third paragraph of the same article, the initiator may require that the Administrative Court review the mayor's decision. The LSGA thus enables a mayor

3 E.g. Decision No. U-I-114/91, dated 28 January 1993 (Official Gazette RS, No. 8/93, and OdlUS II, 9), Decision No. U-I-144/94, and Decision No. U-I-279/96, dated 10 September 1996 (Official Gazette RS, No. 51/96, and OdlUS V, 126).

4 The provision of the first paragraph of Article 47 of the LSGA reads as follows: "An initiative for voters to lodge a request to call a referendum may be submitted by every voter or political party in a municipality or the council of a narrower part of a municipality. The initiative must contain a request to call a referendum, which has to include the clearly expressed question that is to be the subject of the referendum, and a statement of reasons. The charter of a municipality can determine that an initiative must be supported by the signatures of a certain number of voters, which have to be provided on a list containing the following personal data of the signers: name and surname, date of birth, and address of permanent residence."

to review the legality of a request to call a referendum, and provides the initiators of the referendum with a legal remedy against the mayor's decision. However, it does not authorise a mayor to lodge a request for a preliminary review of the constitutionality of a referendum question. Accordingly, also from this point of view, the fulfilment of the procedural requirements for the review of the Order Calling the Referendum upon the Mayor's request is undisputable.

17. The procedural requirements for a review of the constitutionality of the Order Calling the Referendum upon the Mayor's request are thus fulfilled. Therefore, the Constitutional Court had to review the constitutionality of the challenged Order due to the reasons stated by the applicant. In light of such, the Constitutional Court did not have to address the issue of whether the petitioners demonstrated legal interest for a review of the constitutionality of the Order Calling the Referendum. As the petitioners did not allege anything new that the applicant had not already claimed, the Constitutional Court accepted their petition and, as the conditions under the fourth paragraph of Article 26 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA) were fulfilled, proceeded to decide the case on the merits.

B – II

18. In accordance with the first paragraph of Article 74a of the LSGA, the act calling a referendum determines the content of the question to be decided on in the referendum, the day the referendum is called, the referendum area, and the day of voting. In contrast to general acts calling elections at the state or local level, where the act calling the elections only determines the date of the calling of the elections and the day of voting,<sup>5</sup> the LSGA explicitly determines that the content of an act calling a referendum must also include the “content of the question to be decided on in the referendum.” An act calling a referendum is namely a general act by which eligible persons are called on to express on a certain day their will regarding the content of the referendum question.<sup>6</sup> If only the legality of the content of a referendum ques-

  2. The first paragraph of Article 28 of the Local Elections Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 72/93, etc.) determines the following: “In an act calling elections, the day the elections are called and the day of voting shall be determined.”
  - 6 1. Hitherto the Constitutional Court has already reviewed orders calling referenda on the introduction of mandatory contributions by residents to co-fund local infrastructure projects on the merits if the procedural conditions for their consideration were fulfilled. Article 7 of the Act that regulates mandatory contributions by residents to co-fund local infrastructure projects (Official Gazette RS, No. 35/85 – official consolidated text) namely determined the content of an act calling a referendum on the introduction of mandatory contributions by residents.
  2. By Decision No. U-I-114/91, it annulled two orders calling referenda on the introduction of mandatory contributions by residents to co-fund local infrastructure projects as they did not contain all the tion is disputed, the mayor must proceed in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 47 of the LSGA, and the initiators of the referendum can protect their right [in this regard] by means of a legal remedy filed before the Administrative Court in accordance with the third paragraph of Article 47 of the LSGA. However, if the constitutionality of its content is questioned, as a constitutive part of a regulation it is subject to constitutional review.

19. Point 2 of the Order Calling the Referendum determines the following:

“The question submitted to the referendum reads as follows: Do you agree with the implementation of the Ordinance Amending the Ordinance on the Adoption of Spatial Planning Conditions for the V2 Trnovo – Tržaška Cesta Planning Unit (for the VR-2/6 Ob Cesti Dveh Cesarjev Planning Area)?”

20. The essential subject of this review is thus the issue of whether Point 2 of the Order Calling the Referendum is inconsistent with the Constitution for the reasons asserted by the applicant.

B – III

21. The aim of spatial management is to enable coherent spatial development through consolidation of economic, social, and environmental aspects of development.<sup>7</sup> By means of their spatial management competences, municipalities determine the use of land and spatial arrangements of local importance in conformity with the fundamental provisions of the SMA-1 and the directions contained in strategic spatial acts adopted by the State.<sup>8</sup> Spatial arrangements are determined and planned by spatial acts.<sup>9</sup> Until the entry into force of the spatial orders of municipalities, the spatial management conditions,<sup>10</sup> which can be amended or supplemented according to the same procedure pursuant to which they were adopted, remain in force. The ordinance that is the subject of the Order Calling the Referendum is such an act. The first paragraph of Article 46 of the LSGA explicitly only prohibits referenda on the budget and the final balance of accounts of a municipality and on general acts by which, in conformity with the law, municipal taxes and other duties are elements prescribed by law (e.g. the determination of the total amount required for the implementation of the project, the determination of the manner in which the funds would be used).

3. By Decision No. U-I-269/96, dated 7 November 1996 (Official Gazette RS, No. 66/96, and OdlUS V, 146), it abrogated two orders calling referenda as they were inconsistent with the statutory provision determining the persons who may and who must participate in the referenda and who are thus obliged to pay the contributions. The Constitutional Court deemed that this fundamental inconsistency with the law was in itself a sufficient reason to abrogate the challenged acts. Furthermore, it held the following: “A referendum performed contrary to the law and a mandatory contribution determined contrary to the law cannot constitute the basis for introducing obligations for residents.”

7 See the first paragraph of Article 3 of the Spatial Management Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 110/02 and 8/03 – corr. – hereinafter referred to as the SMA-1).

8 See the first paragraph of Article 12 the SMA-1. See also Article 29 of the LSGA.

levied. Thus, in accordance with the law, spatial management decisions that lie in the competence of municipalities may in principle be put to a referendum.

22. The Ordinance that is the subject of the referendum under review amends and supplements the Ordinance adopted in 1988 (Official Gazette SRS, Nos. 6/88, etc.). It envisages the construction of new buildings intended for religious and cultural activities (i.e. the type and purpose of the spatial modification) on land comprising two plots that belong to the VR 2/6 Ob Cesti Dveh Cesarjev, m. e. 4C planning area (Article 3 of the Ordinance). From the text that determines the height of the buildings (the prayer room and the minaret) in relation to their surroundings, it follows that the building will be intended for Islamic worship (i.e. a mosque).<sup>11</sup> Such is also confirmed by the reasoning of the Proposal of the Ordinance (No. 3521-13798-38, dated 13 October 2003), which states that the proposed building was the result of the Islamic Religious Community's efforts to obtain a proper location for the construction of an Islamic religious and cultural centre in Ljubljana. The reasoning also contains positions concerning the comments submitted during the period for public disclosure and discussion of the draft of the Ordinance. In the reasoning, the body that proposed the Ordinance stated that in addition to expert opinions (regarding the location of the structure, its exposure, the threat of flooding, the size and height of the structure, traffic solutions, and noise) and complaints made by garden allotment holders and immediate neighbours, numerous anonymous comments that expressed general opposition to the construction of a mosque were submitted.
23. In the introductory part of its reasoning, the request to call a referendum emphasises that the "religious and cultural centre" will be intended for "a group of almost ten thousand people." From the reasoning it follows that the initiators believe that the Tavzes (Ed.), Cankarjeva založba, Ljubljana 2002, defines the following: "džamija – večja muslimanska molilnica" [mosque – a large Muslim place of prayer], "mošeja – ([...] from Arab. masgid shrine, from saged to pay reverence, worship) a Muslim building intended for religious rites, a shrine", "minaret– (Turk. minare from Arab. manara beacon, from nana to beam) a slimhigh tower next to a Muslim mosque from which a muezzin calls believers to prayer"; pp. 246, 761, and 739.

2. In French, the established expression is mosque (mosquée) designating a religious building of Islam; it is essentially a place of worship. Depending on its importance, it is called djami (mosque-cathedral) or masjid (the mosque of a quarter or district). A minaret is the tower of a mosque, from the top of which a muezzin daily calls out the call to prayer. See Dictionnaire général pour la maîtrise de la langue française, la culture classique et contemporaine, Larousse, Paris 1993, pp. 1045 and 1019.
3. In English, the established term is mosque, which means a building in which Muslims worship their god; a minaret is a high narrow tower, usually a part of a mosque, from which Muslims are called to prayer. question of what buildings are appropriate for practicing religion should be decided on by the majority. Concerning such, they emphasise that they do not oppose that the Islamic Religious Community be ensured proper conditions for exercising their constitutional right to freedom of religion, but at the same time they deem “that they cannot be ensured this right only by means of one large building for the whole country, but by a number of territorially equally distributed places of worship.” They asses “that there is no need to build a large cultural and religious centre at this location, as several prayer rooms in Ljubljana would ensure followers of the Islamic way of life a more complete religious service, particularly due to the dispersion of places of worship and better accessibility of such with regard to traffic and other aspects that such dispersion would bring about.”

24. The mentioned opinions and positions from the reasoning of the request to call a referendum also featured in the campaign seeking supporters for the request to call a referendum. From numerous materials attached to the request, particularly from the records of television and radio discussions and from newspaper articles, it follows that the referendum was to decide on the question of whether the Islamic Religious Community and its members should be allowed to build a place of worship (a mosque) or not. Although also other reservations (e.g. as to the appropriateness of the location and the technical aspects of the building) were expressed, what prevailed was evidently and undoubtedly the argumentation that was already expressed in the reasoning of the request to call the referendum – namely that the Islamic Religious Community does not need such a large building to satisfy its religious needs as several so-called prayer rooms would suffice.<sup>12</sup> Therefore, the referendum on the Ordinance would not only entail deciding on the construction of a certain building in a particular environment, but it would also concern deciding on the question of whether the Islamic Religious Community should be ensured the right to practice its religion in a mosque or not.<sup>13</sup>

25. In light of the above, the Constitutional Court had to review the constitutionality of Point 2 of the Order Calling the Referendum from the perspective of opposition to the construction of a mosque. Concerning such, the issues of the location, size, and design of the building and its constitutive parts, access to the building, etc., cannot be the subjects of this review as, in accordance with spatial planning legislation, these issues have to be resolved already within the procedure for planning the construction of a building or within the relevant procedures for issuing a building permit.

26. Article 44 of the Constitution determines that every citizen has the right, in accordance with the law, to participate either directly or through elected representatives in the management of public affairs. This right is a classic universal constitutional right, the essential characteristic of which is that it guarantees to all citizens the possibility to participate in the management of public affairs in accordance with the law. It is most directly exercised at the level of local communities and by referenda and statutory initiatives, and indirectly through elections; the manner of exercising this right is determined by law.<sup>14</sup> However, it does not directly follow from the mentioned constitutional provision that the law should give priority to direct decision-making over representative democracy. Legal theory has emphasised that direct decision-making can be disputable when the protection of minorities and their constitutional rights is at issue.<sup>15</sup> With regard to local referenda, the Constitu-lic funds for that purpose. The Federal Constitutional Court decided that the public interest in prohibiting such assembly and association prevailed over the complainant's right to a public gathering. It assessed that the slogan of the public gathering pursued the goal of aggressively inciting the exclusion of Jewish citizens of Germany, and that such could not be changed by the subsequently submitted financial-political slogan. According to the Court, the complainant simply wanted to prevent the construction of the synagogue. Although the new slogan did not in fact incite the masses to hatred, given the existence of the previous slogan, it did not change the public perception.

- 15 The following positions can, for example, be found in academic literature:
1. “A balanced conclusion seems to be this: the referendum is neither better nor worse than representative democracy. The sad fact is that both direct and representative institutions of democracy can be used to enact legislation which discriminates against minorities. This is why we need constitutional courts and Bills of Rights. Minorities are always vulnerable and need special protection.”
  2. “[...] Issues like religion, language and nationality, especially when combined, arouse emotions which make compromise impossible [so] that referenda on these issues ought to be avoided, at least if we maintain that consensus government and the protection of minorities are goals in themselves.”
  3. “Referenda are theoretically least likely to lead to oppressions of minorities in large jurisdictions, as an increasing number of citizens increases the probability that the various majorities cancel each other out. [...] Therefore minority-threatening referenda would tend to be unsuccessful in larger polities than in smaller ones. There is empirical evidence which supports this interpretation. [...] Even this percentage is unacceptable, and a vivid illustration of the need for constitutional courts, which can rectify the

tion does not contain any provision equivalent to the second paragraph of Article 90 of the Constitution, which under certain conditions guarantees the right to decide by legislative referendum as a constitutional right. The right to decision-making in a local referendum as one of the forms of direct decision-making is ensured by Article 44 of the LSGA. In deciding on the case at issue, the Constitutional Court did not have to adopt a position regarding the question of whether such entails that the right to decide by local referendum is only protected as a statutory right or whether, with regard to Article 44 of the Constitution, it enjoys constitutional protection equal to that of human rights or fundamental freedoms. Already in Order No. U-II-3/03, dated 22 December 2003, the Constitutional Court namely emphasised that the Constitution is also binding for citizens when they exercise power directly (the second paragraph of Article 3) by deciding on a certain statute in a referendum (Article 90 of the Constitution). The same has to apply to instances of direct decision-making in local referenda. The Republic of Slovenia was established as a constitutional democracy, the essence of which is that the values protected by the Constitution, including, in particular, fundamental human rights and freedoms (the preamble to the Constitution), can prevail over the democratically adopted decisions of the majority.<sup>16</sup> With regard to such, in reviewing the admissibility of a referendum the Constitutional Court must take into consideration that decisions that would be inconsistent with the Constitution may not be put to a referendum.

27. The first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution guarantees the free profession of religion in private and public life. Already in Decision No. U-I-68/98, dated 22 November 2001 (Official Gazette RS, No. 101/01, and OdlUS X, 192), the Constitutional Court held that freedom of religion ensures individuals that they may freely profess their religion, by themselves or together with others, publicly or privately, through teaching, the fulfilment of religious duties, worship, and the performance of religious rites, which are [collectively] designated as the so-called positive aspect of freedom of religion. Thereby the Constitution does not only protect the individual but also the profession of religion within a community. The right to religious freedom is also protected by numerous international instruments that, in comparison with Article 41 of the Constitution, determine the content and scope of this human right in greater detail. - 16 "The adjective "constitutional" in the concept of constitutional democracy is not merely a decorative addition or a modest change in the meaning of the noun democracy (...). The adjective "constitutional" in the concept of constitutional democracy entails a genuine interference with the noun itself. It determines no less and no more than the limits of the principle of democracy; it expresses the idea that the assessment of whether majority decisions are correct is hence subject to a basic reservation, namely the reservation of whether such decisions are in conformity with the constitution." The Vice President of the Constitutional Court of the Federal Republic of Germany W. Hassemer in his paper "Constitutional Democracy", Pravnik, No. 4-5/2003, Vol. 58, p. 214.

December 1948, determines that this right includes the freedom to change one's religion as well as its free, public, and private profession, either individually or in community with others, through teaching, the fulfilment of religious duties, worship, and the performance of rites. The content of the right to profess one's religion is similarly determined by Article 18 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (Official Gazette SFRY, MP, No. 7/71, and Official Gazette RS, No. 35/92, MP, No. 9/92 – hereinafter referred to as the Covenant) and Article 9 of the ECHR.<sup>17</sup> It is established case law of the European Court of Human Rights that Article 9 of the ECHR guarantees religious freedom not only to individuals, but also to religious communities that are “capable of having and exercising the rights contained in the first paragraph of Article 9.”<sup>18</sup> Traditionally, religious communities exist in the form of organised structures. In a democratic society they are thus an indispensable constitutive part of pluralism, and therefore, according to the position of the European Court of Human Rights, they are even the central subject of protection under Article 9 of the ECHR.<sup>19</sup>

28. It is crucial for the exercise of the right to the free profession of religion that religious communities be allowed to build religious buildings in a manner that is traditional for the profession of a particular faith, their religious rites, and customs. Thereby it is necessary to take into consideration that the profession of a certain religion is not necessarily only focused on religious worship and the performance of religious rites, but that it can also be connected with social, educational, and cultural activities. The profession of a religion in a manner that is usual and generally accepted for the profession of the relevant religion is a precondition for the exercise of the free profession of religion, individually or in community with others, and therefore enjoys constitutional protection. Such a position is also confirmed by international instruments. In addition to providing the general definition of this right in Article 1 (the right to have a religion or whatever belief of one's choice, and the freedom, either individually or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest one's religion or belief in worship, observance, practice, and teaching), the United Nations'

17 The provision determines the following:

- “1) Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change one's religion or belief and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest one's religion or belief, in worship, teaching, practice and observance.
- 2) Freedom to manifest one's religion or beliefs shall be subject only to such limitations as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of public safety, for the protection of public order, health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.”

Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and of Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief, proclaimed by Resolution No. 36/55, dated 25 November 1981,<sup>20</sup> also defines the broader content and meaning of this right in Article 6. Thus, in point a) it determines that the right to freedom of thought, conscience, religion, or belief includes the freedom “to worship or assemble in connection with a religion or belief, and to establish and maintain places for these purposes,” and in point e) the freedom “to teach a religion or belief in places suitable for these purposes.” The Concluding Document of the Vienna Meeting of the Conference for Security and Co-operation in Europe in 1989 (hereinafter referred to as The Concluding Document of the Vienna Meeting of the OSCE)<sup>21</sup> mentions the importance of places of worship for the profession of a religion and the functioning of religious communities. The fourth paragraph of Article 16 of the Document determines that the freedom to profess one’s religion also entails that religious communities be allowed to establish and maintain freely accessible places of worship or assembly.<sup>22</sup>

29. It follows from the above-stated that the right to freely profess a religion includes the right of individuals and religious communities to profess a religion, individually or in community with others, in places of worship that are usual and generally accepted (i.e. traditional) for the profession of their religion and the performance of their religious rites.<sup>23</sup> This aspect of the right to freedom of religion follows not only from the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution, but also from the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution, according to which religious communities pursue their activities freely.<sup>24</sup> In light of such, the conviction of the initiators of the request to call the referendum that building places of worship in a manner that is traditional for the

Therein the Republic of Slovenia emphasised “the consistent commitment and dedication of our state to the fundamental values, principles, and goals of the OSCE, and expressed its decision to cooperate more actively in their implementation.”

22 The second indent of the first paragraph of Principle 16 reads as follows: “establish and maintain freely accessible places of worship or assembly”.

23 With regard to the fact that it is also essential for the free profession of one’s religion that religious communities are allowed to build, hire, or own buildings that correspond to their manner of worship and their religious (and social) practice, see also Religious Human Rights in Global Perspective, Legal Perspectives, Edited by Johan D. van der Vyver and John White, Jr., Martinus Nijhoff Publishers; W. Cole Durham, JR, Perspectives on Religious Liberty: A Comparative Framework, pp. 37–40.

24 The free pursuit of the activities of religious communities is a particularly emphasised constitutional right within the general freedom of natural persons and legal entities to act determined by Article 35 of the Constitution. It is ensured to religious communities not only in private life and on private premises, but in public life as well. See L. Šturm in: Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije [Commentary on the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia], Commentary on Article 7, points 11 and 12, p. 125.

profession of an individual religion is not a constitutive part of the right to freedom of religion is erroneous.<sup>25</sup> It is certainly necessary to take into consideration that the construction of such buildings must be planned and realised in conformity with existing legal regulations on spatial planning and construction. However, as already mentioned (Paragraph 25 of this reasoning), that is not the subject of this constitutional review.

30. Already in Opinion No. Rm-1/02, dated 19 November 2003 (Official Gazette RS, No. 118/03, and OdlUS XII, 89), by which it decided on the constitutionality of certain provisions of the Agreement between the Republic of Slovenia and the Holy See on Legal Issues, the Constitutional Court emphasised that the state must allow the free functioning of religious communities as concerns the exercise of the constitutional right to freedom of conscience, and that it must enable individual and collective religious freedom. It follows from the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution that religious communities enjoy equal rights and that they may pursue their activities freely.<sup>26</sup> It follows from the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities (the first paragraph of Article 7) that the state must not identify with a particular religious or other ideology.

31. The Constitutional Court had to answer the question of whether in the case at 25 The Council of Europe Commissioner on Human Rights, Alvaro Gil-Robles, also highlighted the significance of this in the Report on his Visit to Slovenia (11–14 May 2003), wherein he stated the following: “Almost 48,000 persons declared themselves as Muslims at the 2002 official census, making Islam the second most widespread religion in Slovenia. However, despite the efforts by the Slovenian Muslim community over the past 30 years, there is no Mosque or Islamic Cultural Centre in Slovenia. As a result, Muslim worshippers have to meet in apartments, garages and other private premises. The Minister for Foreign Affairs with whom I raised this issue, noted that the authorities had no objection to the building of the mosque, and that the mayor of Ljubljana had indeed already taken the decision to allow the construction of the Mosque, a decision supported by the Government. While a location has been identified, the Minister invoked resistance by the local population towards building the Mosque. I welcome the decision allowing the construction of the Mosque, and would like to urge the authorities not to give in to the pressures exerted by some parts of the population against the building of the Mosque. Having a place to worship is an integral part of one’s right to freely exercise his or her religion. In this context, I would like to refer to the Recommendation by the European Commission against Racism and Intolerance which called upon member States to ‘ensure that the Muslim communities are not discriminated against as to the circumstances in which they organise and exercise their religion.’” issue deciding on the implementation of a spatial planning act in a referendum interferes with the right determined by the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution. Thereby it took into consideration the fact that the casting of votes by those entitled to vote on the content of the referendum question does not merely entail the exercise of freedom of expression (Article 39 of the Constitution), as the referendum does not have a merely consultative character. A decision reached in the referendum would be binding. If a majority voted against the implementation of the Ordinance, the Islamic Religious Community would be prevented from building a traditional place of worship (a mosque), which is (as already explained) a constitutive part of the human right to freely profess one's religion. Therefore Point 2 of the Order Calling the Referendum interferes with the right determined by the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution. In reviewing whether there has been an interference with this right, the Constitutional Court did not accept the argument of the initiators of the referendum that the human rights of the Islamic Religious Community would be violated only if the construction of a mosque were rejected in several repeated referenda and this religious community did not have any other possibilities to perform religious rites. Each of these cases would namely concern completely the same legal situation. Furthermore, the assertions that the case concerned the issue of the location of the building and that several prayer rooms would suffice<sup>27</sup> for adherents of the Islamic religion and they do not need a mosque in order to freely profess their religion were not taken into consideration.

26 “The principle of the equality of religious communities entails that religious communities are in this aspect equal to all other non-state communities. In this respect, they enjoy full equality. The state must demonstrate respect for diversity and religious and ideological neutrality towards all religious communities, which is the origin of the prohibition on privileging persons or communities that hold a particular ideological or religious belief, as well as the prohibition against the exclusion of religious communities or believers, or persons with different beliefs. In this context, the principle of the equality of religious communities is a defensive right against state interferences, but it also obliges the state to actively create conditions for the implementation of this constitutional right.” See L. Šturm in: Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije, [Commentary on the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia], the Commentary on Article 7 of the Constitution, point 8, pp. 124–125.

32. With regard to the above-stated, a review of the constitutionality of Point 2 of the Order Calling the Referendum is, from the viewpoint of opposition to the mosque, a review of the admissibility of an interference with the right to the free profession of religion determined by the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution. In instances in which the norm-framer limits human rights, the Constitutional Court reviews the admissibility of such limitations on the basis of the so-called strict test of proportionality. Such proceeds from the premise that there must exist a constitutionally admissible legitimate aim for an interference with a constitutional right, which follows from the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, according to which human rights are only limited by the rights of others and in such cases as are provided by this Constitution (i.e. the test of legitimacy).<sup>28</sup> If the interference with a human right is intended

27 It does not follow from the documents submitted to the Constitutional Court what the persons who lodged the request to call a referendum mean by the term prayer room. The premises that were inspected by the Council of Europe Commissioner on Human Rights, which by their nature are garages or apartments, probably cannot be considered prayer rooms in the true meaning of the word.

28 Moreover, the above-cited international instruments determine more precisely the reasons for which the right to freedom of religion may be limited. The third paragraph of Article 18 of the Covenant determines that the freedom to manifest one's religion or beliefs may be subject only to such limitations as are prescribed by law and are necessary to protect public safety, order, health, or morals, or the fundamental rights and freedoms of others. The already cited second paragraph of Article 9 of the ECHR determines even stricter conditions. Furthermore, Point 17 of The Concluding Document of the Vienna Meeting of the OSCE determines the conditions under which the rights defined by that document may be limited. Only such limitations are admissible as are provided by law and to ensure the exercise of the rights of others, the Constitutional Court also evaluates whether it is an excessive interference from the perspective of the general principle of proportionality determined by Article 2 of the Constitution (see, e.g., Decision No. U-I-127/01, dated 12 February 2004, Official Gazette RS, No. 25/04).

33. In Decision No. U-I-68/98 the Constitutional Court adopted a position according to which it deemed an interference with the right under the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution (the positive aspect of the freedom of religion) admissible due to the protection of the negative aspect of the freedom of religion (the second paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution). Such concerned a case in which, in the framework of school lessons (compulsory primary school education or the creation of opportunities for citizens to obtain a proper education; the second and third paragraphs of Article 57 of the Constitution) attended by pupils in public schools, the operation (and, as regards primary schools, also the financing) of which must be ensured by the state, there was a conflict between both aspects of this constitutional right. In the case at issue, however, there exists no conflict between the two aspects of the mentioned right, as the decision to visit a building that is the place of worship of an individual religious community is a matter of an individual's free will. The mere fact that a place of worship that also displays external religious characteristics is located on land that is, in accordance with spatial legislation, intended for the construction of religious buildings cannot by itself interfere with the negative aspect of the freedom of religion. Thus, in the case at issue, the protection of the negative aspect of the freedom of religion cannot constitute a legitimate aim that could justify an interference with the right determined by the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution.
34. A precondition for the admissibility of an interference with a human right is that the aim pursued by means of such interference is legitimate, i.e. objectively justified (the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution). The Order Calling the Referendum (together with the actual voting) would entail the exercise of the right to a local referendum, which, as already mentioned, is guaranteed by Article 44 of the LSGA if the statutory conditions for such are fulfilled. It was already clear from the request to call the local referendum and the campaign that the initiators launched when they began collecting signatures that the initiators of the request to call the referendum wanted the persons entitled to vote to reject the construction of the mosque. As was already mentioned, the case at issue does not concern the location of a building in the environment, but the prevention of the construction of a building that is traditional for the profession of the Islamic faith and which its followers are entitled to in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution.<sup>29</sup> The goal of the referendum is thus to prevent members of the Islamic are consistent with the states' obligations under international law and with their international commitments. In accordance with this principle, the states must ensure in their laws and regulations and in the application of such the full and effective exercise of the freedom of thought, conscience, religion, or belief.

29 Cf. the decision of the Federal Constitutional Court of the Federal Republic of Germany cited in note 13.

Religious Community from professing their religion, individually or in community with others, in a building that is usual and generally accepted (i.e. traditional) for the profession of their religion and the performance of their religious rites.

35. Accordingly, it is possible to conclude that the aim that the challenged regulation pursues is the limitation of the right determined by the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution. In accordance with the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, according to which human rights can only be limited by the rights of others (and in such cases as are provided by the Constitution), this aim is inadmissible as it is only intended to limit a right, and not at the same time to also protect the rights of others. Therefore, Point 2 of the Order Calling the Referendum is inconsistent with the right to freely profess one's religion. Thus, the interference is considered to be constitutionally inadmissible already on the basis of the test of legitimacy, and the Constitutional Court did not have to review its proportionality.
36. As the Constitutional Court found that Point 2 of the Order Calling the Referendum was inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution, it annulled it. It chose annulment as it suspended the Order's implementation after its implementation had already begun. As a result of such annulment, the text of the other points of the Order Calling the Referendum became superfluous, and therefore the Constitutional Court also annulled them.
37. As the Order Calling the Referendum had to be annulled already for the above-stated reasons, the Constitutional Court did not have to review the other alleged inconsistencies with the Constitution. Therefore, the Constitutional Court did not have to clarify in what cases a request to call a referendum could be considered inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 63 of the Constitution, which, inter alia, prohibits any incitement to religious discrimination and to religious or other hatred.

38. The Mayor [i.e. the applicant] requested a review of the constitutionality of the LSGA. On the basis of the seventh indent of the first paragraph of Article 23 of the CCA, a request for a review of constitutionality and legality can only be lodged by representative bodies of local communities if there occurred an interference with the rights of a local community. The Mayor failed to submit an authorisation from which it would follow that she is entitled to lodge a request on behalf of the City Council. She could also have filed the request on the basis of Article 91 of the LSGA on behalf of the City of Ljubljana, if the Charter of the Urban Municipality of Ljubljana authorised her to do so (Official Gazette RS, No. 26/01). As the Charter does not provide for such authorisation, the Constitutional Court did not have to address the issue of whether the Mayor, by asserting that there exists a legal gap in the LSGA that interferes with the rights of citizens and prevents the local authorities from obtaining a preliminary review of a referendum question, demonstrated that the constitutional position and the rights of the local community as an independent entity under public law were interfered with.
39. In light of the above, the Constitutional Court rejected the applicant's request for a review of the constitutionality of the LSGA. It also rejected the petition to initiate proceedings for the review of the constitutionality of the LSGA. The Constitutional Court annulled the Order Calling the Referendum. The calling of a referendum is inadmissible on the basis of this decision, and thus the potential establishment of the unconstitutionality of the LSGA would not improve the petitioners' legal position. Therefore, the petitioners failed to demonstrate legal interest for a constitutional review thereof.

40. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of Article 25 and the second paragraph of Article 45 of the CCA and on the basis of the second indent of the third paragraph of Article 46 of the Rules of Procedure of the Constitutional Court (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 93/03 and 98/03 – corr.), composed of: Dr Dragica Wedam Lukić, President, and Judges Dr Janez Čebulj, Dr Zvonko Fišer, Lojze Janko, Mag. Marija Krisper Kramberger, Milojka Modrijan, Dr Ciril Ribičič, and Jože Tratnik. Judge Dr Mirjam Šrk was disqualified from deciding in the case. The decision was reached by seven votes against one. Judge Čebulj voted against.

A

Assertions of the National Council

1. The National Council requested a review of the constitutionality of a number of provisions of the RFA, Article 20 of the Legal Status of Religious Communities in the Socialist Republic of Slovenia Act (hereinafter referred to as the LSRCA), and Article 52 of the Defence Act (hereinafter referred to as the DA). It alleges that the contested provisions are inconsistent with Articles 2, 3, 7, 14, 16, 38, 42, 63, 87, 120, 153, and 158 of the Constitution. They propose that the Constitutional Court annul the RFA in its entirety and find that the contested provisions of the LSRCA and the DA are inconsistent with the Constitution.
2. According to the assertions of the applicant, Article 20 of the LSRCA regulates the financial support of the state to churches in a manner which is inconsistent with Articles 2 and 120 of the Constitution. In its opinion, it allegedly does not provide a framework and criteria for allocating the financial support of the state. This allegedly allows for arbitrary application of the Act.
3. According to the assertions in the request, the third paragraph of Article 3 of the RFA, which sets out the conditions under which differential treatment of the employment of religious and other employees of churches and religious communities [Translator's note: in both the RFA and this Decision, the terms "churches and religious communities" and only "religious communities" are used synonymously.] does not constitute discrimination, is inconsistent with the principle of freedom of activity of religious communities (the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution). By regulating this issue the state allegedly interferes with the manner of practicing religious rites. This provision of the RFA is allegedly also inconsistent with the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities (the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution), as the grounds for justifying the differential treatment of the employment of religious and other employees of the churches and religious communities refer to the ethics of churches and other religious communities and not to the Slovene legal order.
4. Article 4 of the RFA is allegedly inconsistent with the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities (the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution). This provision only provides, in the opinion of the applicant, what kind of conduct of the state is prohibited – because with such the latter allegedly interferes in the sphere of activities of churches and religious communities – but does not regulate what religious communities are prohibited from doing in order for them not to interfere with the sovereignty of the state. This provision is allegedly unconstitutional also because it does not prohibit religious communities from being politically active.
5. The first paragraph of Article 5 of the RFA, which specifies the conditions under which churches or religious communities are considered charitable organisations, is allegedly inconsistent with the principle of clear and precise regulations (Article 2 of the Constitution) and the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities (the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution). It is allegedly inconsistent with Article 2 of the Constitution because it is allegedly not clear what the terms “spirituality in public life” and “finding purpose in life”, which religious communities are to strive for, entail. Since the two criteria are – in the opinion of the applicant – entirely religious in nature, the state should not apply them when assessing whether a certain church or religious community is a charitable organisation. With such assessment, the state, in its opinion, interferes in the sphere of religion and thus violates the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution.

6. The second paragraph of Article 5 of the RFA, which allegedly governs the relationship of the state to churches and religious communities in a general manner, is allegedly also incompatible with the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities. Namely, it allegedly determines that the state establish a lasting dialogue with churches and religious communities and develop forms of enduring cooperation. If this can be understood as the obligation to achieve a specific result on the part of the state, the applicant deems that this is inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution. Since the commitment of the state to respect the identity [of churches and other religious communities] and to open and lasting dialogue and cooperation is allegedly not also determined in relation to unregistered religious communities, this is allegedly inconsistent with the principle of the equality of religious communities (the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution).
7. According to the applicant, the second paragraph of Article 6 of the RFA, which provides, inter alia, that the activities of churches and religious communities must be “known to the public”, is also inconsistent with the Constitution. Since the requirement of the public nature of activities is not listed as one of the grounds for the prohibition of activities in Article 12 of the RFA, it is not clear what the purpose of this provision is. Allegedly, it also entails a disproportionate interference with the freedom of association referred to in the second paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution; it would be more reasonable if the legislature were to prescribe only that information be available on demand. In its opinion, this provision is inconsistent with the principle of the clarity and precision of regulations (Article 2 of the Constitution) insofar as it determines that the activities of a church or religious community should not be contrary to moral principles. Since this prohibition is not included in Article 12 of the RFA as one of the grounds for the prohibition of the activities of religious communities, the applicant cautions that such regulation allows for the arbitrariness of the state authority and therefore violates Article 2 of the Constitution.
8. Item 2 of Article 7 of the RFA is, according to the applicant, inconsistent with the principle of state sovereignty (Article 3 of the Constitution), as it provides that the employees of religious communities must comply with the regulations, rules, and powers of the supreme authority of their church or religious community rather than also the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia in areas where they overlap. It is allegedly also constitutionally questionable that this provision does not differentiate between the employees of religious communities engaged in a purely religious function and those engaged in charitable work.

9. According to the applicant, items 1 and 2 of the first paragraph of Article 12 of the RFA determine that the activities of a religious community are prohibited on the basis of a court decision if, inter alia, it “seriously” breaches the Constitution, encourages discrimination, violence, or war, if it incites hatred, intolerance, or persecution, or if it “seriously” undermines human dignity. Such a regulation is allegedly inconsistent with Article 63 of the Constitution, under which “any” such conduct is unconstitutional and not just that which is “serious”, and with the second paragraph of Article 16 of the Constitution, which allegedly does not allow for any suspension or restriction of the right to human dignity. The same provisions are, in its opinion, also inconsistent with Article 2 of the Constitution. The legal situation is allegedly unclear and unpredictable, as the RFA supposedly does not allow for a clear identification when the need for the prohibition of the activities of a religious community occurs. This uncertainty is allegedly inconsistent also with the fourth paragraph of Article 153 of the Constitution, on the basis of which the individual acts and actions of authorities must be based on a law or a regulation adopted pursuant to law. Article 12 of the RFA is, according to the applicant, inconsistent with the Constitution also because it does not state that activities in conflict with public morality are grounds for the prohibition of the activities of religious communities.
10. The conditions for the registration of religious communities set out in Article 13 of the RFA (i.e. at least 100 members – citizens or aliens with permanent residence – and at least 10 years of activity in the territory of the Republic of Slovenia) are allegedly inconsistent with the principle of the equality of religious communities (the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution). According to the applicant, due to the equality of religious communities, the differentiation concerning registration, which entails the acquisition of a legal personality, is allegedly not allowed, but such differentiation would only be admissible if the religious community were to seek to become involved in the public sphere. The conditions for registration are allegedly also incompatible with the freedom of conscience (the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution), which the state should not recognise in name only. The prescribed period of 10 years is, according to the applicant, inconsistent with the freedom of association (the second paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution). The applicant also claims that there is an internal incompatibility in the RFA itself since Article 8 of the RFA mentions the right to establish a church or a religious community, whereas the conditions determined in Article 13 curtail this right for at least 10 years.
11. Item 7 of Article 14 of the RFA allegedly determines the content of the bylaws which a church or religious community must file upon registration. This item is allegedly inconsistent with the principle of freedom of activity of religious communities (the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution), as it allegedly interferes with the freedom of activity of religious communities too strongly by defining the content of the bylaws in the fourth, sixth, and seventh indents.
12. Articles 22, 23, 24, 25, and 27 of the RFA and the third paragraph of Article 52 of the DA are allegedly inconsistent with the Constitution because they do not define the framework and criteria for spiritual care. Neither the RFA nor the draft of this Act allegedly indicate why the legislature, in regulating spiritual care, chose only some establishments and closed institutions (the Army, the Police, prisons, hospitals, and social welfare institutions providing institutional care), but not also others that are similar to these. Even in these selected institutions only nudum ius is allegedly guaranteed and allegedly no criteria for defining the beneficiaries of religious spiritual care are determined. Such regulation is allegedly inconsistent with Articles 87 and 120 of the Constitution, and Article 24 of the RFA is allegedly also inconsistent with Article 2 of the Constitution. Article 23 of the RFA [is allegedly inconsistent] as it leaves the regulation of the detailed organisation and manner of the implementation of spiritual care in the Police to the Minister, and Article 24 of the RFA [is allegedly inconsistent] as it neither provides the criteria for the provision of spiritual care in prisons nor provides for the issuance of regulations that would regulate this area. The third paragraph of Article 24 and the second paragraph of Article 25 of the RFA are allegedly inconsistent with Articles 87 and 120 of the Constitution as they do not sufficiently explicitly specify what the terms “a sufficiently large number of detainees of the same religion”, “a sufficiently large number of occupants of the same religion”, and “the necessary number of priests” entail. Similarly, the applicant considers that the third paragraph of Article 52 of the DA is inconsistent with Article 120 of the Constitution, as, in its opinion, it does not provide the Minister with the criteria and standards for determining how the exercise of the right to religious spiritual care in the Army is to be implemented.

13. The religious spiritual care provided by the state should be, according to the applicant, related to the physical inability of an individual to obtain spiritual care. Article 22 of the RFA is therefore allegedly inconsistent with the freedom of conscience (the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution). Members of the Army are allegedly constantly ensured religious spiritual care and not only when exercise of their freedom of religion would have been effectively impossible. This provision is also, according to the applicant, inconsistent with the principle of equality (the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution). It allegedly provides for the continuous religious spiritual care of members of the Army, while Article 23 provides such to police officers only in circumstances where the exercise of their religious freedom is rendered difficult.
14. Articles 24 and 25 in conjunction with Articles 22 and 23 of the RFA are allegedly inconsistent with the principle of equality determined in Article 14 of the Constitution. The latter two allegedly – in contrast to Articles 24 and 25 of the RFA – do not expressly provide for the right to collective religious spiritual care. The challenged regulation, according to which persons in prisons, hospitals, and social welfare institutions allegedly have the right to collective religious spiritual care, while members of the Army and Police Force do not, is allegedly inconsistent with freedom of conscience (the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution).
15. The applicant states that Articles 24 and 25 of the RFA, which enable the employment of priests in prisons and hospitals, is inconsistent with the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities (the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution). The state is allegedly not entitled to employ priests as public officials. As these provisions are allegedly inconsistent with each other, they are also allegedly inconsistent with the principle of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution). Namely, Article 24 allegedly allows for a choice between the employment of a priest and the provision of “different remuneration for the work done” [in the words of the applicant], while Article 25 allegedly provides for the mandatory employment of priests. In the opinion of the applicant, there is no reasonable reason for such differentiation.

16. The fourth paragraph of Article 24 and second paragraph of Article 25 of the RFA, which provide that appointed and employed priests can perform their function undisturbed and visit people in detention or in residential care, are allegedly inconsistent with the principle of the equality of religious communities (the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution) and freedom of conscience (the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution). According to the applicant, all religious officials and not just employed priests should have the right to undisturbed access to detainees or people in residential care that desire such care, irrespective of whether they fall within the framework of a “sufficiently large number of persons of the same religion”. The right to be visited by their religious representatives is allegedly granted only to adherents of registered churches and religious communities; adherents of unregistered religious communities allegedly have no such right. Given that such visits are allegedly restricted to priests as only one category of religious officials, such regulation is allegedly also inconsistent with the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities (the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution). Such applies also, according to the applicant, to Articles 24 and 25 of the RFA in the parts in which they refer to “priest”. The state, in its opinion, should leave it to individual religious communities themselves to determine the religious officials who are to provide spiritual care in closed and other types of institutions.
17. The provisions of Article 26 of the RFA are allegedly inconsistent with Article 2, the first paragraph of Article 7, the second paragraph of Article 14, Article 87, and Article 158 of the Constitution. The first paragraph of Article 26, which gives religious communities the right to build and to undisturbed use of their own religious spaces and buildings, is, according to the applicant, inconsistent with the principle of the clarity and certainty of regulations. Namely, it allegedly does not follow clearly from this paragraph whether the rights in this provision refer only to the registered religious communities or also to unregistered religious communities. The applicant states that the second paragraph of Article 26 is undetermined and unclear, as in its opinion it does not specify the criteria for exercising the right to build buildings and facilities, as it does not determine what “the large number of adherents” entails, it does not determine which spatial acts are concerned, which authorities are competent, and as it does not state whether religious communities are to be participants in the proceedings for adopting spatial planning acts.
18. Article 26 of the RFA is allegedly inconsistent with the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities, as it is allegedly the state authority and not the religious community which decides on a religious community's need for a religious building. The state authority should, according to the applicant, decide only on the appropriateness of the facility regarding the spatial and building requirements. The alleged nonconformity can be found, in the opinion of the applicant, also in the second paragraph of Article 26, which determines that the state authorities and religious communities must agree on the needs and interests of religious communities. In its opinion, this entails the state's obligation to achieve a specific result. The third paragraph of Article 26 of the RFA, which allegedly obliges the competent authorities to properly amend the existing spatial planning acts in force, allegedly also suggests such an obligation. Such regulation allegedly disproportionately interferes with the right of the state and local communities to free spatial planning. The regulation is, in its opinion, also inconsistent with Article 87 of the Constitution, as these rights can be regulated only by Acts. As the third paragraph of Article 26 of the RFA allegedly envisages amendments to the spatial plans already in force, it allegedly interferes with their finality and thereby violates Article 158 of the Constitution. As religious communities are allegedly in a privileged position concerning the construction of buildings and facilities in comparison with other voluntary and charitable associations and organisations active in spiritual areas, Article 26 of the RFA is allegedly also inconsistent with the general principle of equality before the law (the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution).

19. The regulation of religious spiritual care in institutions, according to the applicant, violates the principle of equality (the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution), as the priests employed in the institutions receive higher remuneration for the same services than those priests for whom the religious community receives only the payment of social security contributions.
20. The first and fourth paragraphs of Article 27 of the RFA are allegedly inconsistent with the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities (the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution), freedom of conscience (the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution), and the principle of equality (the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution). The applicant states that the right of religious communities to receive financial support to pay for the social security contributions of their employees depends on the Slovene citizenship of the adherents of religious communities and their employees, and emphasises that freedom of religion is a human right, irrespective of nationality. It is allegedly inconsistent with the principle of equality that the adherents of religious communities who are aliens with permanent residence status are allegedly not eligible for state financial support. The applicant refers to the Judgment of the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as ECtHR) in the case of The Moscow Branch of the Salvation Army v. Russia, dated 5 October 2006, in which this court allegedly held that there was no reasonable and objective justification for distinguishing between Russian citizens and aliens regarding the possibility to exercise their right to freedom of religion through participation in organized religious communities.

21. The fourth paragraph of Article 27 of the RFA, which allegedly determines that the condition for guaranteeing the right to the payment of the social security contributions of religious officials is that there be a reasonable proportionality between the number of religious officials and the number of adherents of a religious community, is allegedly inconsistent with the principle of the equality of religious communities (the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution). It allegedly entails unjustified discrimination against smaller religious communities. Equality is allegedly violated as the condition for this right is the number of adherents and not the religious care that was actually provided.
22. The fourth paragraph of Article 27 of the RFA is allegedly also inconsistent with Article 38, the first paragraph of Article 41, and the second paragraph of Article 120 of the Constitution. According to the statements of the applicant, it determines that religious communities must demonstrate the fulfilment of the condition of reasonable proportionality between the number of religious officials and the number of adherents of the religious community in question with credible data sources; inter alia, they may also propose that the latest census data are used. Thus, it would allow for the use of data obtained from the census in a way that opposes the grounds for their collection and is inconsistent with the principle of the protection of personal data (Article 38 of the Constitution). The principle of legality (Article 120 of the Constitution) is thereby violated, according to the applicant, as the RFA does not determine other “reliable data sources” and as the census data are not reliable since proclamation of one’s religious affiliation was not obligatory in the census. The applicant deems that there is an unjustified differentiation in the fact that certified signatures of hundreds of adherents must be submitted for the registration of a religious community, whereas such is not necessary to ascertain whether the condition of reasonable proportionality for entitlement to the payment of the social security contributions of religious officials is fulfilled.
23. The fifth paragraph of Article 27 of the RFA allegedly determines that the condition of reasonable proportionality between the number of religious officials and the number of members of churches or religious communities is met also if the religious community was active in the Republic of Slovenia at least eighty years before the RFA came into force. This allegedly constitutes a violation of the principle of the equality of religious communities (the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution). The applicant states that the provision is intended only for the Jewish religious community, and therefore it entails unjustified positive discrimination at the expense of other, newer religious communities.
24. Articles 5, 27, and 28 of the RFA are allegedly inconsistent with the Constitution, as they do not take into account the property of a particular religious community when considering the payment of the social security contributions of religious officials.
25. According to the applicant, the third paragraph of Article 29 of the RFA, which provides that the state may provide financial support to registered religious communities, inadmissibly discriminates against unregistered communities. The conditions required for registration (100 members and 10 years of activity), have no direct relationship to the general benefits of churches and religious communities for society, which is the reason the state supports them financially in accordance with this provision. The principle of the equality of religious communities (the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution) is allegedly violated, as Article 5 of the RFA allegedly does not allow unregistered religious communities to obtain the status of a charitable organisation, regardless of compliance with all the conditions determined in Article 5 of the RFA. The regulation of the funding of religious communities is allegedly inconsistent with the principle of equality before the law (the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution), as it allegedly unduly differentiates between religious communities and other charitable (non-governmental and non-religious) associations that are active in fields beneficial to society. In particular, the inequality in funding allegedly concerns associations active in spiritual areas. According to the applicant, even though such could perform similar activities as religious communities, they cannot compete for the same financial support of the state due to this provision of the Act. The applicant emphasises that the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities (the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution) requires that the state grant financial support under the same conditions to all organisations pursuing generally beneficial purposes. In its opinion, charitable activities should be funded if they are actually performed, but not exclusively religious activities. The applicant addresses, mutatis mutandis, the same and some other complaints also with regard to Articles 13 to 18 of the RFA, which it argues are inconsistent with Articles 2, 7, 25, 120, and 158 of the Constitution. Freely active (unregistered) religious communities are allegedly not allowed to obtain the status of a charitable organisation, while allegedly this status can be obtained only by registered religious communities without any special procedure establishing and proving that the conditions determined in Article 5 of the RFA have been met. In its opinion, a legal remedy should be provided against such decision of the competent authority. The applicant holds that this is incompatible with the right to legal remedies (Article 25 of the Constitution).

26. The third paragraph of Article 29 of the RFA is allegedly, similar to Article 20 of the LSRCA, inconsistent with Articles 2, 7, and 120 of the Constitution, as it does not determine the criteria and the procedure for obtaining the status of a charitable organisation in a sufficiently clear and precise manner. According to the applicant, the conclusion that all the fields of activity of religious communities are in the public interest is false. The general benefits to society are allegedly related only to specific areas of social life, but the RFA does not identify them with sufficient clarity and precision. It deems that such approach should be used also when funding religious communities.
27. The RFA is allegedly inconsistent with Article 2 of the Constitution, as it uses different terms in referring to religious officials (religious official, employee of the church, priest, nun, monk, insured person) in different provisions (in the second item of Article 7, in Articles 24, 25, 27, and 28). The applicant states that the situation is even more ambiguous as the Standard Classification of Professions does not use the term religious official, but only the occupation of religious professional. Such differing approaches concerning the terminology allegedly disrupt legal certainty, as it is allegedly not always possible to determine with certainty to whom a certain status or right pertain.

28. Article 30 of the RFA, which concerns the tasks of the competent authority, is allegedly inconsistent with Article 2 of the Constitution. The applicant claims that this provision does not determine clearly which authority is competent to perform these tasks. As the competent authority imposes sanctions for violations (Article 32 of the RFA), the applicant claims that religious communities do not know which body is the minor offence authority. It is allegedly not clear from the RFA that the Office of the Republic of Slovenia for Religious Communities (hereinafter referred to as the Office) is the body that currently performs these tasks, and it is allegedly referred to only in the transitional provisions of the RFA. In this respect, the applicant additionally claims that the Office is an executive government agency, which are not established to perform administrative tasks, and that the regulation is inconsistent with Article 120 of the Constitution, as the organisation of [the state] administration must be regulated by an Act.
29. Article 33 of the RFA allegedly violates the principle of the equality of religious communities (the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution), as the religious communities that were already registered with the Office at the time the RFA came into effect will retain the status of legal persons and will be entered into the register ex officio. The applicant emphasises that they will never have to fulfil the conditions otherwise prescribed for registration. Similarly, the financial support granted to them for the payment of the social security contributions of religious officials will allegedly also be preserved to the extent to which they received such before the RFA came into force. The inequality is allegedly also reflected in relation to other organisations (associations) active in spiritual areas, as such will allegedly not have their period of activity in a different organisational form recognised if they transform into a registered religious community.

Reply of the National Assembly

30. In its reply to the request, the National Assembly states that the contested provisions cannot be deemed to be unconstitutional. It states its interpretation of the content of Articles 7 and 41 of the Constitution and thereby refers to certain decisions of the Constitutional Court, and underlines the relevant binding international instruments on human rights.
31. Article 4 of the RFA is allegedly not unconstitutional, as in conformity with Article 7 of the Constitution it determines that the state should not interfere with the organisation and functioning of religious communities, except in the cases provided by an Act. Religious communities are allegedly not above the law or outside it and, according to the National Assembly, have the obligation to act in accordance with the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia, which is explicitly stated also in the second paragraph of Article 6 of the RFA. It emphasises that the principle of state sovereignty determines the limits of the independent functioning of religious communities. Only the state is competent to decide what activities, and under what conditions, can be left to entities of private law.

32. The statement that the first paragraph of Article 5 of the RFA is unconstitutional is allegedly unfounded and no reasons corroborating such allegation were put forward. The determination of the conditions under which a certain religious community is a charitable organisation allegedly does not prejudice either the freedom of religion or other beliefs, nor the activities of religious communities in the religious sphere. This provision, according to the National Assembly, only determines general criteria which cannot be more specific. The second paragraph of Article 5 of the RFA does not prescribe an obligation to achieve a specific result. Likewise, the principle of dialogue and cooperation allegedly does not apply only to registered religious communities but to all religious communities.
33. The applicant allegedly did not submit arguments as to why item 7 of Article 14 of the RFA is unconstitutional. The RFA, in the opinion of the National Assembly, does not interfere with the freedom of activity of religious communities, as it does not determine the manner in which the organisation of religious communities must be regulated, but only that they must be regulated. The applicant allegedly did not explain why the requirement regarding the public nature of activities and the requirement that each religious community publish its rules are inconsistent with the Constitution.
34. The constitutional review request allegedly does not contain arguments concerning the second paragraph of Article 6 and the third paragraph of Article 3 of the RFA; the applicant allegedly misread these provisions. The third paragraph of Article 3 of the RFA allegedly determines an exception to the prohibition of discrimination based on religious or other beliefs when employing religious officials and lay personnel of a religious community. Such a regulation is allegedly reasonable and objectively justified given the nature of religious communities.
35. The National Assembly also rejects the complaint of the applicant concerning the [alleged] ambiguousness due to different terms being used to refer to religious officials. They consider that such usage is sufficiently clear, as it is always evident to which persons the terms refer and which rights are enjoyed by each religious official. They deem that the different terminology is necessary precisely due to different rights belonging to different persons.
36. They also deem to be unfounded the allegations that Articles 22 to 25 and Article 27 of the RFA and Article 52 of the DA do not provide criteria for determining the beneficiaries and the scope of spiritual care. The same allegedly also holds for the allegations regarding the ambiguity of these provisions due to the lack of a precise definition of certain terms in the Acts. They emphasise that the RFA determined the institutions in which the state guarantees religious spiritual care. In this manner the right is guaranteed by the Act, and it is left to the regulations to determine the manner of exercising this right. This is, in its opinion, necessary considering the different circumstances in which certain jobs are performed and the various types of closed institutions. It states that the term “a sufficiently large number” of adherents of the same religion is a legal standard and can be determined. The exact definition should be determined in the regulation, as this number is allegedly different in different institutions, since the conditions and circumstances in these institutions are allegedly also different from each other. The RFA allegedly allows different forms of employment of priests; even though this is allegedly explicitly mentioned only in Article 24, there is no reason, according to the National Assembly, that this is not valid also in other cases.

37. The National Assembly emphasises that the starting point of the RFA is that the declaration of rights does not suffice for their exercise. Therefore, it claims that the state is obliged to enable and guarantee the conditions for the effective exercise of human rights. Therefore, the RFA obligates certain institutions to provide the financial conditions for the exercise of religious freedom. It maintains that the state must, if there is a sufficient number of adherents of a particular religious community in such institutions, also provide a priest who administers spiritual care. Such a regulation allegedly cannot be inconsistent with the Constitution, as it allegedly provides the conditions for the actual exercise of the right to freedom of religion.
38. The National Assembly deems that the allegation of the applicant that the state should provide religious spiritual care only to those persons who are physically unable to obtain such by themselves outside of state institutions is unfounded. It allegedly follows from the RFA and the DA that religious spiritual care in the Army and Police is related to the particular work performance conditions, especially regarding the difficult access to and even non-availability of spiritual care. In such cases, the state is allegedly obliged to provide for conditions for the provision of religious [spiritual] care, as this is allegedly the only way to ensure the right to profess one's religion. According to the National Assembly, Article 7 of the Constitution does not prohibit this. However, it is allegedly evident that the state must remain neutral in respect to all religions. In any situation, in the Army, Police, prisons, hospitals, and social welfare institutions, individual and collective spiritual care are allegedly ensured. In addition, there is allegedly no differentiation between registered and unregistered religious communities. The National Assembly states that religious spiritual care does not depend on “a sufficiently large number” of adherents. Any member of any religious community allegedly has the right to religious spiritual care. According to the National Assembly, only the manner of the provision of religious spiritual care may vary. Thus, provision by an employed priest depends on there being “a sufficiently large number” of adherents of a religious community.
39. The allegation that the funding of religious spiritual care is inconsistent with the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities is allegedly unfounded. This constitutional principle allegedly does not entail that the state may not financially support religious communities. In their view, the state may act in this manner while respecting the principle of equality; in addition, the manner and extent of funding is a matter to be assessed by the legislature.
40. The fourth paragraph of Article 27 of the RFA, which enables the use of data from the last census, is allegedly not inconsistent with the Constitution as it allegedly does not concern the use of personal data. The National Assembly emphasises that the data obtained from the census were given voluntarily and only illustrate the statistically determined and treated data on the number of citizens who declared themselves voluntarily. They refute the allegation that the legislature did not provide other data sources on the grounds that such is a matter of their discretion.

41. The National Assembly responded to the complaints that religious communities and other non-religious organisations are treated differently by stating that the Constitution guarantees equal freedom for all beliefs and professions, religious and otherwise philosophical. However, the RFA regulates only the situation of churches and religious communities; therefore, the National Assembly considers the argument that it places non-religious associations in an unequal position in comparison to religious ones to be unfounded.
42. It is allegedly crucial for the exercise of the right to freely profess one's religion that religious communities are permitted to build their own buildings which are appropriate for their manner of religious worship and religious rites and customs. The Constitutional Court has allegedly already ruled on this matter. The National Assembly emphasises that this is the reason why the second paragraph of Article 26 of the RFA, which requires that the body drafting the spatial planning act assess the need for religious buildings in the draft and which requires that the needs, recommendations, and interests of religious communities be obtained and coordinated in accordance with the latter, is not inconsistent with the Constitution, but, on the contrary, it follows the standpoints adopted by the Constitutional Court.
43. Regarding Article 30 of the RFA, the National Assembly states that this provision determines the powers of the competent authority but does not really identify the latter. However, in the National Assembly's view, it is undisputed that this refers to the office established on the basis of the Government of the Republic of Slovenia Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 24/05 – official consolidated text, and 109/08 – hereinafter referred to as the GRSA). Thereby the first paragraph of Article 120 of the Constitution is allegedly respected.
44. The claim of the applicant that the RFA does not guarantee all religious communities the freedom to profess one's religion due to the conditions for registration is allegedly unfounded. The National Assembly emphasises that registration is not compulsory and that such obligation would be contrary to the freedom of association. In their view, neither the right to the freedom to profess religion nor the majority of other rights provided by the RFA are subject to registration. A religious community allegedly only acquires a legal personality with registration; however, this status is allegedly not a prerequisite for it to be active. It claims that the state may enter into agreements with registered religious communities, but such are also not a prerequisite for the activity of religious communities. The only right that allegedly pertains only to registered religious communities on the basis of the RFA is the right to financial aid for the purpose of the payment of the social security contributions of religious and other officials. It allegedly also follows clearly from the case law of the European Court of Human Rights that the state may make "additional rights" that are not related to the fundamental human right to freedom of religion conditional upon the registration of the religious community in question. However, on no account can the freedom to perform religious rites or the right to religious buildings be conditional upon registration. Consequently, the National Assembly sees no reasons why the conditions for registration are inconsistent with the Constitution.

Opinion of the Government of the Republic of Slovenia

45. The Government filed an opinion on the request for a review of constitutionality in which it opposes the assertions of the applicant concerning the nonconformity of the contested provisions with the Constitution.
46. It considers that Article 20 of the LSRCA is not inconsistent with the Constitution, given that the funding of religious communities is not inconsistent with the Constitution. The principle of the separation of the state and religious communities allegedly does not entail that all support and aid are excluded, provided, of course, that all religious communities are equal. The Constitutional Court has allegedly already adopted such a position.
47. The Government replies to the complaint concerning the use of different terminology for religious officials in the RFA by stating that there is no violation of the principle of a state governed by the rule of law. It is allegedly sufficiently clear from the RFA to which persons it refers and which rights belong to an individual religious official. The different terminology is allegedly necessary due to the different rights pertaining to such officials. The Government additionally adds that the Decree on the Introduction of the Standard Classification of Occupations (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 28/97 and 16/2000) regulates in detail the occupations of religious professionals. The Pension and Disability Insurance Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 109/06 – official consolidated text) allegedly uses the terms priest and monk or nun. The term insured person is allegedly used in the RFA only in the phrase [social security] “contributions of the insured person”, which is allegedly determined in the Social Security Contributions Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 5/96 et seq.).
48. Concerning the applicant’s complaints as to the [alleged] unconstitutionality of Articles 5, 27, and 28 of the RFA, the Government responds that such funding is an expression of the principle of a social state determined in Article 2 of the Constitution. Priests and other ordained persons in religious communities allegedly perform an important function in meeting the human need for spirituality and the need to profess one’s religion. In addition, they allegedly perform a series of other activities – charitable, educational, didactic, philanthropic, cultural, and similar. Such funding is allegedly also in accordance with the principle of equality, as the state has allegedly undertaken to fund 100% of the social security contributions [including contributions for health insurance] of all self-employed persons in culture by the Act Regulating the Realisation of the Public Interest in the Field of Culture (Official Gazette RS, No. 77/07 – official consolidated text et seq., hereinafter referred to as the ARRPIFC). The exclusion of religious officials would, in the opinion of the Government, constitute discrimination on the basis of religion.

49. The Government claims that the RFA contains detailed criteria for such funding in Articles 27 and 28 and in the transitional provisions, and Article 29 of the RFA provides that financial support may also be regulated in other Acts.
50. In the opinion of the Government, the allegation that Article 5 of the RFA does not determine the criteria and procedure for obtaining the status of a charitable organisation is also unfounded. These criteria are allegedly clearly determined. In any case, the concept of charitable organisations in the legal order is allegedly known – e.g. in the Foundations Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 70/05 – official consolidated text and 91/05 – corr. – FA) and the Associations Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 61/06 and 58/09 – hereinafter referred to as the AA-1). Allegedly, even the Constitutional Court has adopted the standpoint that religious communities perform an important social function.
51. The Government considers the requirement determined in Article 6 of the RFA, i.e. that the activities of religious communities should not contradict moral principles and public order, to be a general provision in accordance with the principle that the conduct of legal entities must be in accordance with public order. Moral principles are, in its view, an undetermined legal notion which is also determined in other acts. The second paragraph of Article 6 of the RFA allegedly follows the provisions of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (Official Gazette of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia No. 7/71, and Official Gazette RS, No. 35/92, MP, No. 9/92 – hereinafter referred to as ICCPR).
52. The Government contends that the fifth paragraph of Article 27 of the RFA, which was, according to the applicant, adopted only for the benefit of the Jewish religious community, does not refer to any religious community by name, but provides a general condition that the Jewish community fulfils. The provision allegedly pursues the legitimate goal of facilitating the activities of religious communities that already have a historical tradition in Slovenia. Specifically, such a provision can, in its opinion, help to maintain the Jewish culture in Slovenia by maintaining the Holocaust in our conscience.
53. Concerning Articles 13 to 18 of the RFA, the Government states that the RFA confers the status of charitable organisation on those religious communities that carry out functions that entail a social state and thereby enrich the national identity. The primary activity of religious communities allegedly cannot be compared to the activities of non-governmental organisations, even though such also have great importance in many areas of social life. It adds that the Constitutional Court has repeatedly expressed the standpoint that religious communities are institutions of general benefit performing an important social function.
54. The Government rejects the complaint concerning the [alleged] discriminatory conditions for registration determined in Article 13 of the RFA by stating that the activities of churches and religious communities are free regardless whether they are registered or active without registration. The RFA allegedly does not prescribe the conditions for the establishment of a religious community, but only the conditions for its registration. It emphasises that registration is not obligatory and that it entails the recognition of certain rights which by their very nature cannot be provided to unregistered communities. The position of the applicant that a religious community becomes equal only by registering is allegedly also erroneous. According to the Government, a religious community exists already before registration; it can also be formed as a legal person under civil law. In its opinion, registration under the RFA enables it to obtain a specific type of legal personality which is merely a prerequisite for obtaining rights under this Act. In this framework, the RFA allegedly treats all religious communities equally. Registration allegedly does not restrict the religious community's freedom of activity and the conditions for registration are allegedly not too demanding, but comparable with the regulation of such in other states of the European Union.

55. Concerning the alleged unconstitutionality of item 2 of Article 7 of the RFA, the Government believes that the division of religious workers between those performing purely religious functions and those performing generally beneficial work is not possible as the same persons perform both. Moreover, the fact that religious officials must comply with the internal regulations of religious communities is allegedly not inconsistent with the Constitution, as everyone has a duty to comply with the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia.
56. In the opinion of the Government, the complaint regarding the unconstitutionality of items 1 and 2 of Article 12 of the RFA is also unfounded, as pursuant to these provisions the activities of religious communities can be prohibited only if they seriously violate the Constitution or seriously undermine human dignity. It asserts that the content and standards of these undetermined legal notions will be developed in more detail by the case law.
57. The Government states that item 7 of Article 14 of the RFA does not determine the content of the bylaws but only its obligatory elements, and the content is left to the autonomy of the church or religious community. The RFA thus allegedly does not determine how these issues should be regulated, but only that they must be regulated. The determination of the essential elements of the bylaws allegedly does not interfere with the autonomy of religious communities; it aims only to ensure the transparency of its activities. It emphasises that certain rights are subject to having the legal status of religious community, therefore the state is entitled to determine the obligatory elements of the bylaws of religious communities on the basis of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law and of equality before the law.
58. Article 33 of the RFA, which, according to the applicant, violates the principle of the equality of religious communities and the principle of equality between religious communities and other charitable organisations, allegedly derives from the principle of the continuity of the functioning of religious communities and preserves the acquired rights. If the RFA did not allow registered religious communities to continue to perform their mission, this could, in the view of the Government, constitute an inadmissible interference with legitimate expectations. Any requirement that the already registered communities must re-register would allegedly entail discrimination between the existing religious communities and those that intend to register anew.

59. The third paragraph of Article 3 of the RFA, which allegedly interferes with the manner of performing religious rites, is, in the view of the Government, not inconsistent with the Constitution. This provision allegedly determines only the instances in which differential treatment on the grounds of religious belief does not constitute discrimination. Because of the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities, the state allegedly may not interfere in the autonomous rules and ethics of religious communities. This regulation is allegedly also in accordance with Council Directive 2000/78/EC of 27 November 2000 establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation (OJ L 303, 2 December 2000, p. 16).
60. Article 4 of the RFA, which, in the opinion of the applicant, should define what a religious community must not do in order not to interfere with the sovereignty of the state, is allegedly not unconstitutional. The sovereignty of the state is allegedly already limited by the Constitution and the Acts, as the state authorities are only allowed to act in accordance with the Constitution and the Acts. The RFA allegedly regulates the field of religious freedom, which entails also the freedom and autonomy of the activities of religious communities. It allegedly protects religious communities against the interventions of the state in their autonomy. The Government also rejects the allegation of the unconstitutionality of Article 12 of the RFA as it does not state that activities in conflict with public morality are grounds for the prohibition of the activities of religious communities.
61. Regarding the criteria determined in Article 5 of the RFA that refer to “spirituality in public life” and “finding purpose in life”, the Government states that these are undetermined legal terms whose content and standards will be determined in more detail by the case law. It points to the principle of the clarity and precision of regulations, derived from the principle of a state governed by the rule of law, which, in its opinion, entails that the statutory solutions must be general and abstract.
62. The Government rejects the alleged unconstitutionality of Articles 22 to 25 and Article 27 of the RFA and Article 52 of the DA by stating that the right to spiritual care in the Army, Police, prisons, and other institutions are regulated in accordance with the Constitution and international instruments and are furthermore comparable internationally. The provisions allegedly regulate the manner of the exercise of religious freedom in instances where an individual’s freedom of movement is considerably limited for various reasons or when he or she is unable to attend religious services due to illness or difficulties related to old age. Effective exercise of religious freedom allegedly requires the adoption of certain, particularly organisational and financial, measures. The RFA allegedly clearly determines the beneficiaries and the situations in which individuals are entitled to religious spiritual care, and more detailed organisation is to be regulated by regulations.
63. Regarding Articles 22 and 23 of the RFA, which compared to Articles 24 and 25 of the RFA allegedly do not recognise the right to collective spiritual care to members of the Army and Police Force, the Government claims that the contested provisions allow the members of the Army and the Police Force both individual as well as collective religious spiritual care. Members of the Slovene Army are allegedly provided such care in accordance with statutory and regulatory provisions concerning military service and national defence, and members of the Police Force are allegedly provided such care in accordance with the RFA and the relevant regulations in instances where the Police act as a traditional military structure.

64. Concerning the standard of “a sufficiently large number of persons of the same religion”, the Government states that Articles 24 and 25 of the RFA only bind the ministries responsible for justice and health to employ the required number of religious officials. However, such commitment of the state allegedly occurs only when a certain number of adherents of the same religion exists. In the absence of a sufficient number of persons of the same religion, an individual allegedly still has the right to individual and collective spiritual care, but the state is allegedly not obliged to employ a religious official.
65. The Government rejects the allegation that Articles 24 and 25 of the RFA are unconstitutional, as it allegedly only enables the employment of priests, but not other religious officials, on the grounds that the employment of other religious officials is also possible if the religious community does not have the position of priest. It also deems that the applicant’s complaint that the employment of priests is necessary for the occupants of hospitals and social welfare institutions, but not in prisons, is unfounded, as in its view both provisions require the employment of a certain number of religious officials. It emphasises that the principle of a social state binds the state to proceed actively in order for individuals to be ensured the exercise of individual and collective religious freedom in circumstances that render this impossible for them.
66. Regarding the fourth paragraph of Article 27 of the RFA concerning the population census, the Government states that the data collected in the census can be used for statistical purposes. The RFA allegedly only provides the possibility for religious communities to propose that the statistical data from the last census be used.
67. The Government responds to the complaint that Articles 5, 21, 27, and 29 of the RFA inadmissibly differentiate between religious communities and other organisations performing activities for the general benefit by stating that the RFA regulates religious freedom and that the legislature did not overlook the equal treatment of non-religious organisations, particularly concerning funding. The position of associations is allegedly regulated by AA-1, the position of institutes is allegedly regulated by the Institutes Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 12/91 and 8/96), and the position of humanitarian organisations by the Humanitarian Organisations Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 98/03).
68. The freedom to build and use facilities and buildings for religious purposes determined in Article 26 of the RFA stems, according to the Government, from Article 41 of the Constitution. It states that this right is guaranteed under the Constitution already to all religious communities, regardless of registration, although Article 26 of the RFA refers only to registered religious communities. It explains that the Office only keeps records of registered religious communities; therefore the RFA can require bodies drafting spatial planning acts to discuss and coordinate such planning only regarding the need for places of worship of such religious community. Article 26 of the RFA allegedly does not interfere with Article 7 of the Constitution, as the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities allegedly entails the neutrality of the state, and religious communities allegedly have to act in accordance with the legal order.

69. The Government agrees that Article 30 of the RFA actually does not expressly provide that the Office is the competent authority. However, it adds that such is provided for in a regulation, namely the Decision Amending the Decision on the Establishment of the Office of the Government of the Republic of Slovenia for Religious Communities (Official Gazette RS, No. 22/07). It states that even governmental agencies can be regarded as public administration bodies that can perform administrative tasks. It is allegedly determined in the second paragraph of Article 121 of the Constitution that duties of the state administration may be vested in other bodies and organisations, from which it allegedly follows that administrative duties may also be vested in governmental agencies.

B – I

The Extent of the Constitutional Court Review

70. In addition to Article of the LSRCA and Article 52 of the DA, the applicant challenges a large number of provisions of the RFA, the majority due to the alleged non-conformity with a number of provisions of the Constitution. The applicant motions that the entire RFA be abrogated.
71. The content of the application is broad. The applicant namely makes a number of allegations, although many of them are not elaborated. The shortcomings of its reasoning are either that the alleged unconstitutionality of the individual statutory provisions are not substantiated (e.g. the allegation that the RFA does not distinguish between religious officials who only perform religious functions and those performing generally beneficial work, and the allegation that Articles 27 and 28 of the RFA regarding the payment of the social security contributions of religious officials do not take into account the property of the particular religious community), or that it fails to establish a link between the contested statutory provision and the provision of the Constitution with which such is allegedly inconsistent (e.g. the complaint concerning the nonconformity of the fourth paragraph of Article 27 of the RFA with Article 41 of the Constitution, or concerning the unconstitutionality of Article 12 of the RFA, as it does not state that a religious community acting contrary to public morality is grounds for the prohibition of its activities). In addition to the allegations that are not substantiated, the request also contains a number of clearly unfounded allegations (e.g. that the RFA is inconsistent with the principle of legal certainty due to the use of different terminology for religious officials; the nonconformity with the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities as the state allegedly did not leave it up to religious communities to determine which religious officials will provide spiritual care in institutions and establishments; the alleged violation of the principle of equality due to the fact that priests employed in institutions receive higher remuneration for the same services than those priests for whom the religious community receives only the payment of social security contributions).

72. The applicant is a state body envisaged by the Constitution which the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 64/07 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the CCA) vested with privileged access to the Constitutional Court. It is therefore reasonable to expect that its requests will be well and professionally reasoned. In accordance with this, the Constitutional Court considered only those complaints of the applicant that are understandable, sufficiently defined, and not manifestly unfounded. By proceeding in such a manner, the Constitutional Court did not deem it crucial that some of the complaints were not listed under the appropriate substantive subsets of the request. This entails that even those arguments concerning the nonconformity of the statutory provisions that were clear and of lawyerly quality that the applicant listed in the part of the request motioning for the temporary suspension of the implementation of the RFA were considered.
73. On the basis of this starting point, the Constitutional Court reviewed the consistency of the following provisions with the Constitution:
- the first paragraph of Article 13 of the RFA regarding the registration conditions (although the applicant states that it challenges the entire Article 13, it is evident from the content of the complaint that it challenges only the first paragraph of this provision) and items 1 and 5 of Article 14 of the RFA, which are directly related to this provision;
  - Article 20 of the LSRCA and the third paragraph of Article 29 of the RFA regarding the state providing financial support to religious communities (although the applicant addresses scattered complaints in this regard also concerning the first paragraph of Article 5 of the RFA and Articles 13 to 18 of the RFA, the Constitutional Court, in view of the substance of the allegations, assessed that the applicant challenges only these two provisions);
  - Articles 22, 23, 24, and 25, of the RFA and the third paragraph of Article 52 of the DA-OCT1 (although in the introduction and the proposal of the requests the applicant states that it is challenging Article 52 of the DA-OCT1 in its entirety, it follows from the reasoning of the complaint that it is challenging only the third paragraph of this Article) regarding the religious spiritual care in the Army, the Police, prisons, and in hospitals and social welfare institutions providing institutional care, and the directly related provisions of the last sentence of Article 27 of the RFA, to the extent that they relate to Articles 24 and 25 of the RFA;
  - Article 26 of the RFA regarding the right of religious communities to the freedom to build;
  - the fifth paragraph of Article 27 of the RFA regarding the conditions for funding one religious official;
  - Articles 30 and 32 of the RFA regarding the appointment of the competent authority.

B – II
Starting Points of the Constitutional Review
Freedom of Conscience (Article 41 of the Constitution)

a) Freedom of Conscience in General

74. Article 41 of the Constitution protects and guarantees freedom of religious and other beliefs. This is a human right related to some other human rights such as the right to personal dignity and safety (Article 34 of the Constitution), the protection of the right to privacy and personality rights (Article 35 of the Constitution), the protection of personal data (Article 38 Constitution), freedom of expression (the first paragraph of Article 39 of the Constitution), the right of assembly and association (Article 42 of the Constitution), and the rights and duties of parents (Article 54 of the Constitution). The first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution guarantees the free profession of one's religion in private and public life. The second paragraph states that no one is obliged to declare his religious or other beliefs, the third paragraph of the Article 41 of the Constitution gives parents the right to provide – in accordance with their beliefs – their children with a religious and moral upbringing, whereas the religious and moral guidance given to children must be appropriate to their age and maturity and consistent with their freedom of conscience, and religious and other beliefs or convictions.
75. In Article 41 the Constitution uses the terms “declaration” (the first paragraph of Article 41) and “belief” (the second paragraph of Article 41). Therefore, the question arises what the subject of protection of this constitutional provision is and whether there is a difference between the two terms used that is relevant for a constitutional review. The interpretation must also take into account the title of the Article, i.e. that the freedom of conscience is concerned. Slovar slovenskega knjižnega jezika [The Dictionary of Slovene Literary Language] (hereinafter referred to as the SSKJ)<sup>1</sup> defines the term “opredeliti se” [to declare oneself] as “to express, show one's position, one's allegiance” or “to express, to demonstrate one's position on something”. The declaration is therefore an expression of a position or affiliation. The term “prepričanje” [belief] is defined in the SSKJ more narrowly: as a set of interconnected thoughts, judgments regarding fundamental, general questions of the world, society, humans or regarding a part of reality.<sup>2</sup> A declaration is a more general term and also includes beliefs: any belief is also a declaration, but not every declaration is also a belief.<sup>3</sup> In accordance with this, it seems at first glance that the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution guarantees freedom of (all) declarations, which also includes (all) beliefs, and the second paragraph only guarantees the right to not declare oneself

2 Ibidem, p. 1013.

3 In this sense, see M. Orehar Ivanc in: L. Šturm (ed.), Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije [Commentary on the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia], Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Ljubljana 2002, pp. 445–446.

concerning beliefs, which could entail that not all declarations are included, but only those that are “a set of interconnected thoughts, judgments regarding basic, general questions of the world, society, humans or regarding a part of reality”. However, this fine linguistic distinction becomes less important, even trivial, if the concepts are interpreted in conjunction with the title of Article 41 of the Constitution, i.e. freedom of conscience. Conscience is a feeling, an awareness of the moral value of one’s own behaviour, reflection that creates a sense of moral responsibility.<sup>4</sup> The concept of conscience thus falls within the scope of ethics. It is conscience that indicates to a human being what “right” is. The subjects of protection in the framework of Article 41 of the Constitution are therefore only declarations and beliefs in the field of ethics and morality, in particular all theistic, atheistic, and non-theistic beliefs. In this sense, such beliefs can be defined also as declarations of one’s world-view, that is, as philosophical or ideological theories or systems of thought that explain the human being, his essence, and the world in which he resides; it may also, although not necessarily, come from a higher, metaphysical level.<sup>5</sup> This entails that various political, scientific, aesthetic, historical, and other declarations or beliefs do not fall under the scope of protection of Article 41 of the Constitution, but are protected by other constitutional provisions (e.g. the freedom of expression determined in the first paragraph of Article 39 of the Constitution or the freedom of science and the arts determined in Article 59 of the Constitution).<sup>6</sup> However, also regarding the beliefs that can enjoy protection under Article 41 of the Constitution, it cannot be stated that each of them already automatically receives protection under this provision. Only if the internal and external characteristics of such belief demonstrate its consistency, cogency, seriousness, cohesion, and importance, is it justifiably concluded that it is a religious or other beliefs in the sense of Article 41 of the Constitution.<sup>7</sup> The state, of course, cannot assess regarding this whether such a religion or belief in a theological or philosophical sense is (un)true or (il)legitimate.

76. The first and second paragraphs of Article 41 of the Constitution in particular expose as the subject of protection religious freedom (freedom of religion, freedom to profess one’s religion). However, they do not determine precisely what it entails

4 A. Bajec et al. (ed.), ibidem, p. 1507.

5 The RFA mentions spirituality in several places. The concept of spirituality is distinctively pluralistic, having multiple meanings. The SSKJ defines it as an orientation towards non-material values. It is an integral part of any individual’s personal definition – religious or non-religious – regarding the issues of being, the world, and the universal connections in it. It is not identical to religious belief, nor does religion have a monopoly thereon. Religious spirituality, which is an integral part of religious experience or belief, is just one of the dimensions of the varied spectrum of spirituality.

6 Cf. M. Orehar Ivanc, ibidem, p. 446.

7 Such is also the position of the ECtHR, which stated, for example, in the Judgment Campbell and Cosans v. United Kingdom, dated 25 February 1982, and in the Judgment Leela Förderkreis E. V. and Others v. Germany, dated 6 November 2008, that Article 9 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR) includes views which “attain a certain level of cogency, seriousness, cohesion, and importance”.

or what its components and scope are. By taking into account Article 8,<sup>8</sup> the second paragraph of Article 153,<sup>9</sup> and the fifth paragraph of Article 15<sup>10</sup> of the Constitution, when interpreting the right to religious freedom a number of international instruments have to be considered which define the content and the scope of this human right in more detail in comparison to the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution. Already the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union (Človekove pravice [Human Rights], Zbirka mednarodnih dokumentov [Collection of International Documents], Part I, Univerzalni dokumenti, Društvo za ZN za Republiko Slovenijo, Ljubljana 1995, p. 1, hereinafter referred to as the UN Universal Declaration) guarantees everyone the right to freedom of thought, conscience, and religion. This right includes the freedom to change one's religion or beliefs, and the freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest one's religion or beliefs in teaching, practice, worship, and observance (Article 18). The content of freedom of religion is defined similarly also in Article 18 of the ICCPR, which determines that everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience, and religion. This right includes the freedom to have or to adopt a religion or beliefs of one's choice, and the freedom, either individually or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest one's religion or beliefs in worship, observance, practice, and teaching. The ICCPR also determines that no person shall be subject to coercion which would impair their freedom to have or to adopt a religion or beliefs of their choice. A similar definition is contained in the first paragraph of Article 9 the ECHR, which provides that "everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience, and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in worship, teaching, practice, and observance."

77. Similarly, the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union (OJ C 83, 30 March 2010, p. 389),<sup>11</sup> which became legally binding by the entry into force of the Lisbon Treaty,<sup>12</sup> determines in the first paragraph of Article 10 (freedom of thought, conscience, and religion) that everyone has "[...] the right to freedom of thought, conscience, and religion. This right includes freedom to change religion or belief and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or in private, to manifest religion or belief, in worship, teaching, practice, and observance."

8 "Laws and regulations must comply with generally accepted principles of international law and with treaties that are binding on Slovenia. Ratified and published treaties shall be applied directly."

9 "No human right or fundamental freedom regulated by legal acts in force in Slovenia may be restricted on the grounds that this Constitution does not recognise that right or freedom or recognises it to a lesser extent."

10 "Laws must be in conformity with generally accepted principles of international law and with valid treaties ratified by the National Assembly, whereas regulations and other general legal acts must also be in conformity with other ratified treaties."

11 The Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union was first solemnly declared on 7 December 2000 in Nice (OJ 364, dated 18 December 2000, p. 1).

12 See Article 6 of the Treaty on European Union (Consolidated Version of the Treaty on European Union, OJ C 83, dated 30 March 2010, p. 13).

78. It follows from the wording of the first and second paragraphs of Article 41 of the Constitution, considering the cited provisions of the ICCPR, the ECHR, and the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, that freedom of religion is a complex or composite human right. Its substantive framework operates on three levels of human existence and covers a range of derived rights of a constitutional level. All these rights obviously establish appropriate duties of the state, in statutory regulations as well as regarding such exercise in practice. The Constitutional Court has already adopted a number of standpoints on this matter, which are strengthened and in part expanded with the new ones in this Decision. The following decisions of the Constitutional Court are of particular importance: Decision No. U-I-68/98, dated 22 November 2001 (Official Gazette RS, No. 101/01, and OdlUS X, 192), Decision No. U-I-92/01, dated 28 February 2002 (Official Gazette RS, No. 22/02, and OdlUS XI, 25), Opinion No. Rm-1/02, dated 19 November 2003 (Official Gazette RS, No. 118/03, and OdlUS XII, 89), Decision No. U-I-111/04, dated 8 July 2004 (Official Gazette RS, No. 77/04, and OdlUS XIII, 54), and Decision No. U-I-354/06, dated 9 October 2008 (Official Gazette RS, No. 104/08, and OdlUS XVII, 52).
79. Hereinafter this Decision will refer mainly to religious freedom, however, the findings regarding the content of Article 41 of the Constitution also apply to other, non-religious ideological declarations or beliefs.

b) Three Levels of Religious Freedom

80. At the deepest spiritual level, freedom of religion entails the right to have a religion or the right to freely choose one's religion, the right to not have a religion or to not be a member of any religion, and the right to freely change one's religion. It is a freedom of belief (the freedom to believe), the so-called forum internum, an aspect of religious freedom which the Constitution does not mention explicitly, but undoubtedly the constitutional protection of Article 41 of the Constitution applies also to it. These are namely the internal considerations and the internal decisions of an individual, which by their very nature can be neither regulated nor restricted. Regarding the internal personal decisions of individuals concerning religious issues, Article 41 is a special provision of the Constitution in relation to the first paragraph of Article 39 of the Constitution, which otherwise ensures freedom of thought. Freedom of religion as a specific form of freedom of thought can be exercised only by natural persons, by the very nature of things, legal persons cannot enjoy this aspect of freedom of conscience.
81. The other two levels of religious freedom already entail the external manifestation of one's inner personal decisions (the so-called forum externum). The first of them entails the right to profess one's religion freely. In this sense, freedom of religion is a special form of the general right to freedom of expression (the first paragraph of Article 39 of the Constitution). Profession [of religion] entails external verbal or written expressions of religion, including for the purpose of spreading the religion. The first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution expressly refers only to the freedom to profess one's religion, however it is not possible to interpret this concept differently but that the exercise of religion is protected as well. At the third level, freedom of religion is protected as a form of the general freedom of activity (Article 35 of the Constitution). The concept of professing one's religion thus also includes practices that are an integral part of a religion. In addition to religious teachings, it is worship or religious rituals, other rules of conduct stemming from its teachings, as well as integration in the community which are in fact essential to a religion. If such conduct was not constitutionally protected, freedom of religion would be almost completely hollowed out. Such activities are explicitly protected by the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, the ECHR, and the ICCPR. The freedom to profess and exercise one's religion is ensured to individuals and religious communities or associations, regardless of whether they have a legal personality or not.

82. Freedom of religion may be exercised individually or collectively; concerning both forms, it is possible to distinguish between positive and negative aspects. At the level of personal, individual decisions regarding religious affiliation (forum internum), freedom of religion entails the right of an individual to have a religious belief (the positive aspect) without the interference of a public authority, and at the same time the right of an individual to not have a religious belief if he or she does not want to, and that it is not admissible to coerce him or her into one (the negative aspect). Freedom of religion as forum internum enjoys absolute protection against interferences by the state – the state may not in any event or in any manner prescribe or force the people to adopt (a certain) religion or other beliefs nor prescribe or force the people to not have or adopt a religion or other beliefs.

c) The Positive Aspect of Religious Freedom

83. At the level of the profession and manifestation of religion, the positive aspect of religious freedom entails that an individual may freely profess his or her religious beliefs and other religious declaration in the outside world. External manifestations of religious beliefs are not limited only to privacy, but the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution expressly protects the freedom to profess one's religion also in public life. Religious and other declarations are an integral part of public life and society. No one's freedom of religion or philosophical beliefs can be affected just because the activities of a free democratic society also encompass [other] religious aspects through citizens who are committed to their own religion as adherents.
84. The positive aspect of religious freedom is defined in the cited provisions of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, the ECHR, and the ICCPR in more detail than in the Constitution. The Constitutional Court has already adopted the standpoint in Decision No. U-I-68/98 that the positive aspect of freedom of religion determined in the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution ensures that an individual may freely profess his or her religion either alone or in community with others and in public or in private, by teaching, performing religious duties, in worship, and in observance. The positive aspect of religious freedom thus ensures any (oral or written, private or public) expression of religion or religious affiliation, including prayers and spreading religious dogma, and also actions which constitute observance of religious rules (worship, rites, rituals, processions, the use of religious garments, symbols, etc.) are protected. In general, it can be stated that the constitutionally guaranteed freedom of religion includes externally perceived actions that are significantly related to the individual's religious beliefs. However, this does not entail that all actions that are only encouraged by religious beliefs or those that are influenced by it to whatever degree of intensity are protected. The constitutional protection encompasses only those actions which are reasonably related to the essence of the religious beliefs and without which the religious freedom of the individual would be significantly curtailed. Therefore, generally binding and religiously neutral statutory obligations and prohibitions intended for the protection of other generally beneficial values entail a limitation of this human right only when they refer to those religious manifestations that meet this mentioned quality. Obligations and prohibitions of actions that do not meet this standard cannot constitute an interference with freedom of religion.<sup>13</sup>

d) The Negative Aspect of Freedom of Religion

85. The negative aspect of freedom of religion entails that an individual is not obliged to have a religion and that he or she is not obliged to declare his or her religious or other beliefs, and that due to such he or she cannot be punished, discriminated against, or disadvantaged. Even if an individual is considered to be a member of a particular religion, it is not acceptable to coerce him or her to profess such religion and he or she also has the right to refuse to participate in actions manifesting such religion. Although the negative aspect of freedom of religion derives already from the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution, it is specifically provided for in the second paragraph of this Article that no one shall be obliged to declare his religious or other beliefs. In Decision No. U-I-92/01 the Constitutional Court stated that the use of coercion in order to force someone to change or disclose their religious beliefs constitutes an interference with freedom of conscience. If a law required that an individual was obliged to declare his or her religious beliefs, it would constitute a violation of freedom of conscience and would be unconstitutional (i.e. inconsistent with the second paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution). The right to not declare one's religious or other beliefs logically also includes the right to not profess or to not exercise a religion, as the requirement to profess or manifest a religion also entails that the individual declare his or her beliefs with regards to that religion.
86. In Decision No. U-I-68/98 the Constitutional Court, inter alia, accepted the standpoint that the negative aspect of religious freedom requires the state to prevent any forced (unwanted) exposure to any religious belief. However, in the conflict between the positive and the negative aspects of freedom of religion, i.e. in instances where the positive aspect of freedom of religion interferes with the negative aspect of freedom of religion, the negative aspect of such freedom does not have an a priori advantage over the positive aspect of such freedom.<sup>14</sup> Weighing must be carried out in each individual case and it has to be considered which aspect of such freedom must be given priority in accordance with the principle of proportionality. In the cited Decision, the Constitutional Court, for example, found that the ban on religious activities in public kindergartens and schools entails a proportionate and therefore admissible interference with the positive aspect of freedom of religion (the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution) and with the right of parents determined in the third paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution in order to protect the negative aspect of the freedom of religion of other children and their parents (the second paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution).<sup>15</sup> Regarding the upbringing and education of children, in addition to the freedom of religion of children, also the third paragraph 41 of the Constitution, which guarantees parents a specific aspect of their freedom of religion, i.e. the right of parents to provide their children with a religious and moral upbringing in accordance with their beliefs, has to be taken into account.

13 The restriction of religious expression protected by Article 9 of the ECHR to only those external manifestations that entail the exercise of religion or beliefs in a generally accepted form is well established also in the case law of the European Commission of Human Rights and the ECtHR. Namely, for example, the ECtHR did not consider the refusal of a pharmacist to sell contraceptive pills to be the exercise of religion or belief (the decision in the case Pichon and Sajous v. France, dated 2 October 2001). See B. Vermeulen, in: P. van Dijk, F. van Hoof, A. van Rijn and L. Zwaak (ed.), Theory and Practice of the European Convention on Human Rights, 4th edition, Intersentia, Antwerp – Oxford 2006, p. 762.

e) The Collective Aspect of Religious Freedom

87. Freedom of religion is not only an individual right of individuals, but it also contains a collective dimension, which includes the interactions of adherents. It is common that individuals practice their religion together with others who share the same religious beliefs (especially in the form of rites), and join together in religious associations (churches or other religious communities). The Constitutional Court has already emphasised in Decision No. U-I-111/04 that the Constitution does not protect only the individual but also the collective aspect of the profession of one's religion. The wording of Article 9 of the ECHR, i.e. that one component of freedom of religion is also the right to profess one's religion or beliefs "in community with others", reveals this in particular.
88. The collective exercise of religious freedom has two aspects. The first entails the right of individuals to join together and establish a religious community in the context of their religious freedom. In this context, the positive and negative aspects of freedom of religion as determined in the first and second paragraphs of Article 41 of the Constitution are special with respect to the general freedom of association determined

14 M. Orehar Ivanc, ibidem, p. 448.

15 On the other hand, for example, in Decision No. U-I-111/04 the Constitutional Court did not adopt the standpoint that the construction of a religious building may constitute an interference with the negative freedom of religion of others, who would have to deal with this facility permanently and involuntarily. It held that the mere fact that such a building, which also has external religious characteristics, is located on land that is intended for the construction of a religious building, cannot by itself interfere with the so-called negative aspect of freedom of religion.

in the second paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution. The direct constitutional basis for the establishment of religious communities is therefore the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution, although the content of these rights should also be understood in light of the second paragraph of Article 42, in particular with due regard to the views of the Constitutional Court in Decision No. U-I-155/07, dated 9 April 2009 (Official Gazette of RS, No. 32/09). The second collective aspect of religious freedom is a result of and an elaboration of the first one: it ensures freedom of conscience also to religious communities themselves.

89. The freedom of religious association ensures that everyone is free to join religious communities with other adherents. An essential element of that right is the element of will: every person has the right to freely decide whether to join a religious community or not.<sup>16</sup> In addition to the right to associate with others (the so-called positive aspect of freedom of association), everyone has the right to not associate with others (the so-called negative aspect of freedom of association). The collective exercise of religious freedom in connection with individual religious freedom implies the positive entitlement of an individual to profess his or her religion in association with others and to establish religious communities with them, to become a member thereof, and to participate in religious rites, as well as the negative entitlement that he or she does not need to become a member of a religious association, to decline his or her participation in an association, and to not attend religious rites or other expressions of religious belief. Although the negative aspect of freedom of religious association is not expressly determined in the Constitution, it results from the very substance of this right and is an integral part thereof.
90. Religious association is characterised by the internal organisation of a religious community. Such internal organisation entails that the religious community is more than just a collection of individuals. The right to freedom of association presupposes an organised association of individuals who operate internally by their own rules. The freedom to establish religious communities, thus, implies also the right of religious communities to independently and autonomously regulate their internal affairs concerning their activities and the internal position of their members. This freedom of activity must have a larger margin if the organisational rules according to which the religious community functions have the status of religious rules (e.g. the religious rituals have meaning for adherents only if they are carried out by priests, appointed in accordance with the rules of the religion). In the framework of freedom of religion determined in the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution, the free activity of religious communities specifically guaranteed in the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution is therefore also protected. In terms of the freedom to establish religious communities, it is not necessary that a religious community be officially recognised or registered. Constitutional protection is also ensured to completely informal religious communities.

16 An exception is the constitutional right of parents to raise their children in accordance with their own religious beliefs.

91. The second collective aspect of religious freedom ensures freedom of conscience also to religious communities themselves. Not as a forum internum, which by its very nature can be possessed only by a natural person, but as the right to freely and in accordance with their own rules profess religious beliefs and carry out religious practices.<sup>17</sup>

f) The Obligations of the State when Ensuring Religious Freedom

92. Freedom of religion is primarily a defensive right<sup>18</sup> (the so-called negative status right). The state – the same applies to local communities and bearers of public authority – must not inadmissibly interfere in the relationships protected in the first and second paragraphs of Article 41 of the Constitution. This aspect prohibits the state first of all from adopting decisions on issues concerning the teachings of religion or the internal autonomy of religious communities, prohibits the state from requiring (some manner of) declaration concerning religious issues or issues of conscience, and from rewarding or punishing activities constituting the profession of a (certain) religion or other belief. In connection with Article 14 of the Constitution (the first paragraph of Article 14 prohibits discrimination regarding human rights and fundamental freedoms and the second paragraph establishes the general constitutional principle of equality), Article 41 of the Constitution also prohibits unfair discrimination (privileging or neglecting) against individuals due to their religion or other beliefs.
93. The duty to ensure and protect freedom of religion does not entail that any measure adopted by the state that touches upon religious issues already constitutes an inadmissible interference with freedom of religion. In accordance with the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, human rights and fundamental freedoms are limited by the rights of others and in such cases as provided by the Constitution. Regarding collective religious freedom, also the third paragraph of Article 42 should be considered, which provides that legislative restrictions on the right to freedom of association are permissible if so required for reasons of national security or public safety and for protection against the spread of infectious diseases. Any restrictions of human rights or fundamental freedoms must also be consistent with the principle of proportionality, which is one of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution).
94. The duty of the state to enable unhindered exercise of religious freedom also requires certain positive measures. In particular, it must ensure and build tolerance among adherents of different religions or beliefs,<sup>19</sup> and prevent unjustified differentiation on

17 It is also an established position of the ECtHR that religious groups are also the addressees of the right determined in Article 9 of the ECHR. The ECtHR has emphasised in several decisions, inter alia, that religious communities traditionally exist in the form of organised structures and that their autonomous existence is an indispensable element of pluralism in a democratic society and thus an issue at the very heart of the protection which Article 9 affords. See, for example, the Judgments in the case Cha'are Shalom Ve Tsedek v. France, dated 27 June 2000, and in the case Hasan and Chaush v. Bulgaria, dated 26 October 2000.

the grounds of religion also among individuals (e.g. concerning employment, where such is not necessary due to the nature of the matter). Persons who have limited access to religious care must be enabled access to religious care in certain situations (e.g. soldiers, prisoners, etc.). The state must provide a framework for the acquisition of a legal personality by religious communities that wish to do so. The full effectiveness of the free functioning of religious communities in a modern democratic state would be undermined if they did not have an opportunity to exercise their rights and (thus) the rights of their adherents, which are essential elements of the exercise of its constitutionally protected entitlements, on the basis of their own activities in legal transactions.<sup>20</sup> It is only the status of legal person which fully makes it possible for a religious community, for example, to rent or to own religious facilities and, finally, also for the judicial protection of rights.<sup>21</sup> One of the key issues that the Constitutional Court addressed in this case is how broadly the duty of the state to create conditions for the free realisation of religious needs extends.

The Principle of the Separation of the State and Religious Communities (the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution)

95. Article 7 of the Constitution determines three principles that define the legal status of religious communities in the Republic of Slovenia: the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities (the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution) [hereinafter: the principle of separation], the principle of the freedom of activity of religious communities and the principle of the equality of religious communities (the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution). The Constitution defines the relationship between the state and religious communities only in principle, while the meaning and the content of these principles and also their relationship with Article 41 of the Constitution are only beginning to be formed.<sup>22</sup>
96. The standpoint of the constitution framers concerning the enactment of the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities is reflected in the preparatory materials for the Constitution. The reasons behind the first recorded mention of the principle of separation follow from the reasoning of the Draft Constitution, dated 29 October 1990.<sup>23</sup> With this principle, it should be emphasised “[...] that the church cannot perform functions that are reserved for the state or state authorities (such as, conducting marriages, maintaining registers of personal status, issuing public docu-

20 Among the scholars who emphasise that legal personality is of vital importance for the life and all activities of religious communities, there is, for example, W. C. Durham Jr., Facilitating Freedom of Religion or Belief through Religious Association Laws, in: T. Lindholm, W. C. Durham and B. G. Tahzib-Lie (ed.), Facilitating Freedom of Religion or Belief: A Deskbook, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, Leiden 2004, pp. 322 et seq.

21 The ECtHR has also repeatedly emphasised that the failure to recognise the legal personality of a religious community constitutes an interference with the freedom of religion determined in Article 9 of the ECHR (e.g. the Judgment in Religionsgemeinschaft der Zeugen Jehovas et al. v. Austria, dated 31 July 2008, and the Judgment in Metropolitan Church of Bessarabia et al. v. Moldova, dated 13 December 2001).

22 The Constitutional Court has already stated this in Opinion No. Rm-1/02.

23 The first paragraph of Article 5 stated: “The church is separate from the state.”

ments, etc.). This does not limit the activities of the church in some areas, e.g. in the sphere of charitable activities, education, etc., where the church may perform such activities under the same conditions as citizens. This also does not prevent the inclusion of certain institutions of the church in various public institutions, for example, the integration of theological faculties in universities while respecting the legislation in the relevant areas.”<sup>24</sup> In the statement of reasons of the Draft of the Constitution, dated 12 December 1991, in which the wording of Article 7 proposed is equivalent to the text in force, it was stated that this provision “[...] enacts the principle of the laical nature of the state. Due to the standpoint that the equal treatment of church(es) and various other religious communities should be enabled, the first paragraph is formulated in more general wording, whereas the second paragraph in addition to equality also provides for the freedom of activity of religious communities.”<sup>25</sup>

97. The Constitutional Court considered the content of the principle of separation already in Decision No. U-I-68/98. At that time it adopted the standpoint that, in accordance with the general principle of the separation of the state and religious communities, the state is bound to neutrality, tolerance, and a non-missionary manner of operating. Similarly but slightly more broadly, the content of this principle was explained also in Decision No. U-I-92/01, wherein the Court stated that this principle concerns above all the autonomy of religious communities (in their own sphere), the secularisation of public life, and the neutrality of the state with respect to religious communities.
98. The Constitutional Court adopted an even more detailed standpoint concerning the principle of separation in Opinion No. Rm-1/02. It emphasised the neutrality of the state towards all religious and other beliefs as its particularly essential component. This neutrality prohibits the state from identifying with any religious or other belief and the establishment of a state religion, as well as the promotion or prohibition of ideological beliefs. The Constitutional Court assessed that the principle of separation, which is included in the democratic order (Article 1 of the Constitution) that protects human rights and fundamental freedoms (the first paragraph of Article 5 of the Constitution), provides that religious communities may completely freely pursue activities in their religious (spiritual) sphere. It prevents any expansion of the powers of the state to matters which are of an exclusively religious nature or which fall under the internal affairs of religious communities (similar also in Decision No. U-I-354/06). In the areas in which the activities of religious communities interfere with the competences of the state, the freedom of activity of religious communities as an integral part of the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities is limited by the sovereignty of the state. It does not prevent religious communities from pursuing activities in various areas of social life (e.g. educational, charitable, social, health, economic activities). Due to the principle of sovereignty (internal state sovereignty), only the state may determine the limits in accordance with which the performance of tasks in the competence of the state can be left to the private sphere and under what conditions. The Constitutional Court also adopted the standpoint that the state is not bound to support and encourage the activities of religious communities, and added that the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities does not entail the exclusion of all support and assistance, provided, of course, that the equality of all religious communities is ensured.

99. From those standpoints it can be presumed that the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities determined in the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution in the broad sense has three elements: (1) the religious or ideological neutrality of the state, (2) the autonomy of religious communities in their own sphere, and (3) the equal relation of the state towards all religious communities. The autonomy and equality of religious communities are the mirror image of the requirement of the neutrality of the state: the state is not neutral if it does not treat religious communities equally and if it interferes in autonomous religious areas. They are determined as special constitutional principles in the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution. Although they are an integral part of the broader principle of the separation of the state and religious communities, they can be considered separately.
100. Although in Article 7 the Constitution expressly determines only the separation of the state and religious communities, the neutrality of the state towards religious beliefs also requires the neutrality of the state towards other worldviews. The requirement of the equal treatment of religious and other beliefs stems from the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution in conjunction with Article 14 of the Constitution. As the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution requires the neutrality of the state towards religions and religious communities, the same requirement also extends to other ideological beliefs
101. The religious or worldview neutrality of the state obliges it to not include in its operations religious and philosophical elements, to remain impartial, to neither accept nor reject religion and other worldviews and to – in ideological terms – neither support nor hinder any of them. The requirement of the neutrality (secularity) of the state, of course, does not require the exclusion of religion from public life: already the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution explicitly guarantees freedom to profess of one's faith in private and public life.<sup>26</sup>

26 Foreign, especially German, legal theory distinguishes between the concepts of laity and secularity, and perceives the difference between them to be in the extent of the neutrality of the state. The first notion is interpreted as an originally French one (in French: laïcité) developed in the late 19th century as a worldview and which has roots in the Enlightenment, and which was eventually transformed into the principle of state laity. The concept of laity according to this classification includes not only the secularisation of the state authority in the narrow sense, but also the withdrawal of religion from public life and into the privacy of individuals. See, for example, V. Wick, Die Trennung von Staat und Kirche, Mohr Siebeck, Tübingen 2007, pp. 11 and 39.

102. The Preamble to the Constitution emphasises that human rights and fundamental freedoms are the fundamental premise that were relied on by the constitution framers in adopting the Constitution. This must be taken into account when interpreting the normative part of the Constitution. Slovenia is a democratic state (Article 1 of the Constitution). Therefore, its first and most important duty is to protect and ensure human rights and fundamental freedoms (the first paragraph of Article 5 of the Constitution). Accordingly, the Constitutional Court has highlighted in several decisions the instrumental nature of constitutional principles as tools intended to protect the rights of individuals. Thus, it has, for example, repeatedly emphasised that the essence of the principle of the separation of powers is in its basic function of protecting individuals against the state (see, for example, Decision No. U-I-158/94, dated 9 March 1995, Official Gazette RS, No. 18/95, and OdlUS IV, 20; Decision No. U-I-224/96, dated 22 May 1997, Official Gazette RS, No. 36/97, and OdlUS VI, 65, and Decision No. U-I-60/06, U-I-214/06, U-I-228/06, dated 7 December 2006, Official Gazette RS, No. 27/06, and 1/07, and OdlUS XV, 84) and that the principle of the separation of powers is the principle intended to prevent the abuse of authority which always occurs at the expense of the people or at the expense of the rights of an individual (Decision No. U-I-60/06, U-I-214/06, U-I-228/06). The dimensions of the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities as well cannot be filled with meaning without understanding the purpose of the existence of this principle. The aim of this principle is to ensure true freedom of conscience (and, in a broader sense, pluralism as an essential component of a democratic society), and the equality of individuals and religious communities. In other words, it is not the purpose of the principle of the separation [of the state and religious communities] to protect the state itself from religious and other beliefs and associations (the state itself, of course if it is democratic, is not to be protected from anything), but to ensure complete freedom of conscience and the equality of all people, adherents and non-adherents, with its neutral stance.<sup>27</sup> Without this principle, encompassed in freedom of conscience, this human right would be incomplete. It would be incomplete because there would be no effective tool for establishing freedom and equality for all. And, more importantly, without this principle the door would be open in the other direction – to the influence of the state on religious communities. The principle of separation is therefore not statist, but humanistic. A neutral state respects the right of individuals to freely, individually, or collectively profess their religion or other beliefs. Regarding this, it takes into account that citizens have different religious and non-religious beliefs or that they do not have them at all and that it is responsible for ensuring the freedom of everyone.

<sup>27</sup> Legal theory distinguishes two concepts of the model of the separation of the state and religious communities which are demonstrated by the historical development regarding this: the French model, in legal theory referred to as the anti-clerical or statist model, which sought to free the state from the church, while the American liberal model of separation is a consequence of the idea of the liberation of the church from the state with the intent to provide space for religious freedom. See C. Walter, Religionsverfassungsrecht, Mohr Siebeck, Tübingen 2006, p. 69.

- 103. The religious and ideological neutrality of the state perceived in such a manner is not an obstacle to the cooperation of the state with religious communities. A modern democratic and social state is actively involved in many areas of society, which it promotes in various ways, directly or indirectly. As on the basis of their convictions religious communities carry out tasks in such areas as well, the state must not ignore or even eliminate them in encouraging and promoting various activities in society.<sup>28</sup> The religious neutrality of the state does not entail that religion is pushed to the margins of society, as this could lead to precisely the opposite effect: discrimination based on religion and the denial of neutrality. The principle of separation does not prevent the state from establishing positive relationships, forms of cooperation, and joint efforts with those religious communities that also perform charitable activities, such as the state has in this respect with other organisations of civil society.<sup>29</sup> In doing so, it also cannot be disputed if the legislature assesses in general that religious communities with their fundamental mission – care for religious freedom as a human right – perform an important and useful role in terms of strengthening human dignity in a modern democratic society that goes beyond the pursuit of individual goals. Regarding this, the attitude of the state in relationship to various religious communities must not be inconsistent with the principle of equality, and it especially must not result in the eventual assessment of the state of the legitimacy of the content of such beliefs.
- 104. This neutrality also does not require the state to be indifferent towards the religious needs of the people. Religion is certainly not a state matter. However, as follows from Article 41 of the Constitution, the state is obliged to take into account to a certain extent the religious problems of individuals and religious communities, which it must approach in a neutral and fair manner. Therefore, although the state does not occupy itself with religious issues, it must nevertheless recognise the importance of religion for individuals and actively create conditions for the exercise of this human right. The interpretation of the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution is crucial for determining the duty of the state in relation to it enabling the religious life of people. Nobody has the right to request public assistance in the profession of religion, unless, of course, such a duty results from the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution. This entails that everything that falls within the scope of the exercise of the right to freedom of religion determined in Article 41 of the Constitution cannot be considered inconsistent with the principle of separation determined in the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution. The cooperation of the state with religious communities is not in itself illegal from the perspective of constitutional law, even if it exceeds the limit required by Article 41 of the Constitution, namely as long as the state is religiously neutral in acting in this manner and does not identify itself with religion or religious communities.

The Principle of the Freedom of Activity of Religious Communities
(the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution)

105. The principle of the freedom of activity of religious communities is one of the three components of the broadly perceived principle of the separation of the state and religious communities. It entails the protection of religious communities against the interventions of the state, i.e. it is a guarantee of the autonomy of religious communities in their internal affairs. This principle is further emphasised in the Constitution in the second paragraph of Article 7, which explicitly refers to the free activity of religious communities. At the same time, as already mentioned, the autonomy of religious communities is also a component of the provisions concerning human rights and fundamental freedoms: in general, it is an expression of the general freedom determined in Article 35 of the Constitution, and its direct constitutional basis is also determined in the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution (the Constitutional Court adopted a similar position also in Opinion No. Rm-1/02). This finding entails that interference with the autonomy of religious communities is regarded as an interference with a human right, which is admissible only if it fulfils the conditions of review under the so-called strict proportionality test.
106. In substance, this right ensures religious communities in particular the freedom of establishment, organisation, implementation, the performance of religious rites, and the enactment of other religious matters. This entails that they may organise themselves freely and decide independently on their internal structure, composition, internal competence, the functioning of their bodies, the appointment and duties of their priests and other representatives, the rights and obligations of their adherents related to the exercise of religion, and on connecting with other organisations or religious communities. Freedom of activity is ensured to them not only as regards their private activities and in private spaces, but also in public life. The right of religious communities to organise their internal rules on their own and to independently and autonomously carry out their mission does not relieve them of the obligation to act in accordance with the state legal order.
107. As a fundamental human right, the right to the freedom of activity of religious communities is in essence a defensive right against interferences by the state. The state must not adopt measures that unduly interfere with the sphere of autonomy of religious communities. Interferences with this right are permissible only if the general conditions determined in the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution are fulfilled and the principle of proportionality is taken into consideration. In Paragraph 94 of the reasoning [of this Decision] the Constitutional Court already stated that the constitutionally protected freedom of activity of religious communities binds the state to establish a mechanism that allows religious communities to also obtain the status of a legal person.

The Principle of the Equality of Religious Communities
(the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution)

108. As well as the principle of freedom of activity, the principle of the equality of religious communities is, on the one hand, an integral part of the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities, since the religious neutrality of the state requires the equal treatment of religious communities. On the other hand, its origins are found in the human right to freedom of conscience. In the same manner as regards the principle of freedom of activity, in Opinion No. Rm-1/02, the Constitutional Court adopted the standpoint that also the principle of equality derives from the human right to freedom of conscience determined in the first and the second paragraphs of Article 41 of the Constitution, “[...] as only on the basis of the equal and free activities of all religious communities can the exercise of this constitutional right be guaranteed”.

- 109. Unlike the principle of autonomy, however, the principle of the equality of religious communities is not an independent component of the right to freedom of conscience determined in Article 41 of the Constitution, despite the fact that its intent is to ensure this right, but rather is a specific expression of the general principle of equality determined in Article 14 of the Constitution in the area of the relationship of the state to religious communities. The principle of the equality of religious communities is an instrument for ensuring religious freedom and should be understood in conjunction with the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution, which prohibits discrimination on the basis of personal circumstances when exercising any human rights and fundamental freedoms, and in conjunction with the second paragraph of that same article, which determines the equality of all before the law. The different treatment of religious communities regarding the exercise of a human right or fundamental freedom based on faith should therefore be reviewed according to the strict proportionality test as required by the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution (see Decision No. U-I-425/06, dated 2 July 2009, Official Gazette RS, No. 55/09). Other forms of differentiation between religious communities, namely those for which the reason for differentiation is either not religion (or any other personal circumstance) or those forms that do not relate to the exercise of human rights, are constitutionally permissible if they do not violate the general principle of equality before the law determined in the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution. In accordance with the established constitutional review case law, the latter principle prohibits the legislature, inter alia, from arbitrarily differently regulating situations that are in their essence the same. In such a case, the differentiation of the legislature between religious communities regarding a specific issue is admissible if there exists a reasonable, objective reason that is justified by the nature of the matter.
- 110. As the first and the second paragraphs of Article 41 of the Constitution provide for the same constitutional protection of religious and other philosophical beliefs, the first and the second paragraphs of Article 14 the Constitution also require appropriate equal treatment of religious communities and other ideological associations.

Methodological Approach

- 111. The close interlacing and substantive interdependence of Articles 41 and 7 of the Constitution and their connection to Article 14 of the Constitution require a response to the question of how to take into account in a methodological sense the mentioned relationships when reviewing the constitutionality of the contested provisions. The standpoint of the Constitutional Court is that in cases where a statutory provision is contested on the basis of aspects that relate at the same time to the substance of one of the constitutional principles of Article 7 of the Constitution and of the human right determined in Article 41 (in particular, the circumstances stemming from the framework of the right to the freedom of activity of religious communities), a review of compliance with Article 41 of the Constitution is to be performed first of all. Firstly, it must therefore be established which rights stem from freedom of conscience, what the appropriate state duties are and whether the statutory measure interferes with them. The human right to freedom of conscience is namely the cornerstone of the entire regulation of the status of religious communities and in this sense takes precedence over the constitutional principles defining the status of religious communities in relation to the state. If the statutory measure passes the review of constitutionality in light of Article 41 of the Constitution, a review must then be performed, in the framework determined by the applicant's claims, concerning conformity with the first and second paragraphs of Article 7 of the Constitution, i.e. with those of its aspects – even if their origin and purpose is the protection of the human right determined in Article 41 of the Constitution – that do not comprise the core substance of this human right. This refers primarily to the requirements of the neutrality of the state and with regard to the equality of religious communities.

B – III

Review of the Conditions for the Registration of Religious Communities (the first paragraph of Article 13 of the RFA)

- 112. The contested first paragraph of Article 13 of the RFA determines that a church or other religious community may be registered if it has at least a hundred adult members who are citizens of the Republic of Slovenia or aliens with permanent residence on its territory and if it has been active in Slovenia at least in the last ten years. Article 14 of the RFA determines the documents that the religious community must enclose with the application for registration. In the first item it thus imposes the obligation to submit a list containing the data of the persons referred to in the first paragraph of Article 13 of the RFA (this includes their name, nationality, and residence) and their certified signatures. In the fifth item it requires the religious community to submit proof of its presence in Slovenia in the last ten years, which the religious community is not required to submit if it has been recognised in the world for over 100 years. The condition of ten years of activity in Slovenia is, therefore, pursuant to the fifth item of Article 14 of the RFA, not applicable to the registration of religious communities which have been recognised in the world for over 100 years. The third paragraph of Article 6 of the RFA determines that registered churches and other religious communities are legal persons under private law. The purpose of the registration is therefore to establish a special legal status that sets religious communities apart from other legal persons.
- 113. The applicant considers the mentioned statutory conditions for the registration to be inconsistent with the principle of the equality of religious communities (the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution), freedom of conscience (the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution), the freedom of activity of religious communities (the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution) and right to freedom of association (the second paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution). It states that a religious community needs a form of legal status if it wishes to be active in reality and to appear in public life. In its view, the RFA should allow for the registration of all religious communities and the state can determine the conditions [for this intervention in the public sphere] only when the religious community begins to intervene in the public sphere.

114. This registration or another form of acquiring a legal personality is not a precondition for the establishment and activity of religious communities. Religious communities can be active in a completely informal manner and such forms of associations already enjoy constitutional protection. However, the Constitutional Court has already stated (Paragraph 94 of the reasoning) that the constitutionally protected freedom of activity of religious community obliges the state to establish a mechanism for religious communities that wish to do so to acquire a legal personality. This is required by the collective aspect of the human right to freedom of conscience determined in the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution, understood in the light of the second paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution, which guarantees the right to freedom of association. In this regard, the second paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution substantively codetermines the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution.
115. In Decision No. U-I-155/07 the Constitutional Court determined in detail the substance of freedom of association pursuant to the second paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution. It adopted the standpoint that this freedom guarantees individuals, inter alia, the possibility to establish a legal person for collective action in the area of common interest, as without a legal personality freedom of association often does not make any sense. It emphasised that the obligation of the state to ensure specific types of associations in general does not stem by itself from the second paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution. The obligation of the state is in general therefore only to provide one or more forms that will allow individuals to effectively exercise their interests through an association. The legislature thus has discretion concerning which status forms or legal regimes it will provide, while taking into account the specificities of each area in which associations are active. The obligation to provide a certain or specific legal form (legal regime) of association derives from the Constitution only exceptionally: in particular where such special treatment is necessitated by other grounds of constitutional law or if such is strictly necessary for the exercise of other human rights or fundamental freedoms.
116. The Constitutional Court deems that religious association is not just exercise of the general constitutionally guaranteed right to freedom of association (the second paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution), but is also an exercise of the right to freedom of religion determined in the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution. The freedom of activity of religious communities derives already from the human right to freedom of conscience, and in particular their autonomy is determined as a fundamental constitutional principle also in the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution. This entails that the requirement to provide such legal forms of religious communities that allow for the greatest possible autonomy of religious communities in the exercise of religious freedom follows from the first paragraph of Article 41 in conjunction with the second paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution and from the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution. This essentially entails the requirement that the legal order must in principle respect the autonomous internal structure of a religious community and recognise legal personality to it as such.

- 117. In view of this, the question arises whether from the perspective of the freedom of the establishment and activity of religious communities determined in such a manner it is sufficient that the state provides only a general, fundamental legal form of association, i.e. the form of an association. Namely, if the general legal regime of associations fulfils the requirements of the human right of religious communities to obtain such a legal personality that respects their autonomy to the greatest possible extent, then the conditions determined in the first paragraph of Article 13 of the RFA, which otherwise provides for a particular legal form specifically for religious communities, do not constitute an interference with this human right. The registration of religious communities in accordance with the RFA would in such a case constitute only one of the ways in which this human right can be exercised that the legislature made available in the framework of its discretion. Religious communities that do not meet the conditions determined in the first paragraph of Article 13 of the RFA, i.e. those regarding which the number of members is less than 100 and which are less than ten years old (or not recognised in the world for over 100 years) and whose registrants are not citizens or permanent residents of Slovenia, could obtain a legal personality as required by this human right in the general legal form of association. However, if it is ascertained that the legal regulation of associations is not sufficient from the point of view of the human right to obtain an adequate legal personality (which is derived from the first paragraph of Article 41 in conjunction with the second paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution), then it must be reviewed whether the contested conditions determined in the first paragraph of Article 13 of the RFA are so restrictive that they constitute an interference with that right.<sup>30</sup> In order for the Constitutional Court to assess whether the specific conditions of the first paragraph of Article 13 of the RFA amount to an infringement of the human right of religious communities to obtain adequate legal personality, it had to first review the preliminary question whether the solutions in the Act governing an association as the most general form of association (AA-1) are such that they provide religious communities with the greatest possible autonomy with regard to their establishment and activities.

30 This approach was adopted by the Constitutional Court already in Case No. U-I-155/07. In the statutory regulation of the forms of status of those associations that are required by the Constitution and which must be regulated by the legislature, it must be assessed on a case-by-case basis whether a certain statutory provision entails the determination of the manner of the exercise of freedom of association (or some other human right) or whether it already entails a limitation and thus an interference with this human right. On the other hand, the acts governing the types of associations that the Constitution does not require entail, in general, the manner of exercising the second paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution. A statutory regulation that entails only the determination of the exercise of human rights is reviewed by the Constitutional Court with restraint, i.e. only in terms of reasonableness.

- 118. There are a number of provisions among the provisions of Part II of the AA-1, which governs the establishment and management of an association, that would in the view of the Constitutional Court – if they were applied to religious communities – interfere with the right of adherents to freedom of religious association and the autonomy of religious communities regarding their activities. Thus, for example, the second paragraph of Article 10 of the AA-1 provides, inter alia, that the name of the association must include the word association, alliance, or club, and the association must only use its registered name in legal transactions (the sixth paragraph of Article 10 of the AA-1). In accordance with the first paragraph of Article 12 of the AA-1, the members of an association participate directly or indirectly through representatives, elected bodies, or the representative of the association in managing the association in the manner determined in its bylaws. The first paragraph of Article 13 of the AA-1 determines that the bylaws of the association, its amendments, and other major decisions in the association must be adopted by the assembly of the members, composed of all members of the association. According to the first paragraph of Article 14 of the AA-1, each member of the association holds the right to challenge in court within one year from the date the final decision on such was adopted, the decisions of the bodies of the association [allegedly] adopted in violation of an act or the bylaws or other general acts of the association.
- 119. The described regulation determined in the AA-1 would entail, if applied to religious communities, an interference with the right to the freedom of establishment and activity of religious communities, as ensured by the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution in conjunction with the second paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution. This holds in particular for the provisions that oblige associations to ensure a certain degree of “internal democracy” (the required election of bodies and the decision-making of the assembly of the members, although the internal structure and organisation of religious communities are often, if not usually, associated with religious elements, which are considered by the adherents of the community to be “sacred” – in particular the rules regarding who the leader is, who the priests are, etc.).<sup>31</sup> The same applies to those rules which require that all their internal decisions are subject to judicial control (that the possibility of a judicial challenge of the decisions of the bodies of religious communities generally interferes with the autonomy of religious communities is clear already from Order of the Constitutional Court No. Up-2229/08, dated 28 May 2009, Official Gazette RS No. 43/09). The constitutionally

- 120. In accordance with the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, human rights are limited by the rights of others and in such cases as are provided by the Constitution. In accordance with this, a prerequisite for the admissibility of an interference with human rights or fundamental freedoms is that the interference pursues a constitutionally admissible aim. Regarding the finding that the aim of the interference is constitutionally admissible, it must still be reviewed on the basis of the so-called strict test of proportionality also whether the interference is in accordance with the principles of a state governed by the rule of law determined in Article 2 of the Constitution (see Decision No. U-I-18/02, dated 24 October 2003, Official Gazette RS, No. 108/03 and OdlUS XII, 86; Paragraph 25 of the reasoning). The Constitutional Court found no constitutionally admissible aim on the basis of which the human right to the freedom of the establishment and activity of religious communities determined in the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution in conjunction with the second paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution should be interfered with in the manner presented. This entails that the application of the AA-1 to religious communities is inconsistent with the Constitution.
- 121. The general legal form of association therefore does not correspond to the constitutional requirements arising from the purpose and content of the freedom of religious association. On the one hand, the form of an association would certainly ensure religious communities the right to be subjects of law, as is, inter alia, required by the first paragraph of Article 41 in conjunction with the second paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution. However, at the same time it would constitutionally inadmissibly restrain their internal autonomy protected by the same provision of Article 41 of the Constitution and which is determined as the principle of freedom of activity also by the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution. Due to their constitutionally guaranteed autonomy, it is therefore not constitutionally admissible to treat religious communities in the same manner as other forms of association. The legislature must provide a specific form of status that is appropriate to the content of the constitutionally protected right to religious association.<sup>32</sup>
- 122. By the RFA the legislature regulated the special form of status which allegedly especially matches the nature and purpose of religious association. Due to the nature of things, the statutory regulation is necessary for the exercise of the human right of religious communities to acquire a legal personality (which is an integral part of the freedom of activity of religious communities, understood in the light of freedom of association). Without the latter this human right could not exist. For this reason, the legislature must establish a procedure and criteria for registration that allows the 32 Cf. in academic theory, for example W. C. Durham Jr., ibidem, pp. 368-369, who argues that religious communities have all the rights deriving from freedom of association, and in some respects enjoy even higher protection. He emphasises that the nature of religious activity ensures religious communities, just as such also applies to political parties, a higher form of protection in comparison to the protection enjoyed by the activities pursued by different organisations (e.g. corporations).

acquisition of a legal personality. It depends on the effect of an individual prescribed condition for registration or the effect of all of them together on the exercise of this human right whether these still constitute a manner of regulating its exercise or if they have thus already expanded into an interference with this right. In the challenged first paragraph of Article 13, the RFA makes the possibility of registering a religious community contingent on it having at least 100 members with citizenship or permanent residence in Slovenia and ten years of activity in Slovenia (or more than one hundred years of recognition in the world). This entails that religious communities that do not fulfil these conditions have no possibility to acquire a legal personality under which their autonomy could be respected as much as possible. Given the above, when interacting, these conditions limit the human right to the freedom of activity of religious communities (understood in conjunction with freedom of association) to such a degree that they constitute an interference with it. A statutory regulation which interferes with a human right is constitutionally admissible only if it is based on a constitutionally admissible and objectively justified aim. Moreover, in accordance with the settled constitutional case law, it has to be reviewed whether the interference, even if it pursues a legitimate aim, is consistent with the principles of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution), i.e. with the principle which prohibits excessive state interference (the general principle of proportionality). A review of whether the interference might be disproportionate is carried out by the Constitutional Court on the basis of the so-called strict test of proportionality. This test comprises a review of three aspects of the interference: (1) whether the interference is actually necessary (needed), (2) whether the reviewed interference is appropriate for achieving the aim pursued, (3) whether the weight of the consequences of the reviewed interference for the affected human right is proportional to the value of the aim pursued or to the benefits which would arise due to the interference (the principle of proportionality in the narrow sense or the [similarly named] principle of proportionality). Only if the interference passes all three aspects of the test is it constitutionally admissible (Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-18/02).

- 123. It follows from the legislative preparatory materials<sup>33</sup> that the reason for determining such demanding conditions for registration was the assessment of the legislature that it is possible to recognise certain specific rights guaranteed by the Constitution, international treaties, and laws only to registered religious communities. It follows from the system of the RFA that these rights are the rights contained in the provisions of Chapter IV of the RFA that refer to the possibility of concluding agreements with the state, the provision of religious spiritual care in certain specific circumstances, the freedom of building and state funding. Without the need for the Constitutional Court to review at this stage what the nature of these rights is, it is obvious that such a reason (aim) is only partially constitutionally admissible. The legislature's aim, i.e. ensuring the so-called specific rights only to the registered religious communities that meet the demanding conditions, is namely inadmissible insofar as these specific rights are rights constituting the exercise of human rights and fundamental freedoms. In this case, the aim of the interference with the human right of religious communities to obtain adequate legal personality is in fact a further restriction on other human rights. If the purpose (aim) of the limitation of a certain human right is a further restriction of the exercise of human rights, such purpose is not constitutionally admissible. The aim of the legislature to confer certain specific rights only to registered religious communities that fulfil the demanding conditions is admissible insofar as it relates to the recognition of such rights that are not required by freedom of religion and that are not prohibited by the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities. The legislature is not required to provide everyone with such additional rights (benefits or privileges) which the Constitution itself neither requires nor prohibits, but may (due to a scarcity of resources, security in legal transactions, etc.) lay down specific conditions for the recipients of such additional benefits. When regulating this, the legislature is bound by the obligation that the criteria for distinguishing between those religious communities which can obtain additional benefits and those that are unable to qualify for such are not unreasonable or arbitrary (in accordance with the principle of the equality of religious communities determined in the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution as a particular expression of the general principle of equality before the law determined in the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution).

124. If the Constitutional Court establishes that there exists a constitutionally admissible reason for the interference, it must then, in the framework of the strict test of proportionality, first review whether the interference is necessary to achieve the aim. This entails a review of whether the same aim can be achieved either without any interference or by a milder measure that interferes less severely with the affected human right. The challenged regulation regarding registration does not fulfil this requirement. It is perfectly possible to envisage such a legislative solution which, on the one hand, ensures that only some of the religious communities (i.e. registered, older, and larger ones that have at least 100 adherents with Slovene citizenship or permanent residence in Slovenia) enjoy special rights that the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution does not require and which are not inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution, and on the other hand, allows at the same time all religious communities to acquire an appropriate legal personality irrespective of the number, nationality, or residence of their members and irrespective of the duration of their activity or their recognition in the world. Thus, the legislature could, for example, determine additional conditions (e.g. the number of adherents, etc.) for acquisition of each of the specific rights. Another possibility is, for example, a two-level registration: the basic level would allow for the acquisition of legal personality, while the higher level requiring compliance with certain additional criteria would also provide additional rights. In this respect, it must be emphasised at this point that the legislature must specifically respect the principle of neutrality and the principle of the equality of religious communities also when determining what the reasonable and objectively justified criteria are for distinguishing between religious communities that are eligible to obtain special rights or a higher level concerning registration and those which are not. However, if the legislature prescribes registration as a precondition for the exercise of the rights stemming from the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution, such registration is an interference with this human right that is constitutionally admissible only under the conditions referred to in the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution (the so-called strict test of proportionality).

125. Since the challenged regulation of such registration is not a necessary interference with the human right of religious communities to acquire legal personality as an integral part of the right to freedom of the establishment and activity of religious communities determined in the first paragraph of Article 41 in conjunction with the second paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution, there was no need to review whether it is appropriate and proportional in the narrower sense. The first paragraph of Article 13 of the RFA is inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 41 in conjunction with the second paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution already due to a lack of the necessity of the interference.
126. On the basis of this reason, the Constitutional Court abrogated the challenged first paragraph of Article 13 of the RFA and did not need to review the alleged nonconformity with other provisions of the Constitution. As it thus abrogated the provision which determines the conditions for registration, it also had to abrogate the first and the fifth item of Article 14 of the same Act, which requires religious communities to demonstrate the fulfilment of these conditions (Point 1 of the operative provisions). The abrogation entails that for the registration of religious communities there is no longer a prescribed minimum number of registrants, a prescribed nationality or permanent residence of their members, nor prior activity in Slovenia or more than 100 years of recognition in the world. The Constitutional Court suspended the effect of the abrogation for one year (Point 2 of the operative provisions). This gives the legislature the possibility to adopt a regulation on the criteria for registration consistent with the Constitution. The finding of nonconformity with the Constitution does not entail that the legislature should not determine the conditions for registration at all, or that any condition in itself constitutes an inadmissible interference with the human right to freedom of religious association. It must be emphasised that by the very nature of things it is necessary to regulate the procedure and criteria for registration in order to exercise the human right of religious communities to acquire a legal personality (which is an integral part of the freedom of activity of religious communities, understood in the light of freedom of association). Since the creation of a legal personality places a religious community among entities with legal relationships, the legislature may in the regulation of this institution also incorporate mechanisms aimed at protecting its members as well as third parties involved in legal transactions. It depends on the effect of each of the prescribed conditions for registration or the effect of all of them together on the exercise of this human right whether they still constitute a manner of regulating its exercise or if they have already expanded into an interference with this right. The more narrowing the effect of the statutory regulation on the exercise of the human right is and the more the substance of a specific prescribed condition is removed from the nature [of the human right], that much closer it is to changing from a manner of exercise into an interference, and vice versa. Since the essence of the phenomenon of association is a mutual connection of individuals and therefore by its very concept it already presupposes more than one person (association with oneself is conceptually not possible), the legislature may – also for the purpose of legal certainty – prescribe a minimum number of members. The determination of the minimum number is thus in general a regulation of the manner of exercise of this human right (which is constitutionally admissible if it is not unreasonable), however, the legislature must take into account that a very high threshold would entail an interference therewith (which is constitutionally admissible only if it passes the so-called strict test of proportionality). On the other hand, it must also assess whether there are reasonable reasons on the basis of which freedom of religious association could be subject to conditions regarding the number of members which could be significantly higher than the conditions for other, more general forms of association. Any other conditions which are not a natural component of religious association (citizenship or permanent residency and the period of previous activity or the global recognition of the religious community) are also not necessarily inconsistent with the Constitution. Where there is a constitutionally admissible goal, the conditions which constitute an interference with a human right would be admissible if they pass the strict test of proportionality.

Review of the Funding of Religious Communities

(Article 20 of the LSRCA and the third paragraph of Article 29 of the RFA)

127. The challenged Article 20 of the LSRCA<sup>34</sup> states: “The social community<sup>35</sup> may fund religious communities. The act by which the funding is given may determine the purpose for which the funding may be used. Religious communities are free to use the allocated funds. If the funding was given for a specific purpose, the authority that granted it may require that a report on its use be drawn up.” The contested third paragraph of Article 29 of the RFA provides: “The state may fund registered churches and other religious communities due to their generally beneficial purpose, as defined in Article 5 of this Act.”

34 The legislature expressly maintained the application of this provision also after the RFA came into force on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 35 of the RFA.

35 Regarding the substance of the request, there was no need for the Constitutional Court to deal with the issue of the interpretation of the concept of social community. Notwithstanding this, the Constitutional Court emphasises that the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities determined in the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution draws limitations in the relationship between all bearers of public authority (i.e. also the local communities), on one side, and religious communities, on the other. All that is valid for the relationship between the state and religious communities is valid also for the relationship between other bearers of public authority and religious communities.

128. Article 5 of the RFA, which defines the general beneficial purpose of religious communities, is connected to the third paragraph of Article 29 of the RFA: “Churches and other religious communities that strive for spirituality and human dignity in private and public life, endeavour to find the purpose of living in the sphere of religious life, and also engage in activities that play an important role in public life by developing their cultural, educational, didactic, philanthropic, charitable, and other activities in the scope of the social state, thus enriching the national identity and performing an important social role, are generally beneficial organisations”.
129. By using the established methods of interpretation, certain relevant legal rules can be derived from these legal provisions. Although the text of Article 20 of the LSRCA provides for fiscal funding for all religious communities and does not determine the reason and the purpose of funding, the RFA, as the subsequent regulation (lex posterior derogat legi priori), limited the possibility of funding only to registered religious communities and specifically determined that the characteristic due to the nature of which the funding of religious communities is admissible is “[...] their generally beneficial purpose, as defined in Article 5 of this Act.” This interpretation is also consistent with striving for transparency in the use of public funds. The RFA therefore outlines the purpose for which religious communities may be provided funding. Article 20 of the LSRCA and the third paragraph of Article 29 of the RFA must therefore be understood as an integral unit and interpreted as entailing that funding of any registered religious community that corresponds to the description of a generally beneficial organisation is admissible. The legislature defined the generally beneficial purpose of a religious community in Article 5 of the RFA as a combination of two elements of religious communities. The first element is the pursuit of spirituality and human dignity in private and public life and endeavours to create meaning in life in the sphere of religious life. In this part, the fundamental or original mission of religious communities is considered. The second element, which must exist at the same time as the first, is the direct broader contribution of these communities to the society, when their activities go beyond merely internal religious life so as to perform cultural, educational, didactic, philanthropic, charitable, and other activities in the scope of the social state.
130. In order to determine whether such regulation is consistent with the Constitution, the starting point must be a number of premises of constitutional law that are put forward in general terms already in Section B – II of this decision. The most important point is that funding of religious communities is not an obligation of the state that is a consequence of Article 41 of the Constitution. This constitutional provision in general does not entitle even individuals to demand that the state fund the exercise of their religious freedom. An exception may be specific situations where the funding of an aspect of religious activity in exceptional circumstances could be necessary in order to enable an individual to exercise freedom of religion (e.g. a military mission abroad). However, the fact that the obligation to provide funding does not result from the human right to religious freedom does not entail that such funding, if nevertheless provided by the state, is in itself constitutionally inadmissible. While respecting the equality of religious communities, the state namely may provide support to religious communities – including financial – if this is not contrary to the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities, in particular with the requirement of the state’s religious and ideological neutrality stemming from this principle.

- 131. It is precisely due to the requirement of the neutrality of the state (its mirror image is the principle of the equality of religious communities) that the criteria determined in the first paragraph of Article 5 of the RFA, which determine when religious communities are generally beneficial, must be interpreted with a great deal of reflection. An interpretation that entails that the state may, in reviewing the first, “internal”, element of a general beneficial purpose, i.e. the pursuit of spirituality and human dignity in private and public life and endeavours to create meaning in life in the sphere of religious life, assess the legitimacy or value acceptability of the substance of beliefs, is constitutionally inadmissible. Therefore, these criteria must be understood as an implied characteristic attributed by the legislature in the first paragraph of Article 5 of the RFA in general to all religious communities, that is, as the legislature’s assessment that it is characteristic of religious communities to endeavour to create meaning in life in the sphere of religious life and to pursue spirituality and human dignity. A different interpretation would namely allow for the possibility that the state places among the generally beneficial – and thus those that receive funding – only those religious communities whose substantive beliefs are close to those of the state, but not also those which it assesses, for example, that they do not strive (enough or in the right manner) to create meaning in life in the sphere of religious life. Such would namely go beyond the boundaries of the neutrality of the state guaranteed by the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities determined in the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution.<sup>36</sup>
- 132. By assuming that all religious communities are generally beneficial, the challenged statutory provisions in fact entail that the state can provide financial support only to those registered religious communities which are generally beneficial also for the wider society on the basis of their activities in those fields which otherwise fall within the scope of the social state.
- 133. The applicant complains that the regulation of the financial support of religious communities discriminates in an inadmissible manner against unregistered communities, as such allegedly cannot obtain the status of a charitable organisation, whereas the conditions for registration (one hundred members – Slovene citizens or permanent residents of Slovenia – and ten years of activity or more than one hundred years of world recognition) allegedly bear no relation to having a charitable character. The applicant's objection is unfounded. The generally beneficial character of religious communities is not statutorily defined as a special status. It entails only the definition of the circumstances due to which a religious community is generally beneficial, where activities in the scope of the social state are particularly crucial. Thus, it is not the issue of "the status of having a generally beneficial character" that is at issue, but whether it is admissible to distinguish between registered and unregistered religious communities regarding financial support.

36 The ECtHR maintained a similar position in its Judgment in the case Religionsgemeinschaft der Zeugen Jehovas and Others v. Austria, dated 31 July 2008 (paragraph 92), in which it emphasised that Article 9 of the ECHR binds states to remain neutral and that if a state sets up a framework for conferring a special (privileged) legal personality on religious groups to which a specific status is linked, the state must remain neutral and impartial: all religious groups which wish so must have a fair opportunity to apply for this status and the criteria established must be applied in a non-discriminatory manner.

134. The Constitutional Court abrogated the existing conditions for registration due to their nonconformity with the Constitution (Point 1 of the operative provisions). The conclusion regarding nonconformity is based on the finding that the interference with the right of religious communities to a legal personality is not necessary, as the statutory solution does not restrict 'general' registration, but rather makes possible the exercise of additional rights subject to certain particular conditions or to a higher level of registration. The approach chosen by the legislature is within its sphere of discretion. Regardless of the future regulation of this field, the fact which follows from the title of Chapter IV of the RFA and which is also expressly mentioned in the third paragraph of Article 29 of the RFA, i.e. that only registered religious communities can obtain public financial support, cannot be ignored.
135. Since public funding of religious communities is not a human right (and therefore there is no discrimination which could otherwise be reviewed in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution), the distinction between registered and unregistered religious communities regarding the financial support provided to them must be assessed in the light of that aspect of the principle of the equality of religious communities (the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution) which is a special expression of the general principle of equality before the law within the scope of the relation of the state to religious communities (the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution). This constitutional principle requires, inter alia, that the legislature regulate those situations which are essentially the same in the same manner. If it regulates them in a different manner, there must be reasonable grounds arising from the nature of things for the distinction. The principle of equality thus does not prevent the legislature from determining – within the limits of its competence – the criteria according to which it distinguishes between similar factual situations and attaches different legal consequences to them. Such distinction by which the legislature pursues admissible aims is an essential element of its legislative competences (see Constitution Court Decision No. U-I-36/06, dated 5 February 2009, Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia No. 14/09). The pertinent issue therefore is whether it is admissible from the point of view of the equality of religious communities for the state to provide financial support only for the "generally beneficial activities" of registered religious communities, while unregistered religious communities cannot apply for public funds for their "generally beneficial activities".
136. In the view of the Constitutional Court, the requirement that a religious community must be registered in order for it to obtain financial support from the state in accordance with the RFA is not an arbitrary one but reasonable and objectively justified.

Such a requirement is a natural condition for the participation of the religious community with the state in the funding [and realisation] of generally beneficial activities in the sphere of social state. Registration namely establishes the legal personality of a religious community, which allows it to be the bearer of rights and obligations – even those rights that are established in the relationship with the state at issue. By means of (co-financing, the state promotes the activities of the social state in a broader social area, by which it also indirectly affects third parties. Therefore, requiring the registration of religious communities, which ensures the transparency of their activities and internal structure, also has the function of providing for the legal security of third parties concerned with these areas.

137. The applicant's complaint that Article 20 of the LSRCA, the third paragraph of Article 29 of the RFA, and the first paragraph of Article 5 of the RFA do not clearly define the criteria and procedures for financially supporting religious communities and that therefore Article 20 of the LSRCA and the third paragraph of Article 29 of the RFA are inconsistent with Article 2 of the Constitution, is also unfounded. When interpreting the substance of these Articles also the regulations governing the use of public funds must be taken into account. The fundamental provision for the allocation of state subsidies, aid, and other forms of funding is the second paragraph of Article 53 of the Public Finance Act (Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia, No. 79/99 et seq. – hereinafter referred to as the PFA). This provision determines that the funds for subsidies, loans, and other forms of state aid are granted on the basis of a prior public tender published in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia, under the conditions and procedure prescribed by the Minister of Finance if a special act<sup>37</sup> does not determine otherwise. In addition to the PFA, the Rules on the Procedures for Implementation of the Budget of the Republic of Slovenia (Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia No. 50/07 and 61/08, hereinafter referred to as the Rules), which are subsidiarily applicable, should also be taken into account. It thus follows from the contested provisions of the LSRCA and the RFA that the state may provide financial support for the activities of registered religious communities which fall within the scope of the social state. The specific procedures for the allocation of funds are then conducted in accordance with other regulations governing the corresponding field. It follows from these regulations that public funds are allocated exclusively through public tenders by an individual act. As judicial protection against such an act (if there is no appeal against such in administrative proceedings) is provided in proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts, the applicant's complaint regarding non-conformity with the right to legal remedies determined in Article 25 of the Constitution is also unfounded (see Decision No. U-I-219/03, dated 1 December 2005, Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia No. 118/05, and OdlUS XIV, 88).

<sup>37</sup> In the field of cultural activities, such is, for instance, determined in the ARRPIFC and in the Rules on the Implementation of a Public Call and Public Tender (Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia No. 93/05), adopted on the basis of this Act.

138. Finally, the complaint that the contested statutory regulation of the funding puts other ideological associations (which fall within the scope of protection under Article 41 of the Constitution) in an unequal position in relation to religious communities and that it unjustifiably distinguishes between religious communities and other charitable associations which provide charitable work is also unfounded. In support of its allegations, the applicant indicates that the second paragraph of Article 5 of the RFA includes the open and on-going dialogue of the state with churches and religious communities, while the Act neglects equal respect for non-religious organisations, particularly concerning obtaining funding. The applicant alleges that these organisations are subject to more stringent conditions for obtaining funding on the basis of the AA-1 in comparison to religious communities under the RFA. The status of religious community, which brings financial entitlements, allegedly also puts all societies active in the spiritual field in an unequal position. The applicant states that all charitable organisations (e.g. associations in the public interest or humanitarian organisations) should be able to participate in tenders for public funds under the same conditions.
139. The RFA governs religious freedom and in this framework also the funding of religious communities. The position and funding of other associations are governed by the acts governing associations, institutes, humanitarian organisations, public interest in culture, etc. The applicant did not demonstrate why regulation by different acts constitutes an unjustified distinction between these entities. At the same time, the applicant's complaint is based on the wrong premise, i.e. that the state may provide financial support to religious communities without public tenders, differently than for associations in the public interest and humanitarian organisations. It follows from the regulations governing public finances that religious communities may be financially supported with public funds only through public tenders. The Constitutional Court does agree with the applicant that when funding generally beneficial activities, the state must treat all forms of associations equally – religious, ideological, and others. However, the irregularities in the funding of individual projects can only be the subject of specific judicial proceedings and cannot influence the review of the constitutionality of the RFA.
140. Considering the above-mentioned, Article 20 of the LSRCA and the third paragraph of Article 29 of the RFA are not inconsistent with the Constitution (Point 3 of the operative provisions).

B – V

Review of the Employment of Priests in Prisons and Hospitals (the third and fourth paragraphs of Article 24 and the second paragraph of Article 25 of the RFA) in the Light of the Principle of the Separation of the State and Religious Communities

141. The applicant states that Articles 24 and 25 of the RFA are inconsistent with the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities (the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution), as they enable priests to be employed as public officials. The substance of the complaint refers to a part of the third paragraph of Article 24 of the RFA and to the second paragraph of Article 25 of the same Act, therefore, the Constitutional Court reviewed the complaint in this framework. Article 24 of the RFA, which regulates religious spiritual care in prisons, determines in the third paragraph that the ministry in charge of judicial affairs employ the appropriate number of priests of a particular religion on a full-time or part-time basis or that it ensure different remuneration for the work done if there is a sufficiently large number of detainees of the same religion in the whole country. In the fourth paragraph, this Article determines that a priest who is appointed and employed in accordance with the third paragraph can perform his function undisturbed and visit people in detention at the appropriate time without supervision. Article 25, which regulates religious spiritual care in hospitals and social welfare institutions providing institutional care, determines in the second paragraph that the ministry in charge of health ensure the employment of the necessary number of priests if there is a sufficiently large number of occupants of the same religion in the hospitals in the whole country. A priest appointed and employed in this manner can perform his function undisturbed and visit the occupants of the said religion at the appropriate time. The state may therefore employ priests in order to provide religious care in prisons and hospitals. The important difference between the two statutory provisions is that for religious spiritual care conducted by priests in prisons, remuneration for the work done can be ensured in a different manner and not necessarily by means of employment by the Ministry of Justice. Regarding religious spiritual care in hospitals, the RFA only provides for the employment of priests. The last sentence of the first paragraph of Article 27 of the RFA determines that religious employees employed on the basis of Articles 22 to 25 of the RFA cannot acquire the right to state financial aid intended for the payment of the social security contributions of insured person employed by churches and other religious communities.

142. In order to determine whether employing priests to provide religious spiritual care in the public sector is in accordance with the Constitution, it must first be determined what obligations relating to the exercise of religious freedom in prisons or in hospitals are imposed on the state by the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution. The Constitutional Court has already substantiated that, given the substantive interconnection of the constitutional regulation of religious freedom and of the position of religious communities, everything that is required by Article 41 of the Constitution cannot be considered inconsistent with the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities determined in the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution (Paragraph 104 of the reasoning).
143. Individuals may find themselves in circumstances in which their exercise of an important segment of religious freedom is significantly hindered or even rendered impossible for them, and the nature of such circumstances is such that, based on general empirical rules, they can provoke particularly intense experience of the issues and dilemmas encompassed by the concept of religious belief. In addition to closed environments such as the Army and prisons, such circumstances occur also in otherwise open environments, such as hospitals and some social welfare institutions (e.g. residences for the elderly) in which individuals' exercise of religious freedom outside the institution is significantly hindered or prevented due to their (mainly) physical characteristics. When the state is connected to such circumstances, either directly (e.g. the Army and prisons) or more indirectly (public hospitals), it must also consider the constitutionally guaranteed freedom of religion. The latter above all requires that the state be restrained. It must not preclude, prevent, obstruct, or hinder the freedom to manifest and to exercise religion. If it is necessary for the exercise of this human right, the state must "neutralise" the restrained freedom of individuals also by active conduct intended to reduce the resulting disadvantages. It must enable individuals in such circumstances to perform individual acts of a religious nature (e.g. individual use of religious symbols – including garments, the provision of appropriate food, etc.), enable them to have access to books with religious content, visits by a priest, and also allow the performance of religious rites in the institution. Since a religious rite as a medium between the adherent and the transcendent is an essential element of the exercise of faith, which is usually collectively exercised in special consecrated premises, the positive obligation of the state in prisons and public hospitals is to enable the use of suitable premises for the collective exercise of religion. These rights are, of course, not absolute; the state may interfere with them if it has a constitutionally admissible aim in doing so (e.g. reasons of safety, health, etc.) and if the interference is consistent with the principle of proportionality.

144. The first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution, however, does not give to either individual adherents or to religious communities the right to public funding for the exercise of freedom of religion in prisons and in public hospitals. Using the argument a minori ad major, this entails that the state is also not obliged to employ priests in order to ensure the right to collective manifestation of religion in such institutions. The fact that the employment of priests is not an obligation of the state resulting from the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution does not necessarily entail that such is inadmissible from the perspective of the Constitution. The issue is namely whether the state employing priests to perform religious activities is contrary to the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities determined in the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution.
145. Religious or value neutrality as the central element of the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities obliges the state to not introduce religious or philosophical elements into its activities, to remain impartial, to neither accept nor reject religion or other philosophical worldviews; it must – in terms of values, neither support nor hinder any of them. The constitutional requirement of the separation of the state and religious communities does not hinder all cooperation of the state with religious communities, namely, provided that the state is religiously neutral and does not identify itself with religion or religious communities. Although state funding of religious spiritual care in hospitals and prisons therefore does not fall within the scope of a human right, the state may provide the necessary financial resources for this purpose in a manner not inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution, particularly in line with the requirement of the religious neutrality of the state. The more or less close cooperation of the state with religious communities in the provision of religious spiritual care in prisons (less intense and slightly less frequently also concerning hospitals) is likewise an accepted practice in the majority of foreign legal systems, including the United States of America,<sup>38</sup> Germany,<sup>39</sup> France,<sup>40</sup> Romania,<sup>41</sup> Ireland,<sup>42</sup> Lithuania,<sup>43</sup> Belgium,<sup>44</sup> the Czech Republic,<sup>45</sup> Sweden,<sup>46</sup> Estonia,<sup>47</sup> and the Netherlands.<sup>48</sup>

146. The preference of the legislature regarding (financial) support for the exercise of the religious life of individuals may therefore reach only the border delineated by the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities, in particular by the guarantee of state neutrality. It may not reach the point where the provision of support would entail (even symbolic) identification of the state with religion or religious communities.<sup>49</sup> It is precisely the manner (the modality or the form) of the provision of such support that may lead to a qualitative leap: financial support which is acceptable from the perspective of the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities may result due to the state providing such in a manner entailing a constitutionally unacceptable connection of the mentioned categories. In the view of the Constitutional Court, one of the possible forms of supportive cooperation regarding religious spiritual care in prisons and public hospitals, which, although beyond the requirements of the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution, is still constitutionally admissible, is the provision of monetary recompense to religious communities for the work performed by their priests in offering religious spiritual care to adherents in prisons and public hospitals.<sup>50</sup> In such case, the state is actually and symbolically – in the eyes of third parties – removed enough from the religious activities of the priests, and for the latter the religion and religious community remain the primary authority when offering religious spiritual care.

49 Compare with the so-called Endorsement Test in the case law of the Supreme Court of the United States of America (first established by Judge O'Connor in the concurring opinion in the case Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668), according to which a state measure violates the so-called Establishment Clause of the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States when in the eyes of a reasonable observer the measure puts the adherents of another religion or non-adherents into the position of a less favoured member of the community.

147. The level of admissible cooperation is, however, exceeded when the state (a ministry) concludes an employment agreement with a priest in order to ensure religious spiritual care in prisons and public hospitals when such is not necessary for the exercise of the human rights determined in the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution. The wall between the state and religious communities provides protection on both sides: it protects religious communities from state influence, as well as the state from identifying with any of the religious communities, both in order to respect the religious freedom of individuals. state employment of priests in order for them to provide religious spiritual care in prisons and hospitals is a constitutionally unacceptable crack in the wall with effects on both of the mentioned sides. A priest employed by the state (or its bodies) to provide religious spiritual care will, merely due to being a state employee (and thus associated with the state already on a symbolic level), at least on the outside, in the eyes of third persons, lose something typically religious, certainly some of the autonomy of religion. When providing religious spiritual care, such priest is not loyal only to his religious community, but also to his employer – the state (in the broader sense). state employment of priests in order for them to perform religious services in prisons and public hospitals therefore inadmissibly undermines the autonomy of religious communities and their priests, which is a component of the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities in the broader sense. On the other hand, the employment of priests in a state body for the performance of religious services creates an important institutional link between the state and religious communities. A priest who provides religious spiritual care as a state employee symbolises the state to some extent, even though he is not a public official. It is important that this symbolic link is visible also on the outside, in relation to third persons (non-adherents and adherents of other religions). In this context, the institutional involvement of priests in the body of the state symbolises that the state itself, by means of its apparatus, directly provides religious spiritual care in these institutions and hospitals. This entails its symbolic identification with religion and religious communities and by this the negation of neutrality. Considering the above-mentioned, such an intense manner of supportive activities of the state in enabling religious spiritual care in prisons and hospitals exceeds the limits determined by the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities referred to in the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution, and is therefore inconsistent with them. In the light of the foregoing, the Constitutional Court abrogated the third paragraph of Article 24 of the RFA to the extent that it allows for the employment of priests. Due to this, the fourth paragraph of this Article in the part governing the status of employed priests (i.e. the undisturbed performance of their functions and visiting detainees without supervision) also became irrelevant; therefore, the Constitutional Court abrogated it to that extent (Point 4 of the operative provisions). The first sentence of the second paragraph of Article 25 of the RFA enables only the employment of priests for the provision of religious spiritual care, but not different forms of financing of their work. The second sentence of the same paragraph of Article 25 of the RFA refers only to the position of employed priests (i.e. performing their function undisturbed and visits to persons receiving care in such institutions at the appropriate time), so the purpose of its existence was entirely exhausted when the first sentence was abrogated. Given this, the Constitutional Court abrogated the second paragraph of Article 25 of the RFA in its entirety (Point 4 of the operative provisions). Due to the abrogation of the provisions on the employment of priests, the last sentence of the first paragraph of Article 27 of the RFA became irrelevant as well to the extent that it excludes from the circle of beneficiaries of state financial aid for the purpose of paying the social security contributions of insured persons religious officials employed on the basis of Articles 24 and 25 of the RFA. It was therefore necessary also to abrogate the last sentence of the first paragraph of Article 27 of the RFA to the extent that it refers to Articles 24 and 25 of the RFA (Point 4 of the operative provisions).

148. The Constitutional Court suspended the effect of the abrogation for one year (Point 5 of the operative provisions). By this it prevented, in conformity with the principle of legitimate expectations (Article 2 of the Constitution), the possibility of sudden changes in the position of priests who might already be employed. At the same time, the legislature is given sufficient time to possibly regulate their situation differently after the abrogation takes effect and to perhaps regulate religious spiritual care in prisons and public hospitals in a different manner.

Review of the Religious Spiritual Care in Prisons, Hospitals, and Social Welfare Institutions Providing Institutional Care (Articles 24 and 25 of the RFA) in the Light of the Principle of the Clarity and Precision of Regulations and in the Light of the Principle of Legality

149. The applicant alleges that Articles 24 and 25 of the RFA are inconsistent with Article 2 and with the second paragraph of Article 120 of the Constitution. In its view, the contested provisions do not determine the criteria for defining those entitled to religious spiritual care in these institutions. Allegedly, only a bare right (nudum ius) to religious spiritual care is determined, whereas the organisation of and conditions for its implementation are to be determined in an implementing regulation. Article 24 allegedly does not determine any criteria for the implementation of religious spiritual care in prisons and also does not provide for the issuance of regulations. A particular complaint is directed at the third paragraph of Article 24 as it allegedly does not sufficiently explicitly specify what the terms “a sufficiently large number of detainees of the same religion” and “the necessary number of priests” entail, by which it allegedly leaves the regulation of the right to the implementing regulation. The Constitutional Court did not review the same complaint directed at the second paragraph of Article 25 of the RFA since it abrogated that provision already due to the inconsistency with the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution.

150. From Article 2 of the Constitution there follows, inter alia, the requirement that statutory provisions be clearly and precisely determined so that they can be implemented, that they do not allow for arbitrary conduct, and that they define in an unambiguous and sufficiently precise manner the legal position of the entities they refer to. The requirement that acts be precise is more emphasised the higher the disputed subject is valued (this position was adopted by the Constitutional Court already in Decision No. U-I-18/93, dated 11 April 1996, Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia No. 25/96, and OdlUS V, 40). The second paragraph of Article 120 of the Constitution (the so-called legality principle) requires that administrative bodies perform their work independently within the framework and on the basis of the Constitution and laws. This entails that the substantive basis for the issuance of implementing regulations by the executive power must be a legislative act. When adopting legal rules, administrative bodies are bound by the legislature’s intent regarding the substance of the matter. The value criteria for the implementation of an act must be taken into account and, in particular, the substance of the act must not be altered and rights and obligations must not be independently prescribed. The purpose and the criteria must be clearly expressed in the act and must be also clearly apparent from it. Similarly as the requirement that statutory provisions be clear, the requirement that the administration is bound by law also depends on the importance of the subject governed by such act.<sup>51</sup> The greater the interference or the effect of an act on an individual’s fundamental rights, the more restrictive and precise must be the authorisation contained in the act.
151. The complaint that the criteria determining who is entitled to religious spiritual care in prisons, hospitals, and social welfare institutions providing institutional care are not defined is unfounded. Firstly, it must be taken into account that the provisions of Chapter IV of the RFA, entitled “Rights of Registered Churches and Other Religious Communities and Their Adherents”, which also contain the challenged Articles 24

51 Cf. L. Šturm in: L. Šturm (ed.), ibidem, p. 872, who states that the German Federal Constitutional Court developed the so-called theory of importance or significance of a matter, according to which there must be a correlation between the importance of the statutory regulation and the form of the legal norm.

and 25 of the RFA, refer to registered religious communities and their adherents. Such follows from the historical, teleological, and systematic methods of interpretation. The express intention of the legislature to determine that the addressees of the rights determined in Articles 24 and 25 of the RFA are only registered religious communities follows from the legislative materials. The Draft Proposal of the RFA thus states that registration is not obligatory, but is “[...] a precondition for the recognition of certain rights”.<sup>52</sup> The chapter of the Draft Proposal of the RFA regarding the rights of registered religious communities and their adherents states that due to legal certainty and the protection of third persons, special rights guaranteed by the Constitution, international conventions, and acts are conferred only on registered religious communities. Further on, the RFA enumerates these rights, namely all those that are determined in Chapter IV of the RFA, including religious spiritual care in prisons, hospitals, and social welfare institutions providing institutional care. The same notion of the circle of those entitled is also confirmed by the Government as the proposer of the RFA, as is evident from its opinion concerning the request. Finally, such an interpretation is supported also by the system established in the RFA. Thus, in the first two chapters of the Act the basic principles, general provisions, and the exercise of religious freedom are regulated, which in general refer – if the individual provision does not determine otherwise<sup>53</sup> – to all religious communities and their adherents. Chapter III provides for the registration of churches and religious communities, and Chapter IV, as is stated explicitly in its title, governs the rights of registered churches and religious communities and their adherents. Taking into account these starting points, the circle of those entitled to regular individual and collective religious spiritual care is clearly defined in the first and sixth paragraphs of Article 24 and in the first paragraph of Article 25 of the RFA. Thus, all adherents of registered religious communities who are detained on the basis of a court decision or whose movement is limited and are in prisons, correctional institutions, juvenile correctional centres, training institutions, or are detained in juvenile detention centres, are entitled to religious spiritual care (the first and sixth paragraphs of Article 24 of the RFA). The same applies mutatis mutandis to Article 25 of the RFA: those adherents of registered religious communities who are in hospitals or social welfare institutions providing institutional care are entitled to individual or collective religious spiritual care (the first paragraph of Article 25 of the RFA). The social welfare institutions providing institutional care are those public social welfare institutions determined in Articles 50 to 54 of the Social Security Act (Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia No. 54/92 et seq., hereinafter referred to as the SSA), as well as other social welfare institutions (Article 59 of the SSA) that provide institutional care. The concept of institutional care in institutions is determined by the first paragraph of Article 16 of the SSA and

52 Gazette of the National Assembly, No. 26/06, p. 36.

53 Such is the case, for example, regarding the third paragraph of Article 6 of the RFA, which determines that registered religious communities are legal persons under private law and that also their constituent parts have the right to acquire legal personality.

namely entails all forms of aid provided in an institution by which the functions of the recipients' own home and family, in particular accommodation, organised meals, care, and health care are replaced or complemented.

152. By using methods of interpretation, it is also possible to determine the content and consequently also the extent of the right to regular individual and collective religious spiritual care (determined in the first paragraph of Article 24 and the first paragraph of Article 25 of the RFA) to a sufficient extent. By its nature, it is an undetermined legal notion that can be filled with substance when applied. It is namely undetermined merely on an abstract-regulatory level, but its substance can be determined when it comes into contact with a particular life situation.<sup>54</sup> The essence of the undetermined legal notions is that the legislature uses them in the abstract description of the factual situation when by such a concept it wishes to cover a variety of factual events and situations which have a common semantic substance (see Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-136/07, dated 10 September 2009, Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia No. 74/09). The substance of the right to religious spiritual care is therefore determinable with regard to the purpose of the statutory regulation (to ensure the exercise of religious freedom to the detainees and occupants of the mentioned institutions because otherwise such would be impossible for them or their exercise would be significantly hindered) and by taking into account the variety of individual life situations (in particular, the diversity of the particular religious practices of individual religions and the diversity of forms ensuring these rights in actual situations, for example, due to the difference in the number of adherents in institutions or hospitals and their (lack of) opportunities to exercise religious freedom independently). Regarding this, the general meaning of religious spiritual care must be used as the starting point. The latter contains all the elements of positive religious freedom, namely the right to profess one's religion and to exercise it on both the individual and collective levels, which includes contact with priests and participation in the performance of religious rites. The legislature itself determined the particularities of some aspects of religious spiritual care (in the fifth paragraph of Article 24 of the RFA and in the fourth paragraph of Article 25 of the RFA), as it considered that they do not need to be determined only after the circumstances of specific cases are taken into account. Such are participation in religious rites performed at the institution and being able to receive books with religious content and guidance. The degree to which the concept of religious spiritual care is undetermined is therefore not significantly high.
153. The material conditions for the exercise of the right to regular individual and collective religious spiritual care by detained persons are provided by the ministry in charge of judicial affairs (the second paragraph of Article 24 of the RFA), while hospitals and institutions providing institutional care provide for the space and technical conditions for the religious spiritual care of the occupants in these institutions (the sixth paragraph of Article 25 of the RFA).

54 M. Pavčnik, Teorija prava [Theory of Law], Cankarjeva založba, Ljubljana 1997, p. 53.

154. In the first, second, fifth, and sixth paragraphs of Article 24 of the RFA and in the first, fourth, and fifth paragraphs of Article 25 of the RFA, those entitled to religious spiritual care as well as the substantive meaning of this right are thus sufficiently clearly and precisely determined. Taking the above-mentioned into consideration, the ministries have sufficient substantive basis in these provisions, as well as sufficient latitude (scope) in formulating the implementing regulation concerning organisational issues regarding the exercise of freedom of religion (which is expressly imposed by the third paragraph of Article 25 of the RFA for the occupants of social welfare institutions who cannot participate in religious rites outside the institution due to problems related to health or age, whereas Article 24 of the RFA does not address this issue). For these reasons, the alleged non-conformity with the principle of legality determined by the second paragraph of Article 120 of the Constitution regarding this part is not substantiated. The fact that Article 24 of the RFA does not contain an explicit “implementation clause” is unimportant. The Constitutional Court has repeatedly emphasised that there is no need for express authorisation for the executive branch of power in an act and that a so-called implementation clause (a statutory provision that the implementing regulations must be issued within a determined period) entails only that the legislature did not entirely leave the issuance of the implementing regulations to the discretion of the executive branch of power, but that by an act it imposed on the executive power the duty to regulate certain issues (cf., for example, Decision No. U-I-58/98, dated 14 January 1999, Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia No. 7/99, and OdlUS VIII, 2).
155. The mentioned provisions of the first, second, fifth, and sixth paragraphs of Article 24 and the first, fourth, and fifth paragraphs of Article 25 of the RFA therefore ensure the right to religious spiritual care to detainees and occupants who are adherents of registered religious communities. In the part of the third paragraph that was not abrogated by the Constitutional Court, Article 24 of the RFA expressly envisages a possible additional way to guarantee this right where such is warranted by a sufficiently large number of detainees of the same religion on the level of the state. This refers to the possibility that religious spiritual care provided by priests paid by the state to provide continuous religious care in these institutions is to be ensured. The applicant complains that this provision does not determine the substantive criteria for the implementing regulation.
156. In this respect, two things must be emphasised. Firstly, state funding of the work of prison priests is not an element of the human right determined in the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution, while at the same time it is not inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution if it is not based on state employment of priests. Secondly, this provision does not entail the classic authoritative activity of the state, but refers to encouraging or promoting activities. Given this, the requirement of the precision and restrictiveness of statutory authorisation is less severe. In view of such starting points, the Constitutional Court assesses that the challenged provision provides sufficient criteria and sufficient directions to the Ministry of Justice, and at the same time also enough margin of discretion for responding to changing circumstances. The criterion that must be considered is a sufficiently large number of detainees of the same religion on the level of the state. The purpose of the statutory authorisation given to the competent ministry is expressly foreseeable from the challenged provision, in particular in conjunction with the part of Article 24 of the RFA that was not abrogated and which determines that a priest can perform his function undisturbed and visit the detainees of the religion at issue at the appropriate time. The purpose is to ensure detainees continuous religious spiritual care by permanently engaging priests to provide such care if that proves necessary due to the number of adherents of the same religion. As such a number is highly dependent on the actual, changing situation, by defining such number [to be determined by the competent ministry] as a legal standard, the legislature justifiably left a wider margin of discretion to the competent ministry. In doing so, it obliged the Ministry to ensure such form of cooperation with priests if the standard “sufficiently large number” is fulfilled. When reviewing whether the standards of “a sufficiently large number” of adherents and “an appropriate number” of priests are fulfilled, the legislature’s purpose must be considered: to ensure religious spiritual care in a manner that is more preferable for detainees by means of the permanent involvement of priests. Although the Act does not impose strict constraints on ministerial decision-making regarding such, it does not allow for arbitrary determination of the conditions for permanently engaging priests to provide religious spiritual care. The competent ministry must take into account the various circumstances, in particular the actual and changing data on the number of detained persons and their religious adherence.

157. Due to these reasons, Articles 24 and 25 of the RFA are not inconsistent with the principle of the clarity and precision of regulations determined in Article 2 of the Constitution or with the principle of legality determined in the second paragraph of Article 120 of the Constitution (Point 6 of the operative provisions). The Constitutional Court did not review the issue whether the otherwise clearly defined circle of addressees, which is restricted to only adherents of registered religious communities (and thus excludes the adherents of unregistered religious communities), is consistent with other provisions of the Constitution (in particular, with the positive aspects of religious freedom determined by the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution), because the applicant did not allege such.

B – VI

Review of Spiritual Care in the Army and in the Police Force

(Articles 22 and 23 of the RFA and the third paragraph of Article 52 of the DA)

158. The applicant principally alleges that Articles 22 and 23 of the RFA and the third paragraph of Article 52 of the DA, which govern religious spiritual care in the Army and the Police Force do not contain the criteria for determining who is entitled to religious spiritual care, and that they leave the regulation of the constitutional right to the implementing regulations. In addition, the applicant complains that the regulation of religious spiritual care in the Army is inconsistent with the freedom of conscience, as it allegedly continuously provides religious spiritual care to members of the Army and not just at the times when they would in fact be prevented from exercising religious freedom. As the latter is ensured to the members of the Police Force by Article 23 of the RFA only in circumstances where the exercise of freedom of religion is rendered difficult (and not continuously), Articles 22 and 23 are allegedly inconsistent also with the principle of equality (the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution).

Review in the Light of the Requirement to Ensure the Principle of the Clarity and Precision of Regulations and in the Light of the Principle of Legality

159. Article 22 of the RFA determines that the members of the Slovene Armed Forces have the right to religious spiritual care during their military service in accordance with the regulations on military service and national defence. In accordance with the third paragraph of Article 52 of the DA, military personnel have the right to religious spiritual care during their military service and the Minister determines the manner in which this care is organised and the manner of exercising the right to such care.
160. The complaint regarding the non-conformity of these provisions with Article 2 of the Constitution because the circle of those entitled is allegedly not clearly determined is unfounded.
161. The sedes materiae of the regulation of religious spiritual care in the Army is Article 22 of the RFA. This Article, which in relation to the rules on military service and national defence is a subsequent rule, determines this right (according to the historical, teleological, and systematic methods of interpretation – see Paragraph 151 of the reasoning) in Chapter IV of the RFA to be a right of adherents of registered churches and other religious communities. The members of the Slovene Armed Forces who are entitled to religious spiritual care are determined in more detail by the already mentioned third paragraph of Article 52 of the DA, as well as by the first and second paragraphs of Article 76 of the Service in the Slovene Armed Forces Act (Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia No. 68/07 – hereinafter referred to as the SSAFA), all of which Article 22 of the RFA refers to. This thus entails that those entitled to religious spiritual care are the following adherents of registered religious communities: military personnel during their military service (the third paragraph of Article 52 of the DA) and, to the extent that they are not covered by this definition, also regular military personnel, members of the military reserves when performing military service and undergoing training, persons doing voluntary military service, and other members of the Slovene Armed Forces if the SSAFA determines such (the second paragraph of Article 76 of the SSAFA). According to the DA, the terms military personnel and military service are determined in this Act itself (Article 48 and item 14 of Article 5 of the DA). The above mentioned is sufficient to conclude that the circle of those entitled is not undetermined.
162. All the standpoints the Constitutional Court stated in Paragraph 152 of the reasoning of this decision regarding the conformity of the undetermined legal notion of “the right to religious spiritual care” with the Constitution holds also regarding the review of the clarity and precision of Article 22 of the RFA and of the third paragraph of Article 52 of the DA. The substance of the right to religious spiritual care can therefore be determined with regard to the purpose of the statutory regulation (i.e. to ensure the exercise of the religious freedom of members of the Army, as such would otherwise be rendered impossible or significantly more difficult for them, taking into account their special burdens related to the nature of their work) and taking into account the diversity of individual life situations (in particular, for example, the place and the circumstances in which the operational-level command, unit, or institution function – as expressly stated also by the second paragraph of Article 76 of the SSAFA). Given that the degree to which the concept is undetermined is not excessive, it is not in non-conformity with Article 2 of the Constitution. Due to fact that the challenged rules provide a sufficient substantive basis to the competent ministry regarding the right to religious spiritual care, as well as to the adequate openness (scope) for the regulation of the organisational aspects of its exercise (in particular, the place and circumstances), they are also not inconsistent with the principle of legality determined by the second paragraph of Article 120 of the Constitution.

- 163. The above-mentioned holds mutatis mutandis also for the complaints made in a similar manner regarding the non-conformity of Article 23 of the RFA. It must only be added that the term police officer is determined in Article 3 of the Police Act (Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia No. 66/09 – official consolidated text, and No. 22/10 – hereinafter referred to as the PA) and that the “circumstances in which the exercise of religious freedom is hindered” are clearly also a legal standard that can be determined. The applicant does even not dispute the latter in concrete terms.
- 164. Thus, Articles 22 and 23 of the RFA and the third paragraph of Article 52 of the DA are not inconsistent with the principle of the clarity and precision of regulations determined in Article 2 of the Constitution and the principle of legality determined in the second paragraph of Article 120 of the Constitution. The Constitutional Court did not review the issue of whether the otherwise clearly determined circle of addressees, which is restricted to only adherents of registered religious communities (and thus excludes adherents of unregistered religious communities), is consistent with other provisions of the Constitution (in particular, with the positive aspect of religious freedom determined in the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution), as the applicant did not state such complaints.

Review of Article 22 of the RFA in the Light of the Negative Aspect of Religious Freedom and of the Principle of the Separation of the State and Religious Communities

- 165. The applicant deems that the regulation of religious spiritual care in the Army determined in Article 22 of the RFA is inconsistent with the “principle of freedom of conscience” as it does not include just those Army members who in fact cannot avail themselves of such care outside the institution. With regard to this, the applicant refers to Decision No. U-I-68/98, in which the Constitutional Court decided, regarding the issue of religious instruction in public kindergartens and schools, that the negative aspect of the freedom of religion of children and their parents outweighs the positive aspects, and held that the prohibition of religious activities in public schools and kindergartens is not inconsistent with the first and third paragraphs of Article 41 of the Constitution.

- 166. The Constitutional Court deemed that the applicant in substance alleges a non-conformity with the so-called negative aspect of religious freedom determined in the second paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution. The Constitutional Court has explained its significance in general terms already in Paragraphs 85 and 86 of the reasoning hereto. It ensures an individual, inter alia, the right to not have a religion, to not be obliged to declare one's views regarding this issue, and that it is not acceptable to force someone to profess a religion or to participate in acts entailing the exercise of religion. In case No. U-I-68/98, the Constitutional Court also adopted the standpoint that negative religious freedom obliges the state to prevent individuals from having any forced (unwanted) exposure to any kind of religious belief.
- 167. Similar to the fact that not all actions that are inspired by religion are protected by positive religious freedom (see Paragraph 84 of the reasoning), also not every instance of an individual perceiving the profession or exercise of religion entails such exposure to religious beliefs that would constitute an interference with his negative religious freedom. Thus, the mere visual or auditory perception of religious symbols (e.g. viewing a church or mosque, a religious procession, an adherent wearing religious clothing, a muezzin's call to prayer, or the sound of church bells) cannot constitute forced exposure to a religion from which the state is obliged to protect the individual. Such also follows from the standpoint of the Constitutional Court in Decision No. U-I-111/04, i.e. that the mere existence of a building with external religious characteristics located on land that is intended for the construction of a religious building in accordance with a spatial planning regulation cannot in itself constitute an interference with the negative aspect of freedom of religion. A different, broader concept of interference with negative religious freedom would be incompatible with the constitutionally protected value of ensuring a pluralistic democratic society. The case law of the ECtHR has recognised as an inadmissible interference with negative religious freedom, for example, a compulsory oath on the Bible when assuming state office<sup>55</sup> and the display of crucifixes in public school classrooms.<sup>56</sup> Similarly, German constitutional case law found the display of crosses and crucifixes in the classrooms of compulsory state schools to be an inadmissible interference with the negative freedom of religion,<sup>57</sup> and American case law found the same, for instance, regarding prayers and blessings during graduation ceremonies in public schools.<sup>58</sup> The common aspect of all of the mentioned cases is the more or less indirect compulsory exposure to religious elements or even participation in the exercise of religion.

56 The case Lautsi v. Italy (Judgment dated 3 November 2009; the case was referred to the Grand Chamber).

57 Judgment of the German Federal Constitutional Court, dated 16 May 1995, No. 1BvR 1078/91.

58 Judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case Lee v. Weisman, 505 U. S. 577 (1992).

- 168. Although the Army as a body affiliated with the Ministry is a symbol of the state (also externally, in relation to third parties), there can be no interference with the negative freedom of religion of a member of this body who is an atheist or an adherent of another religion only due to the knowledge that other (religious) members of the same body may avail themselves of religious spiritual care – including also participation in a religious rite ensured in organisational or financial terms by the state. It is essential that there is no element of compulsory exposure to the profession and exercise of religion which is enabled by the state. Negative religious freedom is already ensured in full to the members of the Army in that it is left to their free choice whether they exercise or not their right to religious spiritual care. For example, it would constitute an interference with this aspect of religious freedom if the state influenced the will of the members of the Army in deciding whether they will exercise their right to religious spiritual care or if it, for instance, placed religious symbols in premises not intended for religious rites or if it allowed religious symbols already placed in such premises. The right guaranteed by Article 22 of the RFA does not require anything of such nature and an interpretation of this right that is consistent with the Constitution does not allow for anything of such nature.
- 169. The applicant also does not explicitly allege that the extent to which religious spiritual care in the Army is ensured is inconsistent with the principle of neutrality (as the central component of the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities determined in the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution). Nevertheless, given the content of its complaints, it must be concluded that such non-conformity also does not exist. It has already been explained in general terms that the state must, if such is necessary for the exercise of positive religious freedom, neutralise the curtailed freedom of individuals by active conduct intended to reduce the resulting disadvantages. Everything that is required by the right determined by the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution cannot be considered inconsistent with the principle of separation that follows from this right and is also a tool for ensuring this right. However, even if the scope required by the Constitution in the first paragraph of Article 41 is exceeded, this in itself does not constitute a violation of the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities as long as the state does not identify itself with any religion and as long as it treats all of them equally. The applicant does not even claim that some of these requirements are not respected in ensuring the right to religious spiritual care in the Army.
- 170. In the case of public kindergartens and schools, the Constitutional Court interpreted the protection of negative religious freedom and the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities broadly, as was in substance pointed out already by the applicant. It deemed that the public premises of such kindergartens or schools already represent the state and that therefore the principled prohibition of denominational activities does not constitute an inadmissible disproportionality between the positive aspect of freedom of religion and the rights of parents to raise their children in accordance with their religious persuasion, on one hand, and the negative aspect of freedom of religion, on the other hand. However, the situation regarding the premises of public school classrooms and kindergartens, in which the education and upbringing of children whose personalities are starting to develop and who (in general) do not yet have a completely developed ability to form their own will, is carried out, whereas the consequences of their susceptibility to impulses from such environment are not predictable, is substantially different from the situation at issue, which concerns responsible adults who have full capacity to form their own will. It also follows from the case law of the ECtHR (e.g. the cases Dahlab v. Switzerland, decision dated 15 February 2001, and Lautsi v Italy)<sup>59</sup> that in the public school environment, in particular where younger children are concerned, special emphasis must be placed on the protection of the neutrality of the school system, taking into account the fact that it is compulsory for everyone irrespective of their religion and that its aim is supposedly to foster critical thinking in pupils.

Review of the Admissibility of the Distinction between Religious Spiritual Care in the Army and in the Police Force (Articles 22 and 23 of the RFA)

171. In the section that follows, the Constitutional Court reviewed the conformity of the alleged inequality between the regulation of religious spiritual care in the Army and in the Police Force with the Constitution. Concerning this issue, it assessed on the basis of the principle of equality determined in the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution whether the circumstances of members of the Army and members of the Police Force are equal in this respect and if they are, whether there exists a sound reason justified by the nature of things for the different regulation of the scope of religious spiritual care of the former compared to the latter.
172. The reason why the legislature enacted the right to religious spiritual care of members of the Army and the Police Force is the combined effect of two types of circumstances. The first are the circumstances constituted by the closed environment in which the work is performed. Such significantly hinder or even render impossible, in particular, the collective aspect of the exercise of religious freedom (residence in special closed institutions, limitations regarding leave, the distance to the respective religious community). The second are related to the nature of military or police service. Due to some of their features (e.g. being faced with interferences with the inviolability of human life, dealing with the fleetingness of one's own life, etc.), such may raise intense moral and ethical dilemmas and considerations in individuals that are answered by religious beliefs. The compared situations are therefore similar, as the mentioned circumstances (might) occur in the performance of both of the two professions.

59 In the case Dahlab v. Switzerland, the ECtHR held that the principle of denominational neutrality, on which Switzerland relied when prohibiting a teacher in a public elementary school from wearing an Islamic headscarf, allows that certain restrictions are imposed on some public officials regarding the expression of their religious freedom, in particular in a school environment where younger children are concerned, who are more easily influenced than older ones. In the case Lautsi v. Italy, the ECtHR decided that the compulsory display of crucifixes in compulsory public schools, in particular in classrooms, violates the students' freedom of religion and the right of parents to educate their children in accordance with their own beliefs.

173. Since the conscript system is no longer in force, the accessibility of religious spiritual care is not significantly diminished for members of the Army when in peacetime they are stationed in the territory of the state (and a so-called state of alert is not at issue). Since that time, members of the military and voluntary military reserve are no longer subject to compulsory residence in closed military bases that separate them physically and socially from the ordinary flow of life.<sup>60</sup> Thus, the access of members of the Army and Police Force – during peacetime and when there is no so-called state of emergency – to religious care is significantly hindered primarily during periods of (long-term) training abroad or while participating in various operations outside the state. The legislature took as the starting point that the amount of time spent in a closed environment – i.e. during training and operations abroad – is longer for an average member of the Army than for an average police officer. Such is already clear from the statutory regulation determining the participation of the members of both forces in such tasks. The first paragraph of Article 19 of the PA determines that, at the request of international organisations or on the basis of international treaties, the Police participate abroad in the exercise of police or other non-military tasks. On the other hand, participation in international security alliances which are the basis for the participation of the members of the Army in operations abroad is defined in Article 2 of the DA as one of the tools to achieve the basic purpose of defence. The assumption that an average member of the Army spends more time in a remote closed environment than an average police officer is, in particular, confirmed by data on the number of (past and present) missions and international operations and the number of members of the Army and the Police Force involved in them. In 2009, from 427 to 528 members of the Slovene Armed Forces were involved in ten international operations and missions all together,<sup>61</sup> while on 1 September 2009, there were 22 Slovene police officers on missions.<sup>62</sup> 293 police officers were involved in all peacekeeping missions from 1997 to 2009. The average in the last eight years has been around 30 police officers per year, which constitutes 0.3% of all employed police officers.<sup>63</sup> On the other hand, in the peacekeeping operations of the United Nations from 1997 to 2009, more than 4,200 Slovene soldiers were involved (the highest point was in 2008, when 961 members of the Slovene Armed Forces were posted abroad, which constituted more than 13% of all soldiers).<sup>64</sup>

60 The exemption applies only to those individuals who volunteered for three-month military service, but they, as well, generally do not spend their weekends at a military post.

174. The difference in the nature of typical military and typical police work is also reflected in the legislature's different assessment of the frequency and intensity of experiencing moral and ethical dilemmas and questions of conscience by the members of the Army, on the one hand, and by police officers, on the other. The Army fosters international peace, security, and stability, its main task is to deter military aggression and to carry out military defence. Military defence entails defence utilising weapons and other military means (the first paragraph of Article 5 of the DA). The Ministry of Defence, for example, states that the purpose of combat forces is "[...] to defeat the enemy in direct combat with firepower and by using manoeuvres."<sup>65</sup> An important defining element of the mission of soldiers, junior officers, and officers, constituting the core of the members of the Army, is that they first consent to exposing the inviolability of their own life to risk and their willingness to interfere with the inviolability of the lives of others. Certainly, such situations also occur in the work of police officers. However, given the generally known typical nature of police work,<sup>66</sup> it is not unreasonable to assess that the situations determined by the legislature using the criterion of what is predominant as typical for military service, are not typical of police service, as they do not occur to a predominant, but only to a lesser extent.
175. Generalising or determining typical cases according to the criterion of predominant characteristics is a natural element of the legislative competences. Making such generalisations is not an unsound reason for the difference in determining the amount of religious spiritual care for each of the situations compared. The legislature, therefore, assessed that the greater frequency of separation from the general social environment (the higher number of operations abroad) and the typical nature of military service (which involves moral and ethical dilemmas of conscience, which may be facilitated by religious spiritual care, more intensively and more often) require a broader scope of provision of religious spiritual care. By this, the legislature enabled the executive branch of power to organise religious spiritual care in the Army in a manner that ensures its continuity (e.g. by the permanent presence of appropriate priests). If the exercise of religious spiritual care is organised in such manner that it is constantly available, also those members of the Army whose movement is not limited can participate in such by the very nature of things. Regarding police officers, due to the smaller scale or intensity of their circumstances, the legislature used as the starting point the presumption that situations requiring such care are exceptional rather than typical. Therefore, it provided for such care more narrowly and the executive branch of power can ensure it by organising it in an ad hoc manner only for those persons who need it in such particular situations. The different frequency and intensity of the circumstances requiring religious spiritual care is a sound reason for the different determination of the extent of this care.

66 According to the first paragraph of Article 3 of the PA, such work entails ensuring the safety of persons and property, the prevention, detection, and investigation of minor offences and crimes, maintaining law and order, carrying out border control, and the regulation and supervision of road traffic.

176. As the legislature's determination of the different extent of ensuring the right to religious spiritual care in the Army and in the Police Force is founded on reasonable criterion based on the nature of things, Articles 22 and 23 of the RFA are not inconsistent with the Constitution.
177. In the light of the above-mentioned, the Constitutional Court decided that Articles 22 and 23 of the RFA and Article 52 of the DA are not inconsistent with the Constitution (Point 7 of the operative provisions).

B – VII

Review of the Freedom to Build and Use Facilities and Buildings for Religious Purposes (Article 26 of the RFA)

178. The first paragraph of Article 26 of the RFA determines that churches and other religious communities have the right to build and maintain premises and buildings for worship, other religious rites, and other gatherings, and that they have the right of free access to them. The second paragraph determines that in the drafting of spatial planning acts concerning the foreseen spatial regulation, with regard to the new urban planning zones, particularly those intended for housing and residences, the needs, recommendations, and interests of churches and other religious communities are ascertained and harmonised on the basis of mutual agreement, taking into account the number of adherents of the respective churches and other religious communities. The body drafting the proposal must include in it an assessment of the need for religious buildings. In accordance with the third paragraph of the same Article, the spatial planning acts determined in the second paragraph which were in force when the RFA came into force must be amended and corrected accordingly within a reasonable time if the churches and other religious communities which are present in the area and to which these spatial planning acts refer have an interest and need for such.

Review in the Light of the Principle of the Clarity and Precision of Norms

179. The applicant opines that it is not clear whether the contested provisions refer only to registered or also to unregistered religious communities.
180. The Constitutional Court deems that the addressees of the rules determined in Article 26 of the RFA are clearly defined. In the same manner as it has already explained regarding some of the other provisions of Chapter IV of the RFA, entitled "The Rights of Registered Churches and Other Religious Communities and Their Adherents", Article 26 of the RFA, which is contained in the same chapter, refers to registered religious communities and their adherents. A more extensive argumentation why such follows from historical, teleological, and systematic methods of interpretation is contained in Paragraph 151 of the reasoning and applies mutatis mutandis also to the reviewed situation. The Constitutional Court therefore will not reiterate such.
181. The applicant deems that the second paragraph of the same Article is undetermined and unclear, as in its opinion it does not specify the criteria for exercising the right to construct buildings and facilities, it does not determine what "a large number of adherents” entails, it does not determine which spatial acts are concerned, nor which authorities are competent, and does not state whether religious communities are parties in the procedure for adopting spatial planning acts.

- 182. These complaints are unfounded as well.
- 183. This provision must be interpreted together with the regulations on spatial planning. Thus, the Spatial Planning Act (Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia, No. 33/07 et seq. – hereinafter referred to as SPA) clearly defines spatial planning acts in Article 14 (such are, in general, national, municipal, and inter-municipal spatial planning acts). In Articles 23 to 26, 29 to 37, 46 to 53, 57 to 61a, and 66 to 68 it provides for the procedure of their drafting and adoption, as well as the bodies competent to draft and decide on them.
- 184. It is also not unclear what the term large number of adherents, which is to be considered in coordinating the needs, recommendations, and interests of religious communities in the procedure for drafting the relevant spatial planning act, entails. Such entails that the number of adherents of a registered religious community in the territory covered by the drafted spatial planning act is a criterion for coordination, on the basis of mutual agreement, of the needs and interests of the registered religious community to build structures in a certain territory.
- 185. Finally, the manner of implementation of the cooperation of registered religious communities with the bodies drafting spatial planning acts is also not unclear. It must be taken into account that spatial planning acts are general and not individual acts. The procedure for drafting and adopting them is thus not an administrative procedure. Therefore, a registered religious community is not a party in such procedure.<sup>67</sup> The requirement determined in the second paragraph of Article 26 of the RFA that the needs and interests of the registered religious community be determined and coordinated on the basis of mutual agreement in the procedure for drafting the spatial planning act is a particularly emphasised obligation of the body drafting the spatial planning act which in general terms stems already from the SPA. Namely, in accordance with the principle of the public nature of spatial planning determined in Article 5, the latter Act already obliges the competent state and municipal bodies to enable the expression of the interests of individuals and groups of residents, and the participation of all interested persons in the procedures for drafting and adopting spatial planning acts. It also guarantees everyone the right to be informed of the procedures for drafting spatial planning acts and the right to participate in these procedures with initiatives, opinions, and in other manners, all in accordance with the provisions of the latter Act. The competent state and municipal bodies must, in accordance with the SPA and the act governing access to public sector information, enable everyone to have access to spatial planning acts, technical documents, and other documents related to spatial planning and to inform the public of spatial planning matters. It also determines the duty of the body drafting the spatial planning acts to ensure that the public is informed of the draft of the spatial planning act by publicly presenting and holding a public discussion. This body must closely examine the comments and suggestions made by the public in the process of public presentation and take a position thereon. This duty is concretised in Article 32 of the SPA regarding a municipal spatial plan, a detailed municipal spatial plan, and a regional spatial plan. Given these provisions of the SPA, as the main act regulating these issues, the manner in which the needs, recommendations, and interests of the registered religious community are to be ascertained and coordinated on the basis of mutual agreement is determined in a clear and precise manner. The procedure for amending and supplementing a spatial planning act is, in accordance with Article 18 of the SPA, the same as the procedure for its drafting and adoption. This entails that the described manner of coordinating such on the basis of mutual agreement when drafting a spatial planning act also holds for amending and supplementing an act referred to in the third paragraph of Article 26 of the RFA.

<sup>67</sup> The Constitutional Court has already stated on several occasions that spatial planning acts are general acts and that in the procedure for drafting and adopting general acts, an individual is not a party in the procedure (e.g. Order No. U-I-105/98, dated 22 June 2000, OdlUS IX, 174, and Order No. U-I-246/08, dated 13 November 2008).

- 186. It consequently follows that the complaint regarding the lack of clarity of Article 26 of the RFA is unfounded. Therefore, this Article is not inconsistent with Article 2 of the Constitution.

Review in the Light of the Principle of Separation of the State and Religious Communities

- 187. In the second paragraph of Article 26, the RFA determines that in the drafting of spatial planning acts of new building planning areas, particularly those intended for housing and residence, the needs, recommendations, and interests of churches and other religious communities are to be obtained and harmonised on the basis of mutual agreement, taking into account the number of adherents of the churches and other religious communities.
- 188. In the view of the applicant, the mentioned provision is inconsistent with the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities for two reasons. Firstly, because it is the state authority and not the religious community itself that decides on the religious community's needs for religious buildings. According to the applicant, state authorities should only decide on the suitability of the building in relation to the spatial planning and building requirements. Secondly, in the view of the applicant, the regulation according to which the state authorities and religious communities must agree on the needs and interests of the religious communities is also inconsistent with the same constitutional principle. The applicant states that such imposes upon the state the obligation to achieve a specific result. The third paragraph of Article 26 of the RFA, which allegedly determines that the competent authorities are obliged to accordingly amend the existing and applicable spatial acts, allegedly also demonstrates that such an obligation exists.
- 189. In order to review whether the form of participation of registered religious communities in the development of the spatial measures provided for in the second paragraph of Article 26 of the RFA is inconsistent with the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities, as is claimed by the applicant, it must first be assessed what is ensured by the positive aspect of freedom of religion determined in the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution in relation to the construction of religious buildings. Given the starting points of constitutional law regarding the regulation of religious freedom and the position of religious communities in relation to the state, everything that is required by this human right cannot be considered inconsistent with the principle of separation of the state and religious communities.

190. In Decision No. U-I-111/04, the Constitutional Court adopted the position that the construction of religious buildings in a manner that is traditional for the profession of a particular faith is an integral part of the right to freedom of religion (determined by the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution) and the freedom of activity of religious communities (which is determined as a fundamental principle by the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution).<sup>68</sup> It emphasised that it is essential for the enjoyment of the free manifestation and exercise of religion (which also includes religious teaching, worship, and practicing religious rites) that religious communities are allowed to build their own buildings that correspond to their religious worship, religious rites, and customs. The Constitutional Court also stated that it must be taken into account that the construction of these buildings also must be planned and built in accordance with the applicable legal regulation of spatial planning and building construction. This human right, which therefore entails the right of religious communities to build, own, and maintain buildings that correspond to their beliefs and traditional manner of individual and in particular collective exercise of their religion, is enjoyed by all religious communities, regardless of the manner of organisation and irrespective of their registration.
191. The right to construct buildings for the profession and exercise of religion, which stems from positive religious freedom (and the principle of the freedom of religious communities that is a component of this freedom) presupposes the obligation of the authorities (state and local) not to overlook the needs of the constitutionally protected religious communities in spatial planning. Such is enacted through their involvement in the procedure for adopting spatial planning acts, in which they must be ensured the possibility to express and argue the need for the placement of a religious building in a certain area. The body drafting the spatial planning act must take this into account and adopt a position regarding the expressed needs. The general requirement that the competent authorities must, in the spatial planning procedure, enable the expression of the interests of individuals and groups of residents, as well as their participation in such procedures, stems already from the human right to participate in the management of public affairs determined by Article 44 of the Constitution (see Decision No. U-I-372/06, dated 13 November 2008, Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia, No. 111/08, Medobčinski uradni vestnik Štajerske in Koroške regije [Official Gazette of the Municipalities of the Štajerska and Koroška Region], No. 27/08, and OdlUS XVII, 58).

68 This right also follows from the case law of the ECtHR (see B. Vermeulen, ibidem, p. 769). The same position is also found in some non-binding international instruments. For example, the United Nations Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief, proclaimed by Resolution No. 36/55, dated 25 November 1981 (published in: Človekove pravice, Zbirka mednarodnih dokumentov, I. del, Univerzalni dokumenti [Human Rights, International Collection of Papers, Part I, Universal Acts], Društvo za Združene narode za Republiko Slovenijo [United Nations Association of Slovenia], Ljubljana 1995, p. 96) determines in paragraph (a) of Article 6 that the right to freedom of thought, conscience, religion, or belief includes, inter alia, the freedom “to worship or assemble in connexion with a religion or belief, and to establish and maintain places for these purposes”, and in paragraph (e) “to teach a religion or belief in places suitable for these purposes”. The Concluding Document of the Vienna Meeting 1986 of Representatives of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, adopted in 1989 (available at the webpage http://www.osce.org/documents/mcs/1989/01/16059\_en.pdf (as accessed on 7 October 2009)), determines in section 16.4 the principle that freedom of religion also entails that religious communities must be allowed to establish and maintain free access to places of worship or assembly.

192. However, locating buildings in an area cannot be left to different (and often conflicting) private interests. It is up to the authorities to ensure a balanced spatial development by planning such placements of buildings in an area. Therefore, the authorities must review and coordinate the different developmental needs and interests with the public interest as regards the areas of environmental protection, conservation of the natural and cultural heritage, the protection of natural resources, national defence, and protection against natural and other disasters (the first paragraph of Article 3 of the SPA). Spatial planning must be carried out in such a manner that it, inter alia, enables sustainable development in the area and the rational use of land, quality living conditions, spatially coordinated and mutually complementary positioning of various activities, the preservation of characteristic features of the space, the rehabilitation of degraded areas, protection of the environment and natural resources, nature conservation, overall conservation of the cultural heritage, etc. (the second paragraph of Article 3 of the SPA). In doing so, the competent authorities must take into account public as well as private interests and carefully weigh them in accordance with the aims of spatial planning, while private interests must not affect public interests (Article 7 of the SPA).
193. The constitutionally guaranteed freedom to construct buildings for religious purposes therefore cannot be unlimited. It does not give religious communities the right to build any number of religious facilities wherever they would like regardless of the public interest in sustainable spatial development, which is determined on a general level by the SPA as religiously neutral and which takes into account the universal needs of present generations and also protects the needs of future generations against endangerment. This freedom is, however, enacted in a manner that takes into account the protection of the public interest through general, religiously neutral spatial planning, based on expert findings regarding the properties and capacities of the space (the principle of professional competence determined by Article 10 of the SPA).<sup>69</sup> The body drafting the spatial planning act must – through the participation of religious communities – when coordinating the needs of religious communities regarding the building of religious facilities with other interests regarding spatial development, take into account the constitutional starting points of this human right of the religious community, in particular the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution concerning the admissibility of limitations of human rights.

<sup>69</sup> It follows also from the case law of the ECtHR that such regulations in principle do not interfere unjustifiably

- 194. The human right determined in the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution thus prohibits the state and local authorities from neglecting the needs of religious communities in relation to building religious facilities. However, the right does not go so far that the authorities would not even be allowed to assess from an expert point of view whether the placement of a religious building in an area is justified or that the authorities are bound by the consent of religious communities regarding spatial planning. The second paragraph of Article 26 of the RFA must be understood by taking into account the mentioned constitutional starting points. It must be interpreted together with the SPA, which provides, inter alia, that decisions on spatial planning are made by the competent institutions of local and state authorities. Consequently, the second paragraph of Article 26 of the RFA must be understood exclusively in the manner that registered religious communities are included in the procedures for drafting spatial planning acts in a manner which imposes a duty on the bodies drafting these acts to communicate and coordinate with the registered religious communities regarding their needs, interests, and recommendations concerning the building of religious facilities. A commitment determined in such a manner does not entail the requirement to achieve a consensus between the body drafting the spatial planning act and the registered religious communities. It does not entail, as the applicant suggests, that the result of the participation must be a solution with which the registered religious community at issue agrees. The freedom to build religious facilities ensured by the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution presupposes the necessary scope of participation of religious communities in the spatial development planning procedure. The relationship between the authorities and registered religious communities regarding coordination on the basis of mutual agreement in the procedures for drafting the spatial planning acts as determined by the second paragraph of Article 26 of the RFA is not such that it would be inconsistent with the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities. The authorities do not incorporate religious elements in their own actions merely by taking into account the needs and interests of registered religious communities regarding the construction of buildings when adopting a position regarding these needs and interests and striving to mutually coordinate them when assessing these needs. By doing so, they also do not establish such institutional or functional connections with religious communities that would indicate that they (symbolically) identify with them. However, a different interpretation of

with the exercise of freedom of religion. See B. Vermeulen, ibidem, p. 769, and the Judgment in the case Vergos v. Greece, dated 24 June 2004.

the contested second paragraph of Article 26 of the RFA (as alleged by the applicant), which would entail that the body drafting the spatial planning act must reach an agreement with the registered religious community on how to take into account the needs, recommendations, and interests of the latter, would be constitutionally inadmissible. Such would namely exceed the boundaries of state neutrality (which is a central component of the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities), as the registered religious community would thus indirectly co-decide on spatial planning that affects everyone.

195. The third paragraph of Article 26 of the RFA determines that the spatial planning acts determined in the second paragraph of the same Article which were in force when the RFA came into force must be amended accordingly within a reasonable time if churches and other religious communities present in the area to which these acts apply have an interest or need for such. This provision as well is not inconsistent with the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities. According to an interpretation of the second paragraph of this Article that is consistent with the Constitution and taking into account that it must be construed together with the provisions of the SPA (which, inter alia, determine that spatial planning is decided by the competent authorities of the state or local communities), it is clear that it is the body drafting the spatial planning act that decides whether such a need or interest of registered religious communities is founded, taking into consideration that the latter participate in such procedure.

Review of the Admissibility of the Distinction between Registered and Unregistered Religious Communities
(the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution)

196. The addressees of Article 26 of the RFA are only registered religious communities. However, this does not entail that unregistered religious communities do not have the right to the freedom to build and use religious facilities, as determined in the first paragraph of Article 26 of the RFA merely because this Article does not refer to them, nor that they do not have the right to participate in the preparation of spatial planning acts. It must be established whether unregistered religious communities have essentially similar entitlements in substance as conferred on the registered religious communities by Article 26 of the RFA on the basis of other legal provisions.
197. The right to the free profession of religion determined in the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution and the freedom of activity of religious communities determined in the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution include the right of individuals and religious communities to profess their religion individually or collectively in facilities that are commonly and generally accepted (traditional) for the profession of their religion and performance of religious rites. As the Constitutional Court emphasised already in Decision No. U-I-111/04, it is crucial for the exercise of the right to the free profession of religion that religious communities are allowed to construct their own buildings which correspond to their manner of religious worship, religious rites, and customs. That aspect of the freedom to build and access religious facilities which prohibits the authorities from intervening therewith is therefore ensured to all religious communities – registered and unregistered – already by the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution alone and by the principle of the freedom of activity of religious communities determined in the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution. This requirement regarding the restraint of the state in relation to all (i.e. also unregistered) religious communities is demonstrated also in the first paragraph of Article 6 of the RFA, according to which the activity of a religious community is free regardless whether it is registered or active without registration.

- 198. Religious communities – registered and unregistered – also have the possibility already under the general rules determined in the SPA to participate in planning which is in substance essentially similar to the possibility determined in the second and third paragraphs of Article 26 of the RFA. The principle of the public nature of such matters determined in Article 5 of the SPA, which requires that the competent state and municipal authorities allow individuals and population groups to express their interests and ensures the participation of all interested persons in procedures for drafting and adopting spatial planning acts and which is given concrete form in the procedural provisions of the SPA (in particular, in Articles 32 and 50) regarding the drafting and adoption of state, municipal, and regional spatial plans, is namely applicable also to religious communities. In general, the same procedure for the drafting and adoption of spatial planning acts is also applicable to the amendments to these acts (Article 18 of the SPA). This entails that unregistered religious communities can express their needs and interests and the body drafting the spatial planning act must adopt a position on such, also in the procedure for amending spatial planning acts.
- 199. The exercise of the freedom to build of registered religious communities determined in Article 26 of the RFA as interpreted consistently with the Constitution is in essence ensured in the same manner to unregistered religious communities on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution, Article 6 of the RFA, and Articles 5, 32, and 50 of the SPA. Therefore, Article 26 of the RFA is not inconsistent with the principle of the equality of religious communities determined in the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution.
- 200. The same provisions of the SPA enable anyone, thus also “other voluntary and charitable associations and organisations active in spiritual areas”, to participate in the manner so described (as an element of the right determined in Article 44 of the Constitution). Article 26 of the RFA is not inconsistent with the general principle of equality before the law (the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution) already for this reason. Therefore, with regard to the freedom to build, the Constitutional Court was not required to review whether religious communities are in an essentially similar position as one of the types of association with diverse goals, to which the applicant compares them.
- 201. In view of the above, the Constitutional Court decided that Article 26 of the RFA is not inconsistent with the Constitution (Point 8 of the operative provisions).

B – VIII

Review of the Fifth Paragraph of Article 27 of the RFA

202. In Article 27, the RFA determines the right to state financial aid intended for the payment of the social security contributions of insured person employed by churches and other religious communities and the conditions for obtaining this right. In the fourth paragraph of this Article a reasonable proportionality between the number of the employees and the number of adherents of the registered religious community who are citizens of the Republic of Slovenia where they are also registered as permanent residents is determined as a criterion for enjoying this right. The condition of such reasonable proportionality is, in accordance with this provision, fulfilled if a ratio of at least 1,000 adherents of the registered religious community to one employee is established. The challenged fifth paragraph of Article 27 of the RFA in addition determines that the condition of a reasonable proportionality between the number of employees of a religious community and the number of adherents of a church or religious community is fulfilled also for one employee thereof if the religious community has been active in the Republic of Slovenia for at least eighty years before the RFA came into force. The applicant states that this provision is intended only for the Jewish religious community and that it therefore entails an unfounded positive discrimination at the expense of other, younger religious communities. Such allegedly violates the principle of the equality of religious communities (the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution).

203. It follows from the Draft Proposal of the RFA<sup>70</sup> that the purpose of the benefits determined in the fifth paragraph of Article 27 of the RFA is to enable a registered religious community to receive payments that due to historical circumstances cannot demonstrate the required number of adherents determined in the third paragraph of Article 27 of the RFA, but can demonstrate at least eighty years of activity in the territory of the Republic of Slovenia before the RFA came into force. It is expressly stated that this provision will enable the Jewish community to receive payment of the social security contributions for their employee. In this regard, the Government stated in its opinion on the applicant's request, inter alia, that this provision, by maintaining the Holocaust in our conscience, can help to maintain the Jewish culture in Slovenia.

204. The fifth paragraph of Article 27 of the RFA is written in a general and neutral manner for all the registered religious communities that correspond to the abstract definition of the factual circumstances. However, the legislative preparatory materials clearly show that the intention of the legislature was to ensure a more favourable position for a particular religious community, that is, the Jewish community. The Government has confirmed such intention in its opinion and the National Assembly in its response does not mention this issue. In view of this, the Constitutional Court has found that the challenged regulation – even though it is written in a general manner – differentiates between religious communities in order to give preference to the Jewish community. Such differentiation of the legislature is therefore based on religion, which is a personal circumstance (as determined in the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution).

- 205. The principle of the equality of religious communities determined in the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution must be, as already stated, interpreted in connection with the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution (which prohibits discrimination on the basis of personal circumstances when exercising a human right or fundamental freedom) and in connection with the second paragraph of the same Article (which states that all are equal before the law). In order to review whether the legislature's differentiation of the Jewish community in relation to other registered religious communities is consistent with the Constitution, it is first necessary to determine whether the state financial aid intended for the payment of social security contributions in respect of which the legislature differentiates on the basis of religion entails the exercise of a human right. Namely, if different treatment based on religion relates to the exercise of a human right, its conformity with the Constitution must be reviewed according to the strict test of proportionality, as required by the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution. If, however, it is established that the legislature differently regulated an issue that does not entail the exercise of a human right on the basis of religion, such is constitutionally admissible if it does not violate the general principle of equality before the law determined in the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution.
- 206. Just as such applies to the funding of registered religious communities due to their general benefits to society, this human right (determined in the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution) also does not require that registered religious communities be given state financial aid intended for the payment of the social security contributions of their employees. Such entails that the contested provision does not differentiate between the Jewish community and other registered religious communities regarding the exercise of a human right, but regarding the regulation of additional benefits, namely the encouraging activities of the state. In so doing, the legislature is constitutionally bound by the prohibition on arbitrary, unreasonable differentiation between those religious communities that can obtain additional benefits and those that cannot qualify for them (in accordance with the principle of the equality of religious communities determined in the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution as a particular expression of the general principle of equality before the law determined in the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution). In the case at hand, this entails that the Constitutional Court had to determine what the reason is for the different treatment of the Jewish community in comparison to other registered religious communities in relation to state financial aid for the payment of the social security contributions of the employees of religious communities, and then review whether this reason is sound and derives from the nature of the matter.
- 207. It follows from the legislative preparatory materials and the opinion of the Government that the key factor for differentiation is the historical fact of the Holocaust during the period of World War II that gravely affected Jews, also on the territory of Slovenia.

208. The historian Dr Andrej Pančur, from the Inštitut za novejšo zgodovino [Institute of Contemporary History], states that before World War II, around 1,000 Jews lived on the territory of Slovenia, almost half of them in Prekmurje. He states that in the Auschwitz concentration camp 1771 people from Slovenia were killed, a quarter of whom were Jews. Eighty-five percent of the Jews from Prekmurje therefore did not survive the Holocaust.<sup>71</sup> In the 2002 census in Slovenia, 99 persons identified themselves as adherents of Judaism.<sup>72</sup> The horror of the Holocaust genocide deeply and gravely affected the Jewish population also in Slovenia. It led to its near disappearance from Slovene territory. That the legislature took into account this extreme crime against humanity and its implications as a differentiating reason for the Jewish community to not need to fulfil the condition regarding the number of adherents when applying for financial aid in respect of one employee is therefore reasonable and justified due to the nature of the matter. In view of this, the fifth paragraph of Article 27 of the RFA is not inconsistent with the Constitution (Point 9 of the operative provisions).

B – IX

Review of the Regulation of the Competent Authority (Articles 30 and 32 of the RFA)

209. The applicant is of the opinion that Articles 30 and 32 of the RFA are inconsistent with Article 2 of the Constitution because they do not clearly enough determine which body is competent to perform the duties determined in the RFA. It allegedly does not follow clearly from the RFA that such is the Office of the Republic of Slovenia for Religious Communities. Regarding such, the applicant further states that the Office is a executive government agency, which allegedly cannot perform administrative tasks and that therefore the RFA is inconsistent also with the first paragraph of Article 120 of the Constitution.
210. In Article 30 of the RFA the tasks carried out by “the competent body” are determined and one of the powers of this body (i.e. the competences of the minor offence authority) is determined separately in Article 32 of the RFA.

71 A. Similar conclusions follow from the data in the studies of the victims of World War II in Slovenia collected by the Inštitut za novejšo zgodovino [Institute of Contemporary History], i.e. that during World War II 550 Jews were killed on Slovene territory, 394 of them (166 men and 228 women) in the Auschwitz concentration camp. After the German occupation of Hungary in the spring of 1944, from Murska Sobota District alone, 394 Jews were moved to this concentration camp and only 25 survived. In the Jewish community of Lendava, there were 132 victims of the Holocaust, only 23 Jews from Lendava survived the war. Cited from D. Hančič and R. Podberšič, Žrtve nacionalsocializma in boljševizma med slovenskimi Judi [Victims of National Socialism and Bolshevism among Slovene Jews], available at: http://www.zrss.si/doc/ZGO\_%C5%BDRTVE%20NACIZ-MA%20MED%20SLOVENSKIMI%20JUDI.doc (accessed on 5 October 2009).

The number of Jews in terms of ethnic origin is unknown, but is certainly higher than the cited number of adherents of Judaism.

- 211. The applicant's complaint is unfounded. It is indeed true that it does not follow clearly from the RFA which body exercises the competences determined in this Act as the body is referred to only as "the competent body". However, the transitional and final provisions make it clear that the duties determined in the RFA are exercised by the Office. The sixth paragraph of Article 33 of the RFA thus determines that all churches and other religious communities which on the date the Act was to come into force were not recorded in the register of religious communities kept by the Office and established on the basis of the Decision on the Establishment of the Office of the Government of the Republic of Slovenia for Religious Communities, can register on the basis of this Act. As it can be established from the statutory provisions which body is competent to perform the duties determined in the Act, the RFA is not inconsistent with the requirement that regulations be clear and precise as determined in Article 2 of the Constitution, nor with the first paragraph of Article 120 of the Constitution regarding the legality of the organisation of the state administration, which determines that the state administration is bound by law when determining its own organisation.<sup>73</sup> The applicant argues the unconstitutionality of these provisions of the RFA also by stating that the Office is a executive government agency, which are not established to perform administrative tasks. However, these allegations cannot justify why the challenged statutory provisions are inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 120 of the Constitution in view of the fact that it is possible to determine from the RFA which the competent body is and what the substance of its competences entails. The Decision that is the target of the substance of the applicant's complaints, however, is not challenged by the applicant.
- 212. In view of the above, Articles 30 and 32 of the RFA are not inconsistent with either Article 2 of the Constitution or the first paragraph of Article 120 of the Constitution (Point 10 of the operative provisions).

- 213. The Constitutional Court reached this decision on the basis of Articles 21 and 43 of the CCA, composed of: Jože Tratnik, President, and Judges Dr Mitja Deisinger, Mag. Marta Klampfer, Mag. Marija Krisper Kramberger, Mag. Miroslav Mozetič, Dr Ernest Petrič, Jasna Pogačar, Mag. Jadranka Sovdat, and Jan Zobec. Points 1, 2, 3, 6, 8, 9, and 10 of the operative provisions were adopted unanimously. Points 4 and 5 of the operative provisions were adopted by five votes against four; judges Klampfer, Pogačar, Deisinger, and Mozetič voted against. Point 7 of the operative provisions was adopted by six votes against three; judges Krisper Kramberger, Petrič, and Tratnik voted against. Judges Krisper Kramberger and Mozetič submitted partly concurring and partly dissenting opinions.

<sup>73</sup> The ordinary courts also interpret the Act in the same manner; see the standpoint in the Judgment of the Administrative Court No. U 1524/2007, dated 17 June 2008, according to which "[...] also under the new statutory regulation the Office is the state body that performs the duties of the authority competent for religious communities determined in the RFA, as follows also from the Decision on the establishment of the Office [...]"

OF JUDGE MAG. MOZETIČ, JOINED IN THE PARTIALLY DISSENTING PART BY JUDGE DR DEISINGER

1. I voted for Point 1 of the operative provisions of the cited Decision, which abrogates with suspended effect for a period of time the first paragraph of Article 13 and the first and fifth items of Article 14 of the Religious Freedom Act (RFA), because I agree with the standpoint that due to their rigorousness these provisions inadmissibly interfere with the right of religious communities to acquire a legal personality as an integral part of the freedom of establishment determined in the first paragraph of Article 41 in conjunction with the second paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution. I cannot agree, however, with the greater part of the reasoning that refers to this point of the operative provisions (B – III), as it is unnecessary to a large degree and also misleading.
2. The standpoint expressed in Paragraphs 114 and 116 of the reasoning of the Decision is not problematic.<sup>1</sup> All in all, the RFA follows such a constitutional starting point. The first paragraph of Article 6 expressly determines that the activities of churches and other religious communities are free regardless whether they are registered or active without being registered. The RFA also ensures religious communities that they can organise themselves in such a legal form that allows for their greatest possible autonomy and enables them to acquire a legal personality upon registration. I therefore believe that pondering whether the organisation meets the mentioned constitutional starting point on the basis of the Associations Act (AA-1) is redundant,

1 “114. This registration or another form of acquiring a legal personality is not a precondition for the establishment and activity of religious communities. Religious communities can be active in a completely informal manner and such forms of associations already enjoy constitutional protection. However, the Constitutional Court has already stated (Paragraph 94 of the reasoning) that the constitutionally protected freedom of activity of religious community obliges the state to establish a mechanism for religious communities that wish to do so to acquire a legal personality. This is required by the collective aspect of the human right to freedom of conscience determined in the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution, understood in the light of the second paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution, which guarantees the right to freedom of association. In this regard, the second paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution substantively codetermines the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution.”

“116. The Constitutional Court deems that religious association is not just exercise of the general constitutionally guaranteed right to freedom of association (the second paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution), but is also an exercise of the right to freedom of religion determined in the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution. The freedom of activity of religious communities derives already from the human right to freedom of conscience, and in particular their autonomy is determined as a fundamental constitutional principle also in the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution. This entails that the requirement to provide such legal forms of religious communities that allow for the greatest possible autonomy of religious communities in the exercise of religious freedom follows from the first paragraph of Article 41 in conjunction with the second paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution and from the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution. This essentially entails the requirement that the legal order must in principle respect the autonomous internal structure of a religious community and recognise legal personality to it as such.”

since the legislature provided for a special type of organisation and did not prohibit religious communities from organising themselves also on the basis of the AA-1. Therefore, the last sentence of Paragraph 120 of the reasoning is somewhat unclear, as it can also be understood to mean that religious communities must not register (be organised) on the basis of the AA-1. Such understanding is wrong. It would be inconsistent with the Constitution, however, if the legislature had not regulated a specific legal form for religious communities by an act.

3. In addition, I think that the reason for the established unconstitutionality of the challenged statutory provisions determining the conditions for registration is not clear enough from Paragraphs 123 to 126 of the reasoning. Is the reason that the legislature also makes the exercise of human rights and fundamental freedoms that belong to individuals and religious communities regardless of registration conditional upon registration, or is the reason in the fact that the conditions for registration are too difficult (too demanding) and therefore as such inadmissibly interfere with this human right? I myself believe that the RFA does not make the exercise of the right to freedom of religion or the freedom of activity of religious communities conditional upon their registration; on the contrary, as I stated in the preceding paragraph, in the first paragraph of Article 6 it explicitly determines that the activities of religious communities are free regardless whether they are registered or not. I opine, however, that the conditions determined by the Act for registration are clearly too demanding and as such constitute an inadmissible interference with this human right. My vote for Point 1 of the operative provisions is based on this standpoint.
4. Although I voted against Point 4 of the operative provisions, I agree almost entirely (except in some details) with the starting points of the constitutional review (B – II). I voted against because I am convinced that the constitutional starting points described in the Decision cannot lead to the conclusion that the challenged provisions listed in Point 4 of the operative provisions are inconsistent with the Constitution, i.e. with the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities therein. Thus the (majority) Decision of the Constitutional Court states in Paragraph 146 of the reasoning: “The preference of the legislature [As an aside, who is the legislature? It is the representative of the people, elected in a universal election. Thus, it is the representative of all the citizens regardless of their beliefs.] regarding (financial) support for the exercise of the religious life of individuals may therefore only reach the border delineated by the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities, in particular by the guarantee of state neutrality. It may not reach the point where the provision of support would entail (even symbolic) identification of the state with religion or religious communities. It is precisely the manner (the modality or the form) of the provision of such support that may lead to a qualitative leap: financial support which is acceptable from the perspective of the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities may result due to the state providing such in a manner entailing a constitutionally unacceptable connection of the mentioned categories [emphasised by Mozetič]. In the view of the Constitutional Court, one of the possible forms of supportive cooperation regarding religious spiritual care in prisons and public hospitals, which, although beyond the requirements of the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution, is still constitutionally admissible, is the provision of monetary recompense to religious communities for the work performed by their priests in providing religious spiritual care to adherents in prisons and public hospitals. In such a case, the state is actually and symbolically – in the eyes of third parties – removed enough from the religious activities of priests, and for such their religion and religious community remain the primary authority when offering religious spiritual care.”

5. I agree that the guarantee of state neutrality requires that the state must not identify itself with religion or religious communities, nor with other beliefs. However, the standpoint regarding the “qualitative leap” in which a certain manner (form) of provision of otherwise constitutionally admissible support may lead to constitutionally inadmissible support is in my opinion unconvincing. I opine that any manner (form) of support could be constitutionally inadmissible if the state identified itself with a particular religion, religious community, or other belief (e.g. atheism). Consequently, the manner (form) itself cannot lead to a violation of the principle of state neutrality. The manner, form, modality of ensuring the exercise of a certain human right, or, if you prefer, the “preference of the legislature”, is more an issue of the appropriateness of a certain regulation, the issue whether the exercise of a constitutional right can be regulated in another, perhaps even more appropriate manner. Therefore, the fact that the state ensures the exercise of human rights in one way or another, including the employment of priests or other representatives of religious communities, cannot in itself be inconsistent with the principle of the separation of church and state or even imply that the state identifies itself with a particular religious community. The arguments (allegations) that by employing priests or other representative of a religious community for the provision of religious spiritual care in hospitals, prisons, and other social welfare institutions, the state identifies itself with this religious community, and this is due to the fact that “a public official symbolises the state to some extent” and that therefore the employment of priests “in the body of the state symbolises that the state itself, by means of its apparatus, directly provides religious spiritual care in these institutions and hospitals” and that such entails “symbolic identification with religion and religious communities and by this the negation of neutrality” are not convincing.
6. Similarly, the standpoint that already by employing a priest the state communicates to non-adherents and the adherents of other religions that it identifies itself with this religious community, or at least can create in them such an impression or even communicates to them that it “puts the adherents of another religion or non-adherents in the position of a less favoured member of the community” is also not convincing. In my opinion, the message is different and is a necessary and positive one in this state which has its origins in the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (SFRY), which the Basic Constitutional Charter on the Sovereignty and Independence of the Republic of Slovenia established did not function as a state governed by the rule of law and that within it human rights were grossly violated. And it is the right to religious freedom that was grossly and systematically violated in the SFRY, the right to profess religion publicly was even often persecuted and religious members of the community justifiably and often had the impression (but not just the impression) that they were a less favoured member of the community. Consequently, such a regulation can also be understood as the message that all members of this community, even those with a certain or other religion or belief, are equally favoured and that the state takes the first sentence of Article 5 of the Constitution – in its own territory, the state shall protect human rights and fundamental freedoms – seriously.

OF JUDGE MAG. KRISPER KRAMBERGER

1. The request for a review of the constitutionality of the Religious Freedom Act (RFA) was submitted by the National Council, which was granted privileged access to the Constitutional Court by the legislature in the third indent of the first paragraph of Article 23a of the Constitutional Court Act (CCA). The Constitutional Court adopted the position that it can be justifiably expected from such an applicant that its requests are expertly and qualitatively reasoned, however the request at issue does not fulfil these criteria. Therefore, the Constitutional Court decided to review, with regard to constitutional law, only those allegations that fulfil these criteria.<sup>1</sup>
2. I did not fully agree with this method of review of the Constitutional Court, but I remained in the minority. By approaching the review of the request in such manner that it only extracted the sufficiently expertly reasoned allegations, while omitting a review of the allegations of the applicant for which the sense was clear enough, in my opinion the Constitutional Court inadvertently created new or preserved certain existing unconstitutionality. Such starting point entails that the decision of the majority, despite the fact that all the allegations of the applicant are summarised in its reasoning,<sup>2</sup> and despite the comprehensive theoretical approach to the interpretation of Articles 7 and 41 of the Constitution and also of Article 14 of the Constitution in conjunction with the two mentioned Articles,<sup>3</sup> cannot be construed as a decision by which all (or a majority of) the unconstitutionality alleged by the request are established or remedied.
3. Due to these reasons, my separate opinion is partially concurring and partially dissenting.

1 See Paragraphs 71, 72, and 73 of the reasoning.

2 Up to Paragraph 44 of the reasoning.

3 Up to Paragraph 110 of the reasoning; by quoting a substantial amount of literature, the hitherto case law of the Constitutional Court and of the ECtHR, and a number of standpoints that are not related with the constitutional law review of individual Articles of the RFA. As obiter dicta, these reasons may become an obstacle to a subsequent constitutional review of the RFA.

4. An equilibrium between the rights guaranteed by the Constitution to the religious communities is difficult to achieve. This is particularly true for the right to equality, as in this context the rights determined in the second paragraph of Article 7, Article 41, and Article 14 of the Constitution intersect. The Constitutional Court devotes a great deal of space in the reasoning to this right on the level of a principle,<sup>4</sup> however, it does not complete the review to the end regarding individual Articles of the RFA. The foundation of the interrelationship between the mentioned provisions should be a clear connection between these provisions, which ensure an individual – in the framework of expressing his religious adherence, of religious communities that make this possible for him, and of the broader aspects of state activities – complete equality regardless of such personal circumstance. The equality of individuals regarding the free expression of religion determined in Article 41 of the Constitution is ensured in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution, therefore it is admissible to interfere with this right only under the conditions determined in the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution and in accordance with the so-called strict test of proportionality. It is exactly this requirement of a strict review of equality that is expressed in the second paragraph of Article 7, insofar as it refers to religious communities that enable an individual, and as far as they enable an individual, to express his religion - that is, with regard to their religious activities. As far as it refers to activities that transcend the framework of religion and the profession of religion, such are performed by the religious communities in accordance with the principle of equality before the law determined in the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution under the same conditions both in relation to other religious communities and to other entities that may perform activities in the public interest (e.g. education, social activities, etc.). It is exactly these relationships between the cited articles of the Constitution that prohibit, therefore, the state from providing any religious community with a more favourable position as far as religious activities are concerned, whereas these provisions enable religious communities to act freely and equally, because such constitutes the collective expression of the exercise of the religious freedom of each individual.
5. These are the reasons I voted for Point 1 of the operative provisions.
6. The [state] funding of religious communities shows most apparently whether the legislature ensured such equality. I agree with the majority that Article 20 of the LSRCA and the third paragraph of Article 29 of the RFA are consistent with the Constitution and I voted for Point 3 of the operative provisions. I am also for the most part convinced with the reasons set out in section B – IV of the Decision. In particular, in my opinion the connection between these two Articles and Article 5 of the RFA adequately is explained in Paragraph 129 of the reasoning. This refers to [state] funding due to the generally beneficial purpose [of such communities], as determined in Article 5 of the RFA. The Constitutional Court states that there are two elements that must be fulfilled at the same time. The first is spiritual, the second cultural, educational, didactic, philanthropic, charitable, and other activities in the scope of the social state. The Constitutional Court particularly emphasises in Paragraph 130 of the reasoning that funding religious communities is not an obligation of the state. It also states that the state may provide financial support to religious communities while respecting the equality of religious communities, if this is not contrary to the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities.

4 See in particular Paragraphs 108, 109, and 110 of the reasoning of the decision, and also Paragraphs 95, 98, 99, and 102.

7. It is exactly the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities that separates religious spiritual care (religious activity) from other generally beneficial activities performed by religious communities. Therefore, this principle is violated if the state employs a religious official, as is specifically determined in the Act in the third and fourth paragraph of Article 24 and the second paragraph of Article 25. The Constitutional Court abrogated these provisions in Point 4 of the operative provisions.<sup>5</sup> I agree with such decision and I voted for it. However, the provision of that part of the third paragraph of Article 24, which in addition to employment also ensures that different remuneration is provided for work performed remains unclear. If such refers only to religious spiritual care, also this part of the provision is unconstitutional, which is not included in the operative part of the Decision, and I do not agree with the reasoning.<sup>6</sup> In accordance with the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution, the core of the separation of the state and religious communities is that the state does not pay religious communities to provide services connected to religious activities. Payment for such services entails that the state also directly encourages the activities of a certain religious community with public funds and by state aid it enables such to secure a peculiar privileged position that it should not enjoy in a modern secular state. Whether such payment is given to the religious community directly or indirectly in the form of employing priests to perform such tasks is of secondary importance.
8. In addition, it must be emphasised that it is questionable also from the point of view of the religious communities themselves if the performance of religious activities is understood as some sort of a commercial service that is carried out only in the event of payment for its performance. This is in particular true if for the performance of such the state must pay with public funds. The fundamental starting point must remain the conceptual interpretation of the Constitution that the religious activities of the religious communities are carried out for the adherents of such religious communities regardless whether the state pays for them. Therefore, it cannot be considered that such funding is a part of the (admissible) positive obligations of the state resulting from Article 41 of the Constitution.

5 In relation to employing priests in prisons, hospitals, and social welfare institutions providing institutional care.

6 Paragraph 146 of the reasoning of the Decision.

9. For these reasons I also voted against Point 7 of the operative provisions, in which the Constitutional Court found that Articles 22 and 23 of the RFA are not inconsistent with the Constitution even to the extent to which regarding funding religious spiritual care in the Army they refer to the regulations of military service and national defence (Article 22) and to which regarding the Police they refer to the regulations issued by the Minister of the Interior (Article 23). The applicant in particular pointed out the violation of Articles 87 and 120 of the Constitution, as a law should determine “the organisation and conditions” for the exercise of the right determined in Articles 22 and 23.<sup>7</sup> The third paragraph of Article 52 of the Defence Act namely leaves the regulation of this issue to the Minister of Defence, who issued the Rules on the Organisation of Religious Spiritual Care [in the military].<sup>8</sup> It is determined in Article 3 of these Rules that such care is organised by the Chaplaincy of the Slovene Armed Forces, headed by the chief military chaplain. The military personnel in this chaplaincy consist of the chief chaplain, the deputy chief chaplain, the assistant to the chief chaplain, a military chaplain, and a pastoral assistant, in accordance with the regulations on employment in the Armed Forces of the Republic of Slovenia.<sup>9</sup> This issue is regulated similarly also by the Rules on the Organisation and the Manner of Provision of Religious Spiritual Care in the Police.<sup>10</sup> In accordance with Article 3 of these Rules, religious care is organised by an employee of the General Police Directorate (first paragraph). A detailed description of the duties and obligations of such employee of the General Police Directorate is determined in the act on the internal organisation and classification of job positions (third paragraph). Such, also in this instance, entails the employment of religious officials in the Police.
10. By such decision, the Constitution created an unequal position of two categories of subjects for which there is no sound reason. This part of the two provisions should also be abrogated. Since the operative provision is a uniform one and refers to the text of the Article as a whole, I voted against Point 7 of the operative provisions as a whole, although the text of the cited Articles, inasmuch as they ensure the right to religious spiritual care, are in themselves consistent with the Constitution. However, the freedom of religious spiritual care of these subjects follows clearly also from other provisions of the RFA, such that the special regulation determined in Articles 22 and 23 is, in my opinion, intended only for referral to the special regulation of the Army and Police and consequently to the funding of religious activities (as well).
11. However, I do agree with the regulation stemming from the provisions on the social state determined in Article 2 of the Constitution that religious communities can apply for the right to financial support from the state for the payment of the social security contributions of religious officials for whom such is their only occupation. And yet even at this point the legislature fails to respect the principle of equality.

7 Paragraph 41 of the request.

8 Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia, No. 58/03 - the Rules.

9 Similar provisions are contained in the Agreement between the Slovene Bishops' Conference and the Government of the Republic of Slovenia on Spiritual Care for Military Personnel in the Slovene Armed Forces.

10 Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia No. 72/07 - the Rules.

The legislature namely decided on “reasonable proportionality”, a condition which is allegedly fulfilled if a ratio of at least 1,000 adherents of the registered church or other religious community to one religious official of such is established. This entails that even the registered smaller religious communities will not have the right to the payment by the state of the social security contributions of a religious official of such community if they do not have at least 1,000 adherents. The applicant specifically alleges the unconstitutionality of this provision in Paragraph 21 of the request and in my opinion provides sufficiently clear arguments for such. The Constitutional Court did not overlook this allegation, as it did summarise the allegations from the request in Paragraph 21 of the reasoning of the Decision, but it did not review them later on. The applicant argues that such regulation constitutes illegal discrimination against smaller religious communities. Equality is allegedly violated by determining as a condition for the right to the payment of such contributions the number of adherents and not the work actually done. Therefore, I disagree with the omission of a review of the fourth paragraph of Article 27 of the RFA.

12. Furthermore, inequality is created by Article 33 of the RFA (Paragraphs 29 and 30 of the request) due to the fact that as a transitional provision it simply “runs over” the conditions determined in the other provisions of the Act. This is particularly true for the third paragraph. The regulation under the RFA therefore applies only to new religious communities, as Article 33 of the RFA allows the existing state of funding for all those that were registered with the Office of the Government of the Republic of Slovenia for Religious Communities on the day this Act came into force, regardless of its number of adherents. It is namely determined in the third paragraph of this Article that such applies “regardless of whether the church or other religious community fulfils the conditions determined in the fourth and fifth paragraphs of Article 27 of this Act, and regardless of whether such person fulfils the conditions determined in the first and second paragraph of Article 27 of this Act”.
13. I also cannot agree with the fact that the Constitutional Court in its decision does not pay any attention to the terminology of the Act, but follows the text of the Act without adding any special commentary. A legislature that wishes to respond to the requirements of Articles 41 and 7 of the Constitution must be very conscientious regarding the naming of the persons to whom it provides specific rights in relation to the performance of various religious practices. Article 7 of the RFA (“the Definitions”) determines in the second paragraph that a “religious official” is an adherent of a registered church or other religious community who in his religious community is dedicated exclusively and fully to religious-ritual, religious-educational, and religious-organisational activities in accordance with the regulations, rules, required qualifications, and powers of the supreme authority of his church or other religious community. If this is so, this designation should remain the same throughout the Act or the legislature should have explained why it used another term. Priests, monks, etc., as terms used by the legislature only in individual articles without an explanation of such (e.g. in the third and fourth paragraphs of Article 24, the second paragraph of Article 25, and the second paragraph of Article 27 of the RFA) may constitute a hidden inequality. In paragraph 40 of the request the applicant justifiably also warns about a violation of Article 2 of the Constitution, because the Act also links to this term various rights and thereby “causes insecurity and undermines legal certainty”.<sup>11</sup>

14. Finally, allow me to also mention Article 36 of the RFA: “This Act will enter into force fifteen days after its publication in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia and it shall begin to apply three months after entering into force, except for Article 27 of this Act, which will begin to apply on 1 January 2007”. The Act was published in the Official Gazette on 16 February 2007 and began to apply on 16 May 2007. Special comment on these provisions is probably not required.
15. In view of all of the above, I think that the RFA needs to be written anew and all the rights and obligations stemming from Articles 7 and 41 of the Constitution in conjunction with Articles 2, 14, and 15 of the Constitution must be determined with complete accuracy. And of course, it should be done with such clarity that its application will be possible already by using the rules of interpretation established in legal theory and practice, as one of the fundamental requirements of the principle of a state governed by the rule of law. I agree with the applicant that the RFA is unclear, that certain provisions are contradictory, and that the Act is terminologically not harmonised. Such conclusion is clear from the mere fact that the Constitutional Court too often referred to the legislature’s preparatory materials for the adoption of the Act regarding the interpretation of individual articles.<sup>12</sup> Without such a prop certain provisions could not even be understood.<sup>13</sup> Also for these reasons I believe that the Constitutional Court should not have omitted a review of the provisions referred to in this separate opinion or it should have rejected the request. It must not be overlooked that individual articles are so interconnected that the review (abrogation or establishment) of the unconstitutionality of only some of them leads only to further lack of clarity. However, I would like to emphasise that the legislature will have a sufficient foundation in this comprehensive Decision for reflecting upon which findings of the Constitutional Court are essential regarding the adoption of an Act that is consistent with the Constitution.<sup>14</sup>

- 11 It also argues that the Standard Classification of Professions does not use the term religious official, but only the occupation of religious professional (Paragraph 40 of the request). As an example, I myself wish to quote the Pension and Disability Insurance Act (Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia, No. 109/06), which in Article 15 under self-employed persons enumerates also priests and persons performing other religious work and in the last indent of Article 189 refers to priests, monks, nuns, or other persons in the religious community who professionally perform religious work.

DECISION

At a session held on 15 January 1998 in proceedings to decide upon the constitutional complaint of IDZ-DDI [Istrski Demokratski Zbor – Dieta Democratica Istriana], after a public hearing held on 12 January 1998, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. Supreme Court Judgment No. U-1262/95, dated 12 September 1996, and Decision of the Ministry of the Interior No. 0001-2/1-S-28/533-95, dated 17 July 1995, are annulled.
2. The fourth paragraph of Article 3 of the Political Parties Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 62/94) is abrogated.

*ReasoningA

1. By the Decision dated 17 July 1995, the Ministry of the Interior (hereinafter referred to as the Ministry) rejected the complainant's application for registration in the register of political parties. By its Judgment dated 12 September 1996, the Supreme Court rejected the complainant's lawsuit in the proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts. The complainant believes that the challenged decision violates its right to equality before the law, its right of association, and its acquired rights. The complainant states that it had already been entered into the register of political organisations before the Political Parties Act was adopted. According to the complainant, the finding of the Supreme Court and the Ministry that a part of the party's programme was unconstitutional is unacceptable. The complainant, as a political party, is seeking redress for injustices which were inflicted upon those individuals who lived on the territory of the Slovene part of Istria during the post-war period. The complainant has fought for the recognition of the continuity of Slovene citizenship of these persons, the return of their property, and the recognition of all other rights that derive from their civic status, i.e. including the right of domicile. In particular, the complainant asserts that its right to equality before the law has been violated because it was prevented from being registered in the register of political parties despite having already been registered as a political organisation in the same way as other parties that, in contrast, did not have any problems with registration. According to the complainant, the decisions of the Supreme Court and the Ministry resulted from an arbitrary interpretation of part of the party's programme and the completely unsubstantiated designation of this programme as unconstitutional. The complainant argues that the right of association has been violated because the party's completely legitimate programme, i.e. the fight to redress injustices suffered by persons who lived on the territory of the Slovene part of Istria, is being misinterpreted to its detriment, thereby preventing a group of people from organising themselves in an association in order to seek redress of injustices. In its opinion, the acquired rights of the complainant have been violated by denying it, as a political organisation, the right to continuity and the right to exist as a political group.

2. In its Decision, the registration authority (the Ministry) found that the complainant's political programme, according to which "the party will endeavour to secure immigration priority for those persons who have left Istria as political or economic emigrants, and their descendants and relatives ...", is contrary to the provisions of Article 12 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and Article 32 of the Constitution regarding freedom of movement and the freedom to choose one's place of residence. Furthermore, it was established in the Decision that the provision of Article 14 of the Constitution on equality before the law irrespective of personal circumstances had also been violated. Therefore, on the basis of Articles 13 and 33 of the Political Parties Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 62/94 – hereinafter referred to as the PPA), the registration authority rejected the complainant's application for registration in the register of political parties on the grounds that it had not fulfilled the condition of the fourth paragraph of Article 3 of the PPA. In the reasoning of the Decision, the party's name (i.e. simply the translation of the name of a foreign party) was also found to be inconsistent with the law, and that amendments to the party's Statute were not adopted by the authorised body (i.e. not by the party's assembly or its council but, in fact, by its extended executive committee). These statements were, however, written as findings in relation to the party's complaints against an alleged delay in the proceedings, and not as justification for refusing the application for the registration.
3. In the challenged Judgment, the Supreme Court stated that the principal condition for registering a party in the register is determined by the fourth paragraph of Article 3 of the PPA. If this condition is not fulfilled, the registration authority must refuse the application for the registration. Moreover, according to the Supreme Court, the programme objective that accords immigration priority to the former inhabitants of a specific part of the country (Istria), or their descendants and relatives, is unconstitutional because it placed these persons in an unequal (i.e. privileged) position when compared to persons who had emigrated from other areas of Slovenia for the same (political or economic) reasons. However, Article 14 of the Constitution does not permit such different treatment. In the opinion of the Supreme Court, it is irrelevant to the refusal of the application for registration in the register of political parties whether such programme objective is also contrary to any other constitutional right, or whether, in addition to a party's intention to be engaged in unconstitutional activities, there exists any additional statutory restriction on registering the political party in the register.

4. By the Order dated 2 December 1996, the panel of the Constitutional Court accepted the constitutional complaint for consideration and, upon the complainant's petition, issued a temporary injunction according to which no legal consequences resulting from the final decision on the refusal of registration should arise for the complainant until a final decision is adopted.
5. In the proceedings to decide on the constitutional complaint, acting on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 59 in conjunction with Article 30 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), the Constitutional Court initiated proceedings for a review of the constitutionality of the provisions of the PPA, on which the challenged Judgment is based.
6. Regarding the disputed statutory regulation, the Secretariat of the National Assembly for Legislation and Legal Matters explains that the relevant subject matter is regulated by the PPA and the CCA. The former determines the rules that apply in the establishment and registration procedures, and the latter regulates the manner in which the unconstitutionality of the acts and activities of political parties is determined after a party has already begun to operate as such. The Secretariat deems that Article 160 of the Constitution and Article 68 of the CCA do not grant the Constitutional Court direct power to decide in the procedure for establishing a political party before the party is registered. Such was the reason for the refusal of the initial proposal for a regulation, according to which the registration authority had the authority to suspend a registration procedure and request a Constitutional Court decision whenever it deemed that the submitted acts of a political party were unconstitutional. The Secretariat further deems that the registration procedure includes regular procedural rules for exercising rights or freedoms and, at the same time, respects the judicial protection of human rights and freedoms and the right to a legal remedy. In the Secretariat's opinion, the provision of the fourth paragraph of Article 3 of the PPA is somewhat imprecise in the part that reads as follows: "or it nevertheless intends to operate unconstitutionally, or has already been operating in such way". However, it is allegedly only possible to understand this provision in the context of the whole text, and, in the opinion of the Secretariat, it is therefore not unconstitutional.

B – I

7. Owing to the painful historical experience endured by Slovene society during the former totalitarian system, the historical mission of the Slovene Constitution also included its fundamental aim – to prevent any attempt to restore a totalitarian regime. The right of free association constitutes one of the fundamental constitutional values that must be afforded particular respect and consistently implemented. This is even more important due to the fact that, after assuming power in 1945, the communist regime fictitiously assured freedom of association, including the establishment of political parties and their freedom to pursue their activities, on the constitutional level and also through statutory regulation; however, in reality, the communist authorities completely suppressed the activities of opposition parties through repressive measures, thereby excluding them from the political process. In its Decision Od-IUS I, 102, the Constitutional Court already established that the then government had prevented political parties from carrying out their activities after the war, and that, contrary to the legal order in force at that time, it had removed political opponents using pseudo-legal proceedings and distorted legal remedies. The prevention and suppression of the opposition was not only inconsistent with the Constitution in force at that time but also explicitly unlawful, and resulted in a permanent and severe violation of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

8. The Communist Party used the political system to deal with the bourgeois opposition and subordinate its wartime political allies. The party in power used judicial proceedings against the potential opposition. The main purpose of politically motivated proceedings was to deal with class enemies and confiscate their property. These politically motivated judicial proceedings shared many of the characteristics of show trials instigated by Stalin. Politicians viewed the courts as their “battle agency” who fought the class enemy (Zdenko Čepič et al., Ključne značilnosti slovenske politike v letih 1929 do 1955: Znanstveno poročilo [Basic Characteristics of Slovene Politics between 1929 and 1955: A Scientific Report], Inštitut za novejšo zgodovino, Ljubljana 1995, p. 89). By March 1945, the Politburo of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Slovenia had already decided (J. Vodušek Starič, Prevzem oblasti [Assuming the Power], pp. 170, 331) that it would not allow the restoration of political parties in Slovenia but would instead preserve the unity of the Liberation Front (unlike, for example, in Serbia where Grol’s Democratic Party, the Radicals, Jovanović’s Peasant Party, etc., operated). The OZNA [the Department of National Security] monitored the relationships between these politicians and the leaders of parties abroad (J. Vodušek Starič, Prevzem oblasti, pp. 164–169). A series of events, such as the fate of the Tito-Šubašić Agreement, electoral manipulation (manipulation of electoral registers), the resignation first of the deputy, M. Grola, and then the Minister of Foreign Affairs, I. Šubašić (ibidem, pp. 331, 351, 353), as well as the presence of OZNA at polling stations (ibidem, p. 364), all indicated that there was no future for political parties in Yugoslavia. Nevertheless, attempts were made in Ljubljana at that time to increase interparty connections and contacts with the Yugoslav opposition, with OZNA monitoring events closely – it designated smaller opposition groups by a common name: the “reaction” (ibidem, pp. 351–352). In order to combat the internal enemy, OZNA created a special service – Section II, which included the notorious Subsection 2, which was responsible for the fight against the interior reaction that also included the so-called remnants of bourgeois political parties (J. Pučnik, Iz arhivov slovenske politične policije [From the Archives of Slovene Political Police], Veda, Ljubljana 1996).<sup>1</sup> The post-war Yugoslav authorities strived

1 Among the first Slovene politicians who were charged collectively were the politicians of Mladina JNS [the

to prevent domestic Yugoslav and Slovene politicians from establishing contact with politicians who emigrated in 1945 or remained abroad.<sup>2</sup>

9. Immediately after the end of the Second World War, the Slovene political elite demanded that the UDV [the State Security Administration] carry out detailed monitoring of the activities of all political parties in Slovenia. After a first wave of brutal methods, the UDV began to apply significantly subtler methods: multiple interrogations, psychological pressure, threats of court action, blackmail with pressure on family members, professional colleagues, or friends, tailing, and, in particular, the denunciation among people belonging to the same group, ideology, or party, which was referred to as differentiation (J. Vodušek Starič, Prevzem oblasti po vojni in vloga OZNE - obračun [Assuming the Power after the War and the Role of the OZNA - Settlement of Accounts], in: Slovenija v letu 1945, Zbornik referatov [Slovenia in 1945, Collection of Papers], Zveza zgodovinskih društev Slovenije, 1996, pp. 93–110). In this regard, the UDV was influencing or directing activities within specific groups and, at the same time, informing its superiors and leading political fora (the Central Committee of the Slovene Communist Party, the Politburo, and the Supreme Committee of the Liberation Front) of the activities and atmosphere in the former political groups, church circles, ministries, etc. (ibidem, p. 96).
10. The UDBA [Translator's note: UDBA is the Serbian translation of UDV, i.e. the State Security Administration.] [the State Security Administration] and the Slovene Communist Party perceived Christian Socialism as a threat. In 1949 the UDBA carried out two reports on Christian Socialism, and began to closely monitor the activities of individuals from the Christian-Socialist group (ibidem, p. 100). They had been gathering information on Kocbek from 1946 onwards (ibidem, p. 101). In 1951, the Slovene Party leadership decided to "eliminate" the Faculty of Theology from the university. On 20 January 1952, they poured gasoline on Ljubljana's Archbishop, Anton Vovk, and set fire to him when he was on his way to Novo Mesto (ibidem, p. 107). At the Party's plenary meeting, in 1952, the then Minister of the Interior and a member of Vodušek Starič, Prevzem oblasti, p. 415; Vodušek Starič, Dosje Mačkovšek [The Mačkovšek File], pp. 15, 33, 42, 52). Before the elections to the Slovene Constitutional Assembly, connections between the Slovene opposition and the opposition-circles in Zagreb and Belgrade had been established (L. Sirc, Med Hitlerjem in Titom [Between Hitler and Tito]; CZ, Ljubljana 1992, pp. 253, 257–9, 269, 273); because of these attempts the Nagode-Furlan group was also put on trial in 1947 (L. Sirc, Sodba [The Judgment], pp. 471–505). In a series of smaller scale judicial proceedings, some leading politicians were tried, such as Dr Jože Pučnik, one of the leading politicians of the JNS, in 1946, Vinko Vrhunec (J. Vodušek Starič, Dosje Mačkovšek, pp. 23, 43), and others. All these proceedings were prepared by the OZNA, which also interrogated the accused (J. Vodušek Starič, Prevzem oblasti, p. 257).

- 2 Those were led by Dr Miha Krek, who founded the multiparty Slovene National Committee in Rome (J. Vodušek Starič, Prevzem oblasti, p. 342). In order to prevent these contacts, the OZNA or UDBA also kidnapped some of these politicians in Trieste or Zone A of the Free Territory of Trieste: Dr Albin Šmajd (a member of the Slovene National Committee in Rome) at the beginning of 1946 (J. Vodušek Starič, Dosje Mačkovšek, p. 53), Andrej Uršič in 1947 (J. Vodušek Starič, Dosje Mačkovšek, p. 35), and others. These individuals have never been tried; they disappeared without a trace.

the Politburo, Boris Kraigher, considered lawyers, various writers, artists, and scientists, who were considered to be Catholic (the Academy of Sciences, the University, Institutes, in particular those with a humanistic orientation), and “the espionage centre of our predominantly bourgeois emigrants in Trieste and Klagenfurt” to constitute reactionary circles, i.e. those “who represent, in my opinion, the most dangerous attempt to organise activities directed against us” (ibidem, p. 108). On 19 July 1952, the Slovene UDV prepared a plan of proceedings to be initiated against Dr Jakob Šolar, a member of the Slovene Academy of Sciences and Arts. They accused him of treason (ibidem, p. 110). The arrest was thoroughly prepared by the Committee for the Remnants of Bourgeois Parties (RBP) of the Slovene UDV. On 24 November 1952, the UDBA first arrested Dr Janez Fabijan and then, on 11 December 1952, Dr Jakob Šolar, for their alleged intention to destroy the state and the social order of the Federal People’s Republic of Yugoslavia (FPRY) (ibidem, p. 111). The court sentenced Dr Šolar to ten years and Dr Fabijan to six years in prison. During that time, Edvard Kocbek was relieved of all his political offices (ibidem, p. 113). This concluded the fight against the Christian Socialists as a political group.

B – II

11. The right of assembly and association referred to in Article 42 of the Constitution is a fundamental human right that allows for the free expression of opinion, the formation of political will, and self-organisation. The right of association, which also encompasses the right to establish political parties and that they carry out their activities, is the starting-point of a multiparty political system, without which a free democratic society cannot exist.
12. A free democratic society is a constitutional system, which, by excluding any violence and arbitrariness, represents the social order of a state governed by the rule of law based on the self-determination of its people according to the will of the majority, freedom, and equality. In addition, at least the following key predispositions have to be included among the underlying principles of such an order: respect for human rights as determined by the Constitution, an individual’s right to life, the inviolability of personality rights, the sovereignty of the people, the separation of powers, the accountability of the Government and the lawfulness of the activities of the executive branch of power, the independence of the courts, a multiparty political system, and equal opportunities for all political parties, including the right to establish an opposition and participate in it according to the Constitution. These principles were expressed in point V of the Declaration of Independence, which was adopted by the first democratic parliament on 25 June 1991 (Official Gazette RS-I, No. 1/91).
13. A system of legally determined rules of conduct established on the basis of the aforementioned principles during the course of a long period of historical development in accordance with the democratic heritage of the European legal civilisation ensures the functioning of the free democratic system. Political freedom of opinion, expression, the formation of political will and association, which is guaranteed in various ways, leads to a multiparty system and an organised political opposition.

Free elections held at relatively short intervals guarantee that people have control over the use of power by the political majority. The government is accountable to the parliament. The implementation of the principle of the separation of powers, which ensures that the different branches of power check and balance each other, prevents an excessive concentration of power in one place within the state. Every citizen is provided a sphere of freedom of conduct through the recognition of fundamental human rights and extensive protection ensured by independent courts. The protection of the entire system is above all entrusted to the Constitutional Court.

14. As a free social order may also be jeopardised due to its openness and the fact that it guarantees various types of rights, freedoms, and influences, its protection against forces that may seriously threaten its fundamental values, fundamental order, and rules of conduct is justified. A constitutional or statutory limitation of the right to free association constitutes a very sensitive interference with fundamental constitutional freedoms, which may only be justified through the protection of the free democratic society as a whole. In this respect, a statute cannot go beyond the limitations determined by the third paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution – i.e. for reasons of national security (if an association is acting against the constitutional order, the state's territorial integrity, and sovereignty) or public safety – or if such is necessary for the protection of the rights of others (the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution).
15. The essential element of every association is a common purpose reflected in the fundamental constitutive acts of the association: a statute or programme. The constitutionality of the association's activities is assessed according to the decisions and actions of its bodies or members. When defining the concept of “unconstitutional activity” tolerance is required. It is not sufficient for an association to reject, contradict, or not recognise the constitutional order. Active operation with the intention of destroying (eliminating) the existing constitutional order is required. Mere criticism, regardless of whether it is real and substantiated, is not enough. A serious threat to the underlying principles of a free democratic society has to be established.
16. Owing to the special significance of political parties for the existence of a free democratic state, it is not possible to exclude them from political life as long as they employ legal means to fight specific regulations or even specific constitutional institutions. Such exclusion is only permitted if these parties intend to undermine the fundamental values of a free democratic constitutional state.
17. Political parties have to be guaranteed freedom of establishment, with regard to their programmes, the pursuit of their activities, and the exertion of influence on the formation of political will. The state has to guarantee the effective implementation of these predispositions; in other respects, however, it must abstain from interfering with or influencing the sphere of political parties.
18. Compared to other associations, political parties have a special position because only the Constitutional Court may decide that their activities are unconstitutional (the tenth indent of the first paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution). This so-called parties' privilege protects the existence of a party until the Constitutional Court es-establishes the unconstitutionality of its acts or activities. By a decision the Constitutional Court abrogates the unconstitutional act of a political party or prohibits its unconstitutional activities (the third paragraph of Article 68 of the CCA). The establishment of the unconstitutionality of acts or activities does not, however, simultaneously entail that the party must be removed from the register, i.e. prohibited from operating. Pursuant to the fourth paragraph of Article 68 of the CCA, the Constitutional Court must decide on that issue separately by a two-thirds majority vote of all judges. The first indent of the first paragraph of Article 17 of the PPA may therefore only be interpreted in such a way that a mere decision on the unconstitutionality of an act of a political party, without a special order of removal from the register, cannot constitute the basis for removing a party from the register.

19. Therefore, there is no doubt that only the Constitutional Court can decide on the prohibition of the functioning of a political party (i.e. its removal from the register), by a two-thirds majority vote of all the judges, provided it finds that the acts or activities of the party contradict the Constitution so severely that the mere abrogation of the unconstitutional act or the prohibition of the unconstitutional activity does not suffice, and it is necessary to eliminate the party from political life.
20. It is evident from the legislative procedure and the statements made by the National Assembly representative at the public hearing that the intention underlying the inclusion of the fourth paragraph of Article 3 in the PPA was primarily to prohibit the registration of political parties whose acts or activities were unconstitutional. In this way, the Act determined a substantive condition for the registration of a party, the fulfilment of which is decided on by administrative authorities.
21. An affected party has the possibility to initiate proceedings for judicial review of administrative acts and to lodge a constitutional complaint against a registration authority's decision on the refusal of the party's registration (as the petitioner did in the case at issue). In constitutional complaint proceedings, if paragraph 4 of Article 3 of the PPA were still applicable, the Constitutional Court could also have considered whether the acts and activities of the association were really unconstitutional. However, the question that was raised is whether it is constitutionally admissible for the administrative authority to decide on the fulfilment of such substantive constitutional conditions for the establishment of a political party, as such could entail that the establishment and activities of a party were unacceptably dependent on the prior authorisation of an administrative authority.
22. A registered party cannot be impeded in its political activities until the Constitutional Court, which is the only authority that can prohibit a party's activities, reaches a decision on such. As a result, administrative interference with the existence of a political party is excluded, regardless of how hostile its actions are with regard to a free democratic constitutional order. In this way, the activities of each party are allowed to continue until their unconstitutionality is established in order to guarantee the highest possible degree of political freedom. A party still operates within the framework of the constitutionally admissible tolerance, even if it propagates aims that are hostile (contrary) to the Constitution in a constitutionally admissible manner.

23. The refusal to register a party due to the alleged unconstitutionality of its acts or its allegedly intended unconstitutional activities is, in terms of its content, the same as the prohibition of the functioning of the party. If an administrative authority establishes the unconstitutionality of a party's act, it must refuse its registration. However, the Constitutional Court has the possibility to initially only abrogate a specific unconstitutional act without also ordering, at the same time, the removal of the party from the register. Furthermore, the Constitutional Court may prohibit a specific activity of the party without ordering, at the same time, its removal from the register.
24. According to the PPA, a political party is an association of individuals organised with the intention of realising their political aims. It is left to the founders of an association to define it as a political party. Yet the PPA prescribes the mandatory registration of political parties. In this way, a political party becomes a legal entity, and only from the day of its registration may it commence operation as a political party (the first paragraph of Article 3 and the third paragraph of Article 12 of the PPA). This entails that a political party is created on the day of its establishment but that it cannot operate as such until its registration, except in proceedings and activities intended for its registration (including its active standing to lodge legal remedies against a decision to refuse registration). The registration authority issues an administrative decision on the registration of a party in the register (the first paragraph of Article 12 and Article 13 of the PPA). In such a decision, the registration authority may merely establish whether a political party has met the formal conditions prescribed by statute; however, only the Constitutional Court may decide on the fulfilment of the substantive conditions, i.e. on the conformity of the acts and activities of a political party with the Constitution.
25. As a political party comes into existence before its registration, the Constitutional Court may, pursuant to Article 68 of the CCA, also decide on the unconstitutionality of its acts during the period between its establishment and its registration, provided a petition or request for such a review is submitted (e.g. a request by the Government as an applicant who may submit a request pursuant to Article 23 of the CCA). If the party had already been entered into the register by the time the Constitutional Court decision was reached, the Constitutional Court could also have ordered its removal from the register on the basis of the fourth paragraph of Article 68 of the CCA; however, only if it had found that the party's acts exceed the limits of constitutionally admissible tolerance (particularly in the sense of Paragraphs 14, 15 and 22) to the extent that the mere abrogation of the unconstitutional parts of these acts would not suffice, and that the party has to be eliminated immediately from the legal order. If by the time the Constitutional Court reached a decision the party had not yet been registered, in such an extreme case, the Constitutional Court could have applied the fourth paragraph of Article 68 of the CCA mutatis mutandis to prohibit its registration, instead of ordering its removal from the register. Certainly, such extreme cases in which the contents of a party's acts would require the immediate use of the strictest measure possible are less probable. In all other cases, the Constitutional Court has the possibility, pursuant to the third paragraph of Article 68 of the CCA, to merely abrogate a party's unconstitutional acts or their parts, and to prohibit the party, perhaps even in advance, from operating in such a direction as indicated by these acts, especially if the party or its members had already unlawfully begun such activities before its registration, when their party activities were still prohibited.

26. In the case at issue, the registration authority had decided on the question of the constitutionality of the programme as a condition for registration on the basis of the statutory provision that the Constitutional Court abrogated as unconstitutional. Therefore, the challenged individual acts had to be annulled. The registration authority will have to decide again on the application of the complainant for registration in the register of political parties, without taking into account the abrogated fourth paragraph of Article 3 of the PPA. It will be allowed to review only the fulfilment of the formal statutory conditions and, if it finds that these are fulfilled, it will have to register the party.
27. It was necessary to abrogate the fourth paragraph Article 3 of the PPA in the part where this statutory provision refers to the administrative registration of a party, on the grounds that have been explained in the previous paragraphs of this reasoning. If only the words "must not be registered (either)" were abrogated in this statutory provision, the prohibition would still apply to the activities of parties which "advocate violence, the subversion of the constitutional order, or request the separation of some part of Slovenia, or intend to operate or have already been operating unconstitutionally." This statutory prohibition had to be abrogated because the first part thereof was not consistent with the hierarchy of values as established by the Constitution and the second part thereof was not sufficiently clear and could, with such a sensitive topic, easily lead to an erroneous understanding of which political parties' activities are really prohibited, which political parties' activities may be prohibited by the Constitutional Court with a decision pursuant to Article 68 of the CCA, or which activities would cause the Constitutional Court to order the removal of a party from the register. More specifically, a party, as has already been stated above in Paragraph 22, "operates within the framework of the constitutionally admissible tolerance, even if it propagates aims that are hostile (contrary) to the Constitution in a constitutional manner." Article 63 of the Constitution is the only constitutional provision that explicitly declares incitement to national, racial, religious, or other discrimination, and the inflaming of national, racial, religious, or other hatred or intolerance, and incitement to violence and war, as unconstitutional; however the aforementioned statutory provision has chosen to only include "the propagation of violence" in its wording and, instead of the other unconstitutional activities determined by Article 63 of the Constitution, refers to the propagation of the subversion of the constitutional order and the request for the secession of part of Slovenia, and therefore the first part of the statutory provision is inconsistent with the constitutional hierarchy of values. The issue of whether, on the basis of the aforementioned criteria, some other political party activity of this kind could be and should be prohibited as unconstitutional or whether the removal of the political party from the register should be ordered due to such activity, is to be, according to the Constitution, decided on by the Constitutional Court in concrete cases. For these reasons, the fourth paragraph of Article 3 of the PPA had to be abrogated in its entirety.

28. In the opinion of the Supreme Court the part of the IDZ programme that reads as follows: “The party will endeavour to secure immigration priority to those persons who had left Istria as political or economic emigrants, as well as their descendants and relatives” is contrary to Article 14 of the Constitution, because it places some individuals (i.e. political and economic emigrants from the territory of Istria) in an unequal, i.e. privileged, position when compared to persons who had emigrated from other parts of Slovenia for political or economic reasons.
29. The prohibition of the functioning of the complainant as a political party is therefore based on the assessment that a single sentence from its programme declaration was unconstitutional. Such a decision is unacceptable from the start. If such a programme provision were found to be unconstitutional, the Constitutional Court could also merely abrogate it, without ordering, at the same time, the removal of the party from the register. The review of the unconstitutionality of the acts and activities of the complainant as a political party is not a subject of review in these constitutional complaint proceedings; however, it could be the subject of review in the proceedings pursuant to Article 68 of the CCA, if and when they are initiated.

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE DR UDE

1. I voted for the operative provisions of the Decision because I believe that the fourth paragraph of Article 3 of the Political Parties Act is contrary to the Constitution insofar as it allows an administrative authority to review the constitutionality of the acts and activities of a political party during the procedure for the party’s registration. Only a decision of the Constitutional Court may abrogate an unconstitutional act of a political party or prohibit a party’s unconstitutional activities. For this reason, it was also necessary to annul Supreme Court of the Republic of Slovenia Judgment No. U 1262/95 and Decision of the Ministry of the Interior No. 0001-2/1-S-28/533-95. I do not agree, however, with the reasoning of the Decision, especially the reasoning in Paragraphs 7 to 10, under Section B – I of the Decision. The point of this reasoning is to establish that after the Second World War the regime in power introduced a one-party system.

2. I believe that this part of the reasoning is irrelevant for the Decision of the Constitutional Court because it has no direct link with its content. Such a part of the reasoning is also rare in constitutional decisions, and it would be difficult to find a decision of another constitutional court that would consider issues that were not the subject of discussion and decision-making to such an extent and through such extensive citing of historical sources. In fact, none of the participants to the proceedings referred to a historical evaluation of the period after the Second World War or the regime in power at that time, which was undoubtedly undemocratic and responsible for gradually establishing a one-party system. The mentioned part of the Decision is solely the contribution of the Constitutional Court to the discussion on the issue of the registration of political parties. As such, it is also part of a general heated discussion that is currently ongoing in our country. It could also be viewed as support to a specific political group.

In relation to this issue, it would, in my opinion, have been possible to only briefly establish that the registration of political parties and the assessment of the unconstitutionality of their acts and activities is a particularly sensitive issue in our legal system, because the experiences of Slovene society with political association in the past, i.e. before the Second World War and thereafter, were not democratic.

3. A more comprehensive discussion of these historical experiences might also have been relevant if there was a risk in our society that the state authorities would attempt to introduce a one-party system by prohibiting some parties or not registering them in the register of political parties. It is evident that none of the participants in the proceedings considered that risk. Why should historical evaluations then be included in the reasoning of the judicial decision?
4. If, however, history is being discussed, the experiences of Slovene society with the pre-war political system were also not democratic. In the Kingdom of Yugoslavia in 1920, an Obznana [public pronouncement] was adopted that prohibited the workers' party. In 1931, the Electoral Act prohibited the activities of political groups that did not enjoy royal support. Article 13 of the Constitution of the Kingdom of Yugoslavia from 1931 prohibited association "on the basis of religion, tribal affiliation, or region for party and political purposes". Even this short sentence demonstrates that the political regime of the time did not even recognise nations, since it referred to tribal affiliation, and that the Istrski demokratski zbor – Dieta Democratica Istriana would not have had any possibilities to be registered or to pursue its activities. There was therefore no democratic system in place before the Second World War. To continuously emphasise the undemocratic nature of the political system after the Second World War, however, gives the impression that it was only after the war that the system departed from the previously democratic order and practice.

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE KRIVIC

I fully agree with the Decision and its reasoning. I am of the opinion, however, that only the first paragraph, i.e. Paragraph 7 of Section B – I belongs in the reasoning of this decision. The content of the three paragraphs that follow (i.e. Paragraphs 8–10) is certainly very interesting and substantively indisputable (e.g. how the post-war authorities suppressed political parties and, in general, any opposition); however, it does not actually serve any purpose in the reasoning of the present decision (i.e. that only the Constitutional Court, and not the Ministry of the Interior, may currently prohibit political parties in Slovenia by a two-thirds majority). In my opinion, this could be likened to the situation where in a present-day decision on the protection of the constitutional right to private property it would be deemed necessary to first describe in the reasoning the historical details and interesting facts regarding how and through what means the post-war government destroyed private property, on the grounds that the person, to whom the decision is addressed, and other readers of the decision will only then sufficiently understand why it is necessary in the present-day political and constitutional system to consistently protect private property as a vital important constitutional right. In my opinion, such a “educational” approach underestimates the citizens and is, as such, questionable. A legal and historical analysis of the circumstances during and after the war was naturally necessary and had its purpose in cases where the Constitutional Court has decided and is still deciding on the constitutionality of various regulations applicable during and after the war, insofar as these are still currently applicable; in cases, such as the case at issue, however, an excessive description of the historical reminiscences may entirely needlessly raise various doubts as to the motives of such writing and I believe, as I have already stated, that this serves no purpose and is superfluous. In the case at issue it was found that the refusal to register the Istrski demokratski zbor [Istrian Democratic Assembly] on the grounds that one sentence in their programme was allegedly unconstitutional, was in fact unconstitutional in itself. In my opinion, it is entirely inappropriate to compare the conduct of the present day Ministry of the Interior – that was not a reflection of its political arbitrariness and systematic suppression of the opposition, but primarily a consequence of the implementation of an unconstitutional statutory provision – with the post-war brutality and suppression of the entire opposition, which was illegal even pursuant to the then applicable regulations. As a result, the attention is at least partially diverted from what is really important in this Decision in relation to the present time and circumstances.

Matevž Krivic

The operative provisions and the reasoning have my full support. This case represents one of the most important decisions of the Constitutional Court in recent years, as it is the first time that the Constitutional Court has exhaustively and convincingly defined the constitutional premises and principles of a free democratic society and the freedom of political association. The reasoning under Section B – I, Paragraphs 7 to 10, is apt, as it is the first Constitutional Court decision of its kind. Like other European constitutional courts, some of which have been adopting positions on previous totalitarian systems even decades since their removal (e.g. the German, Italian, Spanish, Czech, and Bulgarian constitutional courts), the Constitutional Court has done the same in specific cases on numerous occasions. Allow me to draw attention to the decisions in the following cases:

- OdlUS I 102, Official Gazette RS, No. 61/92 (U-I-69/92) – Peter Urbanc and others (Citizenship Act)
- OdlUS III 33, Official Gazette RS, No. 23/94 (U-I-6/93) – Public prosecutor of the Republic of Slovenia (Decree on Military Courts)
- OdlUS III 123, Official Gazette RS, No. 73/94 (U-I-172/94) – Supreme Court (the Petan case)
- OdlUS IV 20, Official Gazette RS, No. 18/95 (U-I-158/94) – the Deputies of the National Assembly
- OdlUS IV 54, Official Gazette RS, No. 41/95 (U-I-344/94) – Sergij V. Majhen (the Notary Act)
- OdlUS V, 31, Official Gazette RS, No. 24/96 (U-I-67/94) – Public prosecutor of the Republic of Slovenia (the Combating Illicit Trafficking, Illicit Speculation, and Economic Sabotage Act)
- OdlUS V 174, Official Gazette RS, No. 1/97 (U-I-107/96) – The Roman Catholic Diocese of Maribor and others, and in recent Decision U-I-25/95, dated 27 November 1997, Official Gazette RS, No. 5/98, dated 23 January 1998 – Miha Brejc and others (the Criminal Procedure Act – police tapping)

If there were no such decisions of the Constitutional Court in the Slovene constitutional and legal space (these decisions were published in the Official Gazette RS and in the annual official collected decisions and orders of the Constitutional Court), a casual observer might get the impression as though there had been no communist totalitarian system in Slovenia and that a democratic system had been in place after 1945, with individual excesses, which were more or less severe, and human rights violations.

In this separate opinion, I focus on some constitutional, comparative, and historical facts and positions in order to completely clarify the issues discussed in Decision No. Up-301/96.

Historical reasons that are based on the empirical generalisations from some countries of the European continent in the 20th century are of great importance for the restrictions imposed on intolerant groups or undemocratic political parties. Experience suggests that democracy can be overthrown, as was the case when Hitler came to power in the 1930s. Constitutional safeguards against political parties, the programmes and activities of which are contrary to the principles of a free democratic society, were incorporated into the constitutional system by the Federal Republic of Germany (second paragraph of Article 21 of the Basic Law from 1949) and the Italian Republic (Transitional Provision XII of the Italian Constitution from 1947). The Portuguese Republic imposed similar safeguards based on historical experiences (Article 46 of the Constitution from 1976).

Two typical cases on the prohibition of political parties and their activities from German constitutional case law

The German Federal Constitutional Court prohibited the Socialist Reich Party (Sozialistische Reichspartei – SRP), which was the national socialist party, and the German Communist Party (Kommunistische Partei Deutschlands – KPD) on 23 October 1952 and 17 August 1956, respectively. Both of the mentioned judgments on the prohibition of the right and left extremist political parties gave the German Federal Constitutional Court an opportunity to define the concept of a free democratic society and the concept of democracy in general. This definition namely allowed the German Constitutional Court to substantiate the key reasons for prohibiting their activities. In the judgment on the prohibition of the national socialist party SRP (BVerfGE, 2, 1 et seq.), the German Constitutional Court established the principle that, owing to the special significance of political parties for the existence of a free democratic state, their exclusion from political life is not possible if they employ legal means to fight specific regulations or even specific constitutional institutions. Such exclusion is only permitted if these parties intend to undermine the fundamental values of a free and democratic constitutional state. These fundamental values are integral to a free democratic fundamental system, which deems the constitution to be the foundation of the entire state system. The fundamental constitutional order is linked with values. It is the antithesis of a totalitarian state that, as the only authority, rejects human dignity, freedom, and equality. The claim made by the SRP's representative that there may be different free democratic constitutional orders is erroneous. That claim is based on the confusion between the concept of a free democratic fundamental system and the forms in which it can be implemented within a democratic state. In this way, a free democratic fundamental system can be determined as a system that, by excluding any violence and oppression, represents the social order of a state governed by the rule of law and based on the self-determination of the people in accordance with the will of the majority, freedom, and equality.

The judgment on the prohibition of the German communist party, the KPD (BVerfGE, 5, 85 et seq.), refers to this premise. A free democracy rejects the notion that historical development is determined by a final objective which can be scientifically determined, and that, as a result, this final objective also determines specific community decisions as steps towards the realisation of this objective. It is rather the people themselves who determine their own development through community decisions, and these decisions can only be made if absolute freedom is guaranteed. This further requires that every community member is free to be involved in the creation of community decisions. The freedom of community decision-making is only possible if community decisions (i.e., in practice, majority decisions) leave the greatest possible degree of freedom, in terms of content, to each individual. As to what must be done in practice is determined through a continuous dialogue between all the people and groups who participate in shaping social life. This struggle escalates into a fight for political power in the state. However, it is not limited only to such. During this fight for power, an underlying process of clarification and transformation of these ideas is taking place. The decisions that are finally adopted will certainly correspond more to the wishes and interests of one or another group or social class; the purpose of the regulation and the possibility of free agreement between all real and intellectual forces provided thereby serves to balance and protect everyone's interests. The welfare of the community cannot therefore be equated a priori with the interests and wishes of a particular class; in principle, it strives to promote the welfare of all the citizens more or less equally and an approximately equal distribution of burdens. The ideal of democratic society exists in the form of a state governed by the rule of law.

A state system with a free democracy must therefore be systematically oriented towards continuous adjustment and improvement and social compromise; in particular, it must prevent the abuse of power. Its function is essentially to leave all doors open for every possible solution and to always enforce the will of the actual majority of people regarding specific decisions; however, it must also force the majority to substantiate its decision before all the people, i.e. even before the minority. This is the purpose of the guiding principles of such a system as well as its specific institutions. The will of the majority is established on a case-by-case basis in a carefully regulated procedure. However, the majority's decision is preceded by demands made by the minority that are followed by open discussion, for which a free democratic system provides, desires, and supports several different possibilities, and offers such to the members of the minority with as little risk as possible. Since the majority can always change, minority opinions have a real chance of becoming relevant. As a result, it is possible to positively come to terms with the critique of what currently exists, i.e. dissatisfaction with people, institutions, and specific decisions, to a significant extent within the existing system. The finally adopted majority decision is always linked to the critique of the minority in the opposition and its creative cooperation and intellectual work. Since there exist different, even drastic, ways of expressing discontent and critique, the awareness of the majority that its position is fragile also forces it to consider, in principle, the interests of the minority.

The functioning of such system, its ability to ultimately ensure the community's welfare in a manner that is acceptable to all, is ensured through a system of rules of the game that was legally determined in advance and established on the basis of the described principles over a long period of historical development.

Political freedom of opinion, expression, and association, which is guaranteed in various ways, leads to a multiparty system and organised political opposition. Free elections held at relatively short intervals guarantee that the people have control over the use of power by the political majority. The government is accountable to the parliament. The implementation of the principle of the separation of powers, which ensures that the different branches of power check and balance each other, prevents an excessive concentration of power in one place within the state. The same aim is also pursued by the transfer of state functions from the central leadership to institutions which, in principle, assume responsibility for the performance of such functions. Citizens are guaranteed freedom not only by being granted fundamental rights but also by the extensive protection of their rights through independent courts. The protection of the entire system is above all entrusted to the constitutional court. As such a system, which is open and guarantees all kinds of freedoms and influence, is thus also a threatened system, it protects itself from forces which, in essence, deny its highest principles and ground rules, by way of provisions such as Articles 18 and 21 of the German Basic Law.

The dictatorship of the proletariat is not compatible with a free and democratic social order. Both government systems are mutually exclusive. In the KPD's opinion, a proletarian dictatorship represents the highest form of democracy. Such assessment depends on the conceptualisation and criteria applied. Evidently, the form of democracy that was to exist as a proletarian dictatorship is not a democracy in accordance with the principles of the German Basic Law (BVerfGE 5, 195–196). The aim of the KPD is to establish a form of government that is not compatible with the free democratic system of the Basic Law (BVerfGE 5, 207). Furthermore, the KPD is, in principle, hostile to a free and democratic system, which follows from a substantive and structural analysis of Marxism and Leninism (BVerfGE 5, 298 et seq.). Convincing evidence of the genuine opinion of the KPD regarding a free and democratic system is evident from the party's declarations, especially its political style and party tactics, which are clear from its agitation and propaganda (BVerfGE 5, 380).

These declaratory statements are an expression of planned incitement with the aim of overthrowing and eliminating the constitutional order. Their purpose is to undermine the trust of the people in fundamental values, and it is crucial that they do not entail individual aberrations but a systematic whole (BVerfGE 5, 384).

The prohibition of the German communist party was explicitly not extended to other dependent organisations, supporter movements, or organisations, which served as a disguise for its activities. More specifically, these organisations were not political parties and therefore did not enjoy the special protection afforded to political parties in the context of freedom of association. If such organisations violated the constitutional order, it would be necessary to apply the constitutional and statutory regulation of associations (BVerfGE 5, 392).

In its judgment on the prohibition of the SRP, the Federal Constitutional Court also found that the requirement for democracy within parties prohibits a party from organising itself in a way that would substantially deviate from democratic principles. If a party deviates from the fundamental principles of the democratic internal organisation of parties to such extent that it is only possible to interpret the deviation as the expression of an action that is, in principle, hostile to democracy, then a state of facts arises (especially, if other circumstances also confirm such orientation of a party) that justifies the establishment of the unconstitutionality and prohibition of a political party.

In its decision on the prohibition of both extremist political parties, the German Federal Constitutional Court ordered the dissolution of the neo-national-socialist party (SRP) as well as the communist party (KPD) and the confiscation of their assets for the benefit of the state. Furthermore, the court declared a prohibition on establishing any substitute organisations for both extremist political parties or any further activities of the existing organisations as substitute organisations. The judgment in the SRP case also resulted in the termination of their deputies' terms of office in the federal and state assemblies.

In the context of the above-mentioned constitutional premises and as a comparison with the prohibition of extremist political parties in the Federal Republic of Germany, an examination of the prohibition of the former Communist Party of Yugoslavia [hereinafter referred to as the CPY] could be interesting. The question that we are interested in is whether this prohibition withstands assessment in terms of the modern notion of the admissibility, or rather the inadmissibility, of political parties and their activities, in particular from the viewpoint of the present constitutional order and principles of a free and democratic social order.

On 29 December 1929 by the special public pronouncement No. 29282, known as the Obznana, the Council of Ministers of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes prohibited communist propaganda and communist organisations, their publications and any other document produced by those organisations that could breach the peace in and outside the state, or justify and approve of dictatorship, revolution or any violence. It further prohibited any calls for a general strike and demonstrations of a disruptive or disturbing nature during the Constitutional Assembly in Belgrade. In particular, it imposed the requirement for all weapons to be registered, announced drastic measures against riots designed to overthrow the government, determined that foreigners involved in riots would be deported, and dismissed all officials from the state services who spread Bolshevik propaganda in the country. Even students who were communists were deprived of financial support for their studies. A prohibition of any press that would diminish the importance of these measures was issued separately. The Council of Ministers explained that the then state authorities learned from reliable sources that disruptive elements were preparing an attack on the state, its structure, and social order with the intention to destroy – following the example of the Russian Bolsheviks – all its laws, institutions, and public and private goods, and to establish a proletarian dictatorship. It also referred to the then turbulent situation in the state and abroad, especially in Hungary and Czechoslovakia. Due to the announced general strike, which was to begin at the same time as the Constitutional Assembly in Belgrade and develop into a general riot, bloody revolution, and collapse, the Council of Ministers decided to act immediately.

Seven months later, on 1 August 1921, the Yugoslav Assembly adopted the Act of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes on the Protection of Public Security and State Order (Službene Novine Kraljevine SHS [Official Gazette of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes], No. 170 A, dated 3 August 1921). This Act represented the confirmation of the public pronouncement, dated 29 December 1920; the provisions of this Act were similar to the pronouncement in terms of content, but were legally more structured. It also included elements of criminal sanctions and determined criminal offences. It reiterated that members of communist parties were prohibited from being employed in public services; however, those affected could appeal against the minister's decision before the State Council. Types of conduct that constituted criminal offences under this Act were tried by judges in regular state courts on the basis of the judges' free assessment of the evidence.

Owing to the very long time that has passed since then, it is difficult to assess the situation that existed when the CPY was prohibited. In any event, this is primarily the task of the historical sciences. It is easier to carry out a constitutional review of the acts of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia. Article 1 of the Statute of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia from 1920 defined the aim of the CPY. It expressly stated that the aim of the CPY, as a member of the Communist International, was to completely liberate the working class and all the suppressed social classes of working people through uncompromising class struggle and the dictatorship of the proletariat and by establishing a communist order to replace its capitalist equivalent. Article 2 provided, inter alia, that members of the CPY could only be those persons that accepted the programme, statute, and tactics of the party and undertake by a written declaration that they will be active within the party (The Second Congress of the CPY, p. 118).

The first chapter of the CPY Programme stated that the ultimate objective of all the activities of the international communist party, as a wilful expression of the class movement, is social revolution, i.e. to replace capitalist relations of production with their communist equivalents.

The proletarian dictatorship, i.e. establishing the political power of the proletariat required to enable it to break any resistance of the exploiters, was a prerequisite for this social revolution to occur. The international communist party, the assignment of which was to train the proletariat to carry out its historic mission, had to organise the proletariat into an independent political party against all bourgeois parties, and lead and direct its class struggle (The Second Congress of the CPY, pp. 74–76).

The second chapter of the CPY Programme emphasised that a new era had arrived: the downfall of capitalism and an era of global proletarian revolution.

The second chapter concluded with the finding that the proletariat had to persist in constant economic and political struggle in order to be finally liberated, with all means available that were to be determined with regard to the social situation and the balance of forces between the proletariat and the bourgeoisie. The third chapter emphasised that the CPY, as a member of the Communist International, accepted the requirements of the world revolution as the starting point of its struggle. Therefore, it was the duty of the working class of the entire world to establish a socialist order. To this end, the proletariat had to first destroy the political power of the bourgeoisie and take political power into its own hands. The takeover of state power could not be confined solely to the replacement of persons holding power in the state authorities; it had to also entail the destruction of the alien state apparatus and the replacement of the bourgeois courts with proletarian courts, the destruction of the reactionary bureaucracy, and the establishment of new proletarian authorities. The victory of the proletariat was guaranteed by the organisation of the proletarian authority. It was supposed to lead to a complete breakdown of the bourgeois apparatus and the establishment of the state proletarian apparatus (see The Second Congress of the CPY, pp. 78–80).

The fourth chapter of the CPY Programme emphasised that the lessons learned from the Russian Revolution demonstrated that it is only possible to establish a new social order through a social war against those in power.

Through their dictatorship, the supporters of the new order were to ensure the transition from the old to the new order. Socialism could not be established by means of bourgeois democracy or parliamentary institutions, but only through workers' councils. It was therefore the duty of the CPY to lead, through words and actions, the proletariat towards a revolutionary battle until the dictatorship of the proletariat was established in the form of Soviet republics (see The Second Congress of the CPY, p. 81). The sixth chapter of the CPY Programme expressly stated that it was fighting for the Soviet Republic, i.e. for the transition to socialism by means of a dictatorship of the proletariat in the form of Soviet power.

The Soviet republic was to give all powers – legislative, executive, and judicial – to the working people, who were organised in workers', military, and farmers' councils. Immediately after assuming political power, the proletariat was to confiscate the means of production from the bourgeoisie (see The Second Congress of the CPY, p. 84).

The seventh chapter of the CPY Programme determined that the revolutionary era required the proletariat to use methods of fighting that engage large proletarian masses in major fights and incidents that end in open conflict with the bourgeois state. The idea that socialism could be introduced by making a compromise with the bourgeoisie was utopian. The working class was to actively participate in the movement and lead and conclude its struggle with the activation of the masses, subordinating, in the critical stage of the revolution according to the movement of the masses, all other means that are primarily used for class struggle during peaceful times. Representative bodies were also included among these (subordinated) means. In principle, the CPY opposed parliamentarism as a way to impose class rule. After the takeover of political power, parliamentarism was no longer possible (see The Second Congress of the CPY, pp. 85–86).

A comparative analysis reveals that a political party with such a programme, or a similar one, that operated in the same manner as the former CPY would be inconsistent with the principles of a free and democratic social system that is very tolerant towards the freedom of activities of political parties, and with the democratic European constitutional systems that exist today. In this light, the prohibition of the CPY was also justified at that time. Specific measures resulting from the prohibition of the CPY, which were directed against certain students and government officials, would now be deemed excessive and unacceptable in terms of constitutional democracy. However, such does not affect the principled finding that the prohibition of the CPY as a party and all its activities was constitutionally admissible.

Decision No. U-I-106/95, dated 25 January 1996

DECISION

At a session held on 25 January 1996, in proceedings to review constitutionality and legality initiated upon the request of the deputies to the National Assembly, Dr Ciril Ribičič and others, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. The provision of the second paragraph of Article 93 of the National Assembly Elections Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 44/92) is not inconsistent with the Constitution.
2. The National Assembly Elections Act is inconsistent with the Constitution, insofar as it does not determine the mandatory publication of the lists of candidates determined by the second paragraph of Article 93 in public media and at polling stations. The National Assembly must remedy this inconsistency with the Constitution no later than by 1 August 1996.

Reasoning:

A

1. The applicants (31 deputies) believe that the provision of the second paragraph of Article 93 of The National Assembly Elections Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 44/92 – hereinafter referred to as the NAEA) is not consistent with the principles of equality before the law (Article 14 of the Constitution), constitutional democracy (Articles 1 and 3 of the Constitution), and equal suffrage (Articles 43 and 80 of the Constitution) because it enables political parties to submit lists of candidates (the so-called national lists of candidates) on the basis of which, in the opinion of the applicants, certain candidates are given priority over other candidates of the same party who achieved a better result in the elections. In the applicants' opinion, the Act violates the principle of equality before the law as it gives priority to some candidates over others. The Act violates the principle of equal suffrage as it places in an unequal position voters who voted for candidates who did not become deputies solely due to the option of political parties to decide that candidates from their national lists become deputies. In the applicants' opinion, this further violates the principles of a democratic constitutional order since the national lists result in a composition of the National Assembly that is inconsistent with the will of the voters. On the basis of these arguments, the applicants propose that the Constitutional Court abrogate the provision of the second paragraph of Article 93 of the NAEA.

25 January 1996

2. The Secretariat for Legislation and Legal Affairs of the National Assembly replied to the request. The reply states that the Committee of the National Assembly for Domestic Policy and Justice considered the request and various opinions regarding the constitutionality of the challenged provision were expressed during a session thereof. Some of the participants at the session considered that the challenged provision is not inconsistent with the Constitution. On the other hand, it was "assessed" during the session that "the submitted request or petition was significant and a review of the constitutionality of the provisions of the law regulating elections should be conducted." Finally, the Committee supported the position that the Secretariat for Legislation and Legal Affairs adopted regarding the request. The Secretariat is of the opinion that the challenged regulation does not violate the principle of equal suffrage, which entails that the vote of each voter has the same value or that all voters have the same chance to influence the election result. In the opinion of the Secretariat for Legislation and Legal Affairs, the challenged provision does not entail a violation of the equality of the candidates for deputies, as "in democracies that are conceptualised and implemented in a contemporary manner" political parties "decisively influence the election results." With regard to a violation of the constitutional principle that Slovenia is a democratic republic, the reply states that it is necessary to consider thoroughly whether the provision of the second paragraph of Article 93 of the NAEA can be included, without reservation, among the provisions that fulfil the requirement that the will of the people as expressed at elections is to the greatest extent possible also expressed by the result of the elections. On the basis of Article 300 of the Rules of Procedure of the National Assembly, the Committee on Domestic Policy and Justice adopted a resolution whereby it petitioned the National Assembly to amend the NAEA, in order to ensure that at elections voters can consult the parties' national lists of candidates or at least lists of ten to fifteen candidates in the order in which they appear on the parties' national lists of candidates.

B

3. The Constitutional Court already decided on the constitutionality of the second paragraph of Article 93 of the NAEA in Case No. U-I-36/94 (OdIUS III, 23). In that Case, the petition was rejected because it was manifestly unfounded. However, in the request at issue, the applicants presented new reasons substantiating the alleged inconsistency of the second paragraph of Article 83 of the NAEA with the Constitution, therefore the Constitutional Court considered the request and decided it on its merits.
4. Article 1 of the Constitution declares that Slovenia is a democratic republic. The principle of constitutional democracy entails that public affairs are decided by the citizens directly (by referendum) or indirectly (through elected representatives). The provision of Article 43 of the Constitution, which guarantees citizens universal and equal suffrage, is important for the exercise of indirect democracy. Article 80 of the Constitution determines that deputies to the National Assembly are elected by universal, equal, direct, and secret voting. The Constitution does not regulate the electoral system, but establishes the fundamental principles that the legislature is bound to observe when adopting electoral legislation. In accordance with the provision of the fourth paragraph of Article 80 of the Constitution, the regulation of the electoral system is entrusted to the National Assembly. The National Assembly adopts the law regulating the electoral system by a two-thirds majority vote of all deputies. The legislature enjoys a certain degree of freedom when regulating the electoral system. It may choose any kind of electoral system, provided that in doing so it remains within the constitutionally determined framework – the electoral system must be in accordance with the principles of universal and equal suffrage, and the principles of free, universal, equal, direct, and secret voting.

5. The system of elections to the National Assembly is regulated by the NAEA. The legislature chose an electoral system of proportional representation and modified it in such a manner that the state is divided into 8 constituencies, whereby not all candidates [of each party or list of candidates] (up to 11) are listed on the ballot papers in every constituency, but in each of the 11 districts within a constituency only one candidate can be listed by a party or list. By voting for that candidate, the voter primarily votes for the list that this candidate represents in that electoral district – and in the event that this list wins only one seat in the entire constituency, the candidate from that specific electoral district will only be awarded this seat if, of all 11 (or fewer) candidates from the list, that candidate received the highest share (percentage) of votes in the election. The votes cast for individual candidates from a list of candidates are namely added up on the level of the constituency. Some of the seats are allocated on the level of the constituency to the lists that attained the electoral quotient (at least once). The seats thus obtained by the lists of candidates are allocated to the individual candidates according to their order with regard to the proportion of votes they received in the electoral districts. The remaining seats are allocated on the level of the state in relation to the sums of the remaining votes of lists of candidates of the same party, namely according to the so-called d'Hondt system of calculation. The seats obtained by the individual lists of candidates are allocated to the candidates who were the most successful in the constituencies in which the list of candidates achieved the highest relative remainder of the votes. The challenged second paragraph of Article 93 of the NAEA, however, determines an exception to this rule that provides that the proposers of the lists can compose a list that determines the order of the candidates from the lists of candidates submitted in the individual constituencies. Up to one half of the seats that are allocated to the lists of candidates on the basis of the distribution at the state level can be allocated to candidates from the national list of candidates.
6. The challenged provision of the Act does not violate the principles of equal, universal, and direct elections. Moreover, contrary to the applicants' opinion, it does not violate the principle of equality before the law and constitutional democracy.

7. The principle of constitutional democracy (Article 1 of the Constitution) entails that power is vested in the people, who exercise this power directly or indirectly – through their representatives (Article 3 of the Constitution). With regard to indirect (representative) democracy in the field of elections, the principles of free, universal, and equal suffrage, as well as the principles of direct and secret elections derive from the principle of democracy. If the electoral system is in accordance with the cited principles and the law guarantees periodic elections and the equal opportunity of all political parties in the state to compete at elections, elections are democratic.
8. The principle of universal suffrage entails that the active and passive right to vote are not restricted by conditions that are based on an individual's personal circumstances (religious belief, sex, property, ideology, profession, education, etc.). However, some exceptions are admissible (e.g. the conditions of citizenship and a minimum age). By the provision of Article 7 of the NAEA, according to which every citizen who has attained the age of 18 by the day of the elections and has not been declared legally incompetent has the right to vote and to be elected a deputy, the legislature fully respected the principle of universal suffrage.
9. The principle of equal suffrage derives from the general principle of equality before the law, but due to its special significance it has certain particularities. The principle of equal suffrage entails that each voter has the right to cast a vote and that the vote of each voter must have the same weight with regard to the election result. In electoral systems of proportional representation, the observance of this principle can be ensured through the establishment of appropriate constituencies and the application of an appropriate method of calculation for allocating the seats. Article 2 of the NAEA determines that “deputies shall be elected according to the principle that one deputy shall be elected per an approximately equal number of inhabitants.” In accordance with Article 20, the cited principle also applies to the establishment of constituencies. The provisions of Articles 2 and 20 of the NAEA and the system of counting votes and allocating seats, according to which all votes have the same weight, satisfy the requirements of equal suffrage. The national lists can lead to deviations from the principle that the seats are awarded to eleven candidates from each constituency. However, the principle of equal suffrage does not guarantee the equal representation of individual regions within the state (i.e., in the case at issue, constituencies), but only the equal consideration of each voter's vote. If a smaller number of deputies is elected from among the candidates in some constituencies, such does not entail that the votes of the voters in such constituencies had a lesser value since they are taken into account as part of the remainder of the votes at the state level. The possibility of determining national lists does not violate the principle of the equality of active voting rights.
10. The principle of equality also includes the equality of passive voting rights (the right to stand for election). Also with regard to passive voting rights, the electoral system may not discriminate against individuals. The principle of the equality of passive voting rights is not violated by the possibility of determining national lists of candidates. The applicants allege that the NAEA allows for the possibility that, among candidates from a list, candidates who achieved poorer election results are elected instead of those who achieved better election results. This allegation is not true, as the allocation of the seats to the deputies is based on the electoral success of lists of candidates, and not individual candidates. Voters in electoral districts primarily choose from among the lists and they do not have the possibility to choose from among the individual candidates from a list, therefore it is not possible to deem with certainty whether the electoral success of a candidate in an electoral district should be ascribed to the candidate's popularity or to the popularity of his or her list of candidates, i.e. the political party. The success of an individual candidate is thus connected with the success of the list of candidates and vice versa. Despite the complexity of the electoral system, the provisions of the NAEA are clear and unambiguous. A voter who is acquainted with the electoral system knows that by choosing a candidate, even though he or she circles the number in front of the name of the candidate on the ballot paper, he or she casts a vote for the list of candidates. As a voter's vote is primarily a vote for the list of candidates, this vote may in reality assist the electoral success of another candidate (not the one for whom the voter voted). However, this can already occur at the level of the constituency, and not necessarily at the level of the allocation of seats with regard to the remaining votes from constituencies. The situation wherein the vote of an individual voter can contribute to the electoral success of a candidate for whom the voter did not vote is not only a result of the possibility enacted by the legislature of a party or list to determine a national list of candidates (as the applicants believe), but a logical consequence of the electoral system as a whole. The principle of the equality of passive voting rights is not violated by the possibility of a party or list to determine a national list of candidates, since in accordance with the NAEA, any adult Slovene citizen with legal capacity has the right to stand for elections regardless of any personal circumstances – i.e. also including the right to appear on a national list of candidates on the basis of a political party's democratic decision.

11. The applicants' allegation that national lists of candidates result in the National Assembly having a composition that is inconsistent with the will of the voters and that thereby the principle of constitutional democracy is violated is not true. By casting a vote for a candidate a voter casts a vote for a list of candidates. It is not possible to conclude that by determining a national list of candidates a political party gains the possibility to shape the appearance of the National Assembly in disregard for the will of the electorate, as according to the electoral system in force it is not possible to ascertain the will of the voters in relation to the question of which of the candidates from the lists they wish to cast their vote for.
12. The principle of direct elections entails that voters have the right to decide on the composition of the representative body without the mediation of special electoral bodies (electoral colleges) or electors. This principle is not violated by the possibility of determining lists of candidates in which the proposers determine the order of the candidates who will be allocated the seats obtained by the list of candidates (a so-called closed list), since the voters still make the final electoral choice. The applicants' claim that due to the national lists of candidates the composition of the National Assembly is inconsistent with the expressed will of the voters thus also does not hold true. The principle of directness is observed, provided that the structure of the list is known to the voters in advance and the list cannot be changed after the voting has been carried out. Under this condition, a voter influences the election result directly with his or her vote (without the mediation of a third party). In democratic states it is normal that political parties influence the choice of candidates. When forming closed lists, parties may, for example, positively influence the structure of the representative body by including a comparable number of men and women, members of various professions, social classes, etc.

13. However, in order to satisfy the requirements arising from the principle of direct elections the following conditions must be fulfilled:

- the national lists of candidates must be prepared an appropriate period of time before the day of the election;
- the national lists of candidates must be public; and
- the national lists of candidates cannot be changed subsequently.

The regulation under the NAEA fulfils the first and third conditions. In constituencies, the lists of candidates have to be submitted to the constituencies' electoral commissions no later than twenty-five days prior to the day of the elections (Article 54). The lists of candidates in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 93 (i.e. the national lists) have to be submitted to the Electoral Commission of the Republic of Slovenia within the same time limit. Subsequent changes to their composition are not allowed.

14. However, the NAEA does not regulate the procedure for the publication of the national lists of candidates. Mandatory publication is only prescribed for lists of candidates in constituencies and lists of candidates standing for election in individual voting districts. Article 61 of the NAEA determines that both shall be published in the public media no later than fifteen days prior to the day of the elections. The fourth paragraph of Article 64 determines that announcements of the lists of candidates standing for election have to be posted at the polling stations. The public media that are selected by the Electoral Commission of the Republic of Slovenia are obligated to publish the lists of candidates containing the information determined by the NAEA. Voters are thus informed of the composition of the lists in their own constituency, even though only the name of one candidate from each list of candidates is printed on the ballot paper. In contrast, the legislation contains no obligation to publish national lists of candidates. Consequently, voters are not guaranteed the possibility to inform themselves of the names of the candidates on these lists of candidates. The principle of direct elections is thus violated, as voters are not informed of the choice made by those who proposed the lists (i.e. political parties). Only mandatory publication of the national lists of candidates can ensure, in accordance with the principle of direct elections, that the final decision on who is voted for remains in the hands of the voters. Otherwise, a third party (a political party) comes between the voter and the person who is awarded the office of deputy, as the voter casts his or her vote without knowing what effect this will have on the result of the elections (the distribution of the seats).

15. The Constitutional Court therefore assessed that, although the institution of a national list of candidates is in principle consistent with the constitutional principles in relation to elections, these principles require the enactment of the mandatory publication of national lists of candidates (i.e. the lists of candidates in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 93) in public media and at polling stations in the same sense as such is regulated with regard to the lists of candidates in constituencies. The Court thus required the legislature to remedy this inconsistency no later than by 1 August 1996.

C

16. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 21 and Article 48 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94), composed of: Dr Tone Jerovšek, President, and Judges Mag. Matevž Krivic, Mag. Janez Snoj, Dr Janez Šinkovec, Dr Lovro Šturm, Franc Testen, Dr Lojze Ude, and Dr Boštjan M. Zupančič. Point 1 of the operative provisions was adopted by seven votes against two. Judges Krivic and Šturm voted against. Judge Krivic submitted a dissenting opinion. The Constitutional Court adopted the Point 2 of the operative provisions unanimously.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE KRIVIC

I

In my opinion, the challenged provision (the second paragraph of Article 93) of the National Assembly Elections Act (the NAEA) that regulates the so-called national lists is inconsistent with the Constitution.

The institution of national lists of candidates as such may be constitutionally admissible – within the framework of an at least relatively “normal” electoral system of proportional representation as such are established elsewhere in the world – provided it does not undermine the proclaimed statutory or even constitutional principles of the electoral system in force. If in an electoral system of proportional representation the state is divided into constituencies in which more than one deputy is elected (i.e. multi-member constituencies), but the act regulating elections does not promise voters in either its principles or its operative provisions that territorial representation will also be observed in the final allocation of the seats, but, to the contrary, it clearly states that the principle of territorial representation is to a certain extent corrected by the provisions on national lists of candidates, then such a regulation probably cannot be constitutionally disputable – unless the requirement of equal territorial representation followed already from the Constitution itself. However, even if the law were not as clear as in the above hypothetical example, such would not necessarily entail the unconstitutionality of national lists of candidates. In such an instance their constitutionality would depend on whether and to what extent the Constitutional Court deems – similarly as the German Federal Constitutional Court has done on some occasions – a statutory regulation unconstitutional, namely inconsistent with the principles of a state governed by the rule of law, also in the event of a so-called systemic inconsistency (Systemwidrigkeit, Systemgerechtigkeit, Systemtreue<sup>1</sup>) when statutory provisions are internally contradictory, when some of them contradict the proclaimed principles of the regulation of the field in question, or in similar cases.

Our case does not concern even the above-mentioned rather subtle question, which is quite difficult to resolve (however, due to its importance, I will return to it below in Section II), but, in addition to the fact that the provision regarding national lists of candidates (which is “hidden” in the second paragraph of Article 93) is prima facie inconsistent with “the principle that one deputy shall be elected per an approximately equal number of inhabitants” (Article 2 of the NAEA), which Article 20 also applies as the principle governing the establishment of constituencies, our also concerns something more than merely the question of Systemtreue (loyalty to the proclaimed system) in the above-mentioned sense. It not only concerns the question of whether national lists of candidates, which may be compatible with a “normal” system of proportional representation, are also compatible with a system of proportional representation that determines by statute that 11 deputies are elected in each of the eight constituencies (whereby subsequent interpretations according to which the Act only promises that in each constituency candidates for 11 deputy seats “merely” stand for election without also necessarily being elected are certainly not acceptable). This case concerns even more than that – namely the fact that the provision on national lists of candidates was included (only in the last reading of the draft act) in an electoral system whose essence is, even without this provision, incomprehensible to the average voter to such a degree that the majority of voters – as is demonstrated by numerous public reactions of both laymen and professionals – do not even understand the electoral system as being one of proportional representation, but as a system that above all enables a choice among individual candidates in (single-member) electoral districts – in accordance with the principle “one deputy is elected in each electoral district”. Many voters simply did not read or understand the explanations that such is only an appearance and that the truth is different. When they were faced with 10 or 15 names on the ballot paper in the voting booth, they chose primarily from among those names – and the majority of journalists’ comments from the elections until today also commented on the election results (and criticised the electoral system) as having enabled the election of candidates who obtained fewer votes than other candidates. All those comments thus proceeded and still continue to proceed from a premise that, while being legally incorrect, is to a large extent in line with reality and according to which voters primarily voted for individual candidates rather than for political parties.

1 Cf. e.g. H. Meyer: Demokratische Wahl und Wahlsystem in: Isensee/Kirchhof: Handbuch des Staatsrechts, Band II, Muller, Heidelberg 1987, p. 264.

When the institution of national lists of candidates is included in such a system, which is a system of “proportional representation” already deformed beyond recognition from the perspective of the average voter so that the majority cannot even perceive it as a system of proportional representation (thereby disregarding the probably not small number of voters who do not understand the difference between systems of proportional representation and systems of majority election even in their pure forms or who are not capable of comprehending it), then in such a deformed electoral system this is no longer a subtle constitutional law question of “loyalty to the system”, but already a question of – roughly phrased – fraud against the majority of voters or – put nicely – the transparency (plainness, comprehensibility, clarity) of the electoral system. The system did not defraud the voters with regard to the composition of the parliament as regards political parties, but with regard to its composition as regards the persons elected. It promised them precisely an increased influence on the composition of parliament as regards the persons elected (the “personalisation” of elections), which was the main reason why the system of proportional representation was “camouflaged” beyond recognition through the introduction of apparently single-member electoral districts – and finally the institution of national lists of candidates was included in this context.

The question of whether, without the inclusion of national lists of candidates and despite its fundamental non-transparency, this deformed, distorted electoral system could still be deemed to be constitutionally admissible or not has not been raised and I can therefore leave it aside. Even in such a system many voters would have voted for one of the candidates in their electoral district without knowing that by doing so they actually would not be voting directly for the candidate but primarily for the entire list of candidates of his or her party in the entire constituency or the entire state – however, the number of votes cast for that particular candidate would still determine whether that candidate or someone else would be elected from among the candidates on the relevant list. The promised and expected “personalisation” of elections would be implemented at least to such an extent – however, the introduction of national lists also “cheated” those legitimate expectations of the voters for a list as regards one-half of the seats that the list won on the basis of the remainder of the votes. Instead of a party candidate who managed to secure a considerably higher number of votes for the party or list in his or her electoral district, a candidate who obtained a significantly worse result in his or her district may be elected due to the order in which the candidates appear on the national list.

As is known, the public greeted such election “results” with great dismay, criticism, and resistance. The fact that people disagree with a certain statutory regulation in itself certainly does not entail that the regulation is unconstitutional. However, the situation is somewhat different as regards the electoral system. In addition to referenda, elections are namely the only manner in which the fundamental constitutional principle that “power is vested in the people”, i.e. the principle of democracy as regards the relation between people and power (not as regards relations among state authorities), can be exercised. And if the electoral system is non-transparent, namely confusing and incomprehensible for the people who feel “cheated” when they learn who was elected – then the Constitutional Court should also not deem such a system to be constitutionally admissible in a democratic state. As the subject of such a fundamental misunderstanding or disagreement between the voters and the electoral system was precisely and primarily the institution of national lists of candidates, which was the only aspect challenged before the Constitutional Court, in my opinion the Constitutional Court could have rendered a negative assessment with a clear conscience at least regarding such (if it did not also extend the review sua sponte to other disputable elements of the electoral system).

Allow me to return from the argument of non-transparency (it is precisely due to the national lists of candidates that the non-transparency of the electoral system reached a level that, in my opinion, is no longer compatible with democratic principles) to the first argument, i.e. the argument of the “non-systemic character” [of national lists of candidates].

One can speak of two aspects of the “non-systemic character” of the introduction of national lists of candidates (in the sense that it undermines the foundations of the proclaimed electoral system). Firstly, the institution of national lists of candidates nullifies the anticipated and proclaimed effect of the “personalisation” of the elections in the law or electoral system. While this “personalisation” is significantly limited and problematic already as regards its content in accordance with the basic concept of the law (the order of a party’s candidates within a constituency is not determined by which of them enjoys greater support among the party’s voters, but each of them stands for election in one of the 11 electoral districts – the results are thus to a large extent incomparable), the lodging of a national list of candidates to an important extent completely nullifies even this limited “personalisation” of the elections, which is also problematic as regards its content. This first aspect of the “non-systemic character” [of national lists of candidates] is only weaker than the second one because the principle of “personalisation” is not explicitly listed as one of the main principles of the law in Article 2 thereof or in its general provisions – it is, however, strongly emphasised in lay and political as well as expert interpretations of our electoral system.<sup>2</sup>

The second aspect of the “non-systemic character” [of national lists of candidates] is more prominent and thus also of greater constitutional significance (also) from this point of view. The national lists of candidates namely entail an interference – which is absolutely manifest, can be proven by numbers, and is above all significant – with two fundamental principles that are explicitly proclaimed by Article 2: the principle that “deputies are elected in constituencies” (the first paragraph of Article 2) and the principle “that one deputy shall be elected per an approximately equal number of inhabitants” (the first part of the second paragraph of Article 2). The national lists of candidates do not affect the third principle proclaimed by that provision (i.e. the proportional representation of political interests). The second of the mentioned principles is also not violated as such (as in spite of the national lists of candidates the party obtains a number of seats that is in accordance with the principle of proportionality) – it is, however, violated if we understand and consider it in connection with the first principle (i.e. election in constituencies). That such was also intended is clearly supported by the second paragraph of Article 20 of the NAEA, which reads as follows: “Constituencies are established in accordance with the principle that one deputy shall be elected per an approximately equal number of inhabitants.” As the application of national lists of candidates in the 1992 election led to a situation where in one constituency only 8 candidates were elected instead of 11, while in another constituency 16 candidates were elected instead of 11, it is evident how deeply the challenged statutory provision regarding national lists interfered with the statutory principle of elections in constituencies – namely with the principle of the equal territorial representation of the inhabitants in the parliament. While this principle is not a constitutional principle, it is implicitly contained in the first and second statutory principles mentioned and their mutual connection, therefore, as I already mentioned at the beginning, a violation of this principle can only be deemed to be constitutionally inadmissible if we deem that the “non-systemic character” of the statutory regulation constitutes a violation of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law.<sup>3</sup> At least with regard to electoral legislation, I believe this to be necessary – especially when (as is the case in the case at issue) this “non-systemic character”, which violates the principles of a state governed by the rule of law, at the same time produces such a high degree of non-transparency as regards the electoral system that it simultaneously also entails a violation of the principle of ensuring a democratic state order.

The “non-systemic character” in the above-mentioned sense also clearly follows from the currently only scientific work regarding our electoral system that was written by one of the experts who were the authors of the system (See note 2). Therein, with regard to the fundamental principle of elections in equal constituencies, Dr Grad, inter alia, wrote the following: “It is particularly emphasised that the establishment of constituencies is not only a necessary technical means for carrying out elections, but further that as a general rule deputies are elected in constituencies (such entails that as a general rule seats are allocated in constituencies), which is allegedly intended to provide for a closer connection between the voters and their deputies” (pp. 13–14), and later on when describing the manner of “the second round of allocating seats” (the ones that have not already been allocated during the calculation of the results within the individual constituencies, but are allocated only after adding up the remainder [of the votes] at the state level), he added that this rule is allegedly intended “to ensure that also in the second allocation round the seats are allocated to the lists of candidates in constituencies in accordance with voters' support, which is allegedly intended to also ensure a connection between the voters and those deputies who obtained their seats only in the allocation on the level of the state" (p. 62; emphasis added by M.K.). Although he explicitly writes only about "the connection between the voters and their deputies," and not directly about the principle of the equal territorial representation of the inhabitants in parliament, it is clear that such (also) concerns the latter, despite the fact that candidates may stand for election in a constituency even though they do not reside therein.

This is even more evident from the Chapter "Designing constituencies in accordance with the regulation in force", which on pp. 66–67 states that: "In accordance with the new electoral legislation, the constituency is an extremely important element of the electoral system. The principle that deputies are elected in such a manner that one deputy shall be elected per an approximately equal number of inhabitants has namely been enacted. Such entails the implementation of the principle of equal suffrage, as well as the requirement that each constituency has to be guaranteed the number of deputy seats as is determined by law. The allocation of seats in accordance with this principle should not be such that some constituencies would be allocated a different number of seats than others." That constituencies are not merely a technical necessity for carrying out the elections, but that the legislature also saw them as a means for creating a stronger connection between the voters and the deputies (i.e. [equal] territorial representation in the parliament) is also evident from the third paragraph of Article 20 of the NAEA, which reads as follows: "In drawing up constituencies and electoral districts, their geographic completeness and their common cultural and other characteristics have to be taken into account."<sup>4</sup>

How strongly the idea of the necessity to respect the principle of equal territorial representation (i.e. the principle that 11 deputies are elected in each constituency) was anchored in the minds of the authors of our electoral system is particularly evident from the conclusion of Chapter "3.8. The electoral system in force", where on p. 63 the following is stated with regard to national lists of candidates: "The law contains no provisions on the manner in which the thus obtained seats are distributed among the constituencies. However, an analogous application of the rule on the basis of which other seats are distributed seems indicated ... Also with regard to this irregular allocation of seats one must namely proceed from the law's fundamental principle that one deputy shall be elected per an approximately equal number of inhabitants. In practice, such entails that (taking into account the above-stated rule) seats have to be allocated to those constituencies in which not all of the seats reserved for those constituencies have been allocated." However, this comment is not true and it is unfortunately not possible to act in such a way, as the challenged second paragraph of Article 93 of the NAEA explicitly determines that on the basis of "national lists of candidates" the seats are allocated "regardless of the provision of the preceding paragraph," i.e. also without considering in which constituencies the candidates who are to obtain a seat on the basis of a "national list of candidates" stood for election. This error in the commentary is obviously the result of hastiness (the manuscript was already completed in October 1992, namely immediately after the law had been adopted – and before it could be tested in practice) and it may no longer be found on p. 111 in Chapter "5.4. Determining the election results in the entire state" – I only refer to it to reinforce my position that the principle "11 deputies from each constituency" was in fact intended as one of the fundamental principles of the entire electoral system and that, with regard to the content of the fundamental principles enshrined in the law, it must be deemed as such, and the challenged provision regarding the national lists of candidates must thus be deemed to be inconsistent with this principle and therefore to be "non-systemic" and as such inconsistent with the principles of a state governed by the rule of law, and due to its significant negative effect on the electoral system's transparency, also inconsistent with the principles of a democratic state.

4 Dr Grad, however, adds the following: "The larger question with regard to the adopted idea of the representative nature of deputies' office is naturally what this condition is intended to ensure, as it does not concern the election of representatives of territorial interests." (p. 67). I would reply to this question as follows: deputies are in fact "representatives of all the people" (Article 82 of the Constitution), unbound by any kind of instructions (the representative nature of office), however, this does not entail that consequently an electoral system that would nevertheless attempt to ensure an equal territorial representation of the inhabitants in the parliament – as our system does – would not be constitutionally admissible. And if such is an evident goal of the electoral system (proceeding from Articles 2 and 20), then the provisions that negate the implementation of this goal can be deemed to be "non-systemic" to such an extent that they render the act so internally contradictory that it is no longer consistent with the principles of a state governed by the rule of law.

Finally, the challenged regulation also violates the constitutional right to equal suffrage, namely the equality of the passive right to vote (everyone's right to stand for elections and the right of every candidate to compete at elections with the other candidates under equal conditions). From such perspective, does every "national list of candidates" entail an interference with this right? This problem does not occur in electoral systems where candidates stand for election separately in constituencies for one half of the seats and on "federated state lists of candidates" for the other half of the seats (e.g. the German system).<sup>5</sup> In the former Italian system, where candidates stood for election for all the seats in constituencies, while the candidates on the national list of candidates were given precedence in the allocation of the seats, such a regulation should certainly have been deemed an interference with the constitutional right to the equality of candidates or their formal chances to succeed (Chancengleichheit). That the Italian Constitutional Court did not abrogate it for such reason is perhaps due to the fact that it was never challenged – it is, however, also possible that had such been challenged an interference with a constitutional right might have been established, but the Constitutional Court would not have deemed it inadmissible. An interference with a constitutional right is namely admissible if it is necessary for the protection of other constitutional rights or other “constitutional values” (in accordance with the principle of proportionality). Therefore, it would have to be reviewed whether in such a case the interest of political parties in having their leaders assume a seat in the parliament, even if they were not elected in their constituencies, could also be deemed a public interest and thus a sort of “constitutional value” (for example, the public interest in parties’ leading politicians being active within the parliament and not outside of it) – and if this were answered in the affirmative, subsequently a “weighing” would have to be performed as to whether this “constitutional value” is so much more important than the protection of the constitutional right of candidates’ equal opportunities to be elected that it could justify an interference with such. As an interference with the equality of candidates at least indirectly also affects the rights of the voters who voted for these candidates, at first glance a negative answer to the preceding question seems to present itself – on the other hand, however, other circumstances would nevertheless have to be carefully considered as well, for example the fact that in a democratic state the democratic election of a party’s leadership representing the interests of several hundred thousand party members in the state as a whole might be more important than the votes of a few thousand or ten thousand voters of this party in only one of the numerous constituencies in the state where by means of preferential votes they accorded precedence to the party’s other candidates, not the ones the party as a whole had elected as their leaders (provided, of course, that this was in fact a democratic decision of the entire party membership, and not only a decision of the party’s functionaries). Just because someone is not sufficiently popular in his or her home constituency does not necessarily entail that other voters for the party could not elect him or her into parliament with the help of a “national list of candidates” – if such is a “transparent” element of the electoral system and if public opinion does not reject it as categorically as, e.g., is done in Slovenia. A decision regarding the constitutional admissibility of “national lists of candidates” that would have to be based on a weighing of all the mentioned conflicting elements would, nevertheless, be very difficult.

In our electoral system, which is completely non-transparent to the voter and where the public already therefore rejects the “national lists of candidates” as an intruder in the (otherwise misunderstood) system (probably also due to underdeveloped democratic practices within the parties – and due to their small number of members), the decision appears to be a great deal easier: I would deem “national lists of candidates” to also constitute a violation of the equality of the passive (and indirectly also the active) right to vote. As this (my) review depends to a large extent on the preceding review of the constitutional admissibility of our “national lists of candidates” from the perspective of the transparency or the democratic character of our electoral system and from the perspective of this element’s “systemic character” within this system, I only derived – from the primary violations of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law and of democracy – the violation of the right to equal suffrage, in the case at issue, as a secondary violation.

II

As I have already indicated, in the second part of this dissenting opinion I will present some of the basic criteria for the constitutional review of electoral systems as I adapted them predominantly from the above-cited study of the Frankfurt-based Professor Dr Hans Meyer in the collection Isensee/Kirchhof: Handbuch des Staatsrechts – thereby also considering other sources, in particular Nohlen’s well-known political science study of electoral systems.<sup>6</sup>

a) The criterion of “systemic character”, i.e. “loyalty to the system”, “consistency with the system”
As I have already applied this criterion above under Section I, I consider it at the beginning of this Section, although it is by far not the most important criterion. I would immediately like to emphasise two potential misunderstandings or two possible misconceptions regarding this criterion:

Firstly, this criterion does not entail that all possible electoral systems should be reviewed in accordance with the criterion of their “loyalty” to a pure system of proportional representation or a pure system of majority election; every mixed, combined electoral system also possesses a logic of its own, its own principles – the criterion of a “systemic character” thus (I am adding this as my opinion) entails that the specific principles of each concrete electoral system chosen or enacted by the legislature should be (as a general rule already in the law itself) clearly presented to the citizens – substantial divergences from these principles that could lead to the non-transparency of the electoral system or even “defraud” voters (who, relying on the declared principles and outward appearance, would misunderstand the actual effects of one or another kind of voting) could then, in my opinion, be deemed constitutionally inadmissible.<sup>7</sup> And secondly, as a rule, the criterion of “loyalty to the system” is only a secondary criterion for the review of the constitutionality of the individual elements of the electoral

7 I have already partially indicated why the criterion of “loyalty to the system” is constitutionally acceptable precisely when reviewing electoral systems, but less so or even not all as regards other questions, above under Section I – however, in his already cited study, Meyer states that “the Federal Constitutional Court rightly rejected the idea of transforming the criterion of loyalty to the system into a constitutional postulate” and thereby refers to a position from BVerfGE 59, 36 (49). Therein, the German Constitutional Court – when reviewing the constitutionality of certain elements of the pension system – argued as follows: “The Federal Constitutional Court repeatedly held that a ‘non-systemic character’ (Systemwidrigkeit) – as a violation of the requirement to respect the inherent legality of a law (Sachgesetzlichkeit) – could entail a violation of the principle of equality before the law (Cf. BVerfGE 34, 103 (115) etc.). In addition, once certain principles have been chosen for the regulation of a field, the reasons justifying deviations from such principles would have to correspond in importance to the intensity of the deviation from the chosen principles in order to be persuasive (BVerfGE ...). However, the Systemwidrigkeit as such ... is not inconsistent with the principle of equality before the law. What system the legislature applies to regulate a certain matter is – as equally applies to the reasonableness of such regulation – a matter of its own discretion; the Constitutional Court may only find such a regulation to be unconstitutional according to the criteria under the Constitution, and not from the perspective of its “systemic character”.

system that comes to the foreground only after these individual elements as well as the electoral system as a whole have passed a review of their constitutionality from the perspective of the fundamental principles of electoral law – or when the challenged regulation is evidently not problematic from the perspective of these principles.

b) The criterion of conformity with the principle of equal suffrage

Nowadays (when universal, secret, and direct suffrage has long been completely self-evident), a review of the conformity of an electoral system with the principle of equal suffrage is by far the most important among such reviews.<sup>8</sup>

From this perspective, a pure system of proportional representation (without an “election threshold” and constituencies) and a pure system of majority election (in single-member constituencies) are not only different systems that are not equally admissible from a constitutional perspective, but the former constitutes the closest possible approximation to the ideal of equal suffrage (i.e. with every vote having the same weight and the same influence on the final result), while the latter basically represents the gravest possible disregard<sup>9</sup> of this principle, as, theoretically, in the event of an even distribution of the voters of the winning and losing parties over the entire territory of the state, in such a system the winning party could win 100% of the seats by gaining only 51% of the votes (or, in the event there are a greater number of parties, a relative majority entailing an even lower percentage of the votes) – in any event, in practice within such a system there occur serious violations of the principle of the equality of votes: in an individual constituency, all votes cast for minority candidates are completely lost and devoid of meaning, and it is further irrelevant whether the winning candidate won with 30, 51, or 90% of the votes (again, all “remaining” votes have no value), but above all at the state level this system can produce great disproportionalities between the distribution of votes and the distribution of seats – even up to an absurd situation whereby a party that obtained a lower share of votes wins a larger number of seats (or even an absolute majority of the seats) than another party that obtained a larger share of votes.

In Meyer’s study, the above-presented arguments are not applied to illustrate a similar constitutional law assessment of the two mentioned electoral systems (as such arguments are already well-known in countries that are parliamentary democracies and do not have to be specifically stated). Meyer merely concludes that the fact that the German Constitution contains no provisions on the electoral system – already due to the principle of equal suffrage, but also due to the position of the framers of the Constitution when it was drafted – by no means entails that the law could also introduce a system of majority election. After establishing that the German

Meyer, op. cit., p. 265.

9 Out of respect for the English and French electoral systems, I refrain from applying the rougher expression “violation”.

Constitution does not deem the parliament to constitute a representative of local interests, and therefore also this (only?) possible constitutional law justification of the system of majority election is excluded, Meyer concludes: “The finding that the system of majority election is consistent with the Constitution – and therefore that less severe violations of equal suffrage in other electoral systems are admissible – is thus in any event inadmissible.”<sup>10</sup>

However, even this conclusion of the Federal Constitutional Court (adopted in the first year of its operation),<sup>11</sup> which Meyer rejects in a categorical and persuasive manner, only provided for the acceptability of a system of majority election, and as a result also of other, less severe violations of equal suffrage in mixed systems, in an entirely hypothetical manner – primarily in order to be able to emphasise the requirement of Systemtreue as its antithesis (in the sense that when the legislature itself determines as its starting point the principle of proportionality, then it must observe it as well). In that concrete review of the constitutionality of an element of the mixed electoral system in the federated state of Schleswig-Holstein, the Federal Constitutional Court, proceeding from the requirement of Systemtreue, decided that the element at issue was an (excessive) interference with equal suffrage (at that time and in the federated state in question – in light of the existing concrete political conditions and relations) and that it could no longer be deemed compatible with the Constitution. And the element at issue was merely an “election threshold” (Sperrklausel) that was at that time already generally accepted as an interference with equal suffrage that was in principle admissible and that has remained such until today (it does, however, undoubtedly constitute an interference, as it simply disregards the votes cast for lists of candidates that did not reach the threshold when distributing the seats) – in that case, however, it was found to be unconstitutional as it did not satisfy the conditions for the constitutional admissibility of such interferences.

At this point we encounter the following two important criteria for the constitutional review of electoral systems – that not simply any sound reason derived from the nature of the matter suffices for the admissibility of interferences with equal suffrage (or other constitutional determinants of the right to vote), in contrast to interferences with the general right to equality before the law, but that a special, necessary reason is required, and that the need to prevent excessive fragmentation of the parties in parliament (the occurrence of so-called Splitterparteien) as a serious danger to the democratic system may be deemed to constitute such a necessary reason, namely the crucial need for such an electoral system that enables the creation of a functional parliament and government.

c) The criterion of a special, necessary reason for interferences with equal suffrage

As is generally known, any sound reason deriving from the nature of the matter – even if such was not the legislature’s reason, but was, e.g., subsequently established by the Constitutional Court – suffices for interferences with the general principle of equality before the law (allgemeine[r] Gleichheitssatz), i.e. for the differentiation by the legislature in any field (provided that it merely affects the general principle of equality before the law and no special constitutional right is affected thereby). That such does not suffice for the admissibility of interferences with equal suffrage actually follows already from the fact that such does not concern only the general principle of equality before the law, but the question of the admissibility of interferences with a special, independent constitutional right (equal suffrage) – such interferences, however, are only admissible in accordance with the principle of proportionality, i.e. when they are necessary (required) for the protection of the proportionately equally important rights of others. Since the principle of equal suffrage also constitutes application of the general principle of equality before the law in this special field, German case law and literature especially explain why the general criterion of a “sound, objective reason” does not suffice from this perspective and a “special, necessary reason” is required.<sup>12</sup>

Equal suffrage is fundamentally linked with the notion of democracy – as a result, an objective reason for interferences with equal suffrage cannot exist at all. From such there follows the necessity of strict (formal) application of the principle of equal suffrage (op. cit., p. 281) – the cited first Decision of the Federal Constitutional Court even speaks of “absolute, mathematical equality.”<sup>13</sup> The principle of equal suffrage only allows such restrictions as are necessarily logically connected (denknotwendig verbunden) to the character of the elections (op. cit., p. 282).

A “necessary reason” is thus required by both criteria for a review of the constitutional admissibility of interferences with equal suffrage: the “strict” criterion of finding a sufficient reason deriving from the “related nature” of the principles of equal suffrage and general equality before the law, and the criterion (principle) of proportionality with its three requirements of the appropriateness, necessity, and proportionality of the interference in order to protect the constitutional rights of others.

12 “Differentiation with regard to equal suffrage requires a special, justifying, necessary reason (i.e. eines besonderen, rechtfertigenden, zwingenden Grundes bedürfen). Due to this bond, the legislature’s margin of appreciation is subject to particularly tight limits. [...] The constitutional requirement of equality extends to all rights and legal relationships that constitute the institution of elections. The voters, candidates, and the persons entitled to propose candidates stand at the core of the field of elections (i.e. im Kernbereich der Wahl)” (op. cit., p. 283). “The principle of equal suffrage is most closely linked with both the principle of democracy and the general principle of equality before the law. The Federal Constitutional Court already expressed this link with the principle of democracy in its established case law by holding that ‘due to its connection with the egalitarian principle of democracy’ the principle of equal suffrage ‘has to be understood in the sense of strict and formal equality’. The equal treatment of all citizens in the exercise of their right to vote constitutes one of the essential foundations of the regulation of the state in libertarian democratic constitutional systems. This does not entail that the principle of equal suffrage is not subject to any restrictions; it rather concerns the fact that the legislature is only left with a narrow margin for differentiation. [...] A special, justifying, objectively necessary reason is required.” (Achterberg/Schulte in: Mangoldt/Klein: Das Bonner Grundgesetz – Kommentar, Band 6, Verlag F. Vahlen, München 1991, p. 51).

13 “Sometimes equal suffrage is set against the general principle of equality before the law. While the latter allows for assessment (Wertungen), equal suffrage concerns absolute, mathematical equality.” BVerfGE 1, 208 (247).

The criterion of “necessary reason” has to be distinguished as clearly as possible from another “criterion”, the well-known maxim that co-determines the sharpness and depth of Constitutional Courts’ interferences with challenged statutory regulations in unclear cases – i.e. the maxim that, in such and similar cases, when in doubt the Constitutional Court should decide in favorem legis (namely that it should not declare the challenged statutory regulation unconstitutional), or the even more general principle of judicial self-restraint. Meyer (op. cit., p. 266) drew the following distinction: “When reviewing ordinary laws, there are good reasons for the Constitutional Court to restrain itself and only establish a violation of the Constitution when the legal situation is clear. There is an imminent danger that the Constitution would be applied too zealously against each respective political majority in the legislature and thus hinder it in the realisation of its programme. Accepting this position especially entails that the Constitutional Court must act more stringently when reviewing electoral legislation. Restraint towards a political programme and its statutory implementation can only be justified if the political opponent’s fair chance to win over the people, and thus the parliamentary majority, is guaranteed. A prerequisite for this, however, is that the Constitutional Court has to prevent every inadmissible attempt to retain power through the enactment of electoral legislation. The Constitutional Court has to assume its role as a guardian of the fair political procedure for gaining and retaining power. In interpreting the Constitution, it must therefore exhibit a particular sensibility towards all kinds of discrimination and restrictions of competition and strictly apply the Constitution when reviewing electoral legislation.” (Emphasis added by M.K.).

d) The prevention of the fragmentation of the parties in parliament as a necessary reason

In accordance with German case law, the danger of the fragmentation of the parties in parliament and thus of electing a parliament without a clear majority that would enable the formation of a strong government entails a necessary reason for interferences with equal suffrage, such as the election threshold, a minimum number of signatures required for candidacy, or similar interferences in electoral systems of proportional representation.

Meyer admits that the “protection of the parliament’s functionality” is such an important value that it can be deemed a “special, justifying” reason (pp. 284–287) – whether it is also “necessary” would have to be demonstrated by analysing the current factual situation. At this point, Meyer indicates several reservations and concludes that all these reservations do not necessarily lead to the abrogation of the election threshold, but to a relativisation of its role. Similarly, in their above-cited work Achterberg/Schulte (p. 56) raise the question of whether “nowadays this reason can still be considered a special, justifying reason for such a far-reaching interference with equal suffrage and the equal opportunities of all parties (Chancengleichheit),” namely in the concrete situation in Germany, and argue in favour of relativising the election threshold. (In our circumstances, thus the same logic or criterion could be applied when reviewing whether the election threshold should be changed or not – an analysis of the current factual situation: Has the election threshold prevented the election of a functional parliament and government or could it prevent such in the future to a greater degree than it has up to now?)

The Federal Constitutional Court provided important premises for the necessity of such relativisation already in its first decision regarding electoral legislation. That decision cautions that “the degree of admissible differentiation is determined by valuations that live in the consciousness of the concrete legal community” and that, after realising the great importance of this exception to the rules of the game, some German States included the Sperrklausel in their State Constitutions (BVerfGE 1, 208 (249)) – such naturally entails that any reservations there regarding lose their power (if the enactment of an electoral threshold is the express will of the constitutional legislature – in contrast to the will of the Federal constitutional legislature, which in 1949 during the drafting of the Grundgesetz [the German Federal Constitution] explicitly rejected an electoral threshold due to its inconsistency with the principle of equal suffrage).

DECISION

At a session held on 12 February 1998 in proceedings for the review of constitutionality and legality initiated upon the petition of Danijel Starman, Koper, and others, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. It is not inconsistent with the Constitution that the National Assembly Elections Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 44/95) gives members of the Italian and Hungarian self-governing national communities the right to cast two votes in the election of the deputies to the National Assembly.
2. It is not inconsistent with the Constitution that the Local Elections Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 72/93, 7/94, 33/94, and 70/95) gives members of the Italian and Hungarian self-governing national communities the right to cast two votes in the municipal council elections.
3. Article 22 of the Voting Rights Register Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 46/92) is not inconsistent with the Constitution.
4. It is inconsistent with the Constitution that the Voting Rights Register Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 46/92) does not determine the criteria to be applied by the commissions of the Italian and Hungarian self-governing national communities when deciding on the registration of citizens who are members of the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian national communities in a special electoral register. The National Assembly must remedy this inconsistency with the Constitution prior to calling the next regular elections to the National Assembly.
5. The fourth paragraph of Article 53, Article 134, and the second paragraph of Article 140 of the Charter of the Koper Municipality are not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws.
6. The petition has been dismissed in the part that refers to the Deputies Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 48/92) and the Rules of Procedure of the National Assembly (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 40/93, 28/96, and 26/97).

A

1. By the Order dated 6 June 1996, the Constitutional Court partially accepted, partially dismissed, and partially rejected the petition of Danijel Starman and others (hereinafter referred to as the petitioners) by which they challenged the provisions of the following regulations:
  - the Voting Rights Register Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 46/92 – hereinafter referred to as the VRRRA);
  - the National Assembly Elections Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 44/92 – hereinafter referred to as the NAEA);
  - the Self-Governing National Communities Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 65/94 – hereinafter referred to as the SNCA);
  - the Local Elections Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 72/93, 7/94, 33/94 and 70/95 – hereinafter referred to as the LEA); and
  - the Charter of the Koper Municipality (Official Publications Koper/Capodistria, No. 9/95 – hereinafter referred to as the Charter)
2. The petition was accepted in the part referring to:
  - the alleged unconstitutionality of the right of the members of the Italian and Hungarian national communities (hereinafter referred to as the national communities) to cast two votes in the elections to the National Assembly and in the elections to municipal councils – one vote to elect the representative of the national community to the National Assembly or municipal council, and the other vote to elect other deputies or members to the municipal council; they are granted those rights by the NAEA and the LEA,
  - Article 22 of the VRRRA,
  - the fourth paragraph of Article 53, Article 134, and the second paragraph of Article 140 of the Charter.
3. The petitioners believe that this double voting right, which is how they refer to the right of the members of the national communities to cast two votes in elections to the National Assembly and municipal councils, is inconsistent with the constitutional principle of equality before the law. In their opinion, the double voting right is an inadmissible form of discrimination and in no way contributes to the protection of the national communities.
4. In their initial petition, the petitioners took the position that the Rules of Procedure of the National Assembly (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 40/93, 28/96, and 26/97 – hereinafter referred to as the Rules of Procedure) should limit the rights stemming from the office of the representatives of the national communities. In their opinion, it is unconstitutional for the representatives of the national communities to participate in the decision-making process on any matter that falls under the jurisdiction of the National Assembly.
5. In the opinion of the petitioners, the provision of Article 22 of the VRRRA, which also allows members of the Italian and Hungarian nationalities who do not have permanent residence in nationally mixed settlements to be registered at their request in the electoral register, is unconstitutional as it entails an extension of rights to non-autochthonous members of the national communities and thus exceeds the constitutional protection of nationalities.

6. In the petitioners' opinion, the following provisions of the Charter are also inconsistent with the Constitution:
  - the provision of Article 134, which affords localities the status of legal entities (the petitioners believe that by establishing legal entities of public law the Charter interferes with the powers of the legislature);
  - the provision of the second paragraph of Article 140, as it provides that the national communities must be directly represented in the councils of localities (the petitioners believe that special provisions on the rights of national communities do not apply to localities as they are not self-governing local communities); and
  - the provision of the fourth paragraph of Article 53, which determines that a deputy mayor must be of Italian nationality if the mayor is not (the petitioners believe that this discriminates against the passive right to vote of persons who are not of Italian nationality).
7. On 14 November 1996, the petitioners submitted "a motion for the temporary suspension of the NAEA, insofar as it grants members of the national communities a double voting right, the temporary suspension of the provisions of the Rules of Procedure, insofar as these do not limit the rights stemming from the office of the representatives of the national communities (especially the second paragraph of Article 119 and the second paragraph of Article 128), and the temporary suspension of the Deputies Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 48/92 – hereinafter referred to as the DepA) in its entirety with regard to the representatives of the national communities." In their motion they reiterate their view that it is unconstitutional that the deputies who are the representatives of the national communities participate in the decision-making process on any matter in the National Assembly, for example, also in electing the president of the government and appointing the ministers. The Constitutional Court considered that, by this motion, the petitioners had also extended the petition to include the Rules of Procedure and the DepA. The Constitutional Court held a public hearing regarding the motion for the temporary suspension before rejecting the motion by way of an order.
8. The Secretariat of the National Assembly for Legislation and Legal Affairs (hereinafter referred to as the Secretariat) replied to the entire petition (before it was partially accepted). In its opinion the petition is unfounded, as "the laws that the petitioners claim violate the Constitution merely implement constitutional provisions on the special rights of the autochthonous national communities." In the opinion of the Secretariat, the special protection of the national communities entails the implementation of the principle of equality in a form that takes into account the special position of these two communities and the conditions in which they live. Even if the laws had determined other or more extensive rights than are determined by the Constitution, such would, in the Secretariat's opinion, not be contrary to the Constitution.

9. In the Secretariat's opinion, the double voting right derives from the third paragraph of Article 64 of the Constitution and, with regard to the composition of the National Assembly and the position of its deputies, also from the third paragraph of Article 80 and the first paragraph of Article 82 of the Constitution. Regarding the rights of members of national communities who live outside nationally mixed areas, the Secretariat draws attention to the provision of the fourth paragraph of Article 64 of the Constitution, according to which the legislature must determine the rights exercised by the members of the national communities outside the areas in which these communities live. In the Secretariat's opinion, determining the status of the members of national communities by law is "highly questionable because of the constitutional provisions that guarantee human rights and freedoms, including the provision of Article 61 of the Constitution." The Secretariat also deems that the petitioners failed to demonstrate legal interest for lodging the petition under consideration.
10. After the Order on the partial acceptance of the petition was issued and the public hearing was held, the Secretariat once again replied (exhaustively) to the accepted part of the petition. In its reply, it states that the so-called double voting right is required by constitutional provisions; the double voting right entails the implementation of the special constitutional right referred to in the third paragraph of Article 64 of the Constitution in addition to the general right to vote. The Secretariat emphasises that the Constitution is committed to protecting the rights of the national communities and proceeds from the so-called positive concept of regulating the position of these communities. The Constitution guarantees special rights to the national communities, which manifest themselves in the form of "positive discrimination". The Secretariat emphasises the protection of minorities as an important criterion by which to assess whether an ethnically pluralistic society is democratic. It draws attention to Article 4 of the Framework Convention of the Council of Europe for the Protection of National Minorities, which was also signed by Slovenia; this article determines that measures adopted as a consequence of the specific conditions of persons belonging to national minorities shall not be deemed an act of discrimination of the persons belonging to the national majority.
11. The Secretariat states that the regulation of the position of the national communities in the Constitution entails continuity in this field, as the positive concept of the protection of minorities was already introduced in Slovenia by the Constitution of 1974 and subsequent constitutional amendments. It also refers to the provisions of the Declaration of Independence and the Basic Constitutional Charter on the Independence and Sovereignty of the Republic of Slovenia (Official Gazette RS, No. 1/91-I – hereinafter referred to as the BCC), which determine that the Italian and Hungarian national communities in the Republic of Slovenia and their members are guaranteed all rights from the then applicable Constitution and treaties. It also refers to the provision of Article 338 of the Constitution from 1974 (the amendment from 1989), according to which the national communities shall each have at least one deputy in each of the assemblies of the then Assembly of the Socialist Republic of Slovenia. It notes that the national communities had special voting rights under these provisions and that deprivation of this right would entail a violation of the principle of trust in the law.

12. The Secretariat draws attention to Slovenia's obligations under international law arising from the Agreement on Friendship and Cooperation between the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Hungary, the Agreement on Ensuring the Special Rights of the Slovene National Minority in the Republic of Hungary and of the Hungarian National Community in the Republic of Slovenia (Official Gazette RS, MP, No. 6/93), and the Treaty of Osimo from 1975. It also emphasises that the Framework Convention of the Council of Europe for the Protection of National Minorities requires the signatories, which include Slovenia, to adopt, where necessary, adequate measures in order to promote, in all areas of economic, social, political, and cultural life, full and effective equality between persons belonging to a national minority and those belonging to the majority. The Secretariat states that the requirement for minorities to participate in public affairs, and especially in affairs concerning minorities, follows from the cited convention.
13. Regarding Article 22 of the VRRRA, the Secretariat states that, in accordance with the Constitution, the special voting right of the members of the national communities is not territorially limited and that the rights of the members of the national communities are guaranteed by the Constitution, irrespective of their number and distribution. The Secretariat also refers to the provision of the fourth paragraph of Article 64 of the Constitution, according to which the position of the Italian and Hungarian national communities and the manner in which their rights are exercised in the geographic areas where they live, the obligations of the self-governing local communities for the exercise of these rights, and those rights which the members of these national communities exercise also outside these areas, shall all be regulated by law.
14. Regarding the petitioners' statements that the Rules of Procedure and the DepA should limit the rights of deputies, who are the representatives of the national communities, the Secretariat states that all the provisions of the Constitution regarding deputies determine that they are all equal irrespective of their electoral base or any other circumstances. In the opinion of the Secretariat, such applies to all the rights of the deputies of the national communities in accordance with Article 19 of the DepA, as well as to the rights that arise from the Rules of Procedure (e.g. the right to form a special deputy group and the right to select the working bodies in which they participate). The Secretariat further believes that the procedural requirements for a review of the constitutionality of the Rules of Procedure and the DepA have not been met. The petitioners allegedly failed to demonstrate legal interest, as the Rules of Procedure and the DepA regulate relations that concern deputies and the rules of their work in the National Assembly. The Secretariat further draws attention to the fact that, at the public hearing, the representative of the petitioners took the position that the DepA does not apply to the elected representatives of the national communities. In this regard, the Secretariat deems that this part of the petition must be dismissed as allegedly the petitioners themselves had already withdrawn the petition.

15. The Municipal Council of the Koper Municipality (hereinafter referred to as the Council) replied to the part of the petition referring to the Charter. Regarding the representation of the Italian community in the councils of individual localities, the Council states that it “respected mutatis mutandis the provisions regulating the number of the members of the Italian national community in the municipal council.” In the opinion of the Council, Article 39 of the LSA [i. e. the Local Self-Government Act] serves as the basis for the provision that a deputy mayor must be of Italian nationality if the mayor is not.
16. The Italian and Hungarian self-governing national communities also communicated their position on the petition. Both believe that the challenged provisions are not inconsistent with the Constitution, but that they in fact entail the implementation of the constitutional requirements regarding the protection of the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian national communities.

B – I

17. The petition raises constitutional law issues that concern the protection of the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian national communities. The level of respect or protection afforded to ethnic, religious, linguistic, and other minorities is an important indicator of a democratic society. Democratic states devote special attention to the protection of minorities. The protection of minorities is guaranteed in two forms: through the prohibition of discrimination on the basis of nationality, language, religion, or race and through special rights that appertain only to the minority or its members. The latter form of protection is referred to as the positive protection of minorities. Positive protection results in co-called positive discrimination as members of minorities are guaranteed rights that are not available to members of the majority. Measures of this kind entail a high level of protection of national minorities, afforded by the majority group of the population, and are therefore indicative of a democratic society.
18. The rights of national minorities in international law are regulated by multilateral conventions and bilateral agreements between states. The position of the Italian minority, i.e. the Italian national community, in Slovenia, after the Second World War was regulated by the Special Statute of the Free Territory of Trieste, which was annexed to the London Memorandum of Understanding between the FLRY [the Federal People’s Republic of Yugoslavia], the Italian Republic, and Great Britain. The Special Statute ceased to apply when the Agreement between the SFRY [the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia] and the Italian Republic concluded in Osimo (Official Gazette SFRY, MP, No. 1/77; hereinafter referred to as the Treaty of Osimo) entered into force. In the preamble to the Treaty of Osimo, both states confirmed “their loyalty to the principle of the broadest protection of citizens belonging to ethnic groups (minorities) which derives from their Constitutions and their domestic law and which each Party applies independently and drawing also upon the principles of the Charter of the United Nations, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination and the International Covenants on Human Rights.” Article 8 of the Treaty of Osimo provides: “Each Party declares that, when the Special Statute annexed to the Memorandum of Understanding signed in London on 5 October 1954 ceases to have effect, it shall maintain in force the internal measures already taken in application of the aforesaid Statute and shall ensure under its domestic law that the level of protection stipulated for members of the respective ethnic groups (of the respective minorities) in the expired Special Statute is maintained.” The Special Statute ceased to be in force on the day the Treaty of Osimo entered into force, but continued to be applied as a criterion for ensuring the rights of national minorities in Slovenia’s neighbouring states. The Treaty contains no provision that would guarantee members of the minorities the right to direct representation in representative bodies.

19. The position of the Hungarian national community in Slovenia is governed by the Agreement on Ensuring the Special Rights of the Slovene National Minority in the Republic of Hungary and of the Hungarian National Community in the Republic of Slovenia, signed on 6 November 1992 and ratified by law on 26 March 1993 (Official Gazette RS, MP, No. 6/93). Article 8 of this Agreement provides that the signatories shall guarantee, in accordance with domestic legislation, the adequate participation of the minorities in decision-making at the local, regional, and state levels on matters concerning the rights and position of the minorities and their members.
20. One of the measures for the protection of minorities also includes ensuring their participation in decision-making on public affairs. However, international law as it is currently in force does not guarantee the representation of minorities in representative bodies (Ohlinger/Pernthaler, Projekt eines Volksgruppenmandats im Kaernter Landtag, p. 8; the authors also refer to the work of Oeter, Minderheiten im institutionellen Staatsaufbau. See also Turk, Mednarodnopravni vidiki sedanjega položaja slovenske narodnosti skupnosti v Italiji [International Law Aspects of the Current Position of the Slovene National Community in Italy], p. 6; the author states that exceptions can be found in only very few treaties, e.g. the Treaty of Sèvres and the Cyprus Memorandum). Even the Framework Convention of the Council of Europe for the Protection of National Minorities, which Slovenia has also signed but not yet ratified (the Convention has not yet entered into force), does not explicitly require that the signatories ensure the representation of minorities in representative bodies. It merely provides that the Parties undertake to adopt, where necessary, adequate measures in order to promote, in all areas of economic, social, political, and cultural life, full and effective equality between persons belonging to a national minority and those belonging to the majority. The measures adopted in accordance with this commitment shall not be considered an act of discrimination (the third paragraph of Article 4).
21. Although such is not required by international law, the constitutions and laws of some states guarantee the participation of minorities in decision-making on general matters in representative bodies. The following models for guaranteeing this right

(which may also be combined with each other) are particularly well-known:<sup>1</sup>

1 A more detailed overview of the regulation in different legal systems:

- In the Danish parliament (Folketing), two minorities (from the Faroe Islands and Greenland) are each guaranteed two seats.
- Germany: at the federal level and in some federal states (Schleswig-Holstein, Saxony), the electoral threshold does not apply to political parties of national minorities. By voting for national parties, members of minorities may achieve representation for the minority in parliament. When voting, they are required to choose whether to vote for a minority party or for one of the parties from the traditional political spectrum.
- Finland: The inhabitants of the Åland Islands are guaranteed a seat in the parliament as the islands constitute an independent constituency in which one member of parliament is elected. This deputy has the same rights and duties as all other deputies. This deputy normally joins the deputy group of the Swedish People's Party, although he is not a member of this party.
- Croatia: The Constitutional Act on Human Rights and the Rights of Ethnic and National Communities or Minorities in the Republic of Croatia (Narodne novine [Official Gazette], No. 34/92 – consolidated text) provides that the members of minorities that represent more than 8% of the total population – i.e. the Serbian minority – have the right to elect five representatives to the house of representatives of the Sabor [Parliament] and the members of all the other minorities have the right to elect five representatives in total. The third paragraph of Article 18 provides that the deputies of these minorities (representing less than 8% of the total population) are “the representatives of all the ethnic and national communities or minorities who have elected them and must protect their interests.”

The Electoral Act from 1992 (Zakon o izborima zastupnika u Sabor RH, Narodne novine, No. 22/92) contains identical provisions regarding the election of the representatives of the minorities. Four of the five representatives of the minorities “representing less than 8%” are elected in four special constituencies according to the majority system. They are elected by the members of the minorities. The nationality of the voters is entered in the electoral register (Zakon o popisima birača [the Electoral Register Act], Narodne novine, No. 19/92). The nationality of the candidates is also indicated in the nomination procedure (Article 15 of the Electoral Act).

The initial wording of the Act provided that the number of members of parliament is to be increased if the guaranteed representation of the minorities is not achieved in the elections; candidates on the national lists (according to this Act 60 deputies were elected in proportional elections on the basis of national lists) who had not been elected were to be deemed elected, provided they were of the appropriate nationality and depending on the share of votes in favour of a specific national list. If the required number of deputies of appropriate nationalities could not be ensured through this method, supplementary elections were to be carried out. According to the Act, an electoral threshold (3%) applied to all national lists, but the Constitutional Court (U-VII-233/92, Narodne novine, No. 50/92) decided that this threshold shall not be applied to national minority parties.

The amended Electoral Act (Narodne novine, No. 68/93) brought changes to the electoral system. A total of 80 deputies are elected according to the proportional system and 32 according to the majority system. Of these 32, a total of 28 are elected in “ordinary” constituencies on the basis of the principle that one deputy is elected for approximately the same number of inhabitants. 12 deputies are elected by the diaspora (Croatian citizens throughout the world) from special lists. Three deputies are elected by the citizens of Serbian nationality according to the majority system in a single constituency at the state level. Four deputies (as according to the previous regulation) are elected by the members of minorities in four special constituencies (Italians elect a deputy in the first constituency, Hungarians in the second constituency, Czechs and Slovaks in the third constituency, and Russians, Ukrainians, Germans, and Austrians in the fourth constituency).

- a) the determination of constituencies is adapted to the territorial distribution of minorities (this measure has been enacted, inter alia, by the following states: Hungary, Croatia, Finland, Belgium, Italy, and Switzerland),
  - b) the omission of the electoral threshold with regard to national minority parties (this measure has been enacted, inter alia, by the following states: Hungary, Germany, Poland, and Romania), and
  - c) minorities are guaranteed a seat in representative bodies (this right has been enacted, inter alia, by the following states: Croatia, Romania, Hungary, Denmark, and Finland).
22. The Slovene Constitution of 1974 did not include provisions on the mandatory representation of the national communities in municipal assemblies and the Assembly of the Republic. Article 252 provided that members of [other] nationalities may establish self-governing communities for education and culture purposes in the municipalities in which they live. Together with specific councils of the municipal assembly or with corresponding self-managing interest communities, these commu-

In elections in small constituencies where seats are distributed according to the majority system, the members of the minorities have the option to cast a vote. The Mandatory Instructions of the National Electoral Commission (Obavezne upute broj XII, Narodne novine, No. 82/95) state that the right of the minorities to elect their own representatives is only a right and not an obligation. It is stipulated that the members of the minorities may not vote twice for a candidate in constituencies in which one or three deputies are elected, respectively. Those members of minorities who wish to vote for a “general” deputy must first obtain an attestation from the polling station that they have not voted in the special elections for the representative of the minorities. On the basis of this attestation, they may cast a vote for a candidate in the “ordinary” single-member constituency.

The term of office of “minority” deputies is not restricted (see the Rules of Procedure of the Sabor of the Republic of Croatia, Narodne novine, Nos. 59/92 and 89/92). The concept of minority consent (or veto) is not integrated into Croatian law.

- Romania: the second paragraph of Article 59 of the Romanian Constitution determines that minority organisations have a guaranteed seat in the representative body even if they do not obtain the sufficient number of votes. A minority may only be represented by one organisation. Article 4 of the Electoral Act provides that all minority organisations of a single minority together have the right to one representative if, at the state level, they obtain at least 5% of the average number of votes required for the election of one deputy. The number of members of the representative body is increased accordingly because of the direct representation of minorities.
- Hungary: the representation of minorities in parliament is guaranteed by a reduction of the number of votes required for the election of the deputy representing a minority (Articles 49 and 50 of the Electoral Act).
- Italy: in South Tyrol (the Region of Trentino – Alto Adige), the Ladin language group is guaranteed a representative in the regional council. If no member of the Ladin language group is elected from the lists in the constituencies (the region is divided into two constituencies – Bolzano and South Tyrol – and elections are held according to the proportional system with the possibility to cast a preferential vote) in accordance with the general rules, the candidate who has obtained the largest number of preferential votes is elected. The representative of the minority elected in such manner replaces the last of the candidates from his or her list who was elected according to the general rules (depending on the number of preferential votes).

nities co-decided on specific educational and cultural matters. The representation of the members of the national communities in the councils of the assemblies was only ensured through the internal nomination rules of the then Socialist League of Working People, which had monopolised the candidate selection process.

23. With the Constitutional Amendments of 1989 (Official Gazette SRS [Socialist Republic of Slovenia], No. 32/89), the provisions on the protection of the nationalities were amended. Article 250 defined the two nationalities as being autochthonous. A provision was added after Article 163 that provided that the Italian and Hungarian nationalities must be adequately represented in the assemblies of municipalities in which members of these two nationalities live together with the members of the Slovene nationality. The third paragraph of Article 338 of the Constitution provided that the Italian and Hungarian nationalities shall each have at least one delegate in each of the councils of the Assembly of the Socialist Republic of Slovenia. In accordance with this constitutional provision, the Elections to the Assemblies Act (Official Gazette SRS, Nos. 42/89 and 5/90, Official Gazette RS, Nos. 10/90 and 45/90) provided that special constituencies shall be formed for the election of the delegates of the members of the Italian or Hungarian nationalities to the councils of the Assembly of the Socialist Republic of Slovenia in nationally mixed areas, and that special constituencies could also be formed for the election of delegates of the members of the Italian or Hungarian nationalities to the councils of municipal assemblies (Article 37). Article 10 of the Act provided that voters in special constituencies and other members of the Italian or Hungarian nationalities in municipalities with areas in which members of those nationalities also live autochthonously with Slovenes (i.e. nationally mixed areas) have the active right to vote in the election of the delegates of the Italian or Hungarian nationalities to the councils of the Assembly of the Socialist Republic of Slovenia; in the election of the delegates to the councils of municipal assemblies such right shall only be granted to the voters in special constituencies, while other members of the nationalities in a municipality that includes nationally mixed areas only enjoy such right if it is determined by the Charter of the municipality. The law only granted the passive right to vote [i.e. the right to stand for election] to the members of the Italian and Hungarian nationalities.
24. The second paragraph of the third point of the Basic Constitutional Charter on the Independence and Sovereignty of the Republic of Slovenia (Official Gazette RS, No. 1/91-I) provided that “the Italian and Hungarian national communities in the Republic of Slovenia, and their members, are guaranteed all the rights in accordance by the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia and valid treaties.” Here, the term Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia refers to the Constitution in force at the time, i.e. the Constitution of 1974, as amended.
25. The first paragraph of Article 5 of the Constitution currently in force provides that the state shall protect and guarantee the rights of the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian national communities in its own territory. The special rights of the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian national communities in Slovenia are regulated by Article 64 of the Constitution and the third paragraph of Article 83 of the Constitution, which provides that one deputy of the Italian and one deputy of the Hungarian national communities shall always be elected to the National Assembly.

26. Article 64 of the Constitution is entitled “Special Rights of the Autochthonous Italian and Hungarian National Communities in Slovenia.” The fourth paragraph of Article 64 provides that the two national communities shall be directly represented in representative bodies of local self-government and in the National Assembly. The sixth paragraph of this Article provides that laws, regulations, and other general acts that concern the exercise of the constitutionally provided rights and the position of the national communities exclusively, may not be adopted without the consent of the representatives of these national communities.
27. The Constitution guarantees two inextricably linked rights to the members of the national communities: the right to direct representation in representative bodies of local communities and the National Assembly, and the right to one deputy each in the National Assembly. The latter is a logical extension of the right to direct representation in the National Assembly. The mentioned rights are special rights afforded to the national communities that guarantee these communities the opportunity to participate in the decision-making process of the National Assembly and representative bodies of local communities, regardless of the number of their members or the electoral system.
28. In matters that relate solely to the constitutional rights and position of the national communities, the representatives of the national communities in the National Assembly and municipal councils have the right of a “minority veto” (the sixth paragraph of Article 64 of the Constitution). In such manner it is ensured that the representatives of the national majority cannot outvote the representatives of the two national communities on matters that relate solely to the constitutional rights or position of the national communities.

B – II

29. The petitioners believe that the Rules of Procedure and the DepA or a special statute should limit the rights of the deputies, who are the representatives of the national communities, to deciding on those issues that relate solely to the national communities themselves. In the initial petition, this position was referred to briefly; however, in the motion for temporary suspension, the petitioners also extended the petition to the above-mentioned acts. When deciding on the motion for temporary suspension, the Constitutional Court had not yet reviewed the existence of the procedural requirements for initiating proceedings to review the constitutionality of the DepA and the Rules of Procedure. When deciding on the accepted part of the petition, it assessed separately whether the procedural requirements to initiate those proceedings had been met. It found that the statutory regulation of the scope of the rights of deputies did not interfere directly with the rights, legal interests, or legal position of the petitioners. It therefore dismissed the petition in this part.

B – III

30. The NAEA provides that:

- every citizen of the Republic of Slovenia who has reached the age of 18 and has not been deprived of his or her legal capacity by election day shall have the right to vote and to stand for election as a deputy (the first paragraph of Article 7),
- every member of the Italian or Hungarian national communities who has the right to vote shall have the right to vote and to stand for election as a deputy of the national communities (Article 8).

None of the provisions of the Act provide that the exercise of the special voting right (the right to vote and to stand for election as a deputy of the Italian or Hungarian national community) excludes the exercise of the general right to vote.

31. The NAEA determines a special procedure for the election of the deputies of the national communities. The deputy of a national community is elected in a constituency that shall be established in those areas in which the members of the communities live (the sixth paragraph of Article 20).
32. The VRRA regulates the voting rights register in such manner that the register of citizens who have the right to vote and to stand for election as a deputy of the Italian or Hungarian national communities are kept separately. The special electoral register for each election is compiled by the commission of the self-governing national community. The electoral registers have to be published and they are confirmed by the competent administrative authority (an administrative unit).
33. Members of the national communities who are registered in the general and special electoral registers may cast two votes in the elections to the National Assembly – one for the election of the deputy of the national community and the second for the election of other deputies. These persons therefore have a double voting right – general and special.
34. The special voting right entails a departure from the principle of equal suffrage. The principle of equal suffrage requires that each voter must have the same number of votes and that these votes have the same value. Voters who have a special voting right in addition to a general right to vote have two votes; their will is taken into account twice: firstly, when electing the deputy of the national community and, secondly, when electing other deputies. The right of the members of the national communities to elect their own deputy, irrespective of their number, already entails a departure from the principle of equal suffrage. Furthermore, double voting entails an additional departure from this principle.
35. The special voting right of the members of the national communities is an expression of the constitutionally guaranteed protection of these communities and their members. Although it entails a departure from the principle of equal suffrage, such “positive discrimination” is not constitutionally inadmissible; on the contrary, the Constitution requires that the legislature implement such measures into the legislation. As the Constitution itself provides for or, in fact, requires a departure from the principle of equal suffrage (“positive discrimination”), the Constitutional Court did not have to assess the gravity of the interference with equal suffrage and the importance of the constitutional value achieved by such interference.

36. The Constitutional Court reviewed the question of whether the legislature could have implemented the constitutional provisions on the direct representation of the national communities and the election of one deputy for the Italian and Hungarian national communities to the National Assembly in a different manner, i.e. in a way that would not have given a double voting right to the members of the national communities. If the law gave only one vote to the members of the national communities and provided them with the option to exercise either their general right to vote or their special voting right (i.e. to choose between voting in elections for a deputy of the national community and voting in elections for other deputies), these persons would have been deprived of one of these two constitutional rights. As the Constitution does not limit the general right to vote of the members of the national communities and that, at the same time, it gives them the right to elect a deputy of the national community, the enactment of the right to only one vote with the possibility to choose (option) would result in the members of the national communities being forced to choose between two constitutional rights: the general right to vote and the right to direct representation. By opting for one of these two rights, they would automatically renounce the other. Such regulation would be inconsistent with the Constitution, as the members of the national communities would be deprived of one or the other right – depending on their choice.
37. The right of the members of both autochthonous national communities to vote in elections of the deputy of the national community and in elections of other deputies derives from the Constitution itself, and thus the legislature acted in accordance with the Constitution when it incorporated this right into the electoral system. It is true that the high level of protection of autochthonous national communities guaranteed by the Constitution entails a dual departure from the principle of equal suffrage, however this departure is provided for and required by the Constitution itself as a form of so-called positive discrimination.

B – IV

38. The third paragraph of Article 64 of the Constitution provides that the national communities shall also be directly represented in the representative bodies of the local self-government. As is the case with the analogous regulation in accordance with the NAEA, the right of the members of the national communities to cast two votes in the elections of municipal council members is also not inconsistent with the Constitution. The grounds on which this finding is based are the same as those regarding the regulation in accordance with the NAEA – only this statutory mechanism enables the implementation of the constitutional precept that the national communities shall be directly represented in the representative bodies of local communities.

B – V

39. The special voting right of the members of the national communities is registered in a special electoral register that is compiled by the self-governing national community and confirmed by the competent authority (the fourth paragraph of Article 2 of the VRRA). The electoral register of citizens who are members of the national communities in the areas in which these communities live is compiled by a commission of the respective self-governing national community. A special electoral register is prepared for each polling station (Article 19). The electoral register is then confirmed by the competent authority (an administrative unit). The challenged Article 22 determines that citizens who are members of the Italian or Hungarian national communities and have no permanent residence in the areas in which these communities live are to be entered in this special electoral register based on their request in writing submitted to the respective self-governing national community.

40. Special constitutional rights (including the special voting right) are guaranteed only to the members of the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian national communities. Neither the Constitution nor the law define the concept “autochthonous” in more detail. More detailed criteria for establishing which voters have a special voting right cannot be found in the VRRA or in any other law. In practice, in the elections of the deputies to the National Assembly in 1992 and 1996, the commissions of the self-governing national communities carried out the registration process in the special electoral registers without any statutory criteria.
41. The second paragraph of Article 121 of the Constitution provides that self-governing communities may be vested by law with the public authority to perform certain duties of the state administration. The second paragraph of Article 64 of the Constitution provides specifically that the state may authorise self-governing national communities to perform certain functions under national jurisdiction.
42. The principles of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution), the principle of the separation of powers (the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution), and the principle of the legality of the administration’s operations (second paragraph of Article 120 of the Constitution) establish the requirement that, when exercising these powers, bearers of public authority must, in terms of the principle of equality, be put on an equal footing with state administration authorities. When exercising public authority in specific cases, they must have a legal basis in the law. Such also applies to self-governing national communities when they perform functions pursuant to the public authority vested in them – especially if they decide on the rights of individuals.
43. As the special voting right is recorded by entry in the special electoral registers of the members of the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian national communities, and as, at polling stations before the vote, this voting right is demonstrated by such entry in the electoral register, the criteria to be applied by the commissions of the self-governing national communities when compiling these electoral registers or deciding on the registration of individual voters in these electoral registers should have been defined. Affiliation with the autochthonous Italian or Hungarian national communities is a status to which the Constitution (and in accordance with it the law) ascribes specific rights (particularly the special voting right). Therefore, the criteria determining whether a citizen belongs to the autochthonous Italian or Hungarian national community should have been determined by statute. By determining these criteria, the law would not interfere with the constitutional right referred to in Article 61, according to which everyone has the right to freely express affiliation with their nation or national community. Each person has the right to freely express their affiliation with any nation or national community. As regards the decision as to who should enjoy these special rights, which the Constitution only grants to the members of the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian national communities, not only the will of the individual is decisive, but statutory criteria must be determined for such decision.

44. The Constitution recognises the Italian and Hungarian national communities as autochthonous. All the special rights through which the Constitution protects the national communities refer only to the members of the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian national communities, and not to all persons who define themselves as Italians or Hungarians. In this regard, it is therefore not sufficient for a person to define him- or herself as Italian or Hungarian in order to be able to exercise the special rights (particularly the special voting right). A regulation requiring the commission of a self-governing national community to enter in the special electoral register any citizen who has reached the age of majority, has the legal capacity and has declared that he considers himself a member of the autochthonous Italian or Hungarian national community would be constitutionally inadmissible. Actual affiliation with the autochthonous Italian or Hungarian national communities is not in fact simply dependent on the individual's will, but is also a matter for the national community, which in accordance with the statutory criteria also considers such an individual to be its member and enters him or her in the special electoral register. A regulation guaranteeing anyone who defined themselves as a member of the autochthonous Italian or Hungarian national communities the right to be entered in the special electoral register would not expand the protection of the national community, but would instead enable unrestricted abuse, either solely for election purposes or with the intention of distorting the true will of the national community regarding its operations, elections to its own bodies, etc. Such regulation would negate the special rights of the members of the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian national communities.
45. The legislature should have determined the criteria for establishing affiliation with the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian national communities. The absence of such criteria allows for completely arbitrary decision-making, which is contrary to the principles of a state governed by the rule of law, the principle of the separation of powers, and the principle of the legality of the administration's operations. The Constitutional Court established that this legal gap exists in the regulation of entries in the special electoral register pursuant to the VRR. It required the legislature to fill this unconstitutional legal gap prior to calling the next elections to the National Assembly. The Constitutional Court set a relatively long time limit due to the complexity of the subject matter from academic and political perspectives and its sensitivity; more specifically, the legislature must take special care to ensure that it fills this legal gap so as not to jeopardise the constitutional rights of the national communities and other constitutional rights or freedoms.

46. In its assessment as to whether it is consistent with the Constitution that the special voting right can also be exercised by persons who have permanent residence outside the areas in which the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian national communities live, the Constitutional Court was required to interpret the concept “autochthonous”. It considered that it is not constitutionally inadmissible for a person who lives outside the nationally mixed areas to be considered a member of the autochthonous Italian or Hungarian national communities. In this respect, it took particular note of the provision of the fourth paragraph of Article 64 of the Constitution, according to which “the rights that the members of these national communities exercise also outside the areas where these national communities live shall be regulated by law.” It did not, however, decide on the question of whether it would be unconstitutional if, when filling the established unconstitutional legal gap (i.e. when defining the criteria for affiliation with the autochthonous Italian or Hungarian national communities), the legislature were also to include the criterion of permanent residence in an area in which the autochthonous national communities live.

B – VI

47. The petitioners challenge the provisions of Article 134 of the Charter, according to which local communities are granted the status of legal entities. By Decision No. U-I-274/95 (OdlUS V, 119), the Constitutional Court held that the mandatory interpretation of Article 19 of the LSA in force at the time enabled municipalities to grant legal personality to their constituent parts was not inconsistent with the Constitution. However, it established an unconstitutional legal gap in the LSA and required the legislature to regulate the fundamental characteristics of the legal status of the constituent parts of municipalities that have legal personality. The National Assembly adopted the Act amending the Local Self-Government Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 70/97) on 30 October 1997. The first paragraph of Article 19 of the amended LSA provides that the constituent parts of a municipality may have the status of legal entities. The provision of the Charter that grants local communities the status of legal entities is thus not inconsistent with the Constitution and the laws.
48. The challenged provision of the second paragraph of Article 140 of the Charter determines the direct representation of the national communities in the localities’ councils. The petitioners believe that the special provisions on the rights of national communities should not apply to a locality as it is not a self-governing local community. It is true that a locality is not a self-governing local community; nevertheless, part of the decision-making on public affairs can take place therein if a municipality transfers by Charter the implementation of specific tasks to the locality. These are matters that refer to the most basic public amenities linked to the local area – i.e. local roads, premises for cultural activities, public services in the local area, local events, maintaining the appearance of the local area, etc. The Constitution demands the direct representation of the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian communities in the National Assembly and representative bodies of local communities (municipalities), however, it does not prohibit their direct representation in the representative bodies of constituent parts of a municipality. As the Constitution demands so-called positive discrimination in the form of a special voting right in the elections to the National Assembly and to municipal councils, a regulation in the Charter that also guarantees such special right to the members of the autochthonous Italian national community in elections to the localities' councils is not inconsistent with the Constitution and the laws, although it entails a departure from the principle of the equal suffrage.

49. The fourth paragraph of Article 53 of the Charter provides that a deputy mayor must be of Italian nationality if the mayor is not. The petitioners believe that such entails a discriminatory restriction of the passive right to vote. The deputy mayor is not elected in direct elections but is appointed by the municipal council. The challenged provision therefore cannot entail an interference with the equal suffrage. However, it could entail an interference with equality before the law (the second paragraph of Article 14) – discrimination against persons who are not of Italian nationality but wish to stand as a candidate for deputy mayor. The principle of equality before the law prohibits the legislature or representative bodies of local communities from determining different legal consequences for factual situation that share the same essential elements without an objective justification. The restriction on who may be elected to the office of deputy mayor, which puts those persons who are not of Italian nationality at a disadvantage, is objectively justified and thus not constitutionally inadmissible. It is justified on the basis of the above-described aims of the so-called positive discrimination and the special protection of the national communities. The challenged provision of the Charter, which gives specific priority to members of the autochthonous Italian national community, was also adopted by the municipal council by the required two-thirds majority. Such entails that this right of the members of this national community has been recognised by the national majority through its representatives in the municipal council; for this reason, too, it is not possible to deem it inadmissible discrimination.

50. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of Articles 21, 25, and 48 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94), composed of: Dr Lovro Šturm, President, and Judges Dr Miroslava Geč-Korošec, Dr Peter Jambrek, Dr Tone Jerovšek, Mag. Matevž Krivic, Mag. Janez Snoj, Franc Testen, and Dr Lojze Ude. Points 1, 2, 3, and 5 of the operative provisions were adopted unanimously. Points 4 and 6 of the operative provisions were adopted by seven votes to one. Judge Ude voted against. Judge Ude submitted a dissenting opinion, and Judges Jerovšek and Krivic submitted concurring opinions.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE DR UDE
REGARDING POINTS 4 AND 6 OF THE OPERATIVE PROVISIONS

1. I voted for Points 1, 2, 3, and 5 of the operative provisions of the Decision, in which it was essentially decided that the regulation set out in the National Assembly Elections Act, the Local Elections Act, the Voting Rights Register Act, and the Charter of the Koper Municipality, according to which members of the Italian and Hungarian self-governing national communities have the right to cast two votes in the elections of deputies to the National Assembly, is consistent with the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia.
2. I do not agree, however, with Point 4 of the operative provisions, according to which it is inconsistent with the Constitution that the Voting Rights Register Act does not determine the criteria applied by the commissions of the Italian and Hungarian self-governing national communities when deciding on the entry of voters in the special electoral register of the citizens who are members of the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian national communities, and the National Assembly must remedy this inconsistency with the Constitution prior to calling the next regular elections to the National Assembly.

The concept of an autochthonous national community is not sufficiently defined from a legal, political, and academic perspective. Already in the discussions held during the adoption of the Constitution, some legal theorists, especially those who study the legal position of minorities or ethnic communities in the context of international law, expressed the opinion that the Constitution should not use this concept and associate it with an extremely high level of rights. Even after the Constitution was adopted, the concept of an autochthonous national community was never sufficiently clarified and no elements have yet been determined that are decisive for the establishment of whether or not a specific national community is autochthonous. For this reason, I doubt that the legislature could satisfactorily fulfil the obligation to define by law the criteria for entering voters in the special electoral register of the members of the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian national communities. The Constitutional Court has set a relatively long time limit for the National Assembly, since new elections to the National Assembly will be held in less than three years. Nevertheless, I believe that the legislature will not have sufficient time to study this issue or, more importantly, to prepare reasoned positions of sufficient quality. In addition, such discussion may raise further questions that are crucial for Slovene society, such as, for example, the question of whether it is right that the two autochthonous national communities are granted an extremely high level of rights, especially political rights, while some other national communities, which have more members, are not even guaranteed a much lower level of rights in the spheres of culture and the economy. It is to be expected that some other countries and the international community will exert pressure on Slovenia in relation to these issues. It is therefore, in my opinion, unwise to further exacerbate these issues through positions of the Constitutional Court that could be used as an argument in discussions on the regulation of the rights of national communities in our country.

It is true that the definition of the criteria that are decisive for registering voters in the special electoral register of citizens who are members of the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian national communities is not identical to a definition of the content of the concept of an “autochthonous national community”. However, by defining the criteria that are decisive for the affiliation with an autochthonous national community, the content of the concept of autochthony is also defined. These two issues simply cannot be separated. In my opinion it is necessary to refrain from defining the content of the concept of an autochthonous national community by law until it becomes clear from an academic perspective as to what this concept entails and what consequences a definition of this concept would have for the protection of the rights of the national communities (autochthonous and non-autochthonous). In my opinion, it is too early, and at this time even legally and politically irrational, to impose on the legislature the obligation to define this concept by law.

3. I also do not agree with Point 6 of the operative provisions, by which the Constitutional Court dismissed the petition in the part that refers to the Deputies Act and the Rules of Procedure of the National Assembly. As a result, the Constitutional Court refused to decide whether the provision that the two deputies – who are representatives of the Italian and Hungarian national communities – have the same rights as the rest of the deputies in the National Assembly, and that they may therefore vote on all matters, is consistent with the Constitution.

The allegation that the petitioners do not have legal interest to challenge the regulation of the scope of rights of the deputies as such regulation does not directly interfere with their rights is extremely unpersuasive. The Constitutional Court recognised that the same petitioners have legal interest to challenge the regulation of the “double” voting right of the members of the Italian and Hungarian national communities in the elections to the National Assembly and municipality councils. The Constitutional Court, however, failed to state the reasons for its position that these petitioners do not have legal interest to challenge the regulation of the scope of rights of the two deputies to the National Assembly, and only held, in very abstract and general terms, that the regulation did not directly interfere with the petitioners’ rights, legal interests, or legal position. It is understandable that the Constitutional Court was unable to find reasons for such a position, as this differentiation between the regulation of elections and the regulation of the scope of rights of the deputies is entirely unconvincing.

The Constitutional Court therefore should have substantively considered the scope of rights of the two deputies of the autochthonous national communities. With its formal decision on dismissal, the Constitutional Court avoided substantive consideration and thus providing an answer, even though the answer to this question is very straightforward from a constitutional perspective. In accordance with the first paragraph of Article 80 of the Constitution, the National Assembly is composed of deputies of the citizens of Slovenia, and comprises 90 deputies in total. In accordance with the third paragraph of the same Article of the Constitution, one deputy of the Italian and one deputy of the Hungarian national communities shall always be elected to the National Assembly. These two deputies therefore number among the ninety deputies, each of whom, in principle, have the same rights.

The same conclusion is inevitably reached on the basis of an interpretation of the fifth paragraph of Article 64 of the Constitution, which provides that laws, regulations, and other general acts that concern the exercise of the constitutionally provided rights and the position of the national communities exclusively may not be adopted without the consent of the representatives of these national communities. The deputies of the national communities to the National Assembly therefore hold a constitutionally defined special position regarding the adoption of laws that concern the rights and position of the national communities, while otherwise their rights are identical in terms of content to those of other deputies.

The reasoning of the petitioners could therefore be relevant only in the procedure for amending the Constitution, and not in proceedings to review the constitutionality of laws or other general acts implementing the current constitutional order.

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE DR JEROVŠEK

I voted for all the Points of the operative provisions and for the entire Decision; nevertheless, I was of the opinion that the decision reached in Point 4 of the operative provisions, according to which the Voting Rights Register Act is unconstitutional merely because it does not determine the criteria according to which the commissions of the Italian and Hungarian self-governing national communities to decide on the entry of the voters in the special electoral register of citizens who are members of the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian national communities, was too narrow. More specifically, I believe that, apart from the finding that the mentioned act does not entail sufficient regulation, the Constitutional Court should have held that it is unconstitutional to provide that the national community itself may decide on the entry of voters in the special electoral register. Such would need to be entrusted to the authorities responsible for registering voters in the electoral registers. By such authorisation as is currently provided by the law, the national community (even though to a somewhat lesser extent after the criteria will be defined) has the possibility to generate the number of persons who are entitled to vote, thereby creating certain special relationships to the remaining electorate with regard to the elections to the National Assembly. Even registration in the general electoral registers is not entrusted to special commissions of the electorate but to the competent state authorities who perform such in the manner and in the procedure determined by law. As a result, the current regulation results in an unequal position with regard to the manner in which electoral registers are prepared, which are in addition prepared without the appropriate control of the competent state authorities. In such situation, it is even more reasonable to expect that the required criteria will at least additionally provide for an adequate control mechanism for these registrations and determine appropriate legal remedies in the event of irregularities in the decision-making process regarding the registration of voters on the electoral register.

Dr Tone Jerovšek

I

I agree with all the points of the operative provisions as well as with the entire reasoning, except for one or two formulations in Section B – V; nevertheless, in this concurring opinion, I wish to further elaborate upon the reasoning in Section B – V and, at the same time, also state my position on the differing views on the issues at hand that are also partially evident from some separate opinions.

II

I would like to draw attention to the importance of the constitutional premise referred to at the beginning of Paragraph 40 of the reasoning in Section B – V, which is formulated as follows: “Special constitutional rights (including the special voting right) are guaranteed only to members of the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian national communities.” Members of other “nations or national communities” (wording of Article 61 of the Constitution),<sup>1</sup> i.e. including the members of any other autochthonous national communities, are guaranteed other constitutional rights, especially those determined by Articles 61 and 62 of the Constitution: the right to express their national affiliation and the right to express their culture and use their language and script.

I believe the concerns that Point 4 of the operative provisions and its reasoning in Section B – V could prompt needless discussion on the content of the concept of autochthony and on a possible extension of the special constitutional rights of the Italian and Hungarian autochthonous national communities to others to be with-

- 1 It is not entirely clear from the wording of Article 61 of the Constitution, which refers to the affiliation with “his or her nation or national community”, what the difference between a “nation” and a “national community” is supposed to be, as it is likely that members of every nation also form some kind of “national community” (referred to, of course, in sociological terms as an unorganised group of people that does not have any authorities and legal norms, but that is held together by different ties). With regard to its origins, this wording could probably be attributed to the term “nations and nationalities of the SFRY” that was used in the previous regime; the term “nations” designated the constitutive nations of Yugoslavia (i.e. the nations that founded Yugoslavia), whereas the disputable term “nationalities”, which is problematic from various perspectives, referred to what is clearly and simply known throughout the world as national minorities. I therefore assume that today’s wording “nations and national communities” is some kind of (transformed) remnant of the previous syntagm “nations and nationalities”. In this context, Article 61 of the Constitution should be interpreted in the sense that it guarantees everyone the right to freely express affiliation with any nationality living outside Slovenia, or indeed with any nationality whose members have already lived in Slovenia for a long time and enjoy the status of “national community” or minority. Or, to be more specific, this distinction actually makes it possible for persons who deem themselves to be Italian to freely define themselves either as members of the Italian minority in Slovenia (“national community”) or simply as members of the Italian nation as a whole. However, it is likely that this nuanced distinction lacks any significant practical importance. If an Italian person also has a sense of belonging to the Italian minority in Slovenia, he will probably display this in practical terms (e.g. by participating in the life and activities of the Italian minority or by registering on the special electoral register) and not by some abstract declaration.

out foundation. On the one hand, it is neither possible nor necessary to prevent or fear such discussions because the gradual increase in sensitivity towards these issues on a global level is also inevitably reflected here, in Slovenia; on the other hand, in accordance with Articles 61 and 62 of the Constitution, the members of all the national communities in Slovenia are guaranteed such a high level of constitutional protection (which either does not exist or is not achieved in many traditional democratic states) that it is entirely an internal matter of Slovenia and its constitutional order for what reasons – constitutional, traditional, historical, cultural, and political – it provided the Italian and Hungarian national communities with an even higher level of protection or additional special rights in the Constitution. It is also entirely an internal matter of Slovenia as to whether it will deem it necessary to provide any other national community, apart from these two, with an equally high level of protection and rights in the future, given that the regulation of the rights of the members of all the national communities is more than satisfactory when compared to international law and other legal systems. It is my personal view that there is a probability that this issue will arise – albeit not immediately – only in relation to the Roma community, which in principle already enjoys a special position and special rights in accordance with Article 65 of the Constitution, but not to the same extent as the Italian and Hungarian national communities.

Above all, it is clear that this point of the operative provisions and its reasoning do not require a statutory definition of an autochthonous national community, but merely a statutory definition of the “criteria to be applied by the commissions of the Italian and Hungarian self-governing national communities when deciding on the registration of citizens in a special electoral register”. These are, however, two related but nevertheless independent and different issues. I will explain hereinafter why this is the case.

The issue at hand does not concern an individual not being allowed to express his or her affiliation with one of the two national communities (i.e. to subjectively define him- or herself as its member), as this is his or her constitutional right in accordance with Article 61 of the Constitution. However, it is not possible to impose on this national community, which is organised as a special self-governing community in accordance with Article 64 of the Constitution, the obligation to accept as its member anyone who has declared him or herself as its member or to enter him or her in the special electoral register, especially not when a person (or even a larger organised group of people) seeks to abuse, either solely for election purposes or with the intention of distorting the true will of the national community regarding its operations, the elections to its own bodies, etc.

This idea has already been expressed in Paragraph 44 of the reasoning and I would merely like to further support it with additional arguments. In my opinion, emphasis should not be devoted to the concept of autochthony, but instead solely to the necessary statutory definition of the criteria for the preparation of the special electoral register in order to protect the Italian and Hungarian national communities from any electoral and other abuses. The purpose of these criteria is therefore to protect the two national communities from potential abuses, but not from the possibility that another Italian or Hungarian, who immigrated subsequently, would “pretend” to be one of the “autochthonous” Italians and Hungarians (who have been living here for a long time).

Paragraph 46 of the reasoning also partially addresses this issue, but, in my opinion, not in an entirely adequate manner. In my opinion, the question of whether Italians and Hungarians who live, for example, in Ljubljana or Maribor may also obtain a special voting right does not interfere with the “interpretation of the concept of the autochthony” as is stated in Paragraph 46. The Italian and Hungarian national communities are undoubtedly autochthonous in Slovenia and it is known where they traditionally live, and the issue as to whether or not they deem specific compatriots who live or originate from elsewhere to also be their members is entirely a matter for them to decide. Even if such compatriot has moved to Slovenia from the south of Italy or from eastern Hungary and has actually started to participate in the cultural and other life of the Italian or Hungarian minorities, or wishes to do so, I see no reason why this minority should refuse to accept him or her into its ranks – of course, however, only if it so wishes and not under any duress. In this sense, both minorities could thus attempt to draft a proposal for the statutory criteria required by Point 4 of the operative provisions; however, a simple negative criterion might suffice: anyone who so wishes can be entered in the special electoral register, and registration may only be denied to those for whom it is not possible to ascertain that they are truly connected with the national community based either on their origin, name, language proficiency, and similar objective criteria, or on their previous subjective expression of affiliation with the minority and active involvement in the community, or if specific circumstances point to an attempt to abuse the special voting right for purposes that are foreign to this national community or even contrary thereto.

It is clear from the above statements as to what my answer would be to the unanswered question, which is indicated at the end of Paragraph 46: if the law also included permanent residence in the “autochthonous” area as one of the above-mentioned criteria, this would not be unconstitutional, if such was the will of the Italian and Hungarian national communities (i.e. if they proposed such statutory regulation); moreover it would not be unconstitutional if the law did not determine such criterion, and would thus be much broader and more liberal in this regard. It should be a matter for these two national communities to decide on which compatriots they include as their members through registration in the special electoral register; the statutory criteria for such must be determined exclusively for the protection of the minority against potential abuses or, more specifically, in order to ensure that when the competent commissions started to deny such registrations in the electoral register due to attempts “of hostile takeover of the minority deputy mandates by the groups foreign to the minority”, these commissions, and subsequently, in the event of disputes, also the courts, would have statutory criteria on which they could base their decision. Until no such organised attempts are made, registration will probably not be denied and there will thus be no disputes in this regard.

III

Regarding the petitioners' legal interest (Point 6 of the operative provisions and Paragraph 29 of the reasoning), the fundamental criterion for recognising legal interest (in accordance with Article 24 of the CCA) is that the challenged provisions directly legally affect the petitioner. It is of course true that the legal regulation of the voting right of the "minorities" and the legal regulation of the scope of rights of the minority deputies are issues that are inextricably linked; however, it is also true that the double voting right of the members of the minorities directly interferes with equal suffrage in regard to all the other voters (even though this interference is, as has been established by this Decision, constitutionally admissible and even required), whereas the different scope of rights of minority deputies interferes, at most, indirectly with the rights of the voters who have voted for other deputies. Quod erat demonstrandum. This was (the only) point to be proved. Once this was demonstrated (that, pursuant to the law, the petitioner cannot be deemed to have legal interest), the petition had to be dismissed, regardless of what we may think of the content of the petition and regardless of the fact that, in my opinion, also the answer to this substantive question would probably not be questionable or uncertain.

Decision No. U-I-336/96, dated 4 March 1999

DECISION

At a session held on 4 March 1999 in proceedings to review constitutionality initiated upon the petition of the political parties Stranka Enakopravnih Dežel, Ljubljana, represented by its president, Jožef Jarh, Krščansko-Socialna Unija, Ljubljana, represented by its president, Franc Miklavčič, Republikanci Slovenije, Velenje, represented by its president, Adolf Štorman, and Komunistična Partija Slovenije, Ljubljana, represented by its secretary general, Marek Lenardič, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

Article 43 of the National Assembly Elections Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 44/92 and 60/95) is not inconsistent with the Constitution.

A

1. The petitioners challenge Article 43 of the National Assembly Elections Act (hereinafter referred to as the NAEA), which regulates the submission of nominations for election to the National Assembly. They assert that the provisions of Article 43 discriminate against political parties that do not have deputies in the National Assembly (hereinafter referred to as extra-parliamentary parties). They do not agree with the fact that extra-parliamentary parties must “persuade voters” to sign a nomination proposal and thus reveal their political beliefs. They further state that, through the requirement to collect signatures, the time for their election campaign is shortened. They claim that the challenged regulation is contrary to Article 14 of the Constitution. Krščansko-Socialna Unija also claims that the challenged regulation is contrary to Article 22 of the Constitution (equal protection of rights).
2. The Secretariat of the National Assembly for Legislation and Legal Affairs replies that the petitions are unfounded. It states that it is the purpose of the challenged regulation “to exclude from competition political parties that do not have a real intention or possibility of standing for election.” It further states that according to the challenged regulation all political parties, including extra-parliamentary parties, have the same legal opportunities to submit a nomination and it is therefore not possible to claim inequality.

B – I

3. The Constitution guarantees universal and equal suffrage. This guarantee follows from the provisions of the Constitution regarding a democratic political system (Article 1 of the Constitution, the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution), universal and equal suffrage (the first and second paragraphs of Article 43 of the Constitution), the right to participate in the management of public affairs (Article 44 of the Constitution), and the elections of deputies to the National Assembly (the second paragraph of Article 80 of the Constitution). The principles of universality and equality refer to the active right to vote (i.e. the right to cast a vote) as well as the passive right to vote (i. e. the right to stand for election).
4. The principles of universal and equal suffrage must also be taken into account in the statutory regulation of the nomination of candidates for elections. Each candidate or list of candidates must have the same legal opportunity to stand for election. In addition, all political parties must have the same legal opportunities for their candidates and lists of candidates to stand for election.
5. The principle of universal suffrage does not prohibit the legislature from determining specific conditions for the nomination of candidates. The legislature has the right to ensure, by determining the minimum support required for a nomination at elections to the National Assembly, that only those candidates and lists who have demonstrated that they have at least a minimal chance of being elected may compete in the election, and at the same time prevent the participation of those candidates and lists for whom it becomes clear already during the nomination procedure that they enjoy so little support from the electorate that they have no chance of being elected. In such manner, difficulties that could arise if too many candidates participated in an election are prevented. This ensures electoral transparency and prevents that technical and time constraints would render the presentation and confrontation of political programmes and candidates impossible. The prevention of nominations of candidates that have no chance of being elected also prevents the loss or splitting of votes (it would be certain in advance that the votes of a specific, although minimum, number of voters would not be taken into account in the distribution of seats). The prevention of all these negative phenomena has a positive effect on the democratic nature of elections.<sup>1</sup>

1 The German Federal Constitutional Court has also taken the same position regarding the question of whether a statutory requirement for specific support of nominations is consistent with the principles of the universal and equal suffrage.

The court took the view that the requirement for specific support for a nomination (“Unterschriftenquorum”) does not interfere with the passive right to vote if it is determined in such manner that it only prevents unrealistic or hopeless nominations, but not nominations that have at least a small chance of success (BVerfGE 3, 19; 3, 383; 4, 375; 5, 77; 6, 84; 12, 135; 24, 260; 41, 399).

6. A statutory regulation of the support required to stand for election could entail a restriction of the right to vote (a violation of the principle of universal suffrage) if it were disproportionate, i.e. if the restrictions exceeded the extent required to achieve the above-mentioned aims. A restriction would exist if it was likely that the support required for a nomination would prevent candidates or lists of candidates who would have at least a minimal chance to be elected from standing for election – for example, if the required number of voters' signatures was excessive or if the support of a parliamentary party was prescribed as a mandatory condition.
7. An analysis of the voting system is essential in order to determine the limit which could be considered, once exceeded, to be restricting the right to vote in relation to the statutorily required support for nomination, given the fact that it depends on the realistic chance of the person seeking nomination to be elected.
8. The principle of equal suffrage is not violated if the law provides for alternative ways in which to obtain support for a nomination – for example, if nomination requires the support of a political party, a specific number of voters or deputies of the National Assembly, or a combination of these options. The fact that different weight is assigned to signatures provided by deputies and voters in support of a nomination does not entail inadmissible discrimination between those persons (Article 14 of the Constitution). Such distinction is objectively founded on the different positions held by the individual subjects within the political system. Their different positions give their signatures different weights in establishing the probability of a candidate or list being elected.

B – II

9. The challenged Article 43 of the NAEA provides as follows:
 “Political parties shall nominate candidates in accordance with the procedure determined by their regulations. The list of candidates shall be determined by secret ballot. A political party may submit a list of candidates in every constituency, provided its lists are supported by the signatures of at least three deputies of the National Assembly. The signatures of the deputies shall be submitted to the National Electoral Commission on the prescribed forms.
 A political party may submit a list of candidates in a constituency if the list of candidates has been nominated by members of the political party who have the right to vote and permanent residence in the constituency and the list of candidates is supported by the signatures of at least fifty voters who have permanent residence in the constituency.
 A political party may also submit a list of candidates in a constituency if the list of candidates has not been nominated in the manner defined in the preceding paragraph, provided the list of candidates is supported by the signatures of at least one hundred voters who have permanent residence in the constituency.
 Two or more political parties may submit a joint list of candidates.”
10. The statutory regulation of nomination for elections to the National Assembly currently in force does not prevent candidates who have at least a minimum chance of being elected from participating in the election. Even if political parties cannot secure for their lists the support of at least three deputies of the National Assembly, they may nominate lists of candidates with the support of 50 or 100 voters in a constituency (50 in the event that the list is nominated by members of the party from the constituency, and 100 in the event that the list or lists are nominated by the bodies of the party at the national level). According to available data on the average number of registered voters (according to the data of the Ministry of the Interior, on 30 June 1996 there were 2,039,578 citizens in total, of which 1,593,035 were adults), the average number of adult citizens in a constituency is 199,129. Therefore, in order to support a list of candidates it is on average necessary to secure the signatures of 0.052% or 0.026% of the registered voters in a constituency. Such number of required signatures of support does not prevent the lists of candidates that have at least a minimal chance of obtaining a seat in the distribution at constituency level (on the basis of an electoral quotient that amounts to one eleventh of the votes cast in a constituency) or at the national level (on the basis of an electoral threshold of three seats) from standing for election. This entails that the required support does not exceed the admissible limit and can therefore not be deemed to limit the passive right to vote. The provisions of the NAEA regarding the required support merely exclude from the election those lists that do not have even a small chance of winning a seat. Such ensures electoral transparency and facilitates debates in the election campaign between candidates on those lists that have at least a minimum chance of winning at least one seat in the election, and prevents an unnecessary splitting of votes.

11. Differentiating between the weight of the support of deputies and that of voters is objectively justified by legitimate reasons and it is therefore not possible to claim the inadmissible discrimination of legal subjects. Such different treatment is not based on personal circumstances (nationality, race, sex, language, belief, political or other conviction, etc.) but on the different positions of these subjects within the political system. Political parties are organisations in which citizens associate in order to achieve political goals (especially by nominating candidates for elections) and therefore it is justified for the legislature to assign a special role to them in the nomination procedure. Deputies to the National Assembly are elected in direct and universal elections and therefore it is possible, irrespective of the electoral system by which they are elected, to deem that they enjoy the support of a significant part of the electorate. A differentiation between the weight carried by signatures of support of deputies and signatures of support of voters (the signatures of three deputies are equal to the signatures of up to 800 voters) is objectively justified.
12. The principle of the equal protection of rights in any proceedings before courts, other state authorities, local community authorities, and bearers of public authority (Article 22 of the Constitution) does not refer to the substantive law regulation of the right to vote, the challenged Article 43 of the NAEA, however, contains substantive law provisions on nomination (i.e. conditions for nomination). Consequently, the reference made by the petitioners to Article 22 of the Constitution is irrelevant.
13. The provisions of the NAEA that determine what kind of support a list of candidates nominated by a political party must obtain in order to stand for election to the National Assembly in an individual constituency are not inconsistent with the principle of a democratic state (Article 1 of the Constitution, the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution), the principle of equality before the law (Article 14 of the Constitution), the principle of the equal protection of rights in proceedings (Article 22 of the Constitution), the principles of universal and equal suffrage (the first and second paragraphs of Article 43 of the Constitution), the right to participate in the management of public affairs (Article 44 of the Constitution), and the provisions on the elections of deputies to the National Assembly (Article 80 of the Constitution).

Decision No. Up-2385/08, dated 9 September 2008

DECISION

At a session held on 9 September 2008 in proceedings to decide upon the constitutional complaint of the Lista za čisto pitno vodo [List for Clean Drinking Water], Ljubljana, represented by Mitja Bartenjev, attorney in Ljubljana, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. Supreme Court Judgment No. II Uv 3/2008, dated 15 September 2008, is abrogated, the Decision of the Electoral Commission of the 1st constituency No. 041-3/2008, dated 1 September 2008, is annulled.
2. The list of candidates, which is called the “List for Clean Drinking Water” and which was submitted in the 1st constituency on 20 August 2008, is confirmed.
3. The National Electoral Commission shall implement the decision referred to in the previous point by placing the list of candidates, which is called “List for Clean Drinking Water”, last on the list of confirmed lists of candidates in the 1st constituency.

A

1. The Electoral Commission of the 1st constituency (hereinafter referred to as the EC) rejected the list of candidates, which is called “List for Clean Drinking Water” (hereinafter referred to as the List), because it established that three of the fifty voters who supported the List do not have a permanent residence in the constituency. With regard to the third paragraph of Article 43 of the National Assembly Elections Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 109/06 – official consolidated text and 54/07 – hereinafter referred to as the NAEA), the list of candidates was allegedly not compiled and nominated in accordance with the law. By the challenged judgment the Supreme Court rejected the appeal of the List’s representative as unfounded. It established that the person submitting the List was requested to remedy its formal deficiencies within a specifically determined deadline but failed to do so before the decision rejecting the list of candidates had been issued. Consequently, the Supreme Court ruled that the EC's decision to reject the list of candidates under discussion in accordance with Article 56 of the NAEA was correct and lawful. Therefore, the Supreme Court rejected all the objections of the complainant that, in the given context, could not have influenced the Supreme Court to adopt a different decision.

2. The complainant alleges a violation of the right to vote determined in Article 43 of the Constitution and the right to participate in the management of public affairs determined in Article 44 of the Constitution. It states that the political party "List for Clean Drinking Water" submitted a list of candidates for the election of deputies to the National Assembly in the 1st constituency on 20 August 2008, that the list was supported by fifty confirmed forms expressing the support of the voters from the constituency, and the person submitting the list allegedly received confirmation thereof. On 28 August 2008, i.e. after the deadline to submit candidacies had expired, the president of the party was informed by telephone that three of the forms for expressing voters' support in this constituency "were not ok". It was alleged that the voters in question did not have a permanent residence in the constituency. The person submitting the candidacy relied on the accuracy of the support of the voters expressed before the competent authority – i.e. the administrative unit. It believes that it was the duty of the administrative unit to verify whether the signatory supporting the List has a permanent residence in the constituency, as it may access the voters' permanent residence records. Consequently, the complainant's reliance on the accuracy of the data provided in the form for expressing support, which was confirmed by the administrative unit, was allegedly reasonable. The complainant therefore argues that the finding of the Supreme Court that the fact that three signatories of the form for expressing support do not have a permanent residence in the constituency could not be disputed is unfounded.
3. The complainant argues that, having regard to the third paragraph of Article 56 of the NAEA, it was requested to remedy the formal deficiencies of the list of candidates in an unlawful manner. It claims that that provision of the NAEA requires a written request in order to remedy the deficiencies of a list of candidates; however, the complainant was requested to supplement the list of candidates verbally by telephone, it was given a deadline that was too short, and was not warned of the consequences if it failed to supplement the list of candidates within the specified deadline. The complainant did not invoke this allegation before the Supreme Court, but it alleges that the Supreme Court should have addressed this issue ex officio.
4. By Order No. Up-2385/08, dated 8 September 2008, the Constitutional Court accepted the constitutional complaint for consideration.

B

5. The Supreme Court deemed that the rejection of the list of candidates was consistent with the second paragraph of Article 56 of the NAEA and rejected the complainant's argument that it relied in good faith that the work of the administrative unit will be carried out properly as irrelevant given that the complainant had been requested to remedy the formal deficiencies and that it had allegedly asserted that it would submit other declarations of support within the specified deadline. In the second paragraph of Article 43, the Constitution guarantees the active and passive right to vote in the elections of deputies to the National Assembly, and the NAEA specifies the manner of implementation of those rights. The provisions governing the manner of expressing support to a list of candidates enable the exercise of the voters' active right to vote and, at the same time, the passive right to vote of the candidates standing for election to the legislative body. These rights are protected by Article 43 of the Constitution and not by Article 44 of the Constitution to which the complainant also refers in order to substantiate its constitutional complaint.

6. In accordance with the third paragraph of Article 43 of the NAEA, a political party may submit a list of candidates in an individual constituency provided the list of candidates is (inter alia) supported by the signatures of at least fifty voters who have permanent residence in the constituency. In accordance with the first paragraph of Article 47 of the NAEA, voters express their support by signing a prescribed form; the voter shall sign the form in person before the competent authority, which keeps a voting rights register, regardless of their place of permanent residence. On the mentioned form, the competent authority confirms that the person who signed the form before it is eligible to vote. Article 8 of the Voting Rights Register Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 1/07 – official consolidated text) determines that the right of a citizen of the Republic of Slovenia to vote is entered ex officio in the Permanent Population Register, in which the citizen is entered according to his permanent residence, unless provided otherwise by this Act (however, such is not relevant for the case at issue). The prescribed form for expressing support also requires that the data on the person's residence are provided, whereby, having regard to the third paragraph of Article 42 of the NAEA and the manner in which the Voting Rights Register is kept, it has to be deemed that the form requires that the data on the permanent residence are provided.
7. In Decision No. Up-304/98, dated 19 November 1998 (OdlUS VII, 240), the Constitutional Court already emphasised that elections are a process that must take place and be concluded within a specified continuous period and thus all the activities that have to be carried out in this procedure are limited by precise and very short statutory deadlines; all the authorities that have the power to decide in this procedure must take the manner in which the right to vote is exercised into account and, at the same time, such must also be taken into consideration by all the participants in this procedure. This usually entails that the person submitting the list of candidates is obliged to submit a complete list of candidates in due time; this obligation, however, does not imply that the person submitting the list is required to verify the accuracy of the data contained in the confirmations issued as authentic instruments by the competent national authorities. Therefore, the voters who expressed their support, as well as the person submitting the list of candidates, could reasonably expect that the competent administrative unit had verified the data on a voter's identity on the basis of which it was obliged to establish whether the person signing the prescribed form is eligible to vote. In view of the above, the administrative unit was obliged to verify the data regarding the permanent residence of such a person. The active right to vote, including the right to support candidates, which constitutes an element of this right, is exercised in the constituency in which the voter has permanent residence. In addition, the competent electoral commission that is bound by short deadlines when exercising its competences must be able, as a general rule, to trust that another national authority has fulfilled its obligation lawfully, as it is impossible to imagine that, within the short deadlines that apply during the electoral procedure, and especially at the stage of the nomination procedure, it would be required to verify the entire work that the other national authorities had to perform in accordance with their competences.

8. The complainant enclosed with the list of candidates fifty forms signed by voters before the competent authority. All of the forms, i.e. including the three forms that are allegedly disputable and that were confirmed by the Jesenice Administrative Unit, included addresses that lay in the territory of the 1st constituency as residences. In view of the above, the complainant reasonably relied on the fact that the competent administrative unit had lawfully performed the work that is entrusted to it within the electoral procedure.
9. If the list of candidates fails to meet the condition determined in the third paragraph of Article 43 of the NAEA – i.e. fifty signatures of support by voters who have permanent residence in the constituency – such cannot be deemed a formal deficiency that could be remedied within the deadline and according to the procedure determined by the second paragraph of Article 56 of the NAEA. However, it would not be inconsistent with the right to vote if the electoral commission nevertheless requested that the person submitting the list of candidates supplement the list of candidates within the meaning of the second paragraph of Article 56 of the NAEA, as, if it transpired that the submitting person was already in possession of obtained additional signatures of support or that it had inadvertently failed to submit them, etc., then such would actually have the nature of a formal deficiency, which does not require new election-related activities to be performed in the nomination procedure and that could therefore be remedied.
10. The assessment of whether the complainant could reasonably rely on the fact that the competent administrative unit performed its task lawfully is therefore essential for the decision on confirming or rejecting the complainant's list of candidates. Therefore, the Supreme Court's position, according to which the complainant's argument that it was acting in good faith and therefore relied on the proper work of the national authority are irrelevant, violates the complainant's right to vote determined in Article 43 of the Constitution. Consequently, the Constitutional Court abrogated the judgment of the Supreme Court.
11. As the electoral commission is the electoral authority that is required to verify whether the list of candidates fulfils all the conditions required by law, and is therefore also responsible for the lawfulness of the work performed, the electoral commission, although it is not under any obligation to do so, may not be denied the competence to verify whether all the conditions provided by law are fulfilled, provided it acts in the same way in all cases characterised by identical circumstances, as it is also bound by the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution. The Constitutional Court was not required to consider such as the complainant did not invoke the allegation of unequal treatment. If upon such verification the EC found that the competent administrative unit had not performed its work lawfully, this does not entail that such failure can be attributed to the person submitting the list of candidates who performed his work in accordance with the law and who in view of the above could reasonably rely on the confirmation of the national authority. In such circumstances, the EC could not simply reject the candidacy upon finding that the person submitting the list was unable to remedy the established deficiency in the manner provided in the second paragraph of Article 56 of the NAEA as it transpired that the person submitting the list in fact did not possess any other forms expressing support. The Constitutional Court also considered the fact that the list of candidates was submitted on 20 August 2008 and that the person submitting it was requested to supplement the list as late as 28 August 2008, despite the provisions of the second paragraph of Article 54 of the NAEA.<sup>1</sup> This decision of the EC deprived the complainant and the candidates on the list of candidates of their right to vote. Given the circumstances of the case at issue, the EC's decision thus violated the complainant's right determined in the second paragraph of Article 43 of the Constitution and, despite the fact that the complainant had invoked it explicitly in its appeal, the Supreme Court failed to remedy this violation due to its position that is inconsistent with the Constitution. In such circumstances, the EC should have decided in favour of the right to vote and confirmed the list of candidates. Therefore, the Constitutional Court annulled the challenged decision of the EC.

12. Due to the short deadlines and, in particular, in order to enable the effective exercise of the right to vote of all persons who are eligible to vote, on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 60 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 64/07 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), the Constitutional Court also decided on the lawfulness of the submitted list of candidates. The complainant submitted the list of candidates within the prescribed deadline and demonstrated that the list fulfils the conditions determined by law. With regard to the above-mentioned reasons, it had to be deemed that the complainant could reasonably rely on the fact that fifty voters with permanent residence in the 1st constituency supported the list of candidates through their signatures, and the unlawful work of the competent administrative unit cannot outweigh the importance that the confirmation of the candidacy has for the complainant. Therefore, the Constitutional Court confirmed the list of candidates and, on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 60 of the CCA and given the current stage of the electoral procedure, ordered the National Electoral Commission to enforce this Decision. The EC already carried out a draw in order to determine the order of the confirmed lists of candidates [on the ballot papers] on 3 September 2008; therefore, to ensure the effective implementation of the election-related activities that still have to be performed before election day, the Constitutional Court decided that the list of candidates, confirmed by this Decision, was to be placed last on the list of confirmed lists of candidates in the 1st constituency.

1 The second paragraph of Article 54 of the NAEA reads as follows: "Upon receipt of a list of candidates, the constituency electoral commission shall immediately ascertain whether the list of candidates was submitted in due time and whether it was nominated in accordance with this Act."

- 13. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 59 and Article 60 of the CCA and the first indent of the second paragraph of Article 46 of the Rules of Procedure of the Constitutional Court (Official Gazette RS, No. 86/07), composed of: Jože Tratnik, President, and Judges Mag. Marta Klampfer, Mag. Miroslav Mozetič, Dr Ernest Petrič, Jasna Pogačar, and Jan Zobec. The decision was reached unanimously.

DECISION

At a session held on 24 March 2011 in proceedings to decide upon the constitutional complaint and in proceedings to review constitutionality, initiated upon the petition of Dnevnik, časopisna družba, d.d., Ljubljana, and others, all represented by Mag. Emil Zakonjšek and Jasna Zakonjšek, attorneys in Ljubljana, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. The second paragraph of Article 5 of the Elections and Referendum Campaign Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 41/07 and 11/11) is inconsistent with the Constitution.
2. The National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia must remedy the established unconstitutionality within six months after the publication of this Decision in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia.
3. Until the unconstitutionality has been remedied, the publication of opinion polls on the candidates, the lists of candidates, political parties, and referendum questions is prohibited during the twenty-four hours before voting day.
4. Ljubljana Local Court Judgment No. ZSV-304/2008-2455, dated 13 January 2009, is abrogated and the case is remanded to that court for new adjudication.

1. The petitioners challenge the second paragraph of Article 5 of the Elections and Referendum Campaign Act (hereinafter referred to as the ERCA), which prohibits the publication [Translator's note: the Slovene noun objava used in the original text can mean both publication as well as broadcast. Similarly, the verb objaviti can mean to publish or to broadcast. For reasons of brevity the translation therefore uses the terms publication and to publish to refer also to broadcast.] of public opinion polls on candidates, the lists of candidates, political parties, and referendum questions in the period of seven days before voting day. They claim that such is inconsistent with the second paragraph of Article 14, Article 39, and the first paragraph of Article 74 of the Constitution. They state that the prohibition of public opinion polls does not serve any of the legitimate aims specified in the second paragraph of Article 10 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR). In addition, they believe that the restriction is not sufficiently precise and that it is not necessary in a democratic society; these are the two conditions under which a restriction of freedom of expression is permitted in accordance with Article 10 of the ECHR. The regulation is allegedly also inappropriate because it does not prevent the polls from being made public. Furthermore, the challenged provision allegedly entails an excessive interference with the right to free economic initiative, particularly in relation to the general principle of equality before the law. It allegedly only restricts the publication of opinion polls by the mass media, but not by other legal and natural persons not categorised as such. The regulation allegedly also gives foreign mass media an unfair advantage over domestic mass media. It is claimed that foreign mass media can publish opinion polls even though they can be accessed via the Internet in the same way as domestic mass media.

2. The petitioners lodged a constitutional complaint along with the petition. In the constitutional complaint they challenge the judgment by which the Ljubljana Local Court rejected their application for judicial protection against the minor offence decision finding them guilty of minor offences, which constitute a violation of the prohibition determined in the second paragraph of Article 5 of the ERCA. In the judgment, the court found that the petitioners or complainants in principle admitted that they had committed the minor offences; however, they justified their actions on grounds that are legally not acceptable and did not absolve them of their responsibility for committing the minor offences with regard to the legislation currently in force. The petitioners believe that the challenged judgment violated their rights determined in the second paragraph of Article 14, Article 39, and the first paragraph of Article 74 of the Constitution, as well as the right determined in Article 22 of the Constitution. In order to substantiate the constitutional complaint, the petitioners invoke the arguments put forward in the petition. They only additionally substantiated the violation of the right determined in Article 22 of the Constitution, to be precise they claim that the court did not consider their allegations regarding the unconstitutionality of the second paragraph of Article 5 of the ERCA.
3. The National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia did not reply to the petition; an opinion was, however, submitted by the Government of the Republic of Slovenia. It states that it does not wish to express an opinion on the constitutionality of the challenged provision; however, it believes that the challenged provision is inappropriate and unnecessary. It further states that the challenged provision was intended to prevent the misuse and manipulation of the results of public opinion, but that this purpose had lost its meaning due to the ubiquity of the Internet. The petitioners did not comment on the Government's opinion, as they believe that it clearly demonstrates that the Government agrees with their arguments in the petition and constitutional complaint.

B – I

4. The second paragraph of Article 5 of the ERCA provides: “It is prohibited to publish public opinion polls on candidates, lists of candidates, political parties, and referendum questions in the period of seven days before voting day.” A grammatical interpretation of this provision leads to the conclusion that it prohibits everyone, not just the mass media, from publishing opinion polls during the seven days before voting day; however, the fact that the provision is included in the chapter entitled “Election and referendum campaigns in the mass media” indicates that this legal prohibition is directed only at the mass media. Other provisions in this chapter also make reference only to the duties of the mass media – Article 6 determines how the mass media’s airtime is allocated, and Article 7 regulates the publication of political campaign broadcasts in the mass media. The legislature’s intention for the second paragraph of Article 5 of the ERCA to apply only to publications in the mass media is also evident from the second indent of Article 34, the first indent of the first paragraph of Article 35, and the second paragraph of Article 35 of the ERCA as, in accordance with these provisions, the editor-in-chief, the publisher, and the person in charge of the legal entity are punished for a minor offence if the mass media outlet in question publishes an opinion poll contrary to the second paragraph of Article 5 of the ERCA. As the minor offence can only be committed by way of a publication in the mass media and as it is not evident from the legislative materials that the second paragraph of Article 5 of the ERCA should be a lex imperfecta in relation to other entities, it was clearly the intention of the legislature for the second paragraph of Article 5 of the ERCA to only prohibit the publication of opinion polls in the mass media.<sup>1</sup> The publication of opinion polls is prohibited, regardless of the form in which the mass media are published, meaning that this also applies to Internet mass media. At the same time, it follows from the challenged provision that it is only the publication of opinion polls that is prohibited, not the conducting of such polls. Moreover, during the period of prohibition, anyone (the mass media, candidates, political parties, etc.) may conduct public opinion polls, but they may not publish the results in the mass media.
5. The second question that arises with regard to the second paragraph of Article 5 of the ERCA concerns the actual content of the prohibition. It is manifestly clear that the provision prohibits the mass media from publishing opinion polls ordered by the organisers of the election or referendum campaign during the seven days before voting day. It is clear from the title of Chapter II of the ERCA “Election and Referendum Campaign in the Mass Media” that it determines the rules that the mass media have to respect during the election or referendum campaign while carrying out their activities in relation thereto. Strictly speaking, the mass media do not lead the campaigns by themselves, but merely provide a space for the campaigns to be conducted by the campaign organisers. Election and referendum campaigns comprise the entire advertising content and other forms of political campaign material the purpose of which is to influence the choice of the voters in elections and referenda (the second and third paragraphs of Article 1 of the ERCA); however, it is primarily carried out through political campaign material disseminated in the mass media (first indent of the fifth paragraph of Article 1 of the ERCA). The election campaign may be organised by the candidates themselves, the candidates' backers, lists of candidates, political parties, or other organisers, and, in the event of a referendum, it may be organised by the proposer of the referendum or others that have an interest in its result (the first paragraph of Article 3 of the ERCA). The mass media thus do not normally conduct their own campaign but instead provide airtime or space in their newspapers to conduct the campaign. The mass media are also not obliged to facilitate the election or referendum campaign (the exception is Radiotelevizija Slovenija [i.e. the national radio and television broadcasting network], which, in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 6 of the ERCA, is required to provide airtime during the campaign for the presentation of the candidates or opinions on the referendum question); however, if they decide to do so, they are required to respect the rules determined in Chapter II of the ERCA.

1 The ERCA does not define the term “mass media”. According to the first paragraph of Article 1 of the Mass Media Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 110/06 – official consolidated text), the term “mass media” includes newspapers and magazines, radio and television programme services, electronic publications, teletext, and other forms of editorially formulated programmes published daily or periodically through the transmission of written material, vocal material, audio, or images in a manner that is accessible to the public.

6. During the seven days before voting day, the mass media is therefore prohibited from publishing opinion polls conducted in the context of an election or referendum campaign sensu stricto, i.e. opinion polls that are ordered by the campaign organisers. The question as to whether the second paragraph of Article 5 of the ERCA also prohibits the mass media from publishing polls that were conducted upon the initiative of the mass media with the intention of informing the public, or polls that were not ordered by campaign organisers, however, is a special question. A grammatical interpretation of the second paragraph of Article 5 of the ERCA reinforces the interpretation that the mass media must not publish their own polls or polls that were not commissioned during a formal election or referendum campaign. The wording of the statutory provision is clear: it does not draw a distinction between public opinion polls in terms of who commissioned them, who conducted them, or their purpose. It follows therefore from the usual meaning of the words used that the challenged provision prohibits the mass media from publishing any opinion polls, including those that have been conducted in the context of typical mass media activity, which is to inform the public, and not in the context of campaigns that are run by campaign organisers.<sup>2</sup> This interpretation is also corroborated by the intention of the legislature and the aim that the legislature wished to achieve through this prohibition. With regard to the Government's statements, the purpose of the challenged provision is to prevent the misuse or manipulation of public opinion polls. It is clear that it would not be possible to achieve this aim if the mass media were prohibited only from publishing opinion polls commissioned and conducted in the context of a formal campaign during the seven days before voting day, but were freely permitted to publish their own opinion polls and other opinion polls, unrelated to the campaign organisers, until the last day before the elections or referendum (i.e. until the election silence). Unless this prohibition covers all public opinion polls, the second paragraph of Article 5 of the ERCA loses its meaning. An interpretation that would completely hollow out the purpose of the statutory provision is unacceptable. Therefore, the second paragraph of Article 5 of the ERCA is to be understood in such a way that the mass media are prohibited from publishing any public opinion polls on candidates, political parties, or a referendum question during the seven days before voting day.

7. In the case at issue, the petitioners (the newspaper and its persons in charge) are publishers of mass media. The performance of this activity is protected in the context of the freedom of the press and other forms of informing the public, which is guaranteed by the first paragraph of Article 39 of the Constitution, as well as in the context of free economic initiative, which is guaranteed by the first paragraph of Article 74 of the Constitution. The challenged second paragraph of Article 5 of the ERCA prohibits the mass media from publishing any public opinion polls during the seven days before voting day. Insofar as this prohibition refers to the mass media publishing their own opinion polls, which they publish on their own initiative in order to inform the public, this entails an interference with the first paragraph of Article 39 of the Constitution. Insofar as this prohibition also refers to the publication of polls that are ordered and paid for by others, this could also entail an interference with the first paragraph of Article 74 of the Constitution. In the case at issue, the publisher of the mass media, the editor in chief, and the person in charge of the legal entity were punished for the minor offence of publishing their own public opinion poll. As a result, the Constitutional Court reviewed the constitutionality of the second paragraph of Article 5 of the ERCA from the viewpoint of the first paragraph of Article 39 of the Constitution.
8. In the first paragraph of Article 39, the Constitution guarantees the freedom of expression of thought, speech, and public appearance, protecting in particular the freedom of the press and other forms of informing the public or the freedom of expression in this framework. The significance of the right to freedom of expression is multi-faceted: its purpose is to protect the freedom to impart information and opinions (i.e. the active aspect) and the freedom to receive such, meaning the right to be informed (i.e. the passive aspect).<sup>3</sup> Freedom of the press and other forms of informing the public has a particularly important role in the framework of freedom of expression. In its Decision No. U-I-172/94, dated 9 November 1994 (Official Gazette RS, No. 73/94, and OdlUS III, 123), the Constitutional Court has already emphasised that the freedom of the press is one of the key institutional conditions for the effectiveness of the democratic process.<sup>4</sup> The positions taken by the Constitutional Court in that Decision are relevant not only for the press but also for other forms of informing the public. Free, i.e. independent from the government, mass media are the conditio sine qua non for creating pluralism and ensuring that the public is provided information that is free from bias.<sup>5</sup> The freedom to inform the public is required in order for the public to be able to supervise the authorities, and provides for the effective functioning of the political opposition to the government. Only free mass media can ensure the balanced exercise of political power within the state and continuous supervision of the state (governmental) authorities. The vital role played by the mass media in supervising the authorities entails that it is crucial that they are permitted to function freely, including when monitoring the processes through which people establish state power (i.e. through elections) or directly exercise such power (i.e. by referendum). Elections or referenda can only be deemed fair when the true will of the people has been expressed and when the public has been extensively and comprehensively informed throughout the process.

3 In Decision No. Up-20/93, dated 19 June 1997 (OdlUS VI, 181), the Constitutional Court explicitly linked the right of the mass media to function freely with the constitutional right of citizens to be informed: "The right to freedom of expression guarantees to natural persons and legal entities that are involved in informing the public the right to freely collect, receive, and disseminate information, thoughts, ideas, and opinions. Public mass media perform an activity through which all citizens are able to exercise their right to be informed; its activities are focused on the people and the community."

9. In light of the above, it is necessary to establish that the freedom of the press and other forms of informing the public and freedom of expression enjoy special constitutional protection. Statutory limitations of this human right are admissible only in accordance with the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, i.e. only in instances determined by the Constitution or to protect the rights of others. A statutory interference with the freedom of expression may only be based on an objectively justified and constitutionally admissible aim. If such aim is demonstrated, it is further necessary to review whether the challenged regulation is consistent with the general principle of proportionality (Article 2 of the Constitution). The Constitutional Court assesses whether an interference is excessive on the basis of the so-called strict test of proportionality in accordance with the settled case law of the Constitutional Court.<sup>6</sup>
10. The aim pursued by the second paragraph of Article 5 of the ERCA is not evident from the legislative materials. The National Assembly did not respond to the petition and

4 In that Decision, the Constitutional Court referred to Article 1 of the Constitution, which determines that Slovenia is a democratic state. It emphasised that the effectiveness of the democratic process depends, in particular, on:

- (a) fair election(s) at all levels that enable the formation of representative bodies of the state and local self-government in accordance with the will of the people;
- (b) public supervision of the legislative, judicial, and executive branches of power; and
- (c) recognition of the right to political opposition to the government.

5 In Decision No. U-I-106/01, dated 5 February 2004 (Official Gazette RS, No. 16/04, and OdlUS XIII, 7), the Constitutional Court emphasised that the state is not the only one who can jeopardise freedom of expression, but individual social groups may influence it to an even greater extent. Therefore, it is not sufficient to understand freedom of expression merely in terms of being a negative or defensive right that only limits the state. The first paragraph of Article 39 of the Constitution requires the state to adopt legislation to ensure the independence of public mass media with regard to their programme, organisation, and financing.

6 See Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-18/02, dated 24 October 2003 (Official Gazette RS, No. 108/03, and OdlUS XII, 86).

the Government stated in its opinion that the aim of this provision was to prevent misuse and manipulation of the results of opinion polls. The Government did not explain in more detail how such misuse or manipulation could occur, but it considers that, due to the ubiquity of the Internet, this purpose can no longer be achieved by the challenged provision. Therefore, the statutory prohibition determined in the second paragraph of Article 5 of the ERCA is inappropriate and unnecessary. In addition, the Government explained that a draft law amending the ERCA is in the process of being adopted and that according to this draft the period during which the publishing of public opinion polls is prohibited is reduced from seven days to twenty-four hours before voting day. In this respect, the Constitutional Court notes that the Act amending the Election and Referendum Campaign Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 11/11) was adopted on 9 February 2011, but did not amend the second paragraph of Article 5 of the ERCA.

11. Insofar as the aim of preventing misuse and manipulation of the results of opinion polls allegedly entails that the purpose of the challenged provision is to ensure conditions in which the voters can freely and without interference form and express their true will at the elections, then the Constitutional Court deems that this entails a constitutionally admissible aim for limiting the free functioning of the mass media before and during the elections. The requirement of fair and free elections where the voters have the opportunity to form their true will before voting, without any inappropriate (manipulative, misleading, etc.) external influences, interferences, or pressure, originates from the principle of democracy in the Constitution (Article 1 of the Constitution), which was emphasised by the Constitutional Court in Decision No. U-I-172/94.
12. Moreover, the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR) ruled on the right to freedom of expression and whether it was admissible to limit that right during or before elections. The position of this court, in principle, is that during elections the right to freedom of expression enshrined in Article 10 of the ECHR has to be considered in light of the right to free elections protected by Article 3 of Protocol No. 1 to the ECHR.<sup>7</sup> Free elections and freedom of expression, particularly freedom of political debate, together form the bedrock of any democratic system. The two rights are inter-related and operate to reinforce each other. In the ECtHR's opinion, freedom of expression is one of the conditions necessary to ensure the free expression of the opinion of the people in the choice of the legislature. For this reason, it is particularly important in the period preceding an election that opinions and information of all kinds are permitted to circulate freely. Nonetheless, the ECtHR deems that, in certain circumstances, the right to freedom of expression and the right to free elections may come into conflict. The ECtHR therefore allows for the possibility that it may be considered necessary, in the period preceding or during an election, to place certain restrictions, of a type which would not usually be acceptable, on freedom of expression, in order to secure the free expression of the opinion of the people in the choice of the legislature. The ECtHR recognises that, in striking a balance between these two rights, the Contracting States have a wider margin of appreciation, as they do generally with regard to the restriction of freedom of expression pursuant to the second paragraph of Article 10 of the ECHR.<sup>8</sup> Therefore, also with regard to the ECtHR case law, ensuring the conditions required for voters to freely form and express their true political will in the elections may constitute a reason for restricting the time period during which the mass media may report on opinion polls.

7 Article 3 of Protocol No. 1 to the ECHR reads as follows: "The High Contracting Parties undertake to hold free elections at reasonable intervals by secret ballot and under conditions which will ensure the free expression of the opinion of the people in the choice of the legislature."

13. Without considering the question of whether the statutory prohibition determined in the second paragraph of Article 5 of the ERCA is an appropriate and necessary measure to achieve the pursued aim, the Constitutional Court found that the severity of the consequences of an interference with freedom of expression cannot be justified by the pursued aim or the advantages that would result from the interference. When considering whether the challenged provision entails an excessive interference with the right to freedom of expression, the Constitutional Court took into account several constitutionally relevant circumstances (Paragraphs 14 through 19 of the reasoning).
14. The prohibition to publish specific information with the intention of preventing the mass media from influencing how public opinion is formed or changed entails an interference with the very essence of the role and significance of the mass media in a democratic society. It is in the nature of the mass media to influence public opinion; the principle function of the mass media (leaving economic interests aside) is to inform the public and thereby inevitably influence public opinion. Especially before the elections, when the direct expression of the voters' political will is concerned, the free functioning of the mass media is even more important.
15. In accordance with the first paragraph of Article 2 of the ERCA, an election campaign may not commence sooner than thirty days before voting day. The seven-day prohibition therefore entails that the mass media cannot perform their function of informing the public through the publication of opinion polls for almost one quarter of the duration of the election campaign. It is, however, just before the elections that the electoral activities of the candidates and political parties are performed in a most concentrated and intensive way and therefore undoubtedly significantly influence the voters' decisions.
16. The free functioning of the mass media also goes hand in hand with the right of voters to be informed. Therefore, the prohibition to publish opinion polls may also be considered from the perspective of a voter who may therefore be deprived of essential information. Free and democratic elections presuppose that the voter has the opportunity to be informed of all the relevant issues based on a wide range of true and complete information, as only comprehensively informed voters can in fact express their own true political will on voting day. In addition, information on the state or dynamics of public opinion may also be important, or even crucial, for the voters. Therefore, it is important that the flow of information regarding this question, which may have a decisive influence on the voter's final choice, is interrupted as late as possible.

17. It is not possible to ignore the fact that the prohibition to publish opinion polls is not binding on natural persons and legal entities that are not mass media publishers (or on the foreign mass media), which entails that, given the present-day ubiquity of the Internet, it is almost impossible to prevent such polls from being made available to the wider public.
18. On the other hand, the alleged benefits of the prohibition to publish opinion polls (i.e. guaranteeing to voters the right to freely form their own true will without interference) are relative because they depend on each individual voter and because other methods through which mass media can influence voters (critical or favourable articles, comments, interviews, etc.) are allowed for the entire duration of that prohibition, up until the election silence. Unlike published opinion polls, the electoral campaign and all public campaigning must end one day before the day of the vote, which is when the so-called election silence begins.<sup>9</sup>
19. Even if, by seeking to prevent an unacceptable influence of the mass media on voters before the elections, the legislature pursued a constitutionally admissible aim, it was first required to consider adopting a regulation to limit such conduct by the mass media in a manner that takes into account the interest of the mass media to publish opinion polls as well as the interest of the voters to have access to such information before prohibiting their publication. A more precise regulation of the manner in which opinion polls are conducted during the pre-election period (e.g. by requiring the poll to contain information regarding the date on which it was conducted, who ordered and paid for the poll, who conducted the poll, the methodology used, the sample, and the margin of error, etc.) could reduce the possibility of an unacceptable influence on voters and thereby contribute to the purpose for which such polls are intended – the professional and objective presentation of information regarding changes in public opinion. It must namely be taken into account that opinion polls conducted by the mass media on their own initiative appear objective, impartial, and neutral. The fact (or at least the appearance) that a scientific methodological approach was applied in such polls clearly entails that some voters rely on the published opinion polls to a lesser or greater extent when forming their opinions. Naturally, expertise and objectivity do not imply that there are no differences between the polls or that the mass media are completely unbiased when conducting and publishing such polls (especially if the poll is accompanied by a commentary). However, in a democratic society, it is crucial that there is plurality in the mass media and that voters have the opportunity to form their own opinions on the basis of different public opinion polls.

9 The first paragraph of Article 2 of the ERCA determines that the election campaign must end no later than twenty-four hours before voting day. Article 5 of the National Assembly Elections Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 109/06 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the NAEA) provides that public election campaigning must end no later than twenty-four hours before voting day. The NAEA applies mutatis mutandis also to other elections and to referenda (Article 9 of the Election of the President of the Republic Act, Official Gazette RS, No. 39/92; Article 4 of the Local Elections Act, Official Gazette RS, No. 94/07 – official consolidated text, and 45/08; and Article 55 and the fifth paragraph of Article 56 of the Referendum and Popular Initiative Act, Official Gazette RS, No. 26/07 – official consolidated text).

20. On the basis of the above, the Constitutional Court held that the seven-day prohibition was a limitation that excessively interferes with the free functioning of the mass media. Therefore, the challenged second paragraph of Article 5 of the ERCA is inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 39 of the Constitution. The Constitutional Court did not abrogate the provision but merely established its inconsistency with the Constitution (Point 1 of the operative provisions) and required the legislature to remedy the established unconstitutionality within six months (Point 2 of the operative provisions). The Constitutional Court adopted a declaratory decision as the abrogation of the provision would have jeopardised the effectiveness of the institution of election silence. Although the election silence is a special statutory institution that pursues other aims and, as such, it is not directly related to the prohibition of publishing opinion polls, it would lose its meaning to a great extent if the mass media were allowed to publish opinion polls without any restrictions during this time (and even on the day of voting). The publication of public opinion polls conducted by the mass media on their own initiative does not entail the conduct of a campaign and, therefore, the first paragraph of Article 2 of the ERCA, which determines that campaigning must cease no later than twenty-four hours before voting day, does not apply to such conduct of the mass media. Similarly, it is not possible to qualify the publication of opinion polls as an example of public propaganda, which is prohibited by Article 5 of the NAEA during the twenty-four hours before voting day. The Constitutional Court thus adopted a declaratory decision as it would have interfered with the effectiveness of another statutory institution if it had abrogated the challenged provision.
21. In order to protect the effectiveness of the institution of election silence, the Constitutional Court, on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 40 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 64/07 – official consolidated text - hereinafter referred to as the CCA), also determined the manner in which its decision was to be implemented. It determined that, until the established unconstitutionality has been remedied, the publication of public opinion polls is not permitted during the twenty-four hours before voting day (Point 3 of the operative provisions).
22. Since the Constitutional Court established that the second paragraph of Article 5 of the ERCA is inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 39 of the Constitution, it did not consider the other allegations made by the petitioners. By determining the manner of implementation, the provisions of Articles 34 and 35 of the ERCA, which define that the conduct in violation of the second paragraph of Article 5 of the ERCA constitutes a minor offence, became irrelevant.

B – II

23. The complainants were found guilty of minor offences under the first indent of the first paragraph of Article 35 of the ERCA, the second paragraph of Article 35 of the ERCA in conjunction with the first indent of the first paragraph of Article 35 of the ERCA, and the second indent of Article 34 of the ERCA. These minor offences entail a violation of the prohibition determined in the second paragraph of Article 5 of the ERCA, which the Constitutional Court found to be unconstitutional. Therefore, as the challenged judgment was based on an unconstitutional statutory provision, the Constitutional Court abrogated it and remanded the case to the court of first instance for new adjudication (Point 4 of the operative provisions). In such context, the Constitutional Court was not required to review the allegations regarding violations of other human rights and fundamental freedoms.

24. In addition, the Constitutional Court specifically draws attention to the unconstitutionality of the position taken by the court in the challenged judgment that a court is not required to take a position on alleged violations of the Constitution for lack of jurisdiction. It is true that the regular courts do not have jurisdiction to decide on the constitutionality of laws; however, this does not entail that they are not obliged to take a position on alleged violations of the Constitution. The position that, when deciding, a court is only bound by the law, but not by the Constitution, is inconsistent with the Constitution. Article 125 of the Constitution clearly determines that judges are bound by the Constitution and laws. When human rights – in the case at issue, freedom of expression – are subject to judicial protection, such obligation of the judges (i.e. that they are bound by the Constitution and laws) also arises from the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution. In accordance with this provision, the judicial protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms and the right to obtain redress for the violation of such rights and freedoms are guaranteed. Such judicial protection is not judicial protection in constitutional complaint proceedings, but judicial protection in judicial proceedings at all levels of decision-making before the regular courts, as it is generally guaranteed by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution. The courts are therefore required to take a position on relevant constitutional objections of the parties (such as the objection regarding the unconstitutionality of the second paragraph of Article 5 of the ERCA); otherwise, they are in violation of the constitutional procedural guarantee determined in Article 22 of the Constitution from which there proceeds, inter alia, the duty of the courts to take a position on the allegations of parties to proceedings that are essential for a decision from a human rights perspective. If as a result they are faced with a statutory provision that they deem unconstitutional, they must, on the basis of Article 156 of the Constitution, initiate proceedings before the Constitutional Court. If, however, they deem that the objections regarding unconstitutionality are unsubstantiated, they must present arguments to reject them. In light of the above, the position of the court, according to which it was not obliged to take a position on the alleged unconstitutionality of the statutory regulation which constituted the legal basis of the challenged decision, violated the right to the equal protection of rights determined in Article 22 of the Constitution. In the case at issue, the court also violated the right determined in the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution.

C

25. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision in accordance with Article 48, the second paragraph of Article 40, and the first paragraph of Article 59 of the CCA, composed of: Dr Ernest Petrič, President, and Judges Dr Etelka Korpič-Horvat, Mag. DECISION

At a session held on 21 February 2013 in proceedings to decide upon the appeal of Franc Kangler, Maribor, represented by law firm Odvetniška družba Čeferin, o. p., d. o. o., Grosuplje, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. The Order of the National Council of the Republic of Slovenia, dated 12 December 2012, stating that the office of Franc Kangler, elected member of the National Council, is not confirmed, is abrogated.
2. The office of Franc Kangler, member of the National Council, elected on 21 November 2012 in the elections to the National Council – representatives of local interests, in Maribor constituency No. 3, is confirmed.

*ReasoningA

1. On 21 November 2012, the appellant was elected a member of the National Council. On 27 November 2012, he received a certificate from the State Election Commission regarding his election. At the constitutive session held on 12 December 2012, the National Council voted separately on the confirmation of his office as a member of the National Council and did not confirm it. The appellant alleges that such decision of the National Council was adopted without a legal basis and arbitrarily, therefore it allegedly violated his passive right to vote and the right to participate in the management of public affairs, as protected by Articles 43 and 44 of the Constitution, and the right to the equal protection of rights determined by Article 22 of the Constitution.
2. Allegedly, neither the National Council Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 100/05 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the NCA) nor the National Assembly Elections Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 109/06 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the NAEA), whose provisions apply mutatis mutandis with regard to questions that are not specifically regulated by the NCA, expressly determine the grounds or criteria on the basis of which the National Council can refuse to confirm the office of an elected member. In the opinion of the appellant, the refusal to confirm such office would only be possible on the basis of an appeal against a decision of the Election Commission submitted to the National Council on the basis of Article 49 of the NCA, which could have an influence on the confirmation of the appellant's office. From the materials for the constitutive session of the National Council and the minutes of the meeting, it is evident that such an appeal was not submitted to the National Council.

3. Although the law does not determine the grounds or the criteria on the basis of which the National Council could refuse to confirm the office of an elected member, the National Council should, in the opinion of the appellant, also act in conformity with Article 22 of the Constitution when confirming the offices of elected members. The decision not to confirm the office should have been substantiated by legal arguments; the decision should not have been taken on grounds that should not be taken into consideration. Due to the fact that allegedly neither the procedural nor the substantive prerequisites for deciding that the appellant's office was not confirmed were fulfilled, the decision of the National Council was allegedly completely arbitrary. Such decision was allegedly inconsistent with the highest constitutional values determined by Article 2 of the Constitution and it allegedly inadmissibly interfered with the already mentioned human rights and fundamental freedoms of the appellant.
4. In its reply to the appeal, the National Council explained that at its constitutive session after the elections were held, firstly, in conformity with Article 49 of the NCA and the Rules of Procedure of the National Council (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 70/08, 73/09, and 101/10), the Mandate and Immunity Commission (hereinafter referred to as the MIC) was elected, in which each interest group of the National Council has one member, in order to prepare everything necessary for the confirmation of the offices of the elected members. During the debate at the first session of the MIC, held on 12 December 2012, reservations were expressed with regard to the confirmation of the office of Franc Kangler. The non-economic activities interest group adopted a written standpoint that it felt obliged to act in conformity with moral and ethical standards and that by drawing attention to them it raises the credibility of the National Council; in light of the above it assessed that the office of Franc Kangler is morally and ethically disputable and proposed that a secret vote on the confirmation of such be carried out. In addition to the representative of this interest group, similar reservations were also expressed by the representatives of the interest group of employers and the interest group of employees at the first session of the MIC. With regard to the above, the MIC decided to propose that the National Council decide on all 38 undisputed offices together, and separately on each of the two disputed offices, including that of Franc Kangler. After the undisputed offices were confirmed, the interest group of local interests decided to convene an extraordinary session at which it decided to propose that the National Council decide on the two disputed offices by a secret vote. It also proposed that explanations should be presented to the National Council.

cil with regard to why these offices are disputable. The representative of the State Election Commission and Head of the Legal and Analytical Affairs Department of the National Council informed the National Council that no appeal had been filed against the election of Franc Kangler. At the secret vote, the National Council did not confirm the office of Franc Kangler, because 18 members of the National Council voted for confirmation of his office, whereas 19 voted against.

B

5. By not confirming the office of an elected member,<sup>1</sup> the National Council adopted a decision that would result in a new election being held.<sup>2</sup> [After] a decision that an office is not confirmed [is adopted] the affected person can invoke, before the Constitutional Court and on the basis of the third paragraph of Article 50 of the NCA, the protection of his or her rights. What is at issue is the protection of the right to vote, which is intended to protect the individual rights of voters and also to protect the legality of the elections, all of which should ensure that the representative authority is legally elected. Due to the specificities with regard to exercising the right to vote in comparison with other rights, the procedures for its protection are specifically regulated.<sup>3</sup> Such procedure with regard to the confirmation of the offices of the members of the National Council is regulated by Articles 49 and 50 of the NCA. With regard to the questions that are not specifically regulated by this Act, Article 10 of the NCA prescribes the mutatis mutandis application of the provisions of the NAEA. This entails that also in a dispute regulated by Articles 49 and 50 of the NCA, the principle to be applied is that only such established irregularities are taken into consideration with regard to elections that affected or could have affected the election result, which under the NAEA is applied with regard to the protection of the right to vote after elections have been carried out.<sup>4</sup> Therefore, also in the event an appeal is submitted to the National Council, by which, in conformity with the second paragraph of Article 49 of the NCA, it is admissible to challenge the decisions of election commissions that can affect the confirmation of an office, only such irregularities at the elections can be at issue that affected or could have affected the election result, which of course consequently also affect the confirmation of an office.

1 See Report of the State Election Commission on the Election Results Regarding the Elections of the Members of the National Council, Official Gazette RS, No. 90/12.

2 The second paragraph of Article 8 of the NCA determines that new elections are also carried out if, in the event of an appeal, the National Council or the Constitutional Court do not confirm the office of a member of the National Council and the State Election Commission establishes that new elections must be held.

3 The procedure for the constitution of the National Council envisages the examination of and deciding on possible appeals of candidates, interest organisations, or local communities against the decisions of the Voting Commission that can affect the confirmation of the respective offices (the second paragraph of Article 49 of the NCA); the affected person has the right to file an appeal with the Constitutional Court against the decision of the National Council to not confirm an office, which can abrogate the decision of the National Council and confirm the office or dismiss the appeal (the third paragraph of Article 50 of the NCA).

4 See Articles 106 through 109 of the NAEA.

6. The refusal to confirm the office of an elected member of the National Council in fact entails a rejection of the officially established election result. Such a decision can be, with regard to the NCA, only a result of the examination of an appeal submitted to the National Council that leads to the finding that during the elections such irregularities occurred that it is not possible to recognise the election result otherwise established. Therefore, in deciding on such an appeal before an office is confirmed, the National Council must assess whether the alleged irregularities at the elections are substantiated. It must assess whether they are of such nature as to affect or to be able to affect the legality of the election result in a constituency. The National Council does not have the competence to assess in a discretionary manner whether an office is disputable, as is determined by the second paragraph of Article 50 of the NCA. An office can only be disputable on the basis of an appeal submitted by the entitled subjects and the submitted evidence on the essential irregularities in the election procedure or in the determination of the election result. Only if the National Council establishes the existence of the circumstances that the NCA and the NAEA determine to be [grounds] for an office to be disputable can the National Council adopt an order by which it decides not to confirm the office of a member that was otherwise elected.
7. The appellant was elected a member of the National Council, and the State Election Commission issued a certificate thereon. The appellant alleges that the challenged order of the National Council violates Articles 43 (the right to vote) and 44 of the Constitution (the right to participation in the management of public affairs). From older constitutional case law it namely follows that the right to vote regarding elections to the National Council is protected, due to the special right to vote of the members of interest groups, in the framework of the right determined by Article 44 of the Constitution.<sup>5</sup> However, in the electoral dispute in the framework of the elections to the National Council in 2007, the Constitutional Court allowed the possibility that the right to vote with regard to the elections to the National Council should be protected in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 43 of the Constitution.<sup>6</sup> However, in the Order by which the Constitutional Court rejected the petition for the initiation of proceedings for the review of the constitutionality of the regulation of the elections of the deputies of national communities<sup>7</sup> the Constitutional Court expressly adopted the position that the principles of the general and equal right to vote must be respected within a group of voters that has a special right to vote with regard to the election of such deputies. Such position logically requires that the Constitutional Court also adopt a new position with regard to the constitutional protection of the special right to vote with regard to elections to the National Council. It is true that what is at issue with regard to such elections is a special right to vote and an indirect type of elections, which are established in order to ensure the election of the representatives of the individual interests that comprise the National Council in conformity with Article 96 of the Constitution. However, the National Council is one of the constitutionally defined state authorities with competences as regards the legislative procedure, therefore it is clear that the protection of this right to vote must be based on the same principles as are otherwise envisaged by the Constitution with regard to the right to vote. Such entails that also its protection must be ensured within the framework of Article 43 of the Constitution. Consequently, the right to vote with regard to the election of members of the National Council is a right to vote ensured by the second paragraph of Article 43 of the Constitution.<sup>8</sup>

5 Such standpoint followed from the fact that the members of the National Council are elected on the basis of a special (active and passive) right to vote, as determined by Article 2 of the NCA. See Order of the Constitutional Court No.Up-681/02, dated 24 November 2002, Official Gazette RS, No. 105/02, and OdlUS XI, 298, Para. 5 of the reasoning.

6 In Decision No. Up-3486/07, Up-3503/07, Up-3768/07, dated 17 January 2008 (Official Gazette RS, No. 19/08, and OdlUS XVII, 23), the Constitutional Court stated: "From the hitherto constitutional case law, it follows that the right to vote with regard to elections to the National Council is protected within the framework of Article 44 of the Constitution. However, due to the fact that the allegations of the complainant are manifestly unfounded, the Constitutional Court did not have to adopt a position on whether the alleged violation, were it committed, would also entail a violation of the right to vote determined by Article 43 of the Constitution." (Para. 13 of the reasoning).

7 See Order of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-225/08, dated 15 January 2009.

8. With regard to the information in the minutes of the meeting of the first session of the National Council, the National Council adopted the challenged order in the procedure for the confirmation of offices on the basis of the assessment that the office of the elected member at issue was morally and ethically disputable and without an appeal being filed on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 49 of the NCA. The regulation in force regarding the procedure for the confirmation of the offices of the members of the National Council does not envisage a dispute without an appeal being submitted to the National Council and it also does not state that the grounds on which the challenged order of the National Council was based can entail a circumstance that could affect the confirmation of such. Therefore, it is evident that the decision-making of the National Council on the confirmation of the appellant's office was not based on law. Such decision is arbitrary and entails a constitutionally inadmissible interference with the appellant's passive right to vote.<sup>9</sup> It also entails a constitutionally inadmissible interference with the active right to vote of the eligible voters who elected him.
9. With regard to the above, the appellant's appeal is well founded. By the challenged order, the National Council did not act in conformity with the second paragraph of Article 50 of the NCA. By rejecting the confirmation of the office of the appellant, it violated his passive right to vote determined by the second paragraph of Article 43 of the Constitution and the active right to vote of voters, which is also guaranteed by the same provision of the Constitution.

8 This is also stated by J. Sovdat in: L. Šturm (Ed.), Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije, dopolnitev – A [Commentary on the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia: Supplement to the Commentary – A], Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Ljubljana 2011, pp. 712–713.

9 "The passive right to vote includes the right of an individual to compete with others for election under the same conditions (i.e. the right to be elected or the right to be a candidate at elections). It also includes the right to be elected, which in fact entails the right of an individual to acquire office on the basis of the election results. In addition to the acquired office there also arises the third aspect of the passive right to vote, which includes the right of an individual to perform office acquired in such manner." This is stated by J. Sovdat, op. cit., pp. 711–712.

10. In light of the above, the Constitutional Court granted the appeal and abrogated the Order of the first session of the National Council, dated 12 December 2012, determining that the office of the appellant is not confirmed (point 1 of the operative provisions). With regard to the above, the Constitutional Court confirmed the office of appellant Franc Kangler (point 2 of the operative provisions).

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE DR JADRANKA SOVDAT

I

1. The non-confirmation of the office of a councillor [i.e. a member of the National Council] without the elections of councillors being challenged by legal remedies regulated by law entails political arbitrariness. It is illegal and leads to a violation of the elected candidate's passive right to vote and the active right to vote of voters. This is the principal message of this Decision and I concur with it completely. The National Council should have confirmed the office. Because it did not do so, the Constitutional Court is called on to adopt a decision on the basis of an appeal against the decision of the National Council. The final say regarding the validity of elections must be reserved for an independent and impartial judge, not only in order for the judicial protection of the right to vote to be ensured (although mainly for this reason), but also in order to prevent such type of political arbitrariness of the representative body or some other collective state authority formed in elections (in the case at issue, the National Council). In conformity with the statutory regulation in force, the only legal decision that can be adopted was that adopted by the Constitutional Court.
2. I also concur with the interpretation by which the Constitutional Court clearly stated that the passive (and, of course, also the active) right to vote with regard to the elections to the National Council is constitutionally protected by the second paragraph of Article 43 of the Constitution. In such manner, the position that was clearly expressed by Judge Dr Franc Grad in his dissenting opinion to Decision Up-3486/07, Up-3503/07, Up-3768/07, dated 17 January 2008 (Official Gazette RS, No. 19/08, and OdlUS XVII, 23), also became the "official" position of the Constitutional Court. Due to the fact that I have already expressed my opinion on the constitutional reasons why I find this position to be correct in the commentary to Article 43 of the Constitution,<sup>1</sup> I hereby refer thereto in this aspect and will not repeat it here.

3. Although I agree with all of the above, in this concurring opinion I also wish to present to some degree the reasons that guided me during the decision-making – and that do not allow me to have doubt as regards the constitutionality of the fundamental standpoint that is expressed in the Decision – i.e. that “there is no judge without a plaintiff” and that this also applies in an electoral dispute, although its first part takes place before a political authority. This fact cannot be changed even by my otherwise firm position, which I have already stated several times,<sup>2</sup> regarding the numerous unconstitutionality of the statutory regulation of the electoral dispute with regard to all types of national elections, European elections, and local elections; and also not by my equally firm position (which I also substantiated in a book on electoral disputes that is about to be published) on the fact that also Slovenia should have regulated ineligibility as is also done by foreign regulations and for which in the second paragraph of Article 82 of the Constitution there exists the constitutional basis, while the legislature has thus far not considered it to be necessary to also regulate by law the individual limitations of the passive right to vote. In a certain way, the constitutional background of the electoral dispute and the absence of the regulation of ineligibility nicely illustrate the case at issue.

II

4. In continental Europe, for a long time the position prevailed that only the parliament can be its own “electoral judge”.<sup>3</sup> The changes in this area happened mainly in the period after the Second World War, when certain Western Europe states introduced judicial supervision over the elections. However, also at that time, most of them entrusted this task to constitutional courts, modelling themselves on the Austrian constitutional regulation of 1920. If we look at the regulation in European states, we can find that certain states retained supervision over the validity of elections to the parliament,<sup>4</sup> whereas others decided primarily in favour of two possible regulations regarding national elections: they either gave the role of the electoral judge directly to the constitutional court (e.g. France, and such regulation also exists in Austria),

3 Whereas in the United Kingdom the decision-making on electoral disputes was already in 1868 transferred from parliamentary committees to courts. See J. Harvey and L. Bather, The British Constitution, 3rd Edition, MacMillan St Martin's Press, London 1972, p. 60.

4 However, in doing so, they regulated in a very detailed manner the procedure for decision-making on a legal remedy by which elections are challenged before the parliament; see, e.g. the Norwegian and Swedish regulation.

or maintained the parliament as the primary supervisor of elections, but reserved the last say for the constitutional court (e.g. the Federal Republic of Germany). With regard to the regulation of the electoral judge regarding the election of deputies (the third paragraph of Article 82 of the Constitution), the Slovene constitution-framers modelled themselves on the German regulation, which entrusted primary supervision over elections to the parliament, and allowed an appeal to the Constitutional Court against its decisions. Such regulation also applies with regard to the National Council, however not due to the will of the Slovene constitution-framers, because the Constitution does not regulate this matter, but due to the legislature's will. The legislature namely determined by Article 10 of the National Council Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 100/05 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the NCA) mutatis mutandis application of the provisions of the National Assembly Elections Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 109/06 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the NAEA), i.e. also of the provisions of Articles 106 through 109 of the NAEA, which regulate the protection of the right to vote after election day, and by the third paragraph of Article 50 of the NCA it regulated the appeal to the Constitutional Court.

5. A regulation in which the primary supervisor of elections is a political body conceals in itself special pitfalls; for such reason, I am distinctly not in favour of such.<sup>5</sup> The nature of the work of the representative body is above all political and is not adapted to decision-making in individual legal procedures. Consequently, there exists a danger that political aspects will prevail over the legal aspects also when deciding in the procedure ensuring supervision over elections. Moreover, the political authority thereby assumes the role of the “judge” in matters in which it is involved, whereby it is at the same time required to impartially decide on election irregularities that refer to the election of its own members. This, however, is not an appropriate guarantee that shadows of doubt will not remain over the election procedure. The election results must namely authentically reflect the expressed will of the voters in the electoral procedure in which the candidates campaigned under equal conditions for their votes in accordance with the electoral rules determined in advance. These votes are in the end reflected in the acquired political offices, which are distributed in accordance with the chosen electoral system and in conformity with the expressed will of the voters. The same is also true in the event of indirect elections, except that in such case the electors who elect the candidates assume the role of voters, such as is the situation with regard to the National Council. Therefore, from the viewpoint of the protection of the right to vote, indirect elections by electors do not of themselves require different requirements than those that apply to direct elections.
6. If a regulation leaves the primary supervision over elections to a political body and only allows [appellate] judicial protection before the Constitutional Court, which at the same time is the appellate authority and the electoral judge, it is necessary to ensure that already in the procedure before the political body there exists a meticulously regulated legal procedure for the verification of the validity of the elections and the authenticity of the election results. If such procedure is not clearly regulated, if the details regarding the legal remedy by which elections can be challenged are not regulated, if the authorisations (to annul elections or to establish a different result of elections) of such political body or its working bodies with regard to the verification of alleged election irregularities are not known, if the procedure does not respect the fundamental constitutional procedural guarantees of a fair legal procedure, and if a decision on such legal remedy is not substantiated, this can even have an influence on the role of the electoral judge. It can influence the role of the electoral judge so as to significantly reduce such role, because the electoral judge, who concurrently performs the role of appellate authority and electoral judge in the first and the last judicial instance, cannot avoid a decision that it must examine as the appellate authority. In such manner, the question can be raised whether we really have ensured judicial protection of the right to vote in conformity with the generally internationally established standards regarding electoral disputes today. Whereas in the German regulation, which Slovenia took as a model on the constitutional level, the decision-making procedure of the parliament for appeals with regard to the election of deputies is precisely regulated by law,<sup>6</sup> our legislature inadmissibly abandoned such regulation (in fact, it simplified it to the extreme by a brief regulation in its Rules of Procedure<sup>7</sup>) with regard to deputies. It then copied such completely inadmissible regulation such that it also applies to elections to the National Council<sup>8</sup> (and also to local and European elections).

5 On this matter, see J. Sovdat, Ustavno varstvo volilne pravice [Constitutional Protection of the Right to Vote], in: I. Kaučič (Ed.), Dvajset let Ustave Republike Slovenije, pomen ustavnosti in ustavna demokracija [Twenty Years of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia, The Significance of Constitutionality and Constitutional Democracy], Constitutional Court of the Republic of Slovenia, Ljubljana 2012, pp. 188–192.

7. If the decision-making procedure regarding appeals before the National Council was regulated by law, as it should be, it would be clearly evident already from the statutory regulation that interferences with elections are only possible on the basis of the fact that elections can be challenged by a legal remedy that is determined by law that at the same time also regulates all that must be regulated in connection therewith and with deciding on this legal remedy. Once the election day is behind us and the election results are determined, the will of the voters has been expressed – thereby they exercise their active right to vote, which is a human right. On the basis of the established election results, the political office in question is awarded, in conformity with the election formula determined in advance, to the candidate who won such office in the election. On the basis of such voting results, i.e. the votes of voters, the candidate's passive right to vote, which after the confirmation of the candidacy entailed that the candidate has the right to partake in the political struggle for power as a candidate, assumes a new quality – the acquired office. Therefore, in such case the candidate's passive right to vote, which is as well a human right ensured by the second paragraph of Article 43 of the Constitution, also includes the right to perform the office acquired in such manner.<sup>9</sup> If election irregularities occur due to which the candidate should not have acquired this right, it must be allowed to challenge the elections. For such reason, a legal remedy must be ensured by which it will be possible to claim these election irregularities. In the decision-making procedure for this legal remedy, all constitutional procedural guarantees must be respected, including the right of the candidate to make a statement regarding the alleged irregularities.

8. Due to the fact that the right to vote has a special legal nature and a voter can only exercise it simultaneously with all the other voters, although it is a personal right, and in an electoral procedure organised in advance<sup>10</sup> – this entails the collective manner of exercising the right to vote – and because the trust of voters in the fairness of the election procedure is of exceptional importance for the legitimacy of political power, protection of the right to vote after election day must be ensured in the public interest. For such reason, the legal remedy by means of which the elections may be challenged must be granted to both voters and all the candidates<sup>11</sup> who participated in the election. Therefore, elections can only be successfully challenged (meaning that they are either abrogated or the determined election results are different if the election irregularities can be remedied already in such manner) if what is at issue are such electoral irregularities that have or could have affected the election results, which is also emphasised by the Decision in the fifth paragraph of the reasoning.
9. If no one challenges an election, it must be deemed that the electoral procedure was carried out in conformity with the electoral rules and that the elected candidates acquired their offices, which are constitutionally protected as the passive right to vote; for such reason they also have the right to perform such office. Therefore, in the procedure for the confirmation of office they must be confirmed. Their confirmation also represents respect for the will of the voters, who by exercising this human right expressed it in the most democratic manner possible – in secret, free, and fair elections. A regulation that allows a political decision on the fact whether outside the Constitution and the law there exist reasons due to which it would perhaps nevertheless be substantiated to refuse the confirmation of an office although no one participating in the elections, i.e. voters or candidates, challenged the election would thus entail an inadmissible interference with the passive right to vote that the individual acquired in the elections in conformity with all the electoral rules, and with the active right to vote of voters. Both rights are protected by the second paragraph of Article 43 of the Constitution as human rights.

9 See J. Sovdat in: L. Šturm (Ed.), op. cit. 2011, pp. 711–712.

10 Grad wrote about this already in 1992; see F. Grad, Novi volilni sistem z volilno zakonodajo [The New Electoral System with Electoral Legislation], Inštitut za javno upravo pri Pravni fakulteti v Ljubljani, Ljubljana 1992, pp. 39–40. See also Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-304/98, dated 19 November 1998 (OdlUS VII, 240).

11 At this time I am leaving aside my serious doubts regarding the constitutionality of the statutory regulation in this respect, because they are not decisive for deciding in the case at issue.

10. If today we were to allow the substantiation offered by the National Council – that due to moral and ethical reasons, although no one has challenged the election, it is necessary to refuse to confirm the office of the appellant, a special political exclusion of competitors after the election is over. This would mean that in the procedure intended to perform legal supervision of the constitutionality and legality of elections we abandon the law entirely and allow decision-making based only on how those who find themselves in the position to decide on the confirmation of the office assess the morality of the person elected, although, in fact, from the aspect of the ethical perspective of the situation, they may perhaps even really be entitled to provide such assessment. The doors of arbitrary, political decision-making thus would open fully, in a procedure that must be a legal procedure and that must, as such, be carried out in conformity with the legal rules, in a procedure that entails legal decision-making on the validity of elections at the first instance, and the constitutionality and legality of which will be assessed by the Constitutional Court, as the electoral judge, on the basis of an appeal. Such would entail that instead of a legal procedure, there exists complete political discretion in the decision-making at the first instance. And what is then the electoral judge to supervise – if the politicians have exercised such political discretion correctly? In such manner, also the electoral judge would be transformed into an exclusively political authority. It is not necessary to explain the inadmissibility of such a situation.
11. Therefore, it is, of course, not a coincidence that also the Code of Good Practice in Electoral Matters,<sup>12</sup> which allows primary supervision over elections to a political body as a fact, if such regulation has existed for a longer period of time in the state, simultaneously warns of the possibility of a political decision, due to which it qualifies such possibility as admissible only as a measure at the first instance against which judicial protection must be ensured,<sup>13</sup> i.e. judicial protection before the electoral judge, which in such case simultaneously performs the role of the appellate authority and the role of the judge deciding in the first and the last instance regarding protection of the right to vote. This role imposes the requirement that there exists comprehensive judicial protection to which all the participants in the elections must have access, i.e. both the voters as well as all the candidates in the election. In this judicial procedure the right to vote is protected, especially its already mentioned collective aspect, as is the fairness of elections; therefore, the access of participants in the elections to the electoral judge cannot be conditioned by their possible personal interests and benefits. Consequently, both the voters as well as all the candidates can request an assessment of all possible election irregularities. This refers to the existence of the right to vote and the electoral registers connected therewith, the validity of candidacies, compliance with the rules on and financing of electoral campaigns, as well as to compliance with the rules on voting at polling stations and on the determination of election results.<sup>14</sup> However, if no one invokes these electoral irregularities, the election results are final and those confirming the offices must respect the will of the voters expressed in the elections, which is a reflection of their active right to vote – the human right that developed through the centuries, due to its role and importance for a democratic state, into a fundamental political right of free citizens.

12 The Code of Good Practice in Electoral Matters was adopted by the so-called Venice Commission on 5 and 6 July 2002 at its 51st session. The European Court of Human Rights refers regularly thereto when interpreting Article 3 of Protocol No. 1 to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette, RS No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94), whereby its formally non-binding recommendations are changed into relevant requirements when what is at issue is the protection of the right to vote. See, e.g., the Grand Chamber Judgment in Scoppola v. Italy, dated 22 May 2012.

13 See Procedural Safeguards, an effective system of appeal, Section II.3.3.a. of the Code and paragraph 94 of the Explanatory Report to the Code of Good Practice in Electoral Matters.

12. As I have already emphasised, for the significance of democratic elections it is especially important that voters have faith in the fairness of the electoral procedure, because it is the foundation of their legitimacy and thus the legitimacy of power. For such reason, also the selection of the system for resolving electoral disputes that is effective and powerful enough to ensure the peaceful consolidation of democracy is one of the most important decisions that a state must adopt when regulating the electoral system.<sup>15</sup> Since the legislature decided, modelling itself on the regulation governing the election of deputies, to keep the primary supervision over elections in the hands of a political body, it is even more important that such supervision be carried out in conformity with the legal rules envisaged in advance and not on the basis of political decisions of one kind or another. This is also why it is so important that the decision (at least the final one) is at all times subject to supervision by an independent and impartial judge – the guardian of the fairness of elections. If in the case at issue the Constitutional Court had not abrogated the decision of the National Council and had not confirmed the office [at issue], it would not have performed this role of the electoral judge.

III

13. It is characteristic of Slovene statutory regulation that it determines the least possible limitations of the passive right to vote. If we examine foreign regulations, as well as numerous decisions of the ECtHR, in which it assessed the admissibility of limitations of the passive right to vote, we can see that elsewhere the situation is significantly different. One of the most known limitations of the passive right to vote is ineligibility. This was also envisaged by the Slovene constitution-framers, except that the legislature has left it unregulated to this day. The second paragraph of Article 82 of the Constitution determines that the law is to establish who may not be elected a deputy. Thus, it gives the legislature the authorisation to enact limitations of the passive right to vote in order to achieve the aim of this constitutional provision. In reality, this aim is intended to ensure the integrity of the electoral procedure and the elected representatives of the people. Due to the fact that the Constitution itself requires such limitations of the right to vote, the constitutionally admissible aim of ineligibility is fulfilled (the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution), and what remains for the legislature to do is to determine the limitations by law and to respect, in doing so, the general principle of proportionality (Article 2 of the Constitution). Without statutory regulation of the passive right to vote it is thus not admissible to limit the passive right to vote, and the statutorily determined limitations must pass the so-called strict test of proportionality, on the basis of which the admissibility of a limitation with a human right is assessed.

14 All this is also emphasised in paragraph 92 of the Explanatory Report on the Code of Good Practice in Electoral Matters.

Ayoub, Electoral Dispute Resolution Mechanisms, 4th European Conference of Electoral Management Bodies, “Fighting against electoral fraud – Complaints and appeals procedures”, Strasbourg, 20 to 21 September 2007, publication of the European Commission for Democracy through Law, CLD-EL (2008)005, pp. 119–127, accessible at: http://www.venice.coe.int/docs/2000/CDL-INF\(2000\)013-e.html013-e.html), p. 127.

14. Even if instances of ineligibility are determined by law, such does not already entail that on such basis there can occur political arbitration with regard to which candidate has his or her office confirmed after the elections have been carried out and which not. Ineligibility entails that a person who otherwise fulfils the general conditions (citizenship, age, legal capacity), on the basis of which he or she has the active right to vote (except when what is at issue are persons whose right to vote – both active and passive – is denied due to a lack of legal capacity), does not have the right to vote due to specific limitations that are connected with the profession, activities, or positions that the person carries out or occupies.<sup>16</sup> Such entails that such person must be eliminated already from running for office. From the start, the Election Commission may not confirm the candidacy of an ineligible person. During the confirmation of candidacies, it is not yet possible to successfully challenge its decision, which is based on law, by legal remedies before the competent court (not even by a constitutional complaint). If the Election Commission confirms the candidacy of an ineligible person, voters and candidates can successfully challenge the elections after they have been carried out, if the fact that an ineligible person participated in the election could have affected the election result. If an appeal has been filed, this can thus be the subject of a dispute before [a specific] office is confirmed; however, also in such case the Constitutional Court would not be able to decide politically, but would have to decide legally in conformity with the legal rules determined in advance by law.
15. Due to the fact that our legislature did not in any manner determine the instances of ineligibility, I would like to briefly draw attention to the French regulation, which extended ineligibility also to instances that are not included in the presented definition of this term. The Code électoral,<sup>17</sup> which regulates elections in France, determines different examples of ineligibility for different offices; sufficiently illustrative is the ineligibility of a deputy of the French National Assembly, which is the general representative chamber. According to such, for instance, persons ineligible to be deputy in any district include persons who are currently or who were in the previous six months in such area judges, high officials of the state, bearers of individual public offices at the regional and departmental level, and the human rights ombudsman in all districts. Persons for whom a (criminal) conviction (final, of course) prevents them from being entered into the electoral register for a determined limited period of time are ineligible (meaning that due to a conviction they also do not have the active right to vote). [Furthermore,] the special examples of ineligibility are actually special sanctions for not complying with electoral rules and the rules connected therewith, especially those that refer to the declaration of the assets of elected officials and the financing of election campaigns. In such manner, a deputy who in the statutorily determined time limit does not submit to the special Commission for Financial Transparency of Political Life a declaration of their assets becomes ineligible for a period of one year. Persons who in the statutorily determined period of time do not submit their campaign accounts to the special National Commission for Campaign Accounts and Political Financing, persons whose campaign accounts have not been approved, and persons who exceed the upper statutorily determined amount for the election campaign become ineligible as well. It is the French Constitutional Court (the Conseil constitutionnel) that decides thereon; the one-year time limit is calculated from [the date of] the judicial decision on ineligibility. The French Constitutional Court decides on ineligibility with regard to the financing of the election campaign either simultaneously in an electoral dispute in which either the annulment of the elections due to irregularities (also) in the financing of the election campaign is required or upon the special request of the mentioned Commission if the elections are not challenged. What is essential with regard to both ineligibility caused by a final criminal conviction and ineligibility caused by a decision of the Constitutional Court is that the person is removed from office.<sup>18</sup>

16. In a state as small as Slovenia, it is even more necessary than in larger states to determine ineligibility in order for the integrity of the elected representatives of the people to be ensured, as well as the integrity of the electoral procedure. It would be preferable for the legislature to finally address the regulation of this field. However, let me repeat this one more time: Even if it does determine the cases in which ineligibility applies, this can only entail that these cases would be decided on in legal procedures and in a legal manner.

IV

17. Legal supervision of elections in which the electoral judge has the last say and the legally regulated instances of ineligibility are not a substitute for political responsibility and a culture of [proper] political behaviour. The latter two coexist with the former two. It is known from which perspective political responsibility is a constitutional category, by whom it may be invoked, and when. When what is at issue is the electoral procedure, those who insist on political responsibility in a democratic state during each election again are the voters (i.e. adult citizens of the state) – either directly or through electors (who are elected by them), who with regard to indirect elections are, as I have already mentioned, voters themselves. Of course, also each office holder can demonstrate his or her political responsibility by respecting the political culture in such a manner that he or she resigns from his or her office. However, neither political responsibility nor [proper] political culture entail the negation of law. On the contrary, they adhere to it. After the electoral procedure is complete, an integral part of this law is also the electoral dispute, which entails legal proceedings in which legal supervision of compliance with the electoral rules in the election procedure is carried out. This also applies, as I have already emphasised, when on the request of the entitled initiators of such proceedings this supervision is first carried out before a political body and only then before the electoral judge. Therefore, there is no space therein for politically arbitrary conduct; conduct in conformity with the Constitution and the law is required in an electoral dispute.

<sup>18</sup> A known case that also the Court of Justice of the European Union dealt with (see the Judgment in J.-M. Le Pen v. European Parliament, C-208/03, dated 7 July 2005) is, for instance, the conviction of a known French politician who was convicted by the final judgment of a French criminal court of having committed the criminal offence of assault and public insult and on whom also a one-year prohibition of the exercise of the passive right to vote was imposed, the consequence of which was the termination of the office of a deputy of the European Parliament.

DECISION

At a session held on 9 November 2006 in proceedings to review constitutionality initiated upon the petition of Elizabeta Dolenc, Radovljica, and others, and the petition of Marija Petan, Ljubljana, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. The Victims of War Violence Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 63/95, 8/96, 44/96, 70/97, 43/99, 28/2000, 64/01, 110/02, 3/03, and 18/03 – official consolidated text) is inconsistent with the Constitution.
2. The National Assembly must remedy the established inconsistency within a time limit of one year from the publication of the Decision in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia.
3. The petitions for the initiation of proceedings to review the constitutionality of the Redress of Injustices Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 59/96, 11/01, 87/01, 34/03, 47/03 – official consolidated text, 53/05, and 70/05 – official consolidated text) are rejected.

*ReasoningA

1. The petitioners filed two petitions for the review of the constitutionality of the Victims of War Violence Act (hereinafter referred to as the VWVA) and the Redress of Injustices Act (hereinafter referred to as the RIA). The petitioners are close relatives of persons who died violently during the Second World War (i.e. from May 1942 until May 1945 inclusive). The petitioners allege that those persons were civilian victims who had died during the war due to violence perpetrated by members of the Partisan movement.
2. The petitioners are of the opinion that the third paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution guarantees them, as the closest relatives of persons who were victims of war violence, special protection in conformity with the law. They emphasise that due to the violent death of their relatives they suffered severe consequences both during and after the war. As children they were forcibly deprived of the possibility and right to live in community with their parents. They emphasise that due to the loss of their parents they experienced severe suffering and psychological damage, which continued also in the post-war period, and which are still present particularly in those cases in which the children have not yet succeeded in finding the graves of their parents and to thereby find proper expression of their grief. In the opinion of the petitioners, due to the fact that the remains of their relatives are located in unknown and unmarked places, which are not graves, their right to personal dignity is still being violated.

3. The petitioners allege that due to the confiscation of property they also incurred material damage. Their social position was allegedly worsened. Furthermore, they allegedly did not have equal opportunities as others to enjoy education, employment, and a professional career. Already in their childhood, they were allegedly mocked, injured regarding their personal development, and socially marginalised. Their mental integrity was allegedly injured, and their personal development and the formation of their personal identity were hampered. Furthermore, the honour and good reputation of their families were damaged. The petitioners are convinced that they were ostracised for the entire post-war period as their honour and good reputation were stained. By the establishment of the inconsistency of the RIA and the VWVA with the Constitution they would allegedly receive concrete material and non-material legal benefits and rights.
4. In the opinion of the petitioners, the state of the facts that is characteristic of the killing of their relatives is in essential elements equal to the state of the facts that apply to the cases of the persons referred to by the third paragraph of Article 4 of the RIA, i.e. “persons who were killed without court sentences.” Also the relatives of the petitioners were allegedly killed without being convicted by a court, i.e. without any legal proceedings. The only difference between the two categories of persons is, according to the petitioners, in the period of time in which they were killed. While the relatives of the persons that were killed after the war enjoy the right to compensation determined by the first paragraph of Article 5 of the RIA and the right to be issued death certificates and to mark the graves [of those killed], the petitioners, who are relatives of persons killed during the war, are not entitled to the mentioned rights.
5. The petitioners allege that their position is also not regulated in the VWVA, which in terms of time refers to the period from 6 April 1941 to 15 May 1945, i.e. to the period in which their relatives were killed. The petitioners emphasise that with respect to the provision of Article 1 of the VWVA, which only covers the violent acts or forcible measures of the occupier, they cannot acquire the rights guaranteed to the victims of war violence by Articles 7 and 8 of the VWVA. They emphasise that their relatives do not fall within the circle of persons who voluntarily or professionally collaborated with the aggressor (Article 6 of the VWVA), but that their relatives were civilians or even members of the Partisan movement. In their opinion, the legislature did not have reasonable grounds to exclude the category of persons to which the petitioners and their relatives belong. According to the petitioners, by failing to regulate the legal status of the mentioned persons the legislature violated the principle of a state governed by the rule of law and of a social state determined by Article 2 of the Constitution, the principle of equality before the law determined by the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution, the right to personal dignity and safety determined by Article 34 of the Constitution, the rights to privacy and personality rights determined by Article 35 of the Constitution, and the right to social security determined by Article 50 of the Constitution.

6. The petitioners are convinced that the matter concerns an unconstitutional legal gap for which the legislature did not have reasonable and objectively justifiable grounds. Therefore, they propose that the Constitutional Court establish that “the Victims of War Violence Act and the Redress of Injustices Act are not in conformity with the Constitution insofar as they do not regulate the legal position of persons killed during the war and the rights of the relatives of persons killed during the war.”
7. The petition of Elizabeta Dolenc and others was sent to the National Assembly, which did not respond thereto. The petition was also sent to the Government, which also did not submit an opinion thereon.

B – I

8. The petitioners substantiate their legal interest by alleging that they are close relatives of persons who as civilian persons allegedly died violently during the Second World War (i.e. between May 1942 and May 1945 inclusive). The Constitutional Court assesses that the petitioners demonstrate the legal interest to file a petition in the part relating to the VWVA. The Constitutional Court has received a large number of submissions supporting the filed petition, due to which it did not deem the persons submitting such to be participants in the proceedings.
9. The Constitutional Court joined the two petitions for joint consideration and decision-making. As the allegations in the petition of Marija Petan and others do not deviate substantively from the allegations in the petition of Elizabeta Dolenc and others, the Constitutional Court did not send the other petition to the National Assembly.

B – II

10. The Constitutional Court accepted for consideration the two petitions for the initiation of proceedings to review the constitutionality of the VWVA. Since the conditions determined by the fourth paragraph of Article 26 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA) were fulfilled, it proceeded to decide on the merits of the case.
11. The petitioners proposed the calling of a public hearing. They substantiated their proposal by claiming that the Constitutional Court would thereby gain direct insight into their tragic life stories. The Constitutional Court established, however, that the state of the facts that was the basis for the review of the constitutionality of the challenged statutory regulation was sufficiently explained already on the basis of the submitted documents. Therefore, it decided to not hold a public hearing.

The Review of the VWVA

12. Thus far, the Constitutional Court has decided a number of times on cases in which individuals challenged the VWVA and alleged that they had been unjustifiably excluded from the circle of persons entitled to be granted the status of a victim of war violence.<sup>1</sup> The petitions at issue, however, open a new aspect, i.e. the question of the exclusion of an entire group of persons who in accordance with the criteria determined by the VWVA could well fall within the circle of civilian victims of war, but to whom the VWVA does not grant the status of a victim of war violence merely due to the fact that the circumstances which the VWVA determines as a criterion for granting the status of a victim of war violence were not caused by the occupying forces or their collaborators.
13. The starting point for the review of the constitutionality of the challenged statutory regulation is the third paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution, on the basis of which war veterans and victims of war are guaranteed special protection in accordance with the law. In a number of decisions (e.g. Decision No. U-I-86/94, dated 14 November 1996, Official Gazette RS, No. 68/96, and OdlUS V, 153; and Order No. U-I-327/96, dated 6 May 1999, Official Gazette RS, No. 51/99, and OdlUS IX, 19), the Constitutional Court has already explained the nature of this constitutional right. The mentioned constitutional provision obliges the state to regulate special protection for victims of war violence in a manner that exceeds the rights arising from mandatory social insurance. The content of the right to social security is, however, not determined by the Constitution. Furthermore, the Constitution does not guarantee specifically determined social rights. What follows from this constitutional provision is merely the obligation of the state to create conditions and possibilities for the realisation of social security. Special protection signifies ensuring special rights or a broader scope of rights. The Constitution does not determine the measures that the state must opt for in order to achieve such an aim. Special human rights in the field of social security (social rights) are exercised “under conditions provided by law” – i.e. on the basis of a law that determines the circle of entitled persons, the type and scope of entitlements, the conditions for their acquisition, and the manner of the exercise of these rights.
14. When assessing the challenged statutory regulation, the Constitutional Court must also take into consideration the generally accepted principles of international law (Article 8 and the second indent of the first paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution). This term encompasses, in particular, the rules of customary international law and the general principles of law recognised by civilised nations. These two sources of international law are enumerated in points b and c of Article 38 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice.<sup>2</sup> Within the framework of the constitutional category of ‘generally accepted principles of international law’, the Constitutional Court has applied the ‘general principles of law recognised by civilised nations’ as the criterion for deciding a number of times.<sup>3</sup> In Decision No. U-I-23/93,<sup>4</sup> it proceeded from the fact that after the Second World War the international legal order was established on the basis of condemnation of the Nazi and Fascist regimes and the persecution of the perpetrators responsible for the crimes committed, which was confirmed by the entire international community of that time.<sup>5</sup> In the mentioned Decision, the Constitutional Court adopted the position that certain activities of an individual during the [Second World] War can entail a reason for such person to not be entitled to Yugoslav citizenship. It is also necessary to emphasise the significance of the Preamble to the Constitution, which in this respect states the following: “Proceeding from [...] the historical fact that in a centuries-long struggle for national liberation we Slovenes have established our national identity and asserted our statehood [...]” From both the materials of the Commission for Constitutional Affairs and constitutional theory, it follows that what is meant by the struggle for national liberation is, in particular, the periods of the national liberation struggle and the struggle for independence.<sup>6</sup> In connection with such, Dr Peter Jambrek wrote: “The Slovene constitutional doctrine of the right of the nation to self-determination was explicitly formed, practically tested, and constitutionally implemented in two key periods of the previous century relating to Slovene statehood – in the years between 1941 and 1945 and between 1987 and 1991.”<sup>7</sup>

15. By Article 1 of the VWVA the legislature determined that a citizen of the Republic of Slovenia who during a war or military aggression against the Republic of Slovenia was subject to violent acts or the forcible measures of an occupier, aggressor, or their collaborators, is entitled to the status of a victim of war violence. By such definition the legislature determined that who caused the person to be subject to violent acts or forcible measures is to be the basic criterion for granting the status of a victim of war violence. On the basis of this criterion, the legislature introduced a differential regulation of the position of [various] victims of war violence who in fact had experienced the period of the Second World War in comparable circumstances.

4 In Case No. U-I-23/93, the Constitutional Court assessed the statutory regulation by which the post-war Yugoslav authorities had denied persons of German nationality who during the occupation had been loyal to the German Reich the possibility to acquire Yugoslav citizenship. It established that such regulation was not inconsistent with the general principles of law that already at that time were recognised by civilised nations.

16. The basic text of the VWVA was adopted in 1995 as one of the so-called war acts (together with the War Disabled Act, Official Gazette RS, Nos. 63/95, etc. – hereinafter referred to as the WDA, and the War Veterans Act, Official Gazette RS, Nos. 63/95, etc.). As follows from the legislative file (Gazette of the National Assembly, No. 72/02), the VWVA was adopted in order to ensure special protection of those citizens of the Republic of Slovenia who during the war (from 1941 until 1945) had been subject to certain typical and generic forms of war violence, which resulted in consequences for the war generation that society is only able to remedy or mitigate by special material and organisational efforts. Initially, the VWVA only applied to certain categories of such persons; however, the circle of entitled persons was subsequently expanded by several amendments to the VWVA.
17. In the original text of the VWVA, the legislature included individual typical categories of civilian persons who had been subject to war violence; however, it did not define the concept of a civilian person itself (neither did it do so in subsequent amendments).<sup>8</sup> The following categories of victims of war violence were defined in Article 2 of the VWVA: exiles, camp prisoners, prisoners, labour deportees, internees, refugees, and stolen children. By the provision of Article 4 of the VWVA, the legislature enabled the status of a victim of war violence to also be granted to persons who had been forcibly mobilised into regular military units of the occupier. These persons can also be listed among the particularly exposed victims of war, as they are civilian persons who, contrary to the then valid rules of international law,<sup>9</sup> had been

8 The concept of a civilian is defined in the Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts, adopted on 8 June 1977 (Official Gazette SFRY, MP, No. 16/78, and Official Gazette RS, No. 14/92 – hereinafter referred to as Protocol I). In conformity with the first paragraph of Article 50 of Protocol I, a civilian is any person who does not belong to one of the categories of persons referred to in Article 4 A (1), (2), (3), and (6) of the Third Geneva Convention and in Article 43 of this Protocol. In case of doubt whether a person is a civilian, that person shall be considered to be a civilian. This is an exclusionary approach in defining the concept of a civilian. Members of the armed forces, the wounded, the sick, and prisoners of war are excluded from the circle of civilians. By interpreting the mentioned definition of the term a civilian from the viewpoint of the rules of the international military law in force during the Second World War, one can establish that also in accordance with the war regulations in force at the time, the wounded and sick in the framework of the armed forces and prisoners of war were specially protected categories that could not be included among civilian victims of war (cf. the Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick in Armies in the Field and the Convention relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War, adopted in Geneva on 27 July 1929; on 20 May 1931, the Kingdom of Yugoslavia submitted the instruments of ratification regarding both of them to the Swiss Federal Council. These two Conventions were superseded by the First and Third Geneva Conventions for the Protection of War Victims of 12 August 1949.

9 The prohibition against [forcibly] recruiting inhabitants in an occupied territory can be extracted by interpreting the Hague Regulations of 1907, which in Article 45 determined that it is forbidden to compel the inhabitants of occupied territory to swear allegiance to the hostile Power. This prohibition was included in the Fourth Geneva Convention, i.e. the Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in forced to join the military units of the occupier. Only by the 2002 amendment to the VWVA (i.e. the VWVA-G) did the legislature enable the status of a victim of war violence to be granted to the only category [of persons] who cannot be considered to be civilian victims of war, i.e. members of the former Yugoslav army at the time of the capitulation of the Kingdom of Yugoslavia; however, this category is not relevant to the assessment of the case at issue.<sup>10</sup>

18. Depending on the status granted, the VWVA recognises different categories [of victims of war violence] different scopes of statutory rights (health care, spa and climatic treatment, the reimbursement of travel expenses, recognition of the pension qualifying period, the right to a pension under more favourable conditions, the right to military compensation in accordance with a special law, a monthly allowance for life, and priority in the allocation of subsidised housing). Under certain conditions, also family members of a person who lost his or her life or went missing in the circumstances enabling the granting of the status of a victim of war violence in conformity with this Act (Article 7 of the VWVA) are entitled to such protection.<sup>11</sup>
19. In the framework of the authorisation granted by the third paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution, the legislature namely adopted a regulation by which it limited

Time of War of 12 August 1949 (Official Gazette of the Presidium of the People's Assembly of the FPRY, Nos. 6/50 and 24/50, and Official Gazette RS, No. 14/92), which in the first paragraph of Article 51 determines the following: "The Occupying Power may not compel protected persons to serve in its armed or auxiliary forces. No pressure or propaganda which aims at securing voluntary enlistment is permitted."

- 10 The petitioners do not mention this category in the framework of their allegations.
- 11 In conformity with the first paragraph of Article 7 of the VWVA, protection under this Act is extended to a citizen of the Republic of Slovenia, a family member of a person who lost his or her life or went missing in action in circumstances enabling the granting of the status of a victim of war violence in accordance with this Act. Such protection is ensured to the same circle of family members and under equal conditions as in accordance with the regulations on war-disabled persons. Articles 8 through 10 of the WDA determine which family members fall within the circle of entitled persons in accordance with this Act. In conformity with Article 9 of the WDA, the following family members are entitled to protection under this Act:
  1. A spouse whom a war-disabled person, fallen combatant, or other person maintained during at least the last year prior to his or her death, and a spouse whose marriage was dissolved by divorce, if he or she has or had the right to maintenance on the basis of a court decision or an agreement, and enjoyed such right until the death of the war-disabled person, fallen combatant, or other person (i.e. the divorced spouse);
  2. Children and adoptees, as well as stepchildren, however the latter only under the condition that the war-disabled person, fallen combatant, or other person maintained such during at least the last year prior to his or her death, or from the stepchild's birth onwards, if he or she is less than one year old and does not have a parent who is maintaining him or her;
  3. A parent, adoptive parent, stepfather, or stepmother whom the war-disabled person, fallen combatant, or other person maintained during at least the last year prior to his or her death, provided that the stepfather or stepmother maintained the war-disabled person, fallen combatant, or other person for at least three years and cared for him or her.

On the basis of Article 10 of the WDA, a partnership [of two persons] lasting at least three years that in accordance with the regulations on marriage and family relations is equated with marriage has, under this Act, the same legal consequences as a marriage.

granting the status of a victim of war violence to different categories of civilian persons. However, granting the status of a victim of war violence was only made possible regarding those civilian persons who had been subject to the violent acts or forcible measures of an occupier or its collaborators. The legislature entirely excluded from the circle of entitled persons civilian persons who had been subject to violent acts or forcible measures carried out by the armed forces fighting on the opposing side in the armed conflict. In order to define the term civilian victims, it is decisive that these are persons who were subject to violence due to war events without being actively involved on the either side of the armed conflict.<sup>12</sup>

20. In the assessment of the Constitutional Court, by entirely excluding from special protection the mentioned circle of civilian victims of war who had experienced the period of the Second World War in circumstances comparable to those determined by Article 1 of the VWVA, the legislature acted inconsistently with the authorisation determined by the third paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution. The authorisation given to the legislature by the mentioned constitutional provision is not unlimited. The legislature may only exercise this authorisation within the framework of constitutional principles and by respecting constitutionally guaranteed human rights and fundamental freedoms. By determining in Article 6 of the VWVA that persons who voluntarily or professionally collaborated with the occupier are excluded from the circle of victims of war violence, the National Assembly acted within the framework of such authorisation. A regulation that allowed persons who collaborated with the occupier to be granted the status of a victim of war violence could be inconsistent with generally accepted principles of international law and thus also with the Constitution.<sup>13</sup> However, it does not follow from the Constitution that the term victim of war violence should be restricted to only those civilian persons who had been subject to violent acts or forcible measures carried out by the armed forces of the occupier. Therefore, it is inconsistent with the Constitution that the legislature excluded from the circle of civilian victims of war violence all those persons who had been subject to violent acts or forcible measures carried out by the armed forces fighting on the other side in the armed conflict. Establishing whether potential victims of war violence collaborated with the occupier can be the subject of concrete procedures and thus also the subject of a possible constitutional review of the acts adopted in such procedures, but not the subject of a constitutional review of a regulation.
21. Due to the reasons stated above, the Constitutional Court assesses that the challenged regulation determined by the VWVA is inconsistent with the Constitution. As the matter concerns a situation referred to in Article 48 of the CCA, the Constitutional Court established that the challenged statutory regulation was unconstitutional (point 1 of the operative provisions). The Constitutional Court determined a time limit of one year within which the legislature is obliged to remedy the established inconsistency (point 2 of the operative provisions). By regulating the position and the rights of civilian victims of war in conformity with the above-mentioned, the legislature will also enable the family members of the persons killed to acquire, under the conditions determined by Article 7 of the VWVA, certain rights on the basis of this Act.

22. As the Constitutional Court established an unconstitutionality of the challenged regulation determined by the VWVA already due to the inconsistency with the third paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution, it did not assess the other alleged inconsistencies.
23. Considering the fact that the two petitions substantively refer to the regulation determined by the VWVA, the petitioners do not have a legal interest to challenge the RIA. Therefore, the Constitutional Court rejected the petitions in this part (point 3 of the operative provisions). With respect to the petitioners' allegations concerning their inability to build graves and to obtain death certificates, the Constitutional Court explains that these issues are not a subject of the challenged Acts.

DECISION

At a session held on 2 October 2008 in proceedings to decide upon the constitutional complaint of Velislav Todorović, Ljubljana, represented by Nevenka Šorli, attorney, Ljubljana, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. Supreme Court Judgment No. VIII Ips 213/2004, dated 1 February 2005, Higher Labour and Social Court Judgment No. Psp 136/2003, dated 9 April 2004, and Ljubljana Labour and Social Court Judgment No. Ps 1459/2000, dated 22 January 2003, are annulled.
2. The case has been remanded to the Ljubljana Labour and Social Court for new adjudication.

*ReasoningA

1. The court of first instance found that the complainant is a citizen of the Republic of Slovenia and that he had claimed his right to an old-age pension from the pension insurance institution in the Republic of Serbia where he was last employed. As a result, the court decided that he had exhausted the right to choose his insurance institution in accordance with the applicable regulation. For this reason, he did not meet the conditions for recognition of the right to the oldage pension in the Republic of Slovenia pursuant to Article 177 of the Pension and Disability Insurance Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 106/99 etc. – hereinafter referred to as the PDIA-1). The first paragraph of this Article provides that an insured person who meets the conditions for entitlement to two or more pensions that are based on compulsory insurance in the Republic of Slovenia may enjoy only one pension of their choice. In the second paragraph it provides, however, that the preceding paragraph shall also apply if an insured person meets the conditions for obtaining pensions in other states, provided they acquire rights on the basis of the same periods of pensionable service. In the opinion of the court of first instance, the possibility of choice relates to the insured person, i.e. to the economically active person who has not yet obtained the right to choose. Once the right is exercised, it is no longer possible to choose which institution has the jurisdiction to recognise the right and subsequently disburse the benefit. Therefore the court of first instance rejected the complainant's claim to annul the final decision of the Pension and Disability Insurance Institute (hereinafter referred to as the Institute), by which the latter recognised the right for the oldage pension to be supplemented pursuant to the Provision of Social Security to Slovene Citizens Entitled to Pensions from the Former Republics of the SFRY [Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia] Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 18/01 etc. – hereinafter referred to as the PSSA). According to the court of second instance, the complainant's position that, pursuant to the general regulations, he is entitled to an independent oldage pension – instead of the recognised supplement to the pension – is erroneous on the grounds that were convincingly established in the challenged judgment and final decision of the respondent party to the proceedings. The court of second instance argued that, in order to solve the case at the appeal stage, the actual finding of the court of first instance alone that the right of the complainant to an old-age pension had been recognised by the Serbian pension insurance institution since 1992, which is where he was last insured, also taking into account the years completed in Slovenia was essential. As a result, the right to choose between the state pensions in the Republic of Slovenia and Republic of Serbia had been exhausted. The court of first instance ruled that the plaintiff had exhausted the right to choose, i.e. by claiming his right from the Serbian insurance institution, he had waived the possibility of claiming the same pension benefit from the Slovene insurance institution. Moreover, the Supreme Court upheld the ruling of both courts that the complainant is only entitled to the supplement to the pension. It argued that an insured person who claims the right to a pension in any of the republics of the former SFRY does not have the right to choose and cannot successfully claim the same right in the Republic of Slovenia.

2. The complainant asserts that the position of the courts pursuant to which he exhausted the right to choose the insurance institution in accordance with the applicable regulations by claiming the right to the old-age pension from the Serbian insurance institution is unconstitutional. The complainant believes that the purpose of the second paragraph of Article 177 of the PDIA-1 is not for the insured person to lose the right to a pension as soon as he obtains the right to pension on the basis of the same period of pensionable service in another country. In his opinion, the aforementioned provision is intended to prevent a person from receiving two pensions simultaneously on the basis of the same period of pensionable service, but is not intended to prevent recognition of two rights to a pension. The complainant emphasises that the insured person has the right to a pension on the basis that he meets the conditions for a particular pension. He argues that it is possible to limit the extent to which this right is exercised, but it is not possible to interfere with the right itself, since the individual would be deprived of what he had secured for himself by paying the contributions and by the period of pensionable service in the Republic of Slovenia. In his opinion, the courts would have to recognise his right to a pension and only then decide on whether it was going to be disbursed. It is alleged that the courts decided that because he exercised his right to choose in another country he ultimately lost the possibility to claim the pension on the basis of the period of pensionable service completed in the Republic of Slovenia. The complainant claims that the second paragraph of Article 177 of the PDIA-1 does not provide such and that the courts went beyond what is admissible according to the Constitution. It is alleged that the adopted position results in excessive interference with the right to social security determined in Article 50 of the Constitution. The complainant alleges that the courts also violated the right to make statements (Article 22 of the Constitution), since they did not consider his claims that he is entitled to the right to a pension pursuant to Article 36 of the PDIA-1. It is also alleged that they violated the right to private property pursuant to Article 33 of the Constitution by the contentious interpretation of the second paragraph of Article 177 of the PDIA1, since the protection of property also includes the right to be a beneficiary of the pension scheme to which he contributed. He argues that his right to freedom of conduct (Article 35 of the Constitution) was violated indirectly, because the adopted position of the courts represented an exaggerated sanction for the conduct of the insured person who has the possibility to simultaneously receive pension in two states. He also alleged that the challenged interpretation of the courts is also inconsistent with the principle of equality before the law (second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution). The insured persons that were paying the contributions and completed specific period of pensionable service only in Slovenia acquired the right to a pension without any difficulties, whereas the insured persons who in addition to the same period of pensionable service in Slovenia completed lesser proportion of the period of pensionable service in another state were deprived of that right.

3. By an Order No. Up-360/05, dated 7 November 2006, the panel of the Constitutional Court accepted the constitutional complaint for consideration. Pursuant to the provision of the then applicable Article 56 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94), the Constitutional Court sent the constitutional complaint to the Supreme Court that replied that it will not respond thereto.

B

4. The complainant claims inter alia that, by the challenged decisions, the courts excessively interfered with his right to social security.
5. The first paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution guarantees the right to a pension under conditions provided by law. Therefore, this is a case for which the Constitution leaves part or all of the content and scope of the human right to be determined by the subsequent statutory regulation. In a case such as this, as pointed out by the Constitutional Court in its Decision No. U-I-86/96, dated 12 December 1996 (Official Gazette RS, No. 1/97, and OdlUS V, 176), the so-called statutory reservation is so broad that it is necessary to establish on a case-by-case basis the extent to which the legislature is bound by the Constitution when defining the content and scope of the human right, and the extent to which this falls within its margin of appreciation, in the event of which it is bound merely by other provisions of the Constitution and no longer by the constitutionally determined content of this human right, i.e. by the constitutionally protected core or essence of this human right. If the statutory regulation interfered with the essence of the human right, this would entail an interference with the right determined in Article 50 of the Constitution, which the Constitutional Court would have to review in relation to the third paragraph of Article 15 and Article 2 of the Constitution pursuant to the so-called strict proportionality test. If this does not constitute an interference with the very essence of the human right, then the regulation thereof falls within the legislature's margin of appreciation and it is the duty of the competent courts and the Supreme Court as the highest court in the state (Article 127 of the Constitution) to correctly apply such regulation in individual proceedings when deciding on the rights.

6. In accordance with the previous paragraph, when deciding on the right to a pension, the court would be in violation of the first paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution if the court decision was based on a position that was inconsistent with this right, i.e. if, by interpreting the PDIA1, the courts would inadmissibly interfere with the very essence of the right to a pension. The essence or the core of the right to a pension entails an individual's right to obtain and enjoy a pension that provides social security, on the basis of paid pension insurance contributions and if other reasonably determined conditions (e.g. period of pensionable service and age) are met. The pension has a dual nature: it is an economic category, since the rights from pension insurance<sup>1</sup> depend mainly on how long the contributions were being paid and in what amount and it also includes elements of intergenerational solidarity. The elements of intergenerational solidarity are relevant when determining the amount of the pension, but not for obtaining the right. The insurance aspect of this relationship is essential for obtaining the right. Conceptually the core of the right to a pension itself primarily includes the right of an individual to obtain the right once the abovementioned conditions have been met. An individual who has fulfilled the conditions required to obtain the right to a pension in accordance with the PDIA-1 on the basis of paid contributions to a Slovene insurance institution has the right to claim this right from the insurance institution.
7. The courts of all three instances established beyond a reasonable doubt that the complainant had been paying contributions into the pension insurance system in the Republic of Slovenia for almost 36 years. They took the position that the complainant who exercised his right to a pension in the Republic of Serbia had already exhausted his right to choose the insurance institution, and therefore no longer had the right to choose referred to in the second paragraph of Article 177 of PDIA-1,<sup>2</sup> and would only be entitled to the supplement to the pension pursuant to the PSSA; the right to a pension was exhausted when it was claimed from the foreign insurance institution and he therefore is unable to successfully claim a right to a proportional part of his pension from the insurance institution in the Republic of Slovenia. In view of the constitutionally defined core of the right to a pension, as evident from Paragraph 6 of the reasoning of this Decision, such position of the courts entails an interference with the complainant's right to a pension determined in the first paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution since it does not allow the complainant to claim his right to a proportional pension from the Slovene insurance institution.

1 Cf. Order of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-156/92, dated 20 May 1993 (OdIUS II, 47).

2 Article 177 of the PDIA-1 is worded as follows:

“1) In the event that an insured person meets the conditions for entitlement to two or more pensions from the compulsory insurance in the Republic of Slovenia, the insured person may enjoy only one pension of his own choice.

8. Interference with the constitutionally enshrined core of the right to a pension could be admissible if it were consistent with the third paragraph of Article 15 and Article 2 of the Constitution. In accordance with the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, a constitutionally admissible aim is required in order to limit the right to a pension referred to in the first paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution. Since it is not possible to ascertain a constitutionally permissible aim from the position of the courts, this position is inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution.
9. The Ljubljana Labour and Social Court was the first to take the position violating the complainant's right to a pension referred to in the first paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution. The Higher Labour and Social Court and the Supreme Court confirmed this position. Therefore, the Constitutional Court annulled the judgments of all three courts and remanded the case to the Labour and Social Court for new adjudication. The Labour and Social Court will need to take into consideration the grounds stated in this decision when deciding again on this matter.
10. Since the Constitutional Court annulled the challenged judgments on account of a violation of the right to a pension having been established (first paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution), it was not required to review the complainant's allegations of violations of other human rights.

11. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of Article 59 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS; No. 64/07 – official consolidated text - CCA), composed of: Jože Tratnik, the President, and the Judges Mag. Marta Klampfer, Mag. Marija Krisper Kramberger, Mag. Miroslav Mozetič, Dr Ernest Petrič, Jasna Pogačar, Dr Ciril Ribičič, and Jan Zobec. The decision was reached by six votes to two. Judges Klampfer and Zobec voted against. Judge Zobec submitted a dissenting opinion. Judge Krisper Kramberger submitted a concurring opinion.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE JAN ZOBEC, JOINED BY JUDGE MAG. MARTA KLAMPFER

1. While writing this Dissenting Opinion, I am aware of the general message that is being conveyed: not only did the decision not receive unanimous support, but also the judge who remained in the minority has profound and serious reservations as to the correctness of the decision adopted. I am aware that each dissenting opinion somewhat weakens the decision that was voted through. I am also aware of the risk of diminishing the importance and authority of the constitutional decision. Lastly, I am also aware that this expression of dissent may not contribute to strengthening the integrity, authority, power, trust, consistency, and maybe even the reputation of the Court itself.<sup>1</sup> When I was appointed a Constitutional Court judge, I decided that when considering whether to vote against the majority decision after having exhausted all the persuasive legal arguments (in the discussions at the plenary session as well as in written communications with fellow judges), but nevertheless remaining in the minority with my position, and when considering whether to publish the reasoning behind my vote in the dissenting opinion, I would practice restraint, moderation, and prudence. I sought to use this method of expressing my dissent from the legal arguments of the majority only if the difference of opinion was serious and profound – not so much on account of the values that guide legal feeling (which, when dealing with nuance, is a persuasive factor as to which direction the balance should tilt), but on account of fundamentally different viewpoints regarding the essential issues of the constitutional argumentation, and even then only in matters of fundamental (precedent) importance for finding constitutional balance and establishing the content of constitutionally protected rights.<sup>2</sup>
2. Unfortunately, it appears that both of these conditions are met in the Todorović case. In this unfortunate case, it is the first time since the right to a pension was enshrined in the Constitution that we have ruled on its constitutionally protected content, and we are, at the same time, confronted with sensitive issues concerning

She is very reserved on the subject of separate opinions: “I will continue to give voice to my dissent if, in my judgment, the Court veers in the wrong direction when important matters are at stake. I stress important matters because I try to follow Justice Brandeis’ counsel. He cautioned that in most matters it is more important that the applicable rule of law be settled than that it be settled right.” And then: “Dissents [...] need to be saved for major matters if the Court is not to appear indecisive and quarrelsome.”

the very essence of the jurisdiction of our forum in relation to the judiciary. I am concerned that, in the event of the consistent implementation of the idea that may be attributed to the positions expressed in the reasoning of the Decision, its effects could lead to “statutory” assessment in almost every pension dispute – which may ultimately prove fatal, not only for the pension scheme itself (which may not be predominantly financial in nature or, more precisely, subject to insurance law – it is in fact a scheme of intergenerational and general social solidarity), because elements would be introduced into the scheme that would differ from those that are typical for social security, i.e. elements of property law, especially insurance law. The consequences of this would be fatal for our future constitutional reviews, the balance between the branches of power, and the self-limitation on the (exaggerated) activism of the Constitutional Court.

3. I see the central issue in this difference of opinion being not only in terms of the scope (the extent) but also, in particular, regarding the content of the constitutionally protected core of the right to a pension (the reason why this right is protected by the Constitution, what the intentions of the constitution-framers were, and what is actually being protected – social situation of retirees or a financial investment for old age). The right to a pension is a typical positive right. That is why there can probably be no doubt that, owing to its specific nature, this right necessarily depends on the active role of the state and cannot exist at all if the statute does not prescribe the manner in which it can be exercised. The right to a pension may only come into existence (or cease) through the statute. For this reason, “the so-called statutory reservation (where the Constitution leaves part or all of the content and scope of specific human rights to be determined by the subsequent statutory regulation) is very broad” for this right.<sup>3</sup> The question as “to the extent to which the legislature is bound by the Constitution when defining the content and scope of the human right and the extent to which this falls within its margin of appreciation (in the event of which it is bound merely by general constitutional principles and no longer by the constitutionally determined content of individual, specific constitutional right)” inevitably arises.<sup>4</sup>
4. It was not possible on this occasion to avoid this complex question under the pretext of the “multifaceted and non-specific nature of the right to social security”,<sup>5</sup> or that the matter relates to “a very complex set of possible contents and relations that are dictated by different circumstances”,<sup>6</sup> or quite simply that the content of this right (to a pension) is not determined by the Constitution.<sup>7</sup> This does not entail that the content of the right to a pension guaranteed by the Constitution, more specifically that part of the right that is its constitutionally protected essence, is such in quantitative and qualitative terms as determined by statute regulating this right – including the manner in which it is exercised (otherwise the pension legislation would have the rank of a constitutional act). The constitutionally protected content of the right to a pension is therefore still to be found (determined, evaluated) – and certainly to an extent and standard which is “less” than that what arises from the comprehensive normative body of pension legislation. What does this mean? Nothing more than what the Constitutional Court did on numerous occasions when determining what represented the minimum of a specific, constitutionally guaranteed right, below which the legislature shall not go – without legally hollowing out this right and depriving it of its constitutional minimum (thereby depriving it of its constitutional essence). The Constitutional Court merely protects the minimum standard of economic and social rights, or their core, otherwise leaving significant room for manoeuvre to the legislature (and the judiciary, when interpreting the law).<sup>8</sup>

5. Each right recognised by the Constitution comprises three layers: the first and most fundamental is its solid, constitutionally protected, existential nucleus, which is completely inaccessible to the legislature and judiciary. It is surrounded by somewhat less solid, but still impermeable, plasma, which is not entirely immune to interference from the legislature. However, this may only be achieved through statute – and only if the strict proportionality test has been passed. A court may not penetrate the constitutionally protected layer of the right solely through its interpretation of the statute unless this interference is clearly and specifically provided for therein (and unless such statutory limitation meets the conditions of the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution). The outer layer represents a soft, porous, and relatively wide layer that is not, as a general rule, immune to interference from the legislature (provided the interference is reasonable, non-arbitrary and in the public interest) and cannot withstand legally incorrect conclusions, even if they are reached at the last judicial instance – unless they are manifestly erroneous or arbitrary. The boundaries and transitions between these layers are flowing, dynamic, sometimes vague, and not always easy to identify. The difficulty with delimitation is most common, indeed typical, for the rights that fall within the category of positive rights and require a statutory regulation with regard to how they are obtained, exercised, and maintained, and how they expire. Therefore, it is often impossible to ascertain whether the statute determined the manner in which a human right is exercised (the second paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution) or whether this is a statutory regulation that has become an interference or limitation of a human right (third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution).<sup>9</sup>

<sup>8</sup> “The objective, the purpose, which is to provide social security, is therefore essential; the way in which this objective will be achieved is mostly left to the legislature. When determining the manner in which a constitutional right to social security is executed, the legislature has a broad margin of appreciation, but its normative freedom is not unlimited”. (B. Kresal in Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije [Commentary of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia], Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Ljubljana, 2002, p. 523)

6. When asking the question as to whether the court interfered with the constitutionally protected core of the right by choosing and then interpreting the second paragraph of Article 177 of the Pension and Disability Insurance Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 106/99 etc. – PDIA-1), we must first examine the inherent nature of the right – and the undisputable recognition that it is positive in nature. We must also take into account that the PDIA-1 does not have constitutional rank and so the Supreme Court, as the highest court in the state pursuant to the Constitution, has the final say in the assessment of that layer of the right to a pension which does not represent the right's constitutionally protected core. However, it is manifestly clear that the Constitutional Court has the final say in the decision as to the nature of the solid constitutional core of this right, as well as its scope and content (the task of the Constitutional Court is to state this unambiguously and as clearly as possible). At this point, it is necessary to provide an answer to three crucial questions – it appears that I disagree with the majority on the answers to these: the first issue is whether the right to choose a pension falls under the right to a pension, or whether the right to a pension is (“merely”) the right to receive a pension. Secondly, it is necessary to determine whether the constitutionally protected essence of the right to a pension pertains solely to social security or whether its financial components are also protected. Thirdly, there is the issue as to whether the constitutional guarantee of a pension also requires a Slovene insurance institution to disburse the pension.
7. In my view, the right to a pension is the right to receive a pension (to simply have a pension), and the right to choose between two or more pensions is a typical expression of the way in which this right is exercised. The right to a pension itself may be exercised with or without choosing a pension (the majority of pensioners do not have an option to choose). By applying and subsequently interpreting the second paragraph of Article 177 of the PDIA-1, the court deprived the complainant of the right to choose a pension, claiming that he had already chosen the insurance institution – with the recognition of the right to an old-age pension (initially an early retirement pension) in the Republic of Serbia, where he was last insured, from 23 December 1992 onwards.
8. The decision in this case is, in my opinion, extremely important. This is primarily because it is of principled (precedent) importance and, secondly, because it leads to a temptation for exaggerated activism.<sup>10</sup> I am concerned that we could eventually become prisoners of such activism – in the first instance because of the principle of the equal protection of rights (more precisely, equality of rights). I am also concerned that, at some point in the future, the decision voted through might be interpreted using the historical interpretation of the constitutional right to a pension. It could also be

10 From a layman's perspective, I completely relate to his predicament because of my feelings of empathy for the complainant's tragic fate. However, as a judge, I absolutely do not. Moreover, a primordial standard of judicial assessment also applies to the Constitutional Court: The judge should always act as if he has an indefinite number of cases of the same kind before him (the third paragraph of Article 3 of the Courts Act – Official Gazette RS, No. 19/94 etc.). I would add that the party's nationality, political belief, religion, status etc. are also not taken into account.

construed that the constitutionally protected right to a pension is more than simply the right to social security – simply because the amendment to the Constitution (Official Gazette RS, No. 69/2004) by which it was conferred the status of a human right would otherwise not have been required; and it is therefore necessary to ascertain how the right to a pension as a constitutional category is different from the right to social security – in short, it is necessary to answer the question as to what the differentia specifica of the constitutionally guaranteed right to a pension actually is (compared to the general right to social security, which includes the rights to benefits in cash and in kind in case of sickness, maternity leave, disability or unemployment under the conditions and to the extent provided by law). The interpretation would then follow this line of reasoning: If the right to a pension is not part of the right to social security that was guaranteed prior to the aforementioned amendment to the Constitution,<sup>11</sup> then the distinction between them can only be found in non-social elements of the right to a pension. These are of course financial elements, more specifically elements which are subject to insurance law (e.g. elements of non-life insurance which cover risks associated with old age based on the annuity system: the insured sum will be paid in the form of annuity (as a monthly pension) upon the occurrence of an insured risk, depending on whether the premiums (pension insurance contributions) were paid, as well as the duration for which they were paid and the amount. When this interpretation<sup>12</sup> is joined with the arguments in Paragraph 7 of the Decision, where the fact that the complainant was paying contributions into the pension insurance scheme in the Republic of Slovenia for almost 36 years is deemed constitutionally relevant,<sup>13</sup> we would eventually be confronted not only with the issue of the financial sustainability of the pension scheme but also with the even more important legal issue concerning the constitutional protection of the financial elements of the right to a pension (as the differentia specifica that was not constitutionally guaranteed by the previous constitutional regulation (prior to 2004)). To speculate, it is probably not unreasonable to assume that the constitutionally protected financial elements of the right to a pension would cause the pension scheme to collapse, since a scheme conceptualised in this way (subject to insurance law – annuities) would not be able to withstand the financial pressure of the changed ratio between the active and retired populations due to 11 The Constitutional Court ruled that the right to a pension is covered by the right to social security in its Decisions Nos. U-I-150/94, dated 15 June 1995 (OdlUS IV, 63), and U-I-29/96, dated 8 May 1998 (OdlUS VI, 56); and it ruled in its Decision No. U-I-230/00, dated 17 April 2003 (OdlUS XII, 37), that it would be incorrect to interpret the provision of Article 50 of the Constitution as if it guaranteed to the individual the protection of the economic or business status that he had achieved.

12 Such an interpretation may not be so different to the position expressed in Decision No. U-I-29/96, dated 8 May 1997 (OdlUS VI, 56).

13 This fact could be understood not only as a fact from which the right to a pension (in its existential nucleus) arose, but as a fact that also determined the scope of its constitutionally protected essence – which in monetary terms exceeds the social security essence of that pension, i.e. it is beyond the scope of its social function. This surplus can only be financial in nature and its protection therefore can only entail the protection of the financial elements of the right to a pension.

demographic changes. The pension contributions of the active population would not be able to satisfy the constitutionally protected financial requirements of the retired population based on an annuity system (the insured sum would be paid in the form of annuity (as a monthly pension) upon the occurrence of the insured risk, depending on whether the premiums (contributions to the pension insurance) were paid, as well as the duration for which they were paid and the amount). This is, of course, not going to happen. This is because the pension scheme simply must not, and will not, crash. In order for this to be the case, some sacrifices will need to be made. And the law would fall a victim to this. I am concerned that the position, which at least in its subtext (if not expressis verbis in Para. 7 of the Decision), includes a premise concerning the financial protection of the right to a pension (see Para. 13 and especially footnote 17 of this dissenting opinion), would represent only a small contribution to such scenario.

9. Even without this, it is difficult for me to imagine an interpretation of the right to a pension that would not take into account that it is, by its very essence, social in nature – this, at least in my opinion, represents its sole constitutional core.<sup>14</sup> The constitutional amendment that explicitly recognised the right to a pension as a constitutionally protected social security right (despite it having already been protected in the context of the general right to social security) corroborates this. The fact that it is included in Article 50 of the Constitution, under the heading “right to social security” (if it had been the intention of the constitution-framers to (also) protect its economic, proprietary elements, they would have included this in Article 33, which protects the right to private property and inheritance), in my opinion, serves as an important factor in interpretative guidance when looking for its constitutional core – the core which enjoys constitutional protection. This essence, which was clearly expressed by the constitution-framers when they proclaimed this right as a right to social security, can only be social in nature. If prior to the constitutional amendment it was perhaps still up for debate as to whether the right to a pension was constitutionally protected, with its social security as well as economic (proprietary) components, this issue was solved by being explicitly included in the Constitution among the social rights: That which is constitutionally protected does not include economic

14 I concur with the position in Para. 6 of the Decision that a pension is obtained “on the basis of pension insurance contributions and if other reasonably determined conditions are met”. The economic nature of the right to a pension is crucial for its acquisition – those who do not pay their pension insurance contributions are not entitled to a pension. However, I believe that it is only its social nature that is important in terms of establishing its constitutionally protected scope. The property elements of the right to a pension are therefore necessary for its acquisition – and (only) in this context do they also enjoy constitutional protection. Any person who would be deprived of that right (by an unconstitutional interpretation of the pension legislation) could also protect the financial elements of the right to a pension before the Constitutional Court – simply because, without them, this right cannot even arise. Once this right comes into existence, its social security effect rather than its financial effect is what represents its constitutionally protected essence. The constitutional right to a pension is therefore financial in its origin, but social in its essence (that by which it is defined – in its further existence). Or, borrowing an analogy from biology, the nucleus of the constitutional right to a pension is (also) financial, but its plasma is social security.

10. Even though, as far as positive rights are concerned, it is difficult to draw a distinction between the measures of the state that merely define the manner in which a right is exercised and those measures that already interfere with the constitutional core of the right, the finding that it is the social security aspect of the right to a pension that is constitutionally protected actually simplifies the solution to the problem of whether the courts assigned such content to Article 177 of the PDIA-1, which represents a limitation to the constitutional right to a pension (whereby I leave aside the question of whether this case is even regulated by law – in other words, whether the provision of the second paragraph of Article 177 of the PDIA-1 even refers to pensions of the same kind, or whether it applies only to pensions of different kinds, e.g. widow's, disability and old-age pensions): Such situation would only arise if the non-recognition of the right to choose between two or more pensions, based on the same period of pensionable service, had resulted in a pension so low that it failed to reach a constitutionally protected minimum of that right. The very low pension, which was claimed and received by the complainant, as a result of which the complainant lost the option to choose between this pension and the higher Slovene pension (pursuant to the courts' interpretation), falls below the social security standard (which represents the constitutionally guaranteed minimum of the right to a pension – its constitutionally protected core). If it remained so low (since it does not provide a social security minimum, i.e. that which is the meaning and purpose of the pension as a constitutional category), it could be said that this deprived it of its constitutional content, left it hollowed out from a legal perspective, and does not provide its (constitutionally guaranteed) meaning and purpose, i.e. social security.
11. However, that is not the case here. More specifically, the complainant has had the right to the supplement to the old-age pension since 19 February 2000 pursuant to the Provision of Social Security to Slovene Citizens Entitled to Pensions from the Former Republics of the SFRY [Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia] Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 45/92 etc. – hereinafter referred to as the PSSA). The supplement, which he receives only because he is a recipient of a pension (if he did not have the pension he would not be entitled to this supplement either), provides security in addition to the pension that he receives (or that he could have received if he had not, as he claims, waived it) from the foreign insurance institution.<sup>15</sup> In this case, the challenged interpretation of the second paragraph of Article 177 of the PDIA-1 did not exceed its constitutionally admissible scope – it remained within the margins of the manner of exercise of the right to a pension and did not develop into an interference or limitation of the (constitutionally protected core) of the right to a pension.

12. Lastly, it is necessary to address the question of whether the constitutional protection of the pension also includes the requirement that the institution disbursing the pension, or at least part of the pension in proportion to contributions paid, must be (none other than or precisely) a Slovene insurance institution.<sup>16</sup> In my opinion in the case of the right to a pension, what is essential is the right and not the duty which corresponds to that right. When we speak of constitutional rights, we focus on the right itself: a person who is constitutionally protected is a person entitled to that right. Of course there is no positive right without a duty so this is also relevant. However, it is relevant only secondarily, indirectly, and functionally. Only within these (functional) boundaries is the debtor constitutionally important, i.e. merely as an entity that is required to ensure that the constitutionally guaranteed right is fulfilled. And only when the person entitled to pension is left without this benefit. Therefore, it is not relevant which institution disburses the pension, regardless of whether it is a Slovene or foreign (Serbian) insurance institution, or both. It is important that the person entitled to a pension receives the pension (in an amount that provides social security). The constitutionally protected core of the right to a pension is, however, entirely indifferent to the issue as to which institution is disbursing the pension.
13. Ultimately, I am concerned as to what message this Decision conveys to the courts. How much room (and how much of the judicial autonomy) will there remain to interpret statutory law? I am troubled by the fact that there may be very little (or none). If this were not the case, the Decision would clearly indicate the line not to be crossed by the court when interpreting pension legislation, without interfering with the constitutional content of the right to a pension.<sup>17</sup> Will the courts interpret this Decision to be that the complainant is constitutionally entitled to a pension pursuant

16 Paragraph 7 of the Decision states: "In view of the constitutionally defined core of the right to a pension, as evident from Paragraph 6 of the reasoning of this Decision, such position of the courts entails an interference with the complainant's right to a pension determined in the first paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution, since it does not allow the complainant to claim his right to a proportional pension from a Slovene insurance institution". It would be possible to conclude from this paragraph (i.e. Paragraph 6) that the constitutionally protected content of the right to a pension is actually social in nature (in this regard, there are no differences between the majority opinion and my own), but that the courts have deprived the complainant of the right, since they did not acknowledge that he should receive a pension from the Slovene insurance institution. This would mean that the supporting argument for granting the constitutional complaint is the fact that the complainant is not also receiving a pension, or a part thereof, from the Slovene insurance institution (which is also a constitutional essence of this right).

17 Naturally, a line in the sand needs to be drawn somewhere. If not, the courts do not have any real interpretative freedom and therefore there is no freedom of judiciary, which is headed by the Supreme Court, the highest court in the state pursuant to the Constitution (the power of judiciary lies in the interpretation of statutory law). The position of the Constitutional Court (at least that which is implicitly expressed in Paragraph 7 of the reasoning of the Decision) that the complainant has the right to a pension in a proportion to contributions paid excludes the autonomy of the Supreme Court when interpreting statutory law. It is in fact the entire normative body of the pension legislation that leads to how the pension is calculated that is affected by such.

to the correct interpretation of the PDIA-1, whereby the Constitutional Court, and not the Supreme Court, has the final say as to what the correct interpretation of statutory law for assessing the pension would be? Or will they interpret the Decision in such a manner that it is merely the social function of the pension and the fact that the pension is disbursed (also) by the Slovene insurance institution that is constitutionally protected (it is also possible to interpret Paras. 6 and 7 of the Decision in this way) and will therefore be allowed to insist on their interpretation of the pension legislation and recognise to the plaintiff (only) as much as the amount of the (so interpreted) constitutionally guaranteed part of the right to a pension? I am therefore interested whether, upon new adjudication, the courts will be allowed to interpret the provision of the second paragraph of Article 177 of the PDIA-1 in the same way as in all the previous cases that were similar to this one (that the complainant exhausted his right to choose between the foreign and Slovene pensions, which is in my opinion within the boundaries of the manner in which the right is exercised and therefore within the judicial interpretative autonomy of the statutory law, but so that by such interpretation of the right to a pension (the manner in which the right is exercised), they do not interfere with its constitutionally protected core (as more or less explicitly defined in the Decision) – i.e. that he must not be deprived of its social function because he chose a foreign pension<sup>18</sup>. The question then arises as to how much the pension should be. This is naturally a constitutional question (that can be solved, in my opinion, as explained in Paragraphs 8, 9, and 10). However, the issue is still open as to whether the question comprises the entire normative body of pension legislation that leads to a specific calculation of the monthly pension amount. If the answer is in the affirmative, and I am concerned that the courts may construe it in this way (owing to the emphasis devoted to the importance of how long the complainant was paying pension contributions), then we may have already crossed the boundaries of our jurisdiction and found ourselves within the statutory interpretative autonomy of the judiciary.

14. To conclude, I would like to raise the question of what happens to the equality of all the persons who also paid contributions into the pension scheme of the Republic of Slovenia, but are not its citizens. Are they also entitled to constitutional protection of the right to a pension conceptualised in this way? Pursuant to the first paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution, they are not. The right to a pension is guaranteed only to Slovene citizens. And now a leap: What is the meaning of the constitutional protection of the financial elements of the right to a pension in the context of the first paragraph of 18 The pension would then amount to the income the complainant is receiving now from the foreign (Serbian) pension and the supplement to the old-age pension under the PSSA (both providing social security), but with the difference being that it would have to be covered at least in part by the Slovene insurance institution (if the constitutionally protected essence of the right to a pension is conceived in this way). And what would that mean? Simply that the foreign (in this case Serbian) institution disbursing the pensions (insurance institution), and not the beneficiary (complainant), would be protected through the constitutional protection of the right to a pension. Since this would be absurd, I understand the Decision to mean that it is the non-social aspect of the right to a pension that is constitutionally protected. I have already explained why I refuse to accept this standpoint (see Paragraphs 8, 9, and 10 of this dissenting opinion).

Article 50 of the Constitution? Does the fact that the right to a pension was included in the Constitution among the rights to social security, in combination with the position that this protection (i.e. protection pursuant to the first paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution) extends further to its financial components, mean that these (no longer) enjoy constitutional protection in the context of the protection of private property (Article 33 of the Constitution)? If the Decision conveys such a message (or if it is possible to construe it in this way), then non-Slovene citizens do not enjoy the protection of the financial elements of the right to a pension (since they are protected pursuant to the first paragraph of Article 50 and not pursuant to Article 33 of the Constitution). This is despite the constitutional guarantee of the right to private property not being dependent on citizenship (however, this would be inconsistent with the case law of the ECtHR which protects the financial aspects of pensions in the context of Article 1 of Protocol 1<sup>19</sup>). I hope this Decision will not be understood in this way.

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE MAG. MARIJA KRISPER KRAMBERGER, JOINED BY JUDGE DR CIRIL RIBIČIČ AND JUDGE MAG. MIROSLAV MOZETIČ

1. I concur with the Decision and its reasoning. In my opinion, this is an important constitutional issue. I also wish to add several positions in this concurring opinion that were not included in the reasoning of the majority decision.
2. A position was expressed, among others, that the essence or core of the right to a pension is the right of an individual, under reasonable conditions, to obtain and enjoy a pension in the amount which, in the context of the broader objective to protect human dignity (Article 34 of the Constitution) as a fundamental value of modern society, provides a social security minimum, the lower limit of which affords a decent standard of living.
3. The Constitution was amended in 2004. In the first paragraph of Article 50, the wording “including the right to a pension” was added to the wording “Citizens have the right to social security under conditions provided by law” (Official Gazette RS, No. 69/2004, dated 24 June 2004). In this way, the constitution-framers supplemented, albeit not very aptly, a provision regarding social security. In my opinion, this addition is substantive and not merely “cosmetic” in nature. Through this, the constitution-framers emphasised that it is a special right in the context of social security that has its own specific content, making it different to other social security rights.
4. Since by way of statutory reservation the Constitution leaves to the legislature the manner in which social security is to be regulated, it is in my opinion vital to establish the essence (core) for each right separately in relation to the statute<sup>1</sup> that regulates the individual right. Through statutory regulation, the legislature has expanded upon the brevity of the constitution-framers, who did not define the rights (not even the concept of a pension). In this way it is necessary to base the assessment as to what is the core of the right to a pension also on PDIA-1.

5. The right to a pension from pension insurance is based on the work performed and contributions paid by the insured persons. Other factors (such as intergenerational solidarity, the financial situation of the state etc.) are relevant for the pension (its amount) only to a lesser extent. It is compulsory for the insured persons to make contributions (cf. Article 8 of the PDIA-1). Precisely because of this compulsory insurance, this right differs from the rights of the social security system.
6. Social security is inter alia (with regard to what is relevant for this case) regulated in the Social Security Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 3/07, dated 13 November 1992, etc.). Since underprivileged social classes are unable to provide material security for themselves because of circumstances that are beyond their control, it is clear from the provisions of this act that its purpose is to provide financial and other social assistance to them. The state and the local communities are responsible for social security. These services are also financed from their budgets and not from the pension funds.<sup>2</sup>

---

1 This is also the case with the international acts that are binding on the Republic of Slovenia. I do note, however, that the Republic of Slovenia and the Republic of Serbia have not yet entered into a bilateral agreement regulating pension insurance.

2 Article 3:

Social security rights include services and measures aimed at preventing and eliminating the social distress and difficulties encountered by individuals, families, and population groups, and the financial and social assistance intended for those individuals who are incapable of providing for themselves due to circumstances beyond their control.

Article 5:

- (1) According to this Act, the beneficiaries are the citizens of the Republic of Slovenia with permanent residence in Slovenia, and aliens with a permit to permanently reside in Slovenia. Chapter III: Financial social assistance.

Article 19:

- (1) Financial social assistance shall provide beneficiaries, during their residence in the Republic of Slovenia, with the means to satisfy the minimum needs that allow subsistence.
- (2) The subsistence referred to in the preceding paragraph shall be deemed to have been enabled if the beneficiary is guaranteed a level of income, after paying taxes and compulsory social protection contributions, that is equal to the minimum amount specified in this Act (hereinafter referred to as: minimum income).

Article 20:

- (1) Individuals shall be obliged to ensure to the best of their ability that they and their family members are provided with a decent level of subsistence.
- (2) Persons incapable of ensuring sufficient means of subsistence for themselves through their work, rights arising from work or insurance, income from property or from other sources, [...] shall have the right to financial social assistance in the amount and under the conditions specified in this Act.
- (3) The recipients of financial social assistance may not be in a more favourable social situation than the person who ensures means of subsistence through work or on the basis of rights arising from work.

7. Moreover, the Provision of Social Security to Slovene Citizens Entitled to Pensions from the Former Republics of the SFRY [Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia] Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 45/92 etc. - hereinafter referred to as the PSSA) also follows this logic. Article 7 provides that the funds for the payment of the supplements are to be provided from the budget of the Republic of Slovenia. The Government of the Republic of Slovenia shall also conclude a contract with the Institute regarding the calculation and payment of the obligations arising from this act.
8. First in Decision No. U-I-147/94, dated 30 November 1995 (Official Gazette RS, No. 3/96, and OdlUS IV, 118), and then in Decision No. U-I-101/97, dated 20 May 1999 (Official Gazette RS, No. 45/99 and OdlUS VIII, 105), the Constitutional Court stated: “The PSSA provides social security to Slovene citizens with permanent residence in Slovenia who have claimed their right to state pension in other republics of the former SFRY. The supplement to which the beneficiaries under this act are entitled is a right of a special kind. It is not a right arising from social insurance, as such rights are as a general rule provided by pension insurance institutions in the republics of former SFRY. By its very nature, it is a right which comes closest to the pecuniary rights of social security (social assistance), even though it is not subject to an income census.<sup>3</sup> Social security rights are, however, usually provided by the state and not social insurance institutions.”
9. The manner in which the amount of that supplement is to be determined is now regulated in Articles 1 through 5 of the PSSA. The basis for this also depends on the pension amount (cf. Article 2). However, this does not change its legal nature. The supplement is therefore not a pension, but a form of social assistance. It is therefore possible to define this supplement as a benefit in the context of the other social security rights referred to in the first paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution, but not as a right to a pension. The core of the (general) right to social security, which could only be affected when determining the amount of this supplement, as in the context of the broader objective to protect human dignity (Article 34 of the Constitution) this right guarantees a minimum level of social security to the individual, the lower limit of which represents a decent standard of living. For pensions, however, this criterion would only be relevant in cases where the lowest pension does not reach this minimum level. This is not the case here.
10. The reasoning for the majority decision does not include a position with regard to the allegation that the courts violated Article 14 of the Constitution by not recognising the pension on the basis of PDIA-1. The complainant exercised his right to a pension

Article 21:

Financial social assistance shall be granted to those persons who, for reasons beyond their control, cannot ensure means for themselves and their family members in the minimum income amount, and have exercised the right to financial benefits on the basis of other regulations and the right to exemptions and reliefs pursuant to this Act, and fulfil the other conditions determined in this Act. Article 43: The state and municipalities shall provide for social security as a public service. Article 97: The social security services shall be financed from the state and municipality budgets.

- 3 When this Decision was issued, the PSSA had not yet included the criteria from Articles 1 through 5. Decision No. U-I-101/97 resulted in the amendment to the PSSA (Official Gazette RS, No. 18/01).

as a Slovene citizen in Slovenia, where he permanently resides and where he also fulfilled the conditions for the pension pursuant to the PDIA-1. In its Decision No. U-I-70/92, dated 5 November 1992 (Official Gazette RS, No. 55/92 and OdlUS I, 77), the Constitutional Court has already emphasised that the state may not limit the rights of its citizens on the basis of any criteria that could result in discrimination against other citizens. This also applies to “the right to social security (Article 50 of the Constitution), which includes pension insurance and is guaranteed to citizens under the conditions determined by statutes. It is not possible to limit this constitutional right, particularly not contrary to Article 14 of the Constitution.” Since the complainant had been paying contributions to the Slovene pension insurance institute for almost 36 years of service, and he also fulfilled the conditions concerning his age, there is no reason for him not to be in the same position as all the other citizens of the Republic of Slovenia.<sup>4</sup> If the Constitutional Court had not annulled the courts’ decisions on the grounds of a violation of the first paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution, it would have been required to do so, in my opinion, on the grounds of a violation of the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution, i.e. because of a violation of equality before the law.

11. I would like to further consider the question as to whether the Institute and the courts also violated Article 33 of the Constitution with the opposite decision. The right to a pension certainly includes at least some entitlements arising from the right to property. However, the Constitutional Court has not yet explicitly ruled on the question of whether this is a right which forms part of the right to private property referred to in the aforementioned Article of the Constitution. I believe that, in this case, the complainant has a so-called legitimate expectation, a point on which both the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) and the Constitutional Court have already ruled.<sup>5</sup> This legitimate expectation is also covered by Article 33 of the Constitution. Therefore, by rejecting the complainant's claim,<sup>6</sup> an unacceptable interference with the right to (expected) private property could have arisen.

4 The complainant, who was employed as a civilian in the former Yugoslav People’s Army, was insured with the Institute from 20 October 1991 and had by that time completed 35 years, 11 months and 17 days of pensionable service. By way of a resolution dated 15 October 1991, the employer transferred the complainant to work at the Army Post Office 8080 Kragujevac, where the complainant also went, before the Army Post Office then issued a resolution on early termination of the employment relationship (Resolution No. 10-263/03, dated 26 November 1991) as at 1 March 1992 on the grounds that he had fulfilled the conditions for early retirement on that day. In the Republic of Serbia, where he was last insured, the institution responsible for compulsory pension insurance recognised the complainant’s right to an early retirement pension as of 23 December 1992 and the right to an old-age pension as of 2 September 1998. After the termination of the employment relationship, the complainant initiated proceedings before the Institute for the recognition of the right to a pension. His claim was rejected because he had not yet met the conditions for an old-age pension and he was not entitled to an early retirement pension because he was not a Slovene citizen. At that time, the PDIA/92 was already in force in Slovenia (as of 1 April 1992) and it provided that anyone who was last insured at the Institute under the condition of the prescribed insurance density (this condition applied to everyone, including aliens), may claim the rights from the pension insurance of the Institute; Slovene citizens, however, had a choice. They could claim their rights from the pension insurance at the Institute, despite not having last been insured there, provided that they had spent the majority of time when they were insured in the area covered by the Institute. After he had obtained Slovene citizenship and at the time when PDIA-1 was already in force (it entered into force on 1 January 2000), the complainant again lodged a claim for recognition of a pension on the basis of his insurance held with the Institute. The latter rejected the claim but recognised the right of the complainant to have the old-age pension supplemented pursuant to the PSSA from the day he lodged the claim (i.e. 19 February 2000).

12. Finally, I would like to take up a position on the view that the Constitutional Court could have reached the same conclusion by taking the position that the courts had manifestly erred when applying the second paragraph of Article 177 of the PDIA-1, thereby violating Article 22 of the Constitution. First of all, I must emphasise that I have serious reservations regarding the application of the criterion of manifest error. I agree with those that claim that this criterion must only be applied to glaring errors. In my view, there is no error of this kind in the interpretation of the aforementioned legal norm. Nevertheless, the interpretation of this provision is vitiated by a constitutional error that is substantive and not procedural in nature. In a case such as this, it is not possible to view this provision as a (common) substantive law that does not reach the constitutional level and the correctness of which cannot be subject to review during proceedings to decide upon the constitutional complaint. The present case concerns the recognition of the right that the complainant obtained from the Slovene pension institute through the payment of pension fund contributions to the latter. The Institute has not yet recognised this right by interpreting the aforementioned Article. In Decision No. U-I-101/97, however, the Constitutional Court also stated that: “[t]he fundamental rule of pension insurance is that the pension is paid by the fund into which the insured persons, the employers or the state paid the contributions, i.e.

5 See, for example, the Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-77/04, dated 11 October 2006 (Official Gazette RS, No. 118/2006, OdlUS XV, 98), and the decisions of the Constitutional Court and ECtHR cited therein. Paragraph 10 states inter alia: “The notion of legitimate expectation within the meaning of the protection pursuant to Article 1 of the Protocol No. 1 to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94) was mentioned for the first time by the European Court of Human Rights in the case Pine Valley Developments Ltd. and Others v. Ireland (29 November 1991, Series A no. 222, p. 23, § 51). [...] According to the case law of the European Court of Human Rights, the right to private property does not include the right to acquire property as such. If the complainant is to successfully invoke the right to private property, he has to demonstrate interest that he has a specific claim to acquire specific property based on applicable law. This claim has to involve an expectation that is based on a law or settled case law, to obtain a right to property, and not merely a hope to acquire it. The complainant is therefore required to demonstrate legitimate expectation that he will succeed with the claim.”

6 The insured person may claim the right from compulsory insurance on the day when the conditions to obtain the right are met (the first paragraph of Article 15 of the PDIA-1). Pursuant to the statutory regulation the person obtains the right to a pension if the contributions were paid and the conditions regarding age and the period of pensionable service or the insurance period are met. This right is also protected if the person concerned fulfils the aforementioned conditions and claims the right only for the part of the entire pensionable service period or the insurance period that was completed while being insured with the Institute. The fact that there is no social insurance agreement concluded with the state where the person completed the second part of the pensionable service period cannot in itself deprive the person of the right to a pension for which the conditions pursuant to PDIA-1 are fulfilled.

the institution which insured the individual". It is only a question of the enjoyment of the right or the possibility to exercise the same right twice as well as the scope of that right that must be solved in the present proceedings, and that is after the right has already been recognised.

DECISION

At a session held on 1 July 1999 in proceedings to review constitutionality initiated upon the request of the Supreme Court, and in proceedings to examine the petition of Matjaž Gerlanc, Velenje, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. It is not consistent with the Constitution that, pursuant to Article 105 of the Marriage and Family Relations Act (Official Gazette SRS, No. 14/89 – official consolidated text), it is within the competence of the social work centre to decide on child custody, while, pursuant to Article 78 of the same Act, it is within the competence of the court to decide on the same matter.
2. Article 88 of the Social Security Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 54/92 and 42/94 – Constitutional Court Decision) is not inconsistent with the Constitution in the part that relates to the competence determined in the second paragraph of Article 105 of the Marriage and Family Relations Act.
3. The National Assembly must remedy the inconsistency referred to in Point 1 of the operative provisions within one year of the day of publication of this Decision in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia.

1. The Supreme Court challenges the provisions of Articles 105 and 114 of the Marriage and Family Relations Act (hereinafter referred to as the MFRA) insofar as they determine the competence of a social work centre to decide on child custody, and Article 88 of the Social Security Act (hereinafter referred to as the SSecA) in the part that refers to Article 105 of the MFRA. Owing to the inconsistency of the legislature, which in some cases determined that it is within the competence of a court to decide upon child custody, while in other cases such falls within the competence of a social work centre, Articles 104 and 105 of the MFRA are, in the opinion of the Supreme Court, contrary to Article 14 (equality before the law) and Article 22 (the equal protection of rights) of the Constitution. The different competences allegedly entail different procedural guarantees (e.g. the possibility of issuing interim injunctions, the position of children in proceedings), and that different substantive and procedural rules could result in different decisions in similar cases. Allegedly, there are no reasonable grounds for such a distinction to be drawn. Furthermore, it is alleged, that the position of children varies in relation to the competence of the courts or the competence of the administration. If a court decides on child custody, it also simultaneously decides on their maintenance (and, if necessary, it may even establish paternity prior to this); however, if a social work centre decides on child custody, then it is necessary to initiate new proceedings before a court to decide on child support. It is alleged that such regulation is contrary to the right of children to special protection and care (first paragraph of Article 56 of the Constitution). Owing to the insufficient procedural guarantees in proceedings in which a social work centre decides, the challenged provisions of the MFRA and SSecA are allegedly contrary to the right to respect for family life (Articles 53 and 54 of the Constitution and Article 8 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR). In an administrative procedure, the principle of free disposition, the right to be heard and to make statements, and the principles of direct adduction of evidence and adversary proceedings are allegedly curtailed due to the requirement to protect the public interest. An oral hearing is allegedly not mandatory. It is stated that a social work centre performs various functions in the area of family law, e.g. it decides on the right to adopt a specific measure that interferes with parental rights and the implementation of such measure, it provides for the protection of the child's interests in such proceedings, and it advises the parents after these proceedings have been concluded. It is alleged that this triple role held by the centre is incompatible with the right to respect for family life, which requires that an independent and impartial body decide on these issues. In addition, such role allegedly prevents the judicial protection from being effective. It is stated that if the social work centre does not appoint a guardian ad litem for the child, the child cannot file a law suit before the competent court due to lack of the necessary legal capacity; however, if the centre does appoint such a guardian ad litem for the child, in practice such person is an employee of the centre, who has no interest in filing an appeal against the centre's decision. The effectiveness of judicial protection is allegedly also impaired by the fact that affected persons are neither knowledgeable of the law nor aware of their rights in the event that a social work centre fails to act. Although both civil and administrative procedures guarantee fair proceedings to the individual pursuant to Article 23 of the Constitution and Article 6 of the ECHR, the Supreme Court deems that civil proceedings represent a stronger guarantee that the right to respect for family life will be respected. The Supreme Court therefore suggests that the Constitutional Court abrogate the challenged provisions on the competence of the administrative authority. At the same time, it states that a need may arise during the proceedings to review the constitutionality of other

MFRA provisions pursuant to which social work centres are responsible for deciding on interferences with the right to respect for family life (first paragraph of Article 106, second paragraph of Article 113, fourth paragraph of Article 114, Articles 119 to 121, and Article 150).

2. In substantiating the grounds for filing the request, the applicant stated that the question of the constitutionality of the challenged statutory provisions arose when deciding on the appeal to the Supreme Court against a decision on the rejection of a legal action to issue a new decision on child custody. In the challenged judgments, the courts of first instance and second instance allegedly held that a social work centre is competent to decide on child custody after the termination of a common-law marriage. The Supreme Court granted the appeal and remanded the case to the court of first instance for new adjudication. In general, the proceedings should have been stayed. Since the case was already finally decided, the potential annulment of the challenged statutory provisions, given the ex nunc effects of a Constitutional Court decision regarding such, could only have affected a decision in the case at issue if the case had been remanded to a stage before the final decision was issued.
3. In the same way as the Supreme Court, petitioner Matjaž Gerlanc also challenges the MFRA as, in the event of a divorce, a court decides on who should be awarded custody of the children, while, in the event of the termination of a common-law marriage, a social work centre decides thereon. Such regulation is allegedly contrary to Articles 14 and 53 of the Constitution. It is argued that, since the MFRA does not regulate cases where a child is born in a common-law marriage and the parents subsequently marry and then divorce, it is also contrary to Article 25 of the Constitution (right to a legal remedy). He substantiates his legal interest on the fact that the court that decided on his divorce from his daughter's mother also decided on the awarding of the custody of their daughter, who was born out of wedlock. He proposes that the Constitutional Court, taking European standards into account, impose on the legislature the obligation to amend the Act and determine the jurisdiction of specialised family courts.
4. The National Assembly believes that sufficient safeguards for the protection of the rights and legal interests of parties to the proceedings are built into both administrative and civil proceedings. The Supreme Court has already pointed to certain advantages of the administrative procedure, such as its speed and the flexibility of procedural rules. In the opinion of the National Assembly, the principle of the protection of the rights of citizens and the public interest, the principle of assistance to laypersons, the principle of procedural effectiveness and economy, and the principle of material truth are also important. In the National Assembly's opinion, the principle of the protection of the rights of citizens obliges the public administrative authority to make it easier for citizens to exercise their rights. The principle of the protection of public interest makes it impossible for parties to exercise their rights contrary to public interest, which, in the case at issue, is represented by the constitutional provisions on the special protection of children and respect for the family. In its opinion, this principle and the principle of material truth do not differ from the rules that apply in civil procedures. According to the National Assembly, the adversarial nature of the proceedings is also sufficiently guaranteed in administrative procedures; in addition, and unlike in the civil procedure, it is obligatory to obtain the opinion of an expert commission. If the competent authority has failed to act, the parties may have a direct influence on accelerating the proceedings by filing a law suit due to the authority's failure to act. Last, but not least, it is also stated that a decision of a social work centre is subject to the two-stage judicial review of administrative acts. In the National Assembly's opinion, it is crucial that the competent authorities decide on the basis of the same rules of substantive law in both procedures. The existing regulation could, in its opinion, only be disputed in terms of the equal protection of rights or equality before the law. However, if also in regard to such the decisive question is whether each of the two procedures provide for sufficient safeguards, then, in the National Assembly's opinion, the two above-mentioned constitutional provisions have not been violated. The National Assembly agrees with the position that a special procedure should be provided for decision-making on family law issues. This procedure is to be regulated in the new family legislation which is being prepared; however, until its enactment, the MFRA will allegedly be complemented by the European Convention on the Exercise of Children's Rights that will be directly applied to concrete cases after its ratification.

5. The Government replied to the request. It stated that there are two reasons for the division of competences between the social work centres and the courts. Firstly, by determining that a centre has competence only if the parents, after they have terminated their common-law marriage, cannot agree on child custody, the negative aspect of the right to respect for family life determined in Article 8 of the ECHR was enacted. The second reason for such division was in the conceptualisation of family and common-law marriage. It is argued that even the European Court of Human Rights has only recently taken actual and not just legally established family relations into account. In the Government's opinion, the Supreme Court's allegation that, owing to insufficient procedural safeguards, the effective protection of the right to respect for family life is not guaranteed and that this could lead to a violation of Articles 53 and 54 of the Constitution is only partially substantiated. The General Administrative Procedure Act (Official Gazette SFRY], No. 47/86 – consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the GAPA) allegedly sufficiently guarantees the implementation of the principle of free disposition, the principle of adversary proceedings, the right to be heard and to make statements, and the principle of direct adduction of evidence. Since the parties to custody proceedings are always parents with conflicting interests, an oral hearing is allegedly mandatory already pursuant to the GAPA. According to the Government, the obligatory presence of experts, which is determined in Article 88 of the SSecA, guarantees the protection of the child's interests in the proceedings. There have allegedly been no cases on which the social work centres have failed to decide. It is alleged that, in practice, the proceedings may only be prolonged due to the complexity of a specific case. The Government claims that such is supervised by both the competent Ministry and the Ombudsman. Only the claim of the Supreme Court that only one person decides on issues that arise on the basis of the challenged MFRA provisions is, in the Government's opinion, partially substantiated. More specifically, it is argued that, according to the first paragraph of Article 55 of the GAPA, the social work centre is obliged to appoint a temporary guardian ad litem if the commenced proceedings must be continued due to the urgency of the matter. Moreover, the position of the Supreme Court that issues that arise after either a divorce or the termination of a common-law marriage and that are identical in substance should be decided on by a court is allegedly also substantiated. The Government deems that the right of common-law spouses to privacy should be limited by the positive aspect of the right to respect for family life, the right of children to special protection, and the right to judicial protection. According to the Government, such is to be regulated by the new family legislation which is being prepared; however, until its enactment, the European Convention on the Exercise of Children's Rights will complement the provisions of the MFRA.

B – I

6. Pursuant to Article 23 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), a court may file a request for a review of the constitutionality of a law if an issue arises in relation to the proceedings it is conducting. According to its request, the Supreme Court challenges Articles 105 and 114 of the MFRA in their entirety, and Article 88 of the SSecA in the part that refers to Article 105 of the MFRA. Since the requirement determined in Article 23 of the CCA was met only with regard to the second paragraph of Article 105 in conjunction with the first paragraph of Article 114 of the MFRA, and with regard to Article 88 of the SSecA insofar as it refers to Article 105 of the MFRA, and since the statement of reasons for the request referred only to these provisions, the Constitutional Court limited the scope of the review to these provisions. In conjunction with the second paragraph of Article 105 of the MFRA, the first paragraph of Article 114 thereof determines the competence of the social work centres to decide on child custody if the parents do not live together and cannot reach an agreement on who the child will live with and, therefore, who will exercise the parental rights; the mentioned Article 105 of the MFRA and the challenged part of the provision of the SSecA determine two of the procedural rights of persons who participate in such proceedings. The issue of competence to decide on child custody if the parents do not live together was decisive in the proceedings in connection with which the Supreme Court submitted the request for the review of constitutionality. However, the Supreme Court had not stayed these proceedings but initiated the proceedings before the Constitutional Court after it had granted the appeal and remanded the case to the court of first instance for new adjudication.
7. If a court deciding on a matter deems a law which it should apply to be unconstitutional, pursuant to Article 156 of the Constitution, it must stay the proceedings and initiate proceedings before the Constitutional Court and continue the proceedings after the Constitutional Court has issued its decision on the constitutionality of the law. This has been the situation thus far in cases where the Constitutional Court has decided upon the request of a court (see, for example, Decisions No. U-I-172/94, dated 9 November 1994 – Official Gazette RS, No. 73/94, and OdlUS III, 123; No. U-I-48/94, dated 25 May 1995 – Official Gazette RS, No. 37/95, and OdlUS IV, 50; No. U-I-225/96, dated 15 January 1998 – Official Gazette RS, No. 13/98, and OdlUS VII, 7). In all the mentioned cases, which the Constitutional Court has already decided, the Supreme Court stayed the proceedings for deciding on the legal action filed in the context of the judicial review of administrative acts, i.e. prior to the final decision on the matter. However, in the Supreme Court's opinion, the finality of the decision in relation to which the Supreme Court initiated these proceedings represents an obstacle to the effects of a potential annulment of the challenged statutory provisions in the case at issue. The Constitutional Court has not yet decided as to whether this position is correct; however, it is not possible to deny its merits in advance. In this regard and in relation to the function that the Supreme Court, as the highest court in the country, holds in terms of ensuring the uniformity of case law (Article 127 of the Constitution and Article 109 of the Courts Act, Official Gazette RS, No. 19/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CtsA), the Constitutional Court decided that the requirement for initiating proceedings determined in Article 23 of the CCA had been met, despite the fact that the proceedings in this case had not been stayed.

8. Petitioner Matjaž Gerlanc did not explicitly state which of the provisions of the MFRA he is challenging, but it is clear from his petition that he is challenging Articles 78 and 105. During the proceedings for examining the petition, the Supreme Court submitted the request, in which the issues raised were similar to those in the petition, and therefore the Constitutional Court joined both proceedings.
9. The petitioner demonstrated his legal interest, which is a requirement for initiating proceedings (Article 24 of the CCA), by asserting that the same court which had decided on his divorce from his daughter's mother had also decided on the awarding of custody of his daughter, who was born out of wedlock.
10. The allegation that the MFRA does not determine the competence to award custody of a child in a case such as the petitioner's, and that thus his right to a legal remedy (Article 25 of the Constitution) has been violated, is not substantiated. It is clear from both statutory provisions, which were challenged by the petitioner, that in cases such as the petitioner's the courts have the competence to award the custody of children. Pursuant to the first paragraph of Article 78 upon divorce the courts also decide on child custody and child support. The provision refers to the children of spouses who divorce and does not draw a distinction between children born in or out of wedlock. Other statutory provisions do not contradict such an interpretation of the provision. Deciding on child custody is also the subject of the first paragraph of Article 105 of the MFRA, however, in relation to this provision, Article 78 is more specific. Article 105 is actually a general rule to be applied if the parents do not live together; Article 78, however, determines a special rule to be applied in instances when the parents' separate lives are a consequence of their divorce. The petitioner failed to explain the asserted inconsistency between the challenged MFRA provisions and Articles 14 and 53 of the Constitution, despite being requested by the Constitutional Court to do so. Therefore, the Constitutional Court has reviewed this allegation only on the basis of the applicant's statements; however, it has taken into account the petitioner's request to respect European standards and determine the jurisdiction of special family courts.

B – II

11. The second paragraph of Article 105 of the MFRA determines the competence of the social work centre to decide which parent the child is to live with if the parents live separately and cannot reach an agreement thereon. The parent with whom the child lives or who has been awarded custody of the child is entitled to exercise parental rights pursuant to the first paragraph of Article 114 of the MFRA. The challenged part of Article 88 of the SSecA determines that, before reaching a decision in administrative cases regarding the rights and interests of a child pursuant to Article 105 of the MFRA, social work centres must obtain the opinion of an expert commission in special declaratory proceedings and set a date for an oral hearing. The allegation made in the request, according to which the mentioned provisions of the MFRA and SSecA are contrary to the right to respect for family life (Articles 53 and 54 of the Constitution and Article 8 of the ECHR) due to insufficient procedural guarantees in the proceedings in which the social work centre decides, is therefore unfounded.
12. An essential element of the right to respect for family life guaranteed by Article 8 of the ECHR is the mutual enjoyment by parents and children of each other's company.<sup>1</sup> The safeguard guaranteed by the Convention obliges the state to take measures to ensure the actual existence and protection of a family.<sup>2</sup> Such measures include substantive rules on how to regulate the exercise of parental care and the maintaining of contacts between children and their parents who do not live together; to certain extent the provision of Article 8 also influences any procedure in which these issues are resolved. Effective respect for family life requires that the competent authority, on the basis of all the relevant circumstances, decide on future relations between parents and children, and that such is not left to be decided by the mere passage of time. The competent authorities must therefore proceed swiftly.<sup>3</sup> In proceedings regarding the relations between parents and children, parents must have sufficient opportunity to express their views and interests so that the competent authority takes these statements into account and the parents have the opportunity to use the legal remedies available in due time.<sup>4</sup> As substantiated hereinafter, Article 54, the first paragraph of Article 56, Article 22, and Article 23 of the Constitution guarantee these safeguards to parents and children. In the case at issue, there was therefore no need to separately review whether the challenged statutory provisions violated Article 8 of the ECHR.
13. The first paragraph of Article 54 of the Constitution provides that parents have the right and duty to maintain, educate, and raise their children. It is the parents who are primarily entitled and obliged to care for their children. The first paragraph of Article 56 of the Constitution specifically provides that this duty of parents corresponds to the right of children to be cared for and raised by their parents. According to this provision, children enjoy special protection and care, and shall enjoy constitutional rights consistent with their age and maturity. In this way, the Constitution also draws attention to how parental care and the right of children to the independent development of their personality are intertwined. The existence of this mutual relationship between parents and children is not contingent on whether or not the children were born out of wedlock or whether or not their parents live together.<sup>5</sup> The natural bond from which this legal obligation arises is the same in all instances. This constitutes the basis for the precept of the Constitution that children born out of wedlock have the same rights as children born in wedlock (the second paragraph of Article 54).

14. The fact that the above-mentioned provisions are included in the chapter on human rights and fundamental freedoms demonstrates that the state may not, in principle, interfere with this relationship between parents and children. If the guarantee of mutual connectedness between parents and children is to be effective, the state is also obliged to adopt rules that will enable the actual establishment and protection of such relationships. The procedure for deciding on the exercise of parental care and the maintaining of contact between children and their parents who do not live together forms part of these rules. The affected persons must be guaranteed participation in this procedure in a manner that allows for the protection of their rights. These safeguards are guaranteed in particular in Articles 22 and 23 of the Constitution. On the basis of the guarantee of the equal protection of rights (Article 22 of the Constitution), parents have the right to declare facts that are relevant to a decision, to express their opinion, and to have their opinion taken into account in proceedings to decide on child custody. Pursuant to the same provision, in conjunction with the first paragraph of Article 56 of the Constitution, children who are capable of forming an opinion also have the right to express their opinion, which the competent authority must take into account when making a decision. Taking into account age and maturity, on the basis of the above-mentioned constitutional provisions a child may also participate in proceedings either by himself or through a special representative who in the event of a dispute between the parents must not be either one of them. The right to judicial protection (Article 23 of the Constitution) provides affected persons access to an independent and impartial court, the right to request such court to decide on the merits of the case, and the right to request a decision to be made without undue delay. With regard to the allegations in the request submitted in the case at issue, there was no need to decide on whether, in addition to the mentioned procedural safeguards, the effective protection of the mutual connectedness between parents and children requires more than what is provided for by Articles 22 and 23 of the Constitution.

5 The Government's position that the European Court of Human Rights has only recently taken into consideration actual – and not just legally recognised – family relations is erroneous. The European Court of Human Rights does not make the concept of family conditional upon the parents being married. In 1986, in Johnston v. Ireland (cited in note 2), it already decided that family life also exists in cohabitation relationships, in particular in the case of unmarried partners and their children who have lived together for several years. In an earlier case, i.e. Marckx v. Belgium (cited in note 2), it found a violation of Article 8 of the ECHR as the state had not recognised the legal bond between a child born out of wedlock and the relatives of her mother.

15. The allegations put forward in the request, in which the applicant substantiated the deficiencies of the procedure before the social work centre and, as a result, also the judicial procedure, are unfounded. The social work centre must act pursuant to the provisions of the GAPA, according to which a party to the proceedings is not only the person who has initiated the proceedings or the person against whom proceedings have been initiated, but also other persons who have the right to participate in proceedings in order to protect their rights or legal interests (Article 49 of the GAPA). In proceedings to decide on the custody of children, both parents and the child are parties to the proceedings. Parties to administrative proceedings have the right to state facts that are relevant to a decision, adduce evidence, respond to the statements and evidence adduced by opposing parties, participate in an oral hearing (Article 143 of the GAPA), and file legal remedies (Article 233 of the GAPA). The special provision of the second paragraph of Article 105 of the MFRA guarantees children who are capable of forming an opinion the right to express it. They are provided the opportunity to participate in administrative proceedings through a guardian ad litem. Article 213 of the MFRA imposes the duty to appoint such representative on the authority conducting the proceedings. According to this provision, minors are appointed a special guardian in the event of a conflict between them and their parents, for the minors to be able to perform specific legally relevant actions, and in other instances where their interests are in conflict with the interests of their parents. This provision can only be understood to mean that the appointment of a guardian ad litem is required in all instances of a potential conflict of interest between the parents and the children. Such is the case with a decision as to which of the parents the child will live with.
16. It is a fact that, when arranging relationships within the same family, the same social work centre can assume two different functions: that of an institution, the existence of which has been prescribed by the state in order to offer professional advice and help with arranging the relationships between family members (the second paragraph of Article 15 of the SSecA); and that of the competent authority that has been granted the power to decide on the rights and duties of individual members of the same family. This can influence the impartiality of the person who decides a case, but not necessarily. The fact that a professionally trained person is acquainted with the relations within a family and counsels them does not necessarily entail that this person will be biased in subsequent decision making. If an affected person believes that some other circumstances exist that cast doubt on the impartiality of the person who decides in the proceedings, the affected person may request his or her exclusion (Article 44 of the GAPA). In addition, such person is also guaranteed subsequent protection before an independent and impartial court, which has the possibility to examine the established state of facts and to investigate the relevant facts on its own (first paragraph of Article 14 of the GAPA). It is for the legislature to assess whether counselling is still possible despite such a connection between functions, and such is further not the subject of the request in question.

17. The allegations referring to judicial protection against the decisions of social work centres are also unfounded. As already stated, children must be appointed a guardian ad litem. It is already clear from the function of a guardian ad litem, who represents one of the parties to the proceedings, that a person who is an employee of the authority deciding in such proceedings and who is thus obliged to follow the instructions of this authority cannot be appointed as guardian. It therefore follows from the interpretation of the statutory provisions that, in the cases it is deciding on, a social work centre cannot simultaneously perform the function of a child's representative. The alleged violation of Article 23 of the Constitution is also not substantiated by the assertion that parties who participate in proceedings are laypersons and are unaware of their rights in the event that the administrative authority fails to act. This aspect of the effectiveness of the protection of rights is conditional upon the active participation of the parties and their due care for their rights in proceedings, and does not depend on whether their rights are decided on by an administrative authority or a court.
18. Moreover, the allegation that the right of children to special protection and care (the first paragraph of Article 56 of the Constitution) has been violated by the challenged provisions of the MFRA is unfounded. This constitutional provision does not require the legislature to vest the power to decide on all family-law related questions with either the court or the social work centre.
19. For all the above-mentioned reasons, the challenged part of Article 88 of the SSecA is not inconsistent with the Constitution. The provision explicitly prescribes two procedural safeguards – an oral hearing and the obtaining of the opinion of the expert commission. Both safeguards only extend the scope of rights of parties to proceedings before social work centres. The decision as to whether the applicant is correct to assert that the explicit provision on a mandatory oral hearing in certain family-law related cases excludes the mandatory nature of the hearing in other cases is not relevant to the case at issue.
20. However, the allegation put forward in the request that the challenged provision of the MFRA is contrary to the principle of equality before the law (the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution) is substantiated since that provision, contrary to other similar cases, establishes the competence of a social work centre to decide on the exercise of parental rights. The second paragraph of Article 14 does not prohibit the legislature from regulating the positions of legal subjects differently, but from doing so arbitrarily, without reasonable and objective grounds. Such entails that differentiation must serve a constitutionally admissible aim, that this aim must be reasonably related to the subject of regulation by law, and that the differentiation introduced must be an appropriate means for achieving this aim.
21. Pursuant to Article 78 of the MFRA, a court decides on child custody in divorce proceedings, and also subsequently if changed circumstances and the children's interests require such decision to be altered. The second paragraph of Article 105 in conjunction with the first paragraph of Article 114 of the MFRA determines the competence of a social work centre to decide on which of the parents will exercise parental rights if the parents live separately and cannot reach an agreement on such.

Pursuant to both provisions, the subject of the decision making process is the same: the competent authority decides on which of the parents will exercise parental rights in instances when they do not live together.

22. By claiming that the competence of different authorities may lead to different decisions on the merits, the applicant fails to substantiate the difference that is relevant to the review in terms of the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution. To be more specific, both cases relate to the application of the same substantive rules: in deciding which parent a child should live with, the competent authority must take into account the child's interests. Furthermore, both cases are finally decided by the Supreme Court as the court of last instance, which gives legal opinions that are binding for all its panels on issues that are relevant to the uniformity of the case law (Articles 109 and 110 of the CtsA). The difference between both groups of cases is in the competence to decide on this issue and, as a result, in the procedures in which the competent authority decides. In the first case, a court decides on the exercise of parental rights in a civil procedure; in the second case, however, it is a social work centre that decides in an administrative procedure, the judicial review of its decision being subsequently provided in proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts. An important difference also lies in the fact that, if a social work centre decides on the exercise of parental rights, judicial proceedings must be initiated in order to determine child support; however, if a court decides on the exercise of parental rights, it also decides on child support in the same proceedings if the parents cannot reach an agreement thereon.
23. The connecting factor for the differentiation is the parents' divorce. Regardless of whether the children were born in wedlock or before the marriage was contracted, and regardless of whether it is the first decision on the awarding of custody of the children or a subsequent change to this decision, if the parents divorce, a court is competent to decide on the exercise of parental rights (the first and fourth paragraphs of Article 78 of the MFRA). In all other cases, i.e. if the parents do not divorce but only live separately, or if they have never married but lived in a common-law marriage that was terminated, or they lived together only for a short period of time, or have not lived together at all, a social work centre decides on child custody in an administrative procedure (the first paragraph of Article 105 of the MFRA and Article 86 of the SSecA).
24. The legislature did not have reasonable and objective grounds for the described differentiation. The Government claims that such solution gave priority to the negative aspect of the right to respect for family life, i.e. that the state is not to interfere if the parents have decided not to marry. Even if we ignore the fact that the challenged provision also applies to cases where married parents live separately, which entails that the above-mentioned position is therefore incorrect, the aim pursued by the challenged provision has not been achieved. More specifically, a social work centre's decision is also issued in an administrative procedure and is, as such, an administrative act that is authoritative in nature. It is also not possible to substantiate the difference with the assertion that only the union of spouses and children is (or has until recently been) a legally regulated family unit. Since the MFRA entered into force, relationships between parents and children have been legally regulated, regardless of whether or not the parents are married, and such relationships are the subject of the challenged regulation. Both groups of cases primarily concern a dispute between parents who no longer live together, and not the state's interference with the relationships between parents and children. Thus, if the parents reach an agreement, the social work centre does not decide at all. Moreover, the fact that in divorce proceedings, which are within a court's competence, all issues related to divorce are decided concurrently could not have been a reason for determining different competences. If a court has already decided on child custody, it also decides on the issue again if circumstances change. As the issue of whether or not the parents are divorced has no connection with the subject of the decision, i.e. the decision on the exercise of parental rights, the second paragraph of Article 105 in conjunction with the first paragraph of Article 114 of the MFRA is contrary to the principle of equality before the law (the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution).

25. Having established that the second paragraph of Article 105 in conjunction with the first paragraph of Article 114 of the MFRA is contrary to the principle of equality before the law, there was no need to review whether it was also inconsistent with the guarantee of the equal protection of rights referred to in Article 22 of the Constitution.
26. The challenged provision of the MFRA is not inconsistent with the Constitution because the legislature was not permitted to determine the competence of a social work centre to decide on the exercise of parental rights if the parents were not living together and had not reached an agreement on whom their children will live with. It is only inconsistent with the Constitution as, in some cases it determines the competence of a court to decide on child custody, while in other cases it determines the competence of a social work centre to decide thereon. Therefore, the Constitutional Court has not abrogated the challenged provision of the MFRA but has only established its unconstitutionality. For the same reasons, the provisions of the MFRA that determine the competence of a court to decide on the custody of children if their parents do not live together (the first and fourth paragraphs of Article 78 of the MFRA) are also inconsistent with the Constitution. Pursuant to Article 30 of the CCA, the Constitutional Court may also review the constitutionality of other provisions of the same or other regulation for which a review of constitutionality or legality has not been proposed, if such provisions are mutually related or if such is necessary to resolve the case. Since the establishment of the unconstitutionality of the second paragraph of Article 105 in conjunction with the first paragraph of Article 114 of the MFRA inevitably results in the unconstitutionality of the first and fourth paragraphs of Article 78 of the MFRA, the Constitutional Court decided that these two provisions are also inconsistent with the Constitution. When the already published Civil Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 26/99) enters into force, the fourth paragraph of Article 78 of the MFRA will cease to apply (the first paragraph of Article 501 of the Civil Procedure Act). Since the division of competences to decide on child custody that was challenged by the applicant and is provided in the MFRA at the time of the issuing of this Decision remains the same, the cessation of the application of the fourth paragraph of Article 78 of the MFRA has no effect on the decision in the case at issue.

27. The Supreme Court also drew attention to the possible unconstitutionality of other provisions of the MFRA according to which the social work centre is competent to decide on measures that entail an interference with the right to respect for family life. However, as the requirements for adjudication pursuant to Article 30 of the CCA were not met, the Constitutional Court did not extend the proceedings to a review of the constitutionality of these provisions.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE DR UDE, JOINED BY JUDGE TESTEN

I do not agree with the decision that the statutory regulation, which determines that, pursuant to Article 105 of the Marriage and Family Relations Act, it is within the competence of a social work centre to decide on child custody, while, pursuant to Article 78 of the same Act, it is within the competence of a court to decide on the same matter, is inconsistent with the Constitution. According to this decision, the regulation that determines that a court decides on child custody especially in the event of a divorce or if a decision regarding such is subsequently changed, while a social work centre decides on child custody if the parents live separately and cannot reach an agreement on the custody of their children (i.e. especially with regard to children born out of wedlock or in the event of the termination of a common-law marriage), is therefore unconstitutional. The majority decision rejected the majority of the reasons stated by the applicant (the Supreme Court of the Republic of Slovenia) to substantiate its claim that the statutory provisions on the competence to decide on child custody are contrary to the Constitution. The Decision dismissed the allegations that, when a social work centre decides on child custody, not all procedural safeguards are guaranteed either in the administrative procedure or in the subsequent proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts and such statutory regulation violates the right of children to special protection and care (the right referred to in Article 56 of the Constitution). It was, however, decided that the provisions of Articles 105 and 78 of the MFRA are contrary to the principle of equality before the law (the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia) as that there are no reasonable and objective grounds for enacting different competences.

This finding is, in my opinion, erroneous. The reasons for different competences with regard to deciding on child custody may no longer be convincing. It is even possible to take the view that it would be justified from a professional perspective to determine the competence of the courts to decide on the custody of children, regardless of the question of whether these legal relationships are being decided on in divorce proceedings or when parents do not live together. It is however, in my opinion, impossible to claim that there are no reasonable and objective grounds to determine different competences, which would entail that such a regulation is arbitrary.

Different competences to decide on child custody were the result of the evolution of the legal regulation of family relationships and of procedural economy. It was logical that the legislature had determined the competence of courts for deciding on child custody in the case of divorce already before the MFRA entered into force. In divorce proceedings, a court decides on the legal relationships between spouses who are also often in conflict regarding the question of who will take care of and raise their children and how their maintenance will be ensured. However, it is primarily in affiliation proceedings that a court decides on children born out of wedlock and their maintenance, i.e. when the putative father does not attempt to obtain custody of the child. On the contrary, he disputes his paternity and this is the reason why judicial proceedings are necessary in the first place. Only later, after 1976, did legal relationships develop with regard to common-law marriage, for which the legal order determined several legal consequences. Only during this period did child custody disputes arise in relation to children born out of wedlock, i.e. in common-law marriages. Those disputes primarily arose after the termination of such common-law marriages; however, given their nature, these were not terminated in judicial proceedings, but by actual cessation. The evolution of legal relationships therefore led to different competences for decision-making. Common-law marriage – its establishment and termination – still differs from marriage in real life and in terms of legal regulation. What is particularly characteristic of common-law marriage is that it often evolves without the involvement of state authorities (i.e. a registrar) or intervention from the courts. Therefore, there also exist grounds for a different regulation concerning the custody of children born in such a union. It is therefore impossible to claim that there are no reasonable and objective grounds at all for such differentiation.

I am also of the opinion that the time is now ripe to determine the competence of courts for deciding on legal relationships of this kind. This is demonstrated by a new definition of the competence to decide on child custody and child support in the second paragraph of Article 406 of the new Civil Procedure Act, which emphasises that courts are competent to decide on child custody and child support regardless of whether they are decided upon independently or together with matrimonial disputes, or in proceedings to determine or contest paternity or maternity. Certainly, the mere fact that the competence of the courts was determined on the basis of convincing expertise does not entail that a different regulation is unconstitutional. In short, that which is based on convincing expertise is not always the sole constitutionally admissible option.

I believe that, on this occasion and by its decision, the Constitutional Court engaged in the professional polemics on the competence to decide on child custody and assumed the role of arbiter. Ultimately it even took the position that a regulation, according to which the administrative authorities and social work centres would have exclusive competence to decide on legal relationships of this kind, would also be constitutionally admissible. The Constitutional Court considered a different regulation of competence to be unconstitutional and adopted the position that either a court or a social work centre may be competent, but only to the exclusion of the other. Such finding could only be substantiated if the Constitutional Court assessed that legal protection standards are not equal in court and administrative proceedings (including proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts) or that they are lower in one of them. In the case at issue, however, the Constitutional Court rejected the allegations regarding the lower legal protection standard in the administrative procedure, but nevertheless ultimately considered the division of competences to be unconstitutional. In my opinion, there are no reasonable grounds for such a decision.

DECISION

At a session held on 18 September 2013 in proceedings to decide upon the constitutional complaint of A. B., C., represented by Olivera Gomboc, attorney in Ljubljana, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. Supreme Court Judgment No. I Ips 200/2010, dated 13 January 2011, Higher Court in Ljubljana Judgment No. II Kp 707/2009, dated 8 April 2010, and Local Court in Ljubljana Judgment No. II K 99/2007, dated 20 February 2009, are abrogated.
2. On the basis of point 1 of Article 358 of the Criminal Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 32/12 – official consolidated text and 47/13), the complainant is acquitted of the substance of the summary charge of the District State Prosecutor's Office in Ljubljana, No. Kt (O) 4395/05, filed on 20 March 2007, amended on 28 November 2008 and 13 January 2009, that he committed the criminal offence of the abduction of a minor according to the first paragraph of Article 200 of the Criminal Code (Official Gazette RS, No. 95/04 – official consolidated text) by "unlawfully abducting a minor from a parent to whom the minor has been entrusted, detaining the minor, and preventing the minor from being with a person who has rights in respect of the minor, by – on 7 September 2005 in the afternoon, after C. D. brought the complainant's son F. G., born on X. X. X, to E. Street in Ljubljana, without the permission of the son's mother H. I. J., who was granted custody thereof by final Judgment of the District Court in Ljubljana No. P 2600/2003-IV, dated 24 May 2004, in conjunction with Judgment and Order of the Higher Court in Ljubljana No. IV Cp 38/2004, dated 21 October 2004 – taking the minor with him to his residence at No. X, E. Street in Ljubljana and detaining him there contrary to the mentioned judicial decisions until 22 May 2006, as he did not hand the minor over to his mother during the mentioned period of time in spite of Execution Order of the Local Court in Ljubljana No. In 2005/01241-3, dated 3 October 2005, and Order of the Higher Court in Ljubljana No. IV Cp 786/2006, dated 22 March 2006; and on 8 September 2005 by also demanding that the representatives of the child's school not allow the child to leave with his mother; therefore, in the described manner he prevented the mother as an entitled person from being with him.

3. The costs of the criminal proceedings referred to in the previous point are to be charged to the budget.

Reasoning

A

1. By a final judgment issued by the Local Court in Ljubljana, the complainant was found guilty of committing the criminal offence of abducting a minor in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 200 of the Criminal Code (hereinafter referred to as the CC). He was sentenced to three months' imprisonment, suspended for two years. The complainant allegedly committed the criminal offence by unlawfully abducting a minor from his parent to whom the minor had been entrusted, detaining the minor, and preventing the minor from being with a person who has rights in respect of the minor. He allegedly committed the criminal offence from 7 September 2005 to 22 May 2006.
2. The Supreme Court confirmed the assessment of the lower courts that the complainant's conduct was unlawful and further pointed out that, as regards the criminal offence under the first paragraph of Article 200 of the CC, the [mentioned] unlawfulness is a special statutory element of such criminal offence and, therefore, when examining its existence, it is necessary to examine the legal basis that was violated by the perpetrator's conduct. The same as the lower courts, it considered that such legal basis was the final Judgment of the District Court in Ljubljana, No. P 2600/2003-IV, dated 24 May 2004, by which the mother was granted custody of the minor. Considering that the complainant was aware of this Judgment and that he was aware of the legal recourse with regard to changing the Judgment, the Supreme Court assessed that by conduct contrary to the mentioned Judgment the complainant clearly manifested unlawful conduct and thus fulfilled the statutory element of the mentioned criminal offence. Furthermore, it assessed that the subsequent judicial decisions (the Temporary Injunction dated 22 May 2006 and the Judgment of the District Court in Ljubljana dated 17 December 2008, by which the complainant was granted custody of the minor) could no longer influence the fact of unlawful conduct ex tunc. The Supreme Court also dismissed the allegations of the complainant's defence counsel that there was no unlawful conduct in the material sense since the complainant had pursued the child's interests, which had allegedly been threatened in this case. It adopted the position that it is precisely for the purpose of protecting the child's interests that the legal manner of regulating the relationships between parents and children in the event of divorces and especially in the event of disagreements between parents on such issues is provided for. It was precisely in order to protect the child's interests that by a judgment it was allegedly decided that the mother was granted custody of the minor. As long as such a judgment is in force, in the opinion of the Supreme Court, it is necessary to assess any conduct contrary thereto as conduct contrary to the child's interests and thus also materially unlawful. The Supreme Court dismissed as unfounded also the allegations of the complainant's defence counsel that the complainant's conduct entailed conduct amounting to a minor offence under Article 14 of the CC. It assessed that the complainant's conduct needs to be considered as a whole. As such, it was allegedly extremely uncompromising and persisted despite the Execution Order on the basis of which the mother sought to legally regain custody of the minor.

3. The complainant alleges the violation of the first paragraph of Article 28 (the principle of legality in criminal law), Article 54 (the rights and duties of parents), and Article 56 of the Constitution (the rights of children). He states that when assessing whether he acted unlawfully and thus satisfied all the elements of the alleged criminal offence, the courts formalistically reasoned only from the finding that he had not respected the judicial decision by which the mother had been granted custody of the minor. The complainant deems that when examining the existence of unlawfulness as an element of the alleged criminal offence, the court did not consider Article 54 of the Constitution as he acted exclusively in the interests of his child, which should allegedly exclude unlawfulness in the substantive sense. He claims that he had a reasonable expectation that the criminal court would consider justified reasons – reasons benefitting the child, due to which he resolutely opposed going back to his mother. Therefore, the complainant considers it unacceptable that none of the courts that decided in the criminal proceedings had taken into account the fact that the child had run away from his mother and that he had tried to exercise his constitutional right with a clear and resolute expression of his will. The complainant deems that by weighing which of the values should be granted judicial protection – respect for a final judicial decision or the protection of the rights or interests of a child as a constitutional category – the courts should give priority to the protection of the rights or interests of the child because they were threatened.
4. The complainant points out that he immediately wanted to achieve legal regulation of the disputed relationship with the expectation that in order to protect the child's interests the civil court would decide quickly on his motion for a temporary injunction filed on 8 September 2005. The civil court only issued an order on the proposed temporary injunction on 22 May 2006 and a judgment only on 17 December 2008; in accordance with both, he was granted custody of his son. If the court had decided quickly, the disputed relationship between the parents regarding the child would have been regulated quickly in a legal manner, in accordance with the guarantees determined by Article 22 and the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution. Thus, the basis for the court's assessment that the complainant's conduct was unlawful would also have formally ceased to exist. The legal manner of regulating the relationship between parents and children in the event of a divorce or disagreement between the parents, which in the opinion of the Supreme Court is allegedly in itself in the child's interests, in the case at issue allegedly proves to be just the opposite. According to the complainant, the situation in which the criminal court convicted him precisely of the criminal offence of abducting a minor, after the finality of the civil judgment by which the complainant was granted custody of the child, is intolerable from the legal point of view.

5. The complainant points out that the criminal judgment, despite imposing a suspended sentence, has caused him severe mental suffering and thus entails a heavy burden for him. In the circumstances of the case at issue, he considers the allegation that he committed the mentioned criminal offence unacceptable. Despite the existence of a judgment and the requirement to execute it, in his opinion it is difficult to force a child who is capable of reasonably stating his or her will to return against his or her will to the person whom he or she should be with according to the existing legal basis regarding such custody.
6. By Order No. Up-383/11, dated 28 June 2012, the Constitutional Court panel accepted the constitutional complaint for consideration. The Supreme Court was notified thereof.

B – I

7. According to the second paragraph of Article 38.a of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 64/07 – official consolidated text and 109/12 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), in order to protect the privacy of a participant in proceedings, upon the motion of such participant or on its own, the Constitutional Court may decide that the personal data of a participant in proceedings or the personal data of other individuals not be stated in the decision of the Constitutional Court. The Constitutional Court did not decide to conceal the identity because on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 60 of the CCA the Court itself decided whether the charges against the complainant were justified. As the mandate determined by the second paragraph of Article 38.a of the CCA allows even complete concealment of the identity of an individual, and thus allows also less than that, the Constitutional Court decided to anonymise the personal data when such decision is published because the information from the proceedings, from which the public was excluded, is evident from both the constitutional complaint and judicial decisions, and because there are circumstances that interfere with the privacy of the complainant, his former wife, and also their children.
8. In cases where the challenged final criminal judgment by which a suspended sentence had been imposed was expunged from the criminal record at the time of deciding upon the constitutional complaint, the Constitutional Court has hitherto rejected the constitutional complaint on the grounds that the complainant does not have a legal interest in a decision thereon (see Order of the Constitutional Court No. Up-94/02, dated 21 October 2004, OdlUS XIII, 88). Namely, by expunging the judgment, the legal consequences of the conviction allegedly cease to exist, i.e. the person is deemed to have never been convicted. It follows from the information sent by the Ministry of Justice upon the request of the Constitutional Court that in the complainant's case the anticipated date of the end of the probationary period is 23 April 2012. According to the relevant statutory provisions, it can therefore be concluded that the final criminal judgment had been expunged, although the Ministry of Justice did not explicitly notify the Constitutional Court thereof. Since the complainant explicitly draws attention to the fact that also the suspended sentence entails a heavy burden for him and has caused him mental suffering, the Constitutional Court reconsidered its position in Order No. Up-94/02 and decided to change it due to constitutional reasons. Namely, the possible success of the constitutional complaint would entail that by a final judgment of conviction human rights and fundamental freedoms would be violated, which in a new trial might lead to a judgment of acquittal. Such person would be unjustly convicted. This is a sufficient reason for legal interest in the decision on the constitutional complaint, as Article 30 of the Constitution guarantees a wrongly convicted person the right to rehabilitation, compensation, and other rights provided by law. Moral rehabilitation, constitutionally recognized also as a human right, therefore entails a sufficient reason for changing this position. Namely, the mentioned right is also enjoyed by people regarding whom a judgment of conviction has been expunged from the criminal record. Therefore, the procedural conditions for deciding are fulfilled also in the case at issue.

B – II

9. In proceedings to decide upon the constitutional complaint, the Constitutional Court inspected the following case files: No. II K 99/2007 of the Local Court in Ljubljana; No. P 2600/2003-IV (No. P 3558/2004-IV, No. P 1510/2009-IV) of the District Court in Ljubljana; and No. In 2005/01241 of the Local Court in Ljubljana. The inspected case files reveal the actual circumstances of the cases decided on, i.e. inter alia on the custody of the complainant's minor son, on the execution of the final judgment on the custody of the child which was granted to his former wife, and on the complainant's criminal liability. The subjects of decision-making in this constitutional complaint are only the judgments issued in the criminal case against the complainant. However, in the final judgment of conviction the time the criminal offence was committed is defined as the period from 7 September 2005, when the complainant allegedly abducted the minor from his mother, to 22 May 2006, when by a temporary injunction the District Court in Ljubljana granted the complainant custody of his minor son. Regarding such, the complainant claims that he requested that the court issue the mentioned decision already on 8 September 2005 and that on the one hand the courts did not proceed quickly, and on the other they found the complainant criminally liable for the unlawful detainment of a minor. In addition, the Supreme Court alleges that the complainant was uncompromising when committing the criminal offence, which allegedly persisted despite the execution order. Therefore, the Constitutional Court also inspected the civil and execution case files on the basis of which the decisions were issued which were also referred to in the challenged judgments.
10. It is, inter alia, evident from case file No. P 2600/2003 (No. P 3558/2004, No. P 1510/2009) of the District Court in Ljubljana in a civil case concerning divorce and deciding on granting parents custody of their minor children, that by final Judgment No. P 2600/2003-IV, dated 24 May 2004, the complainant and his former wife divorced and that the mother was granted custody of the minor children. Furthermore, it follows from the [relevant] case file (No. P 2903/2005-IV, which is joined with case file No. P 3558/2004) that the complainant brought an action on 8 September 2005 for the issuance of a new decision on the custody of his son and motioned for a injunction temporarily granting him custody of the child. By Order No. P 3558/2005, dated 22 May 2006, the Court decided to temporarily grant the complainant custody of his minor son. Furthermore, by Judgments of the District Court in Ljubljana No. P 3558/2004, dated 17 December 2008, and No. P 1510/2009, dated 17 February 2010, the court inter alia decided that the minor's mother was to be stripped of custody and the complainant was to be granted such.

11. It inter alia follows from case file No. In 2005/01241 of the Local Court in Ljubljana, in relation to an execution case, that the complainant's former wife filed a motion for execution due to the transfer of her minor son on 9 September 2005 and that by Order No. In 2005/01241-3, dated 3 October 2005, the court allowed execution due to the transfer of the child and in the event of failure to comply with such an obligation imposed a fine on the complainant amounting to SIT 1,000,000.00 at that time. By Order No. 2874 In 1241/2005, dated 2 March 2012, the court dismissed the execution proceedings and by Order No. 2874 In 1241/2005, dated 12 October 2012, it dismissed the proceedings to decide upon the proposal for the imposition of a fine.
12. It inter alia follows from case file No. II K 99/2007 of the Local Court in Ljubljana, relating to a criminal case in which the challenged judgments were issued, that:
  - on 7 September 2005 the complainant's former wife notified the police station that the complainant did not want to return their minor son whom she had been granted custody of following their divorce;
  - on 7 September 2005 the president of the K. Society., a person whom the complainant's minor son trusts, and the minor son gathered at the Social Work Centre in order to ask the minor son whether he wished to live with his father, which allegedly followed also from his written statement, of which the police station was allegedly also notified already the same day;
  - on 8 September 2005, the competent employees of the Social Work Centre, the representatives of the police, the president of the K. Society., the complainant, and his former wife gathered at the elementary school in order to clarify the situation; after a discussion, in which the minor son insisted on going home with his father, with whom he wanted to live, the child's wish was followed in accordance with the instructions of the state prosecutor that the child's wishes were to be respected, if consensus was not possible, in order to avoid even greater traumatization of the child;
  - on 24 April 2006, the District State Prosecutor's Office in Ljubljana filed a motion for the execution of investigative acts with regard to the complainant and on 20 March 2007 a summary charge due to the reasonable suspicion of him having committed the criminal offences of the abduction of a minor in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 200 of the CC,<sup>1</sup> and the neglect and maltreatment of a minor in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 201 of the CC;

1 The first paragraph of Article 200 of the CC determined: "Whoever unlawfully abducts a minor from his parent, adoptive parent, guardian, institution, or a person to whom the minor has been entrusted, or whoever detains a minor or prevents him from being with a person who has rights in respect of the minor, or whoever malevolently prevents the implementation of an enforceable judgment referring to a minor, shall be punished by a fine or sentenced to imprisonment for not more than one year."

- by the Judgment of the Higher Court in Ljubljana dated 8 April 2010, in conjunction with the Judgment of the Local Court in Ljubljana dated 20 February 2009, the complainant was convicted of a criminal offence in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 200 of the CC;
- by the Judgment of the Supreme Court dated 13 January 2011, the request for the protection of legality against the Judgment referred to in the previous indent was dismissed.

B – III

13. The complainant inter alia claims that the challenged judgments violate his rights under Articles 54 and 56 of the Constitution, because the court did not weigh between the two [relevant] values, i.e. respect for a final judgment and the child's interests, which are constitutionally protected, and did not give priority to the latter. The first paragraph of Article 54 of the Constitution determines that parents have the right and duty to maintain, educate, and raise their children; this right may be revoked or restricted only for such reasons as are provided by law in order to protect the child's interests. Furthermore, the first paragraph of Article 56 of the Constitution determines that children enjoy special protection and care, and that they enjoy human rights and fundamental freedoms in accordance with their age and maturity. Therefore, the Constitutional Court assessed the positions of the courts in the challenged judgments in terms of their compliance with the first paragraph of Article 54 and the first paragraph of Article 56 of the Constitution.
14. On the basis of the mentioned constitutional provisions, it is parents who are primarily entitled and obliged to take care of their children. Such entitlement and obligation of parents entails, from the perspective of the position of children, the right of children to be taken care of and raised by their parents. Thereby children are guaranteed special protection, which is also a reflection of the right to respect for one's family life.<sup>2</sup> This refers to the mutual intertwinement of parental care and children's rights. The position of these provisions in the chapter on human rights and fundamental freedoms itself speaks for the fact that the state must generally not interfere with the mentioned relationship between parents and children. For the effective guarantee of the mutual connection between parents and children, the state must adopt measures that will enable the actual establishment and protection of these relationships.<sup>3</sup> In accordance with the mentioned duty of the state, the first sentence of the first paragraph of Article 56 of the Constitution should be interpreted in conjunction with the principle of the child's best interests,<sup>4</sup> which must be considered also by the courts when deciding on relationships between parents and children.

2 Cf. Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-137/03, dated 26 May 2005 (Official Gazette RS, No. 56/05, and OdlUS XIV, 30), Paragraph 12 of the reasoning.

4 Cf. Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-116/03, dated 9 February 2006 (Official Gazette RS, No. 21/06, and OdlUS XV, 14), Paragraph 8 of the reasoning.

15. Parents must exercise the rights and duties referred to in the first paragraph of Article 54 of the Constitution in the interests of their children.<sup>5</sup> It is assumed that parents, aware of their responsibilities towards their children, are willing and able to act in the interests of their children.<sup>6</sup> Since the rights of parents towards a child are equal (the first paragraph of Article 54 in conjunction with the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution), parents should in general care for a child together, even if they live separately.<sup>7</sup> The European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR) also considers that the child's best interests must be the main guidance when interpreting Article 8 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR) as regards the exercise of parental care and the maintenance of contacts between parents and children,<sup>8</sup> and that the child's interests may, depending on their nature and seriousness, override the interests of the parents.<sup>9</sup> The child's interests are allegedly composed of two aspects. On the one hand, the child's interests allegedly require that the child's ties with his or her family be maintained, except in cases when the family has proved to be particularly inappropriate, while on the other hand it is clearly in the child's interest to ensure his or her development in a sound environment, and under Article 8 of the ECHR a parent cannot be entitled to take such measures as would harm the child's health and development.<sup>10</sup>
16. In proceedings regarding the relationships between parents and children, parents must have enough possibilities to express their views and interests, so that their statements are taken into consideration by the competent authority, and to apply available legal remedies.<sup>11</sup> Nevertheless, regarding such, parents have to bear in mind that a child is a person who should be respected as such also within the family circle, and therefore his or her will should be considered in accordance with his or her age and maturity. In such proceedings the child should be treated as a subject, which in particular entails that children who, in accordance with their age and maturity, are capable of understanding the circumstances and independently expressing their will thereon, should be enabled to do so, as well. Their will should be respected, as long as it is consistent with the principle of the child's best interests.<sup>12</sup> The right to express themselves with regard to the question of which of the parents who are getting divorced they wish to live with is provided by Article 22 of the Constitution in conjunction with the first paragraph of Article 56 of the Constitution to children who are sufficiently old and mature to exercise such right.<sup>13</sup> Such right is based on respect for their personal dignity (Article 34 of the Constitution). The above-mentioned is particularly true in cases when the children are, in accordance with their age and maturity, already capable of understanding their situation due to their parents' divorce,<sup>14</sup> and are, therefore, particularly vulnerable, of which both the parents themselves and the competent state authorities should be aware, when the latter are called upon to decide if the parents do not agree on the custody of the child. The child's right to personal dignity thus corresponds to the duty of responsible parents to ensure respect for these rights of their children; therefore, in the first paragraph of Article 54 the Constitution speaks of both the rights of parents towards their children, as well as their duties. Thus, all the above-mentioned rights are a concretisation of the principle of the child's best interests.

17. The above-mentioned should primarily be taken into account when deciding in the relevant proceedings on granting custody of minors to divorced former spouses. Nevertheless, the human rights of parents and children and in this framework also the principle of the child's best interests should also be respected in criminal proceedings initiated due to a criminal offence, the purpose of which is precisely to ensure, on the one hand, respect for the duties of parents, and on the other the children's rights. Therefore, the principle of the child's best interests referred to in the first paragraph of Article 56 of the Constitution, which corresponds to the parents' duty, even if they are divorced, to ensure the safety and education of their children so as to ensure the full and harmonious development of their personality (the first paragraph of Article 54 of the Constitution), is a constitutional value protected by the legislature also by the incrimination of conduct contrary to the mentioned principle.
18. It is assumed until proven otherwise that a final judicial decision by which custody of minor children is granted to divorced former spouses is based on respect for the principle of the child's best interests. Therefore, it is necessary to confirm the positions of the courts [at issue] that parents should respect such final judicial decisions and that in changed circumstances they have adequate legal remedies to enforce their right referred to in the first paragraph of Article 54 of the Constitution and especially in order to protect the child's right referred to in the first paragraph of Article 56 of the Constitution, which is the mirror image of parents' duties.

12 Cf. Article 6 and 7 of the European Convention on the Exercise of Children's Rights (Official Gazette RS, No. 86/99, MP, No. 26/99 – ECECR), which is also binding on the Republic of Slovenia.

13 A child who is capable of forming his or her own views has the right to express those views freely in all matters affecting the child, the views of the child being given due weight in accordance with the age and maturity of the child. For this purpose, the child has in particular the opportunity to be heard in any judicial and administrative proceedings affecting the child (see Article 12 of the CRC).

14 Also in cases when separating children from their parents is necessary, the child's interests must be regarded as essential circumstances (cf. Article 9 of the CRC).

19. Respect for final judicial decisions is a generally important constitutional value and inter alia also one of the fundamental postulates of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution). As follows from the established constitutional case law, it is also an integral part of the right to effective judicial protection referred to in the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution.<sup>15</sup> Its essence is to strengthen the legal relationship to the benefit of trust in the law, which is one of the principles of the rule of law.<sup>16</sup> In particular, the stability of legal relationships is aimed at protecting the holders of rights and obligations in such relationships by binding all participants with regard to the content of the decision (res iudicata ius facit inter partes), because the final decision is considered right and true (res iudicata pro veritate accipitur).<sup>17</sup> This leads to a prohibition on interfering in an already adjudicated matter (ne bis in idem).<sup>18</sup> Therefore, the institution of finality is essential as an instrument of legal certainty, which is also one of the principles of the rule of law. Final judicial decisions must be respected by all, first and foremost by state authorities. Therefore, not even the court itself should interfere in the content of a final judicial decision. Legal relationships regulated by a final decision of a state authority can be annulled, abrogated, or amended only in such cases and by such procedures as are provided by law (Article 158 of the Constitution). Respect for final judicial decisions is thus already in itself a constitutional value, moreover, when it comes to respect for court decisions regarding the question of which of the divorced parents should be granted custody of their child, respect for a final judicial decision on such question also presupposes that it was decided in accordance with the child's best interests.
20. However, it should also be taken into account that it is precisely in the field of child custody that the finality of judicial decisions cannot be an absolute value. Not only changed circumstances on the side of one parent or both of them, but especially the development of the child's capabilities to express him- or herself, in accordance with his or her age and maturity, on issues that are crucial for his or her upbringing, i.e. respect for his or her personal dignity, can lead to the conclusion that in the exceptional circumstances of an individual case recognition of the absoluteness of a final court decision might be in contradiction with the principle of the child's best interests. Therefore, also according to the position of the ECtHR, even in cases when the Hague Convention is applicable, a child's return cannot be ordered automatically or mechanically, but the child's best interests from a personal development perspective depends on a variety of individual circumstances, in particular his or her age and level of maturity, the presence or absence of his or her parents, the environment, and experience. Therefore, the child's best interests must be evaluated in each individual case.<sup>19</sup> The ECtHR is of the view that what is inherent in the concept of the child's best interests is the right of a minor to not be removed from one of his or her parents and retained by the other who considers (rightly or wrongly) that he or she has equal or greater rights in respect of the minor.<sup>20</sup> Referring to its already well-established case law,<sup>21</sup> the ECtHR points out that when examining whether the competent state authorities have taken all the necessary steps to facilitate the enforcement of the contact arrangements, it must strike a balance between the various interests involved: the interests of the child and the parent with whom the child lives, the interests of the other parent, and the general interest in ensuring respect for the rule of law.<sup>22</sup> When determining whether there has been a violation of Article 8 of the ECHR, the ECtHR also takes the child's age and behaviour into account.<sup>23</sup> When assessing whether the domestic courts failed to strike a fair balance between the best interests and wishes of the child and the rights of the parent with whom the child does not live, the ECtHR also points out that the approach of domestic courts that consider that it is 22 Cf. Judgment in the case Sbârnea v. Romania, dated 21 June 2011. In the mentioned case, the complainant (the child's father, who on the basis of a judgment had rights of contact with his daughter) lodged a criminal complaint against the child's mother, alleging that she had not complied with the judgment that defined his contact rights. In December 2003, the public prosecutor decided not to pursue the child's mother criminally, considering that the non-compliance with the final judicial decision could not be imputed to her, but to the child's refusal. The decision of the public prosecutor was abrogated by the domestic court and the case referred back for the investigation to be continued, however, after an extensive investigation, the state prosecutor repeatedly decided not to pursue criminal proceedings because the child's mother did not intend to prevent the complainant from having a personal relationship with his daughter. After the applicant's judicial complaint the domestic court assessed that none of the evidence indicated that the daughter wanted to see the complainant and that her mother was preventing her from doing so. The court's conclusion that the conditions required to attract the criminal liability of the mother had not been met was abrogated and referred back to the investigating authorities, when the daughter precisely explained why she did not want to see her father. The public prosecutor repeatedly terminated criminal proceedings, concluding that the child's mother was not obstructing the execution of the judgment. The Romanian Criminal Code allegedly implied an action from the side of the accused, the mere fact that the mother had failed to inculcate a positive attitude in her daughter towards her father is allegedly not sufficient to assess her conduct as such. Thus, the domestic court upheld such a decision and explained that in this case the child's mother only expressed her disagreement with forcing the child to do something she did not want to do.

23 The ECtHR held that the applicant's daughter was at that time already of an age when she could not simply be handed over to the father if she refused to join him. The bailiff allegedly took into account the girl's refusal to join her father, however, the court did not find this consideration arbitrary or inappropriate. In the case Sbârnea v. Romania, the ECtHR concluded, taking into account all the very difficult circumstances of the case, that the competent authorities had struck a fair balance between the competing interests (see paragraph 138 of the reasoning of the judgment).

of greatest relevance to custody and access issues to establish the psychological situation of the child and take his or her wishes into consideration cannot be open to criticism.<sup>24</sup> Also in its recent decisions the ECtHR points out that in cases concerning the enforcement of decisions in the sphere of family law, what is decisive is whether the state authorities have taken all the necessary steps to facilitate the execution, as far as can reasonably be expected in the special circumstances of each case (they must in particular bear in mind the child's interests) and that coercive measures against children are not desirable in this sensitive area.<sup>25</sup>

21. As has already been pointed out, the rights referred to in the first paragraph of Article 54 and the first paragraph of Article 56 of the Constitution, which both require respect for the child's best interests, should be taken into account also in criminal proceedings in which a decision is issued on the possible criminal liability of a parent who does not respect a final judicial decision on granting parents custody of a child or on establishing contacts between the child and the other parent. Therefore, such court deciding in criminal proceedings should on the one hand ensure respect for final judicial decisions, and on the other hand consider the principle of the child's best interests and strike an appropriate balance between the two, precisely in order to implement the above-mentioned human rights. As also noted by the ECtHR, in such proceedings it is necessary to draw special attention to the balance between the public interest, which lies in respect for the final judicial decision, which is assumed to protect the principle of the child's best interests, and the interests of both parents and especially the actual, even newly-emerged, interests of the child, which may in exceptional circumstances prevail. Accordingly, in exceptional circumstances there may be a collision between respect for a final judicial decision and the principle of the child's best interests. In the event of such, the criminal court should, depending on the content of the constitutionally protected values and circumstances of the individual case, assess which constitutionally protected value should be assigned the higher weight. A position of the court that following such assessment would be contrary to the child's best interests entails a violation of the child's right referred to in the first paragraph of Article 56 of the Constitution. Such right corresponds to the parent's duty determined by the first paragraph of Article 54 of the Constitution to act in accordance with this right in each individual case. Thus, a parent who, in accordance with the circumstances of the individual case, also acted in such manner cannot be assessed as having committed unlawful conduct, the sanctioning of which is precisely the purpose of the criminal offence determined in the first paragraph of 25 Cf. Judgment in the case Pascal v. Romania, dated 17 April 2012, paragraphs 70 and 88 of the reasoning. When assessing the alleged violation of Article 8 of the ECHR, the ECtHR did not deny the weight of the reasoning of the criminal court that the mother, whose conduct was allegedly the main reason for the unsuccessful execution of the decision, acted with concern for the best interests of her child. Regarding such, it emphasized that the conduct of the child's mother was such (also) due to the child's rejection of contact with the applicant, which also for the Romanian criminal court was allegedly the main reason for rejecting the applicant's criminal complaint. See paragraph 79 of the reasoning of the judgment in this case.

Article 200 of the CC.<sup>26</sup> Therefore, in the circumstances of the case at issue, the Constitutional Court assessed the complainant's allegation of a violation of the first paragraph of Article 54 of the Constitution precisely from the mentioned viewpoints.

B – IV

22. In the challenged judgments the court of first instance and the court of second instance assigned absolute validity to the final judicial decision by which the mother of the complainant's son was granted custody. Such a position was explicitly confirmed also by the Supreme Court, which emphasized that all conduct contrary to the final judicial decision is contrary to the child's interests and consequently also materially unlawful. Therefore, this allegedly applies without exception also to all conduct which would, in accordance with a careful assessment, later be proven to entail precisely respect for the child's best interests as a human right, which in the circumstances at that time was different from that protected by the final judicial decision. Such views of the courts are, therefore, in and of themselves inconsistent with the right determined in the first paragraph of Article 56 of the Constitution, which may entail a violation of the right determined by the first paragraph of Article 54 of the Constitution in criminal proceedings. By attributing unlawfulness to conduct that cannot be unlawful, if the mentioned rights are being respected, they might consequently also violate the right determined by the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution. In the circumstances of the case at issue, for the reasons set out below, these views also de facto entail a violation of the complainant's right referred to in the first paragraph of Article 54 of the Constitution and consequently also a violation of the right referred to in the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution.
23. As follows from the examined case files, during the time period when the complainant is alleged to have committed a criminal offence, an eleven-year old child clearly expressed his own will with regard to whom he would like to live with, and through adults, including ones who have been appointed trusted persons [Slo: zaupne osebe] precisely in order to ensure respect for his interests, tried to achieve that he was to live with his father instead of his mother. It follows from the information in the case file that on 7 September 2005 the child resolutely opposed being in his mother's custody any further and that he explicitly demanded that the complainant (his father) not return him to his mother. During the events that took place the next day, i.e. on 8 September 2005, at the school the child attended, also the police did not use coercive measures to execute the final judgment dated 24 May 2004 precisely due to respect for the child's best interests. By his conduct, which includes demanding that the school not release the child to his mother, the complainant in fact expressed his opposition to forcing an eleven-year old child to do something that he allegedly strongly opposed by his own will and allegedly did not want. As regards his age and maturity, the eleven-year old child was capable of expressing his will on the essential circumstances regarding custody, which was also held by the courts. The courts took the view that the complainant should have convinced his son, in a manner understandable to him, to respect the final judgment until a different court decision was issued, which generally can be agreed with. However, it also needs to be considered that such conduct, bearing in mind the expressed persistence of the child, could only be achieved by force. Such coercive measures would formally ensure respect for the final judgment; however, it could have had severe consequences regarding the child's development in the circumstances and with regard to his traumatic experiences and traumatic comprehension of the environment, which was not in favour of respecting his will.

24. In addition, the complainant pursued the legal path to securing the child's rights already the same day, i.e. on 8 September 2005,<sup>27</sup> in order to achieve a change in the final Judgment of the District Court in Ljubljana, dated 24 May 2004. The fact is that instead of proceeding quickly, the competent court concluded only on 22 May 2006 by Decision No. P 3558/2005 that the complainant was thereby temporarily granted custody of his minor son. Nevertheless, by the final judgment of conviction the complainant allegedly committed a criminal offence from the day the child came to him in the company of a person whom the child trusted, to the day the mentioned temporary injunction was issued. After the issuance of the temporary injunction, the proceedings, which were concluded by a final judgment according to which the complainant was granted custody of his minor son, had lasted quite a few years. It is possible to concur with the complainant that these proceedings, ever since the decision-making regarding [i.e. the filing of] the motion for a temporary injunction, lasted unacceptably long, which was also clearly contrary to the principle of the child's best interests. On the one hand, the complainant was facing an allegation of unlawful conduct – in the Judgment of the Supreme Court he is even alleged to have been uncompromising because he allegedly did not comply with the execution proceedings for the execution of the final judgment – while on the other hand, the competent court decided upon his motion, which should have been decided on especially quickly, only after nearly nine months. All this despite the fact that it is precisely the possibility of the issuance of a temporary injunction that presents an effective means by which the child's best interests should immediately be protected in an individual case. The courts that decided on the complainant's criminal liability were also informed of all these circumstances.
25. The circumstance that in the situation at issue indicated respect for the requirement to ensure the child's best interests was the clearly and unambiguously expressed will of an eleven-year old child that, in light of the circumstances of the case, he does not want to return to his mother and wants instead to live with his father. It is indeed within the jurisdiction of civil courts to assess in each individual case whether such will is de facto in accordance with the child's best interests. In this case, the courts assessed that respect for the child's wish for the complainant to have custody of him is in accordance with the child's best interests. In the criminal proceedings the courts were aware of these facts because the summary charge against the complainant was not submitted before the issuance of the temporary injunction by which he was granted custody of his minor son. When assessing the complainant's unlawful conduct, these circumstances were important, especially given the fact that the complainant is alleged to have committed the criminal offence during a time period when the competent court, in spite of the complainant's repeated motions to expedite the proceedings, did not decide on the proposed temporary injunction. Nevertheless, in criminal proceedings the courts did not pay adequate attention thereto precisely because they a priori formalistically took the view that the final judgment of 2004 was absolutely valid and that compliance with the principle of the child's best interests, which was allegedly already established by the final judgment of 2004, cannot lead to any different conclusion.

27 He brought an action seeking custody of both his children and inter alia proposed the issuance of a temporary injunction granting temporary custody of his son.

26. If in the criminal proceedings the courts had considered the clearly expressed will of the minor son, who was, in accordance with his age and maturity, capable of making it clear that he did not want to return to his mother, if they had considered all the specific circumstances that were evident from both the criminal and civil case files, they would have had to conclude that the complainant had acted in the child's best interests, which is also his duty in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 54 of the Constitution, and these interests are also protected thereby. Regarding such, it is not insignificant that the state authorities, despite the fact that they are primarily bound by the obligation to respect final judgments, discontinued the execution of such precisely in order to protect the child's interests. Namely, on 8 September 2005 the police did not use coercive measures to execute the valid final judgment because at that time it assessed that priority should be given to the child's interests. The same conduct cannot, on the one hand, be desirable conduct of the state authorities to respect the child's best interests in the given case, and on the other hand unlawful conduct the complainant is alleged to have committed as an individual. When and as long as there existed a final judicial decision, it equally bound all state authorities as well as all individuals, thus also the child's parents and thus also the complainant. If justified reasons prevented even the authorities competent to execute the final Judgment from doing so, these also existed as regards the complainant and he was thereby imposed the duty to act in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 54 of the Constitution.
27. In the circumstances of the case at issue, failure to comply with the child's best interests (the first paragraph of Article 56 of the Constitution), in the light of the above-mentioned, led to a violation of the complainant's right referred to in the first paragraph of Article 54 of the Constitution and consequently also to a violation of the right referred to in the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution. Therefore, the Constitutional Court abrogated the challenged judgments (point 1 of the operative provisions). However, the case was not remanded to the court of first instance for new adjudication because, based on the first paragraph of Article 60 of the CCA, the Constitutional Court itself ruled on the charge against the complainant.

B – V

28. If the Constitutional Court abrogates challenged judgments, on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 60 of the CCA it may also decide on a disputed right if such is necessary in order to remedy consequences that have already occurred on the basis of an individual act, or if such is required by the nature of the constitutional right or freedom, and if such decision can be reached on the basis of information contained in the case file. On such basis, the Constitutional Court may also itself decide on the justification of the charge brought against the complainant, if the mentioned conditions have been met. The Constitutional Court has hitherto acted in such a manner particularly in cases when it was evident from the reasons for the determination of the violation of a human right by the abrogated judgments that in accordance with precisely this human right it is admissible to adopt precisely the opposite decision from the one adopted by the courts.<sup>28</sup>
29. The Constitutional Court has a sufficient amount of information in the case file in order to decide on the justification of the charge brought against the complainant, and it is bound by the state of the facts established by the competent courts, however, the justification of the charge depends on the question of whether in accordance with an interpretation of the first paragraph of Article 200 of the CC consistent with the Constitution the complainant can be assessed as having committed unlawful conduct in the material sense. If such cannot be attributed to his conduct, conviction due to the alleged criminal offence would entail being convicted for something that is not punishable by law. Therefore, it would entail a violation of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution. The criminal offence the complainant was charged with was allegedly committed already eight years ago. Remanding the case to the competent court for new adjudication would entail for the complainant the renewed initiation of criminal proceedings after a long period of time. Therefore, all the conditions referred to in the first paragraph of Article 60 of the CCA for a decision on the justification of the charge in this case are fulfilled.<sup>29</sup>
30. At the time when the alleged criminal offence was allegedly committed, the criminal offence of abducting a minor was determined by the first paragraph of Article 200 of the CC. The first paragraph of Article 200 of the CC determined: "Whoever unlawfully abducts a minor from his parent, adoptive parent, guardian, institution, or a person to whom the minor has been entrusted, or whoever detains a minor or prevents him from being with a person who has rights in respect of the minor, or whoever malevolently prevents the implementation of an enforceable judgment referring to a minor, shall be punished by a fine or sentenced to imprisonment for not more than one year." As follows from the mentioned provision, the legislature considered that it is precisely unlawfulness that is a special element of this criminal offence.<sup>30</sup>

31. In cases when a final judicial decision on the question of which parent is granted custody of a child exists, conduct contrary to such decision generally establishes unlawfulness in the sense of the first paragraph of Article 200 of the CC. However, it does not establish it automatically and absolutely because such would in the circumstances of an individual case entail a denial of respect for the principle of the child's best interests (the first paragraph of Article 56 of the Constitution), which corresponds on the side of the parents to their duty to act (the first paragraph of Article 54 of the Constitution) in accordance with such principle (paragraphs 20 and 21 of the reasoning of this decision). In order to determine that a parent's conduct is unlawful, it is therefore necessary to carefully consider all the relevant circumstances. Unlawfulness cannot be already assumed on the basis of the existence of a final judicial decision requiring the parent to act in accordance therewith. Changed circumstances on the side of one or both of the parents after the final judicial decision on the custody of the child, as well as the development of the child's capacity to understand the current situation and taking into account his will, as long as such is consistent with the principle of the child's best interests, may, depending on the circumstances of an individual case, exclude unlawfulness in the parent's conduct in the material sense. The same holds in the case at issue when the complainant acted formally in contravention to the enforceable judicial decision, but did everything he could to change it (by bringing an action with a request for a change in the custody of his son and a motion for a temporary injunction on this issue already the same day after the events at the elementary school on 8 September 2005 and immediately the next day after his son came to him and did not want to return to his mother). Thereby, it must be presupposed, according to the nature of the matter, that not only the formation of an action and a motion for a temporary injunction and the lodging of such, but also judicial deciding on the merits thereof, take an appropriate period of time. However, the court must decide on a motion for a temporary injunction as soon as possible. The court's inadmissibly long delay in deciding on the motion for a temporary injunction in the complainant's case was concurrently changed by the charge into the duration of the alleged criminal offence. While the court did not decide for more than eight months on the motion for a temporary injunction by which a change in the custody of the child was requested, the execution proceedings regarding the final judicial decision, which could have been changed by the temporary injunction and which subsequently in fact changed so as to grant the complainant custody of the child, had already been initiated. Nevertheless, it is above all important that the child's best interests in circumstances such as in the case at issue outweigh the importance of respect for a final judicial decision and the execution thereof.

30 See M. Deisinger, Kazenski zakon s komentarjem – Posebni del [Criminal Code with Commentary – Special Part], GV Založba, Ljubljana 2002, p. 320.

32. The complainant acted as a parent in accordance with his duties towards his child, as respect for the judicial decision, even though he deemed that it needed to be changed, could only be achieved by forcing his son, who was capable, in accordance with his age, of understanding the circumstances in which a decision regarding him was made (this finding follows from Order No. P 3558/2005 and Judgment No. II K 99/2007, dated 20 February 2009), to do something that he in fact strongly opposed. Therefore, it also cannot be alleged that the complainant, despite the threat of a significant fine for [not respecting] the execution of the final judicial decision (Order of the Local Court in Ljubljana No. In 2005/01241-3, dated 3 October 2005), did not force his son to return to his mother. Forcing the child in such circumstances would entail conduct that is not only a violation of the child's personal dignity (Article 34 of the Constitution) at his age and maturity (Paragraph 16 of the reasoning of this decision), but also precisely contrary to the child's best interests. Such could further negatively affect the child's psychological development, which due to all the circumstances was already affected, which is also evident from the intensity of the child's reaction to the events on 8 September 2005. Forcing a child, physically or mentally, would result in a conflict with the complainant's duties imposed by the first paragraph of Article 54 of the Constitution. Therefore, the complainant's conduct cannot be held to be unlawful.
33. Final judicial decisions must be respected by everyone, first and foremost by the state authorities. At the events on 8 September 2005, the competent state authorities held that forcing the child to return to his mother would be contrary to respect for the child's best interests. It is not possible to assess that such conduct of the competent authorities was on the one hand correct and in accordance with the principle of the child's best interests, and at the same time declare that the complainant should have ignored the principle of the child's best interests in order to respect the same final judicial decision. Therefore, to reiterate, such conduct of the complainant cannot be held to be unlawful.
34. Given the above, the conduct of the complainant cannot be assessed as having been unlawful. Because unlawfulness is an essential element of the criminal offence referred to in the first paragraph of Article 200 of the CC, the alleged conduct of the complainant does not have all the elements of a criminal offence. The complainant's conviction for such conduct would entail that the complainant was convicted for a criminal offence that at the time when it was committed was not punishable. Therefore, this would entail a violation of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution. On the basis of point 1 of Article 358 of the Criminal Procedure Act (hereinafter referred to as the CrPA), a defendant is acquitted of a charge if the alleged conduct is not punishable. In accordance therewith, the Constitutional Court decided as follows from point 2 of the operative provisions of this decision. Because the Constitutional Court itself decided on the case and acquitted the complainant, it also had to be decided in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 96 of the CrPA that the costs of the criminal proceedings are charged to the budget (Point 3 of the operative provisions).

C

35. The Constitutional Court reached this decision on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 59 and the first paragraph of Article 60 of the CCA in conjunction with point 1 of Article 358 and the first paragraph of Article 96 of the CrPA, composed of: Dr Ernest Petrič, President, and Judges Dr Mitja Deisinger, Mag. Marta Klampfer, Dr Etelka Korpič – Horvat, Mag. Miroslav Mozetič, Jasna Pogačar, and Dr Jadranka Sovdat. Judges Dr Dunja Jadek Pensa and Jan Zobec were disqualified from deciding in the case. The decision was reached by six votes against one; Judge Klampfer voted against.

DECISION

At a session held on 20 April 2006, in proceedings to review constitutionality initiated upon the petition of the company Petrol, Slovenska energetska družba [Petrol, Slovene Energy Company], d. d., Ljubljana, Tibor Feher, s. p., Lendava, and others, represented by Mitja Ulčar, attorney in Kranj, and the company Poslovni sistem Mercator [Mercator Business System], d. d., Ljubljana, represented by legal representative Žiga Debeljak, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. The first paragraph of Article 2 of the Consumer Protection Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 20/98, 25/98 – corr., 110/02, 14/03 – official consolidated text, 51/04, and 98/04 – official consolidated text) is not inconsistent with the Constitution.
2. The Consumer Protection Act is inconsistent with the Constitution, as it does not determine a time limit for the adjustment of the business operations of business entities. The National Assembly must remedy the established unconstitutionality within a time limit of six months from the publication of this Decision in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia.
3. The application of Order of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-218/04, dated 13 October 2004 (Official Gazette RS, No. 117/04), is extended until the expiry of the time limit referred to in the preceding point.

*ReasoningA

1. The petitioners challenge the first paragraph of Article 2 of the Consumer Protection Act (hereinafter referred to as the CoPA)<sup>1</sup> in the part in which it imposes on companies the obligation,<sup>2</sup> in the areas where the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian national communities reside, to also conduct business with consumers in the language of the respective national community. They allege that in these defined areas the challenged provision imposes on them the obligation (under penalty of a high fine) to conduct business with consumers bilingually, which allegedly entails an inadmissible limitation of free economic initiative and an unjustified interference with the right determined by Article 74 of the Constitution. They allege that in their view no reasons exist that would justify an interference with the right to free economic initiative. The interference allegedly does not ensure the two national communities protection of the constitutional right to use one's own language, as the Constitution does not explicitly require that all legal entities and natural persons that trade in goods and services with consumers in the areas in which the autochthonous national communities reside conduct such business bilingually. Furthermore, they are of the opinion that Article 11 of the Constitution – which determines that in those municipalities where the Italian and Hungarian national communities reside, in addition to Slovene, Italian or Hungarian are also official languages – requires only state authorities, other entities of public law, and bearers of public authority to conduct business with members of the autochthonous national communities in their languages, but not also individuals and companies. They allege that the interference is not necessary due to a public interest. The challenged provision is allegedly also inconsistent with the second paragraph of Article 14 in relation to the third paragraph of Article 74 of the Constitution, because it puts companies that conduct business in the areas in which the two autochthonous national communities reside in an unequal position compared to companies that do not conduct business in these markets. The former must namely conduct their business bilingually in these markets. In these areas, the [mentioned] provision allegedly only applies to those companies that conduct business directly with consumers. Moreover, they allege that when determining the new obligation or the new conditions for conducting business, the legislature did not determine an appropriate time limit for the adjustment of business operations to the new requirements, as the new conditions entered into force the day after the CoPA-B was published in the Official Gazette. Such conduct of the legislature allegedly violated the principle of trust in the law determined by Article 2 of the Constitution. The petitioners demonstrate their legal interest for filing the petitions by alleging that they have offices in the areas where the two autochthonous national communities reside.

---

1 The matter concerns Article 2 of the Act Amending the Consumer Protection Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 51/04 – hereinafter referred to as the CoPA-B).

2. In its reply, the National Assembly argues that the challenged provision was included in the text of the draft act on the basis of an amendment tabled during the legislative procedure on the grounds that the obligation to adopt such regulation follows from Article 11 of the Constitution. It draws attention to the connectedness of the challenged provision with Article 3 of the Public Use of the Slovene Language Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 86/04 – hereinafter referred to as the PUSLA), which allegedly is a consequence of the efforts of the two deputies of the national communities to expand the actual possibilities to use their respective languages in the areas where the two communities reside. The National Assembly is of the opinion that the challenged regulation is in itself not inconsistent with the Constitution, although it would need to be legally defined in more detail and the rights and obligations that refer to individuals and legal entities that operate in the areas where the two national communities reside would need to be clearly determined, and an appropriately long transitional period for adjusting to the new conditions for operating would need to be determined upon the introduction of the new obligations. It concurs that what is at issue is an interference with the right to free economic initiative; however, it is of the opinion that it is in conformity with the Constitution and thus does not entail a violation of Article 74 of the Constitution. It rejects the allegation that the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution is thereby violated. Finally, it states that a draft law to amend the challenged regulation of CoPA has already been submitted to the legislative procedure; however, a debate on such was postponed with the argument that the final decision of the Constitutional Court should first be adopted.

3. In its [submitted] opinion, the Government explains the reasons due to which it proposed the adoption of the CoPA-B. According to the Government, the challenged provision, which was not adopted upon its proposal, turned out to be disputable and ambiguous, and subject to different interpretations.
4. The municipal councils of the municipalities of Izola, Koper, Piran, and Lendava submitted applications to the Constitutional Court in which they express their disagreement with the allegations made in the petitions and with the decision of the Constitutional Court to temporarily suspend the implementation of the challenged provision. They are of the opinion that from Article 11 of the Constitution there follows the obligation to conduct business with consumers in the territories of those municipalities in which the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian national communities reside also in the language of the respective national community.

B – I

5. By Order No. U-I-218/04, dated 13 October 2004, the Constitutional Court suspended, on the basis of Article 39 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), the implementation of the challenged provision until the final decision is adopted. Due to joint consideration and decision-making, it joined all the petitions and accepted them for consideration. Since the conditions determined by the fourth paragraph of Article 26 of the CCA were fulfilled, it proceeded to decide on the merits of the case.

B – II

6. The petitioners challenge the first paragraph of Article 2 of the CoPA in the part in which it obliges natural persons and legal entities that carry out for-profit activities to also conduct business with consumers in the areas where the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian national communities reside in the language of the respective national community. They allege that by the challenged provision, the legislature interfered with the right to free economic initiative determined by Article 74 of the Constitution. However, not every regulation by the legislature on how business activities shall be carried out entails an interference with the right determined by the first paragraph of Article 74 of the Constitution.

7. The first paragraph of Article 74 of the Constitution determines that free economic initiative shall be guaranteed. However, the Constitutional Court has already stressed numerous times that an extreme liberalistic conception of free enterprise would not be in conformity with the Constitution. It follows already from the first sentence of the second paragraph of Article 74 of the Constitution that the conditions for establishing commercial organisations are established by law, while the second sentence determines that commercial activities may not be pursued in a manner contrary to the public interest. In addition, the second paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution vests in the legislature the authority to regulate by law the manner in which human rights are exercised also when this is not envisaged already by the Constitution itself but is necessary due to the nature of an individual right or freedom.
8. The right determined by Article 74 of the Constitution is one of the human rights that cannot be exercised directly on the basis of the Constitution. Therefore, the legislature must determine legal forms [of entities] for carrying out business activities (for which it is authorised by the first sentence of the second paragraph of Article 74 of the Constitution) and, with respect to the type of business activity, the conditions for carrying out such as well. In conformity with the above, the CoPA determines the rules that business entities must observe when offering, selling, and [carrying out] other forms of marketing of goods and services, and determines the duty of state authorities and other entities to guarantee such rights (Article 1). One such rule is also the provision regarding the language that such companies must use when conducting business with consumers. In this respect, the question is raised whether the legislature was entitled, on the basis of the authorisation determined by the second paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, to also prescribe the language of the respective national community as an [obligatory] language for conducting business.
9. The issue of the use of a particular language in conducting business with consumers is related to constitutional issues relating to the protection of the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian national communities. In its reply the National Assembly asserted that the determination of the obligation to conduct business with consumers also in the language of the respective national community follows from Article 11 of the Constitution. According to this provision, the official language in Slovenia is Slovene, while in those municipalities where the Italian or Hungarian national communities reside, Italian or Hungarian, respectively, is also an official language. From this provision follows the duty of state authorities, other bodies that perform public services, and local community bodies to conduct business and perform official activities in Slovene, and in those municipalities where the Italian or Hungarian national communities reside, also in Italian or Hungarian. What indirectly follows from this provision is also the right of individuals to use the Slovene language before state authorities and authorities performing public services, and in the mentioned territories also the Italian or Hungarian language.<sup>3</sup> With regard to the above, the obligation to conduct business with consumers also in the language of the respective national community cannot be substantiated by Article 11 of the Constitution.

10. Democratic states pay special attention to the protection of national minorities. The protection of national minorities is ensured in two forms: the first form entails the prohibition against discrimination on the basis of national, linguistic, religious, and racial affiliation, and the guarantee of special rights that only pertain to a minority or its members. The second form of protection is in theory known as the positive protection of minorities.<sup>4</sup> Positive protection entails so-called positive discrimination,<sup>5</sup> since the members of a minority are ensured rights that the members of the majority do not have. Such measures entail a high degree of protection of national minorities that is recognised to them by the majority, and which thereby emphasise the democratic character of the society.
11. In international law, the rights of national minorities are regulated by bilateral agreements and international conventions. The position of the Italian minority or national community was regulated after the Second World War by the Special Statute of the Free Territory of Trieste Annexed to the London Memorandum of Understanding between the Governments of Italy, the United Kingdom and Northern Ireland, the United States, and Yugoslavia (Official Gazette FPRY, MP, No. 6/54). The Special Statute ceased to be in force when the Treaty between the SFRY and the Italian Republic signed in Osimo (Official Gazette SFRY, MP, No. 1/77, Act on the Notification of Succession, Official Gazette RS, No. 40/92, MP, No. 11/92 – hereinafter referred to as the Treaty of Osimo) entered into force. Although the Special Statute ceased to be applicable when the Treaty of Osimo entered into force, it remained a standard for ensuring the rights of the two national communities in the neighbouring countries. The position of the Hungarian national community in Slovenia is regulated by the Agreement on Ensuring the Special Rights of the Slovene National Community in the Republic of Hungary and of the Hungarian National Community in the Republic of Slovenia, signed on 6 November 1992 and ratified by law on 26 March 1993 (Official Gazette RS, No. 23/93, MP, No. 6/93). Article 7 of this Agreement determines that the contracting parties assumed the obligation to consider the special interests of minorities in their spatial and economic development plans, and to ensure the economic and social development of the areas in which the autochthonous minorities reside so as to enable the social and economic equality of the minorities.

4 This is an expression established in recent theory and case law, American in particular (“affirmative action”). See Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-416/98, dated 22 March 2001 (Official Gazette RS, No. 28/01, and OdlUS X, 55).

12. The rights of the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian national communities are regulated by Articles 5 and 64 of the Constitution. The first paragraph of Article 5 of the Constitution determines, inter alia, that in its own territory the state protects and guarantees the rights of the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian national communities. Article 64 of the Constitution determines special rights of the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian national communities in Slovenia. The Constitution thus protects the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian national communities and their members in two different ways. On the one hand, it ensures everyone, i.e. including them, equal human rights and fundamental freedoms irrespective of a person's nationality (the first paragraph of Article 14), and, on the other hand, it also grants them certain special rights (Article 64). Such institutional framework is a prerequisite for the preservation of the identity and for the equal integration of both autochthonous national communities and of their members into social life. In regulating the special position and special rights of the autochthonous national communities, the legislature is not limited by the principle of equality, which with regard to the regulation of human rights and fundamental freedoms prohibits any discrimination based on nationality or any other circumstance determined by the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution. The Constitution allows the legislature to ensure the two autochthonous national communities and their members special (additional) protection (Decisions of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-283/94, dated 12 February 1998, Official Gazette RS, No. 20/98, and OdlUS VII, 26; No. U-I-94/96, dated 22 October 1998, Official Gazette RS, No. 77/98, and OdlUS VII, 196; No. U-I-296/94, dated 28 January 1999, Official Gazette RS, No. 14/99, and OdlUS VIII, 21). By the challenged provision, the legislature ensured members of the national communities such special protection. In order for the members of [the mentioned] minorities to be able to effectively exercise their rights that they have as consumers, they namely must have the possibility to use the language that they speak and understand best. In such context, the fact that the right granted by the challenged provision to the members of [such] minorities is not explicitly envisaged by Article 64 of the Constitution is not decisive. This right is based on the obligation of the state determined by Article 5 of the Constitution to protect and guarantee the rights of national minorities in its territory. The purpose of the challenged provision is also to achieve a high level of protection of the autochthonous national communities and their members. The positive protection that the majority nation grants national, ethnic, linguistic, and other communities (minorities) namely reflects the readiness of the state to foster and exercise the rights of the mentioned communities as an integral part of the democratic development of the entire state (as the Constitutional Court stated in Decision No. U-I-416/98). Such treatment is also in conformity with international instruments, in particular with the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities (Official Gazette RS, No. 20/98, MP, No. 4/98 – hereinafter referred to as the FCPNM), which in Article 4 contains the commitment of the signatory states to ensure members of national minorities the right to equality before the law and to adopt, in all areas of economic, social, political, and cultural life, appropriate measures for accelerating full and ef fective equality between the members of the national minority and the members of the majority nation, with regard to which such measures are not deemed to entail discriminatory actions. Also relevant to the case at issue is the European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages (Official Gazette RS, No. 69/2000, MP, No. 17/2000), which in Article 13 contains the commitment of the signatory states regarding the use of minority languages in the field of economic and social life.

13. In the areas where these two autochthonous national communities reside, the Constitution ensures their members a high degree of protection of their rights. In the field of consumer protection, the provisions of the CoPA on the use of a language serve this purpose. The regulation of the public use of a language also extends to fields that traditionally were not the subject of legislative regulation. The PUSLA regulates the issue of the use of a language or languages also in the field of conducting business with customers. It follows from the provisions of the PUSLA that in the territories of the municipalities where the Italian and Hungarian national communities reside, the public use of Italian or Hungarian as official languages is ensured in the same manner as this Act regulates the public use of Slovene, and in conformity with the provisions of individual acts. Hence, in the area where the two autochthonous national communities reside, the PUSLA prescribes that business with customers shall be conducted in Slovene and in the language of the respective national community.
14. With regard to the above, by determining that in the areas where the two autochthonous national communities reside, companies must also conduct their business with consumers in the language of the [respective] national community, the legislature acted in conformity with the authorisation determined by the second paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution. Therefore, what is at issue is not an interference with the right to free economic initiative determined by the first paragraph of Article 74 of the Constitution, which the Constitutional Court would have to assess in accordance with the strict test of proportionality, nor is it an inconsistency with the mentioned constitutional provision.
15. The petitioners also allege that the challenged provision is inconsistent with the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution in relation to the third paragraph of Article 74 of the Constitution. They substantiate such inconsistency by alleging that due to higher operating costs caused by the challenged regulation, companies that conduct business with consumers in the areas where the two autochthonous national communities reside are in an unequal position compared with companies that conduct business outside these areas. The petitioners are of the opinion that due to the small size of the mentioned two areas they do not represent the "relevant" market, but only an "administrative area". Thus, what is at issue allegedly concerns the determination of different rules for conducting business with consumers in the same market, without there existing a sound reason for such differentiation. Due to the above, the companies that will have to bear additional costs caused by providing business operations in Italian or Hungarian will have more difficulties competing with the other companies that conduct business in the same market and that will not [have to] bear such costs. The petitioners allege an inconsistency of the challenged provision with the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution also due to the fact that the obligation to conduct business in both languages was allegedly only imposed on the companies that conduct business with consumers, but not also on other [types of] companies.

16. The principle of equality before the law (the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution) cannot be understood as the simple general equality of everyone. In accordance with the established constitutional case law, the principle of equality before the law does not mean that a regulation – where the circumstances determined by the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution are not the basis for a different regulation – should not regulate equal positions differently, but that it should not do such arbitrarily, without objective and reasonable grounds.
17. In regulating business with consumers, the legislature determined that companies that conduct business in the areas of municipalities in which the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian national communities reside are required to conduct business with consumers in the Slovene language and in the language of the respective national community whereas outside these areas companies are required to conduct business with consumers only in Slovene. The area in which a company conducts business is thus the differentiating criterion. As stated in Paragraph 12 of the reasoning, a high level of protection of national minorities, which is a prerequisite for the preservation of the identity and for the equal integration of both autochthonous national communities and their members into the social (thus also economic) life, entails reasonable grounds for a special regulation on conducting business with consumers in the mentioned areas. It is not possible to argue that the legislature acted arbitrarily as it wanted to protect, by the challenged regulation, the interests of the autochthonous Italian and Hungarian national communities. Consequently, since the legislature had a sound and concrete reason for differentiation, the challenged provision is not inconsistent with the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution.
18. Likewise, the legislature had reasonable grounds to only introduce the obligation to conduct business in both languages as regards companies that conduct business with consumers, but not also for other companies. The reason for such regulation follows from the purpose of the CoPA. The purpose of this Act is consumer protection. As consumers in the areas where the two national communities reside also include members of national minorities, they can only effectively exercise their rights if in doing so they can use the language that they know and understand best. Therefore, the legislature had reasonable grounds to adopt a regulation in accordance with which the duty to conduct business in Slovene and in the language of the respective national community only extends to those companies that conduct business with consumers. With regard to the above, the challenged provision is not inconsistent with the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution.
19. The challenged regulation determines new conditions for conducting business, with regard to which the legislature should have given the affected business entities the possibility to prepare for the new regulation. The Constitutional Court thus determined a time limit by which the legislature must remedy the established inconsistency. In such manner, the affected business entities will be provided the possibility to be able to adjust their operations to the requirement determined by the first paragraph of Article 2 of the CoPA. In order for such to be effectively carried out, the Constitutional Court had to extend, on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA, the applicability of the temporary suspension of the challenged provision.

DECISION

At a session held on 7 April 2011, in the procedure for examining the petitions of Numizmatično društvo Slovenije [the Slovene Numismatic Society] and Urban Mate, both Ljubljana, represented by the law firm Breclj, Korošec, Mate, Zupančič, d. o. o. – o. p., Ljubljana, and in proceedings to review constitutionality initiated upon the petition of the sole proprietor Janez Švajncer, s. p., Logatec, and Urban Mate, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. Points 2 and 3 of Article 3 of the Cultural Heritage Protection Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 16/08, 123/08, and 8/11) are not inconsistent with the Constitution.
2. The first paragraph of Article 6, Article 53, the tenth indent of the first paragraph of Article 127, and Article 135 of the Cultural Heritage Protection Act are inconsistent with the Constitution.
3. The National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia must remedy the unconstitutionality established in the preceding Point of the operative provisions within one year after the publication of this Decision in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia.
4. The implementation of the tenth indent of the first paragraph of Article 127 of the Cultural Heritage Protection Act is suspended until the unconstitutionality established in Point 2 of these operative provisions is remedied.
5. The petition to initiate proceedings to review the constitutionality and legality of Instruction No. 2, dated 24 March 2009, is rejected.
6. The petition of the Slovene Numismatic Society to initiate proceedings to review the constitutionality of Article 3, the first paragraph of Article 6, Article 53, the tenth indent of the first paragraph of Article 127, the second and third paragraphs of Article 127, and Article 135 of the Protection of Cultural Heritage Act is rejected.

*ReasoningA

1. The petitioners challenge points 2 and 3 of Article 3, the first paragraph of Article

6, Article 53, the tenth indent of the first paragraph of Article 127, the second and third paragraphs of Article 127, and Article 135 of the Cultural Heritage Protection Act (hereinafter referred to as the CHPA-1) because they are allegedly inconsistent with Articles 2, 8, 27, 28, 33, 42, 59, 67, 69, 70, 74, and 155 of the Constitution. They argue that the challenged regulation is also inconsistent with Article 1 of the First Protocol to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the First Protocol to the ECHR) and the legal order of the European Union (hereinafter referred to as the EU), i.e. Council Regulation (EEC) No. 3911/92 of 9 December 1992 on the export of cultural goods (OJ L 395, 31.12.1992, pp. 1–5), which was replaced by Council Regulation (EC) No. 116/2009 of 18 December 2008 on the export of cultural goods (codified version), OJ L 39, 10.02.2009, pp. 1–7 (hereinafter referred to as Council Regulation No. 116/2009). The first petitioner is a sole proprietor who manages the privately owned Logatec War Museum and has been issued a licence from the Ministry of Culture to store, preserve, exhibit, and present movable cultural heritage that he has collected himself; he has also accumulated an extensive numismatic collection. The other petitioners are the Slovene Numismatic Society (hereinafter referred to as the SNS) and Urban Mate, a member of this society who has a collection of antique and other coins in his possession and is an owner of several cartridge casings.

2. The petitioners the sole proprietor, Janez Švajncer, and Urban Mate, are collectors of antique coins and arms. In accordance with the first paragraph of Article 135 of the CHPA-1, they notified the authorised museum that they hold collections of objects for which they did not have a certificate of origin. The petitioners claim that, according to the regulations that had been in force until the enactment of the CHPA-1, there had been no prohibition on the sale, purchase, or collection of such objects, and thus neither their origins nor the locations in which they were discovered were known when they were acquired. They claim that on the basis of the challenged provisions of the CHPA-1 the objects that are part of the collection of the War Museum or the coins that are part of the numismatic collection became state property. Therefore, the challenged regulation is allegedly inconsistent with Articles 33, 67, and 69 of the Constitution. They argue that the CHPA-1 introduced a new obligation for persons who hold an archaeological find or a collection of such finds, i.e. an obligation to possess proof of origin for those objects (Article 53 of the CHPA-1), and failing to do so is considered a minor offence (Article 127 of the CHPA-1). As the CHPA-1 allegedly failed to define the content of such certificate, in their opinion this Act declared that all acquisitions of archaeological finds before its entry into force were illegal and are therefore to be punished as a minor offence. This is allegedly inconsistent with Article 28 of the Constitution (the principle of legality in criminal law) and other fundamental principles of criminal law, especially the presumption of innocence (Article 27 of the Constitution), and Article 155 of the Constitution (the prohibition of the retroactive effect of legal acts). It is true that Article 135 of the Act provides that criminal and minor offences committed before its entry into force will not be prosecuted; however, the procedure that follows the notification of the museum that an archaeological find has been held without a certificate of origin allegedly entails a risk of such objects being nationalised arbitrarily. In this regard, the petitioner SNS stresses that the definitions of the terms archaeological find and archaeological remains in Article 3 of the CHPA-1 are vague, making it difficult to implement the entire act in a reasonable and impartial manner. It is alleged that the first paragraph of Article 6 of the CHPA-1 does not regulate clearly the property right of the state, and that Article 53 of the CHPA-1 is inconsistent with the principle of precision of regulations, and consequently the collectors do not know which objects must be reported as archaeological finds in accordance with Article 135 of the CHPA-1 nor what is supposed to happen to those objects in that procedure. The petitioners Janez Švajncer and Urban Mate state that, under the previous Cultural Heritage Protection Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 7/99 – hereinafter referred to as the CHPA), a person who found an object under ground or in water had a possibility to disprove the presumption that the object has the characteristics of cultural heritage. They state that an object could only be defined as such if it was found in the territory of the Republic of Slovenia, while the new CHPA-1 no longer contains such a provision. They also allege that the CHPA-1 contradictorily and incorrectly transposed Council Regulation No. 116/2009 into the Slovene legal order because the purpose of that regulation is to define the rules of trading with objects constituting cultural heritage with third (i.e. non-EU) countries and not to determine the rules for the EU market. In their opinion it was precisely because of the trading with such objects that the Court of the European Communities in its Judgment, dated 10 October 1985, in Guns Gmbh & Co. Kg proti Hauptzollamt Koblenz, C-252/84 (hereinafter referred to as Case C252/84), defined collectibles in more detail in the context of the common customs tariff. Therefore, the Act is allegedly inconsistent with EU law and Article 1 of the First Protocol to the ECHR and, consequently, also with Article 8 of the Constitution.

3. The petitioner SNS states that the society was established in order to promote collector activity, to provide for the conservation of antiques that may also be objects of cultural heritage, to facilitate the acquisition and exchange of such objects among its members, and for educational and publishing purposes. In its opinion, the challenged provisions of the CHPA-1 entail a serious interference with the interests of the society's members, the economic non-profit activity of the society, and consequently the activity of the society in general. Therefore they are allegedly inconsistent with Articles 42, 74, and 59 of the Constitution.
4. The National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia did not respond to the petitions.
5. The Government of the Republic of Slovenia submitted its opinion. In its assessment, some of the challenged statutory provisions do not apply at all to the situation of the SNS, as it neither holds nor collects archaeological finds. It claims that, pursuant to the Societies Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 61/06 and 58/09 – hereinafter referred to as the SA-1), the SNS may not carry out profit-making activities. The claims that the requirement to possess a proof of origin would paralyse the society's activities are in its opinion unfounded, because the CHPA-1 does not interfere with the regulation of publications or exhibitions, and it does not prohibit collection.

6. The Government emphasises that the assumption underlying the allegations of the petitioners, i.e. that the CHPA-1 introduces ex lege state ownership of archaeological finds and the land plots where archaeological remains are located, is erroneous. The Government has presented in detail the previous regulations from 1945 until the entry into force of the CHPA-1, which had allegedly always contained provisions determining that any archaeological finds, i.e. movable objects found on land, under ground, or in water to which the law ascribed a cultural value were state property or, between 1960 and 1999, social property. Whoever found such objects was allegedly always obligated to notify the authorised institution and hand over the objects to it. Regarding archaeological finds raised from the ground or water before 1945, the Government explains that it is practically no longer possible to find them in private collections because during the last fifty years these finds were gradually transferred to the collections of public museums, owned by the state, and therefore there is only a slight possibility that archaeological finds from this period would be available on the market. Since 1945, archaeological finds could only have emerged from excavations or chance discoveries; therefore the legislation, which required that notification be made of any objects raised from the ground or water and that they be professionally evaluated, also applied to the petitioners. If an object with such characteristics had been on sale during this period, with regard to the applicable regulations such could allegedly only have been an unlawfully acquired object that was put on the market (concealment of a chance discovery, sale on the black market by participants in excavations, theft of excavations, unauthorised excavations).
7. The Government deems that the presumptions underlying the petitioners' challenge of the first paragraph of Article 6 of the CHPA-1 are erroneous. This provision allegedly only continues the sequence of legal norms that maintained state ownership of archaeological finds in our legal order since the beginning of the statutory regulation of this area. Therefore, in the Government's opinion, the CHPA-1 did not affect the nationalisation of specific archaeological finds or collections but was intended to ensure legal continuity of the regulation of this area. The CHPA-1 allegedly only makes it possible to determine in specific cases which objects, pursuant to the previously applicable legislation, have undoubtedly been state property since 1945 and have such characteristics that their inclusion in a public museum collection is justified. The Government also deems that the challenged first paragraph of Article 6 of the CHPA-1 is not less strict than the provision of Article 58 of the CHPA that was in force before its enactment. It is allegedly absolutely clear that the CHPA-1 can also only refer to the territory of the Republic of Slovenia. However, it assesses that the provision of the previously applicable statute was less precise because it did not include any condition regarding age and did not differentiate between archaeological and other cultural heritage. It emphasises that, pursuant to the CHPA and CHPA-1, it is particularly important to professionally determine whether the specific object possesses the characteristics of cultural heritage. The Government is of the opinion that the first paragraph of Article 6 of the CHPA-1 does not prescribe the nationalisation of movable objects and it is therefore not inconsistent with Article 69 of the Constitution and consequently also not with Articles 33 and 67 of the Constitution.

8. The Government explains that point 2 of Article 3 of the CHPA-1 defines the term archaeological find as movable archaeological remains and it is therefore clear that it is a movable object. The term archaeological remains is allegedly a basic term that is defined in point 3 of Article 3 of the CHPA-1 as including real property and movable objects associated therewith that are traces of historical human activity and for which it is possible to assume that they were in water or under ground for more than 100 years (50 years with regard to weapons) and that they possess the characteristics of cultural heritage. Archaeological remains allegedly become cultural heritage once they are professionally identified and registered. The Government explains that the definition of archaeological remains includes protection of the stage immediately preceding their identification as objects of archaeological heritage, as determined in the European Convention on the Protection of the Archaeological Heritage (Revised) (Official Gazette RS, No. 24/99, MP, No. 7/99 – hereinafter referred to as the ECPAH). As the term archaeological remains includes various archaeological elements on land, under ground, or in water, regardless of whether they are movable or immovable, the requirement to possess proof of origin, as determined in Article 53 of the CHPA-1, and the notification obligation determined in Article 135 of the CHPA-1 are allegedly neither logical nor reasonable with regard to such archaeological elements. However, the definition of the term archaeological find, which is subject to a special regulation regarding ownership (state or social property), research, discoveries, and export, has allegedly always been broad already in accordance with previous regulations. In view of the above, the Government considers that the basic terms defined in the CHPA-1 cannot be interpreted and applied arbitrarily and therefore it does not consider points 2 and 3 of Article 3 of this Act to be inconsistent with Article 2 of the Constitution.
9. As regards the challenged Article 53 of the CHPA-1, which introduced the proof of origin, the Government considers that the introduction of such provision was necessary in order to consistently promote the public interest in preserving cultural heritage as defined in Article 5 of the Constitution. In its opinion, this regulation does not interfere with the rights of the persons in possession of archaeological finds if they had already had those rights before the CHPA-1 entered into force. The purpose of this provision was merely to enable the traceability of the trading with archaeological finds, and not to interfere with acquired rights. The obligation of the state to ensure that objects of movable cultural heritage are traceable allegedly arises from international conventions in the area of fighting unlawful trade with movable cultural heritage that bind Slovenia. It is argued that since the entry into force of the Convention on the Means of Prohibiting and Preventing the Illicit Import, Export and Transfer of Ownership of Cultural Property (Official Gazette RS, No. 54/92, MP, No. 15/92, and Official Gazette SFRY [Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia], MP, No. 50/73 – hereinafter referred to as the UNESCO Convention),<sup>1</sup> every legal transaction with archaeological finds and coins (irrespective of whether they originate from archaeological contexts) is registered, the traders are required to inform the buyers of the possibility of restrictions on legal transactions, and the state is required to implement corresponding measures to prevent illicit conduct, including illicit transfer of the ownership of such objects. However, these requirements were not introduced into national law until the CHPA was adopted in 1999, which also took into account the requirements of the ECPAH and EU legal acts in relation to the export and return of objects of cultural heritage. The transitional provision of Article 135 of the CHPA-1 allegedly made it possible for persons who hold archaeological finds in good faith in Slovenia to transition painlessly and in a legally safe manner from a system that did not regulate proof of origin to a system that requires it. On the basis of those arguments the Government considers that the challenged Articles 53 and 127 of the CHPA-1 are not inconsistent with Articles 155, 27, and 28 of the Constitution. As regards the proof of origin, the Government recognises that it is actually not defined in the act; however, it deems that defining its content in more detail would narrow down possibilities to establish the traceability of the objects' origin that must be proved by the persons who hold those objects. In the submitted opinion, it listed possible contents or forms of the certificate of origin, from a decree of distribution to publications in journals. It states that this certificate merely establishes the circumstances in which the person in possession of such object personally acquired it and therefore serves as evidence that makes it possible to trace the circulation of archaeological finds and their origin. As the purpose of this provision is only to establish facts and take evidence, the Government considers this provision to be clear.

10. The Government claims that the challenged Article 135 of the CHPA-1 does not allow for the nationalisation of archaeological finds and their collections, and that timely notification allows for the legalisation of all objects, even those which were acquired illegally. The Government then describes the procedure that is to be followed by the national or authorised museum (hereinafter referred to as the museum) that was notified of the fact that an archaeological find is kept without a certificate of origin by the persons storing that archaeological find. Through this, these persons allegedly obtain either a certificate of origin for those objects that remain in their possession or they receive compensation for storing those archaeological finds or collections for which it was established that they have the characteristics of a cultural monument of national importance and which were included in the public museum collections. The Government explains that the unlawful actions determined in the second paragraph of Article 135 of the CHPA-1 that will not be prosecuted have to be precisely defined to ensure the precision of the legal norm.
11. In relation to the statements regarding the inconsistency of the challenged regulation with the EU legal order, the Government explains that on the basis of Article 30 of the Treaty establishing the European Community (consolidated text, OJ C 321, 29.12.2006, Official Gazette RS, No. 27/04, MP, No. 7/04 – hereinafter referred to as the TEC) the Member States can restrict or prohibit the circulation of goods on the EU internal market on the grounds of protection of national treasures possessing artistic, historic, or archaeological value. Council Directive 93/7/EEC of 15 March 1993 on the return of cultural objects unlawfully removed from the territory of a Member State (OJ L 74, 27.03.1993, pp. 74–79), Council Regulation No. 116/2009, and other EU legal acts in this area contain provisions that clearly indicate that they do not interfere with the competencies of the Member States pursuant to Article 30 of the TEC. With the CHPA-1, Slovenia defined a national treasure in order to monitor trading and to prevent illicit transfer or export with the aim of protecting that treasure. It is true that national treasures are also regulated in the Return of Unlawfully Removed Cultural Heritage Objects Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 126/03 – hereinafter referred to as the RURCHOA); however, this act refers only to procedures associated with the unlawful removal of such object from one EU Member States to another. In accordance with Article 9 of Council Regulation No. 116/2009, Slovenia is only required to introduce rules and penalties for infringements of this Regulation into the internal legal order and shall take all measures necessary to ensure that the regulation is implemented. The Government also explains that the petitioners Janez Švajncer and Urban Mate misinterpret Annex A1 to this Regulation, i.e. that any trading and export of the collectors' pieces that fall under the categories referred to in Case C-252/84 was free. More specifically, point 2 of Article 2 of Council Regulation No. 116/2009 clearly states in which cases a Member State is not required to issue export licences for the export of objects of cultural heritage from the Community's customs territory. With regard to the above the petitioners' claim that the CHPA-1 is inconsistent with the EU legal order is allegedly unfounded.

12. The Government further states that, in accordance with Article 135 of the CHPA-1, persons storing weapons and other military materials from the First and Second World Wars were not required to report them. In accordance with Article 10 of the CHPA-1, such objects are not considered a national treasure; however the purpose of classifying them as archaeological finds and archaeological remains is to introduce a statutory prohibition to remove such materials from the sites contrary to Article 32 of the CHPA-1.
13. The petitioners responded to the Government's opinion. They oppose the Government's assertion that, in relation to archaeological finds, the CHPA-1 only reproduces the regime that applied to those objects pursuant to previous regulations. In their opinion, it is clear from the acts that the Government adduces as evidence for its position regarding the continuity of the state ownership of archaeological finds that those acts included additional essential conditions, especially within the meaning of the wider quality of the object, and that the CHPA-1 does not determine those conditions (e.g. objects of a cultural, historical, artistic, or ethnological nature found during excavations made on behalf of the state). They claim that it was only when the CHPA had been adopted that all the objects found on land, under ground, or in water were declared state property, but – unlike in the law currently in force – such only applied to those that were presumed to constitute heritage. In their opinion, in relation to archaeological finds raised from the ground or water before 1945, the Government is clearly aware that they are not state property, but failed to take that exception into account in the Act. Archaeological objects originating from Slovene sites were allegedly mostly excavated before the Second World War and during that period the discovery of archaeological objects was governed by the General Civil Code [Translator's note: The term General Civil Code refers to the Austrian Allgemeines bürgerliches Gesetzbuch that was adopted in 1811 and was applied throughout the Habsburg Monarchy, i.e. also in the Slovene territory. In Slovenia, it was translated as Obči državljanski zakonik and some of its provisions continued to be applied until the adoption of the Code of Obligations in 2001]. They dispute the Government's statement that after 1973 due to the validity of the UNESCO Convention, every transaction involving archaeological finds was recorded, because the state (first Yugoslavia and then Slovenia) failed to do anything to create conditions to ensure compliance with the obligation arising from Article 10 of that Convention.<sup>2</sup> It was allegedly only in 1999 that the CHPA imposed on antique dealers the obligation to keep corresponding records. The petitioners emphasise that they can accept the assurances of the Government and the Ministry of Culture that the CHPA-1 does not allow for the nationalisation of any movable objects or collections and that the procedure to include movable objects in a museum collection may only commence if it is established beyond doubt that these objects are state property, that they originate from the territory of the Republic of Slovenia, that they possess archaeological characteristics, were acquired by archaeological excavations or chance discovery, that they have the attributes of a monument of national importance, that there is no certificate of origin relating to them, and that the so-called abolition does not include weapons and military material from the First and the Second World Wars. However, they also believe that in accordance with Article 2 of the Constitution, these assurances would have to be clearly stipulated in the CHPA-1, which lacks clarity precisely in these areas and allows for different interpretations. They argue that this particularly applies to weapons and military material that, according to a grammatical interpretation of the CHPA-1, have been classified as an archaeological find simply due to having been under ground or in water for more than fifty years, unlike coins, which are required to possess the characteristics of archaeological remains and also, at the very least, the presumption that they constitute cultural heritage must apply to them. The Government's explanations in relation to the definition of terms notwithstanding, the petitioners insist that the terms in Article 3 of the CHPA-1 (and subsequently in relation to other challenged provisions) are unclear and contradictory. They point out that the CHPA-1 does not include the term archaeological heritage, which the Government uses in its opinion and that is legally more appropriate than the term archaeological find. They believe that because the professional and legal aspects of the term archaeological find are confused and due to the unclear statutory definition of the terms, the recording of private collections may in fact result in decision-making on the ownership of specific objects, the restrictions of legal transactions with those objects, and the nationalisation of objects that do not possess the characteristics of cultural heritage at all. In their opinion, this risk is even more tangible because Article 135 of the CHPA-1 does not provide any detailed rules on how the authorised institutions should act or the procedure that they should follow, so that the arbitrariness of their decision-making is not excluded. They deem that the public interest in protecting cultural heritage that could justify such a strict regulation of the proof of origin is not demonstrated, and the measure itself is also disproportionate and inappropriate. The legislature could have allegedly achieved the same effects through milder archaeological heritage protection measures. They argue that the legislature could have established a special regime to protect archaeological heritage from illegal excavations on site, ensured consistent control at the borders to protect it from illegal export abroad, and by implementing the regulation of property pursuant to the Property Code (Official Gazette RS, No. 87/02) in instances where the ownership of the state has been proved. The petitioners reject the argument of reduced control as a consequence of becoming part of the Schengen area and the arguments that are based on international conventions. In their opinion, in relation to a special export and import regulation, these conventions refer only to the cultural objects that are important for the state, are rare and valuable, and not to just any object.

2 The State Parties to this Convention undertook to oblige antique dealers, subject to penal or administrative sanctions, to maintain a register recording the origin of each object of cultural property, names and addresses of the supplier, description and price of each object sold, and to inform the purchaser of the cultural property of the export prohibition to which such property may be subject.

14. A direct risk of nationalisation is allegedly demonstrated by Instruction No. 2 for the Implementation of Article 135 of the CHPA-1 (hereinafter referred to as Instruction No. 2) issued by the Ministry of Culture on 24 March 2009, which the petitioner SNS received on 26 May 2009, i.e. after it had lodged the petition. For this reason the mentioned petitioner extended its petition to review constitutionality also to Instruction No. 2, as in its opinion it entails a general act of the Ministry even though it was not published. It believes that by that instruction the Ministry determined contrary to the CHPA-1 and the Constitution an ownership regime for notified objects pursuant to Article 135 of the CHPA-1, and thus the petitioner, as the one who submitted a notice pursuant to Article 135 of the CHPA-1, is at risk that its collections will be decided upon contrary to the CHPA-1 and the Constitution and the objects included in those collections will be actually nationalised or legal transactions involving such objects restricted. It argues that, for this reason, Instruction No. 2 entails an unconstitutional interference with its acquired right to private property and inheritance determined in Article 33 of the Constitution, and it is also inconsistent with Articles 2, 15, 67, and 153 of the Constitution. It proposes to the Constitutional Court to annul or abrogate Instruction No. 2.
15. The Ministry of Culture responded to the allegations from the extended petition in relation to Instruction No. 2. It did not take a position on the allegations regarding Instruction No. 2, but did send information regarding the implementation of Article 135 of the CHPA-1.

B – I

16. Anyone who demonstrates legal interest may lodge a petition that the procedure for the review of constitutionality be initiated (the first paragraph of Article 24 of the Constitutional Court Act, Official Gazette RS, No. 64/07 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the CCA). According to the second paragraph of that article, legal interest is deemed to be demonstrated if a regulation or general act issued for the exercise of public authority whose review has been requested by the petitioner directly interferes with his rights, legal interests, or legal position.

17. In accordance with the settled case law of the Constitutional Court, political parties, societies, chambers, and associations have legal interest only to challenge those regulations that directly interfere with their rights, legal interests, or legal position. Legal interest is therefore not demonstrated with regard to the petitions lodged by these entities on behalf of their members, or to further the interests of those members, or because they believe they act in the general interest of society.<sup>3</sup> Consequently, the SNS cannot demonstrate its legal interest by asserting that the challenged regulation also interfered with the rights of its members with regard to the trading organised by the society. The claims that its activity and reputation were damaged also do not justify direct interference with the society's rights, legal interests, or legal position. It is true that, pursuant to its Statute,<sup>4</sup> the SNS engages in profit-making activity that is also related to archaeological finds; however, it does not engage in this activity in the context of the right to free economic initiative in accordance with Article 74 of the Constitution, but for the purpose of contributing to the SNS's non-profit objectives pursuant to Article 25 of the SA-1. Such is, however, not affected by the challenged regulation. The scientific endeavour associated with archaeological finds, which is protected by Article 59 of the Constitution, cannot by its very nature constitute an activity performed by the society as a legal entity, because the society's activity, publishing, is simply the way in which scientists' and researchers' discoveries in that field are presented to the public. With regard to the above, the SNS has failed to demonstrate legal interest for the review of the constitutionality of the challenged regulation. Therefore the Constitutional Court rejected its petition (Point 6 of the operative provisions).
18. In accordance with Article 160 of the Constitution the Constitutional Court has the power to review regulations and general acts issued for the exercise of public authority. Instruction No. 2 was issued by the Cultural Heritage Directorate of the Ministry of Culture and signed by the director of that Directorate, and sent directly to the museums that are responsible for the implementation of Article 135 of the Act. The purpose of this act is clearly to instruct the museums on how to implement the Act and not to regulate its content in more detail. Therefore, in terms of content, it is not an act that regulates the rights and obligations of an unknown number of addressees, but an internal act of the Ministry. Consequently, the requirements that apply to a regulation, which has the formal characteristics determined in Article 74 of the State Administration Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 113/05 – official consolidated text, and 48/09) cannot apply to the Instruction. As Instruction No. 2 is not a regulation or general act issued for the exercise of public authority, its review does not fall within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court. Consequently, it rejected the petition to initiate proceedings to review the constitutionality of Instruction No. 2 (Point 5 of the operative provisions).

19. The petitioners, who are natural persons, reported their collections on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 135 of the CHPA-1. The museum decides on the characteristics of the notified objects in the procedure carried out pursuant to this provision. It is the museum that decides whether the notified object is classified as an archaeological find or a collection of national importance. The third, fourth, and fifth paragraphs of Article 135 of the CHPA-1 also regulate how the museum should treat the notified objects. As no legal remedy is provided against the museum's decisions, Article 135 of the CHPA-1 has direct effect. As Article 135 of the CHPA-1 is substantively directly related to the other provisions that are being challenged by the petitioners, the challenged regulation directly affects their rights, legal interests, or legal position. Consequently, the first and the third petitioner have demonstrated a legal interest for the review of the challenged regulation.
20. The Constitutional Court accepted the petitions to initiate proceedings to review the constitutionality of points 2 and 3 of Article 3, the first paragraph of Article 6, Article 53, the tenth indent of the first paragraph of Article 127, and Article 135 of the CHPA-1. It is true that the first paragraph of Article 135 of the CHPA-1 ceased to have effect because the deadline set therein had already expired; however, the Constitutional Court reviewed the constitutionality of the entire Article 135 of the CHPA-1 as the content of the first paragraph is related to the other provisions of this Article. As the conditions determined in the fourth paragraph of Article 26 of the CCA have been met, the Constitutional Court proceeded to decide on the merits of the case.

B – II

21. The petitioners claim that points 2 and 3 of Article 3 of the CHPA-1, which define the terms archaeological remains and archaeological find, are inconsistent with Article 2 of the Constitution because they are unclear.
22. One of the principles of the state governed by the rule of law requires regulations to be clear and precise so that the content and the purpose of norms can be established with certainty. The requirement that a regulation be clear and precise does not entail that regulations must leave no room for interpretation. With regard to legal certainty, which is one of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law determined in Article 2 of the Constitution, a regulation becomes disputable when the content of the regulation cannot be clearly established by the rules of interpretation of legal norms (Constitutional Court Decision No. Up-679/06, U-I-20/07, dated 10 October 2007, Official Gazette RS, No. 101/07, and OdlUS XVI, 109).
23. Points 2 and 3 of Article 3 of the CHPA-1 define the terms archaeological remains and archaeological find. The term archaeological remains includes real property and movable objects that may be assumed to have been under ground or in water for a specific period of time (i.e. at least 100 years) and possess the characteristics listed in point 3 of Article 3 of the CHPA-1.<sup>5</sup> Archaeological finds are movable archaeological remains.<sup>6</sup> Archaeological remains and archaeological finds are also objects related to burial grounds, which are determined as such on the basis of the regulations governing war graves, as well as to warfare<sup>7</sup> that have been under ground or in water for at least 50 years. The key characteristics of archaeological remains and archaeological finds are as follows: the circumstances of their discovery<sup>8</sup> (on land, under ground, or in water, by excavations or by chance discovery), the minimum required age, and their importance for cultural heritage. Archaeological remains and archaeological finds include objects that are presumed to possess the characteristics of cultural heritage.<sup>9</sup> Archaeological remains and archaeological finds refer to objects that are yet to be defined as cultural heritage. Therefore, the finding that a specific real property or movable object can be classified as archaeological remains or an archaeological find does not necessarily entail that this real property or movable object also constitutes an element of cultural heritage. It is only when archaeological remains and archaeological finds have been professionally identified and registered that they become cultural heritage (the last sentence of point 3 of Article 3 of the CHPA-1). Only then can we speak of archaeological (cultural) heritage. On the basis of such finding or assessment, an entry into the cultural heritage register or a classification as a national treasure may be made or archaeological remains or an archaeological find may be declared a monument. It clearly follows from the Act that cultural heritage, which comprises several stages, including archaeological remains (Article 8 of the CHPA-1), is the subject of protection for reasons of public interest. Archaeological remains are protected in order to prevent the impoverishment of objects of archaeological value

- 5 The term archaeological remains means all objects and any evidence of human activity over different historical periods on land, under ground, and in water, the conservation and study of which would enhance existing knowledge of the historical development of humankind and its connection with the natural environment, the main sources of information of which are archaeological researches or discoveries, and which may be presumed to have been under ground or in water for at least 100 years and possess the characteristics of heritage. Archaeological remains also include objects connected with burial grounds in accordance with regulations governing war graves, and also objects connected with the more general archaeological and natural context of war, which have been under ground or in water for at least 50 years. Professionally identified and registered archaeological remains shall become heritage (point 3 of Article 3 of the CHPA-1).
  - 6 The term archaeological find means movable archaeological remains which have been under ground or in water for at least 100 years, and also arms, ammunition, other military material, military vehicles and vessels or their parts, which have been under ground or in water for at least 50 years (point 2 of Article 3 of the CHPA-1).
  - 7 In the definition of archaeological finds, movable objects connected to warfare are precisely listed: arms, ammunition, other military material, military vehicles and vessels or their parts.
  - 8 Archaeological remains usually presuppose a discovery because they primarily concern areas, buildings, and objects that are covered by soil or water.
  - 9 The term cultural heritage means resources inherited from the past which Slovenes, members of the Italian and Hungarian ethnic communities, and of the Roma community, as well as other citizens of the Republic of Slovenia, determine to reflect and express their values, identities, religious and other beliefs, knowledge, and traditions. The concept of heritage includes features of the environment which have been shaped by the interaction between people and places over time (the second paragraph of Article 1 of the CHPA-1).

that are yet to be identified as such. The measures for their protection are therefore different to the measures in place for protecting cultural heritage because their purpose is to secure their acquisition from the ground or water (at archaeological sites and through archaeological research). This entails that protection measures, the purpose of which is to permanently protect cultural heritage, can be introduced for those movable and immovable objects of archaeological origin that are registered, classified as a national treasure, or declared a monument, and therefore also constitute cultural heritage from a legal perspective. Therefore, archaeological remains and archaeological finds also include objects for which it can be established, on the basis of a professional evaluation, that they are not examples of cultural heritage.

24. The terms archaeological remains and archaeological find were not used in the previous regulations governing cultural heritage protection.<sup>10</sup> The key difference intro-

10 The regulations governing cultural heritage protection used different terms to name the objects that are part of the cultural heritage. From 1945 to 1948, the laws regulating cultural heritage protection (the Protection of the Cultural Monuments and Natural Sights Act, Official Gazette DFY [Democratic Federal Yugoslavia], No. 54/45 – hereinafter referred to as the Act/45, the General Act on Protection of Cultural Monuments and Natural Rarities, Official Gazette DFY, No. 81/46, the Protection of Cultural Monuments and Natural Sights in the People's Republic of Slovenia Act, Official Gazette PRS [People's Republic of Slovenia], No. 23/48 – hereinafter referred to as the Act/48) were using the term cultural monument. A cultural monument was an object determined as such by way of a decision. The object was required to be of cultural and historical, artistic, and ethnological importance. The Act/48 provided that cultural monuments were movable and immovable objects or groups of objects that are of historical, archaeological, cultural and historical, artistic, ethnographical or sociological importance or are characteristic of a rural environment, and especially monuments related to the NOB [the National Liberation War]. The cultural monument was only that object which was determined as such by way of a decision. The Protection of Cultural Monuments and Natural Sights Act (Official Gazette PRS, No. 22/58 – hereinafter referred to as Act/58) provided that cultural monuments were movable and immovable objects or groups of objects that are of importance to society because of their archaeological, historical, cultural and historical, sociological, ethnographical, scientific, artistic, historical and technical, or urbanistic value, and especially monuments of the National Liberation War. Due to its characteristics, the object was a cultural monument in and of itself. The Federal General Act on the Cultural Monuments Protection (Official Gazette of FPRY [Federal People's Republic of Yugoslavia], No. 17/59 – hereinafter referred to as the Act/59) provided the same definition of the term cultural monument. However, the object became a cultural monument only when a special decision was issued. The Protection of Cultural Monuments in the People's Republic of Slovenia Act (Official Gazette PRS, Nos. 26/61 and 11/65 – hereinafter referred to as the Act/61) provided that cultural monuments are movable and immovable objects or groups of objects that are of importance to society because of their archaeological, historical, sociological, ethnographical, artistic, urbanistic, or other scientific and cultural value. A special decision by which an object would obtain the status of a monument was not required. The federal Basic Act on Cultural Monuments Protection (Official Gazette SFRY, No. 12/65 – hereinafter referred to as the Act/65) provided that cultural monuments are immovable and movable objects and groups of objects that are of special significance to society due to their scientific, technical, or other cultural value. A special decision by which an object would obtain the status of a monument was not required. In 1981 the regulations began to draw a distinction between the terms cultural heritage and cultural monument. In essence, cultural heritage is synonymous with what was previously understood to be a cultural monument. An object that had the characteristics determined by law became a cultural monument, which was established by the competent authority. The Natural and Cultural Heritage Act (Official Gazette SRS, Nos. 1/81, 42/83, and Official Gazette RS, No. 26/92 – hereinafter referred duced by those terms is that both clearly focus on the archaeological origin of objects and that they also include weapons and other military material or objects connected to war graves and warfare in this context. They are new statutory terms introduced by the CHPA-1 that designate a protected preceding stage in the system for the protection of cultural archaeological heritage.

25. The terms archaeological remains and archaeological find therefore include real property and movable objects that are only presumed to constitute an element of archaeological cultural heritage. This entails that they include objects for which the authorised authorities establish by a professional evaluation that they are part of the cultural heritage as well as the objects for which it is established that they do not form part of the cultural heritage. Furthermore archaeological remains and archaeological finds that have been professionally identified and registered include objects that formed part of the cultural heritage already pursuant to the previous regulations as well as objects that became part of cultural heritage in accordance with the CHPA-1. Specific objects that are classified as archaeological remains or archaeological finds pursuant to the CHPA-1 can therefore have different statuses. These different statuses must be taken into account during the drafting of the regulation as well as in the interpretation of statutory provisions. This also applies to the provisions in the CHPA-1 that regulate the protection of archaeological remains and archaeological finds.
26. On the basis of the rules on the interpretation of legal norms, it is therefore possible to establish the clear content of both terms, and thus points 2 and 3 of Article 3 of to as the Act/81) defined cultural heritage as immovable and movable objects, groups of objects, and areas that have cultural, scientific, historical, or aesthetic value for the Socialist Republic of Slovenia or any area within its territory. Cultural heritage primarily included objects or groups of objects of historical, archaeological, artistic, ethnological, anthropological, and scientific importance documenting historical events in Slovenia; buildings and other objects that were associated with important figures from our political and cultural history; archives, archaeological sites, art and designed items, ethnological objects, old tools, devices, machines, buildings, and groups or parts of buildings that are artistically, historically, or technically persuasive; settlements and old village and city centres. Cultural heritage was protected pursuant to that Act. Objects of cultural heritage, which enjoyed special cultural, scientific, historical, or aesthetic value, were cultural and historical monuments that enjoyed special societal protection. The CHPA defined cultural heritage as areas and sites, constructed and otherwise designed buildings, objects or groups of objects or preserved materialised works resulting from the creative process and various activities of humankind, as well as social development and events that are characteristic of specific periods in Slovenia and the wider region, the protection of which is in the public interest because of its historical and cultural importance and the importance it has for civilisation as such. Heritage was defined to include in particular archaeological sites and objects; settlements, especially old city and village centres, designed landscape and cultural landscape, buildings, their parts or groups of buildings that are artistically, historically, or technically persuasive; buildings and other objects that were associated with important figures from our political, economic, and cultural history; archives; items from libraries; objects or groups of objects that are of historical, artistic and historical, archaeological, artistic, sociological, anthropological, ethnological, or scientific importance and serve as evidence of the historical events in Slovenia. An individual object was deemed heritage if it was entered into a register. Heritage that contained elements that demonstrated the continuity of cultural development and development of civilisation or a specific stage of such development, or entailed a high-quality creative achievement, obtained the status of a cultural monument ex lege or by way of a promulgation act.

the CHPA-1 are not inconsistent with Article 2 of the Constitution (Point 1 of the operative provisions). The Constitutional Court would not be required to interpret the meaning of the statutory provisions merely in order to examine their alleged lack of clarity, as it would be sufficient to establish that the content of the provisions can be determined on the basis of the rules on the interpretation of legal norms. However, the petitioners also claim that the challenged provisions interfere with the right to property. In order to review the latter, the Constitutional Court was required to interpret the content of the challenged provisions.

B – III

27. Article 33 of the Constitution protects the right to peaceful enjoyment of property. Its purpose is to ensure that the holders of fundamental rights may act freely with regard to their property. Its protective effect is two-fold. It protects a specific position of the holder of the right against authoritative interferences with his or her property, it reflects the relationship between the individual and the community, and protects the legal concept of property or the right to property. It includes the following elements: freedom to acquire property, enjoyment of property, right to dispose of property, and relying on the acquired rights. The right to property is composed of various entitlements, the content of which must be regulated by law. Therefore the substance of the constitutional concept of property is provided only by statutory regulation. The first paragraph of Article 67 of the Constitution authorises the legislature to determine the manner in which property is acquired and enjoyed in order to ensure its economic, social, and environmental functions.<sup>11</sup> The authorisation given to the legislature to determine the manner in which property is acquired and enjoyed is, however, not unrestricted. If the legislature exceeds its power, the regulation no longer constitutes a determination of the manner in which property is enjoyed, but is instead deemed an interference with the right to private property. As to where this boundary lies is dependent not only on the nature of the object owned but also on the obligations that the legislature imposed on the owner in the context of determining the manner in which to enjoy the property. Restrictions of the right to property, which are required in order for the property to achieve its economic, social, and environmental functions, 11 It is clear from previous case law that the right to property guaranteed by Article 33 of the Constitution (right to private property) may not be considered without taking into account Article 67 of the Constitution, which provides for the economic, social, and environmental functions of property. This Article of the Constitution is based on the presumption that, apart from the individualistic function, property must also have a function that serves society as a whole. The owner's right must also serve the freedom and personal development of others and society as a whole. Article 67 of the Constitution allows and obligates legislature to determine the substance of property (Decision No. U-I-40/06, dated 11 October 2006, Official Gazette RS, No. 112/06, and OdlUS XV, 70). The constitutional guarantee of property presupposes the existence of property as a legal concept. The subject-matter of private property and the protected entitlements which arise from property are determined by the legal order in accordance with the purpose of the constitutional guarantee and the economic and societal relationships in general (Decision No. Up-156/98, dated 11 February 1999, Official Gazette RS, No. 17/99, and OdlUS VIII, 118).

must therefore be assessed with regard to the specific circumstances involved.<sup>12</sup> When regulating property, the legislature must respect the fundamental value that the Constitution attaches to private property as well as the social function of property. Its task is to strike an appropriate balance between the peaceful enjoyment of property and the public interest arising from the economic, social, and environmental functions of property.<sup>13</sup> The substance of the constitutional protection of property or the substance of the constitutionally guaranteed entitlements arising from the right to property with regard to specific categories of objects may change over time, depending on the objective importance of that category of objects for the community as well as on the prevailing value that is attached to the relationship between the owner and the community. The authorisation to determine the substance of the right to property by law leads to a different statutory regulation of the right to property on specific categories of objects. Due to the different intensities with which public interest is expressed in relation to specific types of objects, there are differences in the statutory regimes governing property that apply to specific types of objects. The greater the importance of a specific type of object for the community, the greater the legislature's room for manoeuvre when regulating the substance of the right to property.<sup>14</sup>

28. The first paragraph of Article 5 in the general provisions of the Constitution provides some positive obligations of the state,<sup>15</sup> including the obligation to preserve cultural heritage. The fact that the preservation of the cultural heritage was explicitly included in the Constitution next to the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms and among the general provisions that regulate fundamental constitutional principles shows the importance of this constitutionally enshrined value. Furthermore, the special meaning of cultural heritage preservation is also emphasised in Article 73 of the Constitution, where, in addition to the state, the local communities are also obligated to promote the preservation of cultural heritage (the second paragraph of Article 73 of the Constitution). However, the first paragraph of this Article of the Constitution states that it is the obligation of everyone to protect cultural monuments that are classified as cultural heritage. Notwithstanding that the second paragraph of Article 73 of the Constitution does not explicitly refer to the law, it is clear that the state can only fulfil this positive obligation on the basis of corresponding statutory regulation. More specifically, the Constitution itself does not define in detail the substance and scope of those values which, arising out of the achievements of our forbearers, are not only of extraordinary importance for the present existence and identity of the nation, but their preservation is also invaluable for the future. The substance and scope of cultural heritage as well as the manner in which it is protected today in order to be preserved for the future generations are therefore, by their very nature, left to statutory regulation. In this context and with regard to the above-mentioned constitutional provisions, the legislature is not free to decide whether a statutory regulation is necessary, as the failure to regulate this area by law would entail a violation of the constitutional requirement determined in Articles 5 and 73 of the Constitution. The legislature is, however, free to determine within the limits determined by the Constitution the measures required to preserve the cultural heritage, that is to say the measures that ensure its protection today in order to be preserved for the future.

29. The Republic of Slovenia also has obligations arising from international law in relation to cultural heritage protection. The international community has protected cultural heritage as an expression of human development and civilisation through international legal instruments with the objective of preserving the identity of people and nations, thereby preventing the impoverishment and degradation of the cultural property and illicit trade therewith. Unique and irreplaceable cultural and natural property as part of the world heritage of humankind as a whole is protected by the Convention Concerning the Protection of the World Cultural and Natural Heritage (Official Gazette RS, No. 54/92, MP, No. 15/92, and Official Gazette SFRY, No. 56/74), which provides that inter alia “structures of an archaeological nature” shall be considered cultural heritage. Within Europe, the importance of cultural heritage is determined in the Framework Convention on the Value of Cultural Heritage for Society (Official Gazette RS, No. 22/08, MP, No. 5/08), in which cultural heritage is recognised as a resource for sustainable development and quality of life in a constantly evolving society. In order to prevent that the illicit import, export, and transfer of ownership of cultural property would hinder the understanding between nations, the UNESCO Convention obligated the State Parties to the Convention to define cultural properties of national importance (public and private). Archaeological excavations (including regular and clandestine) as well as archaeological discoveries and sites (Article 1) also fall under that definition. The UNESCO Convention also determined the scope of cultural heritage for each state (Article 4) and obligated the State Parties to the Convention to adopt statutory measures designed to protect cultural property, in particular to end the illicit trade of cultural property, to control archaeological research, to promote the development of institutions such as museums, libraries, laboratories, etc., and to establish appropriate services for the effective performance of the functions of this Convention (Article 5). Due to the importance of cultural heritage for promoting understanding between peoples, the UNIDROIT Convention on Stolen or Illegally Exported Cultural objects (Official Gazette RS, No. 23/04, MP, NO. 6/04) also regulated the procedures for the restitution and return of cultural objects between Contracting States and the payment of compensation to bona fide possessors. This Convention also considers objects that are of importance for archaeology to be cultural objects (Article 2). Cultural heritage of archaeological origin is always referred to separately in these international instruments. Thus its importance is emphasised.

30. The archaeological heritage as part of cultural heritage is the subject of a special international convention of the Council of Europe (ECPAH). Pursuant to this Convention, all remains and objects, or any other traces of human existence which bear witness to epochs and civilisations, for which excavations or discoveries are the main source or one of the main sources of scientific information, and which are located in any area within the jurisdiction of the Parties, shall be considered archaeological objects (Article 1). It obligates the Contracting Parties to institute a legal order for the protection of archaeological heritage. Among other it determines the mandatory reporting to the competent authorities by a finder of a chance discovery of elements of archaeological heritage and making them available for examination (Article 2) and the obligation of each Party to implement measures for the physical protection of archaeological heritage, making provision for appropriate storage places for archaeological remains that have been removed from their original location (Article 4).
31. With regard to the constitutional requirement of the protection of cultural heritage and the international obligations of Slovenia, the CHPA-1 was required to provide effective measures for the protection of these objects. In the CHPA-1, cultural heritage protection is based on the principles of the integrated conservation of cultural heritage, the democratic character of cultural heritage protection, respecting the rights of the owners of cultural heritage, exercising the right to inheritance, and the participation of the public in cultural heritage matters.<sup>16</sup> Chapter II of the CHPA-1 specifies the characteristics that specific movable objects, immovable objects, and other valuable items must possess in order to become the subject of protection for reasons of public interest. Article 8 of the CHPA-1 determines that such include: registered heritage, national treasures, cultural monuments, heritage protection areas, and archaeological remains. Only after it is established that the protection of the specific movable object, immovable object, or other valuable item is in the public interest, is it possible to implement the protection measures in one of the five different manners specified in the Act. The type of protection is determined by the classification of a specific immovable object, movable object, or other valuable item into a specific category of objects protected for reasons of public interest.
32. With regard to the content of the first paragraph of Article 5, the first paragraph of Article 67, and the first paragraph of Article 73 of the Constitution, the measures by which the legislature protects objects of cultural heritage can also affect the substance of the property rights of the owners of elements of the cultural heritage and the manner in which they enjoy their property. Article 73 of the Constitution serves as the basis for determining the social function of property (Article 67 in conjunction with Article 33 of the Constitution).<sup>17</sup> The CHPA-1 must therefore be interpreted as a lex

33. The petitioners claim that the challenged provisions are inconsistent with Article 33 of the Constitution.
34. Articles 5 and 6 of the CHPA-1 regulate property rights on cultural heritage. It follows from this Act that movable objects, immovable objects, and other valuable items that constitute cultural heritage, may be private or public<sup>18</sup> property. The Act is based on the principle of respecting the owners' rights. This entails that property rights and other rights in rem on cultural heritage may be restricted only to the minimum extent necessary for the protection. Those in charge of the protection must choose such measures that least restrict the owners and direct possessors of the heritage but achieve the same effects.
35. The first paragraph of Article 6 of the CHPA-1 provides as follows: "An archaeological find or archaeological remains which are movable objects and found by any person on land, under ground, or in water shall be the property of the state." Pursuant to Article 53 of the CHPA-1, anyone who holds an archaeological find or a collection of such finds is required to possess proof of their origin. Pursuant to the tenth indent of the first paragraph of Article 127 of the CHPA-1, it is considered a minor offence if a legal entity, sole proprietor or individual who independently performs an economic activity, or the responsible person of the legal entity, sole proprietor, state, regional or municipal authority, or an individual does not possess proof of origin pursuant to Article 53 of that Act. Article 135 of the CHPA-1 includes a provision on the notification of an archaeological find in the possession of a person who does not possess a certificate of origin (the first paragraph),<sup>19</sup> the provision that previous criminal conduct in relation to an archaeological find will not be prosecuted (the second paragraph), provisions on the issuing of a proof of origin together with instructions for storage (the third paragraph), the drafting of a proposal to declare the notified archaeological find a monument or collection of monuments (the fourth paragraph), the right to hold an archaeological find and to be reimbursed for the costs incurred by the storage (the fifth paragraph), and the provision that the competent ministry decides on such reimbursement (sixth paragraph).

18 The term public property is used in the sense of ownership of the state, local communities, or public law entities.

19 In Article 53 and the tenth indent of the first paragraph of Article 127 of the CHPA-1, the legislature used the term proof of origin, and in Article 135 of the CHPA-1 the term certificate of origin. It is possible to assume that the legislature inconsistently used different terms for the same thing and thus the Constitutional Court deemed both terms to mean the same.

The First Paragraph of Article 6 of the CHPA-1

36. The first paragraph of Article 6 of the CHPA-1 provides that any objects that are found by any person on land, under ground, or in water and that can be defined as an archaeological find or movable archaeological remains pursuant to the definition in points 2 and 3 of Article 3 of the CHPA-1 are the property of the state. This provision can only apply to those objects of the mentioned type that were found after the CHPA-1 entered into force. Real property and movable objects do not become cultural heritage by themselves but only if they are perceived and assessed as such by a person or a society. Therefore the type and the scope of the objects defined as cultural heritage can change in time. The legislature's task is to take into account these changes when adopting statutory regulation, and to appropriately protect objects when required. On the basis of the second paragraph of Article 73 of the Constitution, the legislature has a wide margin of appreciation when deciding which archaeological finds to protect in order to preserve cultural heritage. A change in the scope of the archaeological finds or movable archaeological remains that are defined by the Act as the property of the state that does not in itself entail an interference with the right to property, provided it refers to archaeological finds or movable archaeological remains discovered after the entry into force of the amendments to the statutory regulation. To be more specific, this authorisation does not allow the legislature to interfere with the existing ownership relations. The property right on objects that could be defined as archaeological finds or movable archaeological remains pursuant to points 2 and 3 of Article 3 of the CHPA-1, but were discovered before this Act entered into force, is entirely dependent on the legal regulation that governed property rights on these objects when they were found or appropriated.<sup>20</sup> If an individual validly acquired the right to property on an object on the basis of the regulations that had been applicable before the CHPA-1 entered into force, the first paragraph of Article 6 of the CHPA-1 cannot be understood as depriving that individual of such right to property. If the legislature were to nationalise privately owned movable objects, this would entail an interference with the right determined in Article 33 of the Constitution and would only be constitutionally admissible in exceptional cases and under the conditions determined in the third paragraph of Article 15 and Article 2 of the Constitution and against compensation. However, it is not possible to attribute such content to the first paragraph of Article 6 of the CHPA-1. Therefore, this provision does not interfere with the property right of individuals or legal entities on archaeological finds or movable archaeological remains that was validly established in accordance with the regulations in force before the enactment of the CHPA-1.
37. However, the CHPA-1 uses the terms defined in points 2 and 3 of Article 3 of the CHPA-1 in the first paragraph of Article 6 in Article 53, to which reference is made by the tenth indent of the first paragraph of Article 127 of the CHPA-1, as well as in Article 135, in which a transitional regime is established due to the entry into force of the Act. These terms are used for different situations. If individuals obtained ownership of certain objects, this right also includes the right to alienate these objects. It was therefore necessary to examine the petitioners' claims regarding the interference with the right to property also in that regard.

20 State ownership of specific cultural objects was governed by Article 12 of the Act/45, Article 9 of the Act/48, Article 12 of the Act/58, Article 49 of the Act/59, the first paragraph of Article 9 of the Act/61, the second paragraph of Article 2 of the Act/65, Article 53 of the Act/81, and Article 58 of the CHPA.

38. Taking into account the definitions of the terms in points 2 and 3 of Article 3 of the CHPA-1, the first paragraph of Article 6 of the CHPA-1 classifies all archaeological finds or movable archaeological remains as state property. This also includes objects which, after it was established that they have archaeological characteristics (which must be established on a case-by-case basis), are merely presumed to form part of archaeological cultural heritage. The legislature was correct to establish this presumption because of the constitutional requirement to preserve cultural heritage determined in the second paragraph of Article 73 of the Constitution. Undoubtedly, this presumption is correspondingly reflected in the provisions of Articles 26 and 27 of the CHPA-1 that, upon the discovery of archaeological remains, impose special obligations on the person who found the object, the owner of the land, any other person entitled to the land under the law of property, or the possessor of the land, and, in the event of construction work, also on the investor and responsible construction manager. The third paragraph of Article 26 of the CHPA-1, however, expressly provides that, after the authorised institute has completed its preliminary research and it transpires that the object in question does not constitute cultural heritage, it must return all the dispossessed movable objects to the person who found them. More specifically, in accordance with point 3 of Article 3 of the CHPA-1, only archaeological remains that have been professionally identified and registered become cultural heritage. If, after professional examination, the objects cannot be classified as such, they will be returned to the owner of the real property. However, this cannot entail that the movable archaeological remains referred to in the first paragraph of Article 26 of the CHPA-1 became state property immediately upon their discovery in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 6 of the CHPA-1. If the professional evaluation concluded that the remains did not constitute cultural heritage, the owner of the real property would again obtain ownership of the movable archaeological remains in question. Therefore, by declaring movable archaeological remains or an archaeological find that are only presumed to possess the characteristics of archaeological cultural heritage to be state property, the first paragraph of Article 6 of the CHPA-1 interferes with the right determined in Article 33 of the Constitution.
39. The first paragraph of Article 67 and Article 73 of the Constitution authorise the legislature to define the content of the right to property by law and to regulate the manner in which it is acquired and enjoyed in order to ensure its social function – in the case at issue preserving the cultural heritage. Therefore the regulation that provides that a specific part of that cultural heritage may be exclusively owned by the state in order to preserve such cultural heritage, does not entail an interference with the right determined in Article 33 of the Constitution.<sup>21</sup> The regulation that provides that objects that are merely presumed to be cultural heritage are also state property, even though a professional evaluation may later establish that they are not, no longer lies within the boundaries of determining the manner in which property is enjoyed, but is already of such character that it entails an interference with the right to private property determined in Article 33 of the Constitution.

40. An interference with a human right is constitutionally admissible only if it is based on a constitutionally admissible, i.e. an objectively justified aim (the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution) and consistent with the general principle of proportionality as one of the principles of the state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution). The Constitutional Court assesses the consistency of the challenged regulation with the general principle of proportionality on the basis of the so-called strict test of proportionality, which comprises an assessment of three aspects of the interference, i.e. an assessment of whether such is necessary, appropriate, and proportionate in the narrower sense, provided that it has established beforehand that the restriction is based on a constitutionally admissible aim (see Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-18/02, dated 24 October 2003, Official Gazette RS, No. 108/03, and OdlUS XII, 86, Paragraph 25 of the reasoning).
41. Due to the origin (i.e. chance discovery or excavations) of archaeological remains and archaeological finds, they have special characteristics which must be taken into consideration if they are to be protected effectively. As it is usually impossible to establish immediately upon discovery of a movable or immovable object whether such is part of the cultural heritage or not, it is necessary to prevent free disposition with the object already upon its discovery and to secure it. Therefore, it is only possible to ensure the effective protection of archaeological remains and archaeological finds by providing protective measures already for objects that are merely presumed to possess the characteristics of cultural heritage (i.e. before they are professionally identified and evaluated). In the opinion of the Constitutional Court, the purpose of such a measure is to ensure the effective protection of cultural objects and therefore it pursues a constitutionally admissible aim.
42. However, the regulation that with the purpose of protecting cultural heritage provides that objects that are merely presumed to be part of cultural heritage already become state property is not a necessary measure. It is evident from Articles 26 and 27 of the CHPA-1 that a milder measure is available to the legislature, which was in fact also enacted. The finder, the owner of the land, any other person entitled to the land under the law of property, or the possessor of the land, and, in the event of construction work, the investor and responsible construction manager who find archaeological remains on land, under ground, or in water are required to ensure that they are kept in good condition, at the location where they were found, and in the position in which they were found. They are required to report the finding to the Institute for the Protection of Cultural Heritage of Slovenia (hereinafter referred to as the Institute) by no later than the next working day. If the authorised person of the Institute establishes that the find can be classified as heritage, it must issue a decision on the archaeological find. This decision determines the area of the site, the nature and extent of the preliminary research, and it may restrict or prohibit any economic and other uses of the site that may endanger the archaeological remains in question. The aim of the legislature to ensure the effective protection of objects forming part of cultural heritage is achieved by this procedure and thus the enactment of an even stricter measure is not necessary.

43. In light of the above, the first paragraph of Article 6 of the CHPA-1 is inconsistent with the right determined in Article 33 of the Constitution.

Article 53, the Tenth Indent of the First Paragraph of Article 127, and Article 135 of the CHPA-1

44. The legislature was also careless when subsequently using the term archaeological find, attributing it to different situations and thereby essentially interfering with the right to property. Article 53 of the CHPA-1 introduced the requirement to possess proof of origin for an archaeological find. In the context of protective measures for protecting cultural heritage in order to preserve it and on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 73 and Article 67 of the Constitution, the legislature may impose obligations on the owners of cultural heritage which, although relatively restrictive in nature, do not constitute an interference with the right to property. To this end, it may even impose such restrictions that by their nature have already evolved into an interference with the right to property; however, even such interferences may be constitutionally admissible provided that the conditions determined in the third paragraph of Article 15 and Article 2 of the Constitution are met. If Article 53 of the CHPA-1 can be understood as requiring a proof of origin for archaeological finds or collections of such finds that are classified as archaeological cultural heritage, which is state property and may be kept by an individual or legal entity, such requirement could not entail an interference with the right to property. However, if this provision can be understood as requiring a proof of origin for an archaeological find for which it was established in the procedure carried out pursuant to Article 26 of the CHPA-1 that it is not cultural heritage and it was returned to the owner of the real property, this constitutes an interference with his or her right to property. Such interference could also be constitutionally admissible if its purpose was to achieve the traceability of all archaeological finds. However, pursuant to the CHPA-1, a violation of this provision is considered a minor offence, and it is not even entirely clear which situation is supposed to be covered by Article 53 of the CHPA-1. Furthermore, the transitional regulation in Article 135 of the CHPA-1 refers to the proof of origin determined in Article 53 of the CHPA-1.
45. The first paragraph of Article 135 of the CHPA-1 imposed on each person who was, on the day when this Act entered into force, in possession of an archaeological find as defined in point 2 of Article 3 of this Act (i.e. also an archaeological find, for which it was established in the procedure that it is not cultural heritage, and an archaeological find that was not defined as such pursuant to previous regulations) the obligation to notify a national or authorised museum thereof. In accordance with the second paragraph of this Article of CHPA-1, in such instances potential past criminal conduct will not be prosecuted<sup>22</sup> It is clear that the legislature acted in this way in the knowledge that specific objects that would have to be part of the archaeological cultural heritage already on the basis of the regulations that were in force before the enactment of the CHPA-1 had been acquired illegally. However, by using the term archaeological find it also encompassed objects that should not have been included, because the objects were either the lawful private property of the owner or they could not have been retroactively considered to constitute an archaeological find.<sup>23</sup> If, in order to define the term archaeological find, we turn not only to Article 3 of the CHPA-1 but also to the first paragraph of Article 6 of the CHPA-1, which declares that all archaeological finds are state property,<sup>24</sup> we obtain the complete framework on the basis of which the petitioners reasonably claim that the challenged provisions actually deprive them of the right to property that was validly acquired pursuant to the regulations that were in force before the enactment of the CHPA-1. The deprivation of the right to property undoubtedly entails an interference with the right determined in Article 33 of the Constitution.

46. The basis for the deprivation of the ownership right on a movable object cannot be found in Article 69 of the Constitution that governs only the expropriation of real property. The public interest does not in itself suffice for a deprivation of the ownership right on a movable object; there must exist a serious threat to constitutional values.<sup>25</sup> Therefore, the deprivation of the ownership right on movable objects is also constitutionally admissible, but only exceptionally and provided the conditions determined in the third paragraph of Article 15 and Article 2 of the Constitution are met; furthermore, the compensation for the dispossessed objects must be determined. Only in this way can such a measure also be proportionate. However, the legislature must clearly and precisely define the instances where a specific movable object is really of such exceptional importance for preserving the cultural heritage (in the case at issue archaeological heritage) that it requires an interference with an acquired right to property. Such interferences with the right to property on a movable object may only be decided on in individual procedures, in which respect of the right to property and the compensation for its deprivation are guaranteed; furthermore, all the other rights of the individual or legal entity in question, including 22 The third to sixth paragraphs of Article 135 of the CHPA-1 define in detail how archaeological finds are to be notified.

23 For example, weapons, ammunition, other military material, military vehicles and vessels and their parts, provided they were under ground or in water for at least 50 years, which are included in point 2 of Article 4 of the CHPA-1. With regard to these objects even the Government expressly claims that they did not fall under the concept of archaeological find before the CHPA-1 entered into force.

24 It must first be established in an individual procedure whether the object possesses archaeological characteristics and whether it has the characteristics of archaeological cultural heritage and is, as such, state property.

25 Summarised from G. Virant, op. cit., p. 148.

the right to judicial protection determined in the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution, have to be respected.

47. The challenged statutory regulation does not take into account the above-outlined conditions, which derive from the Constitution, and therefore entails a constitutionally inadmissible interference with the right determined in Article 33 of the Constitution and is inconsistent therewith.
48. As the Constitutional Court has established that the first paragraph of Article 6, Article 53, the tenth indent of the first paragraph of Article 127, and Article 135 of the CHPA-1 are inconsistent with Article 33 of the Constitution, it did not review the other allegations of the petitioners.

B – V

49. In terms of content, it is not possible to abrogate the first paragraph of Article 6, Article 53, the tenth indent of the first paragraph of Article 127, and Article 135 of the CHPA-1. Their abrogation would entail that objects of archaeological cultural heritage would no longer be state property, and would lead to the abrogation of these provisions also with regard to that interpretation of their content, which cannot be deemed inconsistent with the Constitution. Therefore, on the basis of Article 48 of the CCA, the Constitutional Court established their unconstitutionality (Point 2 of the operative provisions) and determined the deadline for the legislature to remedy it (Point 3 of the operative provisions).
50. As the challenged provisions thus continue to apply, except for the first paragraph of Article 135 of the CHPA1, the content of which was actually exhausted when the deadline set therein expired, in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA, the Constitutional Court determined the manner in which its decision must be implemented. In order to prevent the inadmissible prosecution of individuals for the minor offence defined in the tenth indent of the first paragraph of Article 127 of the CHPA-1 until the established unconstitutionality had been remedied, the Constitutional Court suspended the implementation of that provision during the relevant period (Point 4 of the operative provisions).

DECISION

At a session held on 15 March 2012 in proceedings to review constitutionality initiated upon the requests of the Confederation of Trade Unions of Slovenia PERGAM, Ljubljana, represented by Dr Janez Posedi, President, the Slovene Public Authorities Trade Union, Ljubljana, represented by Ivan Stošič, attorney in Ljubljana, and the Slovene Veterinaries Trade Union, Ljubljana, represented by Bojan Grubar, attorney in Maribor, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. The first to tenth paragraphs of Article 42 of the Public Sector Salary System Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 108/09 – official consolidated text, 13/10, 59/10, 85/10, 107/10, and 35/11) and Article 2 of the Act Amending the Public Sector Salary System Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 85/10) insofar as it refers to the aforementioned provisions are inconsistent with the Constitution.
2. The National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia must remedy the established inconsistency within two years from the publication of this Decision in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia.
3. The first to tenth paragraphs of Article 42 of the Public Sector Salary System Act and the Collective Agreement for the Public Sector (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 57/08, 23/09, 91/09, and 89/10) continue to apply until the established inconsistency is remedied.

*ReasoningA

1. The Confederation of Trade Unions of Slovenia PERGAM (hereinafter referred to as the first applicant) has lodged a request to review the constitutionality of the second, third, fourth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth paragraphs of Article 42 of the Public Sector Salary System Act (hereinafter referred to as the PSSSA) and Article 2 of the Act amending the Public Sector Salary System Act (hereinafter referred to as the PSSSA-O). It states that it is a representative confederation of trade unions for the entire national territory that unites representative sectoral and occupational trade unions, including trade unions that primarily unite public sector employees. It has enclosed decisions on representativeness for the national territory and for several activities. The first applicant explains, inter alia, that the challenged amendment to the conditions that are required to be met in order for a collective agreement to enter into force, or to be amended, interferes with the rights of the members of the seven representative trade unions who are signatories of the Collective Agreement for the Public Sector (hereinafter referred to as the CAPS<sup>1</sup>), and that it also directly affects the rights of civil servants who are members of the first applicant. In this way, two annexes to the CAPS (Official Gazette RS, No. 89/10) have already been concluded on the basis of the amended conditions and without the involvement of the trade unions of the first applicant; in the opinion of the first applicant these annexes interfered retroactively with the rights of civil servants.

2. It is alleged that, contrary to Article 76 of the Constitution, the PSSSA interfered with the applicable CAPS, which is an autonomous source of law. The PSSSA allegedly now provides that the collective agreement for the public sector may be amended in a manner which is different from that which was freely agreed upon by the parties to the CAPS in Article 4 thereof. It emphasises that the autonomy of collective bargaining, which is also an international standard, is a constitutional right derived from the freedom of trade unions determined in Article 76 of the Constitution. In the opinion of the first applicant, the measures through which the state unilaterally replaces the adopted and established autonomous legal norms of collective agreements limit the autonomy of collective bargaining and are inconsistent with Article 4 of the Convention of the International Labour Organization concerning the Application of the Principles of the Right to Organise and to Bargain Collectively (Official Gazette FPRY [Federal People's Republic of Yugoslavia], MP, No. 11/58 – hereinafter referred to as ILO Convention No. 98). The first applicant alleges that the challenged regulation, which interferes with the part of the CAPS regarding the obligations of the parties to the agreement, is also inconsistent with the requirement of conformity of legal acts. The first applicant further believes that all the challenged provisions that determine to the manner of establishing whether the signatory trade unions meet the conditions regarding the number of members that is required in order to conclude and amend the collective agreement for the public sector to be inconsistent with Article 76 of the Constitution. The fact that employers may count the number of members of a trade union among their employees allegedly entails an inadmissible and disproportionate interference with the freedom of action of trade unions and the freedom to join trade unions. The first applicant adds that access to the membership forms of trade union members involves the processing of particularly sensitive personal data, which is also protected by Directive 95/46/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 24 October 1995 on the protection of individuals with regard to the processing of personal data and on the free movement of such data (OJ L 281, 23 November 1995, pp. 31–50). In its opinion, the tenth paragraph of Article 42 of the PSSSA actually prevents trade unions that do not consent that their members be counted from representing their members' interests, which is contrary to Article 76 of the Constitution.

1 The abbreviation CAPS is used to refer to the specific collective agreement for the public sector that was applicable at the time the Constitutional Court decided on the case at issue. The text uses the term “collective agreement for the public sector” as a generic term for such collective agreements.

3. The first applicant points out that, on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 42 of the PSSSA, a collective agreement for the public sector could be adopted or amended by trade unions, the membership of which includes more than 40% of public sector employees, even though trade unions, the membership of which includes more than 50% of public sector employees, were opposed thereto. In its opinion, this would be illogical, undemocratic, and conceptually inconsistent with the regulation of the Representativeness of Trade Unions Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 13/93 – hereinafter referred to as the RTUA), according to which a representative trade union represents all employees to the extent to which it acquired representative trade union status. It is therefore alleged that, contrary to the RTUA and Article 76 of the Constitution, the above-mentioned provision inadmissibly and disproportionately restricts the possibilities of trade unions to represent employees' interests in the areas for which they have acquired the status of a representative trade union.
4. In its opinion, the second paragraph of Article 42 of the PSSSA and Article 2 of the PSSSAO are unclear and therefore inconsistent with Article 2 of the Constitution. The first applicant takes the view that, by adopting the challenged regulation, the legislature abused the rules of the legislative procedure and the state acted fraudulently because, by amending the law, it retroactively reduced the quorum. Therefore, in its opinion, the challenged regulation is inconsistent with one of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law enshrined in Article 2 of the Constitution, to be precise the principle that obligates bearers of authority to respect the law. Lastly, the first applicant alleges that the challenged provisions are also inconsistent with Article 155 of the Constitution, which prohibits legal acts from having retroactive effect. The PSSSA-O, which amended Article 42 of the PSSSA, allegedly amended the conditions that have to be met in order to amend the collective agreement for the public sector during the on-going negotiations [for its amendment], which indicated that the majority required for the amendment according to the CAPS will not be achieved.
5. The Slovene Public Authorities Trade Union (hereinafter referred to as the second applicant) challenges Article 42 of the PSSSA and Article 2 of the PSSSA-O on the grounds that they are inconsistent with Articles 2, 76, and 155 of the Constitution. In its opinion, both provisions affect the existing CAPS as they changed the quorum that was determined in the CAPS for amendments thereto. Such was allegedly enacted during the negotiations in order to deceive the social partners, while the conditions for the urgent legislative procedure were not met. It further adds that an “interference with the actual number of members” entails an inadmissible interference with Article 76 of the Constitution.

6. The Slovene Veterinaries Trade Union (hereinafter referred to as the third applicant) challenges the eighth paragraph of Article 1 of the PSSSA-O. It claims that it is inconsistent with Articles 38 and 76 of the Constitution. The challenged regulation allegedly requires that sensitive personal data regarding the membership in a trade union be submitted without the explicit consent of its members. The disclosure of the data regarding membership allegedly also interferes with the right of individuals to freely decide on whether or not they want to become members of a trade union.
7. The Constitutional Court served the first applicant's request on the National Assembly. The National Assembly did not respond thereto; however, the Government of the Republic of Slovenia submitted an opinion thereon. In this opinion, the Government explains that the allegations of an unconstitutional interference with the CAPS are unfounded. By referring to several positions of the Constitutional Court and the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR),<sup>2</sup> the Government deems that the freedom of trade unions, determined in Article 76 of the Constitution, does not provide for the right to effectiveness and therefore the right to conclude any collective agreement. On the contrary, in its opinion, it is possible to infer from Article 76 of the Constitution, Article 11 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR), Article 6 of the European Social Charter – revised (Official Gazette RS, No. 24/99, MP, No. 7/99 – hereinafter referred to as the ESC), and ILO Convention No. 98 that collective agreements are to be concluded freely and voluntarily. In the Government's opinion, Article 76 of the Constitution does not prevent the state from amending, without the trade unions' consent, the conditions under which the collective agreement applies to the non-signatories and non-members of the trade unions. In relation to such, the Government stresses that, according to the PSSSA (and, in particular, Articles 7 and 13 thereof), the collective agreement for the public sector applies to all employers and employees in the public sector and therefore has the same effects as a collective agreement with erga omnes applicability pursuant to the Collective Agreements Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 43/06 – hereinafter referred to as the CAA). The Government deems that only a law may determine the conditions for the erga omnes applicability of a collective agreement, meaning that it also applies to trade unions that did not sign it, to employees that are not trade union members, and for sectors from which no representative trade union participated in the conclusion of the collective agreement. As the amendments to the collective agreement for the public sector also have erga omnes effect, the same also applies with regard to determining the conditions for the applicability of the amendments. In its opinion, ILO Convention No. 98 does not apply to civil servants, and the challenged regulation is not inconsistent with the Convention of the International Labour Organization concerning the Promotion of Collective Bargaining No. 154 (Official Gazette RS, No. 46/08, MP, No. 12/08, Official Gazette RS, No. 121/05, MP, No. 22/05 – hereinafter referred to as ILO Convention No. 154), which regulates this subject matter. The Government further deems that the prescribed manner in which the quorum is determined is not inconsistent with the freedom of trade unions or with the right of individuals to freely join trade unions determined in Article 76 of the Constitution. Allegedly, it only prescribes a counting of the submitted membership forms that are returned to the trade union after the authorised person has inspected them, while it does not require that members are specifically verified by name.

2. Namely the positions expressed in Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-57/95, dated 5 February 1998 (Official Gazette Republic of Slovenia, No. 13/98, and OdlUS VII, 21), and the judgments of the ECtHR summarised therein: National Union of Belgian Police v. Belgium, Judgment dated 27 October 1975; Swedish Engine Drivers' Union v. Sweden, Judgment dated 6 February 1976; Schmidt and Dahlström v. Sweden, Judgment dated 6 February 1976.

8. The Government also dismisses the allegations regarding vagueness, the violation of the principle of legal certainty, retroactive effect, misuse of its role in the legislative procedure, and the deceit of the social partners. In its opinion, the urgent procedure in which the PSSSA-O was adopted was consistent with the Rules of Procedure of the National Assembly (Official Gazette RS, No. 972/07 – official consolidated text, and 105/10); the reason underlying this procedure was to avoid the occurrence of consequences for the operation of the state that would be difficult to remedy. Such consequences would have allegedly ensued as the collective agreements for the public sector, due to inadequate provisions regarding the adoption of amendments thereto, could not have been concluded. As a result, it would have allegedly been impossible to implement measures regarding public sector salaries for 2011 and 2012, which are crucial in terms of achieving fiscal sustainability. In the conclusion of its opinion, the Government describes in detail the negotiations with the representative trade unions regarding the salary policy for the public sector, which it initiated due to the requirement to strike a balance between salary trends in the public and private sectors and because of fiscal sustainability. Such allegedly illustrates that the state attempted to maintain social dialogue, which had been seriously jeopardised and even blocked because a specific group of trade unions was not prepared [to co-operate], and the state was therefore forced to find other solutions to facilitate further social dialogue.

B – I

9. The first applicant challenges the second paragraph of Article 42 of the PSSSA which, in a subsidiary manner, determined the conditions for concluding and amending the collective agreement for the public sector. It stated that it also challenges the third and fourth, and sixth to tenth paragraphs of Article 42 of the PSSSA. It follows from the grounds for this part of the request that the first applicant opposes the manner in which one of the conditions determined in the second paragraph of Article 42 of the PSSSA is established, i.e. the number of members of representative trade unions that signed the collective agreement for the public sector. Therefore, the Constitutional Court deemed that, in addition to the second paragraph of Article 42 of the PSSSA, the first applicant challenges all the provisions of the same article that refer to establishing the fulfilment of the condition regarding the number of members and the consequences that follow if a trade union does not give its consent thereto. Those provisions are the third and fourth paragraphs of Article 42 of the PSSSA to the extent that they refer to its second paragraph, and the sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth paragraphs of the same article of the PSSSA. The first applicant further states that it challenges Article 2 of the Act amending the PSSSA. The first paragraph of this Article determines that the provisions of the Act apply to the conclusion of a collective agreement for the public sector or amendments thereto which have been adopted after the Act entered into force. The second paragraph, however, provides that the Government shall, within three days after the Act enters into force, invite representative trade unions for the public sector to sign Annex No. 4 to the CAPS and that the provisions of the Act shall apply in order to determine if the conditions for its conclusion are met. It is clear from the content of the request that the first applicant opposes this article only insofar as it refers to those provisions of Article 42 of the PSSSA that have been challenged by this request.

10. The second applicant states that it challenges Article 42 of the PSSSA and Article 2 of the PSSSA-O. It follows from the grounds of its request that, in terms of content, it only challenges the second paragraph of Article 42 of the PSSSA, the third and fourth paragraphs of Article 42 of the PSSSA only insofar as they refer to its second paragraph, and the sixth to tenth paragraphs of Article 42 of the PSSSA. Furthermore it also challenges Article 2 of the PSSSA-O insofar as it refers to the entry into force of the aforementioned provisions.
11. The third applicant states that it challenges the eighth paragraph of Article 1 of the PSSSA-O, which constitutes the content of the eighth paragraph of Article 42 of the PSSSA.
12. The Constitutional Court joined the requests for joint consideration and decision. The Constitutional Court did not send the requests lodged in cases No. U-I-259/10 and No. U-I-51/11 to the opposing party in order for that party to respond thereto. In those two cases there are in fact no substantive allegations that have not already been included in the request in case no. U-I-249/10, of which the National Assembly was already informed.
13. On the basis of an analysis of the challenged provisions and their position within the broader legislative context, the Constitutional Court estimates that the first paragraph of Article 42 of the PSSSA, although not challenged by the applicants, also has the same constitutionally significant effect as the challenged provisions. More specifically, both, the first and second paragraphs of Article 42 of the PSSSA, enable the collective agreement for the public sector to enter into force, even though it was not signed by all the representative trade unions representing the civil servants to whom the collective agreement refers. As the first and second paragraphs of Article 42 of the PSSSA have the same effect, i.e. both determine the quorum, and as they are mutually significantly related (the provisions are subsidiary to each other), according to Article 30 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 64/07 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), the Constitutional Court expanded the proceedings for the review of constitutionality to include the first paragraph of Article 42 of the PSSSA and the other provisions related thereto. On this basis it reviewed the first to tenth paragraphs of Article 42 of the PSSSA and Article 2 of the PSSSA-O insofar as they refer to these provisions.

B – II

14. The first and second paragraphs of Article 42 of the PSSSA read as follows:

- “(1) The collective agreement for the public sector, or amendments thereto, are concluded when signed by the Government of the Republic of Slovenia and the majority of the representative trade unions for the public sector, representing at least four different public sector services.
- (2) In the event that the collective agreement for the public sector, or amendments thereto, are not concluded in accordance with the previous paragraph, the collective agreement for the public sector, or amendments thereto, may also be concluded if they are signed by the Government of the Republic of Slovenia and representative trade unions for the public sector of at least four different public sector services, the total membership of which must exceed 40% of all the public sector employees to whom the collective agreement for the public sector applies.”

15. Even though a collective agreement for the public sector is concluded<sup>3</sup> only between the Government and the groups of trade unions defined in the first and the second paragraphs of Article 42 of the PSSSA, it is binding upon not only all civil servants, regardless of whether or not they are members of the trade unions that signed the collective agreement, but also all their employers. The PSSSA thus determined erga omnes applicability of the collective agreement for the public sector, as its normative provisions have a wider effect than only on the parties to the agreement or their members.<sup>4</sup> It is true that the PSSSA does not explicitly provide for such erga omnes effect of the collective agreement for the public sector. However, the erga omnes applicability of the collective agreement derives from the provisions, in which the PSSSA defines the content and scope of the collective agreement for the public sector; the prescribed majority required for its conclusion corroborates this. The collective agreement for the public sector namely regulates how benchmark positions are determined and how they are classified into pay grades,<sup>5</sup> how the criteria for job

3 The same applies to the amendments to that collective agreement. That which applies to the conclusion of the collective agreement for the public sector also applies to its amendments, even though this is not always explicitly stated in this Decision of the Constitutional Court.

4 In this Constitutional Court Decision, the term “erga omnes applicability” (or erga omnes effect) is used in general to describe that the collective agreement is also binding upon persons and entities who are not members of the parties to the agreement, and not as synonym for the concept of erga omnes applicability of a collective agreement in accordance with Articles 12 and 13 of the CAA.

5 The fourth paragraph of Article 12 of the PSSSA thus provides that the collective agreement for the public sector determines the benchmark positions and the titles, and the first paragraph of Article 13 of the PSSSA provides that the same collective agreement determines how the evaluated benchmark positions and titles are graded. The basic salaries of civil servants are determined according to the grade into which their position or title is classified (the first paragraph of Article 9 of the PSSSA); the classification of concrete positions and titles is performed by taking into account how the benchmark positions and titles are classified (the first paragraph of Article 13 of the PSSSA).

performance are determined,<sup>6</sup> how the various allowance amounts are determined (e.g. for years of service, mentoring, specialisations, master's degrees, or doctorates),<sup>7</sup> etc. Together with the PSSSA, the collective agreement for the public sector therefore contributes significantly to determining the salaries of all civil servants. The effect of the collective agreement on the public sector regarding how the salaries for all civil servants are determined is unconditional and binding. More precisely, no agreement on a different (i.e. higher) payment from that which is agreed in the collective agreement for the public sector may be reached in a lower ranked collective agreement or an individual employment contract.<sup>8</sup>

16. The first applicant alleges that the challenged regulation is inconsistent with Article 76 of the Constitution as it inadmissibly and disproportionately restricts the possibilities of trade unions to represent employees' interests in the areas for which they have acquired representative status.
17. Article 76 of the Constitution (freedom of trade unions) guarantees the freedom to establish, operate, and join trade unions. The freedom of trade unions is therefore a special form of freedom of association, which is guaranteed by the second paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution.<sup>9</sup> This entails that the constitution framers explicitly underlined the constitutional importance of the free association of workers, i.e. an association established with the aim to set standards for workers' socio-economic rights, as well as to implement those standards and endeavour to raise them. Moreover, Article 76 of the Constitution does not form part of Chapter II, entitled "Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms", but is instead included in Chapter III, which is entitled "Economic and Social Relations". However, with regard to the content and purpose of the mentioned provision, the freedom of trade unions also constitutes a human right protected by the Constitution that may only be interfered with if the conditions determined in the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution have been met.<sup>10</sup>

6 See the second paragraph of Article 22a of the PSSSA.

7 See, for example, the second paragraph of Article 25 and Articles 26 and 27 of the PSSSA.

8 It follows from several provisions of the PSSSA that important criteria for determining the salaries of civil servants are specified by the collective agreement for the public sector (see notes 5 and 6), which entails that the same issues cannot be regulated by another (narrower) collective agreement. In addition, the third paragraph of Article 13 of the PSSSA provides that the employment contract, decision or resolution regarding a civil servant may not determine a salary that differs from that determined by statute, regulations or other acts issued on the basis of regulations, or collective agreements.

9 In the context of freedom of association, the first paragraph of Article 11 of the ECHR explicitly refers to trade unions: "Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and freedom of association with others, including the right to form and join trade unions for the protection of their interests."

10 The Constitutional Court first indicated that the content of Article 76 of the Constitution entails a human right in Decision No. U-I-57/95, wherein it interpreted this right together with the human right to freedom of association enshrined in Article 11 of the ECHR. In Decisions No. U-I-61/06, dated 11 December 2008 (Offi-

18. The freedom of trade unions with regard to their activities, i.e. the freedom of action of trade unions, is of crucial importance in the case at issue. The Constitutional Court has already held that the right to collective bargaining that is based on the free and voluntary conclusion of collective agreements, and on the autonomy of the parties to the agreement, is one of the aspects of this freedom (Decision No. U-I-61/06 and No. U-I-159/07).<sup>11</sup> The value of collective bargaining is also protected as a fundamental right by international instruments that are binding upon Slovenia. Article 4 of ILO Convention No. 98 provides that measures shall be taken to encourage and promote the full development and utilisation of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers or employers' organisations and workers' organisations, with a view to regulating terms and conditions of employment by way of collective agreements. It does not regulate the position of public servants [the text refers to Article 6 of the English text of the Convention]<sup>12</sup>, and leaves it to the state to decide on the extent to which the Convention's guarantees shall apply to the armed forces and the police. The mentioned Convention is complemented by ILO Convention No. 154, which obligates the State Parties to adopt measures to promote collective bargaining, and specifies the objectives to be achieved by these measures. It applies to economic cial Gazette RS, No. 120/08, and OdlUS XVII, 72), and No. U-I-159/07, dated 10 June 2010 (Official Gazette RS, No. 51/10), however, the Constitutional Court clearly held that the content of this constitutional provision constituted a human right.

- 11 In support of the fact that collective bargaining is a constituent part of Article 76 of the Constitution also M. Blaha in: L. Šturm (Ed.), Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije [Commentary to the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia], Fakulteta za podiplomskedržavne in evropske študije, Ljubljana, 2002, p. 750. Similarly, in relation to the German constitutional order, the Federal Constitutional Court emphasises the premise of the constitution framers, according to which the parties to a collective agreement can better align their conflicting interests than the state because the subject of regulation is more familiar to them (BVerfGE 92, 26). The freedom of trade unions is conceptualised more narrowly by the ECtHR, which wrote in its Judgment in Wilson, National Union of Journalists and others v. United Kingdom, dated 2 July 2002, inter alia, that collective negotiations are not necessary for the effectiveness of the freedom of trade unions.
- 12 Scholars interpret this term, used by the Convention, as "officials employed by the authorities of state or local administration" (see K. Kresal Šoltes, Oblastni posegi v kolektivna pogajanja [Authoritative interference with the collective bargaining process], Delavci in delodajalci, Vol. X, No. 4 (2010), p. 580) or as "civil servants in state administration" (see P. Končar in: M. Novak, P. Končar, and A. Bubnov Škoberne (Eds.), Konvencije Mednarodne organizacije dela s komentarjem [International Labour Organization Conventions with Commentary], Inštitut za delo pri Pravni fakulteti Univerze v Ljubljani and GV Založba, Ljubljana 2006, p. 59). The same follows from the Report of the Committee on Freedom of Association of the International Labour Organization with regard to the scope of ILO Convention No. 98 (329th Report, Case No. 2177/2183, para. 644, adapted from: Freedom of Association: Digest of decisions and principles of the Freedom of Association Committee of the Governing Body of the ILO, International Labour Office, Geneva 2006, p. 179, para. 892). The report emphasises, inter alia, that the mere fact that civil servants are white-collar employees does not in itself suffice to consider them employees engaged in the administration of the state; if this were not the case, the scope of ILO Convention No. 98 would be significantly narrowed. However, in the opinion of the Committee, all employees in public service enjoy the rights of collective bargaining, with the sole possible exception of the armed forces, the police, and state officials that are directly engaged in the administration of the state.

activities and enables that special modalities of the application of this Convention may be fixed by national regulation as regards “public service” [the text refers to the third paragraph of Article 1 of the English text of the Convention], and leaves the regulation with regard to the armed forces and the police to the state. The International Labour Organization Convention concerning Protection of the Right to Organise and Procedures for Determining Conditions of Employment in the Public Service (Official Gazette RS, No. 55/10, MP, No. 10/10 – hereinafter referred to as ILO Convention No. 151) promotes, inter alia, the adoption of measures to encourage and promote procedures for negotiation of terms and conditions of employment between the public authorities concerned and public employees’ organisations for all those employees to whom more favourable provisions in the other conventions do not apply. According to this Convention, it is possible to limit the extent to which the guarantees apply to the police, the armed forces, high-level employees, and those persons whose duties are of a highly confidential nature.

19. By signing the above-mentioned ILO Conventions, the state therefore undertook to recognise the right to collective bargaining in the private and public sectors. However, it may provide special modalities for the implementation of the guarantees referred to in ILO Convention No. 154 for the employees in “public service”. The state may determine the extent to which it will recognise the right of specific categories of civil servants (the police, the armed forces) to collective bargaining.
20. The second paragraph of Article 6 of the ESC obligates the Contracting States to ensure that the right to bargain collectively is exercised effectively and, inter alia, to promote, where necessary, machinery for voluntary negotiations between employers or employers’ organisations and workers’ organisations, with a view to the regulation of terms and conditions of employment by means of collective agreements. In the opinion of the European Committee of Social Rights, Article 6 of the ESC refers not only to employees in the private sector but also to public officials, taking into account the modifications that are clearly required for those who are not bound by contractual provisions, but by public-law regulations.<sup>13</sup> With regard to those persons (i.e. civil servants), the scope of the collective bargaining guarantees may therefore be limited. Those civil servants whose terms of employment are regulated to a certain extent by the law and not by an employment contract, and to whom the regular procedures of collective bargaining do not apply according to the national regulation, must have the right to participate in the adoption of the laws that regulate their position (this right derives from the first paragraph of Article 6 of the ESC).<sup>14</sup>
21. Similarly, Article 28 (Right of collective bargaining and action) of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union (OJ C 83, 30. 3. 2010, p. 389), which became legally binding when the Treaty of Lisbon entered into force, provides that workers and employers, or their respective organisations, have, in accordance with Union law and national laws and practices, the right to negotiate and conclude collective agreements at the appropriate levels.

22. Therefore, the right of trade unions to voluntarily, autonomously, and collectively negotiate with the employers' representatives on behalf of their member workers and conclude collective agreements on social and economic issues in connection to labour relations arises from Article 76 of the Constitution, if this is construed also in relation to the provisions of the above-mentioned international instruments.<sup>15</sup> The regulation of the position of workers through collective bargaining mitigates the structurally subordinate position of each worker when concluding employment contracts and, in such manner, the negotiated rights and working conditions may become relatively balanced. Consequently, it acquires greater value as it contributes to securing social justice and social peace, which are embedded in the principle of a social state (Article 2 of the Constitution), and to enhancing the democratic character of social regulation. However, there is no requirement in Article 76 of the Constitution for the state to guarantee the conclusion of a collective agreement. Such obligation would result in denying its voluntary nature, which is an essential defining element of the freedom of trade unions determined in Article 76 of the Constitution.<sup>16</sup> However, the freedom of action of trade unions obliges the state to provide for a legal framework that facilitates an effective collective bargaining system.
23. The right of trade unions to collective bargaining, which derives from the freedom of action of trade unions, thus involves several aspects. The substantive aspect delineates the range of autonomy of the trade unions and the employers. It therefore defines the subject matter that falls under the autonomy of the social partners, and the employment relationship issues that may be regulated autonomously in a collective agreement by the parties thereto. The employment relationships of civil servants are marked significantly by the fact that the employers are state or other public entities. The state is, at the same time, a bearer of authority and is required to protect the public interest. In order to achieve this objective, it must determine terms and conditions for performing a public service, measures ensuring a reasonable fiscal policy, etc. It must ensure that its competences are exercised effectively, and that the entire public sector functions effectively. Therefore it must also ensure that the freedom of collective bargaining, which includes the possibility that no consensus for the conclusion of a collective agreement is reached, does not seriously threaten the exercise of the mentioned essential functions. In this context, the employment relationships of public sector employees are, in general, by their very nature subject to wide, uni-

15 According to the fifth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, no human right or fundamental freedom regulated by legal acts in force in Slovenia may be restricted on the grounds that the Constitution does not recognise that right or freedom, or recognises it to a lesser extent.

16 In the same manner, the Constitutional Court emphasised in Decision No. U-I-57/95 that trade unions are not guaranteed the right to effectiveness as it would necessarily imply the obligation of employers to conclude a collective agreement. The European Commission of Human Rights also came to a similar conclusion in Association A v. Federal Republic of Germany, dated 14 July 1983.

lateral authoritative (heteronomous) regulation, and the substantive aspect of the autonomy of collective bargaining is accordingly limited. In particular, this applies to the employment relationships of certain categories of public sector employees (e.g. the military, police, and civil service) and for specific elements of the employment relationships (e.g. salaries). These particularities are also taken into account by the binding rules of international law. Despite such, through the PSSSA the legislature provided the possibility of autonomous collective bargaining regarding the elements of salaries for all civil servants uniformly. Therefore, in the case at issue, the Constitutional Court was not required to take a position on the question as to where the boundaries lie between the constitutionally guaranteed substantive autonomy for regulating socio-economic issues with regard to different categories of civil servants, on the one hand, and the authoritative regulation of these issues on the other.

24. The substantive aspect is not the only dimension of the right to collective bargaining guaranteed by Article 76 of the Constitution. It also protects the fundamental procedural elements of that process, such as freedom, the voluntary nature and fairness of collective bargaining. Even though the substantive aspect of the autonomy of collective bargaining, which is protected by Article 76 of the Constitution, does not necessarily require the possibility of collective bargaining on a specific subject, the legislature must, if it regulates the mechanism of collective bargaining with regard to that subject, take into account the procedural aspect of the freedom of action of trade union. Where the state envisages collective bargaining in the public sector and adopts the rules for such, the requirement of fairness in the negotiation procedure demands from the state, inter alia, that it advances its own interest as an employer in accordance with the determined rules of that process and without unjust recourse to its authoritative power. This guarantee would be infringed if the state, during a negotiation process in which it participated as a party on an equal footing with the other parties, authoritatively changed the rules governing that process in order to be able to achieve the implementation of its interests as an employer in the collective bargaining process. Such, however, does not prevent the legislature from interfering with the subject matter of the collective regulation in a time-limited manner if it assessed that this was appropriate, necessary, and proportionate, and based on constitutionally admissible grounds.<sup>17</sup>
25. An independent procedural element of the freedom of action of trade unions is the possibility of trade unions to voluntarily (i.e. in accordance with their own will) represent the interests of their members when concluding collective agreements, the substance of which may be – although perhaps not necessary from a constitutional law perspective – the subject of autonomous collective regulation. A regulation which allows for a collective agreement to be concluded, regardless of the opposition of a representative trade union which brings together civil servants whose position is regulated by such collective agreement, therefore interferes with the voluntary nature of such as an element of the freedom of action of trade unions referred to in Article 76 of the Constitution.

26. A collective agreement may also apply to employees that have not formed a trade union, if the legislature so decides. Given the content of the requests and the fact that they were lodged by trade unions, this is not subject of this review. However, the premise of the first and the second applicants that the parties to the collective agreement, the effects of which also apply by law to non-members (third parties), may themselves determine the quorum for an amendment of the collective agreement therein is erroneous. In the event that a collective agreement is more than just an autonomous regulation of the position of the parties to the collective agreement and their members, as it also determines the rights and obligations of third parties, such effects and the preconditions for such effects may, according to Article 87 of the Constitution, only be determined by law.

B – IV

27. The first and second paragraphs of Article 42 of the PSSSA allow for the salaries of civil servants to be regulated by a collective agreement against the will of a representative trade union representing these civil servants. Therefore, both paragraphs interfere with the freedom of action of trade unions determined in Article 76 of the Constitution. The Constitutional Court subsequently reviewed whether such regulation of the conditions for the conclusion (or amendment) of a collective agreement pursue a constitutionally admissible aim (the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution) and whether the limitation is consistent with the general principle of proportionality (Article 2 of the Constitution).
28. The legislature decided that specific elements of the public sector salary system shall be determined uniformly for all civil servants by way of a collective agreement for the public sector. It is possible to infer from the conclusion of the Government's opinion that the objective of the challenged regulation was to render this system effective. The effectiveness of the collective bargaining process, i.e. the creation of realistic opportunities for actually concluding (or amending) a collective agreement on the elements of the salaries of civil servants, is a constitutionally admissible aim. Social justice and social peace that are created and promoted by an operative social dialogue are undoubtedly in the public interest. The aim of the interference, i.e. to avoid demanding, ambitious conditions for the conclusion of the collective agreement that would obstruct the collective bargaining process and therefore reduce its effectiveness, is also in line with the assumed international obligations to encourage autonomous collective bargaining.
29. As the interference with the freedom of trade unions pursues a constitutionally admissible aim and is therefore not inadmissible in this respect, it is necessary to further review whether the challenged regulation is consistent with the general principle of proportionality, i.e. whether it is necessary, appropriate, and proportionate in the narrower sense.

30. The Constitutional Court deems that the interference is disproportionate in the narrower sense, without reviewing its appropriateness and necessity. When reviewing this element, the Constitutional Court assesses whether the gravity of the consequences of the interference under review with the affected human right is proportionate to the importance of the pursued aim or the benefits arising from the interference. The Constitutional Court based its assessment on the existing regulation and practice of concluding collective agreements for the public sector. It follows therefrom that representative trade unions for the public sector may participate in the conclusion of a collective agreement regardless of the level at which they are organised: as a trade union confederation, as sectoral trade unions (that are not identical to sectors within the meaning of Article 7 of the PSSSA) or even as occupational trade unions.<sup>18</sup> With regard to such, the Constitutional Court was not required to take a position in this case on whether, in the event of a different regulation of representativeness with regard to the conclusion of a collective agreement for the public sector, a trade union of a higher level were able to “outvote” the trade union of a lower level, and if so, under which conditions.
31. On the one hand, the opportunity for the representative trade unions to represent the interests of their members during the conclusion of a collective agreement that will apply to them is affected (which also affects the civil servants who have formed trade unions to represent their interests). It has to be taken into consideration that trade unions that oppose the conclusion of the collective agreement for the public sector are not allowed to participate in any further collective bargaining process in which they would attempt to negotiate for their members a different (in their opinion a more favourable) regulation of salaries from the one agreed upon in the collective agreement for the public sector. On the other hand, there is a public interest in not making the conclusion of a collective agreement on civil servants’ salaries excessively difficult. When searching for the constitutionally acceptable balance between the level of the impairment of the right of trade unions and the importance of the aim, it must be taken into account that by increasing the intensity of the interference (i.e. by increasing the number of civil servants who are represented by trade unions that oppose the conclusion of a collective agreement), the general benefit of the pursued aim diminishes (the benefit arising from the effectiveness of concluding such collective agreements). This is all the more true when a trade union that is the only one to represent a specific category of civil servants opposes the conclusion of a collective agreement. The challenged regulation therefore enables the representative trade unions, which represent a significant part of all civil servants, to conclude a collective agreement that is binding on all the civil servants, regardless of two essential circumstances. The conclusion of such an agreement is possible regardless of the fact that it is opposed by a representative trade union which is the only one uniting civil servants from a specific public sector category, to whom inter alia this collective agreement will apply. Furthermore, a collective agreement may also be concluded although it is opposed by representative trade unions which have a greater number of members who are civil servants from a specific category than representative trade unions which also represent this category and support the conclusion of the collective agreement. The right balance between limiting the possibilities of representative trade unions to represent the interests of their members when a collective agreement is being concluded and the effectiveness of the collective bargaining has thus been exceeded.

32. The first and second paragraphs of Article 42 of the PSSSA therefore entail an excessive interference with the right of representative trade unions to, according to their will, represent their members in the collective bargaining process, which is one of the dimensions of the freedom of action of trade unions determined in Article 76 of the Constitution. Consequently, they are inconsistent with this provision. All the other challenged provisions of Article 42 of the PSSSA which, in terms of content, are exclusively connected with the conclusion of a collective agreement for the public sector with the challenged majority, have therefore become irrelevant. The same applies to Article 2 of the PSSSA-O insofar as it refers to the mentioned provisions of Article 42 of the PSSSA. Therefore the Constitutional Court also established the unconstitutionality of these provisions (Point 1 of the operative provisions).
33. The Constitutional Court issued a declaratory decision as an abrogation is not possible due to the complexity of the issues regulated by the PSSSA and taking into account the premises outlined in Paragraph 30 of the reasoning of this Decision. For the same reason, it determined a longer, two-year deadline to remedy the established unconstitutionality (Point 2 of the operative provisions). During this period, the legislature will be required to establish a legal framework of collective bargaining on public sector salaries which will be consistent with the Constitution.
34. The Constitutional Court also determined the manner in which its decision was to be implemented (the second paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA). It determined that, until the unconstitutional situation is remedied, the first to tenth paragraphs of Article 42 of the PSSSA and the CAPS and its annexes continue to apply (Point 3 of the operative provisions). By doing so, it ensured that collective bargaining on civil servants' salaries will continue to be possible until the established unconstitutionality is remedied. Another reason why the Constitutional Court did not decide to establish unconstitutionality without determining the manner of the implementation of the Decision, which might have also resulted in the invalidity of the already concluded annexes to the CAPS, was that it could not foresee the financial consequences such might have had for the budget.<sup>19</sup> The manner of implementation therefore entails that the already concluded CAPS and its annexes, or any future annexes or a new collective agreement for the public sector, cannot be invalid only because of the unconstitutionality established in this Decision (Point 3 of the operative provisions).
35. As the Constitutional Court established the unconstitutionality of the challenged provisions already due to the above-mentioned reasons, it did not review other alleged unconstitutionality.

36. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision according to Article 48 and the second paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA, composed of: Dr Ernest Petrič, President, and Judges Dr Mitja Deisinger, Dr Dunja Jadek Pensa, Mag. #### DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE JASNA POGAČAR

I voted against the Decision because I do not agree with the assessment, which is based on the findings that the first and second paragraphs of Article 42 of the Public Sector Salary System Act (hereinafter referred to as the PSSSA) excessively interfere with the right of representative trade unions to represent their members during the collective bargaining process when a collective agreement for the public sector may be concluded even though it is opposed by a representative trade union which is the only one uniting civil servants from a specific public sector category and even though it is opposed by representative trade unions which have a greater number of members who are civil servants in a specific category than representative trade unions which also represent such category and support the conclusion of the collective agreement. In this dissenting opinion, I would like to present my thoughts on the subject of exercising the freedom of trade unions in the public sector.

The freedom of trade unions is a fundamental freedom regarding which the Constitution does not explicitly require that the manner of its exercise be regulated by law, and it also does not provide for any possibility of limiting this freedom. According to the general rule determined in Article 15 of the Constitution, the manner in which the freedom is to be exercised may be determined by law if such is necessary due to its nature; limitations are only permitted in order to protect the rights of others or the public interest. This rule does not prevent the legislature from regulating the issues [the regulation of which is] required in order to allow trade unions to exercise their freedom effectively in all the environments in which it is exercised. It is not possible to deny the freedom to establish and join trade unions or the freedom of action of trade unions in the public sector. However, I wonder whether it is constitutionally admissible to introduce specificities related to exercising the right to collective bargaining in an environment that is, by its very nature, fundamentally different to the private sector. This refers to the public sector within the meaning of the Civil Servants Act (hereinafter referred to as the CSA) and the PSSSA.<sup>1</sup> International labour standards allow for the exercise of the right to collective bargaining to be adapted to the way in which the public sector operates; this is demonstrated by the Convention concerning Protection of the Right to Organise and Procedures for Determining Conditions of Employment in the Public Service (hereinafter referred to as ILO Convention No. 151)<sup>2</sup> and the Convention concerning the Promotion of Collective Bargaining (hereinafter referred to as ILO Convention No. 154).<sup>3</sup> I believe that the scope of their application cannot depend on literal translations, as there is no definition of the public sector for the European area; there are only a basic framework identifying the characteristics of the public sector and standards that are applicable to its roles as an authority and service provider. The scope and the manner in which the public sector operates are, however, subject to national regulations. In this context, the public sector consists of entities that do not operate on the basis of the principles of free economic initiative, because they are required, e.g. when carrying out the responsibilities of the state, to continuously and without interruption provide public goods, as a result of which they receive public funding and are included in the fiscal system. It is evident from the reasons of the draft law on the ratification of ILO Convention No. 151 that the purpose of its ratification was its application to persons that are defined as civil servants in the CSA.<sup>4</sup> Therefore, the question arises funds, public institutions, public commercial institutions, and other entities governed by public law that are indirect users of the state budget or a local community budget. Civil servants are the persons employed by these entities governed by public law (with the exception of functionaries). Officials are civil servants in the state authorities and local community administrations.

- 2 It is evident from the Notification of the Entry into Force of the Convention concerning the Protection of the Right to Organise and Procedures for Determining Conditions of Employment in the Public Service (Official Gazette RS, No. 80/11, MP, No. 12/11) that the Convention entered into force in the Republic of Slovenia on 20 September 2011. The preamble to the Convention (the Act ratifying the Convention concerning the Protection of the Right to Organise and Procedures for Determining Conditions of Employment in the Public Service (ILO Convention 151), Official Gazette RS, No. 55/10, MP, No. 10/10) explains that the reasons for its adoption were in particular:
  - (1) considerable expansion of public-service activities in many countries and the need for sound labour relations between public authorities, acting as employers, and public employees' organisations,
  - (2) great diversity of political, social, and economic systems among member States (e.g. as to the respective functions of central and local government, of federal, state, and provincial authorities, and of state-owned undertakings and various types of autonomous or semi-autonomous public bodies, as well as to the nature of employment relationships),
  - (3) different interpretations of the content of international instruments and of the application of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949, to the public sector, and the observations of the supervisory bodies of the ILO that some member states do not apply ILO Convention No. 98 to large groups of public employees.
- 3 As regards the public service, special modalities for the application of this Convention may be fixed by national laws or national practice (the third paragraph of Article 1 of ILO Convention No. 154).

as to whether the inclusion in the public sector as such dictates that specificities be introduced,<sup>5</sup> and whether the nature of a specific position in the civil service or the content of the responsibilities involved dictates that limitations be introduced.<sup>6</sup>

When reviewing whether the second paragraph of Article 7 of the PSSSA is consistent with the second paragraph of Article 120 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court explained that the persons authorised to conclude collective agreements were limited by the PSSSA, i.e. by certain general principles or rules that must be taken into account when adopting the mentioned legal acts.<sup>7</sup> However, in case no. U-I-256/08, the Constitutional Court was not required to consider the relationship between collective bargaining and the regulation contained in the CSA and the PSSSA. In the case at issue, the applicants substantiate their allegations regarding the inconsistency with Article 76 of the Constitution with the explanation that the law should not determine the content of the collective agreement for the public sector, because the purpose of collective bargaining was to obtain more favourable rights than those determined as the statutory minimum. Such interpretation would not require an answer if the review of the Constitutional Court had remained within the boundaries of the challenged provisions of the Act Amending the Public Sector Salary System Act (hereinafter referred to as the PSSSA-O) and within the boundaries of the claims that, during the negotiations, the state authoritatively changed the rules agreed upon through social dialogue and secured a better position for itself as a social partner. By expanding the review to include the first paragraph of Article 42 of the PSSSA-O, the decision-making of the Constitutional Court departed from the review of the allegations and focused instead on the substantive issues with regard to exercising the right to collective bargaining in the public sector. However, the problem is that the initial findings and the positions that have followed these findings do not take into account the content of the CSA and the PSSSA, which determine the autonomy of collective bargaining; in fact, these findings and positions do not constitute a position on the question of whether the state excessively restricted the autonomy of collective bargaining in the public sector, but instead uncritically follow the premises and standards that have been established in the private sector. It is explained in the Decision of the Constitutional Court that the autonomy of collective bargaining is more restricted in the public sector; however, it is not explained

- 5 Article 7 of ILO Convention No. 151 provides as follows: “Measures appropriate to national conditions shall be taken, where necessary, to encourage and promote the full development and utilisation of machinery for negotiation of terms and conditions of employment between the public authorities concerned and public employees’ organisations, or of such other methods as will allow representatives of public employees to participate in the determination of these matters.” Article 9 provides as follows: “Public employees shall have, as other workers, the civil and political rights which are essential for the normal exercise of freedom of association, subject only to the obligations arising from their status and the nature of their functions.”
- 6 [The second paragraph of] Article 1 of ILO Convention No. 151 provides as follows: “The extent to which the guarantees provided for in this Convention shall apply to high-level employees whose functions are normally considered as policy-making or managerial, or to employees whose duties are of a highly confidential nature, shall be determined by national laws or regulations.”
- 7 Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-256/08, dated 18 February 2010 (Official Gazette RS, No. 16/10).

how the regulation differs in the private sector. The wording of the second paragraph of Article 1 of the PSSSA<sup>8</sup> reveals that the purpose of adopting the PSSSA was to determine a common basis in order to ensure that the system is comparable and manageable. It is evident from the legislative materials<sup>9</sup> that the key aims of the PSSSA are:

- (1) to establish a universal salary system for all civil servants and officials;
- (2) to determine appropriate ratios between the salaries of civil servants and functionaries;
- (3) to establish a flexible salary system, linking salaries to effectiveness and work performance; and
- (4) to ensure that the salary system is transparent and manageable in fiscal terms.

The issues regarding the status of specific categories of civil servants are subject to negotiations leading to the conclusion of collective agreements for a specific sector or for a specific budget user (e.g. collective agreements for RTV [i.e. the national radio and television broadcasting network]) or occupation. A collective agreement for the public sector is an agreement sui generis, as it regulates the common characteristics of the salary system as a whole. The state delegated the power to regulate the common characteristics that will ensure the comparability of salaries in the salary system to the social partners and included all representative trade unions, regardless of how they are organised, in the decision-making process regarding these common characteristics. The PSSSA determines the content of the collective agreement<sup>10</sup> and each party to the agreement may propose that other common characteristics be regulated through negotiations. The collective agreement for the public sector does not determine salaries. The salaries were also not regulated in the context of determining benchmark positions and titles; benchmark positions and titles were used in order to provide an abstract comparison between and within pay groups, which facilitated the process of determining basic salaries through the classification of specific positions and titles. However, all this has already been implemented, i.e. through sectoral collective agreements, regulations, and general acts; the collective agreement for the public sector only determined the basic salaries of those ancillary posts that are not characteristic for the sector, the budget user, or the occupation in question.

8 The first sentence of the second paragraph of Article 1 of the PSSSA reads as follows: "This act determines the common foundations of the public sector salary system, in order to enforce the principle of equal pay for comparable occupations, to ensure the transparency and comparability of pay and occupational groups, and for an incentivised reward system."

9 The draft law on the public sector salary system, which was prepared for the first reading (EPA 414), and the Information on Salaries in the Public Sector (Part II, March 2011) are published in the Official Gazette of the National Assembly, No. 9/02.

10 Pursuant to the PSSSA, the collective agreement for the public sector:- determines benchmark positions and titles, and classifies them into pay groups,- classifies positions in the J pay group into pay grades (ancillary posts for the whole public sector);- determines the amount [of funds] for rewarding job performance;- determines the criteria for determining the part of the salary based on job performance;- determines the allowance amounts to which everyone is entitled under the same conditions;- determines the adjustment of pay grade values.

In the private sector, there exists the rule that only rights which are more favourable to workers than the statutory minimum (the in favorem rule) may be determined in a collective agreement; the exceptions to this are explicitly determined. A representative trade union negotiates for the benefits of the workers it represents; the erga omnes effect of the concluded collective agreement is intended to ensure the same working conditions for all. If collective bargaining in the private sector fails, the level of rights already achieved or the statutory minimum applies. In the public sector, where according to the CSA and the PSSSA the salaries are regulated in more detail by authoritative acts and where there is considerable centralisation, there are no statutory minimum rights provided by law, and the collective agreement for the public sector replaces authoritative regulation. Representative trade unions negotiate on common characteristics regarding all civil servants to whom the collective agreement for the public sector applies,<sup>11</sup> meaning that in such negotiations it is not possible to enforce a position that does not follow the principle of comparability. In the event of unsuccessful collective bargaining, also in the public sector the existing regulation applies; however, the state is required to adopt an authoritative act in place of the missing regulation and may perhaps interfere with the existing salary regulation by means of an intervention measure.

In the public sector, the state has the role of a regulator and a social partner. I shall not consider the question of whether, in the case at issue, the state disturbed the balance between those two roles and inadmissibly interfered with the right to freedom of action of trade unions by changing the rules agreed upon through social dialogue. However, I believe that given the autonomy of collective bargaining, as regulated by the CSA and PSSSA, it is not possible to construe that the state excessively interfered with the rights of trade unions. It was agreed through social dialogue that all representative trade unions are parties to the collective agreement for the public sector. The rules to determine validity, which recognise a greater level of representativeness to those representative trade unions that jointly reach a predetermined limit of representation of civil servants to whom the collective agreement for the public sector applies, cannot in themselves restrict the activities of representative trade unions, provided they have the possibility of voluntarily and freely deciding whether to participate in the collective bargaining process and which interests, with regard to the interests of the members that they represent, they will attempt to further within the framework of the common characteristics. The absence of authoritative rules regarding the organisation of employees as parties to negotiations allows all the representative unions to participate in accordance with their will in establishing negotiating positions and in the work of the workers' negotiation group. The fact that representative trade unions act as one party to the agreement in the context of the regulation of the common characteristics requires them to act jointly, and the rules that empower specific representative trade unions or even require their members to be counted weaken their bargaining power and render social dialogue difficult. The content of the autonomy of collective bargaining, which given the applicable regulations has to be taken into account, prevents a specific representative trade union from negotiating different or better salary regulations for its members in negotiations on regulation of the common characteristics. I also wonder whether the right to freedom of action of trade unions precludes the introduction of such a social dialogue model between the employers' representatives and civil servants, the subject of which is the regulation of the common characteristics of the salary system.

Constitutional Foundations of the State

DECISION

At a session held on 11 December 2008 in proceedings to review constitutionality initiated upon the request of the Administrative Court of the Republic of Slovenia, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. The following provisions are inconsistent with the Constitution:
  - the fourth paragraph of Article 5 of the Salary System in the Public Sector Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 56/02, 72/03, 115/03 – official consolidated text, 126/03, 20/04 – official consolidated text, 70/04, 24/05 – official consolidated text, 53/05, 70/05 – official consolidated text, 14/06, 32/06 – official consolidated text, 68/06, and 110/06 – official consolidated text, 57/07, 95/07 – official consolidated text, 17/08, 58/08, and 80/08), inasmuch as it refers to judges;
  - the second paragraph of Article 10 with reference to Annex 3 to the Salary System in the Public Sector Act, inasmuch as it refers to judges;
  - the fourth paragraph of Article 44 of the Judicial Service Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 19/94, 8/96, 24/98, 48/01, 67/02, 71/04, 23/05 – official consolidated text, 17/06 and 41/06 – official consolidated text, 127/06, 27/07 – official consolidated text, 57/07, and 94/07 – official consolidated text).
2. The third paragraph of Article 25 of the Salary System in the Public Sector Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 56/02, 72/03, 115/03 – official consolidated text, 126/03, 20/04 – official consolidated text, 70/04, 24/05 – official consolidated text, 53/05, 70/05 – official consolidated text, 14/06, 32/06 – official consolidated text, 68/06 and 110/06 – official consolidated text, 57/07, 95/07 – official consolidated text, 17/08) was, inasmuch as it referred to judges, inconsistent with the Constitution.
3. The National Assembly must remedy the established inconsistencies within six months from the publication of this decision in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia.
4. The second and fourth paragraphs of Article 3, the fourth paragraph of Article 3a, the third paragraph of Article 23, the second paragraph of Article 48, and the second sentence of the fourth paragraph of Article 49c of the Salary System in the Public Sector Act, inasmuch as they refer to judges, as well as the third paragraph of Article 22b and the fourth paragraph of Article 22f of this act are not inconsistent with the Constitution.

Reasoning

A

The Applicant's Allegations

1. The applicant requests a review of the constitutionality of the second paragraph of Article 10 of the Salary System in the Public Sector Act (hereinafter referred to as the SSPSA). The applicant alleges that the challenged regulation is inconsistent with the principle of the separation of powers (the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution), as it allegedly does not ensure judges remuneration which would be comparable with the remuneration of the officials of the other two branches of power. With reference to such, the applicant also refers to the principle of institutional balance as a principle of European Union (hereinafter referred to as the EU) law, which allegedly developmentally succeeded the classical principle of the separation of powers. In the opinion of the applicant, by placing the offices of senior local court, higher court, and Supreme Court judges one salary bracket higher, the disparities between the salaries of the officials of different branches of power, established by Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-60/06, U-I-214/06, U-I-228/06, dated 7 December 2006 (Official Gazette RS, No. 1/07, and OdlUS XV, 85 – hereinafter referred to as Decision No. U-I-60/06), were nevertheless not remedied. In addition, the legislature has allegedly still not stated convincing reasons for the disputable differences. In the opinion of the applicant, the manner of electing judges and the duration of their term of office, as necessary instruments for performing judicial office, cannot justify that salary brackets for judges be determined as essentially lower than the salary brackets in which the officials of the other two branches of power are placed. The application of a management criterion thereto is allegedly illogical in light of the nature of performing judicial office and the legislature's intention. Moreover, the Government's findings regarding salary relations are allegedly not consistent with Annex 3 to the SSPSA. The applicant provides a comparison between the difficult nature of performing such office and the responsibilities of local court judges and certain other offices determined in Annex 3 to the SSPSA (e.g. the offices of state secretary, secretary general of the National Council, state attorney, deputy of the National Assembly, member of the Commission for the Prevention of Corruption, the president of the National Audit Commission). This allegedly additionally substantiates the applicant's claims that the office of a local court judge is placed too low and consequently that the challenged regulation is inconsistent with the second paragraph of Article 3 and Article 125 of the Constitution.
2. The applicant draws attention to differences between the salary brackets of position-based and non-position-based offices within the judicial branch of power, which are allegedly too great. In the opinion of the applicant, also in this part the legislature did not abide by Decision No. U-I-60/06. The legislature did indeed somewhat lessen the disputed differences, however, not sufficiently. The applicant alleges that the regulation is in this part inconsistent with Article 125 of the Constitution.

3. The applicant requests a review of the constitutionality of the fourth paragraph of Article 44 of the Judicial Service Act (hereinafter referred to as the JSA). The applicant claims that it is inconsistent with Article 125 of the Constitution, as it prohibits only the reduction of a judge's basic salary, whereas it allegedly follows from Decision No. U-I-60/06 that the prohibition against a reduction should not refer to only the basic salary. With reference to such, the applicant states that Article 52 of the SSPSA is inconsistent with Article 125 of the Constitution, if this statutory provision annulled the fourth paragraph of Article 44 of the JSA. In addition, in the applicant's opinion there exists a manifest inconsistency between the fourth paragraph of Article 44 of the JSA and the first paragraph of Article 49 of the SSPSA and thereby an inconsistency with Article 2 of the Constitution.
4. The third paragraph of Article 25 of the SSPSA which regulates the amount of the bonus for years of service, inasmuch as it refers to judges, is, in the opinion of the applicant, inconsistent with the principle of judicial independence determined in Article 125 of the Constitution, due to the fact that the reasons for the reduction are not consistent with the constitutional requirements for the reduction of judges' salaries. Furthermore, this statutory provision is allegedly also inconsistent with the principle of the protection of acquired rights determined in Article 2 with reference to the first paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution. With reference to such, the applicant states that equalizing the bonus for years of service for civil servants and for officials does not entail the legitimate aim of reducing the bonus for judges, as the positions are not comparable. Moreover, in the opinion of the applicant, when weighing constitutionally protected values for the review of the admissibility of the interference within the meaning of Article 2 of the Constitution, as regards judges, not only the acquired rights of judges should be taken into consideration, on the one hand, and the legislature's aims, on the other, but also the principle of judicial independence determined in Article 125 of the Constitution. The applicant also alleges that on the basis of the challenged statutory provision a higher reduction in the fixed part of the salary of older judges in comparison with younger judges also took place, consequently entailing indirect discrimination against older judges for which there allegedly exist no sound reasons. Therefore, this provision is allegedly also inconsistent with the principle of equality determined in the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution and with the third paragraph of Article 3a of the Constitution with reference to Council Directive No. 2000/78/EC of 27 November 2000 establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation (OJ L 303, 2.12.2000). With reference to such, the applicant also refers to the Implementation of the Principle of Equal Treatment Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 50/04 etc.) and claims that the disputable differentiation is not objectively and reasonably justified by the legitimate aim and draws attention to the significance of the knowledge and experience of the older judges with regard to the quality of the judiciary.

5. The applicant requests a review of the constitutionality of the third paragraph of Article 23 of the SSPSA, as it does not determine that judges are also entitled to an extra payment to compensate for the incompatibility of judicial office. The applicant alleges that the challenged provision is inconsistent with Article 125 of the Constitution, as the abolished extra payment which was intended to compensate for the incompatibility of judicial office was not replaced by any other fixed part of the judge's salary. Moreover, abolishing the extra payment compensating for the incompatibility of judicial office allegedly also entails an unconstitutional interference with such acquired rights. The applicant also states that the extra payment compensating for the incompatibility of judicial office is still mentioned in item c of the sixth paragraph of Article 49a and in the fifth paragraph of Article 49f of the SSPSA, which allegedly demonstrates the inconsistency of the statutory regulation with reference to this extra payment and thereby an inconsistency with Article 2 of the Constitution.
6. The applicant alleges that Article 5 of the SSPSA and the fourth paragraph of Article 44 of the JSA do not determine the harmonisation of judges' salaries with the average salary in the Republic of Slovenia or their adjustment for inflation, which is allegedly inconsistent with the principle of judicial independence (Article 125) and with the right to social security (the first paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution). The applicant proposes that the Constitutional Court also take into consideration the systemic problem of vacant judicial positions and unsuccessful judicial recruitment processes.
7. The applicant requests a review of the third paragraph of Article 22b and the fourth paragraph of Article 22f of the SSPSA concerning regular work performance and concerning work performance due to an increased workload. In the opinion of the applicant, the criteria for the payment of part of the salary for work performance are not defined in enough detail, with regard to which the applicant also draws attention to the requirement that judges' salaries be regulated by law. The applicant alleges that the challenged provisions only pursue productivity objectives. With reference to such, the applicant claims that quality criteria for the assessment of judges' work performance are also not contained in the Criteria for an Increased Workload (Official Gazette RS, No. 3/08), which was adopted by the Judicial Council. The challenged provisions are allegedly inconsistent with Articles 2 and 125 of the Constitution, whereas the fourth paragraph of Article 22f of the SSPSA is allegedly also inconsistent with Article 23 of the Constitution, as it allegedly does not ensure that cases are decided solely according to the order of precedence of cases.
8. In the opinion of the applicant, individual provisions of the challenged regulation are inconsistent with Article 125 of the Constitution also because the procedure for adopting legislation on judges' salaries is unconstitutional. In the procedure for adopting the SSPSA the Government allegedly did not reply to the representatives of the judiciary regarding their observations concerning the necessity that judges' salaries be regulated in the JSA, the unconstitutional nature of the regulation on the harmonisation and adjustment of judges' salaries, the need that salary relations between position-based and non-position based judicial offices be determined differently, and observations with reference to the regulation of work performance. The explanation of the Government concerning the proposal of the judiciary regarding the placement of judicial offices is allegedly inadequate, and the reply to the observations with reference to the regulation of a bonus for years of service for the period before the implementation of the salary system and to the observations regarding the regulation of the readjustment of salaries is allegedly contrary to the Constitutional Court decision.

9. In item E of the request the applicant states that the legislature did not comply with the standpoints of the Constitutional Court stated in Decision No. U-I-60/06, which refer to the provisions challenged under items B to D of the order granting a stay of proceedings. Therefore, there is allegedly an inconsistency with the principles of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution) and the principle of the separation of powers (the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution).
10. The applicant requests a review of the constitutionality of the second paragraph of Article 3, the fourth paragraph of Article 3, the fourth paragraph of Article 3a, the second paragraph of Article 48, and the second sentence of the fourth paragraph of Article 49c of the SSPSA. In the opinion of the applicant, it is not clear on the basis of the challenged provisions which authority or authorities decide on the individual elements of judges' salaries. Furthermore, also the regulation with reference to legal remedies against decisions on judges' salaries is allegedly not clear. The applicant alleges that the fourth paragraph of Article 3a of the SSPSA determines that a written request against a decision on the salary can be filed only after the salary has been paid, which allegedly entails that judges are not guaranteed effective judicial protection against interferences with their salaries. Moreover, the applicant states that, in accordance with this provision, only civil servants and not also officials are guaranteed judicial protection. The applicant alleges that the challenged regulation is also not clear regarding the question of the (non-)suspensive nature of legal remedies against decisions on judges' salaries. The applicant points out that the terminology of the challenged regulation lacks clarity allegedly because in the second paragraph of Article 3 of the SSPSA the legislature refers to an employment contract or an order, whereas in the fourth paragraph of Article 3 and in the second paragraph of Article 48 of the SSPSA it refers to a proposed annex to an employment contract or of an order. The applicant emphasizes that the principle of clarity is of essential importance also from the viewpoint of defining administrative tasks, thus regarding the competence to exercise administrative decisions when deciding on judges' salaries by individual acts. In the opinion of the applicant, the Judicial Council did not have a basis to assume this competence within the meaning of the first paragraph of Article 18 of the General Administrative Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 80/99 etc. – hereinafter referred to as the GAPA). A restrictive interpretation of the provisions concerning the possibility of the emergency assumption of competence is allegedly important also because it refers to the question of institutional (constitutional) balance between the three branches of power and the Judicial Council. The applicant proposes that the Meroni Doctrine be applied, which is allegedly well developed in the case law of the Court of Justice. The applicant alleges that the challenged provisions are inconsistent with Articles 2, 25, 23, and 50, the second paragraph of Article 120, and with Article 125 of the Constitution.

The National Assembly's Reply

11. The National Assembly did not reply to the request.

The Government's Opinion

12. The Government is of the opinion that it has already answered the majority of the disputable questions in its opinion provided in case No. U-I-60/06 and that the Constitutional Court should consider this opinion also in the case at issue. In this opinion the Government expressed its viewpoints only regarding certain allegations of the applicant. With reference to the allegations concerning the placement of judges in salary brackets, the Government is of the opinion that the currently valid placement of offices from different branches of power is appropriate and that this does not entail a violation of the principle of the balance of individual branches of power. The Government states that as the proposer of the law in the procedure for amending the SSPSA, in order to harmonise the law with Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-60/06, it somewhat changed the placement of judicial offices in salary brackets and at the same time additionally justified why it did not propose greater adjustments. The Government states as an additional argument for the enacted placements that the element of management must also be taken into consideration in the placement of offices in salary brackets, and that offices in different branches of power which contain such an element and those which do not must be compared separately. The different placement of the office of a minister and a Supreme Court judge can, in the opinion of the Government, be substantiated by referring to the evaluation of management, to the limited duration of the relevant term of office, and to the demanding nature and responsibility of such offices, which can also result in a recall or early termination of office. Moreover, in the opinion of the Government, not all managing positions in different branches of power are comparable, but only positions at the same level. Only judicial office at the Supreme Court level is allegedly comparable with the placement of the offices of the legislative and executive branches of power performed at the national level. The Government draws attention to Paragraph 81 of the reasoning of Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-60/06, in which the Constitutional Court allegedly already held that the organisation of courts at different levels, the manner of election, and the duration of the term of office, can influence the amount of officials' salaries. Thereby, the Government particularly emphasizes that it follows from Paragraph 80 of the reasoning of the above-mentioned decision that comparable remuneration must be ensured only to officials who have a comparable status.
13. With reference to the allegation regarding the inconsistency of the fourth paragraph of Article 44 of the JSA with Article 125 of the Constitution, the Government is of the opinion that the established unconstitutionality of this statutory provision, in accordance with which only judges' basic salary was protected against a reduction, has been remedied. It allegedly follows from the new second paragraph of Article 44 of the JSA that the legislature left the regulation of other payments judges are entitled to (in addition to a basic salary), including protection against a reduction of such payments, to the SSPSA, which, however, ensures judges protection of their nominal salary.

14. As regards the allegations of the applicant concerning the regulation of the harmonisation and adjustment of judges' salaries, the Government is of the opinion that judges' salaries in Slovenia have never been harmonised with the increase in the average salary. As a general rule, two mechanisms applied, i.e., one to the private and the other to the public sector, and judges' salaries and salaries in the legislative and executive branches of power have been harmonised with the latter. The same regulation, mutatis mutandis, allegedly also entails Article 5 of the SSPSA, which envisages the regular harmonisation of judges' salaries (once) annually in the amount agreed upon in the Collective Agreement for the Public Sector (Official Gazette RS, No. 57/08 – hereinafter referred to as the CAPS). In view of the fact that judges' salaries are a part of the unified salary system of the public sector, the unified and simultaneous harmonisation of all salaries, to which the SSPSA applies, is allegedly the only appropriate regulation.

The Applicant's Reply to the Government's Opinion

15. In the reply to the Government's opinion concerning the Government's arguments regarding the placement of offices in salary brackets, the applicant states that the Government is now repeating the reasons stated in the Bulletin of the National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia with regard to which the applicant has already taken a position in its request. With reference to the criterion of the organisation of the judiciary at different levels, the applicant states that the Government itself admits that this element does not justify such great differences in officials' salaries. In the opinion of the applicant, taking into consideration the criteria of the manner of the election of officials, the duration of their term of office, the element of management, and the organisation of an individual branch of power, would entail the replacement of the criteria of education, work experience, and the status of mutually comparable offices of different branches of power as the criteria already established by the Constitutional Court. Regarding the criterion of the organisation of individual branches of power at different levels, the applicant adds that placement in lower salary brackets with regard to lower courts are a consequence of the comparison of work experience and offices, which in the hierarchy of judicial offices are bound to judicial positions, and not a consequence of the fact whether a judge adjudicates in a narrower or broader territory. Thereby, the applicant draws attention to the fact that each judicial decision, regardless of the level at which it has been issued, entails an authoritative decision and that judicial decisions as a general rule become final and enforceable already at the level of higher courts. Moreover, the applicant adds that also judicial decisions issued by local courts have effects throughout the entire territory of Slovenia.
16. As regards the Government's opinion with reference to the allegation regarding the harmonisation of judges' salaries, the applicant states that the Government's claim regarding the unified and simultaneous harmonisation of salaries in the public sector is not consistent with the contents of the request in which the applicant drew attention to the unconstitutional nature of the regulation, as it does not ensure protection against a reduction in salaries in comparison with the average salary in Slovenia.

B – I

Procedural Issues

17. When the request was filed, the SSPSA with amendments up to and including the Act Amending the Salary System in the Public Sector Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 17/08 – the SSPSA-H) applied. After the request had been filed two additional amendments to the SSPSA were adopted, namely the Act Amending the Salary System in the Public Sector Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 58/08 – hereinafter referred to as the SSPSA-I) and the Act Amending the Salary System in the Public Sector Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 80/08 – the SSPSA-J). The amended SSPSA-I changed the regulation regarding the amount of the bonus for years of service, which the Constitutional Court took into consideration when reviewing the constitutionality of the third paragraph of Article 25 of the SSPSA.
18. First of all, attention must be drawn to the Government's opinion that it already answered the majority of the disputable questions in its opinion provided in case No. U-I-60/06 and that the Constitutional Court should take this opinion into consideration also in the case at issue. Such an over-general reference of the Government to its opinion given in a prior, albeit similar case, is not possible. In case No. U-I-60/06 numerous issues which are not connected to the case at issue were opened. Therefore, the Constitutional Court did not take the above-mentioned opinion into consideration when reviewing the case at issue.

B – II

The Review of the Constitutionality of the Second Paragraph of Article 10 with Reference to Annex 3 to the SSPSA (the Placement of Judicial Offices in Salary Brackets)

19. The applicant requests a review of the second paragraph of Article 10 of the SSPSA. It follows from the contents of the request that the applicant is opposed to the placement of judicial offices in salary brackets, which is not, however, regulated only by the above-mentioned provision. The second paragraph of Article 10 of the SSPSA namely only refers to Annex 3 to the SSPSA, which determines the placement of individual offices in salary brackets, whereas the salary brackets are determined in the above-mentioned Annex. With reference to such, the Constitutional Court deemed that the applicant in fact challenges the second paragraph of Article 10 with reference to Annex 3 to the SSPSA inasmuch as they refer to judicial offices.
20. The applicant claims that the regulation by which salary brackets for judicial offices are determined is unconstitutional. In the opinion of the applicant, there exist disproportional differences between the salary brackets for judicial offices in comparison with the salary brackets in which the legislature placed other offices. The core of the dispute refers to the question of comparability between the salary brackets of judges in comparison with the salary brackets of offices of the executive and legislative branches of power and especially in comparison with the offices of deputies and ministers.
21. A constitutional basis for a review of the allegations that the appropriate proportionality between the salary brackets of judges, deputies, and ministers is not established is the principle of the separation of powers determined in the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution and not the principle of institutional balance as a principle of EU law, which only refers to the distribution of competences between the institutions of the EU.

22. The second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution determines that in Slovenia power is vested in the people. Citizens exercise this power directly and through elections, consistent with the principle of the separation of legislative, executive, and judicial powers. The principle of the separation of powers <sup>1</sup> is a fundamental principle of the organisation of the state power. Due to the fact that this is one of the fundamental principles of the constitutional order, its full effect, especially from the viewpoint of the position and functions of the judicial power, must be understood in connection with other fundamental constitutional principles, such as the principle of democracy (Article 1) and the principle of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2). In addition, we must at all time be aware that all fundamental constitutional principles and the constitutional order on the whole serve to protect individuals' freedom <sup>2</sup> in relation to the state power. The concept of power that is limited by law, i.e. the power which functions within the frameworks and on the basis of the Constitution and particularly respects constitutionally determined human rights and fundamental freedoms, is the highest constitutional and societal value, which must be the starting point of every review of the constitutional consistency of relations between the bearers of different offices of the state power. Nevertheless, the Preamble to the Constitution, alone, as the foundation of the state and its existence, determines fundamental human rights and freedoms.

1 The principle of the separation of powers started to develop in the Era of the Enlightenment in the 17th and 18th centuries, first in England, where John Locke developed the foundations of the doctrine of the separation of powers, which was intended above all to limit sovereign, unlimited power. The theory of the separation of powers was first articulated by Charles Montesquieu, who in The Spirit of the Laws (1748) for the first time clearly distinguished between the legislative, executive, and judicial functions of the state power. He set the requirement that these functions of power must be separated from each other, and distributed between different, mutually independent state authorities and performed by different persons. The principle of the separation of powers at the constitutional level was first established in the Constitution of the United States of America in 1787, and in Europe in the first French Constitution adopted in 1791. Already in 1789 the French Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen contained the provision (Article 16) that any society in which the separation of powers is not settled has no constitution.

2 Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-158/94, dated 9 March 1995 (Official Gazette RS, No. 18/95, and Od-IUS IV, 20).

23. The contemporary understanding of the principle of the separation of powers entails that authorities which perform fundamental functions of state power are in their functioning relatively independent and autonomous in relation to other authorities such that none of them prevails. There exists a sophisticated system of mutual supervision, constraints, control, intertwined dependence, and balance.<sup>3</sup> The Constitutional Court explained the principle of the separation of powers in the same manner in Decision No. U-I-83/94, dated 14 July 1994 (Official Gazette RS, No. 48/94, and OdlUS III, 89).<sup>4</sup>
24. The separation of state power into legislative, executive, and judicial branches of power does not entail a relation of superiority or subordination, but a relation of the constraint and cooperation of equal branches of power such that each functions within the frameworks of its own position and its own competence. A starting point of the regulation of mechanisms of checks and balances between branches of power must be the constitutional equality of legislative, executive, and judicial powers.<sup>5</sup> The relations between them must be set in a manner such that the relative independence and integrity of an individual branch of power in performing its function are not endangered.
25. A fundamental function of the judicial power is adjudication. This entails that the immanent competence of judges as bearers of judicial power is to interpret and apply the law in individual cases. A classic function of courts is to decide on individuals' rights and obligations arising from their private relations and to establish the responsibility and impose sentences for criminal offences committed. From the perspective of a functional separation of powers, the judicial power is completely independent in this, while other authorities must accept and respect judicial decisions and, when

4 The Constitutional Court emphasized that it contains two important elements, i.e. the separation of individual functions of such power and the existence of checks and balances between them. The first element requires that the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of power are separated, which also entails that authorities or bearers of these individual branches of power are separated, i.e. are not the same. Absolute implementation of the principle of the separation of powers does not exist, as this would entail not only that the bearers of an individual branch of power appoint themselves and are accountable only to themselves, that they themselves determine its competence, and that they may not interfere by their decisions with the field of competence of another branch of power. In view of the above-mentioned, in systems in which there exists the principle of the separation of powers as the second element of this principle, a maxim states that between the individual branches of power there must exist a system of control and balance (i.e. the system of checks and balances), according to which each of these branches of power influences and constrains the other two, however, to a certain extent there must also exist cooperation, as otherwise the functioning of the system of state power as a whole cannot be imagined.

5 See also, F. Grad, I. Kaučič, C. Ribičič, I. Kristan, ibidem, p. 38: "The principle of the separation of powers refers to horizontal relations between state authorities, i.e. to the relations between the authorities which perform various functions of the state power at the same level, and not to the relations between state authorities of a higher and lower level." Also the Supreme Court of the USA emphasized the equality of the three branches of power when in the case of Touby v. United States (500 U.S. 160, 168 [1991]) it wrote that the principle of the separation of powers focuses on the distribution of powers among the three coequal branches. See, L. H. Tribe, American Constitutional Law, Third Edition – Volume 1, The Foundation Press, New York 2000, p. 124.

necessary, also ensure their implementation. Furthermore, the judicial power has a special position in the system of the separation of powers, as established by the Constitution. This is foremost because it is clear from the numerous provisions of the Constitution, which entail the concrete implementation of the principle of the separation of powers, including the system of checks and balances, that the judiciary has a strongly emphasized role of supervision, especially over the executive branch of power. The fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution in general already determines that judicial protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms, and the right to obtain redress for the violation of such rights and freedoms, are guaranteed, whereas the first paragraph of Article 23 gives everyone the right to judicial protection before an independent and impartial court. An important competence of courts is that they may initiate the procedure for the review of the constitutionality of a law. In accordance with Article 156 of the Constitution, if a court deciding some matter deems a law which it should apply to be unconstitutional, it must stay the proceedings and initiate proceedings before the Constitutional Court. Concerning the relationship of the judiciary towards general acts of the executive branch of power, it can be established that the courts are, in accordance with the Constitution alone, bound only by the Constitution and laws (Article 125). This entails that they are not obliged to apply the regulations of the executive branch of power when deciding some matter if they deem such to be inconsistent with laws or the Constitution (i.e. exceptio illegalis). The judiciary also has jurisdiction to review the legality of individual acts and actions of administrative authorities (Article 157 of the Constitution). Finally, the judiciary also plays the role of an arbitrator in all disputes in which one of the parties is the state. Furthermore, the Constitutional Court also has an important position in relation to the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of power, and its position and powers are determined in the Constitution, whereas the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 64/07 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the CCA) explicitly defines it as the highest body of the judicial power for the protection of constitutionality, legality, human rights and fundamental freedoms (Article 1 of the CCA).

26. The significance of the principle of the separation of powers in a contemporary democratic state is precisely in the independent role of the judicial power. Different from the legislative power, which adopts general decisions for the society (i.e. policies) and the executive branch, which in fact formulates and thereafter also implements such legislative decisions, the force of the judicial power is primarily embodied through its judicial decisions, which are supported by legal arguments that are also rational and convincing. In the system of the separation of powers, the judiciary is the legal power and therefore it is essential that judges are bound only by the Constitution and laws. Although all state authorities must respect the law when performing their functions, this is nevertheless especially the task of the judicial power, as it is precisely the judiciary that in individual cases declares what is law in a binding manner. Therefore, the functioning of the judicial power is of decisive importance for the implementation of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law determined in Article 2 of the Constitution, which requires particular sensitivity when regulating the position of the judicial power as a whole and when regulating the position of judges as bearers of this power. Judges must be ensured such a position so that the best lawyers will stand as candidates for the offices of judicial power.

27. An exceptionally important position of the judicial power within the framework of the principle of the separation of powers must therefore follow from the fact that the judicial power plays the key role in implementing the principles of a state governed by the rule of law. <sup>6</sup>The principles of a state governed by the rule of law, as determined in Article 2 of the Constitution in the most general sense, entail that state power is limited by the law and that it is carried out in accordance with the law (i.e. the rule of law). The principle of the separation of powers, which is in itself based on the separation, control, and cooperation of the three branches of power, together with the principle of limited power, which stems from the principles of a state governed by the rule of law, emphasizes the special role of the judicial power. <sup>7</sup>The meaning of the rule of law is namely precisely in that it protects individuals' liberty and their dignity. In view of the fact that the function of the judiciary is that it definitely and in a binding manner interprets legal rules, which otherwise limit the state power, it is evident that the judicial power must not only be levelled with the legislative and executive powers, but that judges must also be ensured appropriate guarantees of their independence in the performance of judicial office. The judicial power is namely a guarantor for the effective limitation of state power, thus a guarantor that the state functions as a constitutional democracy. <sup>8</sup>
28. The constitutional equality of the judicial power in comparison with the legislative and executive powers, inter alia, requires that the position of the judicial power and judges as bearers of this power is treated and regulated in an appropriately compa-

6 The principles of a state governed by the rule of law require that the functioning of the state power, of all state authorities, and other bearers of public authority is bound by law. Every authoritative act must be performed on the basis of the law and within its framework, including the Constitution as the highest legal act.

8 In Decision No. U-I-111/04, dated 8 July 2004 (Official Gazette RS, No. 77/04, and OdlUS XIII, 54), the Constitutional Court emphasized that the essence of constitutional democracy is that the values which are protected by the Constitution, and among them especially fundamental human rights and freedoms, prevail over democratically adopted majority decisions. W. Hassemer, Vice President of the Constitutional Court of the Federal Republic of Germany, in the paper “Constitutional Democracy” (Pravnik, No. 4-5/2003, Year 58, p. 214), points out that “in the concept of constitutional democracy, the adjective “constitutional” is not only a decorative adjective or a mild change of nounal meaning of the word [...]. The adjective “constitutional” in the concept of constitutional democracy entails a real interference with a noun itself. It determines nothing less and nothing more than the boundary of the democratic principle; it expresses that the review whether majority decisions are correct is from now on subject to a fundamental reservation, namely the reservation whether such decisions are in accordance with the constitution.” For more on constitutional democracy, see also, A. Teršek, Ustavna demokracija in konstitucionalizem: (evropska) izhodišča in onkraj njih [Constitutional Democracy and Constitutionalism: (European) Starting Points and Beyond], X. dnevi javnega prava, Portorož, 14–16 June 2004, Ljubljana 2004, pp. 451–474.

able manner as the other two branches of power, such that judicial independence as well as the integrity and dignity of the judicial branch of power are ensured. The Constitutional Court has already stated in Decision No. U-I-60/06 <sup>9</sup> that the requirement of the equality of the individual branches of power, which follows from the principle of the separation of powers determined in the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution, also presumes a comparable remuneration of the officials of the different branches of power whose statuses are comparable. The three branches of power must namely be equal also regarding the economic status of their officials.

29. By the challenged regulation, in comparison with the former regulation, the legislature placed the offices of senior Supreme Court judge, senior higher court judge, senior local court judge, higher court judge, and local court judge one salary bracket higher. The legislature did not change the placement of other judicial offices. Moreover, the salary brackets of deputies and ministers did not change either. The above-mentioned entails that differences between the lowest placed office of a local-court judge and the lowest placed office of a deputy or a minister are still 15 or 22 salary brackets. Such differences are still unacceptable from the viewpoint of the constitutional requirement that all three branches of power must be constitutionally equal, which must also be reflected in the relative comparability of the amount of the remuneration of their officials. Furthermore, it is not admissible from the viewpoint of the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution that the salary bracket of the office of Supreme Court judge is (still) the same as the salary bracket of the office of the lowest classified deputy.
30. The decision of the Constitutional Court regarding the inconsistency of the challenged regulation with the principle of the separation of powers cannot be influenced even by the Government's reference to a management criterion, by which it attempted to additionally justify the disputable salary relations between the bearers of the individual branches of power. By referring to the element of management it is indeed possible to justify certain differences between the salary brackets of offices where such element is explicitly present and the salary brackets of those offices where such element is not present. Therefore, reference to such element can be considered only when comparing the offices of ministers and judges. What applies to the offices of deputies namely also applies to judicial offices, namely that management is not an essential element of such offices. However, the element of management cannot be attributed too great a significance also regarding the relation between the offices of ministers and judges. It must namely be taken into consideration that such a relation concerns the officials of different branches of power, with different, but equally important, competences in the system of the separation of powers. Therefore, by referring to the element of management, which is a distinct characteristic only for the performance of the office of minister and not also judicial office or the office of a deputy, such great differences in remuneration as determined by the challenged regulation cannot be justified.

31. For the above-mentioned reasons, also such great differences between judicial offices and the offices of president or vice president of the courts cannot be justified. The differences between the starting salary brackets of the judges of individual courts in comparison with the salary brackets of the presidents of these courts are between 10 and 15 salary brackets, whereas the differences between the starting salary brackets of judges in comparison with the salary brackets of the vice presidents of courts (except at the Supreme Court, where the vice president is placed five salary brackets higher than the starting salary bracket of a Supreme Court judge) are between 10 and 13 salary brackets. The actual differences between the above-mentioned offices are that the presidents and vice presidents of courts, in addition to adjudication, also perform certain other tasks connected to the management of courts and that they assume the responsibility for managing the work of the courts. The essential differences are thus based on the above-mentioned additional competences. While certain differences are therefore justified, it cannot, however, be justified that these tasks are valued so much more than adjudication, which is the fundamental task of judges and the essence of the judicial branch of power.
32. As regards the above-mentioned, the second paragraph of Article 10 with reference to Annex 3 to the SSPSA, inasmuch as it refers to judicial offices, is inconsistent with the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution.

The Review of the Statutory Provisions concerning the Allegations on the Reduction of Judges' Salaries

33. As the Constitutional Court has already decided in Decision No. U-I-60/06, one of the fundamental guarantees of judicial independence, protected by Article 125 of the Constitution, is also the protection of judges against a reduction of their salaries during their term of office. Only a judge whose economic status is protected to the greatest extent possible can act truly independently. In this sense the above-mentioned guarantee against the reduction of judges' salaries is primarily a measure which should prevent judges from being "forced" to also think about the political acceptability of their decisions when deciding. Furthermore, ensuring that judges have a stable economic status also allows them a high degree of independence in its broadest sense (e.g. protection against pressure from political parties and the public). The protection of judges against a reduction of their salaries is namely not absolute; it does entail, however, that the reduction of judges' salaries is justified only in truly exceptional instances, on the basis of a review of the concrete circumstances in each individual case. The Constitutional Court considered the above-mentioned starting points adopted in Decision No. U-I-60/06 also when reviewing the allegations on the constitutionally inadmissible reduction of judges' salaries in the case at issue.

The Review of the Constitutionality of the Fourth Paragraph of Article 44 of the JSA (a General Provision on the Prohibition against a Reduction of Judges' Salaries)

34. The applicant challenges the fourth paragraph of Article 44 of the JSA, which reads as follows: "The basic salary of a judge may not be reduced during his term of office except in cases determined by this act". The applicant alleges that the challenged provision is inconsistent with Article 125 of the Constitution, as it allegedly only prohibits a reduction of a judge's basic salary. Thereby, the applicant questions whether the fourth paragraph of Article 44 of the JSA is applicable and states that, if it no longer applies, Article 52 of the SSPSA, on the basis of which the fourth paragraph of Article 44 of the JSA was allegedly repealed, is inconsistent with Article 125 of the Constitution. In the opinion of the applicant, due to the manifest inconsistency between the fourth paragraph of Article 44 of the JSA and the first paragraph of Article 49 of the SSPSA, there is also an inconsistency with Article 2 of the Constitution.
35. These reservations of the applicant regarding the applicability of the fourth paragraph of Article 44 of the JSA are not substantiated. The reference to the first paragraph of Article 52 of the SSPSA, which determines that the regulations on the salaries of employees in the public sector ceased to be in force on the day of the implementation of the SSPSA, i.e. on 13 July 2002, is namely not relevant from the viewpoint of the current applicability of this statutory provision. The content of this statutory provision was last amended by the Act Amending the Judicial Service Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 57/07 – the JSA-H) in 2007, which entails that, at least from then on, its applicability cannot be disputable. Moreover, there is no manifest inconsistency between this provision and the second paragraph of Article 49 of the SSPSA, as upon the transition to the new salary system the latter provision ensured judges a salary in the same amount as they had received before the implementation of the new salary system. This is thus a provision which protects judges against a reduction of their salaries and it cannot be alleged that it entails the basis for a systemic reduction of judges' salaries.
36. The applicant's allegation that the fourth paragraph of Article 44 of the JSA is inconsistent with Article 125 of the Constitution is substantiated. The Constitutional Court reviewed this regulation, which prohibited an interference only with a judge's basic salary already in Decision No. U-I-60/06. It decided that in view of Article 125 of the Constitution, it is not only a judge's basic salary that is protected against a reduction. Protection against a reduction of the salary of an individual judge, if such is intended to ensure its stability and consequently the judge's independence, must namely be understood as protection against any interference which might cause a reduction of the judge's salary which the judge justifiably expected upon assuming office. The case thus concerns the protection of a judge's basic salary and the additional salary payments which are a fixed part of the judge's salary.<sup>10</sup> The above-mentioned indeed does not entail that, in accordance with Article 125 of the Constitution, protection against a reduction of individual parts of a judge's salary as such is protected, but it entails the protection of the judge's salary as a sum of all its fixed parts (protection of the salary as a whole). Therefore, in cases involving a reduction of individual fixed parts of the salary, if the salary is increased for some other reason or if a judge is in some other manner ensured that their salary as a whole will not be reduced, there is no interference with Article 125 of the Constitution. However, if the judge's salary as a whole is reduced, this does interfere with Article 125 of the Constitution (which is admissible only in exceptional cases). A limitation of the protection against a reduction of a judge's salary to only one element of the judge's salary, as determined by the challenged fourth paragraph of Article 44 of the JSA, is therefore inconsistent with Article 125 of the Constitution.

37. The Government claims that regardless of the unaltered content of the fourth paragraph of Article 44 of the JSA, the unconstitutionality of this statutory provision was remedied, due to the fact that it follows from the second paragraph of Article 44 of the JSA that the legislature left the regulation of other parts of a judge's salary (except for the basic salary) to the SSPSA. In light of the fact that the SSPSA does not contain a provision which prohibits a reduction of other fixed parts of the judge's salary, i.e. the same prohibition as the fourth paragraph of Article 44 of the JSA determines for a basic salary, the above-mentioned allegations of the Government do not influence the decision on the unconstitutionality of this statutory provision.

The Review of the Constitutionality of the Fourth Paragraph of Article 5 of the SSPSA (the Harmonisation and Adjustment of Judges' Salaries)

38. The applicant requests the review of the constitutionality of Article 5 of the SSPSA and the fourth paragraph of Article 44 of the JSA, as they do not determine the harmonisation of judges' salaries with the average salary in the Republic of Slovenia or their adjustment for inflation. As regards the fact that the harmonisation and adjustment of salaries in accordance with the SSPSA are regulated by the fourth paragraph of Article 5 of the SSPSA, such allegations can be relevant only from the viewpoint of this statutory provision. Therefore, the Constitutional Court limited its review only to such.
39. The fourth paragraph of Article 5 of the SSPSA reads as follows: "The values of salary brackets shall be harmonised and adjusted as a general rule once a year. The amount of the harmonisation and adjustment shall be agreed on in the collective agreement

10 Such protection against a reduction naturally does not include cases in which a judge receives a lower salary because he or she is no longer entitled to various additional salary payments which judges are entitled to because they perform certain tasks (e.g. an additional payment for mentorship, and position-based additional payment) or because they carry out tasks in certain circumstances or under certain conditions (e.g. additional payments for working in less favourable working conditions and at a less favourable working time) and payments to which they are entitled to only during a period when they in fact carry out such tasks or tasks under such conditions. The same applies to possible payments for work performance.

for the public sector. The negotiations shall begin no later than 1 May and shall as a general rule be completed no later than thirty days before the deadline set for the submission of the draft national budget to the National Assembly.”

40. In Decision No. U-I-60/06, the Constitutional Court already decided that not only the amount of judges’ salaries but also their relative stability play a key role in ensuring judicial independence (Paragraph 64 of the reasoning). In the above-mentioned decision the Constitutional Court also adopted the standpoint that the prohibition against a reduction of judges’ salaries and their regular harmonisation and adjustment are equally important (Paragraph 84 of the reasoning).<sup>11</sup> The reduction of judges’ salaries, prohibited by Article 125 of the Constitution, can namely also cause a fairly significant decline of their real value. Therefore, from Article 125 of the Constitution also follows the requirement in accordance with which the legislature must envisage appropriate mechanisms which will prevent such.
41. The challenged provision indeed determines that the values of salary brackets in accordance with the SSPSA are as a general rule harmonised and adjusted once a year. However, the fact that it leaves the determination of the concrete amount of the harmonisation to the collective agreement for the public sector in fact binds the harmonisation to the conclusion of such agreement between the parties to the collective agreement for the public sector. In view of the fact that the conclusion of such collective agreement depends on the agreement of the parties to the collective agreement, whose conclusion may also be uncertain, and the fact that the judges cannot take part when such agreement is being concluded, such regulation does not meet the requirements regarding the harmonisation and adjustment of judges’ salaries mentioned in the previous paragraph of this reasoning. Therefore, for this reason alone the challenged regulation is inconsistent with Article 125 of the Constitution. Moreover, this established unconstitutionality cannot be influenced by the fact that on the basis of the fifth paragraph of Article 5 of the SSPSA a possible agreed harmonisation and adjustment determined in the fourth paragraph of this article is transferred to the law.

The Review of the Third Paragraph of Article 25 of the SSPSA (a Bonus for Years of Service)

42. The applicant requests the review of the constitutionality of the third paragraph of Article 25 of the SSPSA, inasmuch as it refers to judges. In accordance with this statutory provision, for each concluded year of service an official is entitled to a bonus in the amount of 0.3% of their basic salary. This provision ceased to be in force upon the implementation of the amended SSPSA-I. The sixth paragraph of Article 23 of the SSPSA-I namely determined that on the day of the implementation of the collective agreement for the public sector, bonuses in the amount determined by this collective agreement apply for officials. The CAPS came into force at the same time as the amended SSPSA-I, i.e. on 11 June 2008 (Article 53 of the CAPS and Article 24 of the SSPSA-I). Article 35 of the CAPS determines a bonus for years of service in the amount of 0.33 % of the basic salary for each completed year of service, whereas for women such bonus is increased by an additional 0.10 % for each completed year of service over twenty-five years.<sup>12</sup> The Constitutional Court reviews regulations which have ceased to be in force in accordance with the conditions determined for such in Article 47 of the CCA. As regards the fact that the applicant filed a request which concerns pending proceedings, such conditions are fulfilled.

11 The requirement for the regular harmonisation and adjustment of judges’ salaries also follows from paragraph 62 of Opinion No. 1 of the Consultative Council of European Judges (CCEJ), which reads as follows: “...it was generally important [...] to make specific legal provision guaranteeing judicial salaries against reduction and to ensure at least de facto provision for salary increases in line with the cost of living.” The CCEJ is a consultative body of the Council of Europe, whose acts were considered by the Constitutional Court already in Decision U-I-60/06, regardless of the fact that they are not internationally binding instruments, as an interpretative tool when determining the contents of Article 125 of the Constitution.

43. The applicant claims that on the basis of the third paragraph of Article 25 of the SSPSA judges' salaries were reduced, and such reduction is allegedly inconsistent with the principle of judicial independence, with the protection of acquired rights, and with the prohibition against discrimination on the basis of age. On the basis of the challenged provision, judges are entitled to a lower bonus for years of service than they were entitled to before the amendment of the regulation on judges' salaries in 2006. Before the above-mentioned amendment, the JSA namely determined that judges' salaries be increased by 0.5% for each year of service begun, however by no more than 20%, whereby for female judges with more than twenty-five years of service the percentage of 0.5% was increased by an additional 0.25% for each year over twenty-five years of service begun (the third paragraph of Article 46 of the Judicial Service Act, Official Gazette RS, No. 23/05 – official consolidated text). The amendment of the JSA in 2006 (the Act Amending the Judicial Service Act, Official Gazette RS, No. 17/06 – hereinafter referred to as the JSA-F) amended the regulation of the bonus for years of service so that for each completed year of service a bonus in the amount of 0.3% of the basic salary was determined (the first indent of Article 38 of the JSA-F).
44. In Decision No. U-I-60/06 the Constitutional Court substantively reviewed the same provision (the first indent of Article 38 of the JSA-F) as the third paragraph of Article 25 of the SSPSA and established that it is inconsistent with the Constitution. The Constitutional Court decided that the challenged regulation did not ensure that on its basis individual reductions in judges' salaries could not occur and that the reasons stated by the Government (i.e. the necessity to ensure funds for the remuneration of judges for their work performance and to ensure equality between civil servants and officials) cannot justify this only exceptionally constitutionally admissible reduction of judges' salaries (Paragraphs 93 to 97 of the reasoning of the above-stated decision).
45. The SSPSA was amended by the provisions of the first paragraph of Article 49 and the seventh paragraph of Article 49f. The first paragraph of Article 49 of the SSPSA determines that if a judge receives a lower salary pursuant to the determination of the salary in accordance with Article 49f of this act than the salary determined pursuant to the regulations which applied until the beginning of the calculation of salaries in accordance with this act, the difference up to the former amount of the salary shall be paid thereto until both sums are equal. In accordance with the seventh paragraph of Article 49f of the SSPSA, the amount of the judge's salary determined in accordance with the SSPSA is increased up to the amount of the salary determined in accordance with the former regulations if the amount of the judge's salary determined in accordance with the former regulation is higher than the amount of salary determined in accordance with the SSPSA. On the basis of the above-cited provisions, judges were thus ensured that the nominal value of their salaries (i.e. the fixed parts of judges' salaries) could not be reduced directly by the transition to the new salary system. In view of the fact that protection against a reduction of salaries in accordance with Article 125 of the Constitution does not refer to the protection of the individual parts of judges' salaries, but rather that this provision of the Constitution protects the judges' salaries as a whole, the Constitutional Court had to review, taking into consideration the above-mentioned provisions, whether the third paragraph of Article 25 of the SSPSA on the reduction of the bonus for years of service was still inconsistent with Article 125 of the Constitution.

12 If, in accordance with the legislation, the duration of the pension qualifying period for women and men is determined to be the same, the increased extra payment stemming from such can no longer be paid (the second sentence of the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CAPS).

46. From the above-mentioned provision of the Constitution also follows the prohibition against a reduction of judges' salaries which would be a consequence of a considerable decrease in their real value. In accordance with the fifth paragraph of Article 49f of the SSPSA, a comparable amount of the salary determined in accordance with the former regulation is considered to be the monthly salary paid before the first payment of the salaries determined in accordance with the SSPSA (i.e. the salary for December 2007), and the preservation of the real value of this amount was not ensured in any way. The above-mentioned entails that the statutory regulation protected only the nominal value of judges' salaries which judges were entitled to immediately before the implementation of the reform, whereas they were not ensured protection against a considerable reduction of their real value. Therefore, the third paragraph of Article 25 of the SSPSA, inasmuch as it refers to judges, was still inconsistent with Article 125 of the Constitution. The Constitutional Court did not separately review the sixth paragraph of Article 23 of the SSPSA-I, as it is not a subject of the request in the case at issue. However, the Constitutional Court draws the legislature's attention to the fact that the regulation determined by this provision is not essentially different than the regulation of the challenged provision which was established to be unconstitutional. This provision could be constitutionally disputable from the viewpoint of Article 125 of the Constitution already due to the fact that it leaves the regulation of judges' salaries to the collective agreement. The principle of judicial independence namely requires, as the Constitutional Court already established in Decision No. U-I-60/06, that the salary position of judges be regulated by law (Paragraphs 73 to 76 of Decision No. U-I-60/06).

B – IV
The Review of Other Statutory Provisions

The Review of the Third Paragraph of Article 23 of the SSPSA (with Reference to the Allegations on the Abolishment of an Extra Payment to Compensate for the Incompatibility of Office)

47. The applicant also requests the review of the constitutionality of the third paragraph of Article 23 of the SSPSA, as it does not determine that judges are also entitled to an extra payment to compensate for the incompatibility of their office. The applicant alleges that the challenged provision is inconsistent with Article 125 of the Constitution and that it inadmissibly interferes with the acquired rights of judges. Moreover, there is allegedly an inconsistency with that principle of a state governed by the rule of law from which allegedly follows the requirement of the consistency and coherence of the legal order.
48. The applicant's allegations that the challenged regulation is inconsistent with Article 2 of the Constitution due to manifest contradictions within the legal order are not substantiated. This inconsistency allegedly arises from the fact that an extra payment to compensate for the incompatibility of office is still mentioned in item c of the sixth paragraph of Article 49a and in the fifth paragraph of Article 49f of the SSPSA. On the basis of Article 23 of the SSPSA, it is clear that the new statutory regulation no longer provides for a special extra payment to compensate for the incompatibility of office, whereas in the above-mentioned provisions such extra payment is mentioned only in connection with the former statutory regulation.
49. Furthermore, also the allegations on the inconsistency of the challenged regulation with Article 125 of the Constitution are not substantiated. As already follows from Decision No. U-I-60/06, in order for the legislature to determine judges' salaries consistently with Article 125 of the Constitution, it must take into consideration that a salary must protect a judge against pressures which could influence his or her deciding (Paragraph 80 of the reasoning). Thereby, the legislature may not overlook the limitations for judges which stem from the incompatibility of their office with performing other offices or activities, and must appropriately take this fact into consideration when determining the amount of judges' salaries. However, it does not follow from Article 125 of the Constitution that the remuneration of judges which encompasses compensation for the above-mentioned limitations, should be expressed as a special part of the judges' salaries.
50. With reference to such, the applicant's allegations that the abolishment of the extra payment to compensate for the incompatibility of office entails an interference with the acquired rights of judges are also not substantiated. As follows from the transitional provisions of the SSPSA, an extra payment to compensate for the incompatibility of office was namely taken into account as a basis for the readjustment of the basic salaries of judges or judicial offices in salary brackets in accordance with the new regulations (the first paragraph of Article 49a with reference to item a of Article 49b and item c of the sixth paragraph of Article 49a of the SSPSA). This entails that judges were in fact not deprived of the extra payment to compensate for the incompatibility of their office with performing other offices or activities. As regards the above-mentioned, the challenged provision is not inconsistent with the Constitution.

The Review of the Third Paragraph of Article 22b of the SSPSA (Regular Work Performance)

51. The applicant requests the review of the constitutionality of the third paragraph of Article 22b of the SSPSA, inasmuch as it refers to judges. This statutory provision reads as follows: “The president of the court evaluates the work results of judges by applying, mutatis mutandis, the criteria determined in Article 29 of the Judicial Service Act.” This is a provision on the criteria for deciding whether a judge is entitled to the part of the salary for regular work performance which is also regulated by other provisions of Article 22b of the SSPSA.
52. The applicant alleges that the challenged regulation determines the criteria for the remuneration of judges for work performance which are not determined in the law or which are not determined precisely enough, whereby the applicant is especially disturbed by the fact that the provisions refer, mutatis mutandis, to the application of the criteria determined in Article 29 of the JSA. In the applicant’s opinion, this does not meet the requirement determined in Article 125 of the Constitution, in accordance with which judges’ salaries must be determined by law, as allegedly follows from Decision No. U-I-60/06. With reference to such, it must be explained to the applicant that the case at issue is not the same as was case No. U-I-60/06, in which the legislature left the regulation of the criteria for the remuneration of judges for work performance to executive regulations or collective agreements and to which the Constitutional Court referred in the conclusion of the above-mentioned case, wherein it stated that judges’ salaries must be determined by law. The challenged regulation namely does not determine that the criteria for the remuneration of regular work performance be regulated by an executive act, but it determines that the criteria determined in Article 29 of the JSA be applied mutatis mutandis, hence it determines the application of another law which determines such criteria. The applicant’s allegations that because of this (merely) mutatis mutandis application there were various applications of the criteria in practice, could be important from the viewpoint of Article 2 of the Constitution, from which follows the requirement that statutory provisions must be clear and defined. However, such allegations are not substantiated. The instruction for mutatis mutandis application namely does not entail anything other than the requirement that the regulations must be interpreted, which is not inconsistent with this constitutional provision. With reference to such, also the applicant’s allegations that such criteria will be applied by different authorities is not substantiated. The uniform interpretation of the regulations is namely ensured in proceeding with legal remedies, which entails that the allegations on the unconstitutional nature of the challenged regulation cannot be substantiated by using this argument. From the viewpoint of the consistency of the challenged regulation with the Constitution, also the applicant’s allegations that the legislature should authorise the Judicial Council to determine the disputable criteria are not substantiated due to the fact that this concerns a question of the appropriateness of the regulation, which is not a constitutional matter.

53. The applicant's allegations that there are no quality criteria among the criteria for the remuneration of judges for work performance could be considered from the viewpoint of Article 125 of the Constitution. As the Constitutional Court has already reasoned in Decision No. U-I-60/06, the remuneration of judges for work performance which was only directed towards greater productivity, would not be consistent with this provision of the Constitution. However, the applicant's allegations that Article 29 of the JSA contains merely quantitative criteria are not true. Among the criteria for evaluating judges' performance, Article 29 of the JSA namely also determines professional knowledge, the ability to resolve questions of law, the protection of the judge's and court's reputation, and abilities with regard to oral and written expression. When applying the above-mentioned criteria, the evaluation of the judge's work cannot be directed only towards the evaluation of the number of concluded cases, but also the quality of the judge's work must be taken into consideration.
54. As regards the above-mentioned, the third paragraph of Article 22b of the SSPSA is not inconsistent with Articles 2 and 125 of the Constitution.

The Review of the Fourth Paragraph of Article 22f of the SSPSA (Work Performance with Regard to an Increased Workload)

55. The applicant requests a review of the constitutionality of the fourth paragraph of Article 22f of the SSPSA. It is a provision which refers to remuneration for the work performance of judges due to them having an increased workload, which in the challenged part reads as follows: "The Judicial Council shall determine in detail the conditions, criteria, and the scope of the remuneration for work performance with regard to an increased workload, whereas such must be determined so that in addition to the number of concluded cases, also the nature of the case, how long it has been pending, and the type of case, as well as the level of knowledge and experience needed for deciding, are taken into consideration."
56. The applicant alleges that the challenged provision is inconsistent with Articles 125 and 2 of the Constitution, due to the fact that it does not define the criteria for the remuneration of judges for work performance by a law, nor does it determine such in sufficient detail, that it does not bind the remuneration for having an increased workload to qualitative criteria (in the sense of being entitled to remuneration depending on the share of abrogated, upheld, and modified judicial decisions), and that, taking into account the agreed time-limit for terminating the assumed work, it does not protect judges against excessive pressures with reference to expectations regarding the anticipated workload. The applicant furthermore alleges that the challenged provision does not ensure that cases are dealt with in accordance with the order of precedence of cases, which is allegedly inconsistent with the constitutional requirements of an independent, impartial, and natural judge, which allegedly stem from Articles 23 and 125 of the Constitution. The applicant states that also the Criteria for the Increased Workload, which were adopted by the Judicial Council, are inconsistent with the Constitution.

57. The criteria in the challenged regulation for the remuneration of work performance for having an increased workload are determined in sufficient detail in order to enable a more detailed analysis of the statutory regulation in the executive act. Therefore, the allegations on the inconsistency of the challenged regulation with Article 2 of the Constitution are not substantiated. Also the allegation that the challenged provision is inconsistent with Article 125 of the Constitution, as such regulation allegedly entails the mere encouragement of the productivity of judges, is not substantiated. When determining the criteria for remuneration due to an increased workload, other criteria in addition to the number of concluded cases must as well be taken into consideration (i.e. the nature of the case, how long it has been pending, the type of case, and the demonstrated level of knowledge and experience of the judge). From these criteria there follows the clear intention of the legislature that when such remuneration is determined due to an increased workload, not only the mere number of concluded cases may be taken into consideration, but also their significance and the quality of the judge's work. Within the framework of the above-mentioned criteria, also the portion of abrogated, upheld, and modified judicial decisions can be taken into consideration, which should, in the opinion of the applicant, be one of the criteria for the evaluation of a judge's work performance. In addition, it does not follow from the statutory regulation of the remuneration for work performance for having an increased workload that judges bind themselves in the agreement on an increased workload that they will decide cases assigned to them on such a basis within a certain period of time. The above-mentioned thus entails that the applicant's allegations on the inconsistency of the fourth paragraph of Article 22f of the SSPSA with Article 125 of the Constitution are not substantiated. The possible unconstitutionality of the Criteria for the Increased Workload, as an executive regulation by which the Judicial Council analysed the statutory regulation in more detail, is not a subject of constitutional review in the case at issue.
58. Furthermore, the applicant's allegation on the inconsistency of the challenged provision with Articles 23 and 125 of the Constitution is also not substantiated; the applicant alleges that such does not ensure that cases are dealt with in accordance with the order of precedence of cases, which is allegedly inconsistent with the constitutional requirements for an independent, impartial, and natural judge. Although this is not particularly determined by the challenged provision, it is nevertheless clear that the application of the institution of the remuneration of judges for an increased workload cannot result in the order of precedence when considering cases being abused. The possible violations of these rules, which might take place in practice, cannot substantiate the allegations on the unconstitutionality of the challenged regulation. As regards the above-mentioned, the challenged provision is not inconsistent with Articles 2, 23, and 125 of the Constitution.

B – V

The Review of the Allegations that the Constitutional Court Decision has not been Respected

59. In item E of the request, the applicant states that the legislature has not respected the standpoints of the Constitutional Court expressed in Decision No. U-I-60/06, which refer to provisions challenged under items B to D of the order granting a stay of proceedings or the request. Therefore, there is an inconsistency with the principles of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution) and the principle of the separation of powers (the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution).
60. In Decision No. U-I-60/06 the Constitutional Court established the unconstitutionality of certain statutory provisions, and, in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 48 of the CCA, determined a period of time within which the legislature must remedy such. The principles of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution) and the principle of the separation of powers (the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution) require, inter alia, that each of the branches of power performs their powers and can be held to account for the (non)performance of such. If the legislature does not respond to the Constitutional Court decision, which is binding on the legislature (the third paragraph of Article 1 of the CCA), within the period of time determined by the Constitutional Court for it to remedy the established inconsistencies and does not try to remedy the inconsistencies, the legislature thereby violates Article 2 and the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution.<sup>13</sup> The legislature responded to the Constitutional Court decision by adopting a new statutory regulation. Therefore, such does not evidence a violation of the above-mentioned constitutional provisions merely from this point of view. The new statutory regulation is the subject of the constitutional review at issue – i.e. the review of its consistency with the Constitution. However, it is evident that also this time the legislature regulated individual issues inconsistently with the Constitution, which the Constitutional Court is hereby establishing by this decision.

The Review of the Allegations on the Unconstitutionality of the Regulation of the Procedure for Issuing Individual Decisions on Salaries

61. The applicant also requests the review of the constitutionality of the second paragraph of Article 3, the fourth paragraph of Article 3, the fourth paragraph of Article 3a, the second paragraph of Article 48, and the second sentence of the fourth paragraph of Article 49c, as provisions by which the procedure for issuing individual decisions on determining judges' salaries upon the transition to the new salary system is allegedly determined. The applicant alleges that the challenged provisions are not clear and thereby they are inconsistent with Article 2 and the second paragraph of Article 120 of the Constitution, and consequently they are also inconsistent with Articles 23 and

13 Cf., Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-114/95, dated 7 December 1995 (Official Gazette RS, No. 8/96, and OdlUS IV, 120).

- 25, with the first paragraph of Article 50, and Article 125 of the Constitution. The applicant also refers to the violation of the principle of institutional balance in EU law.
- 62. The foremost allegation of the applicant with reference to the challenged provisions is that they are not clear. Upon reviewing these allegations, the Constitutional Court did not particularly consider the question of which of the above-mentioned constitutional provisions could be relevant regarding such allegations. A prerequisite for considering the unconstitutionality of the regulation due to its unclear nature from the perspective of any of the above-mentioned constitutional provisions is that the regulation cannot be interpreted with the established methods of interpretation, which, as will be explained below, the applicant did not demonstrate regarding the challenged provisions.
- 63. In the opinion of the applicant it is not clear on the basis of the challenged provisions which authority or authorities decide on the individual elements of judges' salaries. The applicant states that it can be established by means of the methods of interpretation that the Judicial Council must, upon the readjustment of salaries, first issue to individual judges a decision on the their placement in salary brackets, whereas all other elements of the salary must be decided by some other authority, however, it is not clear which authority. With reference to such, the applicant states that it follows from the second paragraph of Article 48 of the SSPSA that the employer must determine the judge's salary and that this is not the Judicial Council. It follows from the above-mentioned that by interpreting the regulations, the applicant clearly came to the conclusion that the Judicial Council is competent to issue a decision on the readjustment of the judges' salaries and on the placement of judges into new salary brackets, whereas the other elements of judges' salaries in accordance with the SSPSA should be decided by the employer or by an agent exercising rights and obligations in relation to judges on the employer's behalf. As regards the above-mentioned, what is not at issue here is the unclear nature of regulations which cannot be resolved by means of interpretation. The applicant's allegations on the inappropriate nature of the challenged regulation are not relevant from the viewpoint of the review of its consistency with the Constitution.
- 64. The same applies for the applicant's allegations on the unclear nature of the regulation with reference to the legal remedies which are available to judges against decisions by which their salaries are determined. As regards the applicant's allegations that legal remedies against the Judicial Council's decisions are determined in Article 25 of the JSA, whereas legal remedies against decisions on salaries issued on the basis of the SSPSA are regulated in Article 3a of the SSPSA, it is evident that the applicant did succeed in giving grounds for the regulation also in this part. As follows from the applicant's further allegations, the essence of the applicant's allegations with reference to the challenged regulation is that the applicant does not agree with such regulation of legal remedies. In the opinion of the applicant, judges do not have an appeal against a decision on their salary, but if they do not agree with such decision they may, taking into consideration the fourth paragraph of Article 3a of the SSPSA and only after the salary has been paid, require in writing that the employer establish the unlawfulness of the decision and proceed in accordance with the law (so that that the employer pays the difference between the already paid salary and the salary which is determined by law). This allegedly entails that judges do not have effective judicial protection in order to prevent an unlawful and unconstitutional interference with their statutory right to a salary. The applicant's allegation on the ineffective nature of such judicial protection could indeed be relevant from the viewpoint of the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution, however, the allegation is in and of itself too general and the Constitutional Court could not review it as such. With reference to the allegation connected with the applicant's statements that on the basis of the fourth paragraph of Article 3a of the SSPSA judicial protection is ensured to civil servants, it can be established that the possibility to file a claim in the second sentence of this provision is indeed mentioned only with reference to civil servants, however, the applicant does not explain why it is of the opinion that this legal remedy could not be recognised also to officials by applying this analogously.

65. Furthermore, the applicant's allegations that the regulation regarding the question whether the appeal of a judge against a decision on his or her salary suspends its enforcement is not clear, are also not substantiated. With reference to such, the applicant namely refers to several statutory provisions whereby the applicant does not explain why the discussed issue could not be decided on their basis. However, the request can be understood such that the applicant is of the opinion that appeals against salary decisions upon the transition to the new salary system did not have suspensive effects, while, in the applicant's opinion, they should have such effects. In view of the fact that subsequently the applicant points out this problem only regarding the effects of such legal remedies in the future, the Constitutional Court did not particularly review such allegations in the case at issue, in which the applicant filed a request with reference to a claim against a salary decision issued upon the transition to the new salary system.
66. As regards the above mentioned, the alleged inconsistency of the challenged provisions with the Constitution could not be established. The applicant's reference to the principle of institutional balance is, as already stated above, not relevant within the framework of the review of the constitutionality of the challenged provisions.

The Constitutional Court's Decision

67. The Constitutional Court established that the second paragraph of Article 10 with reference to Annex 3 to the SSPSA and the fourth paragraph of Article 5 of the SSPSA, inasmuch as they refer to judges, and the fourth paragraph of Article 44 of the JSA are inconsistent with the Constitution (Point 1 of the operative provisions). As regards the third paragraph of Article 25 of the SSPSA, inasmuch as it refers to judges, the Constitutional Court established on the basis of Article 47 of the CCA that it was inconsistent with the Constitution (Point 2 of the operative provisions). In view of the fact that the unconstitutionality of these provisions has already been established for the reasons stipulated in the statement of reasons of this decision, the Constitutional Court did not review the other alleged inconsistencies of these provisions.

68. The Constitutional Court may in whole or in part abrogate a law which is not in conformity with the Constitution (Article 43 of the CCA). If the Constitutional Court deems a law, other regulation, or general act issued for the exercise of public authority unconstitutional or unlawful as it does not regulate a certain issue which it should regulate or it regulates such in a manner which does not enable annulment or abrogation, a declaratory decision is adopted on such (the first paragraph of Article 48 of the CCA). In the case at issue, the Constitutional Court issued a declaratory decision (Point 1 of the operative provisions) by which judges' basic salaries as well as the harmonisation and adjustment of judges' salaries are regulated [...] would namely entail that such would no longer be regulated by law, due to which their abrogation is not possible.
69. The Constitutional Court decision in the case at issue entails that the challenged salary regulation is to be applied until the new salary regulation is issued, by which the legislature will have to remedy the established inconsistencies. Determining the manner of the implementation in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA in the manner the Constitutional Court determined in Decision No. U-I-60/06, when it extended the period of the application of the former salary regulation, is namely not possible in the case at issue, as the new regulation has already been implemented. It is also not possible that until the established inconsistencies are remedied the Constitutional Court itself regulate the issues with reference to the regulation of the judges' salaries to which the findings regarding the unconstitutionality refer.
70. In order for the established unconstitutional situation to continue for as little time as possible, the Constitutional Court determined the shortest possible period of time in which the legislature can definitely, in the opinion of the Constitutional Court, remedy the established unconstitutionality. The Constitutional Court decided that the legislature must remedy the established unconstitutionality within six months (Point 3 of the operative provisions). The Constitutional Court took into account that the discussed topic will be the subject of legislative regulation for a third time within a short period and that therefore less time will be needed to draft and adopt a new regulation. With reference to such, the Constitutional Court points out that in the legislative procedure the proposer of the draft law and the legislature will have to ensure the participation of the judges in order to remedy the established inconsistencies, in view of the fact that such concerns the statutory regulation which regulates their position (Paragraph 71 of the reasoning of Decision No. U-I-60/06).
71. As regards the second and fourth paragraphs of Article 3, the fourth paragraph of Article 3a, the third paragraph of Article 23, the second paragraph of Article 48, and the second sentence of the fourth paragraph of Article 49c of the SSPSA, inasmuch as they refer to judges, and the third paragraph of Article 22b and the fourth paragraph of Article 22f of this act, the Constitutional Court decided that they are not inconsistent with the Constitution (Point 4 of the operative provisions).

C

72. The Constitutional Court reached this decision on the basis of Articles 21, 47, and 48 of the CCA and the third indent of the third paragraph of Article 46 of the Rules of Procedure of the Constitutional Court (Official Gazette RS, No. 86/07), composed of: Jože Tratnik, President, and Judges Mag. Marta Klampfer, Mag. Marija Krisper Kramberger, Mag. Miroslav Mozetič, Dr Ernest Petrič, Jasna Pogačar, Dr Ciril Ribičič, and Jan Zobec. The decision was reached unanimously, except regarding the first indent of the first paragraph of the operative provisions, which was adopted by seven votes against one. Judge Mozetič voted against and submitted a dissenting opinion. Judge Klampfer submitted a concurring opinion.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE MAG. MIROSLAV MOZETIČ

1. I have written this opinion because I wish to explain the reasons which led me to not vote entirely in favour of Decision No. U-I-159/08, and thereby prevent possible speculation regarding such.
2. Let me say at the outset that I mainly and, in my opinion, in the most important part did agree with the decision and its reasons. This is a decision which is in essence based on the standpoint adopted in Decision No. U-I-60/06, dated 7 December 2006, which requires that the salaries of judges, as bearers of the judicial branch of power, must be appropriate to their office and role within the system of the separation of powers.
This position must be primarily reflected in their basic salary, which entails the “value” of their work and which is expressed in salary brackets. It must be comparable with the other two branches of power, i.e. the legislative and the executive. It is not appropriate that Supreme Court judges and especially Constitutional Court judges are placed in lower salary brackets than all the ministers. This implies that “in terms of value” the judicial branch of power is placed below the executive branch of power. However, if we compare the judiciary as a whole it is undisputable that there exist great disparities between the judicial branch of power and the legislative and executive branches of power.
3. I could not agree with the majority opinion that the fourth paragraph of Article 5 of the Salary System in the Public Sector Act (hereinafter referred to as the SSPSA) is inconsistent with the Constitution. In my opinion, the reasons for the majority decision are not convincing enough, whereas the decision itself, in my opinion, might even convey the wrong message.
4. Article 5 of the SSPSA has five paragraphs. The first paragraph defines a salary. In the second and third paragraphs it is determined that the amount (value) of the basic salary is determined by placement in an individual salary bracket from the salary scale which is an annex to the act. The fourth paragraph, which was challenged, provides for the annual harmonisation and adjustment of the values of salary brackets with the collective agreement for the public sector, which must be completed before the submission of the draft national budget to the National Assembly. Finally, the fifth paragraph determines that the harmonised and adjusted value of the salary brackets be determined by law. The value of a salary bracket that is harmonised and adjusted in such a manner and determined by law applies to all civil servants as well as to all officials. After all, the value of the salary brackets was determined in the same manner already after the implementation of the regulation of salaries in accordance with the SSPSA.

5. As mentioned above, only the fourth paragraph of Article 5 of the SSPSA was challenged. In the request, the applicant states that this provision is inconsistent with the Constitution “from the viewpoint of the prohibition against the reduction of a salary (Article 125 of the Constitution), as it does not regulate the adjustment of judges’ salaries for inflation, which amounts to 5.7% annually (this was probably true at the time when the request was filed).” With reference to such, the applicant refers to Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-60/06, in which the Court had allegedly explicitly set the requirement that judges’ salaries must be regularly harmonised and adjusted. In the opinion of the applicant, the standard of “regular harmonisation and adjustment” requires the adjustment of judges’ salaries for inflation or (more correctly) harmonisation with the value of the average salary in Slovenia.
6. In Decision No. U-I-60/06 the Constitutional Court indeed held that “not only the amount of judges’ salaries but also their relative stability play a key role in ensuring judicial independence” (Paragraph 64 of the reasoning) and “that the prohibition against a reduction of judges’ salaries and their regular harmonisation and adjustment are equally important” (Paragraph 84 of the reasoning). I entirely agree with the above-mentioned positions. However, contrary to the majority of the judges, I am of the opinion that the above-mentioned principles (requirements) regarding the stability and regular harmonisation and adjustment of judges’ salaries are taken into account in Article 5 of the SSPSA and that therefore the challenged provision is not inconsistent with the Constitution.
7. Most likely not even the applicant believes that the standard of “regular harmonisation and adjustment” entails an automatic adjustment for inflation or harmonisation with the average salary in Slovenia and that such requirement follows from Article 125 of the Constitution. It is certain, however, that from the standpoint of the Constitutional Court (Decision No. U-I-60/06) regarding the constitutional requirement of the “relative stability” of judges’ salaries and from the standpoint regarding the constitutional “prohibition against a reduction” of judges’ salaries, also an indirect reduction which is a consequence of the absence of their “regular harmonisation and adjustment”, there follows the obligation to ensure the harmonisation and adjustment of the value of judges’ salaries (the value of a salary bracket, which determines the basic salary). The legislature pursues precisely this in Article 5 of the SSPSA, naturally not only for judges, but for all employees in the public sector, including officials – and among them also judges. The fact that the manner of the harmonisation and adjustment of the value of salary brackets is determined in the SSPSA and that it is the same for all, thus also for judges, is not inconsistent with the Constitution. The constitutionally defined position of judicial office requires that the position of judges, including their salaries, be determined by law, however, not by a special law. It also does not require that the harmonisation and adjustment of salaries should be regulated differently for judges. The SSPSA follows from the principle of the uniform regulation of salaries in the public sector. It determines the classification of all offices and employment positions in salary brackets. The classification of an individual office in a salary bracket is of essential importance and reflects its “value”. The constitutionally determined role of the judicial branch of power must be respected when placing judges in salary brackets. The value of salary brackets is the same for all. Therefore, a special reason, and certainly not a constitutional reason, for determining a different method and different criteria for the annual harmonisation and adjustment of the value of salary brackets cannot be seen. A different treatment would lead to a different annual harmonisation and adjustment of the value of salary brackets and to them having a different value. However, this seems unacceptable in relatively stable economic and social circumstances, as it could also entail a violation of the second, perhaps even the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution.

8. The majority decision avoided, at least partially, the above-mentioned issues. In particular, it avoided a clear answer to the applicant’s claim that the standard of “regular harmonisation and adjustment” entails adjustment for inflation or harmonisation with the average salary in Slovenia. It only stated that the fourth paragraph of Article 5 of the SSPSA does provide for the harmonisation and adjustment of the values of salary brackets. However, as it envisages harmonisation with the collective agreement for the public sector, while the judges cannot participate when such agreement is being concluded, such regulation does not meet the requirements regarding the harmonisation of judges’ salaries. Harmonisation and adjustment determined in such manner as applies to judges’ salaries allegedly do not ensure that “a considerable decrease in their real value” would not occur. In addition, the regulation is allegedly also inconsistent with the Constitution as “the principle of judicial independence namely requires that the salary position of judges be regulated by law”. The fact that the fifth paragraph of Article 5 of the SSPSA determines that the final value of a salary bracket be determined by law, is allegedly not enough. The application of the standard “a considerable decrease in the real value” probably indirectly indicates that the applicant is not right when in claiming that judges’ salaries should be adjusted for inflation or harmonised with the average salary in Slovenia. However, it is not clear what is a considerable decrease in salaries and what is the real value of the salaries. Both will certainly be established in dialogues (negotiations) regarding the annual harmonisation and adjustment of the value of salary brackets. It can be said with great probability that the Constitutional Court does not consider that every decrease in the real value of salary brackets must be taken into consideration, but only a considerable decrease. With reference to such, a new question is raised - who should evaluate such? Will the Constitutional Court be an arbiter in each individual case, if there is no answer? I am also afraid that by establishing the unconstitutionality of the prescribed manner of the harmonisation and adjustment of the value of the salary brackets of judges, the Constitutional Court probably involuntarily, but nevertheless, albeit unclearly, conveys the message that the uniform harmonisation and adjustment of the value of salary brackets and consequently of the uniform salary system, at least as far as judges are concerned, is inconsistent with the Constitution.

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE MAG. MARTA KLAMPFER, JOINED BY JUDGE DR CIRIL RIBIČIČ

1. I voted in favour of the adopted decision, however, with reservations as to the reasoning of the decision concerning the unconstitutionality of the third paragraph of Article 25 of the Salary System in the Public Sector Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 110/06 – official consolidated text, 57/07, 95/07 - official consolidated text, 17/08, 58/08, and 80/08 – hereinafter referred to as SSPSA), on the basis of which judges were entitled to a lower bonus for years of service than they were entitled to before the amendment of the regulation of judges' salaries in 2006. By the amended SSPSA-G (Official Gazette RS, No. 57/07), the third paragraph of the above-mentioned article was amended so that the bonus for years of service was determined in the amount of "0.3% of the basic salary for each completed year of service", which is also the subject of the present constitutional review, whereas from 11 June 2008, in accordance with the transitional provision of the amended SSPSA-I (Official Gazette RS, No. 58/08), also judges and other officials receive a bonus for years of service in the amount determined by the Collective Agreement for the Public Sector (Official Gazette RS, No. 57/08) (i.e. in the amount of 0.33%). I will proceed to explain the different reasons for my concurring opinion. I am aware that I could have much more easily and with more convincing arguments reasoned my position regarding the issues of the constitutional admissibility of a reduction of the bonus for years of service as one of the elements of a judge's salary when the constitutionality of the regulation of judges' salaries was reviewed for the first time; however, also taking into consideration the reasons provided in Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-66/06, adopted in December 2006, I am of the opinion that a narrowing of the scope of this statutory right should be reviewed from the viewpoint of its consistency with the principle of trust in the law determined in Article 2 of the Constitution.
2. When writing this concurring opinion I proceeded from the earlier constitutional review in which, by referring to Article 125 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court clearly adopted the standpoint that it is not only a judge's basic salary that is protected against a reduction, but all payments to which judges are entitled due to performing judicial office, as only such protection against a reduction of the salary of an individual judge can ensure its stability and consequently the judge's independence. This is thus protection against any interference which might cause a reduction of the judge's salary which the judge justifiably expected upon assuming office. The Constitutional Court also adopted a standpoint regarding the issue of which cases do not involve a reduction of the salary. The Constitutional Court held that such protection against a reduction naturally does not include cases in which judges receive a lower salary because they are no longer entitled to various additional payments which judges are entitled to for performing certain tasks (e.g. an additional payment for mentorship and position-based additional payment) or because they carry out tasks in certain circumstances or under certain conditions (e.g. additional payments for working in less favourable working conditions and at a less favourable working time). Furthermore, there is no reduction of the salary also in cases involving possible payments for work performance, which is also not a fixed part of judges' salaries (Paragraph 89 of the reasoning). Regardless of the fact that the Constitutional Court did not explicitly decide whether such also applies with regard to the reduction or termination of the payment of a bonus for years of service, it is evident that the Constitutional Court placed the bonus for years of service, which is a fixed part of a judge's salary, amongst the aspects of the salary protected against a reduction of the basic salary. This now clearly follows from the new constitutional review of the fourth paragraph of Article 44 of the Judicial Service Act (hereinafter referred to as JSA) (Paragraph 36 of the reasoning of Decision No. U-I-159/08). In the first review of this matter the Constitutional Court adopted the clear standpoint (it adopted the same standpoint also in the decision at issue) that in accordance with Article 125 of the Constitution the bonus for years of service cannot be protected as an independent element of a salary but only in combination with the judge's basic salary, which in fact entailed that the reduction of the bonus for years of service could be compensated for by an increase in the basic salary. Therefore, when reviewing the constitutionality of the first indent of Article 38 of the amended JSA-F (Official Gazette RS, No. 17/06), which entered into force on 18 February 2006, the Constitutional Court held in Paragraph 95 of the reasoning that the legislature may introduce a bonus for years of service or not, due to the fact that a bonus for years of service is not a constitutional category. Therefore, its reduction or possible abolishment would not in and of itself be disputable from a constitutional point of view. However, such reduction could be disputable only if it caused a factual reduction in judges' salaries. Judges must be ensured such protection only inasmuch as their salaries would not be increased for some other reason which would entail a fixed part of their salary, and which could compensate for the reduction in salaries related to the bonus for years of service. Due to the fact that the Constitutional Court held that the prohibition against a reduction in judges' salaries as a whole entails that judges' salaries must be maintained in the amount which judges were entitled to before the implementation of the new salary system, it established that the provision which allowed a reduction of the amount of the bonus for years of service was inconsistent with Article 125 of the Constitution.

3. In the earlier constitutional review of the new salary system, the Constitutional Court already took a position also regarding the reasons which allegedly led the legislature to reduce the bonus for years of service, which in my opinion is a very important starting point for the constitutional review of the reduction of the bonus for years of service within the meaning of Article 2 of the Constitution, which I put forward in this concurring opinion. In Paragraph 97 of the reasoning, indeed when reviewing the issue in terms of Article 125 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court explicitly stated that the reasons by which the Government tried to justify the reduction of the bonus for years of service cannot justify such reduction. The reasons, such as the necessity to ensure funds for the remuneration of judges for their work performance and to ensure equality between civil servants and officials<sup>1</sup> and the need to implement a new salary reform of the entire public sector, are, in the opinion of the Constitutional Court, not sound reasons for such interference with judges' salaries. The Constitutional Court held that also the desire of the legislature to acquire funds for other purposes did not sufficiently justify the reduction of judges' salaries.
4. In order to remedy the established unconstitutionality of the law, the legislature provided for the possibility to protect judges' salaries by ensuring a nominal amount of the salary received. Article 49f of the SSPSA enacted a so-called additional payment for the readjustment of salaries, which ensured judges payment of the difference between the comparable amount of the salary and their salary determined in accordance with the former regulations. In the fifth paragraph of the cited article it was explicitly determined that when calculating a comparable amount of the salary for officials determined in accordance with the SSPSA a coefficient for determining a judge's salary, an extra payment to compensate for the incompatibility of office, an extra payment for management, and the bonus for years of service (i.e. the fixed parts of judges' salaries) must be taken into account. Thus, the nominal amount of a judge's salary could not be reduced when it was readjusted such that it amounted to a new salary. An additional payment for the readjustment of salaries thus protected the nominal salaries which judges received in December 2007, i.e. the last month before the implementation of the new salary system, which, in accordance with the adopted constitutional review, the legislature adopted in the amended SSPSA-G (Official Gazette RS, No. 57/07), which entered into force on 30 June 2007 and is a subject of the review at issue.
5. The Constitutional Court also held that the new statutory regulation of the salary system is inconsistent with Article 125 of the Constitution, as it does not ensure judges the real value of their salaries which they were entitled to before the reform. The statutory regulation protected only the nominal value of judges' salaries which they were entitled to immediately before the implementation of the reform, whereas they were not ensured protection against a considerable reduction of their real value, and therefore the Constitutional Court held that also the third paragraph of Article <sup>1</sup> The Government referred to the circumstance that in accordance with the new regulation also civil servants will be paid a bonus for years of service in the amount of 0.3%.

25 of the SSPSA, inasmuch as it refers to judges, was still inconsistent with Article 125 of the Constitution. However, the Constitutional Court drew the legislature's attention to the fact that the regulation determined in the sixth paragraph of Article 23 of the SSPSA-I (the provision which repealed the third paragraph of Article 25 of the SSPSA, as it determined that extra payments determined by the collective agreement for the public sector also apply for officials) could be constitutionally disputable, which the Constitutional Court did not separately review, as it was not a subject of the request in the case at issue, due to the fact that it leaves the regulation of judges' salaries (the amount of extra payments) to the collective agreement.

6. I agree with the review regarding the established unconstitutionality of the challenged provisions of the SSPSA from the viewpoint of Article 125 of the Constitution, however, I am of the opinion that the Constitutional Court should review the regulation of the reduction of the bonus for years of service also from the viewpoint of the consistency with Article 2 of the Constitution. The Constitutional Court has held numerous times that the Constitution explicitly protects acquired rights only against statutory interferences with retroactive effect (the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution). However, this does not entail that the protection of already acquired rights against statutory interferences for the time after the implementation of a law, which is also defined as irregular retroactivity, is not guaranteed in our system. This is ensured within the framework of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law determined in Article 2 of the Constitution. Within the framework of the broader concept of legal certainty, the principle of trust in the law, which ensures individuals that the state will not worsen their legal position arbitrarily, i.e. without a sound reason that is justified in the prevailing and legitimate public interest, must also be regarded among such principles. Due to the fact that this is a general principle of law and not directly one of the constitutional rights which are, in accordance with the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, ensured stricter protection against possible limitations and interferences, this principle is not absolutely applicable and may be subject to limitations to a greater extent than individual constitutional rights. Namely, in cases of a conflict or collision between this and other constitutional principles or benefits, it must be reviewed by weighing which constitutionally protected benefits must be given priority in the individual disputed case (Decision U-I-141/01, dated 20 May 2004, Official Gazette RS, No. 62/04). On the one hand, such weighing entails the principle of trust in the law, whereby it is particularly important whether the changes in the concerned field of law are relatively predictable such that the affected individuals could take into account beforehand that their position would change and what the weight and significance of such change are, as well as the significance of the existing legal situation of the individual, and on the other hand, the public interest in the implementation of a different regulation than the existing one.
7. The protection of acquired rights in cases in which a law amends the regulation only ex nunc is thus ensured within the framework of the general principles of a state governed by the rule of law, which ensure individuals that the state will not worsen their legal position arbitrarily, i.e. without a sound reason justified in the prevailing and legitimate public interest. The amendment is in accordance with the principle of trust in the law if it is in reasonable proportion to the pursued constitutionally admissible aim (Decision U-I-260/98, dated 9 November 2000). A bonus for years of service is a statutory right and one of the essential elements of a salary. Judges have been entitled to this bonus as a statutory right since the adoption of the JSA in 1994.<sup>2</sup> With the new labour-law legislation which entered into force on 1 January 2003,<sup>3</sup> a bonus for years of service as one of the obligatory elements of the salary was determined to be a statutory right. In Article 129 of the Employment Relations Act, a bonus for years of service is determined as a right stemming from employment; the legislature left the determination of the amount of such bonuses to the branch collective agreements. The fact is that in accordance with the labour-law legislation in force in Slovenia, in addition to a basic salary, employees are also entitled to various additional payments. Even though the use of the term additional payment developed over time and is not consistent, it can nevertheless not be disputable that additional payments are payments which employees are entitled to on the basis of their employment.<sup>4</sup> In the procedure for adopting the new labour-law legislation, the question of whether to retain the bonus for years of service had been discussed, arguments against being that it is an outdated institution which is no longer appropriate due to the fact that the socially-owned property had been converted into the property of known owners and that contractual employment relations had been established. In addition, such bonus allegedly also had negative effects with regard to including older workers in the labour market. However, the representatives of the trade unions insisted that this bonus be provided for in the law. Precisely because of the fact that the legislature left the determination of the amount of the bonus for years of service to the social partners and because of the fear that this right would be revoked by collective agreements, in the transitional provision of Article 238 of the Employment Relations Act the legislature determined that all employees who at the time of the enforcement of this Act received a bonus for years of service in the amount of 0.5% of the basic salary for each completed year of service, shall keep this bonus regardless of the amount of the bonus defined by the branch collective agreement unless this Act or the employment contract stipulated a higher amount. It is a special safeguarding provision of employees because of the implementation of the conceptually modified labour-law legislation.<sup>5</sup>

- 2 Before that, judges were entitled to the above-mentioned additional payment on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Judges' Salaries and Other Income Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 10/93), and before that on the basis of the third paragraph of Article 6 of the Officials in State Administration Bodies Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 30/90, 18/91, 22/91, 2/91-I).
- 3 The Employment Relations Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 42/02).
- 4 Dr Barbara Kresal, Pravna ureditev plače [Legal Regulation of Salary], Založba Bonex, 2001.
- 5 Considering Article 4a of the JSA, which explicitly determines that with regard to the rights and duties arising from judicial office which are not regulated in the Act, the provisions of the law which regulates employment relations apply mutatis mutandis, and which was included in the JSA after the implementation of Article 238 of the Employment Relations Act (by the amended JSA-F, Official Gazette RS, No. 17/06), the standpoint could be defended that this provision protects against a reduction of the 0.5% bonus for years of service also for judges.

The SSPSA, differently than general labour-law legislation, in the first paragraph of Article 25 also provided a definition of the bonus for years of service. In accordance with this definition, the bonus for years of service is a part of the salary through which the work experience acquired over the entire years of service of individual civil servants or officials is valued. A characteristic of the bonus for years of service is that it is determined as a certain percentage for each concluded year of service.

8. As regards the above-mentioned nature of the bonus for years of service as a statutory right and as one of the obligatory elements of a salary, I am of the opinion that the constitutionality of the discussed reduction should be reviewed from the viewpoint of consistency with the principle of trust in the law. The protection of acquired rights, in cases in which a law modifies the regulation only ex nunc, is ensured within the framework of the general principles of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution). By the challenged regulation the legislature did not abolish this right, however, it did substantially interfere with its amount. By reducing the bonus for years of service from 0.5% to 0.3%, the legislature undoubtedly interfered with the legal position of all judges who had been employed when the new labour-law legislation was implemented and whose bonus was determined in the amount of 0.5%. This was an interference which had immediate and negative effects at the individual level. It must particularly be emphasized that the bonus was reduced also for the years of service which included an individual judge's work in the previous years and decades, which exceeds an interference with the judge's expectations regarding receiving a salary which the judge justifiably expected upon assuming office. Due to the fact that the case concerns a regulation which narrows or reduces the scope of already implemented rights, which are also retained by the new labour-law legislation, the question is raised whether the legislature interfered with the principle of trust in the law.
9. In my opinion, in the case at issue the reduction of the bonus for years of service with reference to the regulation which was hitherto in force entails an interference by the legislature, however, the question is whether the legislature did so for reasons justified in the prevailing public interest or whether the proposed amendment is in reasonable proportion to the pursued constitutionally admissible aim. In the constitutional review of the Act Abolishing the Right to Pay for Annual Leave for 1998 (Official Gazette RS, No. 87/97), the Constitutional Court held that the money-saving measures which are a part of the economic policy of the state (i.e. reducing the scope of public finance or their harmonisation with feasible possibilities) undoubtedly entail a constitutionally admissible aim (Decision U-I-260/98, dated 9 November 2000). However, the reduction of the bonus for years of service was not a money-saving measure which was a part of the economic policy of the state, but rather the Government substantiated the above-mentioned reduction by stating the necessity to ensure funds for the remuneration of judges for their work performance and to ensure equality between civil servants and officials, due to the fact that in the future also the bonus for the years of service of civil servants will be reduced to 0.3%. Furthermore, the legislature's reasons for the adoption of such decision also did not follow from the legislative materials of the JSA-F and the SSPSA. The reasons by which the reduction of the bonus for years of service was justified, in my opinion, cannot justify the disputable interference. The Constitutional Court has, although from the viewpoint of Article 125 and not Article 2 of the Constitution, already explicitly addressed these reasons (Paragraph 97 of the reasoning).

10. In view of the above-mentioned, the reduction of the bonus for years of service interfered with the principle of legal certainty and the principle of trust in the law, thus judges' bonus for years of service could be reduced to 0.3% only for the time after the implementation of the new statutory regulation, whereas the amount of this bonus acquired on the basis of the former legislation in force should be retained.

Mag. Marta Klampfer

A dispute between judges and bearers of the executive and legislative branches of power, which even led to something as incomprehensible as a judicial strike, exceeds the issue of the inappropriate payment of judges. It namely touches upon the very core of constitutionally determined mutual relations between the bearers of the different branches of power. Therefore, this is also a good opportunity to underline the special role of the Constitutional Court with reference to the protection of human rights and fundamental constitutional values. The allegations that in resolving the dispute at issue, the Constitutional Court judges decided on their own salaries and position are not only politically incorrect and indecent, but also ignore the constitutionally determined role of the Constitutional Court. This entails ignorance and a lack of understanding of the role of the Constitutional Court within the framework of a constitutional democracy, a democracy in which the Constitution is the origin, the foundation, and above all the limiting instrument regarding the actions of everyone, also regarding the parliamentary majority and a majority expressed at a referendum. The special mission of the Constitutional Court, which is separated from the role of regular courts, is particularly emphasized in cases in which the Constitutional Court reviews competence disputes and other disputes between the bearers of the judicial, legislative, and executive branches of power. When resolving such disputes, the Constitutional Court may not and cannot act as a part of the judicial branch of power, but as a supreme guardian of the Constitution. Thus, as the body which has the final word in the interpretation of the Constitution.

The protection of human rights and concern for fundamental constitutional values cannot depend on checks and balances between the bearers of the three branches of power, and even less so can they be victims of prominent struggles for dominance between them. Nevertheless, the Constitutional Court did not comply with and it was not allowed to comply with the demands of whisperers that the Constitutional Court, instead of the competent authorities, regulate the amount of judges' salaries (i.e. salary brackets, amounts, additional payments, pay raises). It had to limit itself to its constitutional function. It limited itself to the review of whether, in which cases, and to what extent the constitutional principles, as interpreted by the Constitutional Court in a significantly different composition already two years ago, were violated with regard to the payment of judges. It is not excluded that this principled approach of the Constitutional Court will be met with disappointment by all branches of power and bearers of authoritative offices, not only those prior to but also those following the last parliamentary elections. If it had acted differently, the Constitutional Court might have contributed to a more rapid harmonisation of the salary system of judges with the Constitution and consequently to the resolution of a dispute which is seriously paralysing the functioning of Slovenia. However, in such a case it could not avoid justified reproaches regarding partiality in deciding this dispute between equal branches of power and with regard to interfering with political issues whose resolution falls within the competence of the elected representatives of the people or the people themselves at a referendum.

Nevertheless, there can be no disappointment regarding the principled positions which were adopted by the Constitutional Court. It is particularly important that the Constitutional Court once again emphasized the significance of the equal constitutional position of the judiciary, as the least dangerous branch of power as compared to the other two branches of power. Furthermore, the Constitutional Court emphasized the significance of the implementation of the independence of the courts and judges as a condition for their successful functioning. In addition, it emphasized the importance of such evaluation of judges' work which ensures their social security at a level which does not deter them from adjudicating and does not endanger their independence and autonomy. And last but not least, the Constitutional Court resisted the inappropriate underestimation of adjudication as an activity which is intellectually the most demanding and, for the position of the people, of fatal importance.

These are some of the positive aspects of the adopted decision, whereas regarding its negative aspect, I joined the concurring opinion of Judge Mag. Marta Klampfer.

DECISION

At a session held on 10 October 2007 in proceedings to examine the petition and in proceedings to review constitutionality initiated upon the petition of Aleš Zalar, Ljubljana, and in proceedings to examine the constitutional complaint and in proceedings to decide upon the constitutional complaint of Aleš Zalar, Ljubljana, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. The second paragraph of Article 62 of the Courts Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 19/94, 45/95, 38/99, 28/2000, 73/04, 23/05 – official consolidated text, 72/05, 100/05 – official consolidated text, 127/06, 27/07 – official consolidated text, and 67/07) is not inconsistent with the Constitution.
2. The petition for the initiation of proceedings to review the constitutionality of the second sentence of the third paragraph of Article 321 of the Civil Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 26/99, 96/02, 12/03 – official consolidated text, 2/04, 36/04 – official consolidated text, 52/07, and 73/07 – official consolidated text) is dismissed.
3. By Supreme Court Judgment No. I Up 143/2006, dated 29 March 2006, the complainant's right to an impartial trial determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution was violated.
4. The constitutional complaint against the Judgment referred to in the preceding Point is rejected in the part relating to the violation of the right to a trial without undue delay.
5. The constitutional complaint against Supreme Court Order No. VII Ips 1/2006, dated 14 November 2006, in relation to Supreme Court Order No. VI Ips 4/2006, dated 17 May 2006, is rejected.

1. The Judicial Council proposed to the Minister of Justice (hereinafter referred to as the Minister) that the complainant, as the only candidate, be appointed to the office of the president of the Ljubljana District Court. The Minister rejected the Judicial Council's proposal and decided not to appoint the complainant to that office. In the proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts, the court of first instance granted the action of the complainant, annulled the decision of the Minister, and remanded the case to the Minister for a new procedure. Both the complainant and the Minister appealed against the mentioned decision of the Administrative Court. By the challenged Judgment, No. I Up 143/2006, dated 29 March 2006, the Supreme Court dismissed the complainant's appeal and granted the Minister's appeal, and modified the Administrative Court Judgment so as to dismiss the complainant's action against the decision of the Minister. It adopted the position that in conformity with the second paragraph of Article 62 of the Courts Act (hereinafter referred to as the CtsA), in the procedure for appointing the president of a district court the Minister has the right to select a candidate even when the Judicial Council proposes only one candidate to the Minister (regardless of how many candidates responded to the call for applications); i.e. that in such an event the Minister can reject the proposal of the Judicial Council and not select the proposed candidate and thereby not appoint such candidate president of a court.
2. The complainant filed a constitutional complaint against Supreme Court Judgment No. I Up 143/2006 and proposed that until its final decision is adopted the Constitutional Court suspend the legal consequences of the challenged Judgment. In the complaint he alleges a violation of the right to equality before the law determined by the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution and the right to the equal protection of rights determined by Article 22 of the Constitution, the right to an impartial court determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution, the right to the public pronouncement of a judgment determined by Article 24 of the Constitution, the right to a trial without undue delay determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution, the right to an effective legal remedy determined by Article 25 of the Constitution, and the right to equal access to every position of employment under equal conditions determined by the third paragraph of Article 49 of the Constitution. According to the complainant, the interpretation of the provision of the second paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA adopted by the Supreme Court in Judgment No. I Up 143/2006 is manifestly erroneous in view of the established methods of interpretation of legal regulations. The complainant substantiates in great detail why on the basis of linguistic, systematic, teleological, and historical interpretations the only possible interpretation that is in conformity with the Constitution is the one that he supports. Furthermore, he challenges the Supreme Court Judgment for its alleged lack of sound reasoning. The [Supreme] Court allegedly did not state arguments for the adopted position, and the reference to Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-224/96, dated 22 May 1997 (Official Gazette RS, No. 36/97, and OdlUS VI, 65), was allegedly too general. The challenged Judgment was allegedly also contrary to the established case law of the Supreme Court and the Administrative Court in comparable cases regarding the application of the provision on the appointment of presidents of courts. The complainant refers to Supreme Court Judgments No. I Uv 39/95, dated 11 September 1997; No. U 28/98, dated 28 May 1999; and No. U 36/99, dated 22 October 1999. He alleges that these cases are essentially similar to the case at issue and that the Supreme Court did not state reasons for its departure from the established case law. In addition, the complainant is of the opinion that the Supreme Court should have publicly pronounced the Judgment. Since it did not do so, it allegedly interfered with his constitutionally guaranteed right to a publicly pronounced judgment. Moreover, the complainant alleges that a judge participated in the decision-making of the Supreme Court who, in his opinion, should have been disqualified, as allegedly there existed circumstances that raised doubt regarding his impartiality. He alleges that he requested his disqualification, however the President of the Supreme Court rejected his request by reasoning that the matter had already been decided on at the panel session held on 29 March 2006. The complainant emphasises that judges are qualified to request their own recusal when circumstances exist that could raise doubt regarding their impartiality. Since on 3 May 2006 the decision of the [Supreme] Court became known, the complainant filed, with respect to the violation of the right to an impartial court determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution, a request for a retrial against the Supreme Court Judgment in conformity with point 4 of the first paragraph of Article 85 of the Act on the Judicial Review of Administrative Acts (Official Gazette RS, No. 50/97, etc. – hereinafter referred to as the AJRAA).

3. During the procedure for examining the constitutional complaint against Supreme Court Judgment No. I Up 143/2006, by Order No. VII 1/2006, dated 14 November 2006, the Supreme Court dismissed the appeal and upheld the first instance Supreme Court order by which the complainant's request to reopen the proceedings that had been concluded by Supreme Court Judgment No. I Up 143/2006 was rejected. On 29 November 2006 the complainant filed a constitutional complaint also against the mentioned two orders of the Supreme Court. In that constitutional complaint he claims the violation of Article 22, the first and second paragraphs of Article 23, and Article 25 of the Constitution. He alleges that the Supreme Court did not adopt a position with regard to his statements concerning the interpretation of the first paragraph of Article 86 and the third paragraph of Article 85 of the AJRAA, the duty of the court to ensure its own impartiality, his reference to the case law of the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR), and motions for evidence for establishing circumstances when grounds for disqualification can be invoked. From the viewpoint of the constitutional right to an impartial court determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution, the reasoning of the Supreme Court is allegedly manifestly erroneous.

4. The complainant also filed (already in the framework of the first constitutional complaint) a petition for the review of the constitutionality of the second paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA and the second sentence of the third paragraph of Article 321 of the Civil Procedure Act (hereinafter referred to as the CPA). In the petition he alleges that due to the nature and content of the second paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA, competent authorities can assign different meanings to the wording of that provision. He states that in the case at issue the Minister, the Administrative Court, and the Supreme Court adopted different interpretations of the mentioned provision. He advocates the fourth interpretation (which allegedly was also predominantly adopted by the Administrative Court), which at the same time in his opinion is the only one that on the basis of the established methods of interpretation is constitutionally admissible. He proposes that the Constitutional Court adopt a so-called interpretative decision by which it should establish that the second paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA is not inconsistent with the Constitution if it is interpreted (applied) in a manner such that the Minister may not reject the proposal of the Judicial Council regarding the appointment of the president of a court when the Judicial Council proposes only one candidate for appointment. From the petitioner's extensive statements it follows that in his opinion only such interpretation of the second paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA enables the Judicial Council to be in a constitutional position that is equivalent to the Minister's and ensures that only objective criteria are taken into account in the appointment of a candidate for the president of a court, and thereby the independence of judges in the performance of judicial office is ensured (the second paragraph of Article 3 and Article 125 of the Constitution). In his petition he refers to various international acts, the recommendation of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe, the position of the Commission for Democracy through Law (the Venice Commission), and encloses with the file the conclusions of the First Study Commission of the International Association of Judges on the appointment and role of presidents of courts, as well as two judgments of the Constitutional Court of Italy. The petitioner emphasises that his petition primarily relies on the argument that the challenged provision is unconstitutional from the viewpoint of the principle of legal foreseeability (the rule of law) determined by Article 2 of the Constitution and the right to an effective legal remedy (Article 25 of the Constitution) in relation to the right determined by the third paragraph of Article 49 of the Constitution as a special provision regarding the right to the equal protection of rights determined by Article 22 of the Constitution.
5. In the opinion of the petitioner, the legislature expressly conferred on the Judicial Council the power to select a candidate only when a number of candidates who fulfil the conditions for appointment have applied. If, however, only one candidate responds to a call for applications and the Judicial Council finds that he or she fulfils the conditions for appointment, in the opinion of the petitioner, the Judicial Council does not have the option to make a selection but must propose that the Minister appoint such candidate. In the petitioner's opinion, the constitutional right determined by the third paragraph of Article 49 of the Constitution is guaranteed only if in a candidature procedure an effective legal remedy is available to the party in order to ensure that in proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts the legality and correctness of the application of substantive (statutory conditions and those of the call for applications) and procedural rules are examined. The interpretation provided by the Supreme Court allegedly does not ensure equal conditions of access to a position of employment, as in accordance with such interpretation the Minister can determine in each case which criterion will be decisive in appointing the president of a court. The complainant is convinced that, in the case at issue, the act on the appointment of the president of a court can only have so-called notarial effect. This allegedly entails that the Minister only examines the legality of the proposal of the Judicial Council, which includes an assessment whether the Judicial Council used its discretion in the selection without manifest errors, whereas he or she does not have the power of discretion regarding the assessment of the appropriateness of the candidate. In the complainant's assessment, the Minister would only have such power if the matter concerned an appointment to a predominantly political position. The petitioner draws attention to the fact that candidates who fulfil formal conditions are only ensured judicial protection against the appointment act issued by the Minister (the eighth paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA). Since supervision over the legality of decision-making begins only at that stage, it is allegedly logical that also during the appointment the Minister is obliged to assess the formal and substantive criteria for the selection of candidates, which had to be fulfilled during the entire candidature procedure, and not that at that level the Minister carries out the selection or appointment on the basis of a criterion that prior to that phase had not been applicable in the candidature procedure. In such an event, the candidate is not familiar in advance with the criteria decisive for the selection, therefore an action initiating a judicial review of administrative acts cannot entail an effective legal remedy (Article 25 of the Constitution). In addition, according to the petitioner, a legitimate goal of candidature procedures must also be the filling of vacant judicial posts, i.e. the continuity of the presidency of Slovene courts. The petitioner refers to the position of the Constitutional Court in a similar case,<sup>1</sup> according to which the duty of the Judicial Council to propose for election to the position of judge the only candidate who fulfils all the statutory conditions is in conformity with the public interest that all judicial posts be filled. In the petitioner's opinion, if the Minister had such autonomy in comparison to the role of the Judicial Council, the objective of filling judicial posts and ensuring the continuity of the leadership of Slovene courts could not be achieved, as there is no safeguard against arbitrary decision-making by the Minister.

6. On 1 June 2007, the petitioner supplemented his petition and submitted to the Constitutional Court also the texts of two international documents that refer to the manner of and procedure for appointing judges and to the implementation of the principle of the independence of the judiciary. He adds to his allegations regarding the unconstitutionality of the second paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA that, in view of Article 3 of the Act on the Judicial Review of Administrative Acts (Official Gazette RS, No. 105/06 – hereinafter referred to as the AJRAA-1), it follows from Order of the Constitutional Court No. Up-1679/07, dated 29 March 2007,<sup>2</sup> that in deciding whether to appoint a proposed candidate the Minister cannot be entirely autonomous and that such issue is thus not a matter left to his political discretion.

7. The petitioner also challenges the second sentence of the third paragraph of Article 321 of the CPA, which is allegedly inconsistent with Article 24 of the Constitution insofar as it relates to the judicial review of administrative acts. In the judicial review of administrative acts all cases that interest the public are, as a general rule, more complex, therefore the mentioned provision allegedly not only entails an interference with the right determined by Article 24 of the Constitution and its limitations, but actually a complete revocation of this right in all of the most important disputes between bearers of public authority and private entities, and those cases in which the public is interested.
8. By Order No. Up-679/06, dated 25 May 2006, the Constitutional Court accepted for consideration the constitutional complaint against Supreme Court Judgment No. I Up 143/2006, dated 29 March 2006, and suspended, until the adoption and finality of the decision of the Supreme Court on the request to reopen the proceedings concluded by Supreme Court Judgment No. I Up 143/2006, dated 29 March 2006, the procedure for appointing the president of the Ljubljana District Court, initiated on the basis of the Order of the Judicial Council dated 24 November 2005 (Official Gazette RS, No. 109/05). After the finality of the decision of the Supreme Court on the request for a retrial (Order No. VII 1/2006, dated 14 November 2006), the Constitutional Court dismissed, by Order No. Up-679/06, U-I-20/07, the (repeated) proposal of the complainant to suspend, until the final decision is adopted, the legal consequences of Supreme Court Judgment No. I Up 143/2006 and the implementation of the second paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA. Due to the concrete circumstances of the case, the Constitutional Court also assessed in that Order whether it would be necessary to determine a new manner of the implementation of the Order on the acceptance of the constitutional complaint dated 25 May 2006. It decided that it was no longer possible to substantiate the continuation of the temporary suspension of the procedure for appointing the president of the Ljubljana District Court. It namely established that the harmful consequences that could occur if the largest district court in the state was to remain without a president (given the fact that such an unacceptable state of affairs had already existed for more than one year) would be far greater than those that might occur to the complainant if a person other than him was appointed president of the Court.
9. In conformity with Article 56 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94), the Constitutional Court sent the accepted constitutional complaint to the Supreme Court and, pursuant to Article 22 of the Constitution, also to the Minister, and enabled the two of them to reply thereto. The Minister responded to the call of the Constitutional Court. In his reply, he rejects the complainant's allegations as unfounded. According to the Minister, the challenged Judgment cannot be considered to be "manifestly erroneous" or "without sound reasoning", because the reasoning and interpretation of the second paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA originate from constitutional and statutory provisions (i.e. of the CtsA), which is stated in a detailed manner in the reasoning. If the complainant understands this Act differently, this does not entail that the decision lacks sound reasoning, therefore the allegations regarding a violation of Article 22 of the Constitution are allegedly unfounded. The Minister was not able to discern from the constitutional complaint the reason why Article 25 of the Constitution was allegedly violated. Furthermore, the allegations of the complainant regarding the departure of the Supreme Court from the established case law is also allegedly unfounded. Namely, from the cases cited by the complainant it allegedly follows that the Supreme Court had not yet adopted a position on the interpretation of the second paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA, as the cited cases refer to procedures before the Judicial Council. Similarly, the allegations regarding the violation of the third paragraph of Article 49 of the Constitution are also allegedly unfounded. In the opinion of the Minister, the interpretation in accordance with which the term "appointment" also includes the right to choose cannot be inconsistent, already by the nature of the matter, with the mentioned constitutional right, which only guarantees the right to equal access and equal treatment, but not the right to be selected. The reply of the Minister was sent to the complainant, who responded that the reply did not necessitate additional argumentation of the constitutional complaint.

2 By this Order the Constitutional Court rejected as too early the complainant's constitutional complaint against Decision of the Minister of Justice No. 700-22/2005, dated 25 April 2007, by which in the new procedure the Minister again rejected the proposal of the Judicial Council to appoint the complainant to the office of the president of the Ljubljana District Court.

10. The petition was sent to the National Assembly for a reply thereto. In its reply the National Assembly dismisses the allegations regarding the unconstitutionality of the second paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA and of the second sentence of the third paragraph of Article 321 of the CPA. According to the National Assembly, the mere fact that the Supreme Court attributed to the term "appointment" a clear meaning despite the perhaps ambiguous character of the challenged provision proves that the allegation of the violation of Article 2 of the Constitution is unfounded. Likewise, the content of the challenged provision as follows from the interpretation of the Supreme Court is not inconsistent with the third paragraph of Article 49 of the Constitution, as the latter only guarantees equal treatment, and not the right to a position of employment. According to the National Assembly, the challenged provision does not by itself enable unequal treatment. Any possible violation of access under equal conditions to any position of employment is subject to judicial protection that is expressly ensured the eighth paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA, therefore, in the opinion of the National Assembly, the challenged provision cannot be inconsistent with Article 25 of the Constitution. With regard to the allegations of the petitioner concerning the inconsistency with Articles 3 and 125 of the Constitution, the National Assembly draws attention to Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-224/96, in which the Constitutional Court adopted the position that the statutory provision that envisages the participation of the Minister in the procedure for appointing the president of a court is not inconsistent with the principle of the separation of powers. In the opinion of the National Assembly, the interpretation advocated by the petitioner would exclude the Minister from the appointment procedure and would entail that the Judicial Council alone appoints the president. According to the National Assembly, such procedure would be inconsistent with the principle of the separation of powers. In the opinion of the National Assembly, the content of the challenged provision as follows from the interpretation of the Supreme Court also does not interfere with the principle of the independence of a judge. The National Assembly enclosed the opinion of the Government and stated that it agrees therewith in its entirety.

11. In its opinion on the allegations in the petition, the Government emphasises that an essential element in the interpretation of the second paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA is the principle of the separation of powers determined by the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution. In the procedure determined by the second paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA, in accordance with which the appointment of a holder of a judicial-administrative office within the judicial branch of power is decided upon, the Minister, as part of the executive branch of power, and the Judicial Council, as a sui generis constitutional authority, cooperate. In the opinion of the Government, the circumstance that the manner of the appointment of presidents of courts is not determined by the Constitution points to the fact that the manner of the appointment of presidents of courts leaves the legislature a wide margin of appreciation, provided, of course, that the fundamental constitutional values and the specificities of judicial office are taken into account, which also include the protection of the personal and substantive independence of judges. With respect to the provisions of the Constitution (the second paragraph of Article 3 and Articles 23, 125, and 129), the Government assesses that the condition of an “independent court” is fulfilled if a judge with life tenure is appointed president of a court. From the fact that in accordance with Article 7 of the CtsA the president of a court manages the operations of the court, i.e. directs court management, it follows that what is at issue is a typical administrative-executive office. Therefore, in the Government’s opinion, it is in conformity with the Constitution that the executive branch of power has a greater degree of influence in relation to the manner of or procedure for the appointment of the president of a court. The regulation allowing the Minister to decide independently whether to appoint the proposed candidate president or not is, in the opinion of the Government, in conformity with the Constitution also due to the fact that, on the basis of the principle of the separation of powers, the Minister and the Government (the executive branch of power), and not the president of a court, are accountable for the functioning of the judiciary as a whole to the National Assembly (the legislative branch of power). Undoubtedly, selection among several candidates (independent judges) proposed by the Judicial Council also includes the possibility to refuse the appointment of the only candidate. From the viewpoint of the system of checks and balances, the second paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA provides an appropriate guarantee of the protection of the independence of judges, as the Minister may not appoint a president of a court without the formal proposal of such by the Judicial Council. Concerning such, the Government draws attention to the fact that this function of the Judicial Council is not stated in the Constitution, therefore the legislature could also have selected some other autonomous and independent authority to propose candidates (e.g. the plenary session of the Supreme Court), and the judicial and executive branches of power would still be appropriately balanced. With respect to the challenged provision of the second sentence of the third paragraph of Article 321 of the CPA, the Government is of the opinion that this provision determines an exception from the public pronouncement of judgments, in conformity with the authorisation determined by the third sentence of Article 24 of the Constitution. In the Government's opinion, the challenged exception concerning the public pronouncement of judgments (when deciding in a complex case, courts may decide to issue the judgment in writing) already due to the nature of the matter applies to an even greater degree to the Supreme Court, which, in accordance with Article 127 of the Constitution, decides, as the highest court in the state, in particular on complex legal issues raised on the basis of filed extraordinary or ordinary legal remedies, with regard to which the principle of public proceedings does not apply to internal sessions. According to the Government, the regulation determined by the second sentence of the third paragraph of Article 321 of the CPA is not disproportionate from the viewpoint of the position of the Supreme Court, as it applies to the highest court in the state.

12. The Judicial Council also submitted its position regarding the allegations in the petition. In its opinion it states that the CtsA does not contain special provisions on the criteria that the president of a court must fulfil (except that he or she must be a judge), therefore the Judicial Council and the Minister are relatively free in making appointments; however, the cooperation of both the executive branch of power and the Judicial Council is necessary for an appointment. It stated that the Judicial Council as a specific intermediary authority in the system of the separation of powers carries out the first evaluation of a candidate's professional work, his or her organisational experience, and his or her submitted work programme, while the final selection rests with the Minister, who is not bound by the opinion of the Judicial Council. According to the position of the Judicial Council, in the event that the Judicial Council proposes only one candidate to the Minister, the Minister primarily assesses the elements stated in the law, as well as whether the Judicial Council's decision is well founded and acceptable. Thus, the Minister may also reject the candidate if he or she assesses that the candidate is not suitable.
13. In connection with the Government's position, the petitioner emphasises that the office of the president of a court is not administrative-executive but judicial-administrative in nature. Within the framework of such office, the conditions for the regular exercise of judicial power, and not executive-administrative power, are ensured. It is also due to this significant difference that, in the petitioner's opinion, each attempt by the executive power to exert influence on the appointment of presidents of courts must be expressly based on law. He draws attention to the fact that matters of justice administration are determined by Article 74 of the CtsA and are distinguished from matters of court management, which are determined in a general manner by Article 60. The only area where the matters of justice administration and court administration overlap is allegedly connected with the Minister's competence to supervise the performance of matters of court administration, with regard to which the Minister is allegedly not the only supervisory authority. Therefore, the Government allegedly refers in an unsubstantiated manner to the argument that the Minister is responsible for matters falling within the justice administration, due to which the Minister allegedly has the competence to reject the only proposed candidate.

14. The petitioner also does not agree with the position of the Judicial Council that the CtsA does not determine the criteria for the selection of presidents of courts. In connection with the position of the Judicial Council that the Minister and the Judicial Council interpret the content of the term "professional work" differently, the petitioner draws attention to the fact that the term "professional work" entails a statutory category determined by Article 29 of the Judicial Office Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 19/94, etc. – hereinafter referred to as the JOA). He alleges that in the case at issue he enclosed with his candidature application the evaluation of his work performance in judicial office that was adopted with finality, from which it followed that he fulfilled the conditions for faster promotion. He stresses that the reason for the fact that in the procedure for appointment the Judicial Council is included as the authority that carries out the selection is precisely that it is entrusted with the task of evaluating the professional qualifications of candidates. In such a manner, the legislature allegedly wished to prevent political criteria from being applied during recruitments. In the petitioner's opinion, the position of the Judicial Council that both the Judicial Council and the Minister allegedly have equal possibilities to select from among the candidates is not based on any constitutional provision, nor is it based on any established legal method of the interpretation of regulations.

B – I

15. The Constitutional Court accepted the petition for the initiation of proceedings to review the constitutionality of the second paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA. As the conditions determined by the fourth paragraph of Article 26 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 64/07 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the CCA) were fulfilled, it proceeded to decide on the merits of the case. During the preliminary procedure, the question was raised whether the eighth paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA, which regulates judicial protection in the procedure for the appointment of the president of a court, was in such mutual connection with the challenged provision that a review of the constitutionality of this paragraph was necessary to resolve the case. The Constitutional Court assessed that the review of the constitutionality of the eighth paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA was not necessary to resolve the case, therefore it did not initiate proceedings to review its constitutionality.

The Second Paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA

16. Article 62 of the CtsA regulates the appointment of presidents of courts. The second paragraph of this Article reads as follows:

“(2) The presidents of other courts are appointed by the Minister of Justice on the proposal of the Judicial Council for a term of six years with the possibility of reappointment.”

The Review of Conformity with Article 2 of the Constitution

17. One of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution) requires that regulations be clear and precise so that the content and purpose of a norm can be determined with certainty. The requirement of the clarity and precision of regulations does not mean that regulations must be such that they would not need to be interpreted. From the viewpoint of legal certainty, which is one of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law, as determined by Article 2 of the Constitution, a regulation becomes disputable when by means of the rules of the interpretation of legal norms the clear content of the regulation cannot be established (Decision No. U-I-32/00, dated 10 July 2003, Official Gazette RS, No. 73/03, and OdlUS XII, 71).
18. The petitioner alleges that the linguistic framework of the challenged second paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA allows for different interpretations. However, in accordance with the linguistic interpretation and considering also other methods of interpretation (the teleological, historical, and logical methods),<sup>3</sup> the second paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA can only be interpreted in a manner such that the power of the Minister to appoint the president of a court also encompasses the right to select [a candidate], and at the same time entails that the Minister has the right to not appoint a proposed candidate. The meaning of linguistic expressions must namely be interpreted above all in accordance with the purpose that a certain provision has. From the legislative material entitled The Proposal for Adopting the Courts Act<sup>4</sup> it follows that the purpose of the adoption of such a regulation under which the president of a court is appointed by the Minister of Justice on the proposal of the Judicial Council was to ensure that the executive branch of power is given a certain influence on the organisation of court operations.
19. The Minister is competent for matters of justice administration, which include ensuring general conditions for the successful exercise of judicial power, in particular the preparation of laws and other regulations from the field of the organisation and operations of courts, providing education and professional training for judges and other personnel, the publication of professional literature, ensuring the necessary personnel, material, technical, and spatial conditions, international legal aid activities, the enforcement of criminal sanctions, statistical and other research on the operations of courts, and other administrative tasks determined by law (Article 74 of the CtsA). The Minister cannot carry out such function without successfully cooperating with the presidents of courts. The presidents manage the operations of courts (Article 7 of the CtsA). Their competence extends to matters of court management (the first paragraph of Article 61 of the CtsA), which include decision-making and other tasks by which the conditions for the regular exercise of judicial power are ensured on the basis of law, judicial order, and other regulations. The successful provision of the conditions for the functioning of courts is thus only possible if the presidents of courts and the competent Minister cooperate appropriately.

20. If the purpose of the challenged provision is to enable the Minister to have an influence on the appointment of presidents of courts, then it is logical that the Minister is ensured influence only if his or her competence also includes the possibility that he or she does not appoint any of the candidates (independently of whether only one candidate or several candidates were proposed for appointment). Otherwise the inclusion of the Minister in the procedure for appointing presidents of courts would have no meaning.
21. It follows from the above that the allegation of the petitioner regarding the inconsistency of the challenged provision with Article 2 of the Constitution is unfounded.
22. Next, the petitioner proposes that, after reviewing the conformity with Article 2 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court first review the conformity of the challenged provision with the third paragraph of Article 49 of the Constitution in conjunction with Article 25 of the Constitution. However, in view of the content of the challenged statutory provision, it was first necessary to review its constitutionality from the viewpoint of conformity with the principle of the separation of powers (the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution) and with the principle of the independence of judges (Article 125 of the Constitution).

The Review of Conformity with the Second Paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution

23. The second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution reads as follows: “In Slovenia power is vested in the people. Citizens exercise this power directly and through elections, consistent with the principle of the separation of legislative, executive, and judicial powers.” In its decisions, the Constitutional Court has a number of times defined the content of the principle of the separation of powers.<sup>5</sup> In Decision No. U-I-224/96, upon the request of the Supreme Court, it reviewed precisely Article 62 of the CtsA.<sup>6</sup>

5 Its key positions were adopted in Decisions No. U-I-83/94, dated 14 July 1994 (Official Gazette RS, No. 48/94, and OdlUS III, 89), No. U-I-158/94, dated 9 March 1995 (Official Gazette RS, No. 18/95, and OdlUS IV, 20), and No. U-I-224/96, dated 22 May 1997 (Official Gazette RS, No. 36/97, and OdlUS VI, 65).

6 The Supreme Court claimed that the competence of the Judicial Council to select and propose candidates for the offices of presidents of courts in comparison with the competences of the Minister of Justice in the procedure for the appointment of the president of a court, as determined by the then Article 62 of the CtsA, did not ensure implementation of the principle of the separation of powers. In conformity with the role of the Judicial Council emphasised in the Constitution, in the opinion of the Supreme Court, the appointment

The provision of Article 62 of the CtsA has been amended several times since the mentioned Decision of the Constitutional Court was adopted; however, the matter now regulated by the second paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA was at the time of the adoption of Decision No. U-I-224/06 regulated by the first paragraph of that Article.<sup>7</sup> In the mentioned Decision, the Constitutional Court established that the regulation in accordance with which the presidents of courts are appointed by the Minister on the proposal of the Judicial Council was not inconsistent with the principle of the separation of powers determined by the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution. It emphasised that this principle does not allow for the autonomy of individual branches of power but establishes mutual dependency between them, and ensures that each of them exercises functions that are executive, legislative, and judicial in nature, and that the system of checks and balances is an essential component of the principle of the separation of powers from both the functional and organisational points of view. Therefore, from the organisational point of view of this principle, it holds true that, as a general rule, office holders in individual branches of power are not appointed to such positions by the branches themselves, but are appointed to such positions directly (deputies, for instance, through elections) or indirectly by the people (representatives from other branches of power with various competences participate in the procedure for appointing individuals to positions of power). The judicial branch of power is functionally much more independent than the other two branches of power, although even this independence is not absolute (namely, the judiciary does not determine its competences by itself, and judges are bound by law). However, such independence can be lesser in scope when the organisational aspect of the separation of powers is concerned. Since judges are bearers of power regarding whom direct responsibility to voters is not established, it is in conformity with the requirement of the mutual dependency of holders of different offices of state power that the legislative and executive branches cooperate in the appointment of judges and presidents of courts.

24. By Decision No. U-I-224/96, the Constitutional Court also explained that the concrete implementation of the principle of the separation of powers in individual states differs to such an extent that no general rule can be determined with regard to questions such as the regulation of the appointment of judges or presidents of courts. There are no generally valid patterns for establishing the balance between individual branches of power. This depends on every individual state and its specific constitutional regulation, which is created and exists in specific historical and social circumstances. Therefore, various organisational layouts are possible and indeed also exist regarding how the principle of the horizontal, vertical, and functional separation of powers is carried out in accordance with the specific historical and cultural cir-of presidents of lower courts should be entrusted to the Judicial Council.

- 7 By Decision No. U-I-224/96, the Constitutional Court assessed the first paragraph of Article 62 of the Courts Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 19/94 and 45/95), which then read as follows: "The president of a court is appointed by the Minister of Justice from among three candidates that are proposed by the Judicial Council, for a term of six years with the possibility of reappointment."

cumstances of a concrete adaptable and active constitutional regulation. Therefore, the petitioner cannot substantiate the alleged inconsistency by referring to various international documents and two judgments of the Constitutional Court of Italy.

25. The challenged second paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA only determines that presidents of courts are appointed by the Minister on the proposal of the Judicial Council for a term of six years with the possibility of reappointment. The selection procedure and the conditions for holding the position of president of a court are not determined in detail in the CtsA. The only express condition determined by the Act is that only a judge of a court of equal or higher rank may be appointed president of a court (the third paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA). In addition to this condition, it also determines that the candidates must enclose with their application their curriculum vitae with a description of their professional work and organisational experience after election to judicial office, and the [proposed] work programme of the court (the fifth paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA). From the seventh paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA, which regulates the procedure relating to the proposal of the Judicial Council, it follows that if more than one candidate applies for a vacant position, the Judicial Council selects from among the candidates that fulfil the conditions the candidate(s) whom it will propose to the Minister for appointment. The proposal must be reasoned (such that each candidate can understand on the basis of which information and criteria the Judicial Council established whether he or she fulfils the conditions), whereas the Judicial Council may state to which candidate it gives priority and reason such preference. The criteria are not determined in more detail in the Act.
26. The Judicial Council is not only an authority intended to implement the independence of the judicial branch of power,<sup>8</sup> but it is also, with respect to its power to make proposals, the authority that directs personnel policies in filling both vacancies in judicial offices as well as vacancies regarding the office of presidents of courts. Therefore, in the event that only one candidate who fulfils the conditions responds to a call for applications, the Judicial Council is not obliged to propose him or her to the Minister for appointment if it assesses that despite fulfilling the formal conditions, the candidate is not appropriate for performing the office of president of a court. Otherwise this power of selection by the Judicial Council would be hollowed out. The wording of the seventh paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA does allow for such (literal) interpretation. Systematic interpretation supports this. The JOA, which determines the procedure for the election or appointment of judges in more detail, namely expressly determines that the Judicial Council is not obliged to select a candidate who fulfils the formal conditions for the occupation of a vacant judicial post (the fifth paragraph of Article 18 the JOA). It is not apparent why in the event of the appointment and proposal of the president of a court this would be any different.<sup>9</sup>

<sup>8</sup> For more details, see Decision No. U-I-224/96, Paragraphs 10 and 11 of the reasoning.

<sup>9</sup> The petitioner refers to the position of the Constitutional Court in Decision No. Up134/96, in which it decided on the constitutional complaint of (the only) candidate for a judicial office whom the Judicial Council had not proposed to the National Assembly for election. In Decision No. Up-134/96, the Constitutional Court indeed adopted the position that “if there are several candidates that fulfil all the conditions, the Judicial

Therefore, the competence to make a substantive selection among the candidates is reserved for the Judicial Council as the proposer of (a) candidate(s) for president of a court. The Minister may namely only appoint as president one of the candidates proposed by the Judicial Council. A constitutionally consistent balance is thereby established that prevents excessive influence by the executive branch of power on the appointment of the presidents of courts.

27. Hence, in conformity with the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution, the challenged regulation only enables the appointment of the president of a court if both authorities concur on the appropriateness of the candidate, with regard to which the challenged regulation assumes that each of them will act responsibly. Therefore, the petitioner's position that if the Minister has the right to reject a proposed candidate, the Minister is superior to the Judicial Council, is erroneous. As the Constitutional Court already stated in Decision No. U-I-224/96, what is at issue is not a relation of superiority or inferiority, but a relation of mutual restriction. Each of the two authorities namely acts within the framework of its own position and competences. It is exclusively within the competence of the Judicial Council to establish which candidates fulfil both formal and substantive conditions, and which from among several candidates are, in its assessment, from the viewpoint of professional qualifications, organisational capacities, and their ability to perform the leadership tasks, more appropriate to manage a court. The Minister cannot assess the qualification of candidates to perform the office of president of a court from the aspects that fall within the exclusive competence of the Judicial Council, and even less may he or she assess their "political appropriateness" for performing such office. The Minister<sup>10</sup> has the right to select the candidate from either only one or several candidates proposed by the Judicial Council, or to not appoint any of the proposed candidates. The responsible conduct of the Minister in the exercise of this right presupposes that – in the event he or she does not appoint any of the candidates whom the Judicial Council established are professionally qualified to perform the office of president of a court – the Minister will explain the reasons for such decision. Only in such a manner can the Minister demonstrate that in adopting (any of) the proposed candidate(s) he or she was led by reasons in the public interest. In the reasoning of his or her decision, the Minister must strictly limit the reasons to those that fall within his or her competences, and must not address aspects that fall within the powers of the Judicial Council.

Council may select from among them – on the other hand, if there is only one candidate, in accordance with the provisions of the first paragraph of Article 19 and Article 33 of the JOA, it must propose that candidate for election, which is also in conformity with the public interest that all judicial posts be filled." However, it must be taken into consideration that the mentioned decision was adopted on the basis of the then in force special transitional regulation of the procedure for the election and appointment of judges with limited tenure to the office of judge with life tenure.

- 10 On the basis of Article 110 and the first paragraph of Article 114 of the Constitution, the Minister is responsible for the work of the Ministry, within the broader framework of which different activities related to the performance of judicial office fall, including the justice administration. The Minister is politically accountable to the National Assembly for the state of affairs in the judiciary.

28. It follows from the above that the second paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA is not inconsistent with the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution. With respect thereto, the Constitutional Court stresses that in order to adopt a decision in the case at issue, in reviewing the challenged provision it did not have to address the question of whether, in the event of a disagreement between the Judicial Council and the Minister, the regulation ensures the appointment of the president of a court in the shortest time possible. Irrespective of the fact that the Constitutional Court cannot review the appropriateness of the regulation, it does call upon the legislature to assess whether a situation in which, due to a disagreement between the Judicial Council and the Minister, the president of a court is not appointed for a longer period of time calls for legislative regulation. The Constitutional Court already drew attention to the role of the president of a court in the uninterrupted exercise of judicial power, and thereby in ensuring effective judicial protection, in its Order dated 18 January 2007, by which it decided on the proposal of the petitioner to suspend, until the adoption of the final decision in the case at issue, the new procedure for the appointment of the president of the court. Precisely in order to ensure effective exercise of power, such regulation is, for instance, determined already by the Constitution itself in the second paragraph of Article 165<sup>11</sup> relating to the exercise of the office of a Constitutional Court judge.

The Review of Conformity with Article 125 of the Constitution

29. By Decision No. U-I-224/96, the Constitutional Court also decided that the regulation according to which the president of a court is appointed by the executive branch of power is not inconsistent with the principle of the independence of judges determined by Article 125 of the Constitution. Due to the fact that the CtsA and the JOA have been amended a number of times since the mentioned Decision was adopted, the Constitutional Court assessed anew whether the challenged regulation enables the Minister to indirectly interfere with the independent position of judges due to his or her power to appoint the presidents of courts. In comparison with the regulation in force at the time,<sup>12</sup> under the regulation currently in force in the CtsA and the JOA, the powers and competences of the president of a court relating to the operation of courts are indeed significantly more extensive; however, the president's role is still predominantly limited to making proposals and giving opinions. In those cases, however, where the president's powers refer to decision-making that could affect the position of judges and thereby indirectly their independence,<sup>13</sup> the Act contains safe-

12 The CtsA (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 19/94 and 45/95) and the JOA (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 19/94 and 8/96).

13 For instance: decision-making on regular advancement to a higher salary grade and promotion to the rank of a senior judge (the third paragraph of Article 24 of the CtsA), decision-making on the assignment of judges [to other courts] (Article 69 of the JOA), the determination of an annual list assigning judges to certain legal fields (the first paragraph of Article 71 of the CtsA), the appointment of the head of an organisational unit guards that ensure the independence of judges.<sup>14</sup> The Act expressly determines that within the framework of matters relating to court management and supervision over such, interfering with the independent position of a judge in deciding on cases that were assigned to such judge is not allowed (the second paragraph of Article 60 of the CtsA). In accordance with point 2 of the first paragraph of Article 64 of the CtsA, all such attempts by the president of a court are also sanctioned by dismissing him or her from the office. Deciding on essential matters concerning the position of a judge is still reserved for the Judicial Council.<sup>15</sup> Therefore, in the assessment of the Constitutional Court, under the regulation in force at the time of this review, the president of a court does not have such powers that by exercising them he or she could possibly interfere with the independent position of judges. However, in reviewing the possible inconsistency of the challenged regulation from the viewpoint of Article 125 of the Constitution, in addition to the above, it is also and in particular necessary to take into consideration the fact that no one but a judge of a court of an equal or (Article 69 of the CtsA), decision-making on granting leave of absence (the third paragraph of Article 59 of the JOA), deciding on approving a leave due to educational training (the fifth paragraph of Article 63 of the JOA), requesting information and the inspection of a file also in cases not yet concluded with finality (the third paragraph of Article 12 of the CtsA and Article 6 of the Protection of the Right to a Trial Without Undue Delay Act, Official Gazette RS, No. 49/06).

- 14 If a judge assigned to a certain legal field by a decision of the president of a court appeals against such decision, the personnel council of the next higher court decides on the appeal (the second paragraph of Article 71 of the CtsA). If a judge appeals against a decision on assignment, the Judicial Council decides on the appeal (the fourth paragraph of Article 69 of the JOA). If a judge believes that his or her statutory rights, his or her independent position, or the independence of the judiciary have been violated in any manner, he or she may file an appeal before the Judicial Council (the sixth indent of Article 28 of the CtsA).
- 15 The Judicial Council is the authority empowered to select from among several candidates and to propose a candidate for election to a judicial office, as well as to propose that the National Assembly dismiss a judge. In accordance with Article 28 of the CtsA, the Judicial Council is empowered to decide on the incompatibility of judicial office with other offices; to give its opinion on a budget proposal for courts, and to provide the National Assembly with an opinion on laws regulating the status, rights, and duties of judges, as well as judicial personnel; to adopt the criteria for the minimum expected quantity of work for judges and the criteria for evaluating the quality of work performed by judges in office, and to decide whether an appeal of a judge who claims that his or her statutory rights, his or her independent position, or the independence of the judiciary were violated is well founded. In accordance with the JOA, the Judicial Council decides on the cessation of a judicial office (Article 33) by upholding the negative evaluation of the performance of judicial office; on promotion to a higher judicial rank, on faster advancement to a higher salary grade, on faster promotion to the rank of a senior judge or to a higher judicial post; and on extraordinary promotion to a higher judicial post (the third paragraph of Article 24); it decides on the transfer and allocation of judges to other courts (Articles 66, 68, 69, and 71); it decides on the incompatibility of judicial office with other offices and with the performance of other work (the third paragraph of Article 43); it decides on the granting of judicial scholarships (the second paragraph of Article 63); at the request of the president of a court, it adopts the final decision on whether a proposal for professional supervision is well founded (Article 79b); it submits proposals for the initiation of disciplinary procedures (the second paragraph of Article 91); it enforces certain disciplinary sanctions (the sixth paragraph of Article 83); and decides on the suspension of the president of the Supreme Court, as well as on appeals against decisions of the president of the Supreme Court on the suspension of other judges (the third paragraph of Article 95 and the first paragraph of Article 96).

higher rank can be appointed president of a court (the third paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA). Hence, the Minister only makes a selection from among the already elected judges, who, in accordance with the Constitution, are ensured life tenure and who in the performance of their judicial office must be independent and bound only by the Constitution and laws. Therefore, the challenged regulation is not inconsistent with Article 125 of the Constitution.

30. However, as regards the independence of the president of a court as a judge, already in Decision No. U-I-224/96 the Constitutional Court adopted the position that the president of a court must enjoy such independence as pertains to a judge. The Act has certain safeguards that ensure this. In accordance with Article 65 of the CtsA, the dismissal of the president of a court does not affect the position, rights, duties, and responsibilities that pertain to the dismissed president as a judge. If his or her judicial position is protected even in the event of early dismissal, then, in accordance with Article 63 of the CtsA, it is even more protected in the event of the termination of office of the president of a court due to the expiry of the term of office to which he or she has been appointed. In view of the above, the judicial position of the president of a court is not violated by the challenged regulation, and thereby also the principle of judicial independence determined by Article 125 of the Constitution is not violated.

The Review of Conformity with the Third Paragraph of Article 49 of the Constitution in Conjunction with the First Paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution

31. The petitioner links the exercise of the right of a candidate for the office of president of a court to compete with other candidates under equal conditions with Article 25 of the Constitution, which ensures the right to appeal or to any other legal remedy against the decisions of courts and other state authorities. The focal point of this human right is to ensure appellate decision-making concerning the deciding of state authorities. Therefore, in the case at issue the matter does not concern the question of a possible inconsistency with Article 25 of the Constitution, but of a possible inconsistency with the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution,<sup>16</sup> which ensures candidates effective judicial protection. The Constitutional Court emphasises that it only carried out the review in the framework of the petitioner's legal interest, i.e. only from the viewpoint of whether a candidate proposed by the Judicial Council to the Minister for appointment who is not selected by the Minister is ensured effective judicial protection.
32. The third paragraph of Article 49 of the Constitution ensures that everyone has access under equal conditions to any position or employment.<sup>17</sup> In Decision No. U-I-

16 The first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution reads as follows: "Everyone has the right to have any decision regarding his rights, duties, and any charges brought against him made without undue delay by an independent, impartial court constituted by law."

17 Concerning the right determined by the third paragraph of Article 49 of the Constitution, see Decision No. Up-134/96, dated 14 March 1996 (OdlUS V, 62); Decision No. U-I-321/96, dated 10 October 1996 (Official Gazette RS, No. 61/96, and OdlUS V, 133); Decision No. U-I-344/94, dated 1 June 1995 (Official Gazette RS, No.

198/03, dated 14 April 2005 (Official Gazette RS, No. 47/05, and OdlUS XIV, 22), the Constitutional Court stressed in particular “that in the event of applying for office in state authorities, including judicial office, individuals do not have a statutorily or even constitutionally protected right to occupy such a position. Such persons only have the right to compete for such position with others under equal conditions.” With respect to the above, also as regards applying for the office of president of a court, the candidates cannot be entitled to anything more than the right to compete for such position with others under equal conditions. Consequently, the regulation in accordance with which the Minister is free to not appoint a candidate proposed by the Judicial Council president of a court cannot in itself be inconsistent with the third paragraph of Article 49 of the Constitution in conjunction with the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution.

33. With regard to the above, the Constitutional Court decided that the second paragraph of Article 62 of the CtsA is not inconsistent with Article 2, the second paragraph of Article 3, Article 125, or the third paragraph of Article 49 of the Constitution in conjunction with the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution (Point 1 of the operative provisions).

B – II

The Second Sentence of the Third Paragraph of Article 321 of the CPA

34. The petitioner alleges that the second sentence of the third paragraph of Article 321 of the CPA is inconsistent with Article 24 of the Constitution insofar as it refers to proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts, as all the cases subject to these proceedings in which the public is interested are allegedly, as a general rule, more complex. Therefore, the mentioned provision allegedly entails the withdrawal of the right determined by Article 24 of the Constitution in all of the most important disputes, as well as in those interesting to the public, between bearers of public authority and private entities.
35. The AJRAA, which was in force at the time of the filing of the petition, and the AJRAA-1 do not contain special provisions on the public pronouncement of judgments. Therefore, in conformity with Article 16 of the AJRAA and Article 22 of the AJRAA-1,<sup>18</sup> the provisions of the CPA apply appropriately (mutatis mutandis) with regard to the public pronouncement of judgments in proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts. Article 321 thereof regulates the issuance and pronouncement of judgments. It determines that judgments are issued and pronounced in the name of the people (the first paragraph of Article 321) and that in the event a main hearing is held before a panel, the panel immediately issues a judgment upon the conclusion of the main hearing, which is pronounced by the president of the panel (the second paragraph of Article 321). The third paragraph of Article 321 of the CPA then determines that: “In more complex cases, courts may decide to issue the judgment in writing. In such event, the judgment is not pronounced but is served on the parties within thirty days from the day when the main hearing was concluded.” This provision also applies mutatis mutandis to the question of the pronouncement of judgments before the Supreme Court.

41/95, and OdlUS IV, 54); Decision U-I-371/98, dated 24 May 2001 (Official Gazette RS, No. 48/01, and OdlUS X, 104); and Decision No. U-I-202/99, dated 21 November 2002 (Official Gazette RS, No. 105/02, and OdlUS XI, 236).

18 The first paragraph of Article 22 of the AJRAA-1 reads as follows: “The provisions of the Civil Procedure Act apply mutatis mutandis to procedural issues that are not regulated by this Act (Official Gazette RS, 36/04 – official consolidated text).”

36. Article 24 of the Constitution (Public Nature of Court Proceedings) determines: “Court hearings shall be public. Judgments shall be pronounced publicly. Exceptions shall be provided by law.” The cited constitutional provision, which regulates the right to a public trial as a human right, includes a statutory reservation. It gives the legislature the authorisation to regulate exceptions, i.e. to limit the mentioned human right. In addition, by the second paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, the legislature is authorised to regulate by law the manner in which human rights are exercised also in cases where this is not already envisaged by the Constitution itself, but is necessary due to the nature of an individual right or freedom.
37. The right to the public pronouncement of judgments is primarily intended for the exercise of the right to a fair trial, which is, as a human right, also protected by Article 6 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms.<sup>19</sup> It is necessary to concur with the petitioner that the public pronouncement of judgments is an integral part of the right to a fair trial, an instrument of democratic public oversight regarding the functioning of courts, and an instrument for creating trust in the law. However, the right to the public pronouncement of judgments determined by Article 24 of the Constitution is one of the human rights that cannot be exercised directly on the basis of the Constitution. This means that the legislature must prescribe the manner of the exercise of this right, i.e. it must determine the form or manner of the public pronouncement of judgments with respect to the nature and requirements of different judicial proceedings. In the assessment of the Constitutional Court, the challenged provision, in accordance with which in more complex cases courts may decide to issue a judgment in writing, without orally pronouncing such, is part of the statutory regulation of the manner of the exercise of the right to the public pronouncement of judgments. A constitutional review of a statutory regulation that in terms of substance does not limit an individual human right, but only determines the manner of its exercise (the second paragraph of Article 15) must necessarily be self-restrained.<sup>20</sup> In such framework, as a general rule, the Constitutional Court only assesses whether the legislature had reasonable grounds for determining the manner of the exercise of that right. According to the Constitutional Court, the provision in accordance with which in more complex cases courts decide to issue the judgment in writing, which entails that in such cases the judgment is not pronounced, cannot be viewed as unreasonable. This in particular applies to the decision-making of the Supreme Court, which as the highest court in the state (Article 127 of the Constitution) decides on ordinary and extraordinary legal remedies (as a general rule) at non-public sessions, at which it resolves (generally) more complex legal issues. The petitioner proceeds from the erroneous supposition that the public pronouncement of judgments is only ensured by the oral pronouncement of judgments. Conversely, the right to the public pronouncement of judgments guarantees the public nature of the operative provisions of judgments, but not necessarily also the oral pronouncement of judgments. The requirement that the pronouncement of judgments be public is ensured already by enabling the public to consult the operative provisions. If, however, a judgment is pronounced orally, its operative provisions must always be read in public, even if the presence of the public is partially or entirely excluded during the oral statement of the reasons of the judgment.

38. It follows from the above that the petitioner's allegation regarding the inconsistency of the second sentence of the third paragraph of Article 321 of the CPA insofar as it refers to proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts with the right to the public pronouncement of judgments determined by Article 24 of the Constitution is unfounded.
39. Consequently, in this part the Constitutional Court dismissed the petition (Point 2 of the operative provisions).

The Constitutional Complaint against Supreme Court Judgment

No. I Up 143/2006, dated 29 March 2006

40. The subject of decision-making in the constitutional complaint at issue is whether the complainant's human rights were violated by the challenged Supreme Court Judgment. The complainant alleges, inter alia, that the Supreme Court Judgment violated his right to an impartial court determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution. Regarding such, he alleges that in the decision-making of the Supreme Court a judge participated who should have been disqualified, as there were circumstances raising doubt regarding his impartiality.
41. From the right to an impartial trial there follows, inter alia, the requirement that a judge must not be connected to a party or a subject of dispute in such a manner that could possibly cause or at least raise a justified suspicion that, concerning the dispute, the judge can no longer decide objectively, impartially, and by considering exclusively legal criteria. As the statutory provisions on the disqualification of a judge are directly intended to ensure the exercise of the human right to an impartial trial, on the basis of a constitutional complaint possible violations related thereto can also be reviewed by the Constitutional Court (this is stated in, e.g., Decision No. Up-52/99, dated 21 November 2002, Official Gazette RS, No. 105/02, and OdlUS XI, 285).
42. In accordance with the position of the ECtHR, for the existence of an impartial trial both subjective and objective criteria are important; the former concerns a determination of the personal beliefs of a judge who is deciding in a concrete case, while the latter concerns a review of whether in the proceedings the judge ensured the implementation of procedural safeguards in such a manner that any justified doubt concerning his or her impartiality is excluded.<sup>21</sup> In the exercise of the right to an impartial trial it is not only important that the impartiality of the trial is in fact ensured, but also that such is expressed outwardly. This refers to the so-called appearance of an impartial trial.<sup>22</sup> Hence, what is important is that in proceedings in a concrete case courts create and preserve the appearance of impartiality. Otherwise, both the trust of the public in the impartiality of courts in general and the trust of the parties in the impartiality of a trial in a concrete case can be jeopardised.<sup>23</sup> The ECtHR reiterated the mentioned positions also in Švarc and Kavnik v. Slovenia, dated 8 February 2007.

43. One of the most important procedural statutory institutes that serve to guarantee the human right to an impartial trial is the institute of the disqualification of a judge under civil procedure (Article 70 of the CPA). Since the AJRAA does not determine the reasons for disqualification, concerning this issue, in proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts, the provisions of the CPA apply appropriately, in conformity with Article 16 of the AJRAA. The reasons due to which a judge cannot participate in deciding in a concrete dispute can be classified into two core groups: the disqualifying reasons (judex inhabilis) determined by points 1 through 5 of Article 70 of the CPA, and the reasons for suspicion of partiality (judex suspectus) determined by point 6 of Article 70 of the CPA. The latter are not exhaustively enumerated in the Act but are defined by a general clause, i.e. if other circumstances exist due to which doubt arises regarding a judge's impartiality. A party must require the disqualification of a judge as soon as he or she learns that there exists a reason for disqualification, however at the latest by the end of the main hearing before the competent court, or, if no main hearing was held, by the issuance of the decision (the second paragraph of Article 72 of the CPA). A party can request the disqualification of a judge of a higher court until the issuance of the appellate decision, which means until the moment when the court sends a written copy of the judgment to a party. It is the president of the court who decides on the request of a party for the disqualification of a judge. When the concerned judge learns that his or her disqualification has been requested, he or she must immediately cease to perform any activity related to that case, unless the matter concerns disqualification under the sixth paragraph of Article 70 of the CPA, in accordance with which he or she may perform further activities (Article 74 of the CPA). If a judge is disqualified for the reason determined by the sixth paragraph of Article 70 of the CPA, the activities related to civil proceedings that he or she performed after the party filed the request for his or her disqualification for the mentioned disqualifying reason do not have legal effects (as stated by the Constitutional Court in Decision No. Up-365/05, dated 6 July 2006, Official Gazette RS, No. 76/06, and OdlUS XV, 93).

21 Cf. the Judgment of the ECtHR in Saraiva de Carvalho v. Portugal, dated 22 April 1994, Para. 33.

22 This requirement is best illustrated by the English legal saying "justice must not only be done, it must also be seen to be done." Cited according to A. Galič, Ustavno civilno procesno pravo [Constitutional Civil Procedural Law], GV Založba, Ljubljana 2004, p. 413.

23 Cf. the Judgment of the ECtHR in Coeme et al. v. Belgium, dated 22 June 2000, Para. 121.

44. In that specific case, on 5 April 2006, after having learnt from a newspaper that Supreme Court Judge Vasilij Polič, with whom he had been in a dispute concerning a fundamental question regarding judicial ethics, had participated in the adjudication of the specific case, the complainant submitted to the Supreme Court a motion for his disqualification. It follows from the allegations in the constitutional complaint that the mentioned Supreme Court Judge had promoted a book he had authored in the hall of the court without the permission of the President of the Ljubljana District Court (i.e. the complainant). Since, in the opinion of the complainant, the graphic image of the posters involved was extremely inappropriate from the viewpoint of the protection of the dignity and reputation of the court, the complainant criticised his actions severely. The complainant encloses a letter, dated 26 August 2005, in which he suggested to the Slovene Judges Association that it adopt a position on whether by posting such posters and by his statements made in an interview for the Mladina weekly, the Supreme Court Judge had observed the Code of Judicial Ethics and acted in conformity with the rules of the Judges Association. He also sent a copy of the mentioned letter to the President of the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court Judge allegedly publicly declared in the interview for the mentioned weekly that he and the complainant had been in a dispute concerning a fundamental question regarding judicial ethics in relation to the concrete out-of-court activity of the Supreme Court Judge. According to the complainant, the mentioned circumstances objectively justify doubt regarding the Judge's impartiality. The objectively justified conviction regarding the partiality of the mentioned Supreme Court Judge is allegedly additionally substantiated by the fact that the same Supreme Court Judge is deciding in case No. I Up 537/2003, in which the complainant is a party to proceedings, and that the Judge had not submitted the case for resolution when it was due. The complainant alleges that already on 15 December 2004 he proposed priority consideration of that case, but never received a reply to his proposal. When filing the constitutional complaint, his case had not yet been resolved, despite the fact that, according to the information given by the President of the Supreme Court, the time for the resolution of cases by the Administrative Division is considerably shorter than three years.
45. By Order No. Su 29/2006, dated 18 April 2006, the President of the Supreme Court rejected the complainant's request for the disqualification of the Judge (as being too late) by reasoning that the case had already been decided on at the panel session held on 29 March 2006. He then called on the complainant, by a special letter dated 18 April 2006, to make a statement whether his submission dated 4 April 2006 was to be considered as a request for a retrial even prior to the decision of the court becoming known. As on 3 May 2006 the challenged Judgment was served on the complainant, the complainant proposed that the Supreme Court decide on the request for a retrial. Contrary to the position of the Constitutional Court in Decision No. Up-365/05, the President of the Supreme Court deemed that the appellate proceedings concluded with the decision of the appellate panel dated 29 March 2006, and not with the issuance of the appellate decision. However, in his constitutional complaint the complainant does not challenge the Order of the President of the Supreme Court. By emphasising that judges are qualified to recuse themselves from adjudication when circumstances exist that could raise doubt regarding their impartiality, the complainant alleges that the Supreme Court Judge and the members of the appellate panel violated the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution.

46. In the event that circumstances exist that could raise doubt regarding a judge's impartiality (the rejecting reason determined by the sixth paragraph of Article 70 of the CPA), the second paragraph of Article 71 of the CPA imposes on the concerned judge the duty to notify the president of the court thereof, who then decides on his or her disqualification. However, when a panel decides on a case, the members of the panel are also obliged to consider any disqualifying reasons concerning the other members of the panel. The duty determined by the second paragraph of Article 71 as an individual judge's duty, which only concerns the reasons that are related to the individual judge personally, is, in the event of panel decision-making, a somewhat "collective" duty of the members of the panel, each of whom must individually also have regard to disqualifying reasons that refer to the other members of the panel. In the considered case, the mentioned circumstances were undoubtedly known to the Supreme Court Judge even before the appellate panel issued its decision. Furthermore, prior to the final decision on the case (i.e. even before the court sent a written copy of the judgment to the parties to proceedings) also at least two members of the appellate panel had been aware of these circumstances. From the Order of the President of the Supreme Court on the rejection of the request for the disqualification of the Judge, it namely follows that on the same day when the request was filed (i.e. on 5 April 2006), the President of the Supreme Court informed the head of the Administrative Division of the Supreme Court and the president and a member of the appellate panel thereof.
47. In the case at issue, the decision of the Constitutional Court does not depend on answering the question of whether the Supreme Court Judge was in fact partial, but on the question of whether as regards the Supreme Court Judge there are any circumstances that would arouse justified doubt regarding his impartiality in a reasonable person rationally considering all the circumstances of the case. As was already mentioned, from the right to an impartial trial there also follows the requirement that in proceedings in a concrete case the court creates and maintains the appearance of impartiality. According to the Constitutional Court, the circumstances of the concrete case stated in Paragraph 44 of the reasoning are such that in a reasonable person they arouse serious doubt regarding the impartiality of the Supreme Court Judge, and such that they allow for doubt concerning the impartiality of the Court, not only in the eyes of the complainant but also objectively.<sup>24</sup> The Supreme Court Judge and the members of the appellate panel who knew of the mentioned circumstances could have proposed his disqualification, by which in the concrete case they could have ensured the appearance of the impartiality of the trial, however they did not do so. It follows from the above that the Court did not ensure the appearance of the impartiality of the trial, which means that in the concrete case the Court did not fulfil the requirements regarding such that follow from the right to an impartial trial. With regard to the above, the complainant's right determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution was violated by the challenged Judgment.

48. During the proceedings for deciding on this constitutional complaint, on the basis of a new procedure to appoint the president of the Ljubljana District Court, initiated on the basis of the Judicial Council Order dated 26 April 2007 (Official Gazette RS, No. 41/07), by Decision of the Minister of Justice No. 700-22/2005, dated 30 June 2007, a different person was appointed to the office of the president of the Ljubljana District Court. Legal interest is one of the procedural prerequisites for any proceedings, including constitutional complaint proceedings. As a general rule, the Constitutional Court deems that in constitutional complaint proceedings legal interest is demonstrated if the complainant demonstrates with a sufficient degree of probability that the granting of his constitutional complaint would entail a certain benefit for him or her (the improvement of his or her legal position) that he or she could not achieve without such. Legal interest must be demonstrated when the constitutional complaint is filed and the Constitutional Court must ex officio monitor whether this condition remains fulfilled throughout the proceedings. Although the office of the president of the Ljubljana District Court is occupied at the time of the adoption of this Decision, due to the specific circumstances of the case at issue the Constitutional Court did not decide to reject the constitutional complaint, inter alia also because in its Order dated 18 January 2007, by which it decided on the motion for suspension, due to the function of the president of the court it gave priority to the uninterrupted exercise of judicial power, whereby it enabled the appointment of the new president of the Court. Therefore, the Constitutional Court decided to assess whether in the proceedings before the Supreme Court the complainant's human rights and freedoms were violated. By taking into consideration the specific circumstances of the case and by applying the provisions of Article 47 in conjunction with Article 49 of the CCA, in its decision-making the Constitutional Court limited itself to establishing that there was a violation of the human right determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution (Point 3 of the operative provisions).
49. From the statements made in the constitutional complaint there also follows the allegation that the trial was unreasonably lengthy (the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution). The Constitutional Court does not have jurisdiction to review possible violations of human rights that directly result from the conduct of a court or the failure of a court to perform due conduct. From 1 January 2007, the protection of the right to a trial without undue delay has been regulated by the Protection of the Right to a Trial without Undue Delay Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 49/06). With regard to the above, the constitutional complaint had to be rejected in this part (Point 4 of the operative provisions).

The Constitutional Complaint against Supreme Court Order No. VII Ips 1/2006, dated 14 November 2006, in Conjunction with Supreme Court Order No. VI Ips 4/2006, dated 17 May 2006

50. In relation to the violation of the right to an impartial court determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution, in addition to the above-considered constitutional complaint, the complainant also filed a motion for a retrial against Supreme Court Judgment No. I Up 143/2006 on the basis of point 4 of the first paragraph of Article 85 of the AJRAA. Since the Supreme Court had dismissed his appeal by Order No. VII 1/2006, dated 14 November 2006, and upheld the first instance Supreme Court order that had rejected the complainant's motion for a retrial, the complainant also filed a constitutional complaint against the mentioned Supreme Court Orders.
51. In accordance with the first paragraph of Article 50 of the CCA, under the conditions determined by this Act, any person may file a constitutional complaint before the Constitutional Court if he or she considers that one of his or her human rights or fundamental freedoms was violated by an individual act of a state authority, local community authority, or a bearer of public authority. Anyone who requests judicial protection of his or her rights and legal interests must demonstrate a legal interest. He or she must demonstrate with a sufficient degree of probability that the granting of his or her request would entail for him or her a certain legal benefit that he or she could not otherwise gain. A legal interest must also be demonstrated in order to file a constitutional complaint. The Constitutional Court must ex officio monitor whether legal interest exists throughout the proceedings.
52. Since the Constitutional Court established a violation of the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution already when assessing the constitutional complaint against Judgment No. I Up 143/2006, according to the Constitutional Court the complainant no longer demonstrates a legal interest for the continuation of these constitutional complaint proceedings. Therefore, the Constitutional Court rejected it (Point 5 of the operative provisions).

C

53. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of Article 21, the second paragraph of Article 26, Article 47 in conjunction with the first paragraph of Article 49, and the first and second indents of the first paragraph of Article 55b of the CCA, and the second indent of the second paragraph of Article 46 of the Rules of Procedure of the Constitutional Court (Official Gazette RS, No. 86/07), composed of: Dr Janez Čebulj, President, and Judges Dr Zvonko Fišer, Dr Franc Grad, Lojze Janko, Mag. Marija Krisper Kramberger, Milojka Modrijan, Dr Ciril Ribičič, and Jože Tratnik. Point 1 of the operative provisions was reached by seven votes against one. Judge Fišer voted against and submitted a dissenting opinion. Points 2 through 5 of the operative provisions were reached unanimously.

Dr Janez Čebulj
President

1. This dissenting opinion refers to Point 1 of the operative provisions of the Decision, by which the Constitutional Court decided that the second paragraph of Article 62 of the Courts Act is not inconsistent with the Constitution. I voted against the majority decision as I, conversely, am of the opinion that the challenged provision is not in conformity with the Constitution, and in this separate opinion I would like to explain my position.
2. This occasion was not the first time the Constitutional Court decided on the constitutionality of the provisions of the CtsA that regulate the appointment of the presidents of courts. The suspicion that something was wrong with this regulation from the constitutional viewpoint arose already in 1996, i.e. very soon after the new judicial legislation entered into force. The amendment was challenged at that time, together with numerous other provisions, by the Judicial Council and the Supreme Court, i.e. the constitutionally determined judicial self-government authority and the highest court in the state, both of them thus being exceptionally exposed authorities in the judicial field. In the part that also interests us this time, i.e. concerning the appointment of the presidents of courts, the Judicial Council emphasised that the law puts it in a subordinate position in relation to the executive branch of power. The latter is allegedly given the possibility to interfere through “its presidents” with the independent position of judges, and to politically control the judicial power. The Supreme Court was similarly of the opinion that the disputed provision puts the Minister in a superior position in relation to the Judicial Council, as the Minister is not obliged to follow the Judicial Council’s opinions with respect to the selection of candidates.

At that time, the Constitutional Court decided by a tight majority that Article 62 of the CtsA, as it read at the time of decision-making, was not inconsistent with either the principle of the separation of powers or the principle of the independence of judges, and that it was also not unclear. Therefore, it decided that it was not inconsistent with the Constitution (see also Decision No. U-I-224/96, dated 22 May 1997, which is cited a number of times in that Decision).

Judge Krivic submitted a dissenting opinion to that Decision. He underlined that the accentuated role of the Minister of Justice in appointing presidents of courts was inconsistent in particular with the principle of the separation of powers. “In the existing circumstances in which the independence of the judicial power is only now being gradually and slowly established after long decades of its subordination to politics, I view it as too dangerous to give the executive branch of power such a strong influence on the judicial power as is included in the possibility to appoint the presidents of courts,” stated Krivic in the middle of 1997. He further stated that a proper solution to this would be that presidents of courts are appointed by the Judicial Council, although not one composed as it was at the time, but by a strengthened Judicial Council modelled on the Italian example.

3. I have always been in favour of the idea that the position of the judicial power should in general be strengthened in society, both due to its manifest deficiencies in the past and, even more so, because the judicial power is very specific and not easily comparable in all aspects with the two other branches of power. It is in particular necessary to be aware of the fact that it is substantially more sensitive and vulnerable than the other two are. Gaining the self-confidence necessary for deciding is a lengthy process that can be crucially affected already by an apparently unimportant move or event that perhaps has no connection with the concrete matter. Furthermore, it is difficult to imagine that judicial power would by itself exceed its institutional framework and become vampiric in a manner such as sometimes occurs in the other branches of power. In the vast majority of instances, the abuses of judicial power were abuses caused by others who used the judiciary primarily as a tool. If anything, it would be possible to allege, on a purely principled level, that the judiciary has not been successful in defending itself against its abusers, i.e. that it has not resisted enough. But the danger of the instrumental use, i.e. abuse, of the judiciary is unending. I do not know of any society or any state in which the other branches of power, in particular the executive (to avoid calling it the general political) branch of power, do not strive to gain, have, or maintain their influence on the judiciary. Perhaps at this moment it is no longer possible to speak as vehemently as in the past of decades of judicial power being subordinated to politics; however, despite everything, it is still better to be cautious. The establishment of judicial power that is independent in all aspects is a very demanding process that must continuously be striven for and which can never be fully achieved.

The Slovene judiciary acts in a cramped manner and under numerous pressures, due to which it cannot realise its creative potentials, irrespective of the fact that these are lesser in scope than one would wish. It does not enjoy sufficient public trust, and at the same time very little has been done to increase such trust. Society is insufficiently aware that the judiciary is only a reflection thereof, of its members, and institutions. The judiciary is continuously being criticised due to the delays, which it largely did not cause itself. Among the solutions for such and for the other problems in the judiciary, quantity criteria, instead of quality, prevail, which results in positive effects being smaller than they could be, or even in there being none at all. The structure of the judiciary is unfavourable from a number of aspects and it is even becoming worse. Moreover, the judiciary is extremely poorly paid, despite the fact that the opposite is constantly asserted.

Not that I uncritically accept everything that is happening in the judiciary and in connection therewith, and that I do not see numerous deficiencies concerning such, but the least I can say is that in our country the judiciary is treated on various levels in an incorrect manner and undervalued, and in a manner unconstructive from the viewpoint of the functioning of the state. The positive results achieved fade significantly in the face of the unresolved problems: as this matter does not concern an issue directly related to deciding on the case at issue, I perhaps should not state that according to numerous parameters the position of the judiciary at present is not better than it was a decade ago.

If for a certain period of time it appeared that with the amendments to the Constitution and judicial legislation the judiciary would move towards a better position at the most general level, it must be underlined that this did not occur. Judges are still elected by the parliament: certainly, in connection with such we can say that in such a manner it democratically legitimises them to adjudicate in the name of the people, which is more or less a nice sounding declaration. However, judges adjudicate with no less legitimacy also where they are not elected by the parliament. Those of us who pay less importance to grandiose words say, concerning the election of judges by the parliament, that a judge whose office is professional is put in his or her position by a par excellence political authority. The Judicial Council indeed undoubtedly remains an important constitutional authority in the field of the judiciary, however its position has not significantly strengthened, and it is certainly far from being deemed to represent the apex of judicial self-governance.<sup>1</sup>

4. One element in the mosaic of regulating relations in the judiciary is the procedure for appointing presidents of courts. Perhaps it is not the most important one, but it should not under any condition be underestimated. The president of a court is the head of the judges in the authority that he or she directs, and is the one who decides on a number of matters. On the one hand, the president has an indisputable formal power of decision-making, while on the other, which is probably something that does not need to be specifically proven, the president has at his or her disposal countless levers by means of which he or she can influence the work, ambience, efficiency, professionalism, creativity, and many other aspects at the court that he or she directs. After all, it is the president whom a judge contacts when he or she simply needs – to talk. In sum, the president's influence on the operations of the court he or she directs is (or can be) formally and in reality very significant, therefore the significance of this office for the operation of the judiciary in the broadest sense possible should not in any manner be underestimated.
5. Ultimately, self-evident proof of the above statement is the indisputable fact that due to the successive changes in the judicial legislation the tasks of presidents of courts have accumulated to an extraordinary degree. With every amendment to the CtsA the competences of presidents of courts have only expanded. The legislature thus decided to react to problems in the judiciary, inter alia, by strengthening the office and position of presidents of courts.

The present Decision of the Constitutional Court is based on the reasoning of Decision No. U-I-224/96, wherein it compared the tasks and position of presidents of courts. It correctly established that, as already mentioned, in accordance with the existing regulation the competences and authorisations of presidents of courts are far more extensive than they were a decade ago; however, I cannot concur with the conclusion that their role is still predominantly limited to making proposals and issuing opinions.<sup>2</sup> The Constitutional Court established that deciding on the essential issues of a judge's position is reserved for the Judicial Council, whereas when the president of a court decides on issues that could affect the position of judges and thereby indirectly(!) their independence, it is the CtsA that includes safeguards ensuring the independence of judges. The Constitutional Court listed the provisions of judicial legislation that fall within one or the other mentioned category,<sup>3</sup> and established in the end that the regulation does not give presidents of courts competences that when exercised would interfere with the independent position of judges.

1 Concerning the Judicial Council and its role in the Slovene legal system, from the perspective of comparative law, and de lege ferenda, see also Z. Fišer, Sodni svet ali pravosodni svet [The Judicial Council or the Justice System Council], in: Normativne spremembe na področju sodstva v Republiki Sloveniji [Normative Changes in the Field of the Judiciary in the Republic of Slovenia], pp. 10–24, Slovensko sodniško društvo, Ljubljana 2001.

2 See Paragraph 29 of the reasoning of the Decision.

Such a conclusion does not convince me. As seen above, the judiciary is a complexly structured mechanism that operates in an exceptionally sensitive field in which even the seemingly technical competences of presidents of courts may have very long-lasting consequences. Often it is impossible to carry out a precise analysis of everything an individual provision can cause in a concrete case in joint effect with other provisions. It is not necessary that, for instance, the regulation entails in itself an interference with the independent position of judges, as it can occur that this is what it results in, even unintentionally, in joint effect with other regulations. In such case it is necessary to consciously choose a solution that will not interfere or will interfere to a lesser degree with judicial self-regulation.

If one examines what has occurred in the last decade regarding the position of presidents of courts (excluding the Supreme Court, which is not relevant in the case at issue), it is first necessary to establish that development has not in any case followed the direction advocated by Krivic. After all the amendments to Article 62 of the CtsA and to numerous other provisions of that Act that regulate their tasks and competences, presidents of courts are still appointed by the Minister upon the proposal of the Judicial Council. The provisions that regulate appointment and have an influence thereon are, taken as a whole, such that in a concrete case they resulted in the largest district court in the state remaining without a president for significantly more than a year. The Constitutional Court itself recognised in the present Decision that that was not good, and suggested that such deficiency be remedied.<sup>4</sup> In this respect, I would be even stricter, as I am of the opinion that something like that is unacceptable and that the regulation cannot be in conformity with the Constitution already due to the fact that it can lead to a stalemate situation. The system of checks and balances is an important democratic achievement, however mutual blockages entail a disruption that is not acceptable. In my view, a regulation that results in such a consequence cannot pass constitutional review.

In brief, all of this means that the regulation of the appointment of presidents of courts currently in force is, in my opinion, inconsistent with Articles 3 and 125 of the Constitution. Therefore, I could not vote in favour of Point 1 of the operative provisions of the Decision.

6. The efforts of the state to make the judiciary work more effectively and efficiently are legitimate, even necessary; however, the increasingly detailed regulation of all possible situations and the strengthening of the competences of presidents of courts, which is consistently shown to be one of the critical points where the executive power can interfere with the judiciary, is not the right way forward. No matter how unusual, not to say heretical, it may sound at the moment, I am convinced that concerning the first part [of the reasoning], the path of internal judicial self-regulation with a strengthened role (and of course also responsibility) of the Judicial Council should have been pursued.

---

3 See, in particular, notes 13–15 in Paragraph 29 of the reasoning of the Decision.

4 See, in particular, Paragraph 28 of the reasoning of the Decision.

On the other hand, as regards the regulation of the competences of presidents of courts, with some poetic freedom I would characterise their position in the initial text of the CtsA as idealised and somewhat naïve. Since then [i.e. since the adoption of the original CtsA], the entire development has gone very decisively in the direction of emphasising the office of presidents of courts, which is leading them – if it has not yet led – towards the position of managers. This is where I see a further significant difference between the position of presidents of a court that they enjoyed at the time when the Constitutional Court decided on this matter for the first time, and the position that they enjoy today.

In other words, as long as the office of the president of a court remains within the limits of the tasks and competences that are traditional in our legal environment, then a decision on the appointment thereof should in terms of substance be made by the Judicial Council. However, if in the meantime the substance of such office has essentially changed – and I am increasingly inclined to consider that it has – then the matter at issue concerns a completely different position that should be regulated differently and assessed anew. This is then a type of head of a court that does not exist in our legal environment, let alone is familiar. Such regulation is indeed possible and recognised in comparative law; certainly it has its advantages and disadvantages. I am not going to adopt a position thereon at this time; however, I would like to warn against intermediate solutions. As Slovenes like to state robustly, such are neither fish nor fowl.

7. Although the key principled questions regarding the appointment of presidents of courts were completely the same also this time as those during the first decision-making [by the Constitutional Court on this issue], the present decision-making was accompanied by certain new aspects. Among such, particularly notable was the fact that the Constitutional Court was at the same time deciding on the constitutionality of a law on the basis of the petition of an individual as well as on his constitutional complaints. Due to such, it is impossible to avoid the impression that that part of the decision-making, which was extremely important for the complainant, at least partially diverted attention from the principled questions that I have discussed above. While I certainly do not claim that the Constitutional Court did not consider them very thoroughly, there was, nonetheless, at the same time a great deal of attention dedicated to various procedural aspects of decision-making in the procedure for appointing presidents of courts. For such reason, it appears that by its Decision the Constitutional Court attempted to establish a kind of balance between the problems of a principled nature and deciding on concrete violations that negatively affected the complainant. I am not convinced by the Decision also from this perspective.

DECISION

At a session held on 18 October 2012, in proceedings to review constitutionality initiated upon the request of the National Council of the Republic of Slovenia, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

The Act on Cooperation Between the National Assembly and the Government in EU Affairs (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 34/04, 43/10, and 107/10) is not inconsistent with the Constitution.

*ReasoningA

1. The National Council (hereinafter referred to as the applicant) filed a request to initiate proceedings to review the constitutionality of the Act on Cooperation Between the National Assembly and the Government in EU Affairs (hereinafter referred to as the ACBNAGEUA). It alleges that the ACBNAGEUA is inconsistent with the Treaty of Lisbon, which amends the Treaty on European Union and the Treaty Establishing the European Community (UL C 306, 17 December 2007 – hereinafter referred to as the Treaty of Lisbon), because regarding EU affairs it does not regulate the role of the National Council.
2. The applicant alleges that the Parliament of the Republic of Slovenia is composed of two chambers, namely the National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia and the National Council, and is of the opinion that in EU affairs the role of both chambers should have been regulated by law. The ACBNAGEUA is allegedly unconstitutional precisely because it fails to regulate the role of the National Council in the field of EU affairs and it only regulates the relationships between the National Assembly and the Government. The applicant alleges that its role in the consideration of EU affairs is very weak, if compared with the role of parliaments' second chambers in other EU Member States. This weakness is allegedly expressed both in the relation to the National Assembly and in the relation to the Government. It is of the opinion that in EU affairs the National Assembly and the National Council should be more equal. In the opinion of the applicant, the role of the National Council in the procedure for the adoption of legal acts and decisions in the European Union should not only entail the hindering and correction of hasty decisions of the National Assembly, as is characteristic of internal legislative procedures; instead, the National Assembly and the National Council should complement each other and together cooperate with the Government, which directly cooperates, as the executive branch of power, in decision-making within the institutions of the European Union. The applicant substantiates such standpoint by stating that the role of national parliaments in the European Union increased after the implementation of the Treaty of Lisbon. It refers to Article 12 of the Treaty on European Union (UL C 83, 30 March 2010, consolidated version – hereinafter referred to as the TEU), which determines how national parliaments contribute actively to the good functioning of the European Union and in such framework emphasises, above all, Protocol (No. 1) on the Role of National Parliaments in the European Union, which in Article 8 determines that in the systems that are not unicameral, its provisions shall apply to all the chambers of which such parliaments are composed. The applicant is therefore of the opinion that also [Slovene] national law should in an appropriate manner take into consideration the fact that at the level of EU law, a formal role is envisaged in procedures before the institutions of the European Union for both chambers – i.e. both the National Assembly and the National Council. However, due to the fact that in the field of EU matters the challenged ACBNAGEUA only regulated the position of the National Assembly and entirely overlooked the National Council, in the national legal order there allegedly exists a legal gap with regard to the National Council that is inconsistent with the Treaty of Lisbon.

3. Within the framework of the general allegation that the ACBNAGEUA does not regulate the position of the National Council in EU affairs, the applicant alleges in particular that Article 11a of the ACBNAGEUA is inconsistent with the Treaty of Lisbon – or, more precisely, with the first paragraph of Article 8 of Protocol (No. 2) on the Application of the Principles of Subsidiarity and Proportionality (UL C 83, 30 March 2010 – hereinafter referred to as Protocol No. 2) – because it does not determine that in addition to the National Assembly also the National Council can require that an action be filed before the Court of Justice of the European Union on grounds of a violation of the principle of subsidiarity by a legislative act of the European Union.
4. Due to the mentioned inconsistencies with the Treaty of Lisbon, the ACBNAGEUA is consequently allegedly inconsistent also with Articles 8 and 153 of the Constitution.
5. The National Assembly did not reply to the request.

B – I

6. With regard to the fact that the applicant proposes that the Treaty of Lisbon be the criterion for the review of the constitutionality of the ACBNAGEUA, and in particular that the first paragraph of Article 8 of Protocol No. 2 [be the criterion] for the assessment of Article 11a of the ACBNAGEUA, the Constitutional Court first had to assess whether it has jurisdiction to carry out such assessment. In the hitherto constitutional case law, the Constitutional Court adopted the position that it is not competent to assess the conformity of national regulations with EU directives (Decision No. U-I-32/04, dated 9 February 2006, Official Gazette RS, No. 21/06, and OdlUS XV, 10). Similar holds true for the review of the constitutionality of national regulations with EU regulations; by Order No. Up-328/04 and U-I-186/04, dated 8 July 2004 (OdlUS XIII, 82), the Constitutional Court inter alia adopted the position that in light of the fact that EU regulations are not treaties, Article 8 of the Constitution does not apply thereto, and the Constitutional Court is also not competent on the basis of the second indent of the first paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution.

7. In the case at issue, the legal situation is different. The Treaty of Lisbon, to which the applicant refers, represents so-called primary EU law. Its fundamental characteristic is that it is adopted and amended in such form and by such procedure as is ordinary for treaties, because ratification in all the Member States is necessary, in conformity with their constitutional rules, in order for the amendments to enter into force.<sup>1</sup> The Treaty of Lisbon also entered into force in such manner; it was signed on 13 December 2007 and on 1 December 2009 it entered into force, after it was ratified by all EU Member States. In the Republic of Slovenia, the National Assembly ratified by law, on the basis of Article 86 of the Constitution, the Treaty of Lisbon.<sup>2</sup> Therefore, in the Slovene national constitutional [legal] order, the Treaty of Lisbon has the status of a treaty. Such entails that for the review of the constitutionality of the ACBNAGEUA in the case at issue, Article 8 and the second paragraph of Article 153 of the Constitution, in conformity with which laws must be in conformity with treaties that are binding on Slovenia, are relevant. At the same time, such also entails that the Constitutional Court has jurisdiction under the second indent of the first paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution, in conformity with which the Constitutional Court has jurisdiction to decide on the conformity of laws with ratified treaties.
8. With regard to the fact that the Treaty of Lisbon amended the previous TEU and the Treaty Establishing the European Community – the latter was renamed the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (hereinafter referred to as the TFEU), the Constitutional Court deemed that in the part in which the applicant alleges an inconsistency of the ACBNAGEUA with the Treaty of Lisbon it alleges an inconsistency with the TEU and the TFEU. The European Union is based on these two treaties, which have equal legal validity, as is explicitly determined by the third paragraph of Article 1 of the TEU and the second paragraph of Article 1 of the TFEU.
9. The Constitutional Court also has jurisdiction to assess the consistency of Article 11a of the ACBNAGEUA with the first paragraph of Article 8 of Protocol No. 2, because on the basis of Article 51 of the TEU, Protocols form an integral part of treaties and have thus the same legal status as the TEU and the TFEU.

1 The procedure for the revision of the treaties on which the European Union is based is regulated by Article 48 of the TEU.

2 The Act Ratifying the Treaty of Lisbon amending the Treaty on European Union and the Treaty Establishing the European Community (Official Gazette RS, No. 20/08, and MP, No. 4/08).

B – II

10. With the transfer of the exercise of part of [Slovene] sovereignty to the European Union, which occurred on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 3a of the Constitution, important substantive changes arose in the constitutional relationship between the National Assembly as the legislative branch of power and the Government as the executive branch of power. The legislative competence of the National Assembly substantially diminished, precisely to the benefit of the Government, because the representatives of the latter in the EU adopt legislative and other decisions that with regard to their content would otherwise fall within the competence of the National Assembly. Precisely due to these changes in the constitutional balance between the National Assembly and the Government, which is based on the constitutional principle of the separation of powers, the Constitution envisaged the cooperation of the National Assembly and the Government in EU affairs. It ensured the National Assembly the possibility to directly monitor and assess the activities of the Government in the European Union and, in doing so, direct and even bind it with its positions.<sup>3</sup> In accordance with the fourth paragraph of Article 3a of the Constitution, in the procedures for the adoption of legal acts and decisions in the European Union the Government informs the National Assembly thereof; with regard to the proposals of acts and decisions, as well as the activities of the Government, the National Assembly may adopt positions that the Government must take into consideration in its activities. The Constitution left the regulation of the relations between the National Assembly and the Government in the procedures for the adoption of EU acts and decisions to be regulated in more detail by a law adopted by a two-thirds majority vote of National Assembly deputies present. The ACBNAGEUA is this law.

11. The fourth paragraph of Article 3a of the Constitution thus does not envisage the direct cooperation of the National Council in EU affairs, and this also does not follow from other provisions of the Constitution. In fact, such does not entail that the National Council cannot cooperate in the formation of the opinions of the Republic of Slovenia with regard to the legal acts and decisions of the European Union; such cooperation in the legal procedures that are carried out in conformity with the national law takes place within the framework of its other constitutional competences determined by Article 97 of the Constitution.<sup>4</sup> From this constitutional provision it follows that the Constitution does not ensure a direct relationship between the National Council and the Government. The influence of the National Council on the functioning of the Government – also in EU affairs – is only indirect, i.e. through the influence that it may have on the functioning of the National Assembly when carrying out its constitutional and statutory competences. In such context, of particular importance is the constitutional competence of the National Council entailing that it may convey to the National Assembly its opinion on all matters within the competence of the National Assembly (the second indent of the first paragraph of Article 97 of the Constitution), therefore also on all the matters that refer to the European Union. In order for this constitutional competence of the National Council to be effectively carried out, legislative solutions were adopted that impose certain obligations on the National Assembly (and also the Government) in relation to the National Council. For instance, the first paragraph of Article 54 of the National Council Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 100/05 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the NCA) determines that the president of the National Assembly is to inform the president of the National Council of the sessions of the National Assembly and send him or her all the materials on matters that are on the agenda of the sessions of the National Assembly, and the second paragraph of Article 56 determines that the National Council and its working bodies are to cooperate with the working bodies of the National Assembly and present them opinions on the matters falling within their competence. In relation to the Government, it is in particular the first paragraph of Article 56 of the NCA that is relevant, which determines that the National Council and its working bodies have the right to request from state authorities explanations and information with regard to matters that they are dealing with.

12. When alleging an unconstitutionality of the national legislation that regulates the procedures under national law in which those positions are formed that the Government supports in the institutions of the European Union – in the case at issue, the ACBNAGEUA – it is not possible to refer to the Treaty of Lisbon or the TEU and the TFEU. In fact, it is true that the TEU, the TFEU, and the Protocols that form an integral part of the treaties regulate in multiple places the significance and the role of national parliaments and also give them certain concrete authorisations;<sup>5</sup> however,

5 The fundamental provision that defines the role of national parliaments in the European Union is Article 12 of the TEU, which determines:

“National Parliaments contribute actively to the good functioning of the Union:

- (a) through being informed by the institutions of the Union and having draft legislative acts of the Union forwarded to them in accordance with the Protocol on the role of national Parliaments in the European Union;
- (b) by seeing to it that the principle of subsidiarity is respected in accordance with the procedures provided for in the Protocol on the application of the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality;
- (c) by taking part, within the framework of the area of freedom, security and justice, in the evaluation mechanisms for the implementation of the Union policies in that area, in accordance with Article 61c of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, and through being involved in the political monitoring of Europol and the evaluation of Eurojust’s activities in accordance with Articles 69g and 69d of that Treaty;
- (d) by taking part in the revision procedures of the Treaties, in accordance with Article 48 of this Treaty;
- (e) by being notified of applications for accession to the Union, in accordance with Article 49 of this Treaty;
- (f) by taking part in the inter-parliamentary cooperation between national Parliaments and with the

these instances concern the regulation of direct relationships between the national parliaments (and their individual chambers) and the European Union and its institutions, and not the regulation of how Member States are to form and adopt, in their national legal orders, the positions that the representatives of their governments support in the institutions of the European Union or that are, within the framework of the European Union, the subject of intergovernmental cooperation.

13. The treaties on which the European Union is based do not determine how Member States are to form and adopt, in conformity with their national law, [their] positions in EU affairs and what the role of national parliaments and their individual chambers is to be in these procedures. Also the provisions of the treaties on which the European Union is based that otherwise refer to the position of national parliaments in the European Union do not deal with national constitutional questions. Therefore, the TEU, the TFEU, and Protocol No. 2 are not relevant in any manner to the question of what the constitutional relationship between the National Assembly, the National Council, and the Government should be in the national procedures that refer to EU affairs. The allegation of the applicant that the ACBNAGEUA (or the legal order as such) is inconsistent with the TEU and the TFEU, and consequently with the Constitution, because it does not regulate the role of the National Council in EU affairs, is thus unsubstantiated.
14. In the assessment of the Constitutional Court, also the special allegation that Article 11a of the ACBNAGEUA is inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 8 of Protocol No. 2 is unsubstantiated. The applicant alleges that Article 11a of the ACBNAGEUA, which regulates the procedure by which the National Assembly imposes on the State Attorney's Office [the obligation] to file an action before the Court of Justice of the European Union on grounds of a violation of the principle of subsidiarity by a legislative act of the European Union, should also give the same competence to the National Council. Such a requirement entailing the equal treatment of the National Assembly and the National Council allegedly follows from the first paragraph of Article 8 of Protocol No. 2 and also from the general equal treatment of the second chambers of national parliaments under EU law.
15. The competence of national parliaments to ensure, in the fields that do not fall within the exclusive competence of the European Union, compliance with the principle of subsidiarity, is a special competence of theirs that is originally determined by EU law and does not follow from Member States' national law. The third paragraph of Article 5 of the TEU and point (b) of Article 12 of the TEU thus determine that national parliaments ensure compliance with the principle of subsidiarity in accordance with the procedure set out in Protocol No. 2. This protocol envisaged, as a primary mechanism, the cooperation of national parliaments in the legislative procedure: in conformity with Article 4 of Protocol No. 2, draft legislative acts are sent to national parliaments, and then, on the basis of Article 6 of Protocol No. 2, any national parliament or any chamber of a national Parliament may, within eight weeks from the date of transmission of a draft legislative act, submit a reasoned opinion stating why it considers that the draft in question does not comply with the principle of subsidiarity. Further reasoned opinion procedures depend on how many national parliaments (or individual chambers) were opposed to the draft legislative act at issue due to the alleged violation of the principle of subsidiarity. When taking into account the “weight” of the collective veto of national parliaments against a certain draft legislative act, each national parliament has two votes, and in bicameral parliamentary systems each of the two chambers has one vote (Article 7 of Protocol No. 2).

16. In addition to the ex ante cooperation of national parliaments, Protocol No. 2 also envisaged an ex post mechanism to ensure [the implementation of] the principle of subsidiarity. On the basis of Article 8 of Protocol No. 2, the Court of Justice of the European Union has jurisdiction in actions on grounds of infringement of the principle of subsidiarity. With regard to the subjects entitled to file an action, the mentioned provision of the Protocol determines that a Member State may file an action before or notify the Court of Justice thereof in accordance with its legal order on behalf of its national parliament or a chamber thereof.<sup>6</sup>
17. From the above it is evident that there is a significant difference between the cooperation of national parliaments in the initial phase of the legislative procedure and their role before the Court of Justice of the European Union after the legislative act has already been adopted. While Protocol No. 2 directly and comprehensively regulates their role in the legislative procedure of the European Union, with regard to their position before the Court of Justice of the European Union it refers to the regulation under national law. From the wording of the first paragraph of Article 8 of Protocol No. 2, which states that [the Court of Justice of the European Union] is “notified [by Member States of actions] in accordance with their legal order on behalf of their national Parliament or a chamber thereof;” it clearly follows that EU law does not give national parliaments or their individual chambers active standing to directly file actions on grounds of a violation of the principle of subsidiarity; their legal position, as well as the position of individual chambers of parliaments, with regard to the initiation of a procedure before the Court of Justice of the European Union is a question of national law.
18. On the basis of the above, the Constitutional Court assessed that the fact that the challenged Article 11a of the ACBNAGEUA gave only the National Assembly the competence to require the State Attorney’s Office to file, on its behalf (and in conformity with its instructions), an action before the Court of Justice of the European Union on grounds of a violation of the principle of subsidiarity by a legislative act of the European Union, is not inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 8 of Protocol No. 2.

6 The first paragraph of Article 8 of Protocol No. 2 determines the following: “The Court of Justice of the European Union shall have jurisdiction in actions on grounds of infringement of the principle of subsidiarity by a legislative act, brought in accordance with the rules laid down in Article 263 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union by Member States, or notified by them in accordance with their legal order on behalf of their national Parliament or a chamber thereof.”

19. Since the Constitutional Court assessed that the ACBNAGEUA is not inconsistent with the TEU and the TFEU, and that Article 11a of the ACBNAGEUA is not inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 8 of Protocol No. 2, there is consequently also no inconsistency with Articles 8 and 153 of the Constitution.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE DR JADRANKA SOVDAT

1. I voted against the Decision because I do not concur with the argumentation on the basis of which the Constitutional Court established that the Act on Cooperation Between the National Assembly and the Government in EU Affairs (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 34/04 etc. – hereinafter referred to as the ACBNAGEUA) is not inconsistent with the Constitution. Due to the fact that the applicant required, above all, a review of the constitutionality of Article 11a thereof, I will also focus on the reasons for the assessment of this statutory provision. The finding that this statutory provision is not inconsistent with the Constitution in fact entails the finding that it is not inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 9 of Protocol No. 2 on the Application of the Principles of Subsidiarity and Proportionality (UL C 83, 30 March 2010), which was the major premise of the assessment of the Constitutional Court in the case at issue. I am of the opinion that before such a finding was adopted the Constitutional Court should have either submitted a question to the Court of Justice of the European Union for a preliminary ruling, in conformity with the third paragraph in relation to point (a) of the first paragraph of Article 267 of the Treaty on European Union (UL C 83, 30 March 2010 – consolidated version – hereinafter referred to as the TEU), with regard to the interpretation of the mentioned provision of the Protocol, or convincingly reasoned why it deems that what is at issue is an entirely clear provision of primary EU law.
2. I concur with the starting points of the Decision regarding the fact that what the Constitutional Court is dealing with is a request for the review of the consistency of a statutory provision with a provision of primary EU law and that the Constitutional Court has jurisdiction to carry out such assessment on the basis of the second indent of the first paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution, in conformity with which the Constitutional Court has jurisdiction to decide on the conformity of laws with ratified treaties. The treaty that we are dealing with in the case at issue is a special treaty that does not grant national constitutional courts jurisdiction to interpret it, but explicitly entrusts such jurisdiction to the Court of Justice of the European Union. Many years ago that Court determined, in the case CILFIT (No. 283/81, dated 6 October 1982), the criteria on the basis of which national courts may also in cases where there has been no prior decision made by the Court of Justice of the European Union interpret by themselves individual provisions of primary law. The so-called acte clair doctrine established a general starting point in accordance with which the correct application of law must be so obvious as to leave no scope for any reasonable doubt as to the manner in which the question raised is to be resolved; before they can come to such a conclusion, the national court at issue must be convinced that such interpretation is equally obvious to all the courts of the other Member States and to the Court of Justice of the European Union (paragraph 16 of the judgment). Moreover, the Court of Justice of the European Union determined additional criteria that require a comparison of all the different language versions of the text, the observance of peculiar EU law terminology, and the placement of the interpretation in the context of this law (paragraphs 18, 19, and 20 of the judgment).

3. It is true that in legal theory many objections have already appeared against such strictness as follows from the CILFIT judgment.<sup>1</sup> In newer legal theory it is proposed that the sole limitation should be the finding that the correct application of law is so obvious as to leave no scope for any reasonable doubt as to the manner in which the question raised is to be resolved,<sup>2</sup> which should unburden national courts of the impossible task that the CILFIT judgment requires them to carry out and at the same time establish mutual consideration and trust between courts.<sup>3</sup> These are the “arguments” that could at least call for the Court of Justice of the European Union to reconsider the criteria set forth in the CILFIT judgment. However, the Court also has to be given the possibility to actually do that. In my opinion, the fact that until now it has not done so does not allow us to simply state that the matter is clear, with regard to which the applicant alleges that primary EU law ensures him a position that the challenged statutory provision deprives him of.
4. Is it really possible in the case at issue to substantiate that from the first paragraph of Article 8 of Protocol [No. 2] it clearly follows, not only that EU law does not give national parliaments or their individual chambers active standing to directly file “actions on grounds of infringement of the principle of subsidiarity” but also that their legal position, as well as the position of individual chambers of parliaments with regard to the initiation of a procedure before the Court of Justice of the European Union, is a question of national law? Does such argumentation ensure the Constitutional Court that it manifestly correctly interpreted the wording of primary [EU] law so that this interpretation leaves no room for any reasonable doubt with regard to [the question of] in what manner the question at issue should be resolved, if we go no further than the fundamental starting point that the Court of Justice of the European Union introduced in the judgment CILFIT? In this [interpretation], the Constitutional Court deemed that the wording “in accordance with their legal order” is not connected only to the phrase “notified by them in accordance with their legal order,” i.e. the fact that the regulation of who shall have locus standi, on behalf of the “national Parliament or a chamber thereof,” before the Court of Justice of the European Union, depends on the national law of the [Member] States; obviously, individual [Member] States entrusted such active standing to their governments and not to the State Attorney’s Office, as Slovenia has done by the challenged provision, and this is also a subject of discussion in the legal literature.<sup>4</sup> The Constitutional Court also stated that the Protocol left the question of what is a “national Parliament or a chamber thereof” entirely to the national regulation of Member States.<sup>5</sup> Nevertheless, what is at issue is that in this case the primary EU law especially and explicitly regulates the relations between national parliaments and their chambers [on the one hand] and the European Union and its institutions [on the other], i.e., in the case at issue, the Court of Justice of the European Union. In fact, if the Constitutional Court adopted the position that the phrase “(notified by them) in accordance with their legal order” only refers to the question of who files an action on behalf of the national parliament or a chamber thereof and in what manner it files an action (i.e. whether this is the government or, in Slovenia, the State Attorney’s Office, and what the procedure is after the decision to file an action), then immediately the following question arises: Who decides on the filing of an action in the instances of bicameral parliaments, with all the variations from complete bicameralism to different types of so-called incomplete bicameralism, or to authorities such as the Slovene National Council is in this respect? Even the question of whether such a decision can also be made on behalf of an individual chamber by its internal working bodies can arise.<sup>6</sup>

4 See, e.g., M. Wyrzykowski et al., The Role of National Parliaments in the European Union, General Report, Proceedings of the FIDE XXIV Congress, Madrid 2010, Vol. 1. See also P. Kiiver, The National Parliaments in the European Union: A Critical View on EU Constitution-Building, Kluwer Law International, The Hague 2006, pp. 164–165. See also R. Barents, The Court of Justice after the Treaty of Lisbon, Common Market Law Review, Vol. 47, 3/2010, p. 727.

5 If it did leave it, also the question can be raised to which Kiiver draws our attention and which in the case at issue opens a whole variety of subjects that in light of truly different national legal regulations can access the Court. In such manner, Kiiver inter alia states: “Who are ‘the national parliaments’ in the specific context of subsidiarity enforcement? On what basis should they be assigned formal privileges before the ECJ? There do not seem to be any selection criteria. As noted at the very beginning, leaving the determination of who is the parliament to the Member States may work with the assignment of duties, but not with the distribution of powers and privileges. [...] Methodologically, the only solid solution would again be to draw up a list mentioning exhaustively all national parliaments that would have locus standi by name.” Kiiver, op. cit., p. 166.

6 This is also discussed in M. Wyrzykowski et al., op. cit.

Is all of this really completely beyond a reasonable doubt? Would it not be just as possible for the Constitutional Court to arrive at the opposite interpretation, i.e. that the phrase “in accordance with their legal order” only refers to the question of who “notifies”, i.e. files the action, and by what procedure? In fact, if this is so, then the question arises whether in instances of multi-chambered national parliaments primary [EU] law really entrusts, in the case of complete bicameralism, the role of guardian of the principle of subsidiarity only to both chambers together or to each of them [separately], or in the case of incomplete bicameralism, equally [the role of guardian to each of them], and in such framework also whether, if what is at issue is such an authority as the Slovene National Council, such an authority [is entrusted with this role] as well, as the applicant in the case at issue alleges.

5. Since, in my opinion, the Decision does not provide satisfactory answers to all of these questions, I did not vote in favour of it.

Dr Jadranka Sovdat

DECISION

At a session held on 14 November in proceedings to review constitutionality initiated upon a request of the Ombudsman for Human Rights, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. The first paragraph of Article 188 of the Fiscal Balance Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 40/12, and 105/12) in conjunction with the eleventh paragraph of Article 429 of the Pension and Disability Insurance Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 96/12, and 39/13), and the second, third, and fourth paragraphs of Article 188, and Article 246 of the Fiscal Balance Act are inconsistent with the Constitution insofar as they concern female civil servants as insured women who have not yet fulfilled the same conditions for acquiring the right to an old age pension as apply to insured men.
2. The first paragraph of Article 188 of the Fiscal Balance Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 40/12) was inconsistent with the Constitution insofar as it concerned female civil servants as insured women who have not yet fulfilled the same conditions for acquiring the right to an old age pension as applied to insured men.
3. The legislature must remedy the inconsistency established by Point 1 of the operative provisions within a time limit of six months following the publication of this Decision in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia.
4. Until the established inconsistency is remedied, the employment contract of a female civil servant may be terminated due to the [fulfilment of the] prescribed retirement conditions only after she has fulfilled the same conditions for acquiring the right to an old age pension as apply to insured men on the basis of the challenged provisions.
5. In the remaining part, the provisions of the Fiscal Balance Act referred to in Points 1 and 2 of the operative provisions are not or, as applicable, were not inconsistent with the Constitution.

1. In the request of 13 June 2012 and the supplement to the request of 15 January 2013, the Ombudsman for Human Rights challenges Article 188 of the Fiscal Balance Act (hereinafter referred to as the FBA), in its original text and its text as amended by the eleventh paragraph of Article 429 of the Pension and Disability Insurance Act (hereinafter referred to as the PDIA-2), and Article 246 of the FBA. It alleges that the challenged provisions are inconsistent with the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of sex and age, as defined by the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution in conjunction with Articles 49 and 66 of the Constitution. It alleges that the challenged regulation treats women unequally and less favourably in comparison with men in the regulation of the termination of an employment contract due to the fulfilment of the prescribed retirement conditions, as women fulfil these conditions, which are determined by the Pension and Disability Insurance Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 109/06 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the PDIA-1) and the PDIA-2, at a younger age than men. It is of the opinion that the special, more favourable regulation of the conditions for obtaining an old age pension for women may not be a reason for less favourable regulation of their protection with regard to the termination of an employment contract. As a result [of such differentiation], female civil servants, allegedly, can no longer avail themselves of labour law protection of their employment at a younger age and find themselves in a more precarious position with regard to their future employment sooner [than men]. Such allegedly reduces the opportunities of women to equally participate in employment and develop their professional careers. The applicant adds that the challenged regulation is also disputable from the viewpoint of the law of the European Union (hereinafter referred to as the EU), whereby it relies on the case law of the Court of Justice of the European Union (hereinafter referred to as the CJEU) and Directive 2006/54/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 5 July 2006 on the implementation of the principle of equal opportunities and equal treatment of men and women in matters of employment and occupation (recast) (OJ L 204, 26. 7. 2006, p. 23 – hereinafter referred to as Directive 2006/54/EC).
2. In the applicant's opinion, the challenged regulation also places all older civil servants who fulfil the prescribed retirement conditions in an unequal or less favourable position in comparison with younger civil servants who have not yet fulfilled these conditions with regard to labour law protection in connection with the termination of an employment contract. In such manner, the challenged regulation allegedly denies older civil servants any manner of appropriate protection against arbitrary and unsubstantiated termination of employment on grounds of age. Their employment is allegedly precarious and dependant on the will of the employer. This allegedly places them in an excessively subordinate position, which, in the applicant's opinion, can have negative consequences in other areas as well. The applicant is of the opinion that the attainment of a certain age or the fulfilment of retirement conditions which is inseparably linked with the attainment of a certain age, cannot be regarded as a circumstance that would by itself be linked with a worker's (in)ability to perform his or her work. In connection with the prohibition of discrimination, [the applicant] also mentions Article 4 of the Convention of the International Labour Organisation No. 158 concerning Termination of Employment at the Initiative of the Employer (Official Gazette of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, MP, No. 4/84, Act on Notification of Succession to UNESCO Conventions, International Multilateral Air Traffic Agreements, ILO Conventions, International Maritime Organisation Conventions, Customs Conventions and Certain Other International Multilateral Agreements, Official Gazette RS, No. 54/92, MP, No. 15/92), and Article 24 of the European Social Charter (Revised) (Official Gazette RS, No. 24/99, MP, No. 7/99 – hereinafter referred to as the ESC). As the opportunities for these persons to find new employment are allegedly rather limited due to the characteristically poor employability of older persons, in the applicant's opinion, the right to an old age pension in fact becomes the obligation [to retire]. The applicant also refers to Article 6 of Council Directive 2000/78/EC of 27 November 2000 establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation (OJ L 303, 2. 12. 2000, p. 16 – hereinafter referred to as Directive 2000/78/EC) and the CJEU case law based thereon. In addition, the applicant substantiates its allegation of a violation of the prohibition of discrimination by claiming that by means of a so-called provisional measure intended to balance public finances the challenged regulation interferes permanently with the labour law position of persons in a particular age group who will fulfil the retirement conditions precisely when the challenged measure enters into force or who have already fulfilled such conditions before its entry into force. Due to this “provisional” measure, only those to whom the “provisional” regulation applies will have to bear the permanent and irreparable consequences in the fields of labour law and social law also after the “provisional” measure ceases to be in force.

3. Furthermore, in the applicant's opinion, the challenged regulation, without any justification, puts public sector employees in an unequal position in comparison with those who are not employed in the public sector, as for the latter the general labour law regulation does not provide for termination of an employment contract due to similar reasons.
4. The applicant claims that, insofar as it concerns the termination of the employment contracts of university teachers and researchers, the challenged regulation is inconsistent with the constitutionally guaranteed autonomy of the university and other institutions of higher education (Article 58 of the Constitution) in conjunction with the constitutionally guaranteed freedom of scientific and artistic endeavour (Article 59 of the Constitution), also because it does not provide for a transitional period to enable adaptation. It is of the opinion that the legislature's interference with the recruitment of academic personnel is contrary to the constitutionally protected autonomy of universities, in particular due to the omission of prior coordination with the universities. The applicant emphasises that the provision of scientific instruction is subject to decades of scientific and educational training, as obtaining the title of a university teacher for a particular area is subject to extremely demanding habilitation procedures. The challenged regulation therefore allegedly creates difficulties for the universities that cannot be resolved in the short term, but require long-term additional resources and effort to fill the resulting void. The challenged measure therefore allegedly constitutes a severe interference with the functioning of the universities and allegedly threatens the pursuit of their mission in the areas of education and research. Thereby the applicant refers to Constitutional Court Decisions No. U-I-156/08, dated 14 April 2011 (Official Gazette RS, No. 34/11), and No. U-I-22/94, dated 25 May 1995 (Official Gazette RS, No. 39/95, and OdlUS IV, 52). It also draws attention to the possibility that the challenged regulation could result in the termination of the employment contracts of the rector of [one of the] universities and some of the deans of its faculties, who were democratically elected to such positions by the university's employees and students. It adds that scientific activity requires continuity that cannot be ensured through the continuous extension of employment relationships by means of the ad hoc arrangements envisaged [by the challenged regulation]. Continuity is alleged to be a necessary precondition for the freedom of scientific endeavour within an autonomous university space.

5. The applicant also alleges that the challenged regulation is unclear and insufficiently precise (an inconsistency with Article 2 of the Constitution), as allegedly its content and purpose cannot be established. Thereby the applicant highlights a lack of clarity regarding the possibility that a person who has already fulfilled the prescribed retirement conditions could be employed anew in the public sector and the question of the legal nature of a final decision on the termination of an employment contract. As the challenged regulation does not include a transitional period, it allegedly inadmissibly interferes with the principles of a state governed by the rule of law determined by Article 2 of the Constitution, since it further violates the principle of trust in the law. With regard to such, the applicant emphasises that the legislature has to provide for a transitional period when a new regulation interferes with on-going relationships or legitimate legal expectations. From the viewpoint of the affected individuals, such allegedly concerns an unconstitutional interference with their legitimate expectations, as at the time they entered into such employment and during its duration they could not have expected such a change in their position with regard to labour and social law due to the complete absence of similar provisions before the challenged regulation. The applicant further stresses that the challenged regulation entails extremely significant changes for the universities, which have to provide scientific, research, and educational activities that will be sustainable in the long-term and developmentally oriented, whereby planning the careers of professors constitutes a long-term process and not an ad hoc decision.
6. In its reply to the request, the National Assembly highlights that when comparing public sector employees with those who work in the private sector with regard to the termination of their employment contracts one must take into account that such concern different positions. Resources for private sector employees are ensured by private entities that are constantly exposed to the functioning of the market and required to make adaptations, which entails a lower degree of employment security.

Employment in the private sector is conditioned by the market, while in the public sector employment is a matter of the state providing resources for employees from its budget. With regard to discrimination on grounds of age, the National Assembly emphasises that the measures adopted by the legislature have a different effect on individual age groups, depending on the economic situation of society and the time of the adoption of a concrete measure. It adds that the affected employees have already secured for themselves a level of social security that younger employees have yet to attain. It is of the opinion that the challenged regulation is consistent with the case law of the CJEU as well as the Constitutional Court, which has not yet adopted the explicit position that a regulation is automatically inconsistent with the Constitution solely due to the application of age as a condition for the termination of an employment contract. It also draws attention to other positions where one is deemed to no longer be eligible to continue to work after attaining a certain age (judges, notaries). With regard to discrimination on grounds of sex, the National Assembly states that not a single concrete case of a woman who would have been affected by the alleged discriminatory differentiation has been demonstrated. The National Assembly further opposes the allegation that the challenged provisions are unclear and insufficiently precise, as the statements that the challenged regulation was unexpected allegedly in fact indicate that the regulation is comprehensible, but individuals have difficulty accepting it. However, regarding the allegations in relation to the transitional period of the challenged regulation, it states that, taking into account the nature and objectives of the FBA, it would not have been feasible for the Act to determine a longer transitional period. In addition, in certain instances the challenged provisions already allegedly enable an uninterrupted work process, whereby the affected civil servants have at their disposal adequate legal protection against arbitrary decisions by their superiors. The National Assembly is further of the opinion that the applicant's allegation regarding the interference with the autonomy of the universities and the faculties as well as with the freedom of scientific and artistic endeavour (Articles 58 and 59 of the Constitution) is unsubstantiated, as it is for the employer (i.e. the universities and the faculties) to decide whether to conclude an agreement with a civil servant to continue an employment relationship in order to ensure an uninterrupted work process. The National Assembly is of the opinion that due to the different possibilities to engage in educational and scientific work even in the event of the termination of their employment contracts, the affected individuals are not deprived of their autonomy in educational and scientific pursuits. The National Assembly assesses that the challenged regulation entails a balancing between different interests and generations. The affected individuals are allegedly able to continue to work elsewhere or on a contractual basis. The National Assembly adds that the Constitution does not guarantee long-term or permanent employment.

7. The Government also submitted an opinion. It emphasises that the challenged provisions regulate the termination of the employment contracts of civil servants and do not entail their direct or even mandatory retirement. It states that the challenged measure of the termination of an employment contract due to the fulfilment of the conditions for acquiring the right to an old age pension without reductions pursues, on the one hand, the objectives of personnel restructuring, promoting younger workers' access to employment and thereby improving the intergenerational distribution [of employees], and, on the other hand, the objective of controlling public finance expenditures, namely by reducing the labour costs, as during their careers civil servants progress to higher pay grades than the one they had upon entering the civil service system, and by reducing the number of public sector employees. The Government adds that civil servants whose employment contracts are terminated on the basis of the challenged regulation have the right to an old age pension without reductions and thus their social security is guaranteed. Notwithstanding such, they may allegedly independently and freely choose to either retire or remain on the employment market by concluding a new employment relationship in the private sector, in another form of employment, as job seekers, or as unemployed persons. The Government explains that it already drew attention to Directive 2000/78/EC in the draft of the FBA and highlighted the admissible option of different treatment on grounds of age that does not entail discrimination. The Government is further of the opinion that the challenged provisions do not treat civil servants who have fulfilled the conditions for obtaining an old age pension unequally in comparison with private sector workers, as they are not prevented from working for another employer after their employment contract has been terminated. It adds that in the private sector employees are faced with the termination of employment contracts for different reasons on a daily basis, whereby the majority [of the affected persons] do not benefit from a guarantee of social security in the form of a pension. It also draws attention to the possibility to conclude an agreement between a given civil servant and his or her superior on the continuation of the employment relationship, which is provided for by the challenged provisions. Through such, the legislature allegedly enabled all employers – including the universities – to assess in every individual case what consequences the termination of an employment contract would have for the work process. Therefore, the Government believes that it is not possible to speak of an interference with the autonomous regulation of the universities. With regard to the allegations of discrimination on grounds of sex, the Government states that the challenged regulation refers to the provisions of the PDIA-1 that determine the same retirement age for both men and women, as the transitional provision of Article 389 of the PDIA-1 was not taken into account. It also refers to the case law of the CJEU. In light of all of the above, the Government proposes that the Constitutional Court establish that the challenged provisions are not inconsistent with the Constitution.

8. The reply of the National Assembly and the opinion of the Government were sent to the applicant, who did not reply to the opinion of the Government, however in its reply to the statements of the National Assembly, the applicant maintains its request in its entirety. The applicant states that the National Assembly did not reply to all of its allegations and that the challenged measure is not intended to achieve the alleged objective of reducing the average age of the personnel structure of professors but to reduce expenses. This allegedly entails that, due to insufficient resources, no new employees can be hired to replace the retiring professors, and the other teachers would have to fulfil the obligations of the retired professors alongside their own obligations. The applicant is of the opinion that such rejuvenation of the age structure of university teaching staff is a process that requires long-term planning. It emphasises that the challenged provisions consider the possibility of a professor who has fulfilled the conditions for retirement continuing to work as an exception and make such subject to certain conditions.

9. On the basis of a request of the Constitutional Court, the Ministry of the Interior provided data regarding the personnel structure of the employees of the authorities of the state administration for the years 2012 and 2013.

B – I

10. On 1 January 2013, the PDIA-2, which abrogated the PDIA-1 in its entirety, entered into force (the first paragraph of Article 429 of the PDIA-2). On the basis of the transitional provision of the eleventh paragraph of Article 429 of the PDIA-2, also the first paragraph of Article 188 of the FBA ceased to have effect insofar as it determined the conditions for acquiring the right to an old age pension. Since the entry into force of the PDIA-2, the conditions for obtaining an old age pension, which used to be determined by the first paragraph of Article 36 in conjunction with the first paragraph of Article 54, the fourth paragraph of Article 430, Article 402, or Article 404 of the PDIA-1, are determined by the fourth and fifth paragraphs of Article 27 of the PDIA-2 in conjunction with Article 398 of the PDIA-2.
11. If during proceedings before the Constitutional Court a regulation ceases to be in force in the challenged part, the Constitutional Court decides on its constitutionality or legality if the applicant or petitioner demonstrates that the consequences of its unconstitutionality or unlawfulness have not been remedied (the second paragraph of Article 47 of the Constitutional Court Act, Official Gazette RS, Nos. 64/07 – official consolidated text, and 109/12 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA). Therefore, the Constitutional Court required the applicant to provide such a statement.
12. The applicant informed the Constitutional Court that it would continue to pursue the lodged request for the review of the constitutionality of Articles 188 and 246 of the FBA, taking into account the original text of the challenged first paragraph of Article 188 of the FBA as was in force until 31 December 2012, as well as the text of this provision as amended on the basis of the eleventh paragraph of Article 429 of the PDIA-2 and as it has been in force since 1 January 2013. It states that the amendment of the challenged first paragraph of Article 188 of the FBA that came into force with the [enactment of the] PDIA-2 did not change the constitutionally disputed position of the affected individuals whose employment contracts had been terminated on the basis of this provision before the amendment entered into force and that in on-going proceedings the challenged provision will have to be applied in its original text. It emphasises once more that although the challenged regulation is incorporated into the chapter on provisional measures for balancing public finances, due to the unconstitutionality of the challenged regulation the affected individuals have experienced and continue to experience lasting consequences in the fields of labour and social law.

These have not been remedied by the amendment of the challenged regulation and they also will not be remedied when the provisional measures in accordance with the FBA cease to be in force. The applicant proposes that the Constitutional Court, in addition to abrogating the challenged provisions in force at present and establishing the unconstitutionality of the first paragraph of Article 188 of the FBA in the text that had been in force before the entry into force of the PDIA-2, also determine the manner of the implementation of its Decision in order to remedy the severe and lasting consequences that the unconstitutionality produced for the affected individuals.

13. With these statements the applicant substantiated that the alleged consequences of the unconstitutionality of the first paragraph of Article 188 of the FBA in its original text have not been remedied by the amendment that entered into force with the [enactment of the] PDIA-2. Therefore, the Constitutional Court proceeded with the procedure to review its constitutionality (the second paragraph of Article 47 of the CCA).
14. It follows from the applicant's statements that on the basis of the same grounds under constitutional law it extended the request also to the amended first paragraph of Article 188 of the FBA, as it entered into force on the basis of the eleventh paragraph of Article 429 of the PDIA-2. Therefore, the Constitutional Court also reviewed [the constitutionality of] the new regulation, as it is determined by the first paragraph of Article 188 of the FBA in conjunction with the eleventh paragraph of Article 429 of the PDIA-2.
15. The Constitutional Court did not send the extension of the request to the National Assembly, as the applicant challenges the regulation in force for the same reasons as the prior regulation, regarding which the National Assembly had already been given an opportunity to provide its opinion.

The content of the challenged provisions

[Translator's note: A thorough understanding of this Decision requires the clarification of some of the terms applied by the PDIA-1 and the PDIA-2. The term insurance period thus denotes periods in which the insured person was covered by compulsory or voluntary pension and disability insurance and periods for which the relevant contributions have been paid. The pension qualifying period is comprised of insurance periods and special qualifying periods and serves as a basis for establishing whether the conditions for obtaining a pension are fulfilled and determining the amount of the pension. Special qualifying periods are periods during which an insured person was not covered by compulsory or voluntary pension and disability insurance that are nevertheless included in the pension qualifying period regardless of the payment of contributions (e.g. the period of caring for a child up to the child's first year of age if the caretaker was not insured on any other grounds). The term purchased period denotes periods that can be included in the insurance period if the relevant contributions are paid (e.g. the period of caring for a child up to the child's third year of age or a period of unemployment if during such time the person in question was not insured on any other grounds). The added qualifying period in accordance with the PDIA-1 is a period during which an insured person was not covered by insurance but which is taken into account in the determination of the pension qualifying period for the acquisition of the right to an old age pension (e.g. periods of undergraduate and postgraduate studies or mandatory military service).]

16. Before the PDIA-2 came into force, under the challenged regulation, namely according to the first paragraph of Article 188 of the FBA, the employment contract of a civil servant who fulfilled the conditions for obtaining an old age pension on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 36<sup>1</sup> in conjunction with the first paragraph of Article 54, the fourth paragraph of Article 430, Article 402, or Article 404 of the PDIA-1 was terminated. In light of this, insofar as the measure of the termination of an employment contract is concerned, the fulfilment of such retirement conditions was taken into account that enabled an individual to obtain an old age pension without reductions (malus), i.e. the age of 58 years for both sexes along with a period of 40 years of employment for men and a period of 38 years of employment for women (a full period of employment).<sup>2</sup>
17. Furthermore, the conditions for early retirement due to fulfilment of the conditions for an increase in the insurance period that had been in force under the prior valid Pension and Disability Insurance Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 12/92, 5/94, 7/96, and 54/98 – hereinafter referred to as the PDIA) and that, in accordance with the transitional provisions, continue to be applied in some instances (the fourth paragraph of Article 430 of the PDIA-1) were taken into account.<sup>3</sup> As the connection with Article 402 of the PDIA-1 was considered as well, a decrease in the pensionable age according to the prior valid regulations was also taken into account when assessing the fulfilment of the conditions for termination of the employment contracts of insured persons who had been entitled to an increase in the insurance period prior to the entry into force of the PDIA-1.<sup>4</sup> The connection of the challenged provisions with Article 404 of the PDIA-1 entails that the gradual amendment of the conditions for obtaining an old age pension according to special regulations was considered as well.<sup>5</sup>

- 1 The first paragraph of Article 36 of the PDIA-1 reads as follows: “An insured person acquires the right to an old age pension at the age of 58 after completing a pension qualifying period of 40 years (men) or a pension qualifying period of 38 years (women).”
  - 2 The first paragraph of Article 54 of the PDIA-1 reads as follows: “The pension of an insured person who has attained 58 years of age and completed 40 years of employment (men) or 38 years of employment (women) is to be determined in an amount that depends solely upon the completed pension qualifying period, without a reduction due to retirement before the attainment of the full pensionable age.”
  - 3 Insured persons who on the day the PDIA-1 entered into force held posts that were entitled to an increase in the insurance period and who have completed at least 25 years of the pension qualifying period (men) or 23 years of the pension qualifying period (women) continue to be entitled to an increase in the insurance period according to the old PDIA.
  - 4 The pensionable age prescribed for obtaining an old age pension and the full pensionable age are reduced by as many months as their insurance period has been increased, thereby also taking into account the lowest possible pensionable age and the lowest possible full pensionable age for obtaining an old age pension on such basis.
  - 5 The gradual adaptation of these conditions to the new limit determined by Article 154 of the PDIA-1 is regulated differently for men and for women through a gradual annual increase in the lowest admissible

18. The amended first paragraph of Article 188 of the FBA in conjunction with the eleventh paragraph of Article 429 of the PDIA-2 refers to the fourth and fifth paragraphs of Article 27 of the PDIA-2 in conjunction with Article 398 of the PDIA-2 as regards the conditions for acquiring the right to an old age pension.<sup>6</sup> The fourth paragraph of Article 27 of the PDIA-2 completely harmonised the retirement conditions with regard to [the insured person's] sex (60 years of age and 40 years of the pension qualifying period, excluding purchased periods),<sup>7</sup> however, in the transitional period until 31 December 2018, the fifth paragraph of the same Article still determines a different condition as to the pension qualifying period, excluding purchased periods, for men and women (40 years for men, and a gradual increase from 38 years and 4 months to 40 years for women), and the pensionable age is also determined differently for men and women (a gradual increase from 58 years and 4 months to 60 years for men, and a gradual increase from 58 years to 60 years for women). Therefore, until 2019 the pensionable age for men and women will constantly differ by 4 months. This entails that until 31 December 2018, with regard to their age, it will be possible to terminate employment contracts of women 4 months earlier in comparison to men, while with regard to pension qualifying periods the difference between them will gradually decrease.
19. In accordance with the second paragraph of Article 188 of the FBA, the employment contract of a civil servant is terminated on the basis of a final decision adopted by his or her supervisor on the first day following the expiry of two months from the fulfilment of the conditions determined by the first paragraph of this Article. In the event of the termination of his or her employment contract, a civil servant has the right to severance pay in the amount of two average monthly salaries in the Republic of Slovenia calculated for the past three months or his or her last two monthly salaries if such is more favourable for him or her. In accordance with the third paragraph of Article 188 of the FBA, without prejudice to the first paragraph of Article 188 of the FBA, a civil servant's employment contract is not terminated if the employer and the civil servant agree within a time limit of two months following the fulfilment of the conditions determined by the first paragraph of this Article to continue the employment relationship in order to ensure an uninterrupted work process. The agreement regarding the continuation of the employment relationship shall also determine the duration of the employment relationship, and after the termination of the employpensionable age. Insured persons who exercise their [right to a] pension on the basis of the so-called "Asbestos" Act or the Act regulating the rights of victims of war are exempted from such. The determined age limits are additionally decreased for insured persons who worked in positions that were eligible for an increase in the insurance period, namely for as many months as corresponds to the increase in their insurance period, but not exceeding the limits determined by Article 402 of the PDIA-1, if this is more favourable for the insured person.

6 Article 398 of the PDIA-2 provides for the possibility to take into account some instances of decreases in the age limit under the regulations previously in force (increases in the insurance period, added periods).

7 The fourth paragraph of Article 27 of the PDIA-2 determines the following: "Without prejudice to the provision of the first paragraph of this Article, an insured person (men and women) acquires the right to an old age pension upon attainment of 60 years of age and 40 years of the pension qualifying period, excluding purchased periods."

ment relationship the civil servant shall be entitled to a (higher) severance pay in the amount of three average monthly salaries in the Republic of Slovenia calculated for the past three months or his or her last three monthly salaries if such is more favourable for him or her. For the purpose of determining the fulfilment of conditions determined by the first paragraph of this Article, the employer may obtain data from the databases of the Pension and Disability Insurance Institute of the Republic of Slovenia (the fourth paragraph of Article 188 of the FBA).

20. The first paragraph of Article 246 of the FBA determines that the employment contracts of those civil servants are terminated who, on the day of the entry into force of the Act, have already fulfilled the conditions for acquiring the right to an old age pension on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 36 in conjunction with the first paragraph of Article 54, the fourth paragraph of Article 430, Article 402, or Article 404 of the PDIA-1. A civil servant's employment contract is terminated on the basis of a final decision adopted by his or her superior on the first day following the expiry of two months from the entry into force of the Act. A civil servant whose employment contract is terminated has the right to severance pay in the amount of two average monthly salaries in the Republic of Slovenia calculated for the past three months or his or her last two monthly salaries if such is more favourable for him or her (the second paragraph of Article 146 of the FBA). Without prejudice to the second paragraph of Article 246 of the FBA, a civil servant's employment contract is not terminated if the employer and the civil servant agree within a time limit of two months following the entry into force of this Act to continue the employment relationship in order to ensure an uninterrupted working process. The agreement regarding the continuation of the employment relationship shall also determine the duration of the employment relationship, and after the termination of the employment relationship the civil servant shall be entitled to a (higher) severance pay in the amount of three average monthly salaries in the Republic of Slovenia calculated for the past three months or his or her last three monthly salaries if such is more favourable for him or her (the third paragraph of Article 246 of the FBA). If a civil servant [in the position] referred to by the first paragraph of Article 246 of the FBA retires within two months following the entry into force of this Act, he or she is entitled to severance pay in the amount of three average monthly salaries in the Republic of Slovenia calculated for the past three months or his or her last three monthly salaries if such is more favourable for him or her (the fourth paragraph of Article 246 of the FBA).
21. The provisions of Article 246 of the FBA, which by their nature are transitional provisions, differ from the provisions of Article 188 of the FBA, both those previously and currently in force, since they refer to civil servants who had fulfilled the conditions for acquiring the right to an old age pension in accordance with the PDIA-1 already at the moment of the entry into force of the FBA. All provisions thus concern the termination of an employment contract for the same reason, however when Article 246 of the FBA applied, the civil servant had already fulfilled this reason at the moment of the entry into force of the FBA, whereas in the event of the application of Article 188 of the FBA this reason could have arisen or could arise at any moment during the period when this statutory measure is in force. All instances concern provisions with an essentially similar content that require the termination of an employment contract upon the fulfilment of the different conditions prescribed for acquiring the right to an old age pension.

B – III

Review from the viewpoint of the principle of the clarity and precision of regulations (Article 2 of the Constitution)

22. The applicant alleges that the challenged regulation is unclear and not sufficiently precise as its content and purpose cannot be determined. The requirement that provisions be defined clearly and precisely so that their content and purpose can be identified with certainty is the substance of one of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law determined by Article 2 of the Constitution. However, this does not entail that regulations do not require any interpretation. It follows from constitutional case law that a regulation is inconsistent with this constitutional principle when the clear content of the legal provisions cannot be obtained by applying rules of interpretation.<sup>8</sup>
23. The content of the challenged provision can be determined by means of established methods of interpretation. The challenged regulation raises no such doubts regarding its content and purpose, as the Constitutional Court found in Decision No. U-I-227/06, dated 16 November 2006 (Official Gazette RS, No. 131/06, and OdlUS XV, 81), with regard to the second paragraph of Article 162 of the Civil Servants Act in force at that time (Official Gazette RS, No. 35/05 – official consolidated text). With regard to the retirement conditions that have to be fulfilled for the termination of an employment contract, the challenged provisions refer to precisely determined provisions of the PDIA-1 or the PDIA-2, as applicable. These concern the period of employment (PDIA-1) or the pension qualifying period, excluding purchased periods (PDIA-2). As follows from Article 8 of the PDIA-1 (which defines the meaning of terms), the period of employment encompasses the insurance period without taking into account any purchased periods regarding studies and military service or added periods. Since the period of employment does not include any special periods, the moment when a civil servant fulfils the conditions that may result in the termination of his or her employment contract on the basis of the challenged provisions can be determined with certainty. The PDIA-2 defines the meaning of the term pension qualifying period, excluding purchased periods, in point 23 of Article 7. Such concerns the period of mandatory participation in the compulsory pension and disability insurance scheme and the period of pursuing agricultural activity, but without purchased pension qualifying periods. Thus, also in accordance with the amended first paragraph of Article 188 of the FBA in conjunction with the eleventh paragraph of Article 429 of the PDIA-2, only periods of insurance that can easily be identified are taken into account. Consequently, the allegations that it is not possible to determine the content and purpose of the challenged provisions are not true.

24. In addition, the applicant's allegations that the challenged provisions lack clarity with regard to the existence of the possibility of new recruitment in the public sector is not true, as these provisions do not interfere with the issue of concluding new employment contracts in the public sector (which is governed by other regulations). The challenged provisions regulate a special manner of terminating an employment contract in accordance with the seventh indent of Article 75 of the Employment Relationships Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 42/02, and 103/07 – hereinafter referred to as the ERA) or, at present, the seventh indent of Article 77 of the Employment Relationships Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 21/13, and 78/13 – hereinafter referred to as the ERA-1).
25. Furthermore, the legal nature of a final decision on the termination of an employment contract is clear (the second paragraph of Article 188 and the second paragraph of Article 246 of the FBA). It entails a declaratory decision by which the existence of the conditions for the termination of an employment contract, determined by the first paragraph of Article 188 or the first paragraph of Article 246 of the FBA, is confirmed and the right to severance pay, determined by the second paragraph of Article 188 or the second paragraph of Article 246 of the FBA, is concretised. The adoption of such a decision is also necessary due to the possibility to extend an employment contract despite the fulfilment of the conditions determined by the first paragraph of Article 188 or the first paragraph of Article 246 of the FBA that is provided to the employer and the civil servant by the challenged third paragraph of Article 188 or the third paragraph of Article 246 of the FBA. Such a decision thus entails a decision by the employer whether to terminate the employment contract of a civil servant. It entails a sui generis termination of the employment contract, which is one of the options (i.e. in other cases determined by law) envisaged by the Act regulating employment relationships (the seventh indent of Article 75 of the ERA or, at present, the seventh indent of Article 77 of the ERA-1). In some instances, a legal remedy is provided against the employer's decision to terminate an employment contract (a complaint or an objection), depending on the field or part of the public sector wherein the civil servant is employed.<sup>9</sup> When such preliminary protection of workers' rights is provided by the employer, the moment the decision becomes final and thereby the employment contract is terminated depends on the exercise of such a legal remedy. In all such cases, the employer's decision becomes final either when the time limit for lodging the legal remedy expires or upon the decision on the legal remedy. If the legislation does not provide for preliminary protection of workers' rights by the employer (e.g. civil servants in public institutes, with the exception of institutes in the field of culture and education and schooling, public agencies, public funds, etc.), and the general legislation (the Act regulating employment relationships), which does not envisage such a legal remedy in instances of the termination of employment contracts, applies, a civil servant's employment contract is terminated already on the basis of the employer's decision. However, such entails that the employment contract is in no event terminated directly on the basis of the challenged provisions of the FBA. Therefore, the case at issue does not concern ex lege termination of employment contracts.

9 The possibility to lodge a legal remedy is, for example, determined by the Civil Servants Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 63/07 – official consolidated text, and 65/08 – hereinafter referred to as the CSA), the Realisation of the Public Interest in the Field of Culture Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 77/07 – official consolidated text, 56/08, 4/10, and 20/11 – RPIFCA), the Organisation and Financing of Education Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 16/07 – official consolidated text, 36/08, 58/09, and 20/11 – OFEA), the Defence Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 103/04 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the DefA).

26. In light of the above, Article 188 of the FBA (both prior to the entry into force of the PDIA-2 and thereafter) and Article 246 of the FBA are not inconsistent with the principle of the clarity and precision of regulations determined by Article 2 of the Constitution.

B – IV

Review from the viewpoint of the prohibition of discrimination (the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution)

GENERAL PREMISES

27. The applicant alleges that the challenged regulation entails an interference with the right to non-discriminatory treatment as it treats civil servants differently on grounds of age and sex with regard to the termination of an employment contract due to the fulfilment of the statutorily determined retirement conditions.
28. The prohibition of discrimination is a universal principle of international law. The first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution prohibits discrimination on grounds of national origin, race, sex, language, religion, political or other conviction, material standing, birth, education, social status, disability, or any other personal circumstance. Discrimination is also prohibited by numerous international instruments that are binding on the Republic of Slovenia, such as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948 (Človekove pravice, Zbirka mednarodnih dokumentov, I. del, Univerzalni dokumenti [Human Rights, Collection of International Documents, Part I, Universal Documents], Društvo za ZN za Republiko Slovenijo, Ljubljana 1995, p. 1), the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (Official Gazette of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, No. 7/71, and Official Gazette RS, No. 35/92, MP, No. 9/92 – ICCPR), the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR), the ESC, International Labour Organisation Convention No. 111 concerning Discrimination in Respect of Employment and Occupation (Official Gazette of the Federal People's Republic of Yugoslavia, MP, No. 3/61, and the Notification of Succession Act, Official Gazette RS, No. 54/92, MP, No. 15/92).
29. The prohibition of discrimination on grounds of age and sex is also regulated by EU law.<sup>10</sup> The TFEU determines already in its general provisions (Article 10) that

<sup>10</sup> The legal system of the EU is based on the Treaty on European Union (consolidated version, OJ C 326, 26. 10. 2012 – hereinafter referred to as the TEU) and the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (consolidated version, OJ C 326, 26. 10. 2012 – hereinafter referred to as the TFEU). In order to achieve objectives in defining and implementing its policies and activities the EU shall aim to combat discrimination based on sex, racial or ethnic origin, religion or belief, disability, age, or sexual orientation. On this basis, the first paragraph of Article 19 of the TFEU determines the Council's competence to take (with the consent of the European Parliament) appropriate action to combat discrimination based on sex, racial or ethnic origin, religion or belief, disability, age, or sexual orientation. In addition, in the chapter on Social Policy, the TFEU specifically determines that the European Parliament and the Council, after consulting the Economic and Social Committee, shall adopt measures to ensure the application of the principle of equal opportunities and the equal treatment of men and women in matters of employment and occupation, including the principle of equal pay for equal work or work of equal value (the third paragraph of Article 157). The existence of the principle of the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of age as a general principle of EU law, which in the field of employment and work is given special expression by Directive 2000/78/EC and Directive 2006/54/EC,<sup>11</sup> has also been recognised by the CJEU.<sup>12</sup>

30. The FBA does not explicitly state that it implements the two above-mentioned Directives into the Slovene legal order.<sup>13</sup> The challenged regulation governs the termination of an employment contract upon the fulfilment of the statutorily determined retirement conditions that are determined differently with regard to age and sex. By determining such a differentiation, the FBA interferes with an area (the prohibition of discrimination) that is also the subject matter that is regulated by Directive 2000/78/EC and Directive 2006/54/EC. In this sense, the challenged provisions of the FBA entail the implementation of the mentioned Directives in the Slovene legal order.
31. With regard to national regulations implementing EU law, the Constitutional Court already adopted the positions that, on the one hand, it is not competent to review the consistency of these regulations with Directives,<sup>14</sup> while, on the other hand, its competence to review the conformity of regulations that implement Directives into the

they have in common, the Member States confer competences on the EU (the first paragraph of Article 1 of the TEU). The EU shall pursue its objectives by appropriate means commensurate with the competences that are conferred upon it in the Treaties (the sixth paragraph of Article 3 of the TEU). Competences not conferred upon the EU in the Treaties remain with the Member States (the first paragraph of Article 4 of the TEU), taking into account the principle of conferral of competences, the principle of subsidiarity, and the principle of proportionality (Article 5 of the TEU). The areas of, delimitation of, and arrangements for exercising the competences of the EU are determined in the TFEU (the first paragraph of Article 1 of the TFEU).

- 13 The Implementation of the Principle of Equal Treatment Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 93/07 – official consolidated text – IPETA), the ERA, the ERA-1, and the PDIA-1 are explicitly intended for the implementation of the mentioned Directives in the Slovene legal order.
- 14 See Constitutional Court Orders No. U-I-44/05, dated 11 September 2007, and No. U-I-116/07, dated 25 May 2007, and Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-32/04, dated 9 February 2006 (Official Gazette RS, No. 21/06, and OdIUS XV, 10).

internal legal order with the Constitution cannot be excluded.<sup>15</sup> In the case at issue, such entails that the Constitutional Court is competent to review the consistency of the challenged provisions of the FBA with the Constitution, however, it is not competent to review the consistency of these provisions of the FBA with the [above-cited] Directives.

32. Without prejudice to the above-stated, when reviewing regulations that entail the implementation of Union law, on the basis of the third paragraph of Article 3a of the Constitution,<sup>16</sup> the Constitutional Court must take into account the primary and secondary legislation of the EU and the case law of the CJEU.<sup>17</sup> The Constitution does not regulate in more detail the position of rules that enter the Slovene constitutional order on the basis of the third paragraph of Article 3a of the Constitution, neither in terms of their temporal effects nor their hierarchical position.<sup>18</sup> From this constitutional provision there follows only the requirement that, in the exercise of their competences, all state authorities, including the Constitutional Court, must apply EU law in accordance with the legal order of this [international] organisation.<sup>19</sup> The effect of EU law in the internal legal order thus depends on the rules that regulate the functioning of the EU at a given moment. Such concerns the fundamental principles of EU law that are enshrined in the TEU and the TFEU or that the CJEU has developed through its case law. Due to the third paragraph of Article 3a of the Constitution, the fundamental principles that define the relationship between internal law and EU law are at the same time also internal constitutional principles that have the same binding effect as the Constitution.<sup>20</sup>
33. The most important of these is the principle of the primacy of Union law, which entails that in the event of an inconsistency between EU law and the law of the

16 The third paragraph of Article 3a of the Constitution determines the following: "Legal acts and decisions adopted within international organisations to which Slovenia has transferred the exercise of part of its sovereign rights shall be applied in Slovenia in accordance with the legal regulation of these organisations."

17 The first and second paragraphs of Article 3a of the Constitution define the procedural and substantive conditions for the transfer of the exercise of a part of sovereign rights to an international organisation (M. Avbelj, Slovensko ustavno pravo v odnosu do prava EU [Slovene Constitutional Law in Relation to EU Law] in: I. Kaučič (Ed.), Pomen ustavnosti in ustavna demokracija, Znanstveni zbornik Dvajset let Ustave Republike Slovenije [The Importance of Constitutionality and Constitutional Democracy, 20 Years of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia, Collection of Scientific Papers], Ustavno sodišče Republike Slovenije, Ljubljana 2012, p. 346). The first paragraph of Article 3a of the Constitution entailed the constitutional legal basis that enabled Slovenia to transfer the exercise of a part of its sovereign rights to international organisations, first and foremost to the EU, and thereby it at least partially denied the Constitution the power that had been assigned to it in accordance with the classical spirit of the organisation of the state upon its adoption (M. Cerar in: L. Šturm (Ed.), Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije, Dopolnitev – A [Commentary on the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia, Supplement – A], Fakulteta za državne in evropske študije, Ljubljana 2011, p. 74).

Kaučič (Ed.), op. cit., p. 383.

Member States, EU law has to be given precedence over the law of a Member State. Other fundamental principles that regulate the relationship between EU law and national law include the principle of sincere cooperation, including the principle of consistent interpretation (the third paragraph of Article 4 of the TEU),<sup>21</sup> the principle of the direct applicability of EU law, the principle of the direct effect of EU law, the principle of conferral of competences (the first paragraph of Article 5 of the TEU), the principle of subsidiarity (the third paragraph of Article 5 of the TEU), and the principle of proportionality (the fourth paragraph of Article 5 of the TEU).

34. As internal constitutional law principles, these principles also bind the Constitutional Court in the exercise of its competences in the framework of legal relationships that concern EU law. When interpreting national law (the Constitution and other regulations) in a procedure for the review of regulations, the Constitutional Court must take into account EU law, namely in such manner as it derives from the acts of the EU or as it has developed in the case law of the CJEU. It must interpret national law in the light of EU law in order to ensure its full effectiveness.<sup>22</sup>
35. In the case at issue, such entails that the Constitutional Court will take into account Directive 2000/78/EC, Directive 2006/54/EC, and the case law of the CJEU when interpreting the challenged provisions of the FBA and in the review of their consistency with the right to non-discriminatory treatment according to the Constitution.

DISCRIMINATION ON GROUNDS OF AGE

36. The applicant alleges an inconsistency of the challenged provisions with the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of age (the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution). It is of the opinion that from the viewpoint of labour law protection, with regard to the termination of an employment contract, the challenged regulation inadmissibly places all civil servants who have fulfilled the prescribed retirement conditions in a less favourable position, namely, only older civil servants in comparison to younger civil servants who have not yet fulfilled these conditions.
37. The first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution determines that in Slovenia everyone is guaranteed equal human rights and fundamental freedoms irrespective of national origin, race, sex, language, religion, political or other conviction, material standing, birth, education, social status, disability, or any other personal circumstance.
38. It follows from the hitherto constitutional case law that the Constitutional Court has not yet adopted an explicit position on the issue of admissible discrimination on grounds of age in relation to the termination of an employment relationship. By Decision No. U-I-49/98, dated 25 November 1999 (Official Gazette RS, No. 101/99, and OdlUS VIII, 266), it found that a provision of the Employment Relationships Act in force at that time (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 14/90, 5/91, 29/92, 71/93, 19/94, and 21 It derives from the case law of the CJEU that Member States, and thus also national courts, must ensure the application of and respect for EU law in their territory (See the Judgment in the case Unibet (London) Ltd and Unibet (International) Ltd v. Justitiekanslern, dated 13 March 2007, Para. 38).

22 See Constitutional Court Decision No. Up-2012/08, dated 5 May 2009 (Official Gazette RS, No. 22/09, and OdlUS XVIII, 65).

38/94), which applied to all employed persons, was inconsistent with the Constitution since it determined the ex lege termination of an employment contract upon the fulfilment of the conditions for acquiring the right to a full old age pension for male and female workers, and the employer's consent was required for the continuation of the employment relationship. The Constitutional Court adopted the position that there was a violation of the prohibition of discrimination as under the regulation of pension insurance in force at that time the conditions had been determined differently for men and for women with regard to age as well as the pension qualifying period for obtaining a full old age pension,<sup>23</sup> which entailed that the employment relationships of individuals were terminated differently with regard to their sex and indirectly also with regard to their age. As regards the termination of an employment relationship in the state administration upon the fulfilment of retirement conditions, the Constitutional Court has adopted two decisions. By Order No. U-I-329/04, dated 12 May 2005 (Official Gazette RS, No. 53/05, and OdlUS XIV, 27), it dismissed a petition for the initiation of a procedure for the review of the constitutionality of Article 92 of the DefA that, on the basis of the fifth indent of Article 75 of the ERA and Article 153 of the Civil Servants Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 56/02), determined that the employment relationship of a person serving in the field of defence in the armed forces shall be terminated no later than by the end of the calendar year wherein he or she fulfils the conditions for acquiring the right to an old age pension according to general regulations, regardless of the period for which the employment contract was concluded in accordance with general provisions. It found that the allegations as to the inconsistencies of the challenged regulation with the second paragraph of Article 14 and Article 49 of the Constitution were unsubstantiated. In the opinion of the Constitutional Court, due to the specificity and different nature of the work, organisation, and other requirements of professional service in the army, the legislature was accorded the possibility to regulate individual questions of labour law [in this field] differently than they are regulated in other fields of employment. It dismissed the allegation of an inconsistency with Article 49 of the Constitution by reasoning that this constitutional provision does not guarantee long-term or even permanent employment in a specific post. By Decision No. U-I-227/06 it reviewed the second paragraph of Article 162 of the Civil Servants Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 35/05 – official consolidated text), which determined that, as regards authorities of the state or local communities administrations, a supervisor may terminate a civil servant's employment contract in the regular manner, taking into account the period of notice, at any time after the first day of the month following the month when the civil servant attained the full pensionable age and the full pension qualifying period for retirement according to the legislation in force at that time. The Constitutional Court abrogated the challenged provisions, however not due to discrimination, but because they were unclear (Article 2 of the Constitution).

23 On the basis of the PDIA workers acquired the right to an old age pension upon the fulfilment of the condition of attaining the full pension qualifying period and the age of 58 years (men) and 53 years (women).

39. In the case at issue, however, the applicant alleges an inconsistency of the challenged provisions with the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of age. In order to assess whether the allegation of unequal, discriminatory treatment is substantiated, the Constitutional Court must answer the following questions: 1) does the alleged different treatment refer to ensuring or exercising a human right or fundamental freedom; 2) if so, is there a difference as to the treatment of the persons whom the applicant is comparing; 3) are the de facto positions that the applicant is comparing essentially the same and thus the differentiation is based on a circumstance determined by the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution; and 4) if the differentiation is indeed based on a circumstance determined by the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution and thus there is an interference with the right to non-discriminatory treatment, is such interference constitutionally admissible.<sup>24</sup> As EU law must be taken into account in the case at issue, the Constitutional Court must also consider EU law, including the case law of the CJEU, when reviewing the constitutional admissibility of the challenged regulation.
40. The first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution prohibits discrimination in ensuring, exercising, and protecting human rights and fundamental freedoms with regard to an individual's personal circumstances. In order to establish a violation of the constitutional prohibition of discriminatory treatment, the determination of the existence of inadmissible discrimination in the enjoyment of any human right suffices, whereby it is not necessary to demonstrate an interference with this human right in and of itself.<sup>25</sup> In the case at issue, the applicant alleges discriminatory treatment on grounds of age by the statutory regulation of the termination of an employment contract upon the fulfilment of statutorily determined retirement conditions.
41. The alleged different treatment concerns the exercise of the right to freedom of work and, in this framework, also [the right] to freely choose one's employment. In accordance with the third paragraph of Article 49 of the Constitution, everyone shall have access under equal conditions to any position of employment. Access under equal conditions to any position of employment entails that the termination of an employment relationship must also be regulated under equal conditions for all, i.e. the personal circumstances determined by the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution may not be the only criterion of differentiation.<sup>26</sup> However, this constitutional provision guarantees neither long-term nor permanent employment in a specific post.<sup>27</sup> In accordance with the Constitution, instances of and conditions

24 See Constitutional Court Decisions No. U-I-212/10, dated 14 March 2013 (Official Gazette RS, No. 31/13), and No. U-I-425/06, dated 2 July 2009 (Official Gazette RS, No. 55/09, and OdlUS XVIII, 29).

25 As held by the Constitutional Court already in Decisions No. U-I-146/07, dated 13 November 2008 (Official Gazette RS, No. 111/08, and OdlUS XVII, 59), No. U-I-425/06, and No. U-I-212/10. The European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR) also assesses alleged violations of the prohibition of discrimination under Article 14 of the ECHR in the same manner – cf. the Judgment in the case E. B. v. France, dated 22 January 2008 (Grand Chamber), Para. 48.

26 See Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-49/98, Paragraph 14.

27 Cf. Constitutional Court Order No. U-I-329/04, Paragraph 14, and Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-for the termination of employment relationships may be determined only by law, which follows from Article 66 of the Constitution, which requires that the state create opportunities for employment and work and ensure their protection by law. The state implements this obligation mainly by laying down protective norms and determining a minimum of rights for workers, who are usually the weaker party in comparison to employers.<sup>28</sup> In light of these statements, legal protection with regard to the termination of an employment relationship falls within the scope of the third paragraph of Article 49 of the Constitution. [The case at issue] thus concerns an allegation of inadmissible discrimination in the exercise of this human right.

42. In instances of the termination of an employment contract due to the fulfilment of retirement conditions, the challenged regulation treats civil servants differently with regard to their age, whereby from the viewpoint of performing their work, they are in a comparable position.<sup>29</sup>
43. Directive 2000/78/EC must be taken into account in determining the constitutional admissibility of the challenged regulation. The purpose of this Directive is to establish a general framework for combating discrimination on grounds of religion, belief, disability, age, or sexual orientation as regards employment and occupation, with a view to putting into effect in the Member States the principle of equal treatment (Article 1 of Directive 2000/78/EC). The concept of discrimination (the principle of equal treatment) is defined by Article 2 of Directive 2000/78/EC.<sup>30</sup> The Directive accords to the 29 Cf. the CJEU Judgment in the case European Commission v. Hungary, C-286/12, dated 6 November 2012, Para. 50.

30 Article 2 of Directive 2000/78/EC determines as follows:

- “1. For the purposes of this Directive, the ‘principle of equal treatment’ shall mean that there shall be no direct or indirect discrimination whatsoever on any of the grounds referred to in Article 1.
2. For the purposes of paragraph 1:
  - (a) direct discrimination shall be taken to occur where one person is treated less favourably than another is, has been or would be treated in a comparable situation, on any of the grounds referred to in Article 1;
  - (b) indirect discrimination shall be taken to occur where an apparently neutral provision, criterion or practice would put persons having a particular religion or belief, a particular disability, a particular age, or a particular sexual orientation at a particular disadvantage compared with other persons unless:
    - (i) that provision, criterion or practice is objectively justified by a legitimate aim and the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary, or
    - (ii) as regards persons with a particular disability, the employer or any person or organisation to whom this Directive applies, is obliged, under national legislation, to take appropriate measures in line with the principles contained in Article 5 in order to eliminate disadvantages entailed by such provision, criterion or practice.
3. Harassment shall be deemed to be a form of discrimination within the meaning of paragraph 1, when unwanted conduct related to any of the grounds referred to in Article 1 takes place with the purpose or effect of violating the dignity of a person and of creating an intimidating, hostile, degrading, humiliating

Member States a wide margin of appreciation for justified different treatment on grounds of age in the field of employment and the labour market, as national law may provide for [justified] instances of different treatment on grounds of age. In the sense of the first paragraph of Article 6 of the mentioned Directive,<sup>31</sup> different treatment on grounds of age does not constitute discrimination if the Member States, within the context of national law, establish that it is objectively and reasonably justified by a legitimate aim. However, the means of achieving that aim must be appropriate and necessary. In accordance with the mentioned Directive, aims that may be regarded as legitimate in the meaning of the cited provision include, inter alia, legitimate employment policy, labour market, and vocational training objectives. In interpreting Directive 2000/78/EC, which allows justification of different treatment on grounds of age, the CJEU in its decisions has often referred to recital 25 of the Directive, which outlines the essential importance of distinguishing “between differences in treatment which are justified, in particular by legitimate employment policy, labour market and vocational training objectives, and discrimination which must be prohibited.”

44. In accordance with the standpoint of the CJEU, the automatic termination of an employment contract upon the fulfilment of retirement conditions entails discrimination on grounds of age that may, however, be admissible if it is justified by a legitimate aim and when the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary.<sup>32</sup> However, the CJEU has also repeatedly emphasised that the automatic termination of the employment contracts of employees who have met the conditions as regards age and contributions paid for the exercise of their pension rights has, for a long time, been a feature of employment law in many Member States and is widely applied. It is a mechanism that is based on the balance to be struck between political, economic, social, demographic, and/or budgetary considerations, and the choice to be made between prolonging people’s working lives or, conversely, providing for early retirement.<sup>33</sup> The termination of an employment contract does not have the automatic effect of forcing the affected person to leave the labour market for good. It does not prevent an employee who wishes to continue his or her professional activity after reaching retirement age, e.g. for financial reasons, from doing so.

or offensive environment. In this context, the concept of harassment may be defined in accordance with the national laws and practice of the Member States.

4. An instruction to discriminate against persons on any of the grounds referred to in Article 1 shall be deemed to be discrimination within the meaning of paragraph 1.

45. In the assessment of the Constitutional Court, the challenged regulation on the basis of which an employment contract is terminated upon the fulfilment of retirement conditions precisely determined by the PDIA-1 or the PDIA-2, as applicable, which refer to the age of the insured persons, entails an interference with the right of older civil servants to non-discriminatory treatment (the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution), and therefore an assessment of the constitutional admissibility of the interference is required.<sup>34</sup> An interference with a human right is only constitutionally admissible if it is grounded in a constitutionally admissible, i.e. reasonably justified objective (the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution) and if it is consistent with the principle of proportionality as one of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution). The Constitutional Court conducts an assessment of the consistency of a challenged regulation with the general principle of proportionality by means of the so-called strict proportionality test, which encompasses a review of three aspects of the interference, namely a review of the appropriateness, necessity, and proportionality in the narrow sense.<sup>35</sup>

THE CONSTITUTIONALLY ADMISSIBLE OBJECTIVE

46. The main objective of the FBA as a whole, as such was stated by the Government and as derives already from Article 1 of the FBA, is to ensure sustainable public finances and reduce budgetary expenditure. Even though the legislature did not explicitly define any special objectives of the challenged measure, in the opinion of the Government, such does not entail that the challenged regulation does not have a (different) legitimate objective. In any event, the realisation of the objectives of social policy and employment policy must be included among the objectives that the legislature and the Government pursued with this measure. In accordance with the Government's statements, the challenged measure thus allegedly pursues the objectives of personnel restructuring and establishing a favourable age structure as regards civil servants, encouraging access to employment by means of a better intergenerational distribution, and controlling public finance expenditure. The termination of the employment contract of a civil servant who has fulfilled the conditions for acquiring the right to an old age pension without reductions is only one of the instruments by means of which the Government wishes to achieve in part a reduction in the number of public sector employees (a reduction in the public sector wage bill) and in part an altered age structure of civil servants. With regard to such, the Government also submitted data from personnel reports regarding the number of employees in state authorities broken down by age as of 31 December for the years from 2008 to 2011, and the Ministry of the Interior submitted data from the central personnel records of the state administration (hereinafter referred to as the central personnel records) as of 31 December 2012 and 1 June 2013.

---

34 The Constitutional Court reviewed the prohibition of discrimination with regard to the termination of an employment contract in relation to age in the framework of the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution already in Decision No. U-I-49/98.

35 See Constitutional Court Decisions No. U-I-18/02, dated 24 October 2003 (Official Gazette RS, No. 108/03, and OdlUS XII, 86), Paragraph 25, and No. U-I-212/10, Paragraph 19.

47. The FBA is a law by which the Government tackled the consequences of the crisis through a package of austerity measures. The measures affected all social groups (for example, civil servants, retired persons, families, young persons, persons with disabilities). The FBA amends and supplements the provisions of 39 other laws (See Article 1 of the FBA). Therefore, the legislature only defined the objective that the adopted measures pursue in all areas with which the FBA interferes as the objective of this law. However, this does not entail that in specific areas the adopted measures do not also pursue other objectives that are only important for those areas. What applies in general to all measures contained in the FBA also applies to the measure of the termination of an employment contract upon the employee fulfilling the conditions for acquiring the right to an old age pension. These measures are intended to overcome the critical conditions that resulted from the economic and financial crisis, which also affected the Republic of Slovenia, and to fulfil the requirements in the context of the excessive deficit procedure that the European Commission initiated against the Republic of Slovenia. It follows already from the legislative materials<sup>36</sup> that in relation to the challenged measure the legislature drew attention to employment policy by referring to the case law of the CJEU and Directive 2000/78/EC, according to which Member States may provide that different treatment on grounds of age shall not constitute discrimination if, within the context of national law, it is objectively and reasonably justified by a legitimate aim, including legitimate employment policy, labour market, and vocational training objectives, and if the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary. All of the above required the adoption of certain employment policy measures in the public sector with the purpose of harmonising the employment rates in the public and the private sectors. Along with the decrease in economic growth, the number of private sector employees namely also decreased such that their number fell three years in a row. In contrast, in these years the number of employees in the state sector increased by 1.9% in 2009 and 2010 and by 0.6% in 2011.

48. According to the CJEU, it cannot be inferred [from the first paragraph of Article 6 of Directive 2000/78/EC] that the lack of precision in the item of legislation at issue, as regards the objective pursued, automatically excludes the possibility that it may be justified under that provision. In the absence of such precision, it is important that other elements taken from the general context of the measure concerned (i.e. the measure under review) enable the underlying objective of that measure to be identified for the purposes of review by the courts whether it is legitimate and whether the means put in place to achieve it are appropriate and necessary.<sup>37</sup> As regards reliance on several objectives at the same time, it may be inferred from the case law that the coexistence of a number of objectives does not preclude the existence of a legitimate aim within the meaning of the first paragraph of Article 6 of Directive 2000/78/EC.<sup>38</sup> This entails that, in addition to the main objective defined by a statute, the Constitutional Court may also take into account objectives that can be identified on the basis of other circumstances. In light of such, the Constitutional Court, in addition to the objective defined by the FBA (ensuring sustainable public finances and reducing budget expenditures), also considered the objective that can be inferred from the legislative materials and which the Government stated in its opinion, namely to establish a favourable age structure of civil servants. In the assessment of the Constitutional Court, however, one evident objective of the challenged regulation is also the prevention of conflicts regarding an employee's ability to perform his or her work after a certain age. Hereinafter, the Constitutional Court had to consider whether these objectives are constitutionally admissible.

49. The CJEU has already adopted the position that while budgetary considerations can underpin the chosen social policy of a Member State and influence the nature or extent of the measures that the Member State wishes to adopt, such considerations cannot in themselves constitute a legitimate aim within the meaning of the first paragraph of Article 6 of Directive 2000/78/EC.<sup>39</sup> The objectives that a Member State relied on may be linked to one another or classified in order of importance.<sup>40</sup> At the national level, Member States enjoy broad discretion in their choice not only to pursue a particular objective in the field of social and employment policy, but also in the determination of measures capable of achieving it.<sup>41</sup>
50. According to the position of the CJEU, encouragement of recruitment may constitute a legitimate aim of the social policy or employment policy of the Member States in terms of the first paragraph of Article 6 of Directive 2000/78/EC, in particular when the promotion of the access of young persons to a profession is concerned.<sup>42</sup> The establishment of a balanced age structure in order to ensure high-quality service, facilitate the planning of retirements, ensure the promotion of civil servants, particularly younger civil servants among them, and prevent disputes that might arise upon retirement regarding an employee's ability to perform his or her work, may further constitute a legitimate aim under this Directive.<sup>43</sup>
51. In light of all of the above, the Constitutional Court assesses that the main objective of the challenged measure is to ensure sustainable public finances, which in the field of employment entails a reduction in the public sector wage bill. However, according to the position of the CJEU, rationalising expenditure cannot be a constitutionally admissible aim that could in and of itself justify an interference with the right to non-discriminatory treatment or be a legitimate aim in the meaning of the first paragraph of Article 6 of Directive 2000/78/EC, therefore the Constitutional Court had to review whether the establishment of a balanced age structure of civil servants and the prevention of disputes regarding a civil servant's ability to perform his or her work after reaching a certain age constitute constitutionally admissible objectives.

52. According to the Government's statements, an additional objective of the challenged provisions of the FBA is the establishment of a favourable age structure of civil servants. It is evident from the data and tables that the Government submitted to the Constitutional Court that the age of the employees of the authorities of the state administration is increasing, and younger civil servants predominantly perform their work on the basis of fixed term employment contracts, work contracts, or as student work. The proportion of employees aged 39 years or less is steadily decreasing<sup>44</sup> due to the increasing proportion of employees aged 40 years or more.<sup>45</sup> The decrease in the proportion of employees aged 30 years or less is the most acute, as the proportion of this age group dropped from 18.6% on 31 December 2008 to 12.4% by 31 December 2011. This entails that in the period before the entry into force of the FBA the proportion of younger civil servants (30 years or less) in the state administration decreased, while according to the latest available data only 32.4% of the youngest civil servants have a permanent employment contract. On the contrary, the proportion of civil servants in the state administration who are older than 50 years of age and have a permanent employment contract amounts to 98%.
53. The Constitutional Court assesses that the aim of establishing a balanced age structure of civil servants constitutes a constitutionally admissible objective. The employment of civil servants of different ages namely provides an opportunity for the transfer of experience from older to younger employees and for the younger employees to convey the knowledge they have obtained in their education to older employees. The varied age structure thus contributes to the quality of public services in the state administration as well as in the public sector as a whole.
54. In the assessment of the Constitutional Court, the prevention of disputes regarding an employee's ability to perform his or her work after a certain age also constitutes a constitutionally admissible objective. Consequently, civil servants are protected from procedures for the establishment of their ability to work and to achieve the expected work results in cases when civil servants are no longer fit for service due to their age. While in such cases the employer may terminate their employment contract due to inability, this may entail a severe interference with the personal integrity of employees, who may have been very successful in their active period, but the decline of their vigour due to their age prevents them from reaching the required minimum work results, which they may find difficult to accept.<sup>46</sup>

44 [Their proportion amounted to] 54.4% on 31 December 2008 and then gradually dropped to 47.1% by 31 December 2011. According to data from the central personnel records, on 1 June 2013 their proportion only amounted to 43.3% of all employees in the state administration.

45 [Their proportion amounted to] 45.7% on 31 December 2008 and then gradually increased to 52.9% by 31 December 2011. According to data from the central personnel records, the proportion of civil servants in the state administration who are older than 40 years increased to 56.6% by 1 June 2013.

46 See also the CJEU, e.g., in its judgment in the joined cases Gerhard Fuchs and Peter Köhler, Para. 50.

55. In light of the above, the Constitutional Court assesses that the interference with the right to non-discriminatory treatment aims to achieve constitutionally admissible objectives and is therefore not inadmissible in this aspect.

APPROPRIATENESS

56. As it established the existence of constitutionally admissible objectives, the Constitutional Court also had to assess whether the challenged measure was appropriate and necessary for the attainment of the above-mentioned objectives, and proportionate in the narrower sense. From the aspect of the criterion of appropriateness, the Constitutional Court verifies if the interference under assessment is appropriate for attaining the pursued objective in the sense that this objective may in fact be attained through the interference with the human right.
57. According to the position of the CJEU, only general statements concerning the appropriateness of a specific measure to contribute to employment policy, labour market, or vocational training objectives are not enough to demonstrate that the aim of that measure can justify a derogation from the principle of the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of age, and, moreover, on the basis of such statements it cannot reasonably be concluded that the means chosen are appropriate to achieving that aim.<sup>47</sup> The CJEU stated that the first paragraph of Article 6 of Directive 2000/78/EC imposed on Member States the obligation to establish with a high standard of proof the legitimacy of the aim relied on as justification.<sup>48</sup> With regard to the assessment of the degree of accuracy of the evidence required, the CJEU pointed out that Member States enjoy broad discretion in the choice of the measure they consider appropriate.<sup>49</sup> That [choice] may be based on economic, social, demographic, and/or budgetary considerations, which include existing and verifiable data, as well as forecasts that, by their nature, may prove to be inaccurate and are thus to some extent inherently uncertain. The measure in question may, moreover, be based on political considerations, which will often involve a compromise between a number of possible solutions and, again, cannot with certainty lead to the expected result.<sup>50</sup> In order to demonstrate that the challenged measure is appropriate and necessary, it must not appear unreasonable in light of the objective pursued and must be supported by evidence whose probative value the national court has to assess in accordance with the rules of national law.<sup>51</sup> In accordance with the established case law of the CJEU, legislation is appropriate for ensuring the attainment of the objective pursued only if it genuinely reflects a concern to attain it in a consistent and systematic manner.<sup>52</sup>

58. In the opinion of the Constitutional Court, the challenged regulation entails an appropriate measure for attaining the objective of sustainable public finances or limiting the public sector wage bill. The cost of labour of employees in the public sector<sup>53</sup> may be reduced by dismissals on the basis of labour law legislation (the ERA-1, the CSA). The challenged provisions of the FBA determine a new manner of terminating the employment contracts of those civil servants who have fulfilled the conditions for acquiring the right to an old age pension. Such terminations [of employment contracts] also contribute to reducing the public sector wage bill. The challenged measure (together with the other measures that were introduced by the FBA) thus contributes to reducing the public sector wage bill and thereby to ensuring the sustainability of public finances.
59. The challenged regulation is further an appropriate measure for achieving the objective of establishing a favourable age structure of civil servants. It namely enables the freeing up of positions that are occupied by workers who have already fulfilled the conditions for acquiring the right to an old age pension. Through a system of promotions and internal transfers, these positions will shortly become available to younger civil servants who are already employed in the civil service.<sup>54</sup> The termination of the employment contracts of older civil servants will presumably contribute to an increase in the proportion of younger civil servants, the intergenerational balance will be improved, and the personnel structure of public sector employees will be rejuvenated.
60. The pursued objectives (reducing the public sector wage bill, establishing a balanced personnel structure) can only be attained by measures that will remain in force over a long period of time. While the legislature classified the challenged measure as a provisional measure, it conditioned the termination of an employment contract with the fulfilment of an uncertain future fact.<sup>55</sup> The measure's duration is envisaged rather than determined, and only descriptively defined. It derives from data published by the Institute of Macroeconomic Analysis and Development (hereinafter the joined cases Gerhard Fuchs and Peter Köhler, Para. 85.

- 53 It follows from the clarifications of the Ministry of the Interior that expenditure for labour costs (labour costs of direct budget users and transfers to indirect budget users) entail almost one third of the total resources in the proposal for amendments to the Budget of the Republic of Slovenia for the year 2014. According to the data of the Agency of the Republic of Slovenia for Public Legal Records and Related Services (AJPES), 158,778 civil servants were employed in the public sector in June 2013.
- 54 In accordance with the third paragraph of Article 163 of the FBA, regardless of the suspension of the effects of promotions until the year 2014 (Article 162, and the first and second paragraphs of Article 163 of the FBA), civil servants and public officials acquire a professional title or a higher title and the right to payment in accordance with the acquired title if the acquisition of the professional title or higher title in question is a condition for carrying out the work at the position to which the civil servant is transferred or for which an employment contract is concluded.
- 55 Article 128 of the FBA determines that Articles 183 through 188 of this Act remain in force until the expiry of the year following the year in which economic growth will exceed 2.5% of the gross domestic product.

referred to as the IMAD) in the Summer Forecast of Economic Trends 2013<sup>56</sup> that the growth of the gross domestic product was negative in 2012. It follows from this Forecast that a further decrease in economic activity is expected in 2013. The gross domestic product is expected to drop by 2.4% in 2013, and a further decrease (-0.2%) is also expected in 2014. In the Autumn Forecast for the period 2012–2014,<sup>57</sup> the European Commission also projected a 1.6% decrease in the gross domestic product in 2013, and only a 0.9% increase in 2014. The presented data show that gross domestic product growth will not exceed 2.5% for some time. Even though the legislature classified the challenged measure as a provisional measure, considering the economic indicators,<sup>58</sup> it thus entails a measure that will remain in force for a long period.

61. In addition, the measure is appropriate to attaining the objective of preventing potential disputes regarding a civil servant's ability to perform his or her work after a certain age. It namely enables the termination of a civil servant's employment contract upon fulfilment of the retirement conditions (with regard to age and the pension qualifying period) without requiring that his or her ability to perform the work in question and attain the expected work results be established in a procedure for the regular termination of an employment contract due to inability.<sup>59</sup>
62. In light of such, the Constitutional Court deems that the challenged measure is appropriate for the attainment of the objectives pursued.

NECESSITY

63. As part of the review of the consistency of an interference with a human right with the general principle of proportionality, the Constitutional Court also reviews whether the measure is in fact necessary (indispensable) for the attainment of the objective in the sense that the objective could not (in equal measure) be attained through a lesser interference or even without it.
64. The Constitutional Court assesses that the sustainability of public finances is threatened by the consequences of the economic and financial crisis, and therefore it accepts the Government's statement that measures for reducing the public sector wage bill are necessary.<sup>60</sup> The necessity of adopting an appropriate law is dictated by the situation on the financial markets, the requirements of the European Commission for faster consolidation of the public finances, and the intention to uphold certain rights of employees with regard to revenue, even if on the basis of a different regulation. The entry into force of the proposed measures also entails the assurance that the Republic of Slovenia will remain a state with stable public finances and a social state.<sup>61</sup> The developments with regard to the resources allocated for public sector wages in the period 2009–2011 indicate that these have been persistently increasing from year to year, including during the time when intervention measures, as determined by the Intervention Measures Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 94/10 – IMA) and the Additional Intervention Measures for 2012 Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 110/11, and 43/12 – AIMA12), were in force, which additionally substantiates that an interference with public finance expenditures on such basis is necessary.<sup>62</sup> In addition, the ongoing excessive deficit procedure against the Republic of Slovenia on the basis of Article 126 of the TFEU has to be taken into account. The Council Decision of 19 January 2010 on the existence of an excessive deficit in Slovenia (2010/289/EU)<sup>63</sup> established that an excessive deficit that is not only the consequence of temporarily exceeding the reference value exists in Slovenia. In the framework of that procedure, on 7 June 2013 the Council adopted a Council Recommendation with a view to bringing an end to the situation of an excessive government deficit in Slovenia.<sup>64</sup> In [the Recommendation] the Council found that the Republic of Slovenia is facing a steeply increasing public debt due to persistently large primary deficits and, to a lesser extent, stock-flow adjustments and higher interest payments.<sup>65</sup> The Council inter alia recommended that Slovenia should rigorously implement the measures already adopted to increase mainly indirect tax revenue and reduce the public sector wage bill and social transfers, while being prepared to complement them with additional measures if their yield proves to be less than foreseen or if any measure is repealed by the judicial system (Point 3 of the recommendations).

65. The Government demonstrated that the average age of public sector employees is increasing, while the proportion of younger civil servants is steadily decreasing on account of the increasing proportion of older civil servants. A possible alternative

In 2010, the nominal growth in the resources for gross/gross public sector wages paid was 2.99% in comparison to 2009. In 2011, the resources for the payment of gross/gross public sector wages amounted to EUR 4,412,670,160.00. In 2011, the nominal growth in the resources for gross/gross public sector wages paid was 0.93% with regard to 2010 (See the Draft of the FBA, p. 35).

65 From as low as 22% of GDP in 2008, the debt increased to 54% of GDP in 2012. The European Commission's updated 2013 Spring Forecast projects that it will increase to 61% of GDP in 2013, thus breaching the Treaty reference value. Based on a "no policy change" scenario, the debt is forecast to further increase to 69% of GDP in 2015 (Para. 19).

measure with regard to the aim of reducing the public sector wage bill could be the termination of the employment contracts of employees in accordance with labour law legislation, in particular, terminations for reasons of redundancy. In such a situation, the employment contracts of those civil servants who have already fulfilled the conditions for old age retirement would be terminated first, as they do not enjoy any special protection from dismissal (Article 114 of the ERA-1). However, the employment contracts of younger civil servants would also be terminated for reasons of redundancy, which could additionally reduce the proportion of employed younger civil servants, and therefore such terminations would not attain the pursued employment policy objective (i.e. a balanced personnel age structure).

66. A reduction in the number of employees in order to reduce expenditure could also be attained by other methods of terminating employment contracts, in particular by terminations of employment contracts with notice due to inability,<sup>66</sup> breach of obligation,<sup>67</sup> or even terminations of employment contracts without notice.<sup>68</sup> As such generally concern complicated procedures, before the employer as well in potential judicial proceedings (i.e. the employer has to demonstrate the existence of the reason for termination and the fulfilment of other conditions for the legality of such terminations of employment contracts), the effects of such measures would occur later than the effects of the challenged measure that merely concerns the finding that the retirement conditions are fulfilled. In addition, such procedures would interfere with the dignity of those civil servants with regard to whom the question of their ability to perform their work after a certain age would arise. When compared with the challenged regulation, such measures would not contribute to achieving the objective of stable public finances with the same efficiency, as their effects would be delayed. Furthermore, they would not necessarily contribute to balancing the personnel age structure, as they would affect civil servants of all ages. However, in the assessment of the challenged measure's necessity it is essential to consider that the objective of the challenged regulation is an employment policy intended to permanently reduce the public sector wage bill and, at the same time, to establish an appropriate personnel age structure in the long term. The above mentioned possibilities of terminating civil servants' employment contracts that are based on the assessment of an individual worker would not guarantee such permanently and systematically and would not enable a lasting structural stabilisation of expenditures in the area of labour costs. However, this does not entail that the employer is not required to terminate civil servants' employment contracts in accordance with labour law legislation if substantiated reasons for such exist. In light of such, the Constitutional Court deemed that the challenged measure is necessary to attain the outlined objectives simultaneously and with equal efficiency.

66 See the second indent of the first paragraph of Article 89 of the ERA-1. On the basis of the first paragraph of Article 159 of the CSA, with regard to the definition of inability, the provisions of the CSA apply to civil servants in state authorities and the administrations of local communities instead of the provisions of the law that regulates employment relationships.

68 See Article 110 of the ERA-1.

PROPORTIONALITY IN THE NARROWER SENSE

67. From the viewpoint of the principle of proportionality in the narrower sense, the Constitutional Court reviews whether the weight of the consequences of the interference with the affected human right under review is proportionate to the value of the objective pursued or the benefits that will result from the interference.
68. In the assessment of the Constitutional Court, the challenged measure is not disproportionate. This assessment is based on the finding that at the end of their professional career the persons whom the challenged measures concern are entitled to financial compensation in the form of an old age pension without reductions.<sup>69</sup> Moreover, the challenged regulation did not introduce mandatory retirement, as it does not prevent the affected persons from finding new employment or continuing their professional activities elsewhere.<sup>70</sup> A special possibility to continue professional activity is, inter alia, determined in the Labour Market Regulation Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 80/10, 21/13, and 36/13 – hereinafter referred to as the LMRA), which enables retired persons to perform temporary or occasional work on the basis of a contract for the provision of temporary or occasional work as a special agreement between an employer and a beneficiary, which may also have some elements of an employment relationship as determined by the law that regulates employment relationships (Articles 27a through 27g of the LMRA). In the assessment it must also be taken into account that [the challenged regulation] in fact does not concern a provisional measure, but economic indicators suggest that it will produce long-term effects. All the above-mentioned circumstances reduce the weight of the interference with the affected right of civil servants to non-discriminatory treatment.
69. Considering all the circumstances that reduce the weight of the interference with the affected right of civil servants to non-discriminatory treatment (see the preceding paragraph of the reasoning) and the importance of the objectives pursued by the challenged regulation, the Constitutional Court assesses that, even though it influences the financial as well as the social position of the affected civil servants, the challenged measure does not excessively interfere with the right of older civil servants to non-discriminatory treatment (the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution).
70. In light of the above, the challenged regulation is not inconsistent with the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of age as one of the other personal circumstances under the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution.

DISCRIMINATION ON GROUNDS OF SEX

71. In its request the applicant also alleges the inconsistency of the challenged provisions of the FBA with the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of sex (the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution).

69 See also the CJEU in the Judgments in the case Félix Palacios de la Villa, Para. 73, in the joined cases Vasil Ivanov Georgiev, Para. 54, and in the joined cases Gerhard Fuchs and Peter Köhler, Para. 66.

70 The CJEU considered a similar circumstance in the Judgments in the case Gisela Rosenblatt, Para. 75, and in the joined cases Gerhard Fuchs and Peter Köhler, Para. 66.

72. With regard to the termination of an employment contract, the challenged provisions of the FBA refer to the fulfilment of the above-mentioned retirement conditions under the PDIA-1 and the PDIA-2 that are determined differently for women and men. As the Government rightly pointed out in its opinion, the relevant provisions of the PDIA-1 determined the retirement age equally for both sexes (58 years); however the condition of years of employment was different with regard to sex, namely 40 years for men and 38 years for women. Prior to the entry into force of the PDIA-2, thus, in otherwise completely equal factual circumstances the challenged measure of the termination of an employment contract affected female civil servants two (working) years earlier than male civil servants.
73. In addition, the fifth paragraph of Article 27 of the PDIA-2, which is referred to by the first paragraph of Article 188 of the FBA as amended on 1 January 2013 in conjunction with the eleventh paragraph of Article 429 of the PDIA-2, does not remedy the differentiation on grounds of sex until the expiry of the transitional period on 1 January 2019. Even an additional difference with regard to the retirement conditions that enable the termination of an employment contract has been introduced. Under the new regulation, not only the condition of years of employment or the pensionable qualifying period, but also the required retirement age differ by sex. Therefore, on the basis of the text of the challenged Article 188 of the FBA currently in force, until 2019 the employment contracts of female civil servants may be terminated upon the attainment of an age that is four months less than [the retirement age determined] for men.
74. With regard to the test under Paragraph 39 of the reasoning of this Decision, the Constitutional Court deems that the challenged regulation treats civil servants differently on grounds of sex, whereby men and women are in a comparable position in terms of performing their work. It has further already been established that legal protection in connection with the termination of an employment contract falls within the scope of the third paragraph of Article 49 of the Constitution and, therefore, the case at issue concerns different treatment in the exercise of a human right.
75. When considering the constitutional admissibility of the challenged regulation, Directive 2006/54/EC, which gives expression to the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of sex,<sup>71</sup> and the case law of the CJEU must be taken into account. Point (a) of the first paragraph of Article 2 of Directive 2006/54/EC determines that there exists direct discrimination (inter alia) “where one person is treated less favourably on grounds of sex than another is, has been or would be treated in a comparable situation.” In accordance with point (c) of the first paragraph of Article 14 of Directive 2006/54/EC, there shall be no direct or indirect discrimination on grounds of sex in the public or private sectors, including public bodies, in relation to employment 71 Previously Directive 2002/73/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 23 September 2002 amending Council Directive 76/207/EEC on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion, and working conditions (OJ L 269, 5. 10. 2002, p. 15).

and working conditions, including dismissals<sup>72</sup> and pay.<sup>73</sup> Directive 2006/54/EC thus requires equal treatment regardless of sex in all aspects of employment, including the termination of an employment contract in connection with retirement. The CJEU has also repeatedly adopted the position that there exists inadmissible discrimination in the event of the termination of an employment contract that is connected with the attainment of the required retirement age if such is determined differently for men and women.<sup>74</sup>

76. The challenged regulation on the basis of which an employment contract is terminated upon the fulfilment of the statutory retirement conditions in accordance with the PDIA-1 or the PDIA-2, as applicable, whereby these are determined differently for men and women, entails an interference with the right of female civil servants (as women) to non-discriminatory treatment (the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution).
77. In accordance with the Constitution, an interference with the right to non-discriminatory treatment is only admissible if it is grounded in a constitutionally admissible, i.e. reasonably justified, objective (the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution), and if it is consistent with the general principle of proportionality as one of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution). The Constitutional Court carries out an assessment of consistency with the principle of proportionality by means of the so-called strict proportionality test.
78. The second paragraph of Article 14 of Directive 2006/54/EC must be taken into account with regard to the constitutionally admissible objective. In accordance with this provision, Member States may provide, as regards access to employment including the training leading thereto, that any difference in treatment that is based on a characteristic related to sex shall not constitute discrimination where, by reason of the nature of the particular occupational activities concerned or of the context in which they are carried out, such a characteristic constitutes a genuine and determining occupational requirement, provided that its objective is legitimate and the requirement is proportionate. Furthermore, the CJEU emphasised that, given the fundamental importance of the principle of equal treatment, this exception to the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of sex must be interpreted strictly, so as to be applicable only to the 72 In connection with the question of the termination of an employment relationship upon the fulfilment of retirement conditions, the CJEU adopted the position that an age limit for the compulsory dismissal of workers pursuant to an employer's general policy concerning retirement falls within the term "dismissal", even if the dismissal involves the granting of a retirement pension (see M. H. Marshall v. Southampton and South-West Hampshire Area Health Authority (Teaching), 152/84, dated 26 February 1986, Paras. 32 and 34).

73 On the basis of the second paragraph of Article 14 of Directive 2006/54/EC, Member States may provide, as regards access to employment including the training leading thereto, that a difference in treatment that is based on a characteristic related to sex shall not constitute discrimination where, by reason of the nature of the particular occupational activities concerned or of the context in which they are carried out, such a characteristic constitutes a genuine and determining occupational requirement, provided that its objective is legitimate and the requirement is proportionate.

74 See the CJEU Judgments in the case Pensionsversicherungsanstalt v. Christine Kleist, C-356/09, dated 18 November 2010, Para. 46, and in the case M. H. Marshall, Para. 38.

determination of the pensionable age for the purposes of granting old age pensions and to the possible consequences thereof for other social security benefits.<sup>75</sup>

79. With regard to the existence of a constitutionally admissible objective, the Constitutional Court established that both the National Assembly and the Government failed to present in their submissions any reasons that could justify the described differentiation on grounds of sex, and such reasons are also not evident from the legislative materials. An objective that would justify the interference with the right of female civil servants (as women) to non-discriminatory treatment thus does not exist, nor did it exist prior to the entry into force of the PDIA-2. As a result, already the first requirement determined by the Constitution for the limitation of human rights is not fulfilled (the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution).
80. The Constitutional Court therefore established that the first paragraph of Article 188 of the FBA in conjunction with the eleventh paragraph of Article 429 of the PDIA-2, the second, third, and fourth paragraphs of Article 188, and Article 246 of the FBA, insofar as they refer to female civil servants as insured women who have not yet fulfilled the same conditions for acquiring the right to an old age pension as apply to insured men, are inconsistent with the right to non-discriminatory treatment under the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution (Point 1 of the operative provisions).
81. For the same reasons, the first paragraph of Article 188 of the FBA prior to the entry into force of the PDIA-2 was also inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution, insofar as it referred to female civil servants as insured women who have not yet fulfilled the same conditions for acquiring the right to an old age pension as applied to insured men (Point 2 of the operative provisions).

Review from the viewpoint of the unequal treatment of civil servants in comparison with private sector workers (the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution)

82. The applicant is of the opinion that the challenged provisions place public sector employees in a less favourable position in comparison to private sector employees, as for the latter the general labour law regulation does not envisage the termination of their employment contract due to the fulfilment of the statutorily determined retirement conditions.
83. The second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution ensures general equality before the law. It requires the legislature to regulate equal positions equally and different positions accordingly differently. If the legislature regulates essentially equal positions differently or if it regulates essentially different positions equally, a sound reason that derives from the nature of the matter must exist for such.<sup>76</sup>

75 See the CJEU Judgments in the case Pensionsversicherungsanstalt, Para. 39, in the case M. H. Marshall, Para. 36, and the case Niederösterreichische Landes-Landwirtschaftskammer v. Anneliese Kuso, C-614/11, dated 12 September 2013, Paras. 52 and 53.

76 Cf. Constitutional Court Decisions No. U-I-18/11, dated 19 January 2012 (Official Gazette RS, No. 9/12), and No. U-I-149/11, dated 7 June 2012 (Official Gazette RS, No. 51/12).

84. The respective positions of employees in the public and the private sectors are fundamentally different in several aspects. Already at the outset, there is a difference in the regulation of their labour law positions, as numerous specificities for civil servants are determined by the CSA, the Public Sector Salary System Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 108/09 – official consolidated text, 13/10, 59/10, 85/10, 107/10, 35/11, and 46/13 – PSSSA), the DefA, and other laws. The Constitutional Court has already held that the positions of workers in the public and the private sectors are not comparable.<sup>77</sup> Even among civil servants themselves there exist numerous groups that cannot require equal treatment in comparison to other civil servants due to their different positions.<sup>78</sup>
85. With regard to the termination of an employment contract, the second part of the CSA, which applies to civil servants in authorities of the state and in the administrations of local communities, determines specificities in comparison to the general labour law regulation as determined by the ERA or as determined by the ERA-1 currently in force. These specificities are determined by Articles 153 through 162 of the CSA. Thus, for example, Article 156 determines that, instead of the ERA, provisions of the CSA apply with regard to the reasons for the regular termination of an employment contract for reasons of redundancy. The same is also true with respect to the termination of an employment contract due to inability, as the second paragraph of Article 159 of the CSA defines the term inability differently than the ERA. With regard to the termination of an employment contract for economic and financial reasons, public sector employees are in a different position in comparison to private sector employees mainly since the rights that derive from their employment relationships are financed from public resources. In this aspect, the position of civil servants thus essentially differs from the position of private sector employees, whose material rights under labour law are provided from private resources.
86. As employees in the public and private sectors are not in essentially equal positions, the legislature was entitled to regulate their positions differently. Consequently, the challenged provisions are not inconsistent with the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution.

B – VI

Review from the viewpoint of the principle of trust in the law (Article 2 of the Constitution)

87. From the perspective of the affected individuals, there allegedly exists an unconstitutional interference with their reasonable expectations, as when they entered into employment and during the time of their employment, due to the absence of similar provisions prior to the [enactment of the] challenged regulation, they could not have expected such a change in their position under labour and social law. The applicant states that the challenged regulation does not contain a transitional period and therefore it is allegedly contrary to the principle of trust in the law, which is one of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law determined by Article 2 of the Constitution.

<sup>77</sup> Cf. Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-244/08, dated 21 January 2010 (Official Gazette RS, No. 8/10), Paragraph 12.

88. The legislature must respond to needs in all fields of social life by adopting appropriate statutory regulation, which is even truer if such needs concern the foundations of the functioning of the state or its ability to efficiently ensure human rights and fundamental freedoms.<sup>79</sup> Such is required by the principle that the law must adapt to social relations as one of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution).<sup>80</sup>
89. The Constitutional Court has repeatedly explained that the Constitution does not prevent a regulation from changing previously determined rights or conditions for their exercise with effect for the future, provided that such changes do not contradict constitutionally determined principles or other constitutional provisions, in particular the principle of trust in the law as one of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law as determined by Article 2 of the Constitution (Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-66/08, dated 11 December 2008, Official Gazette RS, No. 121/08, and OdlUS XVII, 73). According to the established constitutional case law, this principle ensures individuals that the state will not aggravate their legal position in an arbitrary manner, i.e. without a sound reason substantiated by a prevailing and legitimate public interest (Constitutional Court Decisions No. U-I-66/08, No. U-I-370/06, dated 17 January 2008, Official Gazette RS, No. 15/08, and OdlUS XVII, 3, and No. U-I-79/12, dated 7 February 2013, Official Gazette RS, No. 17/13). As such concerns a general legal principle and not directly a human right, which under Article 15 of the Constitution enjoy stricter protection from potential limitations and interferences, this principle does not have absolute validity. It is open to potential limitations to a greater extent than individual human rights, i.e. in the event of a conflict or collision between this and other constitutional values, a so-called weighing of values must be carried out in order to decide which of the constitutionally protected values (either the principle of trust in the law or the principle that the law must adapt to social conditions) is to be given precedence in an individual case (cf. Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-66/08).
90. When the new regulation interferes with on-going relationships or legitimate legal expectations, due to the observance of the principle of trust in the law, the legislature must lay down a transitional period intended to regulate the rights and legal relationships that have already been established under the law that was previously in force and that still exist upon the entry into force of the new law (Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-123/11, dated 8 March 2012, Official Gazette RS, No. 22/12).

79 See Constitutional Court Decision No. U-II-1/12, U-II-2/12, dated 17 December 2012 (Official Gazette RS, No. 102/12, and OdlUS XIX, 39).

80 Cf. Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-186/12, dated 14 March 2013 (Official Gazette RS, No. 25/13).

The legislature may change the position of civil servants under labour law if it takes into account the above-mentioned conditions. Whether and to what extent a transitional period is necessary is assessed by weighing the statute's objective against the interference with [existing] legal positions (held by the Constitutional Court, for example, in Decisions No. U-I-206/97, dated 17 June 1998, Official Gazette RS, No. 50/98, and OdlUS VII, 134, and No. U-I-90/05, dated 7 July 2005, Official Gazette RS, No. 75/05, and OdlUS XIV, 66).

91. By the challenged regulation the legislature determined that a civil servant's employment contract is terminated when he or she fulfils the statutorily determined conditions for acquiring the right to an old age pension. Thereby, the legislature determined a new reason for the termination of an employment contract and interfered with on-going legal relationships. In such manner it interfered with the expected right of civil servants that their employment relationship would be terminated for [one of the] reasons that had been determined by law before the change. The interference with these rights is, however, not unconstitutional if there exist sound reasons substantiated by an overriding and legitimate public interest that are more important than the interference with the position of the affected persons.
92. In light of the objectives pursued by the challenged measure, the Constitutional Court deems that they entail sound reasons that are substantiated by an overriding and legitimate public interest.<sup>81</sup> Therefore, the Constitutional Court proceeded to assess whether the challenged provisions provided civil servants with sufficient time to adapt to the new conditions.
93. The FBA in fact did not determine a transitional period for the implementation of the challenged regulation. Nevertheless, it has to be noted that the existence of a possibility to adapt to the new regulation cannot be ruled out completely, as the consequences of the challenged regulation do not take effect for two months following the fulfilment of the statutory conditions for acquiring the right to an old age pension (the second paragraph of Article 188 and the second paragraph of Article 246 of the FBA).
94. Furthermore, it has to be taken into account that, under the regulation currently in force as well as under the regulation valid until 31 December 2012, the social security of the affected civil servants is already guaranteed in the form of the right to an old age pension without reductions. This makes adaptation to the challenged regulation considerably easier, since civil servants who are not able to find other employment or other means of obtaining resources through work, can retire and thus guarantee their social security. In addition, upon the termination of their employment contracts they are entitled to a special kind of severance pay (the second paragraph of Article 188 and the second paragraph of Article 246 of the FBA).
95. In light of the above, the challenged regulation is not inconsistent with the principle of trust in the law determined by Article 2 of the Constitution.

Review from the viewpoint of the requirement of the autonomy of universities and other institutions of higher education in conjunction with the freedom of science and the arts (Articles 58 and 59 of the Constitution)

96. Article 58 of the Constitution determines that state universities and state institutions of higher education shall be autonomous. The manner of their financing shall be regulated by law. Article 59 of the Constitution guarantees the freedom of scientific and artistic endeavour.
97. The Constitutional Court has already adopted the position that, due to respect for the autonomy of the university, the legislature must not regulate the question of whether and in which instances teachers, researchers, and other personnel at institutions of higher education may continue their employment relationship even if they have already fulfilled the conditions for acquiring the right to an old age pension (see Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-22/94, Paragraph 14 of the reasoning). The provision of the Higher Education Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 67/93) that was abrogated in that case differed essentially from the challenged regulation in Articles 188 and 246 of the FBA, as it provided that, regardless of the fulfilment of the prescribed retirement conditions, full professors could only occupy their posts until attaining 65 years of age. It did not enable universities and other institutions of higher education to independently decide on the continuation of the employment relationships of individual full professors, in consideration of the specific needs of their professional activity (given the specificities of the educational process, educational work, and the personnel structure of universities and other institutions of higher education). The Constitutional Court stated that the specificities of the educational process, educational work, and the personnel structure of universities and other institutions of higher education are included among those questions that constitute the content of the autonomy of universities that is protected by Article 58 of the Constitution.
98. The challenged regulation is essentially different as it enables employers (including universities and other institutions of higher education) to conclude an agreement for the continuation of an employment relationship, regardless of the fulfilment of the conditions for the termination of an employment contract, with a civil servant (including teachers, researchers, and other personnel at institutions of higher education) in order to ensure an uninterrupted work process (the third paragraph of Article 188 and the third paragraph of Article 246 of the FBA). Precisely by providing for this possibility the legislature enabled universities and other institutions of higher education to independently decide on the continuation of the employment relationships of teachers, researchers, and other personnel at institutions of higher education in order to ensure an uninterrupted work process and guarantee the freedom of scientific endeavour and research. Thereby it is guaranteed that universities and other institutions of higher education may themselves take into account the specificities of the educational process, educational work, and personnel structure. With regard to such, the challenged regulation does not interfere with the requirement of the autonomy of universities and other institutions of higher education (Article 58 of the Constitution) and the freedom of science and the arts (Article 59 of the Constitution). As a result, the legislature was also not required to determine a transitional period for the adaptation of universities and other institutions of higher education to the changed regulation.

99. In light of the above, the challenged provisions are not inconsistent with Articles 58 and 59 of the Constitution.

B – VIII

100. The Constitutional Court may in whole or in part abrogate a law that is not in conformity with the Constitution (Article 43 of the Constitution). If the Constitutional Court deems a law unconstitutional as it does not regulate a certain issue which it should regulate or it regulates such in a manner which does not enable abrogation, a declaratory decision is adopted on such (Article 48 of the Constitution).
101. In the case at issue, the Constitutional Court only established the partial unconstitutionality of the challenged provisions. Insofar as it refers to male civil servants, the challenged regulation is not inconsistent with the Constitution, thus there are no reasons for its abrogation in that part (Point 5 of the operative provisions). The abrogation of the challenged regulation only insofar as it refers to female civil servants as insured women who have not yet fulfilled the same conditions for acquiring the right to an old age pension as apply to insured men would result in constitutionally inadmissible discrimination against male civil servants, as the challenged measure of the termination of an employment contract would only continue to be in force with regard to them. Therefore, the abrogation of the challenged regulation is not possible and, considering the established inconsistency with the Constitution, the Constitutional Court thus adopted a declaratory decision (Points 1 and 2 of the operative provisions) and determined a six-month deadline for the legislature to remedy the established unconstitutionality (Point 3 of the operative provisions).
102. As on its own the Constitutional Court decision referred to in the preceding paragraph would entail a perpetuation of the unconstitutional state of affairs and thereby the further unconstitutional discrimination of female civil servants, the Constitutional Court determined the manner of the implementation of its Decision on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA. It determined that until the unconstitutionality established by this Decision is remedied, the employment contracts of female civil servants as insured women who have not yet fulfilled the same conditions for acquiring the right to an old age pension as apply to insured men may only be terminated when they have fulfilled the same conditions for acquiring the right to an old age pension as apply to insured men on the basis of the challenged provisions (Point 4 of the operative provisions).

C

103. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of Articles 21, 47, and 48, and the second paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA, composed of: the President Mag. Miroslav Mozetič and Judges Dr Mitja Deisinger, Dr Dunja Jadek Pensa, Mag.

Marta Klampfer, Dr Etelka Korpič – Horvat, Dr Ernest Petrič, Jasna Pogačar, Dr Jadranka Sovdat, and Jan Zobec. It adopted the first and second Points of the operative provisions unanimously. The third and fourth Points of the operative provisions were adopted by eight votes against one. Judge Jadek Pensa voted against. The Constitutional Court adopted the fifth Point of the operative provisions by six votes against three. Judges Jadek Pensa, Korpič – Horvat, and Sovdat voted against. Judges Jadek Pensa, Korpič – Horvat, and Sovdat submitted dissenting opinions.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE DR JADRANKA SOVDAT

1. I voted for the first four points of the operative provisions of the Decision, and against the fifth point. My vote for the first four points of the operative provisions does not entail that I accept the discrimination on grounds of age that persists in the legal system due to the majority decision. I expressed my opposition to discrimination on grounds of age through my vote against the fifth point. Even if I agreed that there has been no inadmissible discrimination on grounds of age, there would namely still exist inadmissible discrimination on grounds of sex to the extent that follows from the first and second points of the operative provisions of the Decision.
2. As I agree with the established inadmissible discrimination on grounds of sex, I also agree that by determining the manner of the implementation of its Decision in the fourth Point of the operative provisions of the Decision in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 40 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 64/07 – official consolidated text, and 109/12 – CCA), the Constitutional Court created a basis that has equal legal effects as a statutory basis and that (at least) establishes gender equality.
3. However, I cannot agree with the arguments by which the majority substantiated its decision in the fifth Point of the operative provisions, although I agree with some of the premises on the basis of which the review was carried out. I cannot agree with the rationes decidendi that justify the different treatment on grounds of age in the case at issue due to a number of reasons that diverge mainly in two directions. The first concerns the justification of the constitutionally admissible objectives, and the second the review of the necessity and appropriateness of the measure for attaining the objectives.

I

4. Today, the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of personal circumstances is a truly universal legal principle that is also enshrined in international instruments, first among them being the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948,<sup>1</sup> which

---

1 Published in: Človekove pravice, Zbirka mednarodnih dokumentov, I. del, Univerzalni dokumenti [Human Rights, A is considered to be an integral part of customary international law.<sup>2</sup> The Universal Declaration of Human Rights<sup>3</sup> and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights<sup>4</sup> as well as the Constitution [of the Republic of Slovenia] (the first paragraph of Article 14) determine the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of personal circumstances as regards human rights and fundamental freedoms. Age is undoubtedly such a personal circumstance regardless of the fact that it is not explicitly mentioned by these documents. Furthermore, the basic text of the Convention on the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR) contains a provision in Article 14 that prohibits discrimination in the enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms guaranteed by the Convention. However, it should be noted that the Republic of Slovenia is a signatory to Protocol No. 12 to the ECHR (Official Gazette RS, No. 46/10, MP, No. 8/10), which in the first paragraph of Article 1 determines the prohibition of discrimination more broadly, not only in the enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms.<sup>5</sup> This provision prohibits discrimination regarding any right set forth by law. This is also the approach of European Union law. Not only Articles 10 and 19 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (OJ C 326, 26. 10. 2012 – hereinafter referred to as the TFEU), but also Article 21 of the European Union Charter of Fundamental Rights (OJ C 326, 26. 10. 2012) generally prohibit discrimination (i.e. not only as regards fundamental rights), whereby such is a principle,<sup>6</sup> not a fundamental right. Indeed, the principle of non-discrimination

Škrk, Odnos med mednarodnim pravom in notranjim pravom v praksi Ustavnega sodišča [The Relationship between International Law and Domestic Law in the Case Law of the Constitutional Court], Pravnik, No. 6–8 (2007), p. 292.
- 3 The first sentence of Article 2 reads as follows: “Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status.”
- 4 Official Gazette SFRJ, MP, No. 7/71, and Official Gazette RS, No. 35/92, MP, No. 9/92 – hereinafter referred to as the ICCPR. The first paragraph of [Article] 2 of the ICCPR reads as follows: “1. Each State Party to the present Covenant undertakes to respect and to ensure to all individuals within its territory and subject to its jurisdiction the rights recognized in the present Covenant, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status.”
- 5 The European Court of Human Rights applies both [instruments] as its legal basis. Thus, in the Judgment in the case Konstantin Markin v. Russia, dated 22 March 2012, the Grand Chamber of the Court established a violation of the right determined by Article 14 in conjunction with Article 8 of the ECHR. In the Judgment in the case Sejdić and Finci v. Bosnia and Herzegovina, dated 22 December 2009, the Grand Chamber of the Court established a violation of the first paragraph of Article 1 of Protocol No. 12 to the ECHR, as the case concerned the election of a head of state, which is not encompassed by the third paragraph of Article 3 of the Protocol to the ECHR.
- 6 This can also be concluded from the Judgments of the Court of Justice of the European Union (hereinafter referred to as the CJEU). In the Judgment in the case Kücükdeveci v. Swedex GmbH & Co. KG, C-555/07, dated 19 January 2010 (Paras. 21–23), the CJEU referred to the principle of the prohibition of discrimination on on grounds of age in European Union law is regulated in further detail by Council Directive 2000/78/EC of 27 November 2000 establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation (OJ L 303, 2. 12. 2000 – hereinafter referred to as Directive 2000/78/EC).<sup>7</sup>

5. Why am I drawing attention to this? Because the Decision refers to all of these legal sources and its reasoning relies to a significant extent on European Union law; however, it is not expressly evident from the aspect highlighted [by the Decision] why the prohibition of discrimination with regard to a human right has been reviewed, and Paragraph 39 of the reasoning would be misinterpreted if someone were to derive from it that there are no restrictions of discrimination on grounds of age with regard to rights that are not human rights. In fact, in my opinion, quite the contrary is true. There exists a general prohibition of discrimination on grounds of personal circumstances that naturally applies a fortiori to human rights and fundamental freedoms, with regard to which the Constitution and international legal instruments specifically lay down such a prohibition.
6. This case concerns a right that is (also) a human right. I namely agree that the case concerns the question of the admissibility of discrimination on grounds of age with regard to the human right determined by the third paragraph of Article 49 of the Constitution. If the cited Constitutional provision guarantees equality as regards access to any position of employment, then it also guarantees equality as regards the refusal thereof. Equality constitutes the essence of this human right; it does not entail that a person enjoys the right to a position of employment, but that everyone can compete for a position of employment under the same conditions or, as applicable, that such can be refused to them under the same conditions. If according to the essence of this right (even general) inequality is prohibited, then the prohibition must apply even more to discrimination on grounds of a personal circumstance such as age. In light of such, in cases concerning discrimination with regard to a human right it would be more appropriate if the Constitutional Court in the future explicitly emphasised that it applied the prohibition of discrimination with regard to precisely the human right that the case concerned as the upper premise of its review – in the case at issue namely the review and establishment of (in)consistency with the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution in conjunction with the third paragraph of Article 49 of the Constitution. As can be derived from the reasoning [of the Decision],<sup>8</sup> the Constitutional Court namely conducted such a review; however, in conclusion it only established an (in)consistency with the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution. In light of Article 1 of Protocol No. 12 to the ECHR and in light of the principle of European grounds of age as a general principle of European Union law and thereby also recalled the prohibition of discrimination determined by the first paragraph of Article 21 of the Charter.

8 The Constitutional Court reviewed the prohibition of discrimination with regard to a human right in the same manner in Decision No. U-I-425/06, dated 2 July 2009 (Official Gazette RS, No. 55/09, and OdlUS XVIII, 29); however, it only established an inconsistency with the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution, even though it was in fact reviewing the prohibition of discrimination with regard to the human right determined by Article 33 of the Constitution.

Union law that extend the prohibition of discrimination beyond the scope of the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution, it appears that such an emphasis would have been appropriate. However, I agree that both types of review may also include intertwining arguments and the application of European Union law as regards the review of the admissibility of discrimination on grounds of age.

7. I agree with the approach adopted in the Decision that in the case at issue European Union law also has to be taken into consideration when reviewing the conformity of the law in terms of the first paragraph of Article 14 in conjunction with the third paragraph of Article 49 of the Constitution. It is a fact that by the third paragraph of Article 3a of the Constitution the Slovene constitution framer explicitly established the constitutional obligation on the basis of which in the Republic of Slovenia legal acts and decisions adopted within the European Union are applied in accordance with the legal regulation of the European Union.<sup>9</sup> I agree that taking European Union law into consideration is a constitutional obligation,<sup>10</sup> and not merely an obligation arising from a treaty by which the exercise of part of our sovereign rights have been transferred to the European Union in such a manner that since then we have been exercising them together with the other Member States in the manner determined by European Union law. This constitutional obligation requires all authorities of the state, including the Constitutional Court, to also take this dimension into consideration when interpreting constitutional provisions.<sup>11</sup> Therefore, I further agree that the general principle of the European Union regarding the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of age and Directive 2000/78/EC, which concretises it, as well as the CJEU judgments in which that court interpreted the provisions of the mentioned Directive, have to be taken into account in the review in the case at issue. However, I do not agree with the method applied by the majority in the case at issue.

- 9 A constitutional provision such as the third paragraph of Article 3a of the Constitution (which, although general, is distinctly adapted to the specificities of the European Union) is found in neither the German Constitution, which, in contrast to Slovene regulation, contains a so-called European Article (Article 23 of the Fundamental Law of the Federal Republic of Germany), nor the Austrian Constitution, which also regulates questions related to the European Union separately (Articles 23a through 23f of the Federal Constitutional Law of the Republic of Austria).
  - 10 This then obviates the application of the constitutional rule that only treaties that have been validly ratified and published are directly applicable, as stated by Prof. Grad (See F. Grad, Evropsko ustavno pravo, Prvi del, Ustavno pravo Evropske unije [European Constitutional Law, Part One, Constitutional Law of the European Union], Uradni list Republike Slovenije, Ljubljana 2010, p. 199). It namely excludes the application of Article 8 of the Constitution.
  - 11 In this regard, the warning of a former President of the Constitutional Court should be recalled, i.e. that this provision entails a wide blanket authorisation for the application of European Union law that does not precisely determine the rules that enter the Slovene constitutional legal order in such manner in terms of their temporal effects or hierarchical position. See F. Testen in: L. Šturm (Ed.), Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije, Dopolnitev – A [Commentary on the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia, Supplement–A], Fakulteta za državne in evropske študije, Ljubljana 2011, p. 91.

II

8. In accordance with the first paragraph of Article 6 of Directive 2000/78/EC, different treatment on grounds of age does not constitute discrimination if, within the context of national law, it is objectively and reasonably justified by a legitimate aim, including legitimate employment policy, labour market, and vocational training objectives, and if the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary; this different treatment may also include the determination of conditions as regards both access to employment and the dismissal of older persons. The provision thus leaves quite some room to manoeuvre in the interpretation of which objectives may constitute legitimate aims that can render differentiation on grounds of age admissible.
9. The Decision recognises that the main objective of the Fiscal Balance Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 40/12, and 105/12 – hereinafter referred to as the FBA) is to ensure sustainable public finances. As it establishes that, in accordance with the case law of the CJEU, budgetary considerations cannot in themselves constitute legitimate aims for the different treatment of older persons, it supplements such with two additional objectives (which in itself is not inadmissible), i.e. the establishment of a balanced age structure of civil servants and the prevention of potential disputes regarding whether a civil servant is still able to perform his or her work after a certain age (Paragraph 51 of the reasoning of the Decision). It then proceeds to justify not only why the measure is necessary and appropriate from the viewpoint of the additional objectives, but also in terms of the objective of sustainable public finances (Paragraphs 58, 60, 64, and 66 of the reasoning of the Decision). This entails that the majority [of the Constitutional Court judges] understand the emphasis stemming from numerous CJEU judgments that budgetary considerations cannot in themselves constitute justifiable reasons for discrimination on grounds of age in the following manner: Discrimination cannot be admissible solely on the basis of budgetary reasons; however, if these are supplemented by other, legitimate objectives, budgetary reasons (in themselves) also become a legitimate objective for differentiation on grounds of age.
10. In my opinion, CJEU judgments cannot be understood in such a manner. If we examine, for example, the Judgment in the case Gerhard Fuchs and Peter Köhler v. Land Hessen, C-159/10, C-160/10, dated 21 July 2011, in Para. 74 the CJEU states that while budgetary considerations may underpin the choice of social policy and influence the nature and extent of the measures that a Member State wishes to adopt, such considerations “cannot in themselves constitute a legitimate aim within the meaning of Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78.”<sup>12</sup> I understand this as meaning that budgetary reasons simply cannot constitute a legitimate aim in the sense of the first paragraph of Article 6 of the cited Directive. Furthermore, they cannot become such aims even if they are supplemented by other objectives that could in themselves be legitimate aims. If they are supplemented by other objectives, differentiation that is based on these other objectives that are also in themselves legitimate can potentially be justified. In other words, aims that are legitimate in themselves constitute sufficient aims to justify differentiation on grounds of age if it can be established that the measure [in question] is necessary and appropriate to actually achieve these aims. The legitimacy of the other aims, however, does not entail the legitimacy of budgetary objectives. In my opinion, such also derives from the reasoning that the CJEU provided in judgments in which it considered discrimination on grounds of age. If I continue to focus only on the above-highlighted Judgment in Gerhard Fuchs and Peter Köhler v. Land Hessen, the CJEU thus established that the cited Directive does not preclude a law that provides for the compulsory retirement of public prosecutors at a certain age, “provided that that law has the aim of establishing a balanced age structure in order to encourage the recruitment and promotion of young people, to improve personnel management and thereby to prevent possible disputes concerning employees’ fitness to work beyond a certain age, and that it allows that aim to be achieved by appropriate and necessary means.”<sup>13</sup> If the situation was such as derives from our Decision, the CJEU would additionally apply budgetary considerations in its reasoning, but that is not the case.

11. Therefore, firstly, I have serious doubts that on the basis of the CJEU judgments that we [i.e. the Constitutional Court] refer to the co-existence of budgetary reasons could be taken into account as a legitimate aim alongside other legitimate aims, and that we would in this sense be dealing with an acte éclairé. If we wanted to draw such a conclusion, in my opinion, we would have been required to previously refer a preliminary question to the CJEU regarding the admissibility of such an interpretation of the first paragraph of Article 6 of the cited Directive. The fact that the Republic of Slovenia is in an excessive deficit procedure in accordance with Article 126 of the TFEU could have been a particular argument in this regard. However, thus far such an argument has not been recognised by CJEU judgments as a legitimate aim that would exceed the reasons that the CJEU classifies as budgetary considerations. This is therefore another argument in favour of referring a question for a preliminary ruling in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 267 of the TFEU. In this sense, we are thus also not dealing with an acte éclairé. As the CJEU has consistently stated that budgetary reasons in themselves cannot constitute legitimate aims for differentiation on grounds of age in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 6 of Directive 2000/78/EC, in my opinion, we are thus far from an acte clair in this regard as well.
12. In my opinion, in the case at issue the arguments that substantiate the necessity and appropriateness of the differentiation on grounds of age in the sense of the objective of ensuring sustainable public finances thus should not have found a place in the Decision, at least not without previously establishing a dialogue with the CJEU. Once I eliminate [these arguments], I am left with the question of whether the objectives stated in Paragraph 51 of the reasoning of the Decision, which the CJEU, in my opinion, deems to be a single aim,<sup>14</sup> can justify the differentiation. Thereby, firstly, the question arises whether the additional objectives that the Decision refers to in Paragraph 51 are in fact the actual objectives of the challenged statutory regulation. Such might be disputable, as was also stressed by the applicant in its statement regarding the reply of the National Assembly. However, this does not even have to be resolved, as, in my opinion, in light of the mentioned objectives, even if they were considered to constitute the actual objectives [of the challenged statutory regulation] that could allegedly render differentiation on grounds of age admissible, the challenged measure appears to be neither necessary nor appropriate.

III

13. The CJEU, which through its decisions is obliged to ensure the uniform application of Directive 2000/78/EC in the entire territory of the European Union, has frequently left the final decision on the necessity and appropriateness of a measure to the national courts.<sup>15</sup> However, at the same time it has repeatedly stated that the national court must ascertain whether the age limit guarantees that the aims pursued by the measure will be attained in a consistent and systematic manner or whether the exceptions to the age limit interfere with the consistency of the legislation in question by leading to a result that is contrary to that objective.<sup>16</sup>
14. In my opinion, the legislature itself successfully contested the necessity of the measure as in the third paragraph of Article 188 and the third paragraph of Article 246 of the FBA it provided for the possibility that an employer and a civil servant agree to continue the employment relationship, whereby they define the further duration of the employment relationship that is not limited by statute, and thus it can last for 5 or even 10 years, namely for a period lasting until the civil servant would in any event decide to cease to work and retire. This period will thus exceed the provisional nature of the challenged measure and in such instances no differentiation will occur at all. These are, therefore, exceptions that lead in the opposite direction of the objective. If such exceptions exist, in my opinion, one cannot deem the measure to be necessary.
15. Moreover, one cannot deem that the legislature established the consistency of the implementation of the measure for attaining the objective of an intergenerationally balanced personnel structure. For some this measure will produce effects, for others, due to the discretion of the employer (when assessing whether the continuation of the employment relationship is necessary to ensure an uninterrupted work process), it will

16 See, e.g., the Judgment in the case *Vasil Ivanov Georgiev v. not, and due to the provisional nature of the measure (Article 182 of the FBA<sup>17</sup>), for some it will produce no effects at all. This creates additional differentiation on grounds of age between civil servants. In addition, such concerns a measure that is evidently intended to reduce the size of the public sector (which also indicates that fundamentally the measure pursues public-finance objectives, as has also been stressed by the applicant). Such entails that, as a rule, in instances of terminations of employment contracts due to limited budgetary (public) resources, firstly, an assessment of the organisational possibilities of reducing the number of employees to achieve the required reduction in the public wage bill will have to be carried out, and only afterwards will there be room for substitute recruitment. The Government only submitted data on the personnel situation and changes regarding such during the period of the validity of this law for state administration authorities, but failed to provide such data for the entire public sector. This may also constitute a problem, as due to such it is not possible to assess with certainty whether such a measure is indeed appropriate for the consistent attainment of the aim. The data submitted by the Government also include a table indicating the age structure of employees in state administration authorities as of 31 December 2012, namely a good half year after the FBA entered into force, and as of 1 June 2013, namely a good year after the FBA entered into force. If such concerns a measure of a provisional nature, although due to economic reasons this provisional measure may remain in force for several years, in such a period of time the first results of the measure in terms of the highlighted objective should become apparent, at least as a trend towards halting the further deterioration of the intergenerational age structure (as it has to be considered that intergenerational balance may in fact be established [only] over a longer period of time). The submitted data, however, do not show that the trend as regards the deterioration of the age structure of employees halted, but rather suggest the contrary. In the first half of this year, the number of the oldest group of civil servants (aged 60 years and over) increased from 518 to 545 in comparison to the end of the previous year, while in the next category (aged 50 to 59 years) the number increased from 6,012 to 6,220, and in the next (aged 40 to 49 years) it increased from 11,582 to 11,625. On the contrary, the number of civil servants aged 30 to 39 years decreased from 11,404 to 11,050, and of those younger than 30 years from 3,408 to 3,022. At the present moment, this rather indicates that the measure does not in fact pursue the additional objectives from Paragraph 51 of the Decision, but rather its main objective – i.e. to reduce the size of the public sector or the public wage bill due to budgetary reasons. The young are not being recruited, and the age of civil servants is in fact increasing.

16. The objective of intergenerational balance could in fact be achieved in the long term through consistent recruitment of young persons. However, if recruitment is suspended due to budgetary reductions, it will not be possible to attain this objective (at least to a large extent), which was also pointed out by the applicant. The need to reduce the size of the public sector is completely legitimate and could be attained in different ways, and while the state can decide to take such action, it may not do so by allowing discrimination on grounds of age. The data supporting the fact that civil servants who have not yet attained the age of 30 years have concluded the highest proportion of fixed-term employment contracts also does not favour a different conclusion. While this data in itself is understandable, as it is common knowledge that trainees and individuals in other professions (e.g. internships and residency of physicians) who are training to be able to perform their profession independently or, for example, junior researchers pursuing doctoral studies conclude fixed-term employment relationships. By itself, this does not entail a deterioration of the intergenerational age structure of civil servants, provided that, after the completion of the training, the normal transfer of such persons to available positions is ensured. Opening the doors of the public sector to young educated persons is legitimate and necessary. It would be appropriate if the legislature adopted measures to ensure such. However, if in this process, due to the necessarily limited number of employment positions available in the public sector, differentiation on grounds of age is to occur, then the legislature must implement it in such a manner that the measure pursues a legitimate objective and that this measure is necessary and appropriate as well as consistently implemented such that the objective will in fact be attained, and not by establishing further inequality between civil servants on grounds of their personal circumstances.

17 In accordance with the cited provision, the measure remains in force until the expiry of one year following a year in which economic growth exceeds 2.5% of the gross domestic product.

IV

17. I would have arrived at the same conclusion also through a constitutional review of the admissibility of the interference with the non-discriminatory exercise of the right determined by the third paragraph of Article 49 of the Constitution without any reference to European Union law. Even if all the objectives mentioned by the Decision could (but they must not) be considered as possible constitutionally admissible objectives for the mentioned interference (the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution), in my opinion, the measure from the challenged provisions would not pass the strict proportionality test (Article 2 of the Constitution). It depends solely on the employer's discretion which civil servants will be affected by the provisional measure, and with whom he or she will conclude agreements for the continuation of the employment relationship, potentially for several years. Such a measure cannot be necessary. If the attainment of the objective(s) can in fact to a large extent be avoided through exceptions that lie in the employer's discretion and given the measure's provisional nature, also the appropriateness of such a measure is called into question. If these exceptions are dictated by the resources available for public sector wages, it is again clear that the true objective of the measure is a reduction in expenditure and not the attainment of an intergenerationally balanced age structure. Budgetary considerations, however, cannot constitute constitutionally admissible objectives that could justify discrimination on grounds of a personal circumstance. If we were to recognise them as such, we would open wide the doors to discrimination.
18. Since the challenged measure introduces differentiation regarding the termination of employment contracts between civil servants on grounds of age and due to reasons and in a manner that in my opinion is not consistent with the principle of the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of age, the Constitutional Court should have established its unconstitutionality in this sense as well. As I believe that there also exists inadmissible discrimination on grounds of age due to which the challenged provisions (insofar as they still remain in force) should have been abrogated or (insofar as they ceased to have effect, but will continue to be applied in potential judicial proceedings) their unconstitutionality should have been established (Article 47 of the CCA), I did not at all address the questions of whether the challenged measure is consistent with the principle of trust in the law and whether it further entails an inadmissible interference with the autonomy of universities.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE DR ETELKA KORPIČ – HORVAT

1. The prohibition of discrimination, as determined by the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution, according to which in Slovenia everyone shall be guaranteed equal human rights and fundamental freedoms irrespective of their personal circumstances (e.g. national origin, race, sex, language, religion, political, or other conviction, material standing), is one of the fundamental constitutional values, as this human right is intertwined with people's daily lives and their basic human dignity. I believe that in the case at issue the right to non-discriminatory treatment has been violated since the challenged statutory regulation established an unjustified differentiation between individuals, namely on grounds of age.<sup>1</sup>
2. Below, I will clarify the reasons why I believe that Articles 188 and 246 of the Fiscal Balance Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 40/12, and 105/12 – hereinafter referred to as the FBA), which concern the termination of an employment contract due to the fulfilment of the prescribed conditions for acquiring the right to an old age pension, are inconsistent with the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of age determined by the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution.
3. In accordance with Constitutional Court doctrine, an interference with the right to non-discriminatory treatment is constitutionally admissible only if it is based on a constitutionally admissible and legitimate, i.e. objectively justified aim (the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution), and provided that it passes the strict proportionality test (Article 2 of the Constitution).<sup>2</sup> In the case at issue, I particularly

1 Age is one of the personal circumstances that are not explicitly listed in the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution; however, by means of the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of "other personal circumstances" it is clearly encompassed by this provision.

2 The Constitutional Court reviews an interference with a human right on the basis of a test of legitimacy and a test of proportionality. In order for the restriction of a human right to be admissible there must exist a legitimate (constitutionally admissible) objective. In addition, the following three conditions have to be fulfilled: firstly, the interference must be necessary – this entails that the objective cannot be achieved through a less disagree with the part of the Decision that establishes that the legislature was entitled to pursue public-finance objectives and that the interference with the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution was thus justified by public-finance reasons. In addition, I believe that also the remaining three conditions of the strict proportionality test in a constitutional review (necessity, appropriateness, and proportionality in the narrower sense) were not fulfilled.

4. In accordance with EU law, whereby the review of the case at issue must primarily take into account Article 6 of Council Directive 2000/78/EC of 27 November 2000 establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation (OJ L 303, 2. 12. 2000), it is not disputed that national legislations can determine instances of different treatment regarding the termination of an employment contract on grounds of age, provided that they are objectively and reasonably justified by legitimate aims [that are pursued by means] that must be appropriate and necessary. The legitimate aims can include employment policy, labour law, and vocational objectives.
5. In Paragraph 46 of the reasoning the Constitutional Court stated: “In any event, the realisation of the objectives of social policy and employment policy must be included among the objectives that the legislature and the Government pursued with this measure. [...] The termination of the employment contract of a civil servant who has fulfilled the conditions for acquiring the right to an old age pension without reductions is only one of the instruments by means of which the Government wishes to achieve in part a reduction in the number of public sector employees (a reduction in the public sector wage bill) and in part an altered age structure of civil servants. [...]” I could not agree with this line of reasoning as, in the meantime, the legislature adopted the Pension and Invalidity Insurance Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 96/12, and 39/13 – hereinafter referred to as the PDIA-2), which entered into force on 1 January 2013 (namely only half a year after the FBA) and determined that insured persons who remain employed until the age of 65 although they have already fulfilled the conditions for acquiring the right to an early pension or an old age pension have the right to receive, in addition to the entire wage from their employment relationship, 20% of their pension even though they have not formally acquired the status of pensioners (the third paragraph of Article 38 of the PDIA-2).<sup>3</sup> The institution of partial retirement is also intended for gradual retirement due to active ageing (Article 40 of the PDIA-2). Moreover, due to the increasing life expectancy, trends in severe interference with the constitutional right in question or even without such interference; secondly, the interference must be appropriate for actually achieving the objective; and, thirdly, the so-called proportionality in the narrower sense has to be taken into account to establish whether the interference with the human right is proportionate to the [resulting] benefit.

- 3 The third paragraph of Article 38 of the PDIA-2 determines the following: “An insured person who, upon fulfilment of the conditions for obtaining an early or an old age pension, is insured by the Agency and remains insured to the same extent, is, from the day following the lodging of the application, provided that the insured person decides to lodge such, entitled to a monthly payment of 20% of the early or old age pension which he or she would have been entitled to on the day of acquiring such right until the insurance is terminated or a partial pension is claimed, but no longer than until 65 years of age.”

the field of pension insurance are in favour of raising the retirement age.<sup>4</sup> What then is the aim of employment and social policy in the Republic of Slovenia: active ageing or retirement? The employment and social objectives pursued by the challenged provisions of the FBA and the above-mentioned provisions of the PDIA-2 are contradictory. In my opinion, this is already a sufficient reason to convince me to not accept that the FBA, in addition to evident public-finance objectives, also pursued objectives in the fields of employment policy and social policy. Public-finance objectives were, in my opinion, evidently the only objectives of this law, and by themselves these objectives do not constitute constitutionally admissible objectives that would allow an interference with the right to non-discriminatory treatment.

6. The Constitutional Court deemed that the following constituted constitutionally admissible objectives for the less favourable (discriminatory) treatment of older persons who have fulfilled the conditions for old age retirement: firstly, the public-finance objective, i.e. reducing budgetary expenses (reducing the number of employees and thereby the wage bill to achieve budgetary effects; Paragraphs 48 and 51 of the reasoning). It follows from the Decision that, in particular in light of CJEU decisions, this objective by itself is insufficient. Therefore, the Decision also established the objective that derives from the legislative materials and that was also asserted by the Government, i.e., secondly, the establishment of a favourable age structure of civil servants (Paragraph 48 of the reasoning). In addition, in the assessment of the Constitutional Court, an evident objective of the challenged regulation is also, thirdly, the prevention of disputes regarding an employee's ability to perform his or her work after a certain age (Paragraph 48 of the reasoning).
7. With regard to the public-finance objective, the question arises whether [the reduction of] the budgetary deficit may constitute a legitimate aim that justifies an interference with the right to non-discriminatory treatment on grounds of age. The Constitutional Court considered this question relying on the CJEU Judgment in the joined cases Gerhard Fuchs and Peter Köhler, C-159/10 and C-160/10, dated 21 July 2011, according to which public-finance considerations cannot in themselves constitute a legitimate aim, but budgetary considerations can underpin the chosen social policy of a Member State. The question of how Para. 74 of that Judgment is to be understood in the application and interpretation of the challenged provisions of the FBA is essential.
8. In my opinion, the reference to the mentioned Judgment in the sense of establishing the public-finance objective as the primary legitimate objective that may justify discrimination remains disputable. Neither in the mentioned Judgment nor in its decisions in other cases<sup>5</sup> did the CJEU directly link the co-existence of several objectives

4 In Decision No. U-I-49/98, dated 25 November 1999, the Constitutional Court also deemed that trends in the field of pension insurance – including the proposed amendments to the Slovene pension legislation – were moving towards raising the retirement age, encouraging late retirement, and equalising retirement conditions (in particular regarding age) for men and women.

5 See the CJEU Judgments in the case Gisela Rosenblatt v. Oellerking Gebäudereinigungsges. mbH, C-45/09, dated 12 October 2010, Paras. 43 and 45, in the joined cases Vasil Ivanov Georgiev v. Tehnicheski universitet - Sofia, filial Plovdiv, C-250/09 and C-268/09, dated 18 November 2010, in the case Félix Palacios de la Villa v. Cortefiel to a primary public-finance objective, and it also did not deem such an objective to be a legitimate aim. The mentioned cases (Rosenbladt, Petersen, and Georgiev) concerned [instances of the co-existence of] several legitimate aims, and not several aims that also included aims that were not legitimate. The CJEU only accepted that the budgetary situation may be taken into account in the determination of social and employment objectives. While a budgetary deficit may influence the determination of a legitimate employment or social objective, [budgetary considerations] may not in themselves constitute a direct objective that could justify discrimination on grounds of age. In my opinion, such follows from Para. 74 of the Judgment in the joined cases Fuchs and Köhler, which the Constitutional Court directly referred to.<sup>6</sup> This follows even more clearly from Para. 65 of the same Judgment, which reads as follows: “Therefore, in defining their social policy on the basis of political, economic, social, demographic and/or budgetary considerations, the national authorities concerned may be led to choose to prolong people’s working life or, conversely, to provide for early retirement (see Palacios de la Villa, paragraphs 68 and 69). [...]” The FBA, however, concerns a law that in its first Article explicitly determined only a single objective, i.e. “ensuring sustainable public finances and reducing budgetary expenses.” This is thus the only statutory objective that the legislature provided for the possibility of “mandatory” retirement. I believe that an interference with the right to non-discriminatory treatment cannot be based on a law that only lays down public-finance objectives, while its other objectives, i.e. employment and social policy objectives, which the legislature did not define, derive from other circumstances or submissions made by the Government.<sup>7</sup> On the basis of a poor state of public finances only the main act that regulates the position of civil servants under labour and social law can determine the objective of the termination of an employment contract due to the fulfilment of retirement conditions.

9. Moreover, the discriminatory effect of the FBA is distinctly emphasised as it allows the arbitrary termination of employment contracts. It determines that the employer has full discretion when deciding which civil servant’s employment contract is to be terminated upon the fulfilment of retirement conditions. Therefore, in my opinion, the provisions of the FBA discriminate against those civil servants who have fulfilled retirement conditions and are arbitrarily chosen by the employer (without being bound by any criteria when doing so), who thus decides that these civil servants have to retire. The challenged provisions of the FBA are thus already discriminatory in themselves.

Servicios SA, C-411/05, dated 16 October 2007, Paras. 69 and 71, and in the case Domnica Petersen v. Berufungsausschuss für Zahnärzte für den Bezirk Westfalen-Lippe, C-341/08, dated 12 January 2010.

- 6 The text of Para. 74 of the Judgment in the joined cases Fuchs and Köhler reads as follows: “In that regard, while budgetary considerations can underpin the chosen social policy of a Member State and influence the nature or extent of the measures that the Member State wishes to adopt, such considerations cannot in themselves constitute a legitimate aim within the meaning of Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78.”
- 7 With regard to such, I would like to point out that, as regards public-finance objectives, in Decision No. U-II-1/11, dated 10 March 2011, the Constitutional Court already held that the unconstitutionality of the PDIA-1 cannot be substantiated, even though it can in general be substantiated that changes to the pension system are needed and even necessary for macroeconomic, public-finance, or demographic reasons (Paragraph 32).

- 10. Furthermore, the public-finance objective cannot be reviewed as the legislature provided no data to demonstrate its effects (not even an estimate of budgetary net effects). The Constitutional Court lacked data regarding the number of civil servants who will fulfil the conditions for retirement as well as regarding the reduction in budgetary expenses due to their (potential) retirement. The Constitutional Court Decision also does not contain data on the expected reduction in budgetary expenses. The Decision only contains general statements on the critical conditions in the Republic of Slovenia, without providing an assessment of the budgetary consequences of the statutory provisions. As this manner of terminating an employment contract is not mandatory but subject to the employer's decision, it is questionable if and to what extent it will affect the sustainability of public finances or the reduction of budgetary expenses. I believe that no significant reductions of budgetary expenses will be achieved as the older civil servants who previously contributed to the budget will, following their retirement, receive pensions from the budget. While the wage bill will decrease, at least in the short term, the labour costs will increase due to the payment of severance pay. If new civil servants are employed, in my assessment, the reduction in labour costs will be negligible. Of course, in these assessments I have not considered the fact that the newly retired civil servants also rendered a useful service. Therefore, at least in the short term (and the FBA is a provisional statute), in my assessment, the Act will not produce budgetary effects due to the mentioned disputable provisions.
- 11. In light of all of the above, I believe that the public-finance objective does not constitute a constitutionally admissible objective for the less favourable (discriminatory) treatment of older employees who have fulfilled the conditions for retirement.
- 12. The Constitutional Court constructed the second legitimate objective – i.e. establishing a balanced age structure of civil servants – from data provided by the Government demonstrating that the age of the employees of the authorities of the state administration is increasing,<sup>8</sup> while the number of younger civil servants has decreased significantly (younger civil servants are predominantly employed on the basis of fixed-term contracts), and that a varied age structure contributes to the quality of the public service (Paragraphs 52 and 53). These statements should not be disputed as the issue of youth unemployment is a problematic one, not only in the public sector, but also in the private sector. The need for intergenerational cooperation in employment relations is equally not disputable in the provision of public services and in carrying out tasks in the other areas of the public sector, and in the private sector as well. Consequently, these aims may be defined as constitutionally admissible objectives for an interference with the human right to equality if they are objectively and reasonably justified. However, in the case at issue this does not apply.
- 13. I believe that maintaining the employment of those who are able to achieve their goals, who are successful, and who fulfil contractual and other obligations arising from their employment relationship regardless of their age and regardless of reasons of social security is an objective and sound reason. This is especially true with regard to employees in the public sector, where the principle of sound administration (economical, efficient, successful) is an important principle for the functioning of the state. Civil servants have to be successful, they have to attain the results set out in the employment contracts they concluded regardless of whether they are young or old. Is it better if lectures are given by a bad 35-year-old or a good 65-year-old professor? Providing access to employment for young persons or maintaining their employment only because they are young is discriminatory, as it places older, successful civil servants in a less favourable position without justification. If anywhere, then within the public sector the individual ability of each civil servant should be established, i.e. whether their work, their work results, justify their employment contract, in order to protect the public interest. The selection of civil servants belongs to the area of management, including actions in the field of human resources, and should not be addressed by the disputed provisions of the FBA that allow employers to terminate the employment contracts of civil servants simply on the basis of the establishment of the fulfilment of retirement conditions.

14. I also do not agree that the challenged regulation passes the strict proportionality test (necessity, appropriateness, and proportionality in the narrower sense). The Constitutional Court derives its appropriateness from three elements: firstly, the reduction of labour costs, whereby no assessment of the extent of the reduction of budgetary expenses is provided and thus the measure could not be reviewed; secondly, the establishment of a favourable age structure, whereby the Decision does not clarify when a favourable age structure can be deemed to exist; there is a lack of criteria for the definition of a favourable age structure with regard to current demographic trends; and, thirdly, that the measure was appropriate also due to the “prevention of potential disputes regarding the ability of a civil servant to perform his or her work after a certain age.” It is not disputable that an individual’s ability mainly depends on his or her personal characteristics, which differ from one individual to another. The Decision, however, is based on the presumption that, upon the attainment of the age condition for retirement, civil servants are no longer capable of working, and the further presumption that judicial disputes would arise if their employment were terminated for reasons of inability. With regard to such, I would like to recall Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-49/98, wherein the Court stated the following: “The fulfilment of the conditions for obtaining a full old age pension – indirectly also the attainment of a certain age – does not entail in itself that individuals are no longer capable of performing their work. It only means that they are guaranteed a certain level of social security stemming from the mandatory pension insurance system” (Paragraph 17). It must further be taken into account that in the Republic of Slovenia in 2013 the pensionable age for men was 58 years and four months (the fifth paragraph of Article 27 of the PDIA-2),<sup>9</sup> which as a rule does not correspond to

9 With regard to the pensionable age, a transitional period applies until 2019; until then, the age for men and women will be raised each year by four months and will be equalised in 2019, when persons of both sexes will acquire the right to old age retirement at the age of 60 years and 40 years of the pension qualifying period without purchased periods.

the old age retirement conditions in other EU Member States where the statutory regulation of pensions have raised this age to 65 or 67 years.<sup>10</sup>

15. I believe that the challenged regulation does not pass the test of necessity. Not only could the stated aims be achieved by means of a less invasive interference in accordance with the Constitution, the adoption of the measure, moreover, was not even necessary. The Constitutional Court established the necessity of the measure by means of general statements about the budgetary deficit and the public debt of the Republic of Slovenia (Paragraph 64). Ensuring a balanced personnel age structure allegedly also requires the necessity of retirement at a certain age. The Civil Servants Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 63/07, and 65/08 – hereinafter referred to as the CSA) defined a greater number of possible manners of terminating an employment contract than the Employment Relationships Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 21/13 – hereinafter referred to as the ERA-1), which applies to the private sector, as the CSA adopted all manners of terminating an employment contract in accordance with the ERA-1 and also added other manners of terminating such.<sup>11</sup> One of the manners of terminating an employment contract for business reasons is precisely the public-finance reason that the FBA determined as the objective of such retirement. It follows already from such that the disputed provision of the FBA was not even necessary because the termination of an employment contract for public-finance reasons is already possible in accordance with the CSA by means of dismissal for business reasons. In the public sector the personnel policy must be exercised consistently at all times. In accordance with the CSA, persons holding leading positions have at their disposal sufficient possibilities to dismiss underperforming civil servants. Therefore, I cannot agree with the statement in the Decision that “[the above mentioned possibilities of] terminating civil servants’ employment contracts that are based on the assessment of an individual worker would not guarantee such permanently and systematically and would not enable a lasting structural stabilisation of expenditures in the area of labour costs” (Paragraph 68 [sic, recte: Paragraph 66]). On the contrary, an appropriate organisation of work through appropriate measures in the field of personnel policy is a systematic and permanent process. Dismissals of workers are a part of regular personnel management in the private sector. However, in relation to such, the public sector, which is stronger than the private sector as regards the educational structure of the personnel, invokes complicated dismissal procedures that should not be acceptable.
16. In the Decision, the Constitutional Court itself lists other methods to achieve a reduction in the number of public sector employees; however, in the opinion of the Constitutional Court, these would not be effective due to the delay (mainly as a result of judicial proceedings) and the interference with the dignity of civil servants when establishing the reason for their dismissal due to inability, and since such methods

10 I believe that the Constitutional Court took the mentioned reason from a CJEU Judgment (in the joined cases Fuchs and Köhler, Para. 47). The relevant case concerned the German Land Hessen, where a retirement age of 65 years applied to civil servants. I believe that the implementation of CJEU standpoints in our circumstances is not a good idea, unless other elements of the relevant CJEU decision are also taken into account.

11 See Article 154 of the FBA.

would affect civil servants of all ages. I believe that the delay cannot be of such importance that it could not be outweighed by the greater level of legal certainty that is guaranteed to civil servants in the event of dismissal (in particular, the employer is required to substantiate the reason for the dismissal), as opposed to an arbitrary choice of the employer regarding which civil servants' employment contracts to terminate by a final decision in accordance with the FBA. I also believe that it is no less dignified if the civil servant has to wait for a decision of the employer that is not subject to any criteria that would have to be considered when choosing those civil servants whose employment contracts are to be terminated due to the fulfilment of retirement conditions than if an employer has to establish the inability of an incapable civil servant.

17. Furthermore, the measures under the FBA are not only unnecessary, but, in my assessment, also harmful as the employment contracts of scientists, researchers, teachers at institutions of higher education, and others who upon the attainment of the full pensionable age could have been at the peak of their creative abilities were (or will be) terminated. For every nation, knowledge is priceless and thus cannot be measured by public-finance scales. This is even truer in the functioning of a small state, such as the Republic of Slovenia, in times of crisis. The fact that the measure is not of a mandatory nature does not convince me that persons in leading positions will not apply the disputed measure in accordance with the FBA to terminate the employment contracts of civil servants in an arbitrary manner, since the measure does not prescribe any procedure therefor, but only requires establishing that a civil servant has fulfilled the retirement conditions. Such concerns the simplest manner and procedure for the termination of an employment contract. Instead of protecting the state governed by the rule of law and knowledge (i.e. successful civil servants), the legislature thus enabled the linear dismissal (without any criteria) of older civil servants simply because they have fulfilled the statutory conditions for old age retirement.
18. Moreover, I disagree with the conclusion that the challenged measure is not disproportionate. The loss of the status of civil servant is a measure that interferes, in a systemic manner, with the protection of income and employment (the right to work), i.e. with the most fundamental rights of a civil servant. Therefore, it entails severe consequences. It is true that the affected civil servants will receive pensions (although pensions are lower than wages), and it is also true that they are guaranteed the formal possibility of re-employment (their actual chances being small given the high supply of labour); however, the non-pecuniary aspect has to be considered as well, as such concerns an interference with a person's creative abilities, their essence, personality, and dignity. In my opinion, such interferences should not be admissible by means of provisional statutes with public-finance content that permanently change the positions of individuals under labour and social law.
19. I believe that in the case at issue there further occurred a violation of the autonomy of universities in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 58 of the Constitution. I agree with the applicant's statement that the personnel aspect is also part of the core of the autonomy of universities. Instead of supporting this statement by comparable regulations in other democratic states or references to monographs,

I simply refer to Decision No. U-I-22/94, dated 25 May 1995 (Official Gazette RS, No. 39/95, and OdlUS IV, 52), wherein the Constitutional Court held the following: “However, the regulation of the question of whether and in what instances teachers at institutions of higher education, research workers, and associates at institutions of higher education who have fulfilled the conditions for acquiring the right to a full old age pension may continue in their employment due to special reasons falls within the scope of the autonomy of universities and institutions of higher education” (the second subparagraph of Paragraph 14 of the Reasoning). I have not found a sound reason for a different conclusion.

20. I also believe that the disputed provisions of the FBA violated the principle of trust in the law (Article 2 of the Constitution), as the FBA did not determine a transitional period that would enable the affected persons to make appropriate preparations. The measure thus interfered with the expected rights of older civil servants who have fulfilled the conditions for old age retirement. The principle of foreseeability, however, is an important principle for the protection of the rule of law.
21. Due to the above-mentioned reasons, I believe that the challenged regulation is inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution, which prohibits discrimination on grounds of age. The employment of young persons is an important part of the social and employment policy of each democratic country that has to be implemented, however, not by following the path of discriminating against older persons. It is in the public interest that the state ensures employment possibilities and social security for everyone in a constitutionally admissible manner, particularly without thereby interfering with the human right to equality and trust in the law.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE DR DUNJA JADEK PENZA

1. I completely agree with the general premises presented in Paragraphs 27 through 35 of the reasoning of the majority Decision. The reasons regarding the effects of Article 3a of the Constitution that substantiate the relationship between the legal order of the European Union (hereinafter referred to as the EU) and the domestic legal order in the territory of the Republic of Slovenia as well as the importance of these effects for a constitutional review are essential in the case at issue. However, these premises have not been taken into account in what I consider to be an important part of the consideration on the merits. As I believe that this was not unimportant for the review, I could not agree with the reasoning of the Decision on the constitutional admissibility of the interference with the right to non-discriminatory treatment on grounds of age regarding dismissal (Point 5 of the operative provisions). The specific decisions in Points 3 and 4 of the operative provisions of the majority Decision are tied to this constitutional review. As I could not agree with their assessment of the fact that the interference with the right to non-discriminatory treatment on grounds of age is constitutionally admissible (these two points of the operative provisions namely presuppose such a review and refer to it), I also voted against these decisions. My vote against this part (i.e. Points 3 and 4) of the operative provisions is certainly not a negation of the right of female civil servants to non-discriminatory treatment on grounds of sex regarding dismissal, but, on the contrary, an affirmation of this right and thereby of the requirement that it be consistently observed in the domestic legal order.

2. It is namely my central belief that this right has already become effective within the domestic legal order since such is determined by EU law. The challenged statutory regulation could not have had an effect contradicting [this right] precisely due to the general premises of the majority Decision. In accordance with the principle of the primacy of EU law in this area, in the event of a collision between EU law and national law, EU law has to be applied. It further follows from the case law of the Court of Justice of the European Union (hereinafter referred to as the CJEU) that the prohibition of differentiation on grounds of sex regarding dismissal determined by the first paragraph of Article 14 of Directive 2006/54/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 5 July 2006 on the implementation of the principle of equal opportunities and equal treatment of men and women in matters of employment and occupation (OJ L 204, 26. 7. 2006) has direct effect within the national legal order.<sup>1</sup> Consequently, even if the Constitutional Court had not established its inconsistency with the Constitution, the challenged regulation should not be applied by the national courts and individual women can directly rely on [the Directive] against employers who are “public institutions” (in so-called vertical relationships; such is also the case at issue). Therefore, I was of the opinion that the Constitutional Court decision regarding the manner of implementation determined by Point 4 of the operative provisions was not even necessary for the implementation of the right to the equal treatment of female civil servants in (real) life. The same applies, mutatis mutandis, to the request that the Constitutional Court addressed to the legislature.<sup>2</sup> In an ideal normative world, the challenged regulation has had and from now on also will have no effect on the implementation of the human right to non-discriminatory treatment on grounds of sex regarding dismissal.
3. In accordance with the premises in Paragraphs 34, 35, and 43 of the reasoning, in the case at issue the Constitutional Court also considered that, in addition to being bound by the (1) Constitution, it was also bound by (2) Council Directive 2000/78/EC of 27 November 2000 establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation (OJ L 303, 2. 12. 2000 – hereinafter referred to as Directive 2000/78/EC) and (3) the case law that the CJEU has developed on its basis. Both the first paragraph of Article 6 of Directive 2000/78/EC, which defines a derogation from

1 Cf. the CJEU Judgment in the case M. H. Marshall v. Southampton and South-West Hampshire Area Health Authority (Teaching), 152/84, dated 26 February 1986, Paras. 47 et seq.

2 At this point, I would like to draw attention to the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Implementation of the Principle of Equal Treatment Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 50/04, and 61/07 – IPETA), which guarantees equal treatment inter alia with regard to sex and explicitly and specifically requires the National Assembly to create conditions for equal treatment also through measures of a normative nature.

the prohibition of the different treatment of individuals on grounds of age,<sup>3</sup> and the case law that the CJEU developed on its basis were important. In the terminology of constitutional law, the mentioned provision of Directive 2000/78/EC, together with the relevant CJEU case law, defines the test of (and thereby the “density” of) the assessment of the legitimacy and the proportionality of an interference with the right to non-discriminatory treatment on grounds of age in employment and occupation (in the case at issue, differentiation on grounds of age regarding dismissal is essential).

4. Even if we accept that, in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 6 of Directive 2000/78/EC, age is a specific personal characteristic and therefore different treatment on such grounds in employment and occupation is not inadmissible if, within the context of national law, it is objectively and reasonably justified by a legitimate aim; and even if, as the CJEU has consistently stated in preliminary ruling procedures in accordance with Article 267 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (consolidated version, OJ C 326, 26. 10. 2012 – hereinafter referred to as the TFEU), Member States enjoy a comprehensively wide margin of appreciation in identifying the objective needs in a Member State and choosing accordingly from among the competing interests of different policies in the fields of employment, the labour market, or vocational training,<sup>4</sup> age belongs to the suspicion-raising personal characteristics in this area of EU law. This entails that it belongs to the prohibited (personal) differentiation criteria,<sup>5</sup> and potentially admissible derogations from this prohibition must be considered exceptions that require narrow interpretation.<sup>6</sup> That such concerns an exception to the prohibition of different treatment on grounds of age is confirmed by the case law of the CJEU.<sup>7</sup>

- 3 The first phrase of this provision of the Directive reads as follows (NB: structural changes to the text by DJP): “Notwithstanding Article 2(2), Member States may provide (i) that differences of treatment on grounds of age shall not constitute discrimination, (ii) if, within the context of national law, they are (iii) objectively and reasonably justified by a legitimate aim, (iv) including legitimate employment policy, labour market and vocational training objectives, and (v) if the means of achieving that aim are (vi) appropriate and (vii) necessary.”
  - 4 “[...] Article 6(1) of Directive 2000/78 gives Member States the option to provide, within the context of national law, for certain kinds of differences in treatment on grounds of age if they are ‘objectively and reasonably’ justified by a legitimate aim, such as employment policy, or labour market or vocational training objectives, and if the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary. It imposes on Member States the burden of establishing to a high standard of proof the legitimacy of the aim relied on as a justification. No particular significance should be attached to the fact that the word ‘reasonably’ used in Article 6(1) of the directive does not appear in Article 2(2)(b) thereof.” See the CJEU Judgment in the case The Incorporated Trustees of the National Council for Ageing (Age Concern England) v. Secretary of State for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform, C-388/07, dated 5 March 2009, Para. 67.

5. In the context of the prohibition under consideration, the exception entails that only the conditions that define the exception on an abstract level (and that are defined by EU law) outline the scope of the requirement of the implementation of equal treatment. A broadening of the exception will inevitably lead to a narrowing of the scope of the right to non-discriminatory treatment in an individual case (and vice versa). The scope of the exception itself, however, is inversely proportional to the number of conditions that define the exception. Consequently, each of the conditions that define the scope of the exception is important for the content of the right to non-discriminatory treatment in an individual case. Therefore, I believe that the following applies: the broader the scope of the exception, the narrower the scope of the requirement of equal treatment and thus the scope of the right to non-discriminatory treatment (and vice versa).
6. In EU law, the path of the constitutional review of the admissibility of an exception to the fundamental prohibition of discrimination on grounds of age (inter alia) regarding dismissal is defined by (1) the conditions determined by Directive 2000/78/EC and (2) the case law of the CJEU (i) which interprets the open-textured legal terms that define these conditions, (ii) as well as the guidance that the CJEU provides to national courts in preliminary review proceedings on how to review the proportionality of concrete derogations from the prohibition of differentiation in individual cases, and, finally, (iii) by the factors that [national courts] have to take into account in doing so. In such cases, the CJEU does not provide a final judgment regarding the legitimacy and the proportionality of a concrete interference. This is left to the national court. In cases where the CJEU assesses an action of the European Commission against a Member State on the basis of Article 258 of the TFEU, the CJEU itself replies to the question of whether the measure at issue has a legitimate aim and whether the means of achieving it that are under review are proportionate. Such was the situation in the case Commission v. Hungary, C-286/12, dated 6 November 2012.<sup>8</sup> When deciding on the right of an individual to non-discriminatory treatment on grounds of age regarding dismissal, it appears clear to me that in order to ensure the full effectiveness of EU law a national court must, for the purpose of reviewing the legitimacy and proportionality of a concrete interference with this right, align the circumstances of the individual case with the open-textured legal terms that define the individual conditions for the exception, thereby taking into account the case law of the CJEU and the guidance and relevant factors expressed therein. And only following such may it pass judgment regarding the legitimacy and proportionality grounds of age, on account of the recognised specificity of age among the grounds of discrimination prohibited by the directive. Recital 25 in the preamble to that directive makes clear that it is 'essential to distinguish between differences in treatment which are justified, in particular by legitimate employment policy, labour market and vocational training objectives, and discrimination which must be prohibited.'" See the CJEU Judgment in the case The Incorporated Trustees of the National Council for Ageing (Age Concern England) v. Secretary of State for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform, Para. 60.

- 8 In that case the CJEU itself passed judgment regarding the appropriateness and necessity of the challenged lowering of the age limit for compulsory retirement of judges, prosecutors, and notaries.

of the interference and thus the potential admissibility of the interference with the right to non-discriminatory treatment on grounds of age. The case law of the CJEU determines on an abstract level which circumstances are relevant for this review.<sup>9</sup>

7. I therefore advocated that the Constitutional Court, in essentially the same manner as any other national court reviewing the right of an individual to non-discriminatory treatment in concrete judicial proceedings, in the framework of 'its' strict test on the basis of which it assesses the (in)admissibility of an interference with the constitutionally guaranteed human right determined by the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution, apply the interpretation of open-textured terms, guidelines, and factors from CJEU case law, or, simply put, the test that has developed in hitherto CJEU case law. As I understand it, already the principle of consistent interpretation requires it to do so. The strict test that the Constitutional Court applies is in any event "open" enough to enable the consideration of the case law of the CJEU in the substantive sense, whereby I am not only thinking of the interpretation of open-textured terms provided by CJEU judgments, but also further guidelines and factors, as all of these together define the conditions for a derogation from the requirement of equal treatment on grounds of age regarding dismissal (and thus the scope of the exception). In my opinion, all standpoints from CJEU judgments play the role of "criteria" for a review of the legitimacy of individual aims and the proportionality of the means of achieving a concrete legitimate aim in an individual case. In my understanding, such entails the only possible manner of ensuring that at the same time a review is carried out regarding whether the challenged regulation meets the minimum requirements of protection under EU law, below which protection in a Member State must not be lowered.<sup>10</sup> To sum up, firstly, each and every one of the conditions that define the scope of the exception to the prohibition of differentiation on such grounds, including CJEU case law in this field, is important for [determining] the scope of this exception, and, secondly, the scope of the exception is the factor that defines the substance of the right to non-discriminatory treatment on grounds of age regarding dismissal in an individual case. Finally, it is not unimportant that EU law directly protects the individual within the scope of Directive 2000/78/EC and

9 Cf. the analysis of the case law of the CJEU in this field in Elaine Dewhurst, Intergenerational Balance, Mandatory Retirement and Age Discrimination in Europe: How Can the ECJ Better Support National Courts in Finding a Balance between the Generations, Common Market Law Review, I. 50, No. [5] (2013), pp. 1334–1362. The author rightly draws attention to the difference in the amount of guidance that the CJEU provides in individual cases of differentiation on grounds of age, in particular with regard to the question of whether the differentiation concerns the general labour market or a specific organisation. She further rightly draws attention to the danger of different application of EU law in comparable cases in different Member States as well as within an individual Member State that arises from the CJEU's flexible approach (Ibidem, pp. 1345 et seq.).

10 Cf. recital 28 of the preamble to the Directive, from which it clearly follows that the Directive (only) lays down minimum requirements, and Article 8 of the Directive, that provides that Member States may introduce or maintain provisions which are more favourable for the protection of the principle of equal treatment than those laid down in this Directive.

8. With regard to the interpretation of the open-textured legal terms that define the conditions for an exception to the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of age as concerns (inter alia) dismissal, the case law that the CJEU has developed regarding the interpretation of the concepts of the appropriateness and necessity of the means that the national regulations prescribe for achieving legitimate aims is also important. These contents are important in EU law as they are applied to define (in constitutional law terminology) the path of the review of the proportionality of an interference with the right to non-discriminatory treatment (i.e. of the proportionality of the means for achieving a concrete legitimate aim that are under review). In other words, CJEU judgments identify all the viewpoints from which national courts must illuminate the interference under review in order to be able to assess its proportionality as objectively as possible. It thus follows from the case law of the CJEU that national legislation is appropriate for ensuring the attainment of the objective pursued only if it genuinely reflects a concern to attain it in a consistent and systematic manner.<sup>14</sup>
- <sup>15</sup> However, according to the case law of the CJEU, when reviewing the necessity of a measure from the viewpoint of the legitimate aim it pursues, it must also be clarified whether the exceptions to the age limit do not interfere with the consistency of the legislation in question by leading to a result that is contrary to that aim.<sup>16</sup> In addition, according to the case law of the CJEU, authorities have to find the right balance

Swedex GmbH & Co. KG*, C-555/07, dated 19 January 2010, Para. 54.

12 “In those circumstances it is the responsibility of the national court, hearing a dispute involving the principle of non-discrimination in respect of age, to provide, in a case within its jurisdiction, the legal protection which individuals derive from the rules of Community law and to ensure that those rules are fully effective, setting aside any provision of national law which may conflict with that law.” See the CJEU Judgment in the case *Werner Mangold v. between the different interests involved, while ensuring that they do not go beyond what is appropriate and necessary to achieve the legitimate aim pursued.<sup>17</sup>

9. The majority Decision, as I understand it, does not reply to the questions that are relevant for the assessment of the proportionality of the interference according to the case law of the CJEU, as it fails to take into account the test that developed therein. Thus, for example, the exception to the statutory obligation of dismissal with regard to age determined by the third paragraph of Article 188 of the Fiscal Balance Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 40/12, and 105/12 – hereinafter referred to as the FBA) was not included in the assessment. In the context of the strict limitation of recruitment determined by Article 183 of the FBA, I believe that the third paragraph of Article 188 of the FBA is of particular importance in relation to the pursued objective of ensuring a balanced age structure of civil servants. In accordance with the wording of the third paragraph of Article 188 of the FBA, dismissal is namely a matter of assessment by the head [of a state authority] regarding the need to ensure an uninterrupted work process. By the nature of the matter, this assessment falls within the ambit of the autonomous decision-making of such [head of a state authority]. Precisely due to such, I find it hard to deny the importance of the exception defined in the third paragraph of Article 188 of the FBA in the assessment of the (in)consistency and necessity of the challenged regulation for achieving the objectives of ensuring an altered (balanced) age structure, especially since this circumstance moreover undermines the possibility of employing (younger) civil servants, which Article 183 of the FBA makes conditional upon the urgency of the need to carry out the functions [of the state authority in question] (cf. the first indent of the second paragraph of Article 183 of the FBA). It appears clear to me that the existence of the urgent need for recruitment is also excluded if the post in question is occupied at the discretion of the head in order to ensure “an uninterrupted work process”. With regard to the second identified objective – the prevention of disputes on whether an employee is able to perform his or her work after a certain age, I doubt that this objective must necessarily be attained by means of dismissals of civil servants who have fulfilled the conditions for an old age pension, for example, already at the age of 58. The joined cases Gerhard Fuchs and Peter Köhler v. Land Hessen<sup>18</sup> concerned the question of the retirement of prosecutors at the age of 65 years with the possibility to continue working until 68 years (if such was in the employer’s interest). In my opinion, the challenged means of achieving the objective of preventing disputes originating from a civil servant’s inability to carry out his or her work is manifestly disproportionate as it goes beyond what may (perhaps) have been necessary to achieve this objective. My personal experience with persons from this age group namely reinforces my conviction that I cannot presume merely on grounds of their age that such persons are in general less capable of performing the work of a civil servant than persons who have not yet attained such age. Allow me to add that the objective of preventing disputes regarding the ability to perform work after a certain age derives from the supposition of the inability of older persons to work. However, this supposition is nothing but a prejudice related to age, and Directive 2000/78/EC is intended to protect individuals precisely from prejudice on grounds of their personal characteristics (inter alia, age).<sup>19,20</sup>

10. I would like to proceed to (and summarise) some of the dilemmas that I have faced with regard to the objectives of the challenged regulation. I fully agree with the standpoint from the majority Decision that ensuring sustainable public finances is the main objective of the challenged measure: in the field of employment it enables a reduction in the number of civil servants and in the public sector wage bill. That this objective was also in the foreground when the challenged regulation was adopted, as I understand it, is supported by its inclusion among provisional measures. Thereby the FBA once again<sup>21</sup> completely clearly stated that the measure is only important for the time of the economic crisis (regardless of its duration). In such a period, on the one hand, problems in ensuring resources for the wages of public sector employees naturally arise, while, on the other hand, ensuring them in the same amount may seriously threaten the financial balance (inter alia) of the social security system and thus the existence of the most vulnerable groups, which the state must not allow. However, it is precisely due to its inclusion among provisional measures, which entails that the enacted measure of dismissal is provisional, that the challenged measure deviates from the objective of pursuing intergenerational justice in the sense of the desire to attain a balanced distribution of employment posts between younger and older generations (by which differentiation on grounds of age is justified in the majority Decision). I namely see no purpose in pursuing intergenerational justice that is only provisional. However, I agree with the majority Decision that the objective of ensuring the sustainability of public finances was objectively justified. We are namely facing a situation in which due to harsh conditions the need to prevent serious threats to the financial balance is being emphasised in the state, while the threat of insufficient coverage of social and other benefits in such circumstances inevitably requires that a (new) balance between the competing interests of social, economic, and fiscal policies be struck. For me, it was in particular the necessity of finding a new

19 “As regards the second objective, the Commission points out that the argument concerning the replacement of older judges by younger judges and the improvement of the efficiency of the public justice service assumed to result therefrom is not only a ‘pure and simple generalisation’, rejected by the Court in Fuchs and Köhler, but also a form of prejudice based on age. Directive 2000/78, however, precisely seeks to protect individuals against such prejudices.” See the Judgment in the case Commission v. Hungary, Para. 30.

20 Therefore, it is rightly emphasised that the concern regarding an employee’s ability to perform certain types of work could be better dealt with under the first paragraph of Article 4 of the Directive. Cf. the Supreme Court of the United Kingdom, the Judgment in the case Seldon v. Clarkson, Wright & Jakes, [2012] UKSC 16, dated 25 April 2012 (per Lady Hale), Para. 57.

balance between the competing interests (inter alia) with regard to social policy in the Republic of Slovenia that illuminated the importance of achieving the objective of sustainable public finances from a special viewpoint. As I understand it, the factual context in which the challenged measure was adopted is hence different from the one in the joined cases Gerhard Fuchs and Peter Köhler v. Land Hessen, from which follows the standpoint of the CJEU that while budgetary considerations can underpin the chosen social policy of a Member State, they cannot in themselves constitute a legitimate aim that could justify different treatment on grounds of age within the meaning of the first paragraph of Article 6 of Directive 2000/78/EC.<sup>22</sup> On the basis of these premises and taking into account that the sustainability of public finances is the main objective of the challenged regulation, due to the specific circumstances of the case at issue, it became clear that the Constitutional Court should have solicited the position of the CJEU regarding this issue that is difficult for society and individuals alike, before reaching a decision in the case at issue. Such namely concerns the scope of Directive 2000/78/EC, which, as can be inferred from the arguments at the beginning [of the reasoning of the majority Decision], is binding upon the Constitutional Court. In my opinion, therefore, a preliminary question should have been submitted to the CJEU in accordance with Article 267 TFEU regarding the interpretation of the concept of a legitimate aim in circumstances where reducing the public sector wage bill is not only one of the (possible) policies, but an expression of the urgent response to the need to ensure the financial balance of public finances in order (inter alia) to prevent threats to the coverage of social security benefits.<sup>23</sup>

<sup>23</sup> It follows from the case law of the CJEU that the legitimate aims stated in the first paragraph of Article 6 of the Directive are listed as examples. Cf. the CJEU Judgments in the case Commission v. Hungary, Para. 40, and the CJEU Judgments cited therein.

DECISION

At a session held on 3 July 2014, in proceedings to review constitutionality initiated upon the request of the Information Commissioner, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. Articles 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, and 169 of the Electronic Communications Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 109/12 and 110/13) are abrogated.
2. Following the publication of this Decision in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia, the service providers referred to in the first paragraph of Article 163 of the Electronic Communications Act must immediately destroy all data that they are retaining on the basis of the challenged provisions.

*ReasoningA

1. On the basis of the sixth indent of Article 23a of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 64/07 – official consolidated text and 109/12 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), the Information Commissioner submitted a request for the review of the constitutionality of Articles 162 through 169 of the Electronic Communications Act (hereinafter referred to as the ECA-1), which entered into force on 15 January 2013. By the challenged provisions, the Republic of Slovenia transposed into its legal order Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC (OJ L 105, 13 April 2006 – hereinafter referred to as the Data Retention Directive).<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Such follows from the content of the statutory provisions and especially from the second paragraph of Article 2 of the ECA-1 and the purpose of the legislature expressed in the draft act (Gazette of the National Assembly, dated 1 October 2012, EPA 667-VI).

2. The applicant is the supervisory authority for supervision of the implementation of the provisions on the obligatory retention of data in conformity with the provisions of Section XIII of the ECA-1 (Article 169 of the ECA-1). It claims that it is conducting an inspection procedure with regard to the conduct of one of the Slovene mobile phone service providers, in conformity with the provisions of the ECA-1. Since in this procedure it doubted the constitutionality of the provisions on the basis of which the service provider had been retaining the traffic, location, and other therewith related data (hereinafter referred to as traffic data) of its users on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 163 of the ECA-1, the applicant submitted the request for the review of the constitutionality of the challenged provisions.
3. The fundamental allegation contained in the request for the review of the constitutionality of the challenged provisions is that, on the basis of the Data Retention Directive, the Republic of Slovenia imposed on service providers the obligation to retain as a precautionary measure data on all users, i.e. regardless of whether the users themselves gave rise to reasons for such an interference with their rights. Such retention of data allegedly entails an inadmissible interference with the right to the protection of personal data (Article 38 of the Constitution), communication privacy (Article 37 of the Constitution), and consequently also with the right to freedom of movement (Article 32 of the Constitution), the right to freedom of expression (Article 39 of the Constitution), and with the principle of the presumption of innocence (Article 27 of the Constitution). The applicant is of the opinion that, in conformity with the established constitutional case law, these measures do not pass the test of proportionality. It stresses that traffic data enjoy the same protection as the content of communications and that they are protected by Article 37 of the Constitution. It is also of the opinion that the interferences with [the mentioned human] rights are not proportionate because empirical data do not prove that the purpose of such retention of data could be achieved by such interference with the mentioned rights. Only a significantly higher percentage of serious criminal offences being investigated can allegedly justify the primacy of the public interest over the interests of every single individual with regard to enjoying privacy, moving and communicating freely (without being monitored), expressing his or her opinions, etc. The applicant is of the opinion that the measure is not even appropriate, because there exists a series of technical circumventions that prevent the retention of data. In the opinion of the applicant, the awareness of users that their communications are being monitored also has an influence on the exercise of other rights (especially the freedom of expression). Due to self-censorship, an individual who knows that he is being monitored will act differently than he or she would otherwise. The applicant is of the opinion that due to the retention of location data, the regulation is additionally invasive, because it interferes with the freedom of movement. It also alleges a violation of Article 3a of the Constitution, which in its view lies in the fact that the Data Retention Directive has allegedly been incorrectly transposed into the Slovene legal order, because it also allows the retention of traffic data for the prevention, investigation, detection, and prosecution of criminal offences that cannot be qualified as serious criminal offences, and because it allows data to be used for the purpose of providing for the needs of the intelligence service and defence forces.

4. In its reply to the request [for the review of constitutionality], the National Assembly in fact concurs that the retention of data determined by Article 164 of the ECA-1 significantly interferes with the privacy of individuals; however, it does not concur with the standpoint of the applicant that the state does not need such data. It draws attention to the fact that the retention of data is an important tool for the detection and investigation of criminal offences, the defence of the state, national security, and constitutional regulation, and that such data must most often be obtained for a past period of time, which is precisely what the obligatory precautionary retention of data enables. The National Assembly draws attention to the provisions of the challenged regulation that reduce the possibility of abuses, namely: ten-year retention of data regarding any accessing of traffic data; service providers must retain data and protect them as confidential in conformity with the law regulating confidential data; sanctions are determined for any violation of security rules; and access to data is only possible on the basis of a court order.
5. In its opinion, the Government draws attention to the fact that the applicant, although it explicitly challenges the provisions of a national regulation, substantively alleges that the Data Retention Directive is inconsistent with the mentioned human rights. The Government does not concur with the standpoint that the retention itself of traffic data is not an important tool for the prosecution of criminal offences. It refers to the Evaluation Report on the Data Retention Directive, dated 18 April 2011,<sup>2</sup> from which it allegedly follows that retained traffic data such as envisaged by the Data Retention Directive have an important role in the investigation of criminal offences. An equal conclusion allegedly also follows from the analysis with regard to the use of electronic communications traffic data for the period 2010–2012 that was prepared by the Police. From that analysis it allegedly follows that traffic data have an important role in the collection of evidence in the framework of the investigation of criminal offences, because they indicate individual facts, circumstances, relations, dynamics, and patterns that significantly contribute to the collection of fundamental evidence for directly proving the suspicion that a [concrete] criminal offence has been committed (uncovering the planning of criminal offences, the identification of persons and connections in a criminal association, etc.). The Government warns that the detection of certain criminal offences would not even be possible without the analysis of data retained beforehand (e.g. sexual abuses of children committed over the Internet). It also stresses that access to traffic data is an important tool for combating terrorism and international organised crime, as well as for the functioning of the [Slovene] Intelligence and Security Agency with the purpose of safeguarding the security of the state and its constitutional regulation. The Government explains that service providers retain traffic data in two separate databases: in the so-called “commercial” database and the “retentional” database. The latter is smaller in scope, because from the “commercial” database only those data that are exhaustively determined by Article 164 of the ECA-1 are transferred thereto. Allegedly, the only consequence of the challenged regulation is a longer period of the retention of data. The Government is of the opinion that the challenged regulation does not interfere with the right to the freedom to act and the freedom of movement, and with the freedom of expression, as determined by Articles 32 and 39 of the Constitution. On the contrary, the regulation allegedly does interfere with the right to communication and information privacy determined by Articles 37 and 38 of the Constitution, as well as with the general right to privacy determined by Article 35 of the Constitution; however, these interferences are allegedly proportionate. The same allegedly applies to the alleged violation of the presumption of innocence.

6. In its reply, the applicant underlines that the allegations of the Government regarding the alleged benefits of the obligatory retention of data are generalised. It alleges that the Government does not explain what is essential: whether due to the entry into force of the obligatory retention of traffic data there was a significant change in the detection of criminal offences in comparison with the period when the regulation had not yet been in force. It is of the opinion that the analysis submitted by the Government is methodologically inappropriate and that it pursues wrong aims. It refers to the study of the Max Planck Institute for Foreign and International Criminal Law from 2011, from which the conclusion allegedly follows that the retention of traffic data does not contribute to a higher number of criminal offences being investigated. It also draws attention to statistical data submitted by the Government, from which it follows that only a small share of the data needed by the Police are older than 6 months. It also underlines that the perpetrators of the most serious (especially organised) criminal offences have the knowledge and means to efficiently conceal [their] electronic traces. One consequence of that is the fact that the immensely vast database containing data on the entire population will only serve to aid in the search for a handful of the most ignorant and careless perpetrators of criminal offences; for such reason, the [disputed] interferences entail a manifestly disproportionate measure.

B – I

7. The challenged provisions are contained in Section XIII of the ECA-1, entitled “Retention of data”. The legislature envisaged such regulation as determined by this Section only in order to transpose into the national legal order the requirements of the Data Retention Directive.<sup>3</sup> In fact, the Slovene legislature first transposed the obliga-

3 See the explanation of Section XIII of the ECA-1 (Retention of data) in the draft act (Gazette of the National Assembly, dated 1 October 2012): “[...] From the viewpoint of the clarity of the regulation, because what is at issue is the implementation of two different directives (the Directive on Privacy and Electronic Communications and the Data Retention Directive), a new Section is introduced in the ECA-1 that only refers to the implementation of the Data Retention Directive, as was in fact already ensured by Section X of the existing ECA (i.e. ‘The protection of the privacy, confidentiality, and safety of electronic communications and the retention of data regarding electronic communications traffic’). [...]” tions stemming from the Data Retention Directive already by the adoption of the Act Amending the Electronic Communications Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 129/06 – hereinafter referred to as the ECA-A),<sup>4</sup> which entered into force on 27 December 2006. The regulation of the obligatory retention of data, as a consequence of the implementation of the Data Retention Directive (except for the time limit for the retention of data being shortened from two years to the now applicable 14 or 8 months),<sup>5</sup> has already been in force in a virtually unchanged form for more than 7 years.

8. The challenged provisions impose on service providers the obligation to retain data related to the use of certain telecommunication services (telephone services in fixed and mobile networks, Internet and e-mail access, as well as Internet phone service access). On the basis of the data that are being retained, it is possible to determine who communicated with whom, when, for how long, where, and how (Article 164 of the ECA-1 and Article 5 of the Data Retention Directive). The obligation to retain data also includes unsuccessful phone calls. The content of communications is not being retained (the third paragraph of Article 163 of the ECA-1 and the first paragraph of Article 3 of the Data Retention Directive). Data related to publicly accessible phone services are being retained for 14 months following the day of a particular communication, whereas other data are being retained for 8 months. In exception, a longer period of retention can be determined (the fifth and sixth paragraphs of Article 163 of the ECA-1 and Articles 6 and 12 of the Data Retention Directive). At the end of the retention period, service providers must destroy the data, except those data regarding which an order for accessing the data has been issued and that have been transmitted to the competent authority (the seventh paragraph of Article 163 of the ECA-1 and Article 7 of the Data Retention Directive). What is determined (in general) is the level of protection of the retention of data and the related measures that service providers must adopt themselves or in cooperation with others. The role of the Information Commissioner is also determined; the Information Commissioner can submit preliminary opinions with regard to the general act that determines in detail the manner of the protection of the retention of data (Article 165 of the ECA-1) and supervises, with certain limitations, the implementation of the provisions of Section XIII of the ECA-1 (Article 169 of the ECA-1). Service providers must retain data (if they create or process such when providing public communications services related thereto) for the purposes of obtaining data in a public communications network determined by the law that regulates criminal procedure, for the purposes of ensuring national security and the constitutional system, and the security, political, and economic interests of the state as determined by the law that regulates the Slovene Intelligence and Security Agency, as well as the defence of the state as determined by the law that regulates the defence of the state (the first paragraph of Article 163 of the ECA-1 and in a certain part also Article 1 of the Data Retention Directive). A record of any access to data and transmission of data must be ensured for ten years (the fifth paragraph of Article 166 of the ECA-1). Service providers must not disclose to the affected persons (or third persons) the fact that any data will be or has been accessed or transmitted, nor may they disclose the court order itself (the fourth paragraph of Article 166 of the ECA-1). This Section also includes special provisions with regard to the definition of the terms that are used in this Section (Article 162 of the ECA-1), the costs of the retention of data (Article 167 of the ECA-1), and data referring to the orders for accessing and transmitting data (Article 168 of the ECA-1).

4 See Article 92 of the ECA-A, which introduced the new Articles 107a through 107e.

5 The fifth paragraph of Article 163 of the ECA-1.

9. In fact, the applicant explicitly challenges all the provisions of Section XIII of the ECA-1, however, as is evident from the third paragraph of this reasoning, it substantively challenges only those provisions that impose on service providers the obligation to retain certain data in public communications networks (also) for the purposes and in the scope envisaged by the Data Retention Directive. [Therefore], the Constitutional Court also carried out a review [of constitutionality] in such scope.
10. Substantively, the applicant in fact alleged that the Data Retention Directive is inconsistent with human rights. The Constitutional Court was not able to decide on the constitutionality of the challenged regulation until the Court of Justice of the European Union, which has exclusive competence to assess the validity of the mentioned Directive, decided on its validity. Therefore, by Order No. U-I-65/13, dated 26 September 2013, the Constitutional Court stayed the proceedings to review the constitutionality of the challenged provisions of the ECA-1 until the Court of Justice of the European Union adopted a decision in the joined cases Nos. C-293/12 and C-594/12, which when the Constitutional Court decided to stay the proceedings were already in the final phase of decision-making.
11. By its Judgment in the joined cases Digital Rights Ireland Ltd v. Minister for Communications, Marine and Natural Resources and others and Kärntner Landesregierung and others, C-293/12 and C-594/12, dated 8 April 2014 (hereinafter referred to as the Judgment in the joined cases C-293/12 and C-594/12), the Court of Justice of the European Union declared the Data Retention Directive invalid. It established that by its adoption, the legislature of the European Union exceeded the limits imposed by compliance with the principle of proportionality in the light of Articles 7 and 8, as well as the first paragraph of Article 52 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union (OJ C 326, 26 October 2012, p. 391 – hereinafter referred to as the Charter).

B – II

12. By declaring the Data Retention Directive invalid, the obligation of Member States to transpose the requirements from this Directive into the national legal order ceased. Nonetheless, the protection of traffic data still remains a subject of regulation under European Union law. Articles 5 and 6 of Directive 2002/58/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 12 July 2002 concerning the processing of personal data and the protection of privacy in the electronic communications sector (Directive on Privacy and Electronic Communications) (OJ L 201, 31 July 2002) impose on Member States the obligation to ensure the confidentiality of communications and related traffic data, if they are not necessary for achieving the purpose of the transfer of communications or if an individual did not give his or her consent for such processing of the mentioned data. Article 15 of this Directive enables that “Member States may adopt legislative measures to restrict the scope of the rights and obligations provided for in Article 5, Article 6, [...] of this Directive when such restriction constitutes a necessary, appropriate and proportionate measure within a democratic society to safeguard national security (i.e. State security), defence, public security, and the prevention, investigation, detection and prosecution of criminal offences or of unauthorised use of the electronic communication system, as referred to in Article 13(1) of Directive 95/46/EC. To this end, Member States may, inter alia, adopt legislative measures providing for the retention of data for a limited period justified on the grounds laid down in this paragraph. All the measures referred to in this paragraph shall be in accordance with the general principles of Community law, including those referred to in Article 6(1) and (2) of the Treaty on European Union.”

13. Therefore, European Union law does not prohibit the retention of traffic data for purposes such as are determined by the first paragraph of Article 163 of the ECA-1. Consequently, a Member State may decide to adopt such a measure. If it does, however, it must respect the requirement of the proportionality of the measure, in conformity with the limitations referred to in the mentioned provision of the Directive. From such a perspective, the Slovene legislature is entitled to determine the obligatory retention of traffic data also for the purposes of safeguarding national security, defence, and public safety, as well as [for the purposes of] preventing, investigating, detecting, and prosecuting criminal offences. In conformity with the mentioned provision of the Directive, such interference with fundamental rights must entail a necessary, appropriate, and proportionate measure within a democratic society. Also in conformity with the established constitutional case law, there has to exist a constitutionally admissible aim in order for an interference with any human right – and thus also with the right to information privacy determined by the first paragraph of Article 38 of the Constitution – to be admissible, and in addition, such interference must also be in conformity with the principles of a state governed by the rule of law, namely with that of these principles that prohibits excessive interferences by the state (the general principle of proportionality – Article 2 of the Constitution).<sup>6</sup> The admissibility of the limitation of the right to the protection of personal data is thus also, in conformity with the Constitution, substantively regulated in the same manner as follows from Article 15 of the mentioned Directive.

B – III

14. On the basis of the challenged regulation, as a precautionary measure service providers non-selectively retain, for a determined period of time, exhaustively determined traffic data on all communications related to fixed network phone service, mobile phone service, Internet access, Internet e-mail service, and Internet phone service. The Government alleges that these data indicate individual facts, circumstances, dynamics, and patterns of individuals' lives. With regard to the definition [of personal data] in point 1 of Article 6 of the Personal Data Protection Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 94/07 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the PDPA-1), which determines the system of protection of personal data, personal data is any data relating to an individual, irrespective of the form in which it is expressed. An individual is an identified or identifiable natural person to whom personal data relates; an identifiable natural person is one who can be identified, directly or indirectly, in particular by reference to an identification number or to one or more factors specific to his physical, physiological, mental, economic, cultural or social identity, where the method of identification does not incur large costs or disproportionate effort or require a large amount of time (point 2 of Article 6 of the PDPA-1). Therefore, on the basis of the challenged regulation, service providers are retaining data that include, from the viewpoint of privacy, information regarding identifiable individuals, who must thus enjoy the protection of personal data as guaranteed by Article 38 of the Constitution. The Constitutional Court does not deal with the question of whether absolutely all traffic data that are determined by the challenged regulation are in any event personal data in the sense of the definition mentioned above.<sup>7</sup> What is key is that from these data (combined) it is possible to draw details from individuals' lives, and they must thus enjoy protection from the viewpoint of the right to privacy. Or, as stated by the Court of Justice of the European Union in the Judgment in the joined cases C-293/12 and C-594/12 (paragraph 27): "Those data, taken as a whole, may allow very precise conclusions to be drawn concerning the private lives of the persons whose data has been retained, such as the habits of everyday life, permanent or temporary places of residence, daily or other movements, the activities carried out, the social relationships of those persons and the social environments frequented by them."

15. The retention of such data (also for the purposes envisaged by the challenged regulation) entails, with regard to the established constitutional case law and also the case law of the Court of Justice of the European Union,<sup>8</sup> an interference with the right to the protection of personal data guaranteed by Article 38 of the Constitution, Article 8 of the Charter,<sup>9</sup> and also Article 8 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR).<sup>10</sup>
16. From the established constitutional case law it follows that the first paragraph of Article 38 of the Constitution guarantees the protection of personal data as a special aspect of privacy. The purpose of the protection of personal data is to ensure respect for a special aspect of human privacy – so-called information privacy. As the Constitution regulates this right specifically, it has a special place and importance in the general protection of the privacy of an individual. It also has an important place on the level of the European Union. Article 8 of the Charter also in a declaratory manner elevated the right to the protection of personal data to the level of a fundamental human right. In conformity with the established constitutional case law, any collecting and processing of personal data entails an interference with the right to the protection of privacy, i.e. with the right of individuals to keep information regarding themselves [private], because they do not want others to be acquainted therewith. The fundamental value foundation of this right is the realisation that individuals have the right to retain information regarding themselves to themselves and that as a starting point it is they who can decide how much information concerning themselves they will reveal and to whom.<sup>11</sup> However, the right to information privacy is not unlimited and absolute. Therefore, individuals must accept the limitations of information privacy, i.e. allow interferences therewith that are in the prevailing public interest and if the constitutionally determined conditions are fulfilled. [Such] an interference is admissible under the conditions determined by the third paragraph of Article 15 and Article 2 of the Constitution. In such context, the Constitutional Court must assess whether the legislature followed a constitutionally admissible aim, and if it did, also whether the limitation is in conformity with the principles of a state governed by the rule of law, namely with that principle that prohibits excessive interferences by the state (the general principle of proportionality).<sup>12</sup> In the law it must be precisely determined which data may be collected and processed, and for what purpose they may be used; supervision over the collection, processing, and use of personal data must be envisaged, as well as protection of the confidentiality of the collected personal data. The purpose of the collecting of personal data must be constitutionally admissible. Only data appropriate and urgently necessary for the implementation of the statutorily defined purpose may be collected.<sup>13</sup> When what is at issue is the processing of personal data for the purposes of police work, the legislature must weigh the measure by which it interferes with a sensitive area of the privacy of an individual without his or her consent in an especially meticulous manner.<sup>14</sup> The same also applies to the processing of personal data by other authorities of the state for the purposes of the defence of the state, national security, and the constitutional system.

17. The Constitutional Court has already explained numerous times that substantively similar requirements to those included in Article 38 of the Constitution are also included in the Convention for the Protection of Individuals with regard to the Automatic Processing of Personal Data (Official Gazette RS, No. 11/94, MP, No. 3/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CPI). In addition to the fact that personal data must be obtained and processed fairly and lawfully, the CPI requires that measures be taken that will ensure that personal data will be retained for specified and legitimate purposes and that they will not be used in a way incompatible with those purposes, as well as that only data that are adequate, relevant, and not excessive in relation to the purposes for which they are retained will be processed (Article 5 in relation to Article 4 of the CPI).<sup>15</sup>

18. The first condition for the admissibility of an interference with the right determined by the first paragraph of Article 38 of the Constitution is thus the existence of a constitutionally admissible objective. The fundamental purpose of the Data Retention Directive, due to which the legislature instituted the challenged regulation, was determined by the first paragraph of Article 1 [of the Directive],<sup>16</sup> namely “[...] to ensure that the data are available for the purpose of the investigation, detection and prosecution of serious crime, as defined by each Member State in its national law.” Similarly, also the first paragraph of Article 163 of the ECA-1 determines that “[service providers] must retain, for the purposes of obtaining data in a public communications network determined by the law that regulates criminal procedure, for the purposes of ensuring the national security and the constitutional system, and the security, political, and economic interests of the state, as determined by the law that regulates the Slovene Intelligence and Security Agency, as well as the defence of the state, as determined by the law that regulates the defence of the state, the data determined by Article 164 of this Act, if they create or process it when providing public communications services related thereto.” The prosecution of serious forms of criminal offences, the defence of the state, and the safeguarding of the security of the state with the purpose of ensuring the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms, as well as other fundamental legal values from illegal attacks against them are constitutionally admissible aims. In order for the state to be able to protect human rights and fundamental freedoms on its territory (Article 5 of the Constitution), it must primarily foster the existence and efficient functioning of the institutions of a state governed by the rule of law also in such a manner that it combats the most serious forms of criminal offences, ensures the defence of the state, the national security, and the constitutional system.
19. Therefore, the legislature did have constitutionally admissible aims for interfering with the constitutionally protected right to information privacy determined by the first paragraph of Article 38 of the Constitution. From this point of view, the interference is not inadmissible.
20. The challenged measure is also appropriate for achieving the mentioned aims, because they can in fact be achieved by the measure. Undoubtedly, in certain situations the retention and subsequent use of traffic data can entail an appropriate means for the investigation, detection, and prosecution of serious criminal offences. The same applies to the purposes of the defence of the state and the safeguarding of the security of the state. Such proceeds from the statements of Member States, as follows from the Evaluation Report of the European Commission<sup>17</sup> and other documents published on its website,<sup>18</sup> as well as from the analysis that was submitted by the Government in the proceedings at issue. The Government alleges that these data play an important supporting role in the collection of evidence in the framework of the investigation of criminal offences, because they indicate individual facts, circumstances, relations, dynamics, and patterns that significantly contribute to the collection of fundamental evidence directly proving the suspicion that a [concrete] criminal offence has been committed. Also the Court of Justice of the European Union assessed that with regard to the increasing importance of electronic communications, the data that had to be retained on the basis of the now invalid Directive provided national authorities competent for criminal prosecution additional possibilities with regard to detecting serious criminal offences and that in this regard they are a valuable means for [conducting] criminal investigations.<sup>19</sup> Although from the materials submitted by the Government and the documents of the Commission it is not clearly evident whether what is at issue is the use of data that otherwise in the absence of obligatory retention as envisaged by the Data Retention Directive and the now challenged regulation would not be accessible to prosecuting authorities and other competent authorities of the state, it is at the same time also not possible to conclude that these data are manifestly inappropriate for achieving the stated aim. Likewise, it is not evident that the measure is inappropriate even if in certain instances due to technical circumvention or specific types of use of these communications services (e.g. falsifying the number calling, the use of unregistered prepaid mobile services, the use of a service for the anonymisation of traffic over the Internet, etc.) it is possible to cover the digital traces behind the real user or achieve anonymous use of a mobile and fixed network phone service, as well as of Internet access, which is what the applicant otherwise draws attention to. A measure is inappropriate only when the means for achieving the aim does not have a sensible connection with that aim and when the stated aim cannot be achieved in any event by the chosen measure, not only that it cannot be achieved only to a certain degree.<sup>20</sup> However, the fact that the constitutionally admissible aim can only be achieved to a certain degree by the chosen measure can significantly influence the assessment of the proportionality of such measure.

20 See Decision No. U-I-201/93, dated 7 March 1996 (Official Gazette RS, No. 24/96, and OdlUS V, 27). Cf. also with paragraph 207 of the reasoning of the Judgment of the Federal Constitutional Court of the Federal Republic of Germany No. 1 BvR 2156/08, 1 BvR 263/08, 1 BvR 586/08, dated 2 March 2010.

21. Even if a measure is both appropriate and useful, such does not mean at the same time that it is necessary, i.e. that in order to achieve the pursued aim no other less invasive measures that would interfere less with the human rights of individuals are available.<sup>21</sup> In the framework of the test of the necessity of a measure, the Constitutional Court assesses whether an interference is at all necessary in the sense that the aim cannot be achieved without (any) interference at all or whether the aim can be achieved without the (concrete) interference that is being assessed by means of some other interference that would be milder in nature.<sup>22</sup>
22. For such reason, it is necessary to assess whether the legislature could also achieve the purpose for which such personal data was retained also in a manner that would interfere less invasively with the right determined by the first paragraph of Article 38 of the Constitution. Due to the fact that with regard to the manner and scope of the retention of data the challenged regulation is actually a transposition of the requirements from the Data Retention Directive and was thus determined in a manner such as was determined by the now no longer valid Data Retention Directive, the underlying reasons that guided the Court of Justice of the European Union in its invalidation are key also to the assessment of the challenged Act.
23. First of all, it has to be underlined that combating serious criminal offences, especially organised crime and terrorism, the defence of the state, and ensuring national security and the constitutional system, are of fundamental importance for the functioning of a state governed by the rule of law. However, such an aim, although of fundamental importance, cannot in itself justify an unlimited interference with human rights.
24. The challenged regulation provides for the precautionary (in advance) and indiscriminate retention of traffic data [generated by] certain electronic communications. A consequence of such regulation is that service providers retain, for a determined period, the traffic data of all users of phone services in fixed and mobile networks, data on accessing the Internet and e-mail, and data on the use of phone service over an Internet protocol, such as determined by Article 164 of the ECA-1. By the precautionary and indiscriminate retention of data created daily, service providers are creating vast databases that are being retained for 14 or 8 months and from which, at any moment, very detailed conclusions can be drawn concerning facts regarding the private life of every single individual that uses these services.<sup>23</sup> With regard to the fact that the modern manner of communicating predominantly entails the use of the mentioned electronic communications services,<sup>24</sup> such a measure in fact entails a very invasive interference with the (information) privacy of the entire population, both with regard to the scope of the persons affected by the 21 In the framework of the assessment of the proportionality of a measure (or the necessity of a measure in a democratic society), the ECtHR underlines that the adjective “necessary” is not synonymous with “indispensable” and at the same time it also cannot be interpreted as flexibly as, for instance, the expressions “admissible”, “ordinary”, “useful”, “reasonable”, or “desirable” (the Judgment in Handyside v. United Kingdom, dated 7 December 1976).

22 As stated, e.g., in Decision No. U-I-77/08, dated 8 July 2010 (Official Gazette RS, No. 61/10).

23 See Paragraph 14 of the reasoning.

24 See paragraphs 72 and 73 of the opinion of Advocate General Pedro Cruz Villalón in the joined cases C-293/12 and C-594/12, dated 12 December 2012, and the Judgments of the ECtHR to which he refers.

measure and with regard to the data that are being retained. The interference with the [mentioned] right is also exacerbated by the fact that by the creation of such an extensive database of personal data on the entire population, the risk that unauthorised persons will access the retained data or that the data will be used for unlawful purposes, despite the obligations imposed on service providers by, inter alia, Article 165 of the ECA-1, increases substantially.<sup>25</sup> Such a regulation substantially interferes with the human rights and fundamental freedoms of individuals also due to the fact that the affected persons are not informed of the retention and the potential subsequent use of their data, which can in the minds of these persons generate a feeling of constant surveillance.<sup>26</sup> Such an intangible feeling of constant surveillance can also influence the exercise of other rights, above all the right to free expression and public communication, as guaranteed by Article 39 of the Constitution and Article 11 of the Charter.<sup>27</sup>

25. By the nature of the matter, the precautionary and non-selective retention of data necessarily entails that it predominantly interferes with the rights of those persons who are not and will not be even indirectly connected with the purposes for which these data were primarily collected. Both the Data Retention Directive and the Slovene legislature did not limit the retention to those data that have some reasonable and objectively verifiable connection with purpose that [the legislature] intends the measure to achieve. The non-selective and precautionary retention of traffic data necessarily entails that it will interfere predominantly with the rights of that part of the population that did not give rise to any reasons for such an interference. As also the Court of Justice of the European Union stressed,<sup>28</sup> by the unlimited measure also data regarding communications that would otherwise have to enjoy special protection are retained. Namely, the regulation does not allow for anonymous use of means of communication in all those instances when confidential and untraceable use of the means of communication is necessary to achieve its purpose (e.g. phone services for assistance in emotional distress). Similarly, the challenged regulation, as well as the Data Retention Directive, did not limit the retention of data to a certain period of time, geographical area, or circle of persons who might have a certain connection with the purpose pursued by the measure.<sup>29</sup>
26. The question regarding the length of time personal data is retained is also important for the assessment of whether the interference at issue is necessary to achieve a constitutionally admissible aim. The retention and processing of personal data for a longer period of time than is necessary in order to achieve the purpose does not fulfil the criterion of pro-

26 Namely, service providers must not reveal to the persons to whom [the relevant] data refer that they were transmitted (the fourth paragraph of Article 166 of the ECA-1).

27 As stated already in the Judgment of the Federal Constitutional Court of the Federal Republic of Germany No. 1 BvR 2156/08, 1 BvR 263/08, 1 BvR 586/08 and paragraph 37 of the reasoning of the Judgment in the joined cases C-293/12 and C-594/12.

portionality.<sup>30</sup> In fact, in the fifth paragraph of Article 163 of the ECA-1, the legislature envisaged a different length of time for the retention of data regarding publicly accessible phone services (14 months), on the one hand, and all other data (8 months), on the other. However, the reasons why the legislature decided to require retention for such duration and why it determined a different period of retention for the mentioned data are not evident from either the reply of the National Assembly nor the opinion of the Government. The analysis already mentioned above that was submitted by the Government only includes the generalised claim that if the duration of retention was shortened, “a new adaptation of investigative procedures would be necessary.” With regard to the fact that different data are collected that have, by the nature of the matter, a different utility value with regard to the duration of retention, the legislature should have taken that into consideration and correspondingly differentiated the duration of retention with regard to the usefulness of the data or with regard to the persons concerned.<sup>31</sup> From the mentioned documentation it is also not evident why a shorter period of retention (than was, for instance, determined by certain Member States)<sup>32</sup> does not suffice to achieve its purpose. With regard to the measure that includes such a broad range of different data without objective criteria being determined more precisely for such retention, it is also not possible to carry out a subsequent test of whether the measure only refers to what is truly necessary in order to achieve its purpose. Such measure does not fulfil the criterion of necessity nor the criterion of proportionality in the narrower sense, because it is not possible to weigh whether the correspondingly longer period of retention and the degree of interference with the privacy of individuals related thereto are proportionate to ensuring public safety or some other interest pursued by such measure.

27. The now invalidated Data Retention Directive limited the purpose of such retention only to the investigation, detection, and prosecution of serious criminal offences. The challenged regulation does not include such a limitation. Also in the regulations referred to by the challenged regulation (the first paragraph of Article 163 of the ECA-1), the legislature did not limit the processing of personal data only to certain acts (serious criminal offences) for which it would assess that due to their weight the retention of data or access to these data justify the interference with the privacy of individuals.<sup>33</sup>

United Kingdom*, dated 4 December 2008. As stated also by Article 6 of the Directive on Privacy and Electronic Communications and point e) of Article 5 of the CPI. See also Paragraph 24 of the reasoning in Decision [of the Constitutional Court] No. U-I-411/06. Article 6 of the Directive on Privacy and Electronic Communications determines the principle that traffic data that is processed must be erased or made anonymous when it is no longer needed for the purpose of the transmission of a communication.

32 E.g. the six-month time limit determined by the Federal Republic of Germany in the (now in fact abrogated) Article 113a of the Telecommunications Act (Telekommunikationsgesetz).

33 Cf. the first paragraph of Article 149b of the Criminal Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 32/12 – official consolidated text and 47/13 – hereinafter referred to as the CrPA) and the second paragraph of Article 150 of the CrPA, where the legislature determined a catalogue of criminal offences with regard to which the measures determined by the first paragraph of Article 150 of the CrPA can be ordered.

Also for such reason, the measure disproportionately interferes with the right determined by the first paragraph of Article 38 of the Constitution.

28. By determining, in the first paragraph of Article 163 of the ECA-1, the obligatory retention of traffic data, the legislature substantially interfered with the right to the protection of personal data and at the same time it did not determine in detail the circumstances on the basis of which such interference would be limited to only what is truly necessary to achieve the aim. The challenged provision thereby interfered disproportionately with the right to the protection of personal data determined by the first paragraph of Article 38 of the Constitution. Consequently, the first paragraph of Article 163 of the ECA-1, which explicitly determines the obligation to retain traffic data, is unconstitutional. The other challenged provisions of Section XIII of the ECA-1 are directly connected with this provision and do not have an independent meaning. For such reason, the Constitutional Court abrogated the challenged provisions of Section XIII in their entirety (point 1 of the operative provisions).
29. Since the challenged provisions had to be abrogated already due to the inconsistency with the right to the protection of personal data determined by Article 38 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court did not assess the other alleged unconstitutionality.
30. In order to prevent further disproportionate interferences with the right to the protection of personal data determined by the first paragraph of Article 38 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court determined, on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA, the manner of the implementation of this Decision. On the basis of this Article, service providers that are retaining traffic data in conformity with the first paragraph of Article 163 of the ECA-1 must immediately upon the publication of this Decision in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia destroy these data (point 2 of the operative provisions).

DECISION

At a session held on 14 June 2001 in proceedings to review constitutionality initiated upon the petition of Nova stranka, Ljubljana, represented by its co-president Gorazd Drevenšek and secretary Blaž Babič, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. The provisions of the second paragraph of Article 254 and the third paragraph of Article 292 of the Rules of Procedure of the National Assembly (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 40/93, 80/94, 3/95 – corr., 28/96, 26/97, 46/2000, 3/01, 9/01, and 13/01) and the part of the second sentence of the second paragraph of Article 292 of the Rules of Procedure of the National Assembly that reads as follows: “except in the case referred to in the second paragraph of Article 254 of these Rules of Procedure or if, within 7 days of the adoption of the law, it receives a request from the National Council that the National Assembly decide again on the law in question” are abrogated.
2. Since the Act Regulating the Transformation of Duty-Free Shops at Road Border Crossings with Member States of the European Communities, Acting within the Framework of the European Union, into Border Shops, and the Special Supervisory Measures Relating to these Shops (Official Gazette RS, No. 13/01) have not been promulgated and published in accordance with the Constitution, they have not entered into force and may not be applied.
3. Point 2 of these operative provisions shall be implemented in the manner determined in Paragraphs 50 to 54 of the reasoning of this Decision.
4. This Decision takes effect on the day following its service on the National Assembly.

*ReasoningA

1. The petitioner challenges the procedure for the adoption of the Act Regulating the Transformation of Duty-Free Shops at Road Border Crossings with Member States of the European Communities, Acting within the Framework of the European Union, into Border Shops, and the Special Supervisory Measures Relating to these Shops (hereinafter referred to as the ATDFSEU). The petitioner alleges that the challenged act was adopted in a procedure which is contrary not only to the Constitution but also to the Referendum and Public Initiative Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 15/94, etc. – hereinafter referred to as the RPIA). The petitioner alleges a violation of Article 1 of the Constitution (principle of democracy), Article 2 of the Constitution (principle of a state governed by the rule of law) and Article 3 of the Constitution (principle of the people's sovereignty), Article 44 of the Constitution (participation in the management of public affairs), the second paragraph of Article 90 of the Constitution (legislative referendum) and Article 91 of the Constitution (promulgation of laws), as well as a violation of the second and third paragraphs of Article 21 of the RPIA. The petitioner challenges the third paragraph of Article 292 of the Rules of Procedure of the National Assembly (hereinafter referred to as the RPNA) and proposes that the Constitutional Court initiate proceedings to review the constitutionality of the second paragraph of Article 254 of the RPNA in accordance with the principle of correlation. The petitioner proposes that the implementation of the ATDFSEU be suspended until a final decision is reached by the Constitutional Court.

2. The petitioner alleges that the challenged provisions of the RPNA are constitutionally disputable because they render it either impossible or considerably more difficult for all authorised persons to submit an initiative or request to call a subsequent legislative referendum since they reduce the statutory time limit for submitting such. The petitioner believes that it is first necessary to review the constitutionality of the mentioned provisions of the RPNA, since the essential violations of the procedure for the adoption of the ATDFSEU actually result from the provision of the third paragraph of Article 292 of the RPNA which provides that, in the event that the National Assembly decides again on a law because of a suspensive veto, the law be sent for promulgation immediately. In the petitioner's opinion, the above provisions of the RPNA, and therefore also the procedure for the adoption of the ATDFSEU, entail a violation of the constitutional right to participate in the management of public affairs referred to in Article 44 and the second paragraph of Article 90 of the Constitution.
3. The petitioner states that on 28 February 2001 it submitted an initiative to collect signatures of voters in order to lodge a request to call a subsequent legislative referendum regarding the ATDFSEU. It states that the initiative was submitted on the basis of Article 21 of the RPIA within seven days of the adoption of the law, and that the initiative included the required amount of signatures and the text of the referendum question, together with a statement of reasons. It explains that the ATDFSEU was promulgated on 22 February 2001 and published in the Official Gazette on 28 February 2001. Its initiative was rejected by Act of the President of the National Assembly No. 005-02/97-8/8, dated 2 March 2001, on the grounds that the statutory deadline for submitting the initiative had been missed.
4. The petitioner opposes the position adopted in the decision to reject its initiative to call a referendum, i.e. that even if the National Council exercises its suspensive veto and the National Assembly then decides again on the law and adopts it, the seven-day period for submitting an initiative to call a referendum referred to in Article 21 of the RPIA begins to run as of the “first” adoption of the law by the National Assembly and not as of the day on which the National Assembly again decides on the law on the basis of the suspensive veto. In the petitioner’s opinion, this position is inconsistent with all the principles of human rights law and the principle of interpretation of the law in good faith. The petitioner points out that, when interpreting the law, no interpretation that restricts human rights is admissible.

5. The petitioner believes that its initiative to call a referendum regarding the ATDF-SEU was submitted in due time, i.e. within seven days of the adoption of the law, which was adopted after the National Assembly decided again thereon because the National Council had exercised its suspensive veto. It believes that there are no grounds for drawing a distinction between the two ways of adopting a law, and that the disputed position of the National Assembly is not acceptable in terms of the grammatical, teleological, or systematic methods for interpreting the law. In the petitioner’s opinion there is only one way to adopt a law, to which the legal order attaches specific legal consequences. The petitioner claims that the essence of the institution of the suspensive veto is the suspension of the effects of the adoption of a law. It adds that the institutions available to the National Council which allow it to participate in the legislative procedure are not mutually exclusive and may also be cumulative; therefore, in expressing its disagreement with a certain law adopted by the National Assembly, the National Council may first use a milder instrument (a suspensive veto) and, if that is not sufficient, it may subsequently use a stricter instrument (a request to call a subsequent legislative referendum). The petitioner states that the disputed position of the National Assembly, according to which the seven-day period for submitting an initiative (and therefore for lodging a request) to call a referendum begins to run as of the first adoption of the law by the National Assembly, does not allow for such logical interpretation.
6. The petitioner further believes that the distinction between two ways of adopting a law is also contrary to the principles of legal precision and predictability and trust in the law, since such a distinction is by no means based on the nature of things and may therefore be unclear to the average addressee of the legal norm. In the petitioner’s view the applicable statutory regulation of the interventions involving referendum procedures is unsatisfactory and insufficient, and the resulting legal gap allows the National Assembly to act arbitrarily; therefore, the legislature should be obliged to provide for an appropriate statutory regulation of such interventions. The petitioner further states that it has initiated proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts in order to protect its rights relating to the initiative to call a referendum on the ATDFSEU; however, in the petitioner’s opinion this is clearly a legally ineffective legal remedy. It states that it has brought a legal action against the order on the promulgation and the publication of the ATDFSEU, which was rejected, and a legal action against Act of the President of the National Assembly No. 005-02/978/8, dated 2 March 2001, which was dismissed; moreover, it lodged two appeals against the two Administrative Court decisions, on which the Supreme Court has yet to decide.

7. Pursuant to the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), on 28 May 2001 the Constitutional Court sent to the National Assembly the petition of Nova stranka and Order of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-104/01, dated 28 May 2001, by which it initiated not only proceedings for the review of the constitutionality of the second paragraph of Article 254 and the third paragraph of Article 292 of the RPNA, but also proceedings for the review of the constitutionality of the ATDFSEU, and gave the National Assembly 14 days to reply. The President of the National Assembly failed to send the response of the National Assembly in accordance with Articles 299 and 300 of the RPNA within the mentioned time limit, which expired on 11 June 2001. On 7 June 2001 the Constitutional Court received the data and explanations of the National Assembly sent by the National Assembly's Secretariat for Legislation and Legal Affairs, referring to Article 301 of the RPNA, and following a consideration by the Commission for the Rules of Procedure.
8. In these explanations the National Assembly states that the provision of the third paragraph of Article 292 of the RPNA has been applied unamended since its entry into force and has thus far not been challenged. In the discussions during the drafting of the RPNA, the opinion was expressed that the main procedural issues relating to a referendum should be regulated by a special law. The National Assembly states that, according to the Constitution, the National Council does not have the role of a lower chamber, and is an indirect participant in the legislative procedure; this is why, during reconsideration as a result of a suspensive veto of a law that has already been adopted, the National Assembly only votes on the law in question but discusses it no further. As regards the provision of the second paragraph of Article 254 of the RPNA, the National Assembly states that it was included in the RPNA during the third reading of the draft RPNA for practical reasons, so that it would not be necessary to wait for seven days to promulgate and publish the law. It states that the RPIA was adopted in 1994, i.e. after the RPNA, which is why the RPIA applies to all the referendum-related issues according to the rule that the more recent and special law prevails and therefore the second paragraph of Article 254 of the RPNA is no longer applied.
9. In the National Assembly's opinion, the regulation provided for in the third paragraph of Article 292 of the RPNA is not directly connected with the referendum issue, as it only regulates the promulgation of laws in relation to the reconsideration procedure. This procedure is regulated by the provisions of Articles 205 to 207 of the RPNA as a special procedure, and is regulated in the chapter regarding the legislative procedure because it refers to the laws and "does not mean that it refers to the legislative procedure, i.e. when the law is being made". In the opinion of the National Assembly, the regulation provided in the third paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA is independent from the mentioned regulation in the RPNA; however, the two regulations may be implemented simultaneously and in accordance with the Constitution. In the event that the National Council requires the National Assembly to decide again on the law, the National Assembly believes that it must first decide and only then can the procedure determined by the RPIA regarding an initiative to collect signatures [for a request to call a referendum] be carried out with regard to the law which was upheld by the National Assembly during the reconsideration procedure; in this context, the time limit for collecting signatures begins to run upon the elimination of the constitutional impediment by the National Assembly, i.e. by the National Assembly rejecting the suspensive veto, provided that the initiative to collect the voters' signatures has already been submitted within the statutory time limit of seven days of the adoption of the law. The National Assembly states that such an interpretation is also consistent with the position of the National Council, in that it enables the National Council to lodge a request for reconsideration within the constitutional time limit of seven days as well as to lodge a request for a subsequent legislative referendum on the basis of the RPIA within the statutory time limit of seven days, which runs concurrently. In the opinion of the National Assembly, the provision of the third paragraph of Article 292 of the RPNA does not prevent the exercise of the right to a legislative referendum, as the procedure is carried out directly on the basis of the RPIA and not on the basis of the RPNA. The National Assembly then adds that the draft of the new RPNA no longer includes the provision of the current second paragraph of Article 254 of the RPNA, and that the current provision of Article 292 of the RPNA has been amended so as to include the situation which arises on the basis of the RPIA.

10. The National Assembly states that the employed interpretation of the provision of the second paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA does not deny any of the statutorily determined initiators the right to exercise their constitutionally guaranteed right to participate in the management of public affairs and to initiate a legislative referendum, since they all had the opportunity to initiate either a preliminary referendum or a subsequent referendum within seven days of the adoption of the law; however, the petitioner, Nova stranka, did not avail itself of the opportunity. Furthermore, in the National Assembly's opinion, the suspensive veto cannot entail the commencement of a special fourth stage in the legislative procedure, since the regular legislative procedure consists of three stages, and the wording of the law may no longer be changed after the veto has been exercised.
11. The National Assembly further states that it is clear from the provision of the first paragraph of Article 91 of the Constitution that "the adoption" means the adoption of the law during the legislative procedure, i.e. at the last stage, by a vote on the draft law as whole, and that the above provision must also be taken into account when interpreting Article 21 of the RPIA. In this context, the National Assembly refers to the position of Dr Kaučič<sup>1</sup> that it would be reasonable if the time limit for submitting a request or initiative for a subsequent legislative referendum began to run after the expiry of the time limit for exercising the veto, as it may happen that a law is not adopted during the reconsideration procedure and, consequently, a subsequent legislative referendum in relation thereto may no longer be possible; and it adds that this inevitably clashes with the constitutional provision on the obligatory eight-day time limit for promulgation. In the National Assembly's opinion, a systematic interpretation of the RPIA results in the finding that the seven-day time limit that begins to run as of the adoption of the law refers to the adoption of the draft law as a whole during the third stage of the legislative procedure.

12. The National Assembly believes that the RPIA neither concerns the cases involving laws in relation to which the suspensive veto has been exercised nor does it establish rules to be applied thereto, and thus it is necessary to interpret the issue of the mutual effect of both instruments. In this context the National Assembly states that, according to the petitioner's interpretation, two time limits would have been available for submitting an initiative to collect signatures; however, such a significant instrument could only be dependent on completely certain, clearly defined, and predictable circumstances such as the adoption of a law by the National Assembly during the last stage of the legislative procedure. A different interpretation of the time limits would give rise to several questions (until the expiry of the time limit, the initiators would not know whether such time limit continues to apply or whether it will begin to run anew; it is unclear whether "the first time limit" is merely interrupted or whether it will begin to run again after the law has been adopted during reconsideration procedure; it is unclear how the initiatives already submitted within "the first time limit" are to be treated; etc.). In the opinion of the National Assembly, such an unclear regulation could result in an unequal position of different initiators and in different treatment of laws as the subjects of a referendum. The National Assembly believes that the interpretation offered by the petitioner is therefore contrary to the principles of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution) and that the interpretation of the National Assembly supports the clear, logical, and uniform exercise of the constitutional right to a legislative referendum as it makes the starting point of the seven-day time limit for initiating a subsequent legislative referendum dependent on an objective fact which is ever present and always clearly evident. The National Assembly adds that the issue of time limits should have already been clearly and expressly regulated by the RPIA, as the exercise of constitutional rights requires a clear statutory regulation.
13. The National Assembly also mentions the constitutional obligation of the President of the Republic to promulgate laws within eight days of their adoption. In the opinion of the National Assembly, a constitutional impediment to the promulgation only exists if the suspensive veto has been exercised; if the law is adopted during the reconsideration procedure, the said constitutional impediment is eliminated and the President of the Republic must therefore immediately promulgate the law in question. The National Assembly believes that an initiative to call a subsequent legislative referendum submitted in due time, in contrast, entails statutory grounds to suspend the promulgation.
14. The National Assembly adds that the proposed amendment to the RPIA is currently in the legislative procedure, which will allow for additional discussion and improvements to be made to the currently applicable regulation of the referendum. The National Assembly repudiates all the statements made by the petitioner and believes that the procedure for adopting the ATDFSEU was in accordance with both the Constitution and the law, and that it did not constitute a violation of the petitioner's right to a referendum, because the petitioner had the opportunity to submit an initiative for a preliminary referendum and a subsequent legislative referendum within seven days of the adoption of the law.

15. On 14 June 2001, the Constitutional Court received the response of Nova stranka to the statements of the National Assembly, in which the petitioner insists on its statements and claims, and opposes the interpretation offered by the National Assembly.

16. By an order dated 28 May 2001, the Constitutional Court initiated proceedings to review the constitutionality of the third paragraph of Article 292 and the second paragraph of Article 254 of the RPNA, initiated proceedings to review the constitutionality of the procedure for the adoption of the ATDFSEU and, at the same time, suspended the implementation of the mentioned provisions of the RPNA and ATDFSEU until a final decision is reached. The Constitutional Court decided to assign the case priority status. Pursuant to Article 30 of the CCA, the Constitutional Court also initiated proceedings to review the constitutionality of the part of the second sentence of the second paragraph of Article 292 of the RPNA which reads as follows: “except in the case referred to in the second paragraph of Article 254 of these Rules of Procedure or if, within 7 days of the adoption of the law, it receives a request from the National Council that the National Assembly decide again on the law in question”. As both parties had the opportunity to express their views on the issue regulated by the cited provision of the RPNA, since the latter refers or relates to the other two challenged provisions of the RPNA and regulates the same subject matter, the Constitutional Court immediately proceeded to decide on the merits of this part of the case.

B – II

17. The RPNA is a legal act that regulates the organisation and activities of the legislative body. In the part relating to the legislative procedure and the part relating to the relationship between the National Assembly and other state authorities, the RPNA is a general legal act by nature with an external effect, i.e. a regulation, and, despite it not formally being a law, it has the status of a law in the hierarchy of legal acts (see, for example, Decisions of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-40/96, dated 3 April 1997, Official Gazette RS, No. 24/97, and OdlUS VI, 46, and No. U-I-84/96, dated 21 October 1999, Official Gazette RS, No. 95/99, and OdlUS VIII, 224). If it became evident that the RPNA actually makes it impossible or considerably more difficult to exercise any of the constitutional rights or to respect constitutionally guaranteed legal positions, it would be inconsistent with the Constitution in this regard. In the case at issue the petitioner claims that there has been a violation of the constitutionally guaranteed right to a referendum, i.e. relating to the exercise of the right to initiate a subsequent legislative referendum. The review of the Constitutional Court was therefore focused on the question as to whether the challenged provisions of the RPNA make it impossible or considerably more difficult to effectively conduct a subsequent legislative referendum.

18. Several provisions of the Constitution play a crucial role in defining the constitutional right to a referendum. The basic starting point are Articles 2 and 3 of the Constitution, which provide that Slovenia is a democratic republic and that, in Slovenia, power is vested in the people, who exercise this power both directly and through elections. Pursuant to Article 44 of the Constitution, every citizen has the right, in accordance with the law, to participate either directly or through elected representatives in the management of public affairs. The principles enshrined in the mentioned constitutional provisions are also manifested in the provision of Article 90 of the Constitution, which regulates the legislative referendum. Article 90 of the Constitution reads as follows: “(1) The National Assembly may call a referendum on any issue that is the subject of regulation by law. The National Assembly is bound by the result of such referendum. (2) The National Assembly may call a referendum referred to in the preceding paragraph on its own initiative, however it must call such referendum if so required by at least one third of the deputies, by the National Council or by forty thousand voters. (3) The right to vote in a referendum is held by all citizens who are eligible to vote in elections. (4) A proposal is adopted in a referendum if a majority of those voting have cast votes in its favour. (5) Referenda are regulated by a law to be adopted by the National Assembly by a two-thirds majority vote of deputies present.”
19. A referendum is a form of direct democracy and holds an important place in the Constitution. The term “referendum” is defined in the Constitution in relatively broad and non-restrictive terms. Moreover, the required two-thirds relative majority for the adoption of the law regulating referenda attests to the importance that the Constitution attaches to them. In interpreting the statutory implementation of this constitutional right, account must be taken of the above-mentioned starting point, meaning that a restrictive approach is not acceptable and the statutory regulation must, in the event of doubt, be interpreted and applied in favour of the right to a referendum.
20. The Constitution therefore only regulates the legislative referendum in general terms, referring to a detailed regulation to be provided for by law. The provisions of the fifth paragraph of Article 90 of the Constitution cannot, however, be understood as a statutory reservation by which the Constitution would allow for this constitutional right to be restricted by law. The law may only regulate the manner in which the constitutionally guaranteed right to a referendum is to be exercised. The constitution-framers have left the decision on what type of legislative referendum it will regulate to the legislature, and it is not to be understood from the Constitution that the regulation has to include all possible and known types of legislative referendum (as held in Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-47/94, dated 19 January 1995, Official Gazette RS, No. 13/95, and OdlUS IV, 4). This does not, however, entail that the legislature is free to regulate the referendum issue entirely at its own discretion. By selecting and defining the types of referendum through which the constitutional right referred to in Articles 44 and 90 of the Constitution will be exercised, the legislature is obliged to regulate each of the referendum types it includes in the legal order in such a way that it will be possible to effectively conduct them in practice, and that the effective exercise of the constitutionally guaranteed right to a referendum will be ensured. Owing to the nature of a referendum, which is a demanding and complex legal activity, all questions arising in connection with the exercise of this constitutional right must be precisely and clearly defined.

21. The RPIA entails the statutory implementation of the provision of Article 90 of the Constitution. The RPIA regulates both the preliminary and subsequent legislative referendum. Pursuant to Article 9 of the RPIA, in a subsequent legislative referendum the voters confirm a law that has already been adopted by the National Assembly. Upon the adoption of a law and on its own initiative, the National Assembly may decide to call a subsequent legislative referendum on the adopted law (Article 20 of the RPIA); the authorised referendum initiators (one third of the deputies, the National Council, and 40,000 voters) may, however, lodge a request to call a referendum within a specified time limit following the adoption of the law: one third of the deputies or the National Council may lodge the request within seven days after the law has been adopted (first paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA), whereas the 40,000 voters may do so within a thirty-day period that begins to run after the law has been adopted; in the event of the latter, an initiative to lodge a request to call a referendum must be submitted to the voters (second paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA) no later than seven days after the law has been adopted. An initiative [for the collection of signatures for a request] to call a referendum may be submitted by any voter, political party, or other association of citizens and must be supported by the signatures of at least two hundred voters; such initiative must also meet all the other prescribed requirements in terms of both form and substance (Article 13 of the RPIA ff.).
22. The third paragraph of Article 21 and Article 24 of the RPIA provide that the National Assembly must suspend the publication of a law in the event that an initiative or request to call a referendum is submitted. Pursuant to the third paragraph of Article 21 of the RPIA, in the event that an initiative for the voters to lodge a request to call a referendum has been submitted, the publication of the law is suspended until the expiry of the time limit for lodging the request; if the request of the voters to call a subsequent legislative referendum is not lodged within this time period, the National Assembly submits the law for publication. If a request to call a referendum has been lodged (by any of the authorised initiators) and the referendum is then called, the law, pursuant to Article 24 of the RPIA and provided that it has been confirmed in the referendum, shall be sent for publication immediately after the National Assembly has received a report on the result of the referendum. Hence it follows, a contrario, that in the event that the law has not been confirmed in the subsequent legislative referendum it is not sent for publication. This entails that, in the event of a request or initiative to call a subsequent legislative referendum, the law may not be sent for publication until the referendum procedure is concluded.

23. The suspension of the publication of a law is an important legal consequence of a submitted request or initiative for a subsequent legislative referendum. Only by preventing the publication of the law until the referendum procedure has been concluded (and thereby preventing its entry into force) can the effectiveness of a subsequent legislative referendum as a method by which the electorate decides directly on the confirmation or non-confirmation (i.e. rejection) of a law be ensured. More specifically, the point of a subsequent legislative referendum lies in the fact that the electorate decides on a law which has already been adopted by the legislature, but will only enter into force after its promulgation, publication, and the expiry of the vacatio legis. A subsequent legislative referendum would lose its meaning if the relevant law entered into force prior to the referendum being conducted. A request to call a subsequent legislative referendum is a request that the people themselves directly and ultimately decide whether a law that was adopted by the legislature should exist or not. The existence of a certain law is thus dependent on the will of the electorate, their voting, i.e. deciding in the referendum, and no longer only on the voting, i.e. deciding, of the deputies as the representatives of the people in the legislative body. In this regard, Pitamic spoke of “the people’s veto”.<sup>2</sup> A law that has not been confirmed in a referendum, has not been made at all and does not exist. This is an expression of the principle of popular sovereignty, according to which power is vested in the people, who may, when disagreeing with their chosen representatives through whom they indirectly exercise their power, assume their original right to decide on public affairs. A decision adopted directly by the voters in a referendum has an overriding power over the decisions taken by their chosen representatives and it is the will of the electorate that determines whether or not a law will be made.

B – III

24. The provisions of the second and third paragraphs of Article 292 and the second paragraph of Article 254 of the RPNA regulate the question of when the President of the National Assembly should send a law to the President of the Republic for promulgation. The second paragraph of Article 292 of the RPNA determines the general rule, according to which a law shall be sent for promulgation on the eighth day after it has been adopted. In addition to this general rule, two exceptions are provided for, both of which are related to the exercise of the suspensive veto by the National Council. A special rule applies if the President of the National Council notifies the President of the National Assembly that the National Council will not discuss the text of the adopted law; in the event of such, the law is immediately sent for promulgation (second paragraph of Article 254 of the RPNA). The other special rule applies if the National Council has exercised the suspensive veto; if, at a request of the National Council, the National Assembly decides again on the law and the law is then adopted, the law is sent for promulgation immediately (the third paragraph of Article 292 of the RPNA).

25. In order to review the constitutionality of the above-mentioned provisions of the RPNA in terms of whether they make it impossible or considerably more difficult to conduct a subsequent legislative referendum as a form of the constitutionally guaranteed right to directly participate in the management of public affairs and, in this context, the right to a referendum, the following questions must first be solved: what are the promulgation and the publication of a law and what is the relationship between them; what is the adoption of a law; what is the effect of the suspensive veto and what is the relationship between the National Council and the National Assembly during the procedure for the adoption of a law; how is the relationship between the persons authorised to lodge a request to call a legislative referendum or the electorate that decides in the referendum and the National Assembly as the legislature defined; what is the relationship between the suspensive veto and subsequent legislative referendum. The question at issue is how to define legal positions of individual participants (direct or indirect) in the legislative procedure in the broader sense, i.e. in the context of the process of drafting a specific law. The Constitution defines the position of the National Assembly as the legislature, the position of the National Council, the institution of suspensive veto, the institution of legislative referendum and the promulgation and publication of laws. The statutory regulation (and the regulation in the rules of procedure) governing the legislative procedure in the broader sense of the word, i.e. the process of drafting a law, must be such as to respect the constitutionally guaranteed legal positions of all the relevant subjects, who are directly or indirectly involved in the process of drafting the law (the National Assembly, the National Council, the authorised initiators of a legislative referendum, and the electorate), and the relationships between them, and to ensure effective exercise of their entitlements, rights, and powers, which arise from the Constitution, in the context of the process of the making of the law (adoption of a law, suspensive veto, subsequent legislative referendum, promulgation, and publication of a law).

B – IV

26. Given that Article 21 of the RPIA refers to the publication of a law, while the challenged provisions of the RPNA refer to the promulgation of a law, the relationship between the promulgation and the publication of a law is relevant to the review of the above-mentioned provisions of the RPNA. Are the regulation in the RPIA and the regulation in the RPNA contradictory, or are they independent of each other as they regulate two different issues? The question must be answered as to how to proceed with the constitutional review of a regulation according to which, in the event where a request to call a subsequent legislative referendum has been lodged (irrespective of whether or not a suspensive veto was used in the procedure for the adoption of the law), the law in question is sent for promulgation (in compliance with the provisions of the RPNA) and, at the same time, its publication is suspended (in compliance with the provisions of the RPIA).
27. The promulgation of laws is listed in the first paragraph of Article 107 of the Constitution as one of the powers of the President of the Republic, whereas the first paragraph of Article 91 of the Constitution provides that: “Laws are promulgated by the President of the Republic no later than eight days after they have been adopted”. As regards the publication of laws, account must be taken of Article 154 of the Constitution, which provides that regulations must be published prior to their entry into force, that a regulation enters into force on the fifteenth day after it has been published unless otherwise determined in the regulation itself, and that state regulations are published in the official gazette of the state. Pursuant to the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 57/96 – hereinafter referred to as the OGA), the official gazette of the state in which state regulations are published is the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia (Article 1), which is issued by the government office in charge of legislation (Article 2) and published by the public company the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia (Article 3). Article 9 of the OGA provides that regulations and other acts are published by order of the body which issued such act, i.e. laws are published by order of the National Assembly. Pursuant to Article 5 of the OGA, the director of the public company determines the numbering and sequence in which the regulations and other acts will be published, if they are duly submitted for publication.

28. It can therefore be established that the promulgation of a law and the publication of a law are legally relevant actions that follow the adoption of the law and entail a necessary condition for the law to enter into force. The promulgation of a law and the publication of a law are two activities which are, however, interdependent and interconnected. The promulgation is an act by which it is established that the law in question has been made through the participation of all the constitutionally determined participants; it is an act by which it is established that the law has been adopted by the authorised body in the prescribed procedure, that the law has actually been made, and that the law therefore exists. The publication is the act of making the law externally identifiable and is a necessary condition for the law's entry into force in that it enables the addressees to get familiar with the law and its substance before it enters into force and becomes binding for them.<sup>3</sup> Pursuant to the regulation currently in force, laws are promulgated by the President of the Republic and published in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia and the National Assembly, or rather the President of the National Assembly, submits laws for promulgation and orders their publication. A law may not be promulgated or published if there are impediments preventing it from entering into force. It is not possible to promulgate and publish a law that has not yet been made and does not exist, or a law with regard to which it is unclear whether it has been made. It is also clear from the provisions of the Constitution which provide that the President of the Republic promulgates laws that only existing laws are promulgated. This means that the provision of the first paragraph of Article 91 of the Constitution may be construed to require the President of the Republic to promulgate the law in question by no later than the eighth day after it has been adopted, on the condition that there are no constitutional impediments in relation to the making of the law and it is certain that the law has been made.

29. After the National Assembly has adopted a law with a prescribed majority, either in a regular, fast-track, or shortened procedure, there are two further impediments for such to become a law: the possibility of a suspensive veto exercised by the National Council and the possibility of a subsequent confirmatory legislative referendum. If the National Council exercises its suspensive veto, the National Assembly must again decide on the law; the law, which requires a larger majority to be adopted, may or may not be adopted during this reconsideration procedure. In regulating the question of when the law is to be sent for promulgation, the RPNA takes account of the above possibility, and thus a suspensive veto is treated as an impediment to the promulgation of the law: only after the National Council has announced that it will not discuss the law (and will also not exercise the suspensive veto), or in the event that the National Council has exercised its suspensive veto, may the law be submitted for promulgation, but only after the National Assembly has adopted the law during the reconsideration procedure. The RPNA does not, however, consider the possibility of a subsequent legislative referendum to be an impediment to the promulgation of a law. It is therefore possible that a law is sent for promulgation regarding which an initiative or request to call a referendum might be submitted, i.e. a request that the electorate make the final decision on a law that has already been adopted by the National Assembly, but which might not be confirmed by the electorate.

B – V

30. The provision of the second paragraph of Article 254 of the RPNA provides that, in the event that the National Council announces that it will not discuss the law (and will thus not exercise its veto), the law is sent for promulgation immediately, i.e. prior to the expiry of the time limit for submitting an initiative or request to call a subsequent legislative referendum referred to in Article 21 of the RPIA. The above-mentioned provision of the RPNA is included in the chapter titled “The Relations of the National Assembly towards the National Council”. It is evident that the RPNA was not intended to regulate issues relating to a referendum. This is the substance of the RPIA, which was adopted later. Given that even the Constitution does not regulate the legislative referendum in detail, it is understandable that the legislature, when formulating the provisions of the RPNA, was unable to take into account the institution of the subsequent legislative referendum. However, as soon as the legislature adopted the RPIA, in which it provided for a subsequent legislative referendum, thereby implementing the constitutional right to a referendum, it should also have adapted the provisions of the RPNA accordingly. Through the RPIA, which was adopted at a later point in time (like the RPNA, the RPIA is adopted by a two-thirds relative majority), the legislative body provided for a subsequent legislative referendum as one of the ways in which the constitutional right referred to in Article 90 in conjunction with Article 44 of the Constitution and grounded in the fundamental principles of the constitutional order referred to in Articles 1 and 3 of the Constitution is to be exercised. The subsequent legislative referendum is therefore accorded constitutional protection. Already from the definition of this type of referendum there follows the requirement that a certain time limit be determined for submitting a request or initiative to call a referendum after the law has been adopted. It would be contrary to the very essence of this type of referendum if there was no interval between the adoption of the law and the law being sent for promulgation that corresponded to the time limit set by the RPIA for submitting a request or initiative [to call a referendum]. The National Assembly states that after the RPIA had been adopted the provision of the second paragraph of Article 254 of the RPNA ceased to be applied; however, it did not abrogate this provision in the process of adopting several subsequent amendments to the RPNA, and the doubts regarding the validity of this provision have never been resolved. The regulation as provided in the second paragraph of Article 254 of the RPNA is inconsistent with the Constitution as it fails to take into account the institution of the subsequent legislative referendum, thereby making it possible to send a law, which may or may not be made, for promulgation prior to the expiry of the time limit for submitting an initiative or request to call a referendum. It was therefore abrogated by the Constitutional Court.

31. Since the Constitutional Court abrogated the above-mentioned provision of the RPNA, the general rule, according to which a law is sent for promulgation on the eighth day after it has been adopted, also has to be applied in the case at issue and it must be interpreted in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 91 of the Constitution, taking into account all the constitutionally guaranteed legal positions of the specific subjects entitled to participate in the process of drafting the law. This entails that a law is promulgated if there are no constitutional impediments to its promulgation and publication in relation to its drafting. A subsequent legislative referendum, designated by the legislature as one of the ways in which the right referred to in Article 90 of the Constitution is to be exercised, also entails a constitutional impediment to the promulgation of the law. That which cannot be promulgated also may not be sent for promulgation. The President of the Republic cannot promulgate as a law something which might never become a law, because it will not be confirmed by the people in a referendum. More specifically, promulgation is an act that establishes that the law in question was made with the participation of all the constitutionally entitled subjects and that it therefore exists.

B – VI

32. When reviewing the constitutionality of the provision of the third paragraph of Article 292 of the RPNA, the Constitutional Court first had to clarify the nature of the relationship between a suspensive veto and a subsequent legislative referendum. This is inextricably linked to the question of what is deemed to be the moment a law is adopted, from which point the seven-day time limit for submitting an initiative or request to call a referendum referred to in Article 21 of the RPIA begins to run.

33. The first paragraph of Article 97 of the Constitution determines the suspensive veto to be one of the powers at the disposal of the National Council and it is specified in more detail by the provision of the second paragraph of Article 91 of the Constitution: “The National Council may within seven days of the adoption of a law and prior to its promulgation require the National Assembly to decide again on such law. In deciding again, a majority of all deputies must vote for such law to be adopted unless the Constitution provides for a higher majority for the adoption of the law under consideration. Such new decision by the National Assembly shall be final.” The reconsideration of a law is regulated by the provisions of Articles 205 to 207 of the RPNA, which constitute a special section in the chapter titled “Legislative Procedure”. Reconsideration of a law by the National Assembly due to a suspensive veto of the National Council’s is a part of the legislative procedure in the broader sense of the word, i.e. the whole process leading to the adoption and making of a law. If the suspensive veto is exercised after the National Assembly adopted a law, either in a regular, fast-track, or shortened procedure, this entails that the National Assembly must again decide on whether or not to adopt the law. It is evident from the wording of the relevant provisions and, in particular, the definition of the suspensive veto in the Constitution and the RPNA that, during a reconsideration which is a result of a suspensive veto, the National Assembly decides on the adoption of a law. In that case, a larger majority of deputies is required to adopt the law than when the law was “first” adopted. If the required qualified majority in the National Assembly is not achieved, the constitutionally determined conditions for such a law (adopted by a majority which does not suffice once the suspensive veto has been exercised) to be adopted by the National Assembly, i.e. to be made, have not been met. If the National Assembly does not adopt the law during the reconsideration, such a law does not exist and has therefore not been adopted by the National Assembly. The Constitutional Court agrees with the finding of the National Assembly that the National Council is only an indirect participant in the legislative procedure and that, during the reconsideration resulting from the suspensive veto, the National Assembly (taking into account the applicable regulation in the RPNA) only decides on whether the law, without amending the existing wording, will be adopted or not, and hence neither the substance of the law may be changed nor may the National Council propose any amendments. This does not, however, entail that the law has already been adopted after it was “first” decided on by the National Assembly since, in the event that a suspensive veto is exercised, the position of the National Assembly is the same as it was prior to when the draft law was “first” decided on, i.e. prior to the adoption of a decision as to whether or not to adopt such a law.
34. The Constitutional Court has already taken a position with regard to the suspensive veto, its relationship to when the adoption of the law is “first” decided on by the National Assembly, and the significance of the reconsideration procedure in the National Assembly, in particular in Decision No. U-I-84/96, dated 21 October 1999 (Official Gazette RS, No. 95/99, and OdlUS VIII, 224). In the reasoning of the mentioned decision the Constitutional Court stated inter alia that, by requiring that the National Assembly decide again on a law, the National Council becomes involved in the procedure of deciding on a law. The Court pointed out that, after the suspensive veto has been exercised, the National Assembly decides again on the law as a whole and may neither partly change it nor return it to the stage of the first or second reading; if the law is not adopted during the reconsideration procedure, the legislative procedure is concluded. The Court further explained that exercising the suspensive veto actually entails asking the deputies whether they agree that the law in question be adopted.
