

---

CONSTITUTIONAL COURT OF THE REPUBLIC OF SLOVENIA

---

Selected Decisions

---

1991–2015

---

CIP - Kataložni zapis o publikaciji
Narodna in univerzitetna knjižnica, Ljubljana

342.565.2(497.4)"1991/2015"

SLOVENIJA. Ustavno sodišče

Constitutional Court of the Republic of Slovenia : selected decisions : 1991-2015 / [editor- in-chief Sebastian Nerad ; translations Vesna Božič ... [et al.] ; index Vesna Božič ...
et al.]. - Ljubljana : The Constitutional Court of the Republic of Slovenia, 2016

ISBN 978-961-90589-5-4

1. Nerad, Sebastian
284858368

Twenty-five years have passed since Slovenia adopted the Basic Constitutional Charter on the Sovereignty and Independence of the Republic of Slovenia (hereinafter referred to as the BCC) and declared itself to be a sovereign and independent state. In Decision No. U-I-109/10 the Constitutional Court held that: “Human dignity is also at the centre of the constitutional order of the Republic of Slovenia. Its ethical and constitutional significance already proceeds from the BCC, which is not only the constitutional foundation of Slovene statehood, as also certain principles that demonstrate the fundamental legal and constitutional quality of the new independent and sovereign state are outlined therein. In its Preamble the BCC first proclaimed the fact that the Socialist Federal Republic of Slovenia (hereinafter referred to as the SFRY) did not function as a state governed by law and that within it human rights were grossly violated, while Section III, as the antipode to the above-mentioned, emphasized that the Republic of Slovenia would guarantee the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms to all persons in the territory of the Republic of Slovenia irrespective of their national origin, without any discrimination whatsoever, in accordance with the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia and the treaties in force. This new constitutional quality of the new state is even more clearly demonstrated in the Declaration of Independence (Official Gazette RS, No. 1/91), which was adopted together with the BCC (on 25 June 1991), and in which the former Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia emphasized the commitment of Slovenia to respect human rights and fundamental freedoms and its orientation towards joining international organisations which are based on respect for human dignity and which in their acts determine the fundamental international standards of human rights protection. Thus, by adopting these independence documents not only the fundamental the fundamental relationship entailing state sovereignty between the Republic of Slovenia and the SFRY was severed, but there was also a fracture with the fundamental value concept of the constitutional order. [...] Differently than the former SFRY, the Republic of Slovenia is a state governed by the rule of law whose constitutional order proceeds from the principle of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms already on the basis of the basic constitutional documents. From the BCC, the Preamble to the Constitution, and numerous constitutional provisions there proceeds the fact that human dignity is the fundamental value which permeates the entire legal order and therefore it also has an objective significance in the functioning of authority not only in individual proceedings but also when adopting regulations. In its substance, human dignity entails the presumption that every human being has equal and absolute inner worth because he or she is a human being. Respect for human dignity therefore entails the protection of the inherent worth of the individual against unjustified interferences by and requirements of the state and society.”

The above-outlined premises provided the basis upon which the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Slovenia began to carry out its work as the highest authority for the protection of constitutionality and legality and the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms in our sovereign state. The new Judges were elected by the first National Assembly to have been elected in free multiparty elections. Only the values upon which the new sovereign state of the Republic of Slovenia was founded and which established our state as a constitutional democracy allowed for the Constitutional Court to assume the position of supreme guardian of the Constitution and protector of human rights and fundamental freedoms. It is therefore quite appropriate that we celebrate the adoption of the mentioned acts as the beginning of the functioning of the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Slovenia. Although Slovenia already had a Constitutional Court while still a constituent part of the Yugoslav Federation, that court functioned within the framework of the socialist single-party social and political order, in which, as established by the BCC, human rights had been grossly violated and which did not function as a state governed by the rule of law. The adoption of the independence documents marked a break with the fundamental value concept of the constitutional order. In contrast to the former SFRY, the Republic of Slovenia is a state governed by the rule of law whose constitutional order proceeds from the principle of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms already on the basis of the basic constitutional documents.

The break with the fundamental value concept of the former constitutional order first required the deconstruction of the communist legacy and the establishment of a democratic state that is governed by the rule of law and a social state. The Constitutional Court played a crucial role in this process and the selection of the most important Constitutional Court decisions from the past 25 years is intended to illustrate this role. The Constitution is namely more than merely a collection of articles; its full substance is, to a large extent, the result of the work of the Constitutional Court. Without it, the Constitution would lead a “rather constricted life,” as the decisions of the Constitutional Court supplement the Constitution and give it meaning, thus making it a living instrument and an effective legal act.

The process of interpreting the Constitution, as well as developing and strengthening democracy and the rule of law, is an ongoing endeavour. Every composition of the Constitutional Court has thus been confronted with new issues and every Constitutional Court decision entails another piece in the mosaic of the rule of law and in the consolidation of constitutional democracy, as well as with regard to the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms. During the past 25 years, 29 judges have contributed to this mosaic. The first composition of the Constitutional Court undoubtedly played a particularly important role as it carried out pioneering work and adopted numerous decisions that are still relevant today. However, the commitment of the first composition to the fundamental value premises of the independence documents has been confirmed and continued by all subsequent compositions.

Throughout its functioning, i.e. the entire twenty-five years since the Republic of Slovenia became a sovereign and independent state, the Constitutional Court has been committed to the Constitution and the values enshrined therein. Through the introduction of modern standards of constitutional review, the judges of the Constitutional Court put the Republic of Slovenia on the map along with other modern constitutional democracies in Europe and throughout the world. In our young state in transition, the Constitutional Court played a central role in establishing the principle that the individual must be the measure of the functioning of state power. Its constitutional case law essentially contributed to the transition from the former non-democratic regime to the new socio-political system, which is harmonised with European and international legal standards and based on the rule of law and the protection of individuals and their dignity.

This collection of the most important decisions of the Constitutional Court over the past twenty-five years of its functioning is convincing evidence of its commitment to the Constitution and the values enshrined therein.

A handwritten signature in dark ink, reading "M. Mozetič". The script is fluid and cursive, with the first letter 'M' being large and prominent. The signature is positioned above the printed name and title.

Mag. Miroslav Mozetič
President

Table of Contents

	page number ↓
The Constitution Following 25 Years of Constitutional Case Law	Introduction by Dr Jadranka Sovdat, Vice President 17

Cases

↓ the numbers of the individual decisions      ↓ subject      page number ↓

PART I – Human Dignity, Human Rights, and Fundamental Freedoms
1.	Decision No. U-I-109/10 , dated 26 September 2011	Tito Street 55 ▷ 21–22
2.	Decision No. U-I-23/93 , dated 20 March 1997	The Equal Protection of Rights in Denationalisation Proceedings 82
3.	Decision No. U-I-146/07 , dated 13 November 2008	Discrimination against Blind and Partial- ly Sighted Persons in Civil Proceedings 112 ▷ 35, 36
4.	Decision No. U-I-425/06 , dated 2 July 2009	Registered Same-Sex Partnerships 132 ▷ 35
5.	Decision No. Up-555/03, Up-827/04 , dated 6 July 2006	The Death of a Person during Arrest and Effective Legal Remedies 139 ▷ 22, 23, 45
6.	Decision No. Up-679/12 , dated 16 October 2014	Liability for Damages due to the Death of a Person during Arrest 164 ▷ 23
7.	Decision No. U-I-292/09, Up-1427/09 , dated 20 October 2011	Credibility of an Asylum Applicant 177 ▷ 24
8.	Decision No. Up-75/95 , dated 7 July 1995	Detention due to the Risk of Recidivism 192 ▷ 25–26
9.	Decision No. U-I-18/93 , dated 11 April 1996	Obligatory Detention and Conditions for Deciding on Detention due to the Risk of Recidivism 203 ▷ 24–25
10.	Decision No. Up-185/95 , dated 24 October 1996	Detention due to the Risk of Absconding 232 ▷ 26

↓ the numbers of the individual decisions	↓ subject	page number ↓
11. Decision No. Up-286/01 , dated 11 December 2003	Detention and Home Detention	238 ▷ 25
12. Decision No. U-I-60/03 , dated 4 December 2003	Judicial Protection with regard to Involuntary Commitment to a Psychiatric Health Care Institution	249 ▷ 28–29
13. Decision No. U-I-294/12 , dated 10 June 2015	Involuntary Commitment of a Person Deprived of Legal Capacity to a Psychiatric Health Care Institution	277 ▷ 29
14. Decision No. Up-333/96 , dated 1 July 1999	The Driving License of a Person Removed from the Register of Permanent Residents	293 ▷ 34
15. Decision No. U-I-145/03 , dated 23 June 2005	Fines for Written Submissions Insulting the Court or Other Party in Proceedings	299 ▷ 24, 36
16. Decision No. U-I-164/09 , dated 4 February 2010	Default Judgment due to Unjustifiable Absence from a Hearing	323 ▷ 35
17. Decision No. U-I-249/96 , dated 12 March 1998	Confiscation of Assets without a Written Judgment	338
18. Decision No. Up-13/99 , dated 8 March 2001	State Liability for Damage Caused during World War II	354 ▷ 23
19. Decision No. U-I-65/05 , dated 22 September 2005	Judicial Protection of the Right to a Trial without Undue Delay	363 ▷ 36, 37, 45
20. Order No. U-I-302/09, Up-1472/09, U-I-139/10, Up-748/10 , dated 12 May 2011	Leave to Appeal to the Supreme Court and the Constitutionality of a Formulaic Reasoning	383 ▷ 35–36
21. Decision No. Up-1177/12, Up-89/14 , dated 28 May 2015	Damages for Removal from the Register of Permanent Residents	393 ▷ 23
22. Decision No. Up-879/14 , dated 20 April 2015	Legality in Criminal Law	411 ▷ 26–27

↓ the numbers of the individual decisions	↓ subject	page number ↓
23. Decision No. Up-34/93 , dated 8 June 1995	A Motion for Evidence on an Alibi Must Be Heard	460 ▷ 27
24. Decision No. U-I-271/08 , dated 24 March 2011	Revealing Confidential Information on Police Informers due to the Rights of the Defence	467 ▷ 27–28
25. Decision No. U-I-60/98 , dated 16 July 1998	Compensation for Unjust Convictions and Confiscated Assets	487 ▷ 39, 40
26. Decision No. Up-50/99 , dated 14 December 2000	Conflict between the Right to Privacy and the Freedom of Expression and Artistic Endeavour	517 ▷ 30
27. Decision No. Up-472/02 , dated 7 October 2004	The Right to One's Voice	526 ▷ 30, 31
28. Decision No. U-I-218/07 , dated 26 March 2009	Limitations regarding Tobacco Products	534 ▷ 29, 45
29. Decision No. Up-2530/06 , dated 15 April 2010	Search and Seizure in a Lawyer's Office	547 ▷ 30
30. Decision No. U-I-40/12 , dated 11 April 2013	The Privacy of Legal Entities	565 ▷ 30, 31–32
31. Decision No. Up-540/11 , dated 13 February 2014	Communication Privacy when Using the Internet	610 ▷ 31
32. Decision No. U-I-92/01 , dated 28 February 2002	Census Questions regarding Religious Affiliation and Nationality	633 ▷ 29, 31, 32, 33
33. Opinion No. Rm-1/02 , dated 19 November 2003	The Agreement between the Republic of Slovenia and the Holy See on Legal Issues	663 ▷ 33, 34, 45
34. Decision No. U-I-111/04 , dated 8 July 2004	Referendum on Building a Mosque	687 ▷ 32
35. Decision No. U-I-92/07 , dated 15 April 2010	The Religious Communities Act	706 ▷ 32–33

↓ the numbers of the individual decisions	↓ subject	page number ↓
36. Decision No. Up-301/96 , dated 15 January 1998	Prohibition of a Political Party	794 ▷ 37
37. Decision No. U-I-106/95 , dated 25 January 1996	Preferential Lists of Candidates Must Be Published in Due Time	815 ▷ 38
38. Decision No. U-I-283/94 , dated 12 February 1998	The Right to Vote of the National Minorities and Positive Discrimination	835 ▷ 38, 39
39. Decision No. U-I-336/96 , dated 4 March 1999	Different Treatment of Extra-Parliamentary Parties is Justified	859 ▷ 38
40. Decision No. Up-2385/08 , dated 9 September 2008	Voters Can Rely on Published Lists of Candidates	864 ▷ 38
41. Decision No. U-I-67/09, Up-316/09 , dated 24 March 2011	Prohibition on Publishing Opinion Polls before Elections	870 ▷ 39
42. Decision No. Mp-1/12 , dated 21 February 2013	Confirmation of the Office of a Member of the National Council	882 ▷ 38
43. Decision No. U-I-266/04 , dated 9 November 2006	All Civilian Victims of War Violence Must Be Treated Equally	897 ▷ 41
44. Decision No. Up-360/05 , dated 2 October 2008	The Core of the Right to a Pension	906 ▷ 41
45. Decision No. U-I-273/98 , dated 1 July 1999	The Competence to Decide on Child Custody	926 ▷ 34
46. Decision No. Up-383/11 , dated 18 September 2013	Children Must Be Treated as Subjects in Judicial Proceedings	941 ▷ 34
47. Decision No. U-I-218/04 , dated 20 April 2006	The Italian and Hungarian Languages Must Be Used in Commerce	960 ▷ 38–39
48. Decision No. U-I-297/08 , dated 7 April 2011	Protection of the Cultural Heritage	969 ▷ 40
49. Decision No. U-I-249/10 , dated 15 March 2012	Collective Agreements in the Public Sector	994 ▷ 41–42

PART II – Constitutional Foundations of the State

50.	Decision No. U-I-159/08 , dated 11 December 2008	Judges' Salaries and the Principle of the Separation of Powers	1017 ▷ 43
51.	Decision No. Up-679/06, U-I-20/07 , dated 10 October 2007	Appointment to the Office of President of a Court	1055 ▷ 37, 43
52.	Decision No. U-I-17/11 , dated 18 October 2012	Cooperation between the National Assembly and the Government on EU Affairs	1086 ▷ 46
53.	Decision No. U-I-146/12 , dated 14 November 2013	The Fiscal Balance Act and Discrimina- tion against Female Civil Servants	1097 ▷ 46
54.	Decision No. U-I-65/13 , dated 3 July 2014	Retention of Electronic Communication Data	1162 ▷ 31
55.	Decision No. U-I-104/01 , dated 14 June 2001	Review of the Constitutionality of a Legislative Procedure	1177
56.	Decision No. U-II-1/10 , dated 10 June 2010	Referendum regarding the Rights of Persons Removed from the Register of Permanent Residents	1210 ▷ 41, 48
57.	Decision No. U-II-1/12, U-II-2/12 , dated 17 December 2012	Referenda on Austerity Measures	1266 ▷ 39, 45
58.	Decision No. U-I-73/94 , dated 25 May 1995	The Principle of Legality in the Work of the State Administration	1304 ▷ 42
59.	Decision No. Up-624/11 , dated 3 July 2014	The Effects of Declaratory Decisions of the Constitutional Court	1310 ▷ 46–47
60.	Decision No. U-I-137/10 , dated 26 November 2010	The Establishment of Municipalities	1321 ▷ 44
61.	Decision No. U-I-178/10 , dated 3 February 2011	The European Financial Stabilization Mechanism	1355 ▷ 43
62.	Decision No. U-I-158/11 , dated 28 November 2013	The Additional Income Tax and Retroactive Effect of Legislation	1372 ▷ 43–44

↓ the numbers of the individual decisions	↓ subject	page number ↓
63. Opinion No. Rm-1/09 , dated 18 March 2010	The Arbitration Agreement between the Government of the Republic of Slovenia and the Government of the Republic of Croatia	1423 ▷ 19
64. Order No. U-I-214/00 , dated 14 September 2000	Competence to Review Constitutional Amendments	1470

	page number ↓
Index	1477
Chronological List of Cases	1489
List of Constitutional Court Judges and Their Separate Opinions	1497

I. INTRODUCTION

On 25 June 1991, with the promulgation of the Basic Constitutional Charter on the Sovereignty and Independence of the Republic of Slovenia<sup>1</sup> and the entry into force of the Constitutional Act implementing this Charter, the Republic of Slovenia became a sovereign and independent state. As the common federative state of Yugoslavia disintegrated, Slovenia re-acquired all the rights and obligations that under its previous constitution as a constituent republic and under the constitution of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had been transferred to the authorities of SFR Yugoslavia. As a result, the Constitutional Court of the Yugoslav Federal Republic of Slovenia, which had functioned as such since January 1964, became the Constitutional Court of the sovereign state of the Republic of Slovenia. The Basic Constitutional Charter proclaimed that the state shall be governed by law and guarantee the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms (hereinafter referred to collectively as human rights).<sup>2</sup> Half a year later, a new Constitution was adopted<sup>3</sup> that established a legal basis for a different social order, one based on respect for free human beings, on the rights they enjoy in accordance with the Constitution, on the principles of a democratic and social state governed by the rule of law, and on the separation of powers. The Constitution defined the Constitutional Court as one of the central authorities of the state, whose task is to ensure that the legislative, executive, and judicial powers, as well as local authorities, observe the Constitution.<sup>4</sup> Thereby, not only was a change in the position of the Constitutional Court in the institutional sense due to the establishment of the sovereign state enacted, but its transformation into a guardian of the Constitution and of the values contained therein was made considerably more important. It is precisely this transformation that qualitatively changed the constitutional case law of the last twenty-five years in this state proclaimed to be a constitutional democracy<sup>5</sup> and that brought about a turning point in the more than fifty years of existence and development of the constitutional judiciary in the Slovene territory.

The first composition of the Constitutional Court in the new sovereign state was the one that started to create the constitutional case law on the basis of these new foundations. Beyond a doubt, they carried out pioneering work. Although the initial period of establishing the new social order was distinctly marked by so-called transitional issues, and despite the fact that the starting points (which are mostly self-evident

---

1 The Constitutional Court of the Republic of Slovenia (hereinafter referred to as the Constitutional Court) characterised this basic constitutional act as “a permanent and inexhaustible constitutional source of the statehood of the Republic of Slovenia,” Opinion No. Rm-1/09, dated 18 March 2010, Point I of the operative provisions.

2 The Preamble to and Section III of the Basic Constitutional Charter.

3 The Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia (hereinafter referred to as the Constitution).

4 See indents one through six of the first paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution.

5 See W. Hassemer, Ustavna demokracija [Constitutional Democracy], Pravnik, 4–5 (2003), p. 214, and A. Teršek, Teorija legitimnosti in sodobno ustavnštvo [The Theory of Legitimacy and Modern Constitutionalism], Univerza na Primorskem, Univerzitetna založba Annales, Koper 2014, pp. 402 and 407–408.

today) of certain fundamental preconditions of constitutional case law had to be developed from the start (which, naturally, took some time), the first composition also succeeded in making an important contribution to respect for human rights and the implementation of constitutional principles. Several milestones can be highlighted in the initial development of the constitutional case law, inter alia, the introduction of the constitutional complaint (and consequently also the Constitutional Court's supervisory function over the judiciary regarding respect for human rights) and the first preliminary opinion on the conformity of a treaty with the Constitution, both of which are completely new competences vested in the Constitutional Court by the Constitution, as well as numerous significant steps that were taken in the interpretation of constitutional provisions. The constitutional judges from subsequent compositions of the Constitutional Court have in some sense continued on the basic path of the new constitutional case law, while they have also further developed<sup>6</sup> and significantly expanded such.

The Constitutional Court interprets the Constitution and these interpretations have a legally binding effect.<sup>7</sup> It is only by these interpretations that the substance of the constitutional provisions is crystallised, as is codetermined, with due consideration given to constitutional principles, by the constitutionally regulated rights and obligations of individuals and legal entities, as well as by the competences of state and local authorities. The concise and general wording of constitutional provisions frequently comes alive only by means of interpretation, whether such concerns defining the substance of rights, the admissibility of the limitation thereof, rules on the harmonious coexistence of people in all forms of social life, or the functioning of the political system, i.e. the institutions of the state or local authorities. Let us thus take a closer look at the image of the Constitution drawn by the interpretations the Constitutional Court made in those key decisions adopted over the previous 25 years that are published in the present collection.

At the outset, the present overview closely examines the constitutional provisions that protect a human being as a person, namely his or her dignity and freedom. Everyone must be equal in this respect; the equal protection of rights must be ensured to everyone, and this is even more important when the rights in question are determined to be human rights. This will be followed by an examination of the fundamental political rights, i.e. the rights that transform a citizen as an object of politics into a subject of politics;<sup>8</sup> these rights are of key importance for the successful functioning of democracy. Freedom in the field of private property and free economic ini-

---

6 The criteria for the admissibility of limitations of human rights, which are based on there being a constitutionally admissible objective for such limitation (the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution) and on the proportionality of the limitation (Article 2 of the Constitution), and which were undoubtedly introduced in the middle of the 1990s by the first composition of the Constitutional Court, obtained their final form by Decision No. U-I-18/02 (dated 24 October 2003), to which the Constitutional Court has repeatedly referred ever since.

7 As already stated in Decision No. U-I-163/99 (dated 23 September 1999), Para. 9. of the reasoning.

8 O. Ihl, Le vote, Montchrestien, Paris 1996, p. 15.

tative are certainly two of the more important rights that distinguish the new constitutional order from the previous one. Even certain important rights stemming from the system of social security are (also) protected as a property right. The principle of the separation of powers was introduced precisely in order to safeguard human rights; it is intended to prevent the abuse of power, namely by means of the constitutionally designed system of checks and balances.<sup>9</sup> Every aspect of the functioning of the state and its institutions (as well as of the institutions of local communities) must be based on law; all that these institutions have not been authorised to undertake in advance by law or on the basis of a law determines the field of freedom of a person. The constitutional order ensures respect for international instruments in force in Slovenia in order to ensure the credibility of the state, namely as an equal member of the international community that fulfils bona fide the assumed international obligations, including those that it assumed in the framework of the transfer of the exercise of certain of its sovereign rights to the institutions of the European Union. The overview concludes by emphasising the binding force and certain legal effects of the decisions of the Constitutional Court, together with some final thoughts on the importance of constitutional case law. In a state governed by the rule of law, the decisions of the constitutional court must be respected, first and foremost by all other state (and local) institutions. This is necessary in order for people to have trust in the law and to freely and in an undisturbed manner follow the path they choose – because they are (must be!) protected by law.

2. A FREE PERSON AND HIS OR HER DIGNITY

At the centre of the constitutional order is human dignity, the legal-ethical foundation of a democratic state.<sup>10</sup> In its essence, human dignity entails that every human being has equal and absolute inner worth because he or she is a human being. Respect for human dignity therefore entails the protection of the inherent worth of the individual against unjustified interferences by and the requirements of the state and society.<sup>11</sup> As the fundamental value, it has a normative expression in numerous

---

9 Since, as Pitamic stated as early as in 1927, “[a]nyone who holds power tends to abuse it; therefore, each branch of power must be limited by another. If the legislative power is not separated from the judicial and executive powers, then there is no freedom [...]”; L. Pitamic, Država [The State], Cankarjeva založba, Ljubljana 1996, p. 100.

10 Decision No. U-I-109/10 (dated 26 September 2011), Para. 6. of the reasoning. This standpoint was implied already in the Basic Constitutional Charter, which represents, together with other independence documents, a fracture with the fundamental value concept of the previous constitutional order (ibidem, Para. 7 of the reasoning). Grad stated that the new constitutional order entails a caesura (break) with regard to the previous one; F. Grad, Razlike med zasnovno prejšnje in nove ustavne ureditve [The Differences Between the Concepts Behind the Previous and the New Constitutional Order], in: Ustava Republike Slovenije z uvodnim komentarjem dr. L. Ude, dr. F. Grada in M. Cerarja ml. in stvarnim kazalom [The Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia with an Introductory Commentary by Dr. L. Ude, Dr. F. Grad, and M. Cerar Jr., and an Index], Uradni list Republike Slovenije, Ljubljana 1992, p. 24.

11 Decision No. U-I-109/10, Para. 8 of the reasoning.

provisions of the Constitution, in particular in those regulating human rights.<sup>12</sup> As a special constitutional principle, respect for human dignity is protected by Article 1 of the Constitution, which regulates the principle of democracy. The latter substantively defines the state as a constitutional democracy, i.e. as a state in which the acts of authorities are legally limited by constitutional principles and human rights, precisely because individuals and their dignity lie at the centre of its existence and functioning. Only such state order is truly democratic in which respect for human dignity is the principal guideline for the functioning of the state.<sup>13</sup> Although the bearers of power in representative bodies of the state and of local communities are elected in free and periodic elections, which is a prerequisite for democracy, they nevertheless are not given the right to act freely thereby. On the contrary, a duty is imposed on them to respect the boundaries that proceed from the constitutional order, whose central principle is precisely the principle of respect for human dignity when exercising their constitutional and statutory powers.<sup>14</sup>

Human life,<sup>15</sup> a person's physical and mental integrity<sup>16</sup> as well as dignity<sup>17</sup> are the highest values within the hierarchy of human rights.<sup>18</sup> The constitutional provisions that protect them are intended to protect individuals from the interferences of the state or its public officials with these rights.<sup>19</sup> In addition, the state has positive obligations with regard to the protection of human rights.<sup>20</sup> The first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution, which regulates the right to judicial protection, does not guarantee the right to a precisely determined type of judicial proceedings.<sup>21</sup> Therefore, it cannot be argued that, in the event a death occurs following the use of force by the police, the state must ensure the relatives of the deceased person the right to prosecute the perpetrators in a criminal procedure. It follows from Article 13 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (hereinafter referred to as the ECHR), as interpreted by the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR), that in such instances the state must provide for an independent investigation that will lead to the establishment of all the relevant facts and circumstances of the death, and in which the relatives of the deceased can effectively participate.<sup>22</sup> The Constitution does not expressly regulate

---

12 Ibidem, Para. 9 of the reasoning.

13 Ibidem, Para. 10 of the reasoning.

14 Ibidem.

15 Article 17 of the Constitution guarantees its inviolability.

16 Inter alia, Article 18 of the Constitution prohibits torture.

17 It is in particular protected in criminal procedures, as determined by Article 21 of the Constitution.

18 Decision No. Up-555/03, Up-827/04 (dated 6 July 2006, hereinafter referred to as Decision No. Up-555/03), Para. 24 of the reasoning.

19 Ibidem, Para. 23 of the reasoning.

20 The first paragraph of Article 5 of the Constitution imposes on the state the obligation to protect human rights in its territory.

21 Decision No. Up-555/03, Para. 28 of the reasoning.

22 Ibidem, Para. 32 of the reasoning.

this right. However, with regard to their protection, the principle of the highest level of protection of human rights must always be observed, as is determined by the fifth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, which ensures a constitutional level to a treaty that provides a higher level of protection of a certain human right than the Constitution.<sup>23</sup> The fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution expressly requires judicial protection of human rights. The mentioned provision must be understood in conjunction with Article 13 of the ECHR so as to also encompass the right to an independent investigation of the circumstances of an incident in which a person dies during an action carried out by the repressive authorities of the state.<sup>24</sup> Thereby, the procedural aspect of the right to life is protected.<sup>25</sup> The Constitution guarantees the latter right as an absolute right, hence it cannot be limited even on the basis of the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, i.e. not even when pursuing the objective of fighting the most severe forms of crime or terrorism.<sup>26</sup> If the state does not act in conformity with the mentioned constitutional obligations, the issue of its liability for damages arises. Article 26 of the Constitution guarantees the right to such damages as a human right. From this Article there follows the general prohibition of exercising power in an unlawful manner, regardless of which branch of power is concerned. The liability of the state to compensate for the damage entails liability for iure imperii conduct,<sup>27</sup> which requires that a specific form of liability be regulated, regarding which the standard rules of civil liability for damages are not appropriate.<sup>28</sup> The illegality is connected with the due conduct of the state, with regard to which the state is not only obliged to refrain from adopting measures by which it would interfere in an inadmissible manner with human rights, but must also protect these rights by its active conduct.<sup>29</sup> The procedural aspect of the right to life imposes on the state the burden of proof in demonstrating that it acted in conformity with the Constitution and the law. If the state does not prove that it has done everything in its power to prevent the death of a person, then its conduct was unlawful.<sup>30</sup>

---

23 As stated in Order No. Up-43/96 (dated 30 May 2000), Para. 12 of the reasoning.

24 Decision No. Up-555/03, Para. 33 of the reasoning.

25 Decision No. Up-679/12 (dated 16 October 2014), Para. 9 of the reasoning.

26 Ibidem, Para. 8 of the reasoning.

27 This also includes liability for systemic deficiencies that can be attributed to the state or its apparatus as such, as well as liability in cases where there is no individualised relation between the bearer of authority and the affected individual. See Decision No. Up-1177/12, Up-89/14 (dated 28 May 2015), Para. 13 of the reasoning. However, it is not unconstitutional if before a domestic court an individual cannot claim damages from a foreign state for its iure imperii conduct, as jurisdictional immunity is an expression of the principle of the equality of states and of respect for the independence and integrity of the other state, and because damages can still be claimed from the foreign state before its national courts. See Decision No. Up-13/99 (dated 8 March 2001), Para. 21 of the reasoning.

28 Decision No. Up-679/12, Para. 11 of the reasoning.

29 Ibidem, Para. 12 of the reasoning.

30 Ibidem, Paras. 9, 13, and 14 of the reasoning.

The prohibition of torture, which is determined by Article 18 of the Constitution, is also an absolute right.<sup>31</sup> What follows therefrom, inter alia, is the obligation of the legislature to regulate the procedure for granting international protection in such a manner that respect for this right will be ensured, which also includes the right of an individual to not be returned to countries where they may face a certain danger, persecution, or where their life, personal integrity, or freedom is endangered in some other manner.<sup>32</sup>

As a general rule, the protection of other human rights is not absolute, which entails that they can be limited and the Constitutional Court will review such limitations as interferences with human rights. However, such interferences are only admissible under strict constitutional conditions – namely if they pursue a constitutionally admissible aim (the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution) and are proportionate (Article 2 of the Constitution).<sup>33</sup> The right to personal liberty (the first paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution) can certainly be included among the central rights of particular importance. Any interferences therewith must be carried out in accordance with the lex certa principle, i.e. the principle of legality, which is the primary element of a state governed by the rule of law and would apply as an imperative constitutional starting point even if the Constitution did not explicitly refer thereto.<sup>34</sup> The detention of an individual entails a severe interference with this right. The executive branch of power must bring the person deprived of liberty before a court without undue delay. In accordance with the first paragraph of Article 20 of the Constitution, the judiciary may only order detention if there exists a reasonable suspicion that the person concerned has already committed a criminal offence, i.e. that the person has already interfered with the constitutionally protected value at issue.<sup>35</sup> With regard to such, when detention is ordered due to the risk of recidivism, the danger to public safety can be constitutionally deduced only if the danger is causally connected to a criminal offence that is reasonably suspected of having been committed.<sup>36</sup> The public safety condition can also refer to criminal offences against property, but only 31 Decision No. U-I-292/09, Up-1427/09 (dated 20 October 2011), Para. 13 of the reasoning.

---

32 Ibidem, Paras. 12 and 14 of the reasoning.

33 Cf. A. Barak, Proportionality, Constitutional Rights and their Limitations, Cambridge 2012, pp. 400–418. Regarding the tests created by constitutional courts for assessing the admissibility of limitations of human rights, see D. Robertson, The Judge as Political Theorist, Contemporary Constitutional Review, Princeton University Press, Woodstock 2010, pp. 33–34, 50–54, 200–204, 300–303, 326–344, and 368–369. Regarding the principle of proportionality and its development in the Slovene constitutional case law, see A. Novak, Predpostavke načela sorazmernosti v ustavnosodnem odločanju [Presuppositions of the Principle of Proportionality in Constitutional Decision-Making], in: M. Pavčnik, A. Novak (Eds.), (Ustavno)sodno odločanje [(Constitutional) Judicial Decision-Making], GV Založba, Ljubljana 2013, pp. 103–181.

34 Decision No. U-I-18/93 (dated 11 April 1996), Paras. 35 and 36 of the reasoning. This principle is also important when cases other than criminal cases are at issue. A limitation of a human right and the determination of the exercise of such right may only be prescribed by a law that is precise and clear. See Decision No. U-I-145/03 (dated 23 June 2005), Para. 25 of the reasoning.

35 Decision No. U-I-18/93, Para. 49 of the reasoning.

36 Ibidem, Para. 48 of the reasoning.

if such criminal offences are serious and interfere with the most important, constitutionally-protected interests of others.<sup>37</sup> The Constitution expressly requires that the interference be absolutely necessary, which entails that it also expressly underlines the principle of the proportionality of the interference.<sup>38</sup> It follows from Article 27 of the Constitution<sup>39</sup> that the burden of proof in criminal proceedings is on the state, that the state carries the risk of failing to provide proof, and that the rule in dubio pro reo applies. Consequently, the burden of proving the existence of a reasonable suspicion and the absolute necessity of detention also must rest on the state prosecutor.<sup>40</sup> In order for an independent court to be able to impartially decide on a motion for detention it has to hear both parties, therefore a hearing is absolutely necessary prior to deciding. If the court then orders detention, it has to give reasons for its decision.<sup>41</sup> What is at issue is not merely the constitutionality of the statutory regulation, but also the constitutionality of its interpretation in individual cases, which is what the Constitutional Court denotes as the procedural aspect of a state governed by the rule of law. The rule of law is also reflected in its institutions and primarily in the manner these institutions actually apply the law in their procedures.<sup>42</sup> Trust in the judiciary (the habeas corpus logic of the first paragraph of Article 20 of the Constitution, which determines the constitutional conditions for ordering detention) does justify a certain measure of discretion, as courts are independent and impartial by law and in fact (Article 23 of the Constitution).<sup>43</sup> Nonetheless, judges must at all times diligently assess whether the constitutional and statutory conditions for ordering detention are fulfilled and determine, in each case, whether an interference with personal liberty is admissible.<sup>44</sup> The interference must be appropriate for achieving the pursued, constitutionally admissible aim, and regarding this matter, i.e. detention, the legislature has actually already performed this assessment. Courts, however, must review whether an interference is necessary – absolutely necessary – in the sense that the aim cannot be achieved by any other means, i.e. by a milder measure, and whether it is proportionate (in the narrower sense)<sup>45</sup> with the aim, i.e. the value that the interference intends to protect.<sup>46</sup> In this regard, it must follow from the established particular circumstances that there is a real risk that the person concerned, if at large, might

---

37 Ibidem, Paras. 53 and 54 of the reasoning.

38 Ibidem, Paras. 58, 59, and 60 of the reasoning.

39 This Article determines the presumption of innocence.

40 Decision No. U-I-18/93, Paras. 67 and 72 of the reasoning.

41 Ibidem, Paras. 69, 72–74, and 76 of the reasoning.

42 Decision No. U-I-18/93, Para. 20 of the reasoning.

43 Ibidem.

44 Decision No. Up-75/95 (dated 7 July 1995), Para. 19 of the reasoning.

45 The Constitutional Court considered home detention to entail a limitation of human rights which in its intensity and the manner of implementation constitutes an interference with personal liberty, and not only an interference with the freedom of movement determined by Article 32 of the Constitution. See Decision No. Up-286/01 (dated 11 December 2003), Para. 15 of the reasoning.

46 Decision No. Up-75/95, Para. 25 of the reasoning.

again commit a particular criminal offence.<sup>47</sup> Or there must exist a risk of absconding based on concrete and proven circumstances with regard to which there exists a high degree of probability that the interested person would flee.<sup>48</sup>

The principle of legality is expressly guaranteed by the Constitution as a special substantive constitutional safeguard relating to the determination of criminal offences (the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution).<sup>49</sup> Constitutional obligations for the legislature follow therefrom, as only a law may regulate which acts are incriminated (lex scripta). The law must be precise, so that it is possible to distinguish between conduct that is criminal and conduct that falls outside the scope of criminal liability (lex certa); this is also the reason for the prohibition of analogia legis and analogia iuris already when criminal offences are determined in the law (lex stricta). The purpose of such substantive constitutional safeguard is that individuals know in advance which acts are incriminated. Only when they know where the border lies in terms of their general right to act freely, which is guaranteed by Article 35 of the Constitution, and acts that are incriminated, can they adjust their conduct. Thereby, they are able to predict what kind of consequences their conscious conduct may produce; for such reason, the legislature must not determine criminal offences retroactively (lex praevia).<sup>50</sup> What the legislature is prohibited from doing and what it is required to do also applies to the interpreter of the law. The courts are obliged to interpret laws in accordance with the Constitution,<sup>51</sup> which also entails that they must respect human rights.<sup>52</sup> The lex scripta requirement brings strictness into the relation between the legislature and the courts, as follows in general from the principle of the separation of powers – by interpreting the law, courts must not include anything in the scope of criminal liability that the legislature did not clearly and precisely include already at an abstract level. The interpretation by the court must remain strictly within the possible meaning of the wording of the statutory provision, which constitutes a constitutional law aspect of the principle of legality that the Constitutional Court has to review within the framework of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution.<sup>53</sup> If any of the statutory elements of the criminal offence determined by the legislature is not encompassed by the conduct of the person concerned, the conviction of a criminal offence entails a violation of the principle of legality. A violation also occurs in the event a court extends the scope of criminal liability when through its interpretation it itself determines that also conduct that the legislature did not include in the scope of criminal liability is criminal.<sup>54</sup> A court must

---

47 Ibidem, Para. 26 of the reasoning.

48 Decision No. Up-185/95 (dated 24 October 1996), Para. 7 of the reasoning.

49 Decision No. Up-879/14 (dated 20 April 2015), Para. 17 of the reasoning.

50 Ibidem.

51 On the duty of the courts to ensure the constitutionally consistent interpretation of statutes, see M. Pavčnik, Ustavnoskladna razlaga (zakona) [(Statutory) Interpretation in Conformity with the Constitution], in: M. Pavčnik, A. Novak, (Eds.), op. cit., pp. 65–101.

52 Decision No. Up-879/14, Para. 18 of the reasoning.

53 Ibidem, Para. 20 of the reasoning.

54 Ibidem, Para. 23 of the reasoning.

define the content of individual facts within the framework of the legally relevant facts and compare them with what the legislature determined to be elements of the criminal offence at the level of the statutory definition of the criminal offence. Only after an assessment is made whether these legally relevant facts and elements of the criminal offence correspond is it possible to review whether the provision of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution has been respected.<sup>55</sup> With regard thereto, a court may not replace the concretisation of one of the statutory elements of the criminal offence with the concretisation of another statutory element of the criminal offence so that they merge with each other and thereby the realisation of the second statutory element automatically also entails the realisation of the first statutory element.<sup>56</sup>

In a criminal procedure, general constitutional procedural guarantees determined by the Constitution in Article 23 (the right to judicial protection), Article 22 (the right to make a statement, the equality of arms, and other rights that follow from the equal protection of rights), and Article 25 (the right to appeal) must be ensured. As a criminal procedure can entail an interference with personal liberty, it is not surprising that procedural guarantees in criminal proceedings are expressly determined by Article 29 of the Constitution. Among them, the Constitution guarantees individuals the right to present all evidence to their benefit (the third indent). However, such does not entail that a court is obligated to hear all the evidence proposed by the defence that could, merely by its content, benefit the defendant. The defence must first satisfy the burden of proof and substantiate the existence and legal relevance of the proposed evidence with the required degree of probability.<sup>57</sup> When in doubt, a motion for evidence submitted by the defence is deemed to benefit the defendant, and the court is obliged to take the evidence unless it is manifestly clear that it cannot corroborate the line of defence. There are no abstract rules that follow from the Constitution regarding the required degree of probability that must be demonstrated in order for a court to hear the evidence. In accordance with the principle of the free assessment of evidence, such is namely a matter to be decided by a court in a concrete case on the basis of a diligent and specific consideration of the evidence.<sup>58</sup> However, the evidence regarding an alibi is legally decisive. Therefore, if the defence demonstrates at least the likelihood of an alibi in its motion for adducing evidence, the court is required to fully verify its existence.<sup>59</sup>

Article 29 of the Constitution also ensures the right of the defendant to challenge incriminating statements in the procedure and to examine the author thereof with respect to such statements.<sup>60</sup> This right also extends to persons protected by the confidentiality of the sources of reports in order to guarantee anonymity to individuals who voluntarily collaborate with the police based on a relationship of trust and in secrecy,

---

55 Ibidem, Para. 25 of the reasoning.

56 Ibidem, Para. 40 of the reasoning.

57 Decision No. Up-34/93 (dated 8 June 1995), Paras. 12 and 13 of the reasoning.

58 Ibidem, Paras. 14 and 15 of the reasoning.

59 Ibidem, Paras. 12 and 15 of the reasoning.

60 Decision No. U-I-271/08 (dated 24 March 2011), Para. 17 of the reasoning.

as well as to persons carrying out undercover investigative measures in pre-trial procedures, where even the identity of these persons is confidential information. It is only admissible to withhold such evidence from a defendant if this is necessary and if the interference with his or her right to the disclosure of important information is counterbalanced by appropriate proceedings before a court in which the requirements of adversarial proceedings and the equality of arms are respected and in which adequate safeguards for the protection of the interests of the defendant are ensured.<sup>61</sup> For such reason, the measure of not disclosing a witness's identity is necessary and proportionate only if a serious danger to his or her life or person exists or there are other substantial reasons in the public interest, while at the same time the possibility to examine such a witness upon the application of protective measures is ensured.<sup>62</sup> It follows from the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution that a judge and not the executive branch of power must have the final say on this matter. Namely, only if the court knows the identity of a witness can it apply the mentioned protective measures and thereby, while diligently weighing the issues, balance the weight of the interference with the defendant's rights against the benefit of the constitutionally admissible aim.<sup>63</sup>

Interferences with the right to personal liberty, however, do not occur only in criminal proceedings. Involuntary commitment to a closed ward of a psychiatric hospital entails a severe interference with this right as well, which furthermore also constitutes an interference with the right to the protection of one's mental integrity (Article 35 of the Constitution) and with the prohibition of involuntary treatment (the third paragraph of Article 51 of the Constitution).<sup>64</sup> The inviolability of one's mental integrity, which in addition to the inviolability of one's physical integrity is guaranteed by Article 35 of the Constitution, entails, in particular, the prohibition of any interference with the freedom to make decisions, i.e. the right to self-determination.<sup>65</sup> A law may prescribe such an interference only if due to a mental disorder the patient is incapable of making by him- or herself a wilful and deliberate decision on treatment, due to which the deprivation of liberty and involuntary treatment are absolutely necessary because the patient poses a serious danger to him- or herself, or to others.<sup>66</sup> The safeguards guaranteed by the third paragraph of Article 19 that are applicable during the deprivation of liberty must also be ensured in such cases. This entails that such a person must have the right to the legal assistance of a counsel at the state's expense. He or she must be ensured the right to judicial protection,<sup>67</sup> as follows from the first paragraph of Article 23 and the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution. The court must in any event enable the involuntarily committed person to make statements (Article 22 of the Constitution). If such a person is

---

61 Ibidem, Paras. 14 and 18 of the reasoning.

62 Ibidem, Para. 26 of the reasoning.

63 Ibidem, Paras. 19 and 27 of the reasoning.

64 Decision No. U-I-60/03 (4 December 2003), Para. 7 of the reasoning.

65 Ibidem, Para. 9 of the reasoning.

66 Ibidem, Paras. 8, 11, and 22 of the reasoning.

67 Ibidem, Paras. 12–14 and 19 of the reasoning.

incapable of understanding and invoking his or her rights, the person must be provided appropriate representation.<sup>68</sup> The right of a person with a mental disorder to make a statement is so important that it cannot be automatically presumed that the person concerned does not have the capacity to consent, even if he or she has been deprived of legal capacity due to this disorder and he or she has a legal representative. Therefore, in order to place such a person in a secure ward of a social care institution, which entails an interference with the right to personal liberty, the consent of the person's legal representative does not suffice; namely, in each individual case it has to be separately determined whether the person consents (or is capable of consenting) to the deprivation of his or her personal liberty.<sup>69</sup>

The provisions of the Constitution that protect human dignity, personality rights, privacy, and safety hold a special position among human rights.<sup>70</sup> The right to personal dignity determined by Article 34 of the Constitution<sup>71</sup> guarantees a person recognition of the inherent worth he or she has as a human being and from which stems the person's ability to make independent decisions. It also follows from this human right that personality rights are guaranteed to everyone (Article 35 of the Constitution). Personality rights protect those elements of an individual's personality that are not protected by other provisions of the Constitution, rather it is only by all of them together that individuals are given an opportunity to develop freely and to live their lives as they decide. The general right to act freely is also included in the scope thereof – in a state governed by the rule of law a person is permitted to do everything that is not prohibited.<sup>72</sup> However, this does not entail that unlimited and abstract “natural” freedom is guaranteed; what is at issue is the legally determined freedom, which is subject to limitations, yet protected within such boundaries. Limitations that are necessary due to the interests of others and society as a whole do not entail an interference with the general right to act freely, but define its constitutionally protected substance.<sup>73</sup> The general right to act freely enables individuals to do what they will with themselves, to choose their own lifestyle, develop their personality, and live their personal life as they choose.<sup>74</sup>

The Constitution protects privacy as a general right to privacy as determined by Article 35 of the Constitution and by special rights that protect spatial (the first paragraph of Article 36), communication (the first paragraph of Article 38), and information privacy (the first paragraph of Article 38). The right to privacy establishes, for individuals, a sphere of their own intimate functioning in which they may decide by themselves – and this is guaranteed by the state – which interferences therewith they will allow. It is limited by the protection of the rights of others, often by the freedom

---

68 Ibidem, Para. 21 of the reasoning.

69 Decision No. U-I-294/12 (dated 10 June 2015), Para. 18 of the reasoning.

70 Decision No. U-I-92/01 (dated 28 February 2002), Para. 24 of the reasoning.

71 This Article determines that everyone has the right to personal dignity and safety.

72 Decision No. U-I-218/07 (dated 26 March 2009), Para. 8 of the reasoning.

73 Ibidem, Para. 9 of the reasoning.

74 Ibidem, Para. 10 of the reasoning.

of expression, and by the behaviour of an individual in public. The less intimate the sphere of an individual's private life is, the smaller the scope of legal protection it enjoys when it comes into collision with the rights of others. Therefore, in the framework of the freedom of expression determined by the first paragraph of Article 39 of the Constitution and the right to free artistic endeavour determined by Article 59 of the Constitution, an author has the right to describe in his or her work, without their consent, the persons with whom he or she has come into contact and the events he or she has experienced therewith, if these are persons from public life or persons exposed to public interest in connection with a particular matter. However, an author may not, without the consent of the affected person, publish matters from their intimate or family lives.<sup>75</sup> The freedom of expression also includes the right to advertise for commercial purposes; however, such interferences with privacy are not admissible without the consent of the persons concerned.<sup>76</sup>

A person's privacy refers, in the context of a person's existence, to the more or less complete whole of his or her behaviours and involvements, feelings, and relations, for which it is characteristic and essential that the person shapes and maintains it alone or alone with those near to him or her with whom he or she lives in intimate community and that he or she lives in such community with a sense of being protected against intrusion by the public or any other undesired person.<sup>77</sup> Matters that may not be revealed include personal matters that the individual wishes to keep hidden and which by the nature of the matter or with regard to moral or otherwise established rules of conduct in society have such status.<sup>78</sup> The spatial aspect of privacy is protected where an individual justifiably expects to be left undisturbed, with regard to which it is not the space as such that is protected, but the individual's privacy in that space.<sup>79</sup> The communication aspect of privacy protects the individual's interest that the state or uninvited third persons do not learn of the content of a message that he or she transfers via any means that allows remote exchange or transfer of information. It also includes the individual's interest in controlling to whom, to what degree, and under which conditions he or she will transmit a certain message. In such context, both free and uncontrolled communication and thus the protection of the confidentiality of the relations into which the individual enters when communicating, as well as how the communication took place, who initiated it, with whom he or she initiated it, and whether it took place at all, are protected.<sup>80</sup> This entails that

---

75 Decision No. Up-50/99 (dated 14 December 2000), Para. 7 of the reasoning.

76 Ibidem, Para. 9 of the reasoning.

77 Decision No. Up-472/02 (dated 7 October 2004), Para. 10 of the reasoning.

78 Decision No. U-I-40/12 (dated 11 April 2013), Para. 14 of the reasoning.

79 Ibidem, Para. 15 of the reasoning. In the event of a search of a lawyer's office it does not suffice to only observe the spatial aspect of privacy, as the privacy of such office is significantly characterised by aspects that are connected with the nature of the confidential relationship between the lawyer and his or her clients. Namely, lawyers have the duty to protect the professional secrecy and rights (including human rights) of their clients. Decision No. Up-2530/06 (dated 15 April 2010), Paras. 7 and 8 of the reasoning.

80 Decision No. U-I-40/12, Para. 16 of the reasoning.

also traffic data processed for the transmission of communications in an electronic communications network are protected; with regard to such data, the individual's expectation of privacy (which he or she clearly demonstrates outwardly) regarding particular data is important, as well as the legitimacy of such expectation, which is a reflection of the fact that society is willing to accept such expectation as legitimate.<sup>81</sup> An integral part of one's privacy is the right of a person to his or her own voice; the personality of a person is namely reflected in his or her words. Everyone may decide on their own on the appearance of their personality that they convey in communication with others, as well as on who may hear the content of his or her communication. Therefore, every person is entitled to decide whether his or her voice shall be recorded and thereby, through a sound carrier, transmitted to third persons, whereby the words and the voice become separated from the person and independent.<sup>82</sup> A recording gives power over another person, over his or her personal asset, as it enables repetition. Communication is safeguarded against the threat that words could be used as evidence against the person who uttered them.<sup>83</sup> Therefore, if a person's communication is recorded without his or her knowledge, this entails an interference with this person's privacy, which can be admissible under the general conditions under which limitations of human rights are admissible.<sup>84</sup>

Any collecting and processing of personal data entails an interference with the right to privacy, i.e. with the right of individuals to keep information regarding themselves private. An interference with information privacy is admissible if a law precisely defines which data may be collected and processed, the purpose for which it may be used, and prescribes control over the collection, processing, and use of the collected personal data, as well as protection of the confidentiality thereof.<sup>85</sup>

In certain instances, some of the rights that the Constitution guarantees to natural persons as human rights also need to be recognised to legal entities as their constitutional rights if the substance and legal nature of these rights can apply thereto. The right to free economic initiative (the first paragraph of Article 74 of the Constitution) belongs, as a human right, to individuals. In order to be able to exercise it, they have the right to establish legal entities. The possibility to establish legal entities in order to enable collective functioning in a field of common interests is also one of the aspects of the freedom of association (the second paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution), which equally belongs to individuals. Therefore, legal entities are important also for exercising the human rights of natural persons, hence their constitutional protection is necessary, stemming from the need to protect natural persons.<sup>86</sup> The Constitution ensures legal entities equal protection of certain rights, 81 Decision No. Up-540/11 (dated 13 February 2014), Paras. 13 and 14 of the reasoning.

---

82 Decision No. Up-472/02, Para. 10 of the reasoning.

83 Ibidem.

84 Ibidem, Para. 14 of the reasoning.

85 Decision No. U-I-92/01, Para. 27 of the reasoning, and Decision No. U-I-65/13 (dated 3 July 2014), Para. 16 of the reasoning.

86 Decision No. U-I-40/12, Paras. 17 and 18 of the reasoning.

e.g. protection in the field of property, freedom of expression, the general right to act freely, constitutional procedural guarantees, and free economic initiative. Other rights are provided a lower degree of protection, whereas some rights are not protected by the Constitution at all.<sup>87</sup> Legal entities enjoy the constitutional right to privacy adapted to their legal nature only in a narrower sphere in which they can expect to be left undisturbed and where only state interferences of such magnitude that they correspond to the term search referred to in the second paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution are allowed.<sup>88</sup> Legal entities may also legitimately expect privacy as regards communications at a distance that they consider confidential.<sup>89</sup> Religious and other beliefs constitute another aspect of one's privacy.<sup>90</sup> From the freedom of religion (the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution), taking into account also international human rights instruments binding on the state in accordance with Article 8 of the Constitution, there are three levels of this freedom that are guaranteed to individuals, namely the right to freely choose one's religion, or the right to freely change it, and the right to not have a religion. The freedom of religion enables individuals to profess their religion either alone or in community with others, in public<sup>91</sup> or in private, by teaching, performing religious duties, observance, and carrying out religious rituals, which is what constitutes the positive aspect of the freedom of religion. The right of individuals to associate with others in establishing religious communities is a special aspect of the freedom of association.<sup>92</sup> It is crucial for the profession of religion within a community that religious communities be allowed to build religious buildings in a manner that is traditional for the profession of a particular faith, their religious rituals, and customs. This aspect also follows from the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution, which determines that religious communities may pursue their activities freely.<sup>93</sup> The freedom of their establishment, organisation, and performance of religious rites, and the enactment of other religious matters is guaranteed, even in public life, however, they must act in accordance with the general legal order.<sup>94</sup> This follows already from the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution, although their autonomy is also ensured in particular as a fundamental constitutional principle by the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution. Therefore, religious communities must be provided such

---

87 Ibidem, Paras. 18 and 19 of the reasoning.

88 Ibidem, Para. 24 of the reasoning.

89 Ibidem, Para. 26 of the reasoning.

90 Decision No. U-I-92/01 (dated 28 February 2002), Para. 24 of the reasoning.

91 No one's freedom of religion can be affected just because the activities of a free democratic society also encompass a religious aspect, which is expressed by citizens who are committed to their own religions as adherents. Decision No. U-I-92/07 (dated 15 April 2010), Para. 83 of the reasoning.

92 In such manner, also religious communities are ensured their own freedom of conscience. In this respect, individuals also have the right to not join a religious community. Decision No. U-I-92/07, Paras. 87 and 89 of the reasoning.

93 Decision No. U-I-111/04 (dated 8 July 2004), Paras. 28 and 29 of the reasoning.

94 Decision No. U-I-92/07, Para. 106 of the reasoning.

legal forms that allow for the greatest possible autonomy in the exercise of religious freedom.<sup>95</sup> The funding of religious communities is not an obligation of the state that follows from the first paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution, yet this does not entail that the state may not nevertheless provide such funding. However, funding may reach only the border delineated by the principle of the separation of the state and religious communities and in particular the guarantee of state neutrality, which prohibits the provision of such support that would entail the (even symbolic) identification of the state with a religion or a religious community.<sup>96</sup>

The right not to declare a religion is the negative aspect of freedom of religion (the second paragraph of Article 41 of the Constitution).<sup>97</sup> In a conflict between the positive and the negative aspects of freedom of religion, weighing must be carried out on a case-by-case basis and which aspect of this freedom must be given priority in accordance with the principle of proportionality must be reviewed.<sup>98</sup>

The state may not interfere with the freedom of conscience, hence it may not require anyone, either directly or indirectly, to accept a certain religious belief, and it may not use coercive measures or offer privileges for affiliation or non-affiliation with a specific religious or other belief.<sup>99</sup> Freedom of religion enjoys absolute protection against interferences by the state.<sup>100</sup> However, the state also has positive obligations. It must ensure tolerance among adherents of different beliefs, it must prevent unjustified differentiation on these grounds, it must enable access to religious care in certain situations, and it must allow religious communities to acquire a legal personality.<sup>101</sup> The principle of the separation of the state and religious communities determined by the first paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution requires the neutrality of the state towards all religious communities and prohibits the state from identifying with a certain religious community and from introducing a state religion; it also prohibits the promotion or prohibition of ideological beliefs.<sup>102</sup> It entails the religious, i.e. ideological, neutrality of the state, the autonomy of religious communities in their own sphere, and the equal relation of the state towards all religious communities.<sup>103</sup> The principle of the equality of religious communities (the second paragraph of Article 7 of the Constitution) is a specific expression of the general principle of equality before the law determined by the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution.<sup>104</sup> The principle of the separation of the state and religious communities does not prevent

---

95 Ibidem, Para. 116 of the reasoning.

96 Ibidem, Paras. 130 and 146 of the reasoning.

97 Decision No. U-I-92/01, Para. 17 of the reasoning, and Decision No. U-I-92/07, Para. 85 of the reasoning.

98 Ibidem, Para. 86 of the reasoning.

99 Decision No. U-I-92/01, Para. 18 of the reasoning.

100 Decision No. U-I-92/07, Para. 82 of the reasoning.

101 Ibidem, Para. 94 of the reasoning.

102 Ibidem, Para. 98 of the reasoning.

103 Ibidem, Para. 99 of the reasoning. See also Opinion No. Rm-1/02 (dated 19 November 2003), Paras. 18 and 20 of the reasoning.

104 Decision No. U-I-92/07, Para. 109 of the reasoning.

religious communities from performing activities in different areas of social life. However, due to the principle of state sovereignty, only the state may set the limits within which and the conditions under which the performance of tasks pertaining to the competence of the state may be entrusted to the private sphere. With regard to such, the state must ensure the basic equality of all citizens, irrespective of whether they are believers or not (the first paragraph of Article 14 and the first and second paragraphs of Article 41 of the Constitution).<sup>105</sup>

The first paragraph of Article 54 of the Constitution determines that parents have the right and duty to maintain, educate, and raise their children. This duty of parents corresponds to the right of children to be cared for and raised by their parents (the first paragraph of Article 56 of the Constitution). In this manner, the Constitution draws attention to the fact that parental care and the right of children to the independent development of their personality are intertwined.<sup>106</sup> The state may not, in principle, interfere with the relationship between parents and children; it must, however, adopt rules that will enable the actual establishment and protection of such relationships. The procedure for deciding on the exercise of parental care and the maintaining of contact between children and their parents who do not live together forms part of these rules. The affected persons must have the possibility to participate in such procedures in a manner that allows for the protection of their rights. In accordance with Article 22 and the first paragraph of Article 56 of the Constitution, children who are capable of forming an opinion also have the right to express their opinion in such proceedings.<sup>107</sup> A child is a person who must be respected as such also within the family circle, and therefore his or her will should be considered in accordance with his or her age and maturity, as long as such will is consistent with his or her best interests. This right of a child is based on his or her right to personal dignity determined by Article 34 of the Constitution, which corresponds to the duty of responsible parents to ensure respect for such rights of their children.<sup>108</sup>

3. EQUALITY AND CERTAIN CONSTITUTIONAL PROCEDURAL GUARANTEES

Equality before the law as determined by the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution entails that regulations shall apply to each individual in a non-arbitrary manner. In judicial proceedings, this implies that courts are required to treat equal situations equally without taking into consideration personal circumstances that are not determined to be decisive by the legal norm.<sup>109</sup>

The principle of non-discrimination on the basis of personal circumstances with regard to human rights (the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution) requires substantive equal treatment and the enactment of the principle of equal opportunities. Within a certain scope and under certain conditions, this includes the prevention

---

105 Opinion No. Rm-1/02, Para. 25 of the reasoning.

106 Decision No. U-I-273/98 (dated 1 July 1999), Para. 13 of the reasoning.

107 Ibidem, Para. 14 of the reasoning.

108 Decision No. Up-383/11 (dated 18 September 2013), Para. 16 of the reasoning.

109 Decision No. Up-333/96 (dated 1 July 1999), Paras. 8 and 9 of the reasoning.

of de facto or indirect discrimination when due to an apparently neutral regulation a person is placed in a less favourable position compared to other persons and is thus discriminated against. There exists an inequality in the effects of the legal regulation, not in the legal regulation itself.<sup>110</sup> In the event a regulation is discriminatory against a social group characterised by a certain personal circumstance, it is unconstitutional to refrain from determining an exception to the general norm, namely to prevent the marginalisation of that social group.<sup>111</sup> Consequently, in order to ensure de facto – substantive – equality to persons with disabilities, measures designed to ensure their independence, as well as social and occupational integration, must be adopted. Failure to adopt such is reviewed as an interference with the right to non-discriminatory treatment that follows from the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution.<sup>112</sup> In instances that do not entail indirect discrimination, a regulation nevertheless interferes with the right to non-discriminatory treatment if it treats an individual with a certain personal circumstance differently, with regard to a human right, than a person not characterised by such personal circumstance, even though both individuals are in comparable positions with regard to essential actual and legal aspects.<sup>113</sup> Although not expressly mentioned therein, sexual orientation is one of the personal circumstances referred to by the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution.<sup>114</sup>

The right to an adversarial procedure (Article 22 of the Constitution) guarantees parties that courts will treat them as active participants in proceedings and enable them to effectively defend their rights and thereby give them the opportunity to actively influence decisions in cases concerning their rights and interests, in such a manner that they are treated as ends and not means. In this regard, the right to an adversarial procedure is based on respect for human personality.<sup>115</sup> The corollary to the right of a party to make statements is the obligation of courts to take note of all the legal and factual allegations of the party and also to adopt a position in the reasoning of the judgment on those allegations that are admissible and significant for the decision.<sup>116</sup> The constitutional law significance of the reasoning of a judicial decision lies in providing insight into the reasons for the very decision, in particular for the party that was unsuccessful in the proceedings. This demonstrates the autonomous nature of the reasoning as an independent dimension of the right to a fair trial, which is also one of the aspects of the right determined by Article 22 of the Constitution.<sup>117</sup> However, this 110 Decision No. U-I-146/07 (dated 13 November 2008), Paras. 15–17 of the reasoning.

---

111 Ibidem, Paras. 18 and 19 of the reasoning.

112 Ibidem, Para. 28 of the reasoning. By this Decision, the Constitutional Court established the unconstitutionality of the regulation of civil procedure that did not provide blind and partially sighted persons the possibility to review procedural materials in a form that is accessible to them. Today, courts can provide such persons documents in Braille printed at the state's expense.

113 Decision No. U-I-425/06 (dated 2 July 2009), Paras. 7 and 12 of the reasoning.

114 Ibidem, Para. 13 of the reasoning.

115 Decision No. U-I-164/09 (dated 4 February 2010), Para. 13 of the reasoning.

116 Ibidem.

117 Order No. U-I-302/09, Up-1472/09, U-I-139/10, Up-748/10 (dated 12 May 2011), Para. 8 of the reasoning.

right is not absolute, it is not always applied in the same manner; it depends on the nature of the decision and on the circumstances of the particular case – it is narrower in scope when it concerns decisions against which there is no legal remedy.<sup>118</sup>

Parties cannot effectively exercise their right to make statements unless they are previously given the opportunity to review the entire body of procedural materials. An essential element of the right to the equal treatment of parties in civil proceedings is the requirement of the equality of arms, which entails that the parties to proceedings before the court must be guaranteed equal procedural positions. The right determined by Article 22 of the Constitution is a central provision that guarantees a fair trial, a part of thereof being the right to use of one's own language and script in judicial proceedings, even though this right is specifically protected by Article 62 of the Constitution.<sup>119</sup>

The purpose of words delivered before the court by a party is to effectively exercise constitutional procedural safeguards and this constitutes an integral part of the right to make statements determined by Article 22 of the Constitution.<sup>120</sup> As regards judicial proceedings, it is by their very nature necessary that the manner and form of carrying out procedural activities, including making statements, be regulated and subject to certain formal requirements, inter alia also concerning the manner of making statements. The procedure may be regulated by law in such a manner that it prohibits parties from making statements in an offensive or defamatory manner.<sup>121</sup> The right to make statements does not give parties the right to make any kind of statement before the court, as this right is guaranteed in connection with the right to effective judicial protection and thus refers only to statements that are important for the decision in the judicial proceedings at issue.<sup>122</sup> Criticism of a court can always be stated, however, such criticism can always be stated in a manner that does not damage the reputation of the court or the entire judiciary, or entail a personal attack on a judge's capacity to perform judicial office.<sup>123</sup> The trust of the public in the judiciary and the reputation and authority of the judiciary are the reasons why the judiciary enjoys special protection, in comparison to the other two branches of power. Building such respect and trust is primarily a task of the judiciary itself, which it can accomplish by conducting proceedings lawfully and appropriately, by adopting substantively correct and lawful decisions, and by providing well-substantiated reasoning for its decisions.<sup>124</sup>

The right to judicial protection (the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution) entails the right to obtain from the court a decision on the merits of the case and the right that the judgment be enforced.<sup>125</sup> An integral part thereof is the right to

---

118 Ibidem, Para. 9 of the reasoning.

119 Decision No. U-I-146/07, Para. 12 of the reasoning.

120 Decision No. U-I-145/03, Para. 5 of the reasoning.

121 Ibidem, Para. 6 of the reasoning.

122 Ibidem, Para. 8 of the reasoning.

123 Ibidem.

124 Ibidem, Para. 9 of the reasoning.

125 Decision No. U-I-65/05 (dated 22 September 2005), Para. 7 of the reasoning.

an impartial judge, which requires that the judge is not associated with a party or the disputed subject in such a manner that could possibly cause or at least raise a justified suspicion that, concerning the dispute, the judge could no longer decide objectively, impartially, and by considering exclusively legal criteria.<sup>126</sup> In this regard, both the subjective and objective criteria have to be taken into account; the former concerns a determination of the personal beliefs of a judge, while the latter concerns a review of whether in the proceedings the judge ensured the implementation of procedural safeguards in such a manner that any justified doubt concerning his or her impartiality is excluded – so that also the appearance of the impartiality of the trial is guaranteed, in order to ensure the trust of the public in the impartiality of the courts in general as well as in the case at issue.<sup>127</sup> An essential part of the right to judicial protection is also the right to a trial without undue delay, which ensures everyone the possibility to assert his or her rights in judicial proceedings within a reasonable time.<sup>128</sup> In accordance with the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, this right must also enjoy judicial protection, which requires – in accordance with the fifth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution and the positions stated in the judgments of the ECtHR, which are binding even if they were not adopted in a case against Slovenia – that the state award appropriate satisfaction to persons whose right to a trial without undue delay was violated in judicial proceedings that have already been concluded.<sup>129</sup> Such entails compensation for the failure to fulfil the positive obligation of the state to ensure a judicial system that enables individuals to obtain a judicial decision within a reasonable time.<sup>130</sup>

4. FUNDAMENTAL POLITICAL RIGHTS

The right of assembly and association (Article 42 of the Constitution) is a fundamental human right that allows for the free expression of opinion, the formation of one's political will, and self-organisation. It also encompasses the right to establish political parties and that they can carry out their activities. It is the starting point of a multiparty political system and includes ensuring equal opportunities for all political parties, comprising the right to establish an opposition and to participate therein in accordance with the Constitution.<sup>131</sup> Political parties may not be excluded from political life if they employ legitimate means to fight regulations or even specific constitutional institutions; their exclusion is only permitted if they intend to undermine the fundamental values of a free democratic constitutional state. Deciding whether their activities are unconstitutional falls under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court.<sup>132</sup>

---

126 Decision No. Up-679/06, U-I-20/07 (dated 10 October 2007), Para. 41 of the reasoning.

127 Ibidem, Para. 42 of the reasoning.

128 Decision No. U-I-65/05, Para. 8 of the reasoning.

129 Ibidem, Para. 12 of the reasoning.

130 Ibidem, Para. 13 of the reasoning.

131 Decision No. Up-301/96 (dated 15 January 1998), Paras. 11 and 12 of the reasoning.

132 Ibidem, Paras. 16 and 18 of the reasoning.

The principle of democracy (Article 1 of the Constitution) entails that public affairs are decided by the citizens directly (by referendum) or indirectly (through elected representatives). With regard to representative democracy in the field of elections, the principles of free, universal, and equal suffrage (the first paragraph of Article 43 of the Constitution), as well as the principles of direct and secret elections, derive from the principle of democracy; if the electoral system is in accordance with these principles and if periodic elections and the equal opportunity of all political parties in the state to compete at elections are guaranteed, elections are democratic.<sup>133</sup> It is not only the elections to the National Assembly, which is the general representative body, that are carried out in accordance with these principles, but also – on the basis of the right to vote and the right to stand for election determined by the second paragraph of Article 43 of the Constitution – the election of the members of the National Council, which is one of the constitutionally defined state authorities with competences in the legislative procedure.<sup>134</sup> The principle of universal suffrage entails that the right to vote and the right to stand for election are not restricted by conditions that are based on an individual's personal circumstances.<sup>135</sup> This principle does not prohibit the legislature from determining the conditions for candidacies. Such conditions ensure that only such candidates who have at least a minimal chance of being elected stand for election, the transparency of elections is ensured, presentations of political programmes and candidates as well as confrontations between the latter are made possible, and the splitting of votes is prevented.<sup>136</sup> Expressing support for a list of candidates enables the exercise of the voters' right to vote and, at the same time, the right of the candidates to stand for election.<sup>137</sup> A political party or other authorised person submitting a list of candidates is obliged to submit a complete (lawful) list in due time. However, such does not imply that he or she is required to verify the accuracy of the data contained in the confirmations issued as authentic instruments by the competent national authorities; he or she may justly rely thereon.<sup>138</sup> The principle of the equality of voting rights requires that each voter has the same number of votes and that these votes have the same value.<sup>139</sup> The special voting right of the members of the Italian and Hungarian national communities, to whom special rights are guaranteed by Article 64 of the Constitution,<sup>140</sup> entails a double vote

---

133 Decision No. U-I-106/95 (dated 25 January 1996), Paras. 4 and 7 of the reasoning. In such manner, the Constitutional Court defined, many years before the Venice Commission did the same, the fundamental electoral principles that in accordance with the Code of Good Practice in Electoral Matters are considered to be a part of the European electoral heritage.

134 Decision No. Mp-1/12 (dated 21 February 2013), Para. 7 of the reasoning.

135 Decision No. U-I-106/95, Para. 8 of the reasoning.

136 Decision No. U-I-336/96 (dated 4 March 1999), Para. 5 of the reasoning.

137 Decision No. Up-2385/08 (dated 9 September 2008), Para. 5 of the reasoning.

138 Ibidem, Para. 7 of the reasoning.

139 Decision No. U-I-283/94 (dated 12 February 1998), Para. 34 of the reasoning.

140 The protection of national minorities is implemented also by the provision of special rights that only minorities are entitled to – by measures of positive discrimination, members of minorities are provided a high that is provided by the Constitution as an instance of positive discrimination.<sup>141</sup>

The freedom of the press (the first paragraph of Article 39 of the Constitution) is one of the key institutional conditions for the effectiveness of the democratic process. The latter depends on fair elections at all levels and on public supervision of all three branches of power. The freedom to inform the public is required in order for the public to be able to supervise the authorities, and provides for the effective functioning of the political opposition.<sup>142</sup> The vital role played by the mass media in supervising the authorities means that it is crucial that it is permitted to function freely, including when monitoring the processes through which people establish state power (i.e. through elections) or directly exercise such power (i.e. by referendum). Elections or referenda can only be deemed fair when the true will of the people has been expressed and when the public has been extensively and comprehensively informed throughout the process.<sup>143</sup> During elections, the freedom of expression must be considered in light of the right to free elections, therefore it is of particular importance that in the period preceding elections opinions and information are permitted to circulate freely. Any restrictions on such are only admissible if this is necessary in order to ensure that the people are able to freely express their political will.<sup>144</sup>

The right to request a legislative referendum is an important constitutional right that in an established constitutional democracy enables individual issues to not be definitively decided on by an elected representative body, but that a law that such body has already adopted be referred to the voters in order to be confirmed or rejected.<sup>145</sup> If such right is successfully exercised, the voters decide on the entry into force of such law in a referendum, thereby exercising power directly by exercising the right to decide in a referendum.<sup>146</sup>

5. PROPERTY

The constitutionally guaranteed right to private property as a human right (Article 33 of the Constitution) grants an individual liberty with regard to property. Property is a basic human right that is closely linked to the protection of personal liberty. Its function is to enable everyone to shape his or her life freely and responsibly.<sup>147</sup> The legal order determines what the subject of the private property is and what the protected entitlements that arise from the property are, taking into account economic and social relationships. At the same time, the content of property as a legal concept depends on the functions assigned to it by the legal system. The right to property is composed degree of protection that is recognised to them by the majority, and which thereby emphasise the democratic character of the society. Decision No. U-I-218/04 (dated 20 April 2006), Para. 10 of the reasoning.

---

141 Decision No. U-I-283/94, Para. 35 of the reasoning.

142 Decision No. U-I-67/09, Up-316/09 (dated 24 March 2011), Para. 8 of the reasoning.

143 Ibidem.

144 Ibidem, Para. 12 of the reasoning.

145 Decision No. U-II-1/12, U-II-2/12 (dated 17 December 2012), Para. 21 of the reasoning.

146 Ibidem.

147 Decision No. U-I-60/98 (dated 16 July 1998), Para. 22 of the reasoning.

of various entitlements, the content of which must be regulated by the legal order. Therefore, the substance of the constitutional concept of property is only provided by statutory regulation.<sup>148</sup> Individuals cannot exercise the entitlements stemming from their property without any limitations, but must also take into consideration the interests of other members of the community, and the community as a whole. In accordance with the Constitution, the definition of property includes its social, economic, and environmental functions (the first paragraph of Article 67 of the Constitution).<sup>149</sup> The positive obligations of the state determined by the first paragraph of Article 5 of the Constitution also include the obligation to preserve the cultural heritage, which the Constitution placed on a par with the protection of human rights and general constitutional principles. The cultural heritage is in particular protected by Article 73 of the Constitution, which obliges everyone to protect cultural monuments classified as cultural heritage (the first paragraph); in addition to the state, local communities are also obligated to promote the preservation of the cultural heritage (the second paragraph). From the mentioned provisions there follows the obligation of the legislature to regulate the substance and scope of the cultural heritage, as well as the manner in which it is protected today, in order to be preserved for future generations.<sup>150</sup> The measures by which the legislature protects cultural objects also affect the substance of property enjoyed by the owners of elements of the cultural heritage.<sup>151</sup> The first paragraph of Article 67 and Article 73 of the Constitution authorise the legislature to define the content of the right to property by law and to regulate the manner in which it is acquired and enjoyed in order to ensure its social function – in this case, preserving the cultural heritage.<sup>152</sup> Deprivation of property rights as regards movable objects has no legal basis in Article 69 of the Constitution;<sup>153</sup> such is only admissible on the basis of a law under the conditions determined by the third paragraph of Article 15 (the test of legitimacy) and Article 2 (the test of proportionality) of the Constitution, and may only be carried out in individual procedures in which respect for private property and compensation for the deprivation of property rights are guaranteed.<sup>154</sup>

6. SOCIAL SECURITY RIGHTS AND THE FREEDOM OF TRADE UNIONS

The core of the right to a pension determined by the first paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution, which includes a statutory reservation, is to ensure that individuals, on the basis of paid pension insurance contributions and provided that other reasonably determined statutory conditions are fulfilled, obtain and enjoy a pension

---

148 Decision No. U-I-297/08 (dated 7 April 2011), Para. 27 of the reasoning.

149 Decision No. U-I-60/98, Para. 23 of the reasoning.

150 Decision No. U-I-297/08, Para. 28 of the reasoning.

151 Ibidem, Para. 32 of the reasoning.

152 Ibidem, Para. 39 of the reasoning.

153 This Article regulates the expropriation of real estate allowed under condition of providing compensation and the existence of a public interest.

154 Decision No. U-I-297/08, Para. 46 of the reasoning.

that provides them social security.<sup>155</sup> The pension has a dual nature. It is an economic category, as the rights arising from pension insurance depend mainly on how long the contributions were being paid and in what amount; in addition, it also includes elements of solidarity, which are relevant when determining the amount of the pension, but not for obtaining the right itself. The insurance aspect of this relationship is essential for obtaining the right.<sup>156</sup>

The third paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution obliges the state to regulate special protection for victims of war violence in a manner that exceeds the rights arising from mandatory social insurance. Such special protection can be reflected in ensuring special rights or a broader scope of rights.<sup>157</sup> In order to define the term civilian victims, it is decisive that these are persons who were subject to violence due to war events without being actively involved on either side of the armed conflict.<sup>158</sup>

The freedom of trade unions determined by Article 76 of the Constitution is a special form of freedom of association guaranteed by the second paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution. It is guaranteed as a human right whose purpose is to enable the association of workers directed towards setting standards for workers' socio-economic rights, as well as towards the implementation of and raising these standards.<sup>159</sup> It also protects the freedom of action of trade unions, one aspect of which is also the right to collective bargaining based on the free and voluntary conclusion of collective agreements, and on the autonomy of the parties to the agreement.<sup>160</sup> The regulation of workers' position by collective agreements mitigates the structurally subordinate position of workers when concluding employment contracts and, in such manner, enables the negotiated rights and working conditions to be relatively balanced. It contributes to securing social justice and social peace, which are embedded in the principle of a social state determined by Article 2 of the Constitution, and to raising the level of democracy of social regulation.<sup>161</sup> With regard to the employment relationships of civil servants, the state acts as the employer. However, the state is, at the same time, a bearer of authority and is required to protect the public interest. It must ensure that its competences are exercised effectively, and that the entire public sector functions effectively. Therefore, it must also ensure that the freedom of collective bargaining, which includes the possibility that a collective agreement is not concluded, does not seriously threaten the exercise of the aforementioned tasks, which accordingly narrows the aspect of the substance of the autonomy of collective bargaining

---

155 Decision No. Up-360/05 (dated 2 October 2008), Paras. 5 and 6 of the reasoning.

156 Ibidem. The first paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution provides the right to a pension only to citizens. Other persons are provided constitutional protection of this right within the framework of the right to private property (Article 33 of the Constitution); see Decision No. Up-770/06 (dated 27 May 2009), Para. 4 of the reasoning.

157 Decision No. U-I-266/04 (dated 9 November 2006), Para. 13 of the reasoning.

158 Ibidem, Para. 19 of the reasoning.

159 Decision No. U-I-249/10 (dated 15 March 2012), Para. 17 of the reasoning.

160 Ibidem, Para. 18 of the reasoning.

161 Ibidem, Para. 22 of the reasoning.

(in particular, with regard to the police, the military, and the civil service).<sup>162</sup>

7. THE SEPARATION OF POWERS, THE LEGALITY OF THE FUNCTIONING OF THE STATE, AND LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT

The principle of democracy (Article 1 of the Constitution) contains inter alia the requirement that the most important decisions be adopted by directly elected members of the parliament. As a result, the executive branch of power can only operate legally when working on the substantive basis of and within the framework of laws, and not on the basis of its own regulations or even on the basis of its own function within the system of the separation of powers.<sup>163</sup> The priority of laws plays an important role in delimiting the competences of the legislative and executive branches of power in accordance with the principle of the separation of powers (the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution). The principle of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution) requires that legal relations between the state and its citizens be regulated by laws. Thereby, the functioning of the executive power becomes known, transparent, and foreseeable by the citizens, thus increasing their legal certainty. The principle of the protection of human rights (the first paragraph of Article 5 of the Constitution) requires that, in accordance with the principles of democracy and a state governed by the rule of law, these may only be limited by the legislature in the instances and to the extent allowed by the Constitution, and not by the executive power.<sup>164</sup> The second paragraph of Article 120 of the Constitution determines the principle that administrative authorities perform their work within the constitutional and statutory framework, and in particular in accordance with the constitutional and statutory basis, which makes the principle of legality in relation to the functioning of the state administration – due to its connection with the other mentioned principles – one of the fundamental constitutional principles.<sup>165</sup> Administrative authorities may not issue regulations that do not have a substantive basis in law, independently determine rights and obligations, or independently modify or regulate statutory subject matter. However, if the law provides for a substantive framework for issuing an implementing regulation, they may issue such even if the law does not determine an express authorisation to this end by means of an implementing clause.<sup>166</sup>

The fundamental constitutional principles and the constitutional order on the whole serve to protect individuals' freedom in relation to the state power. The concept of power that is limited by law, i.e. power that functions within the framework and on the basis of the Constitution and respects human rights in particular, is the highest constitutional and societal value, which must be the starting point of a review of the constitutional consistency of relations between the bearers of different offices of the

---

<sup>162</sup> Ibidem, Para. 23 of the reasoning.

<sup>163</sup> Decision No. U-I-73/94 (dated 25 May 1995), Para. 18 of the reasoning.

<sup>164</sup> Ibidem.

<sup>165</sup> Ibidem.

<sup>166</sup> Ibidem, Para. 19 of the reasoning.

state power.<sup>167</sup> The relation between individual branches of power is a relation of the constraint and cooperation of equal branches of power such that each functions within the framework of its own position and its own competences. Their equality is the starting point of the regulation of the mechanisms of checks and balances between individual branches of power.<sup>168</sup> The significance of the principle of the separation of powers in a contemporary state is precisely in the independent role of the judicial power, whose task is to determine, in individual cases and in a binding manner, what the law is. The force of the judicial power is embodied through its judicial decisions, which are supported by legal arguments that are also rational and convincing. Therefore, it is essential that judges are bound only by the Constitution and laws, and as a result the functioning of the judicial power is of decisive importance for the implementation of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law.<sup>169</sup> The principle of the separation of powers establishes mutual dependency between individual branches of power and ensures that each of them exercises its own functions, with regard to which the system of checks and balances operates from both the functional and organisational points of view. From the organisational point of view of this principle, it holds true that, as a general rule, office holders in individual branches of power are not appointed to such positions by the branches themselves, but are appointed to such positions directly (members of parliament through elections) or indirectly by the people (representatives from the other two branches of power with various competences participate in such procedures).<sup>170</sup>

Article 149 of the Constitution is a procedural provision that regulates the legal form and power regarding the adoption of decisions on state borrowings and state guarantees for loans, which require a special decision by the National Assembly in the form of a law. The assumed obligations must be determined by law or at least determinable on the basis thereof. By such a law, the financial burden is actually or potentially transferred to the future, while at the same time the fundamental power of the National Assembly to decide on state revenues and expenditures is ensured, as well as the special disclosure of state borrowings and guarantees in accordance with the principles of a democratic state and a state governed by the rule of law.<sup>171</sup>

The significance of the constitutional prohibition of the retroactive effect of legal acts (the first paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution) is to ensure the essential element of a state governed by the rule of law, i.e. legal certainty, and consequently trust in the law. Only a law may establish that certain of its provisions have retroactive effect if this is required in the public interest and provided that no acquired rights are infringed thereby (the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution).<sup>172</sup> A regulation has retroactive effect when the moment of the beginning

---

167 Decision No. U-I-159/08 (dated 11 December 2008), Para. 22 of the reasoning.

168 Ibidem, Para. 24 of the reasoning.

169 Ibidem, Para. 26 of the reasoning.

170 Decision No. Up-679/06, U-I-20/07, Para. 23 of the reasoning.

171 Decision No. U-I-178/10 (dated 3 February 2011), Paras. 24 and 25 of the reasoning.

172 Decision No. U-I-158/11 (dated 28 November 2013), Para. 20 of the reasoning.

of its application is a moment before its entry into force, or when it starts to be applicable after its entry into force, but some of its provisions have such effect that they retroactively interfere with legal situations or legal facts that were final when the previous legal norm was in force.<sup>173</sup> Retroactive effect can only be justified by a specific public interest, one that substantiates precisely the retroactive effect of the regulation without which the pursued aim of the particular regulation could not be achieved. With regard to the fact that such a public interest substantiates an exception to the constitutional prohibition of retroactive effect, it must be specifically established in the legislative procedure.<sup>174</sup> Such must be the case in particular in the field of taxation, not only due to the density and intensity of legal relations between the state and taxable persons, but also due to the asymmetry of tax law relationships, which entail an interference by the state with the property sphere of taxable persons without directly paying any compensation for such, as well as due to the general sense of justice. In fact, taxable persons must know that the legislation may change, however, they may legitimately expect that any changes will be made in such a manner that while making decisions they will be able to take these changes into consideration, which presupposes that they are informed thereof (the first paragraph of Article 154 of the Constitution).<sup>175</sup>

In Slovenia, local self-government is guaranteed (Article 9 of the Constitution). It follows from the constitutional concept of a municipality that local self-government is the right of local communities to manage common local affairs. In fact, the establishment of a municipality is an essential condition for the exercise of local self-government; however, the legislature may determine the conditions and the procedure for the establishment of a municipality. Therefore, Articles 138 and 139 of the Constitution<sup>176</sup> cannot be interpreted in the sense that they guarantee people the right to their own municipality, but only the right to exercise local self-government in a municipality that is established in accordance with the conditions and the procedure determined by law.<sup>177</sup> When establishing municipalities and changing their territories, the legislature is bound by the will of the voters expressed in a referendum (the third paragraph of Article 139 of the Constitution), unless respecting the will of the voters expressed in a referendum would lead to the establishment of a municipality that would not be in accordance with the constitutional and statutory provisions on municipalities, or if it were not possible to respect the will of the voters expressed in a referendum due to the conflicting results of referenda.<sup>178</sup>

---

173 Ibidem, Para. 21 of the reasoning.

174 Ibidem, Para. 26 of the reasoning.

175 Ibidem, Para. 27 of the reasoning. In accordance with the first paragraph of Article 154 of the Constitution, regulations must be published prior to entering into force.

176 These two Articles regulate the exercise of local self-government and municipalities as self-governing local communities.

177 Decision No. U-I-137/10, Para. 10 of the reasoning.

178 Ibidem, Para. 13 of the reasoning.

8. RESPECT FOR INTERNATIONAL AND EUROPEAN UNION LAW

By reviewing the conformity of laws and other regulations with treaties (the second indent of the first paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution), the Constitutional Court ensures the effectiveness of international law in the state. In accordance with Article 8 and the second paragraph of Article 153 of the Constitution, laws and other regulations must comply with principles of international law and with treaties that are binding on Slovenia. Ensuring respect for international law is an important constitutional value, which safeguards the international credibility of the state.<sup>179</sup>

The Constitutional Court is also entrusted with the task of preventing conflicts between the Constitution and treaties containing provisions that are inconsistent with the Constitution, which can occur in two different situations. The first situation concerns the provisions of treaties on human rights, with regard to which the Constitution itself introduced, in the fifth paragraph of Article 15, a special mechanism for resolving such conflicts. In accordance with this provision, the Constitution must give way to the provisions of treaties that guarantee a higher level of protection of a particular human right.<sup>180</sup> The provisions of such treaties are often also used as an interpretative tool when interpreting constitutional provisions.<sup>181</sup> In such framework, the provisions of the ECHR hold a special place as a result of the functioning of the ECtHR, which defines the substance of the Convention rights. The Constitutional Court must observe the case law of the ECtHR irrespective of whether it was adopted in a case in which Slovenia participated in the proceedings before the ECtHR.<sup>182</sup>

The second situation concerns the fact that the Constitutional Court prevents conflicts between the Constitution and international law by exercising a special power (the preliminary, a priori constitutional review of treaties; the second paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution). Its purpose is to prevent, upon the ratification of a treaty, the state from assuming an obligation that would be inconsistent with the Constitution or that, after ratification, it would be forced to bring the obligation arising from international law in line with the Constitution.<sup>183</sup> The Constitution namely does not recognise the primacy of international law. An obligation arising from international law would be contrary to the Constitution if, upon its transposition into the domestic legal order, it created self-executing unconstitutional legal norms or obliged the state to adopt an internal legal act that would be contrary to the Constitution.<sup>184</sup> An opinion on the constitutionality of a treaty has the same legal effect as a decision of the Constitutional Court. It binds the National Assembly when ratifying a treaty, and it is also binding on all the other authorities of the state in the domestic legal order.<sup>185</sup>

---

179 Decision No. U-II-1/12, U-II-2/12, Paras. 46 and 53 of the reasoning.

180 Cf., e.g., Decision No. Up-555/03.

181 See, e.g. U-I-218/07 (dated 26 March 2009).

182 Decision No. U-I-65/05, Para. 12 of the reasoning.

183 Opinion No. Rm-1/02, Para. 8 of the reasoning.

184 Ibidem.

185 Ibidem, Para. 53 of the reasoning.

In the Slovene national constitutional order, the Treaty of Lisbon, by which Slovenia transferred to the European Union the exercise of some of its sovereign rights in conformity with Article 3a of the Constitution, has the status of a [regular] treaty. Such entails that the Constitutional Court has the jurisdiction, as determined by the second indent of the first paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution, to decide on the conformity of laws with the Treaty of Lisbon.<sup>186</sup> In accordance with the third paragraph of Article 3a of the Constitution, all authorities of the state, including the Constitutional Court, must take into account, in the exercise of their competences, the primary and secondary legislation of the European Union and the case law of the Court of Justice of the European Union. Due to the mentioned constitutional provision, the fundamental principles that define the relationship between national law and European Union law (the principles of primacy, direct applicability, and the direct effect of European Union law, the principle of sincere cooperation, the principle of conferral of competences, and the principle of proportionality) are at the same time also constitutional principles that have the same binding effect as the Constitution.<sup>187</sup>

9. THE LEGAL EFFECTS OF THE CASE LAW OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL COURT

The third paragraph of Article 161 of the Constitution determines that the legal consequences of Constitutional Court decisions are regulated by law, whereas the third paragraph of Article 1 of the Constitutional Court Act determines that the decisions of the Constitutional Court are binding. The binding nature of the decisions of the Constitutional Court follows already from fundamental constitutional principles – i.e. the principle of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution) and the principle of the separation of powers (the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution) – and would apply even if the Constitutional Court Act did not contain such a provision.<sup>188</sup> The binding effect of the decisions of the Constitutional Court does not have an unambiguous meaning. In particular, the question arises as to the binding force of interpretations of the Constitution by which the Constitutional Court reasons its decisions, i.e. how strong the ratio decidendi is, and who is bound by the positions stated by the Constitutional Court in the reasoning of its decisions. The Constitutional Court emphasised that when reviewing the constitutionality of regulations the operative provisions and reasoning of its decisions form a whole, therefore also the positions and reasons contained in the reasoning of a decision are binding, even if the Constitutional Court merely establishes in a declaratory decision that a regulation is inconsistent with the Constitution.<sup>189</sup> For a judge who must decide in judicial proceedings by observing a decision of the Constitutional Court, a declaratory decision<sup>190</sup> entails a duty to interpret the law in a constitutionally consis-

186 Decision No. U-I-17/11 (dated 18 October 2012), Para. 7 of the reasoning.

187 Decision No. U-I-146/12 (dated 14 November 2013), Paras. 32 and 33 of the reasoning.

188 Decision No. U-I-248/08 (dated 11 November 2009), Para. 12 of the reasoning.

189 Decision No. Up-624/11 (dated 3 July 2014), Para. 10 of the reasoning.

190 The Constitutional Court adopts such a decision if there is an unconstitutional legal gap where the law fails to regulate a certain issue that, in accordance with the Constitution, it should regulate, or regulates it in such tent manner, which follows already from Article 125 of the Constitution.<sup>191</sup> A judge may still apply a provision whose unconstitutionality was established and was not abrogated, however, such application must not be contrary to the reasons that led the Constitutional Court to establish its inconsistency with the Constitution.<sup>192</sup>

Decisions of the Constitutional Court by which statutes are either abrogated or the inconsistency thereof established must also be observed after a judicial decision becomes final if extraordinary legal remedy proceedings or proceedings to decide upon a constitutional complaint have been initiated against such judicial decision.<sup>193</sup>

Thereby, the effectiveness of extraordinary legal remedies is ensured, which also applies in the event a declaratory decision has been adopted – in such context, the issue is not whether certain conduct was legal when it was performed, but whether it was in conformity with the Constitution.<sup>194</sup> If the Constitutional Court also determines the so-called manner of implementation of a decision, by which it temporarily, until the legislature responds thereto, legally regulates the individual question that was the subject of review, the addressees of the legal norms at issue must act in accordance with such manner of implementation until the legislature regulates that question in an equal or different manner.<sup>195</sup> This also holds for state authorities. Namely, in states governed by the rule of law, the decisions of constitutional courts are complied with, regardless of whether legal experts express doubts regarding such. State authorities are bound by the decisions of the Constitutional Court and cannot be absolved of this duty to comply by any concerns expressed by experts, even if these are justified.<sup>196</sup> However, in pending proceedings on extraordinary legal remedies, it must be taken into consideration that the manner of implementation determined by a decision of the Constitutional Court has the same legal power as a statute, and consequently its implementation and interpretation are subject to the established methods of interpretation of statutes.<sup>197</sup> Hence, failure to observe the determined manner of implementation during judicial decision-making can primarily entail a violation of a statute, but it may also reach the level of a violation of the Constitution; the reasons the unconstitutionality was established must, namely, be meticulously taken into consideration. Courts must observe the manner of the implementation of the relevant decision if deciding otherwise would constitute a violation of human rights.<sup>198</sup>

The Constitution and the decisions of the Constitutional Court are not binding only on the legislature, but also on citizens when they exercise power directly by a manner (legal drafting) that abrogation is not possible.

---

191 In accordance with this provision, judges are bound by the Constitution and laws when deciding in judicial proceedings.

192 Decision No. Up-624/11, Para. 10 of the reasoning.

193 Ibidem, Para. 12 of the reasoning.

194 Ibidem, Para. 13 of the reasoning.

195 Ibidem, Para. 14 of the reasoning.

196 Decision No. U-II-1/10, Para. 45 of the reasoning.

197 Decision No. Up-624/11, Para. 15 of the reasoning.

198 Ibidem, Para. 16 of the reasoning.

deciding on a particular law in a referendum.<sup>199</sup> In a legislative referendum it is inadmissible to decide whether to respect a decision of the Constitutional Court, because such would constitute a referendum on the authority of the Constitutional Court and on whether certain issues should even be regulated in a manner consistent with the Constitution.<sup>200</sup>

10. THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL CASE LAW

The decisions of the Constitutional Court gathered in this collection represent only a narrow selection of the most important decisions, therefore they do not represent the whole picture of the hitherto constitutional case law. In fact, the latter is much broader. This is reflected in the twenty volumes of the Collected Decisions and Orders of the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Slovenia, in which the case law is (also) published. Due to the large number of decisions, it progressively became necessary to set limits regarding the publication thereof; in 2009, only a narrow selection of the most important decisions was published in a single volume, while more recently a volume containing a narrow selection of the most important decisions is published every two years. Nonetheless, it can be stated that the present selection is a sufficiently representative sample on the basis of which the content of important constitutional provisions as seen and interpreted by the Constitutional Court is presented, often also by referring to international law and the case law of the international courts that interpret it. The provisions of the Constitution, whose content is presented in the present volume after 25 years of constitutional case law, confirm that a free individual, his or her dignity, and the human rights that he or she as a human is inherently entitled to in accordance with the Constitution are established as the fundamental starting point of the constitutional order. The Constitutional Court cannot overlook these human rights even when interpreting the principles that guide the constitutionally defined relationships between the authorities of state power, such as the principle of the separation of powers, with regard to which the Constitutional Court has repeatedly emphasised that respect therefor is intended to ensure exercise of the freedom of a person and his or her human rights. In addition, a number of general principles are inherently connected with the protection of human rights, starting with the generally required protection thereof (the first paragraph of Article 5 of the Constitution), followed by the principle of proportionality applied as one of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution) or as a criterion for reviewing the admissibility of the limitation of human rights (the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution). Some general constitutional principles can be implemented in an important manner when applied through the protection and exercise of individual rights; for instance, the principle of a social state (Article 2 of the Constitution) is implemented through the rights to social security (the first paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution).

---

199 Decision No. U-II-1/10 (dated 10 June 2010), Para. 19 of the reasoning.

200 Ibidem, Para. 45 of the reasoning.

The Slovene Constitution is a modern constitution and as such contains an extensive catalogue of human rights, divided into two chapters, i.e. a chapter on human rights and a chapter on economic and social relations. However, this catalogue does not constitute a closed list, as on the basis of the provision of the fifth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution it can conceptually and interpretatively encompass human rights not expressly regulated therein, but in the treaties that the state has ratified, as well as those human rights regarding which such treaties ensure a higher degree of protection than the Constitution. In its constitutional case law the Constitutional Court expressly uses such human rights as the major premise, while occasionally also interpreting the constitutional provisions by additionally “assigning” them the substance of a right regulated exclusively by a treaty (e.g. the right to hear an incriminating witness forms an integral part of the right to a defence determined by Article 29 of the Constitution, even though the wording of that provision does not mention such right expressly). There are a number of treaties on human rights; nevertheless, the ECHR has the central place among them due to the fact that an international court has been established on its basis and that the contracting states have agreed that their citizens may bring proceedings against them before that court on account of alleged violations of human rights. On the basis of the Treaty of Lisbon, the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, with its relatively extensive catalogue of human rights, which Member States are to apply only when implementing European Union law, also entered the ranks of such treaties. This development may bring about specific difficulties regarding the protection of human rights when a court is involved in their protection in a manner such as applied by the Luxembourg Court.<sup>201</sup> A more extensive catalogue of human rights does not inherently entail a higher degree of protection of these rights.

Above all, any catalogue of human rights would remain merely ink on paper if its effectiveness were not ensured, which requires the enactment of human rights and their judicial protection on a daily basis in order for violations to be prevented. This is precisely the point where we can recognise that, by its decisions during these 25 years, the Constitutional Court has taken exceptionally important steps on the path from a state in which human rights were grossly violated (as stated in the Preamble to the Basic Constitutional Charter) towards a state in which human rights are not only empty words but have become real and effective for each individual person. It is not surprising that these steps have been made both in the framework of the review of the constitutionality of regulations as well as when deciding on constitutional complaints, as violations of human rights can occur either when a statutory regulation itself is unconstitutional or if a court gives it an unconstitutional meaning. It took many years for the courts to embrace the necessity of a constitutionally consistent interpretation of laws, which also entails the protection of human rights already at the first instance of judicial proceedings (or even before administrative authorities where these are the first bodies to decide on rights, obligations, or legal benefits). Only in recent years have the courts become important interlocutors of the Constitutional Court by filing requests for a review of the constitutionality of individual laws they must apply in proceedings. It is obvious that time was needed for that to happen and that such shifts do not occur over night, because they require a qualitatively different perspective on judicial proceedings.

---

201 For more detail, see J. Sovdat, The Constitutional Court of the Republic of Slovenia and European Union Law, Hrvatska i komparativna javna uprava, 3 (2013), pp. 895–927.

The question is, however, whether such a qualitative leap has already been made also by the public. It certainly has been made to a certain extent among the professional public, but not by the general public, which is bombarded by media that exaggerate with their sensationalist style and are not very interested in serious topics. Unfortunately, constitutional case law is (much) too often seen by the general public as comprising decisions that benefit a particular person, or even a political party or viewpoint, instead of there being a discussion about what a certain decision means from the standpoint of the content of a human right or the level of its protection as interpreted by the Constitutional Court. Is legal language really too difficult to comprehend? Have we, the judges of the Constitutional Court, done enough to ensure that our decisions are universally understood? Perhaps we have not, perhaps we will have to do more and thus contribute to improving the general and legal culture of public discourse.

Finally, there is another important issue that should be emphasised. While awareness of the human rights that people are entitled to has been progressively raised, it remains overlooked too often that human rights are mostly not absolute, that they are limited by the human rights of others. The Constitutional Court has often emphasised that some of these limitations are, due to the nature of the matter, an integral part of rights themselves. The Constitutional Court's emphasis that the general right to act freely allows one to do everything that is not prohibited, therefore, applies in particular to the relation of individuals towards the state. The state may interfere with an individual's freedom to act only when there is an express statutory basis for such. However, that does not entail that the freedom to act of an individual is unlimited. The Constitution sets boundaries at almost every step. Therefore, the requirement that they be exercised responsibly and with the awareness that we wish and must live in harmony with other people, whom we are obliged to show the same respect as we expect to receive therefrom, always goes hand in hand with human rights. Therefore, it is more than self-evident that a person's freedom extends only to where the freedom of another person begins.

*Dr Jadranka Sovdat
Vice President*

---

PART I

---

Human Dignity, Human Rights, and Fundamental Freedoms

Decision No. U-I-109/10, dated 26 September 2011

DECISION

At a session held on 26 September 2011 in proceedings to review constitutionality and legality initiated upon the petition of Lidiya Drobnič, Ljubljana, and others, represented by Radovan Cerjak, lawyer in Ljubljana, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

Article 2 of the Ordinance on Determining and Changing the Names and Course of the Roads and Streets in the Territory of Ljubljana Municipality (Official Gazette RS, No. 44/09) is annulled.

Reasoning

A

1. The petitioners challenge Article 2 of the Ordinance on Determining and Changing the Names and Course of the Roads and Streets in the Territory of Ljubljana Municipality (hereinafter referred to as: the Ordinance), which regulates the name and course of Titova cesta [hereinafter referred to as: Tito Street] in the territory of Ljubljana Municipality. Petitioner Jernej Vrtovec substantiates his legal interest by alleging that he lived under the communist regime in which human rights and fundamental freedoms were systematically violated. Naming the street after Josip Broz Tito therefore allegedly interferes with his right to personal dignity. Petitioner Lidiya Drobnič substantiates her legal interest by alleging that in 1949 and 1950 she was arrested as an opponent of the communist regime and on that account the competent authority recognized her status as a former political prisoner by a decision in 2000. As a victim of the former totalitarian regime, the petitioner feels that she has been punished once again due to the naming of a street after Josip Broz Tito. Petitioners Franci Slak and Ignac Polajnar are councillors in the Municipal Council of Ljubljana Municipality. They are convinced that Article 2 of the Ordinance is unconstitutional, and substantiate their legal interest to challenge such by the fact that as councillors they must act in accordance with the Constitution.

2. The petitioners substantiate the unconstitutionality of the challenged provision of the Ordinance by stating the same reasons. They allege that naming the street after Josip Broz Tito, who, in their opinion, personifies the former communist regime in the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (hereinafter referred to as: the SFRY), entails a violation of the right to personal dignity determined in Article 34 of the Constitution of the victims of this regime as well as others who lived under this regime. Article 2 of the Ordinance, in their opinion, also violates Article 63 of the Constitution, which prohibits incitement to discrimination and intolerance and prohibits incitement to violence and war. This provision of the Constitution allegedly protects constitutionally guaranteed categories of equality, human dignity, and a democratic state governed by the rule of law. These values are allegedly the complete opposite of the values fostered in totalitarian regimes, which the communist regime in the former SFRY also was. The President of the SFRY and the leader of Yugoslav communists, Josip Broz Tito, allegedly personally controlled the communist regime and dictated its development. The petitioners are convinced that Josip Broz Tito was, regardless of certain positive elements, historically a negative person, a non-democrat, and a dictator. For him, human rights and fundamental freedoms were only empty words on paper. In the consciousness of many residents of Slovenia, he allegedly still today arouses fear and dark memories with regard to the people executed during the communist regime. In the opinion of the petitioners, naming the street after him therefore entails a particular kind of incitement to hatred and violence. The petitioners compare naming the street after Josip Broz Tito to naming a street after Adolf Hitler, Benito Mussolini, or Joseph Vissarionovich Stalin. Every such naming can violate the personal dignity of individuals and incite discrimination, intolerance, and violence. The challenged Ordinance allegedly once again humiliated people who during the communist regime were unjustifiably forced to the margins of society due to their political convictions and commitment to democracy and human rights. With reference to such, the petitioners draw attention to the Basic Constitutional Charter on the Sovereignty and Independence of the Republic of Slovenia (Official Gazette RS, No. 1/91 – hereinafter referred to as: the BCC), the Preamble to which states, inter alia, that the SFRY did not function as a state governed by law and that within it human rights were grossly violated. In addition, they draw attention to the European Parliament resolution of 2 April 2009 on European conscience and totalitarianism (OJ C 137 E, 27 May 2010, p. 25), in which the European Parliament condemned all crimes against humanity and the massive human rights violations committed by all totalitarian and authoritarian regimes.
3. The opposing party – Ljubljana Municipality, represented by mayor Zoran Janković – in the response to the petition alleges that the petitioners did not demonstrate legal interest for the initiation of the procedure for the review of the constitutionality and legality of the Ordinance. Only individuals to whom Article 3 of the Act on Designating Areas and Naming and Marking Settlements, Streets, and Buildings (Official Gazette RS, No. 25/08 – hereinafter referred to as: the ADANMSSB) refers allegedly have legal interest therefor. Ljubljana Municipality opposes the allegations that the challenged Ordinance is inconsistent with Articles 34 and 63 of the Constitution. It alleges that the disputed street was named after a historical figure who made an important mark on the period during World War II and the decades following the War. Josip Broz Tito was allegedly an important historical figure for Slovenes, as he was commander-in-chief of the Partisan army, which in 1945 liberated the territory of present-day Slovenia from fascist occupation. Testifying to his great historical role are also numerous medals and awards which Josip Broz Tito received from other countries as well as the fact that many cities around the world have streets or squares named after him. The opposing party adds that discussions on naming streets can be a matter of democratic dialogue, however, the final decision regarding such is the democratic right of the majority in the municipal council.

B – I

4. The challenged Article 2 of the Ordinance is a regulation (i.e. a general legal act), which, in accordance with the ADANMSSB, determines that in Ljubljana a part of the existing Štajerska cesta [Štajerska Street] and a part of a newly planned street be named Tito Street and that its course be determined<sup>1</sup>. For the concretisation of this provision, thus for the naming of the determined road section Tito Street to take effect, the ADANMSSB and the Ordinance do not envisage the issuance of any further administrative decisions or other individual acts which would be necessary for its implementation. The naming of streets and roads by an ordinance of the local community takes direct effect, and thus not only in relation to state and other authorities which must respect such new fact ex officio (e.g. in various public records and registers), but also in relation to individuals and other legal subjects in their daily life and business activities. Naming public spaces does not only concern the residents of these areas, but such also has legal effect with

---

1 The challenged provision of the Ordinance reads as follows:

“In the territory of Ljubljana Municipality, in the settlement of Ljubljana:

→ the name of the following street is hereby changed thusly:

A part of Štajerska cesta [Štajerska Street] in the part of the northern artery from the roundabout at the northern ring road at Tomačevo to the intersection with Zasavska cesta [Zasavska Street] and Dunajska cesta [Dunajska Street] is renamed Tito Street.

→ the following street is hereby newly named thusly:

A part of the planned “new Tomačevska cesta [Tomačevo Street]” from the roundabout at Plečnikove Žale to the intersection with Kranjčeva ulica [Kranjčeva Street] and in the extension of the newly planned northern artery to the north and northeast to the roundabout at the northern ring road at Tomačevo is hereby named Tito Street.

→ the course of the following street is determined and changed thusly:

The newly named Tito Street runs from the roundabout at Plečnikove Žale to the north and northeast along the route of the newly planned northern artery towards and over the Tomačevo roundabout to the intersection with Zasavska cesta [Zasavska Street] and Dunajska cesta [Dunajska Street].

The course of Štajerska cesta [Štajerska Street] is changed so that it runs from the intersection of Zasavska cesta [Zasavska Street] and Dunajska cesta [Dunajska Street] to the municipal border with Trzin Municipality.”

regard to everyone who encounters or apprehends such name. Such naming has an emphasized symbolic significance that also concerns everyone. Naming such road section Tito Street thus has erga omnes effects, which arise directly on the basis of the Ordinance on the day of its implementation.<sup>2</sup> Furthermore, in the case at issue questions are raised which refer to human dignity as the fundamental value and legal starting point of Slovene democracy. These concern the most elementary questions regarding the relation of the state or authorities towards individuals, regarding the position and significance of human beings and humanity in the state, and regarding the fundamental purpose of a free and democratic state in general. In the case at issue, the petitioner Lidija Drobnič undoubtedly demonstrated legal interest; she was recognized the status of former political prisoner by the decision of the Government Commission for the Implementation of the Redressing of Injustices Act of 17 October 2000, which was issued on the basis of the Redressing of Injustices Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 59/96). The Constitutional Court therefore did not have to decide whether other petitioners demonstrated legal interest.

5. The Constitutional Court accepted the petition for consideration and, in consideration of the fact that the requirements laid down in the fourth paragraph of Article 26 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 64/07 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as: the CCA) are fulfilled, proceeded to decide on the merits.

B – II

6. Respect for human dignity (German: Menschenwürde) is the legal-ethical foundation of contemporary states based on the concept of constitutional democracy, i.e. on the presumption that authority must be restricted by certain fundamental rights and freedoms humans are entitled to due to their inherent worth. The awareness that human dignity is the highest ethical value and that respect for human dignity must be a criterion of and limitation on the functioning of state authority, has gradually been strengthening throughout the centuries.<sup>3</sup> Human dignity was first recognised at the constitutional level as a universal value inherent to all individuals at the end of the 18th century following the adoption of the key constitutional documents in the period of the constituting of the independent United States of America and of

---

2 With reference to such, it is not relevant that the ADANMSSB and the Ordinance envisage certain substantive acts after the naming is implemented – the Surveying and Mapping Authority of the Republic of Slovenia must register the change in the register of spatial units, the street must be marked by a street sign indicating the name of the street, while buildings along the street must be assigned house numbers (Sections VI and VII of the ADANMSSB, Article 5 of the Ordinance). The direct effect of the ordinance by which a street is renamed or newly named is also not influenced by the fact that the natural persons who reside on the street or legal entities which have their registered office thereon must consequently in relevant proceedings change or in some other manner adapt their personal documents or documents used in business operations.

3 Among the pivotal historical documents, certain key English documents must be mentioned, i.e. the Magna Carta (The Great Charter) of 1215, the Habeas Corpus Act of 1679, and the Bill of Rights of 1689. The beginnings of the modern structure of human rights can be traced back to the Age of Enlightenment, to the legal-philosophical thought of numerous authors of the 17th and 18th centuries.

the French Revolution.<sup>4</sup> Following a certain standstill in the development of human rights in Continental Europe in the 19th and at the beginning of the 20th century, after World War II the principle of respect for human dignity developed as a special universal principle, first in some of the most important international documents, and later as the fundamental constitutional principle in the constitutions of new democracies, which, by codifying human rights, placed the individual at the centre of the constitutional order.<sup>5</sup> The Preamble to the Charter of the United Nations of 1945, for instance, stresses that it was adopted by the people of the United Nations, who were determined to reaffirm “faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person”. This was followed by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948, the Preamble to which opens by stressing that “recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world”, while the normative part already in Article 1 determines that “all human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights”. Furthermore, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights of 1966 (which entered into force on 23 March 1976) in its Preamble emphasises that “recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world” and that the rights determined in this Covenant “derive from the inherent dignity of the human person”. The European Convention on Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as: the ECHR) does not explicitly mention human dignity, however, the contracting parties in the Preamble expressed “their profound belief in those fundamental freedoms which are the foundation of justice and peace in the world” and looked for the inspiration for the adoption of the Convention in “a common heritage of political traditions, ideals, freedom and the rule of law”. In alliance with such spirit of commitment to human rights, also the European Court of Human Rights in its judgments clearly upheld that the very essence of the ECHR is respect for human dignity.<sup>6</sup> Also the Charter of Fundamental

4 The Virginia Declaration of Rights of 1776 can be deemed to contain the first definition of universal human rights in positive constitutional law. It was followed by the Declaration of Independence of the USA of 1776, the Constitution of the USA of 1787 – the Bill of Rights to the Constitution was adopted the same year, and the French Declaration of the Rights of Man and of Citizen of 1789. For more on the historical development of fundamental rights, see: L. Pitamic, Država [The State], Cankarjeva založba, Ljubljana 1996, pp. 188 – 207, and V. Simič, Temeljne pravice kot pravnocivilizacijska dediščina [Fundamental Rights as the Heritage of the Law and Civilisation], in: M. Pavčnik, A. Polajnar-Pavčnik, D. Wedam-Lukić (Editor), Temeljne pravice [Fundamental Rights], Cankarjeva založba, Ljubljana 1997, pp. 21 – 51.

5 Jens Meyer-Ladewig (Menschenwürde und Europäische Menschenrechtskonvention, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift, Year 57, No. 14 (2004), p. 982), stated that in the case of the Federal Republic of Germany, human dignity was “a symbolic formula of the new democracy”. Article 1 of the German Federal Constitution (i.e. Grundgesetz – the Basic Law) namely determines that human dignity is inviolable and that it is the duty of all state authorities to respect and protect it.

6 See, for instance, paragraph 65 of the reasoning in Pretty v. The United Kingdom (judgment dated 29 July 2002).

Rights of the European Union, which became binding law for the European Union<sup>7</sup> by the entry into force of the Treaty of Lisbon, in its Preamble states that “conscious of its spiritual and moral heritage, the Union is founded on the indivisible, universal values of human dignity, freedom, equality and solidarity; it is based on the principles of democracy and the rule of law. It places the individual at the heart of its activities, by establishing the citizenship of the Union and by creating an area of freedom, security and justice.” The Charter protects human dignity also as a special human right, as already in Article 1 it determines that human dignity is inviolable and must be respected and protected.

7. Human dignity is also at the centre of the constitutional order of the Republic of Slovenia. Its ethical and constitutional significance already proceeds from the BCC, which is not only the constitutional foundation of Slovene statehood, as also certain principles that demonstrate the fundamental legal and constitutional quality of the new independent and sovereign state are outlined therein. In its Preamble the BCC first proclaimed the fact that the SFRY did not function as a state governed by law and that within it human rights were grossly violated, while Section III, as the antipode to the above-mentioned, emphasized that the Republic of Slovenia would guarantee the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms to all persons in the territory of the Republic of Slovenia irrespective of their national origin, without any discrimination whatsoever, in accordance with the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia and the treaties in force. This new constitutional quality of the new state is even more clearly demonstrated in the Declaration of Independence (Official Gazette RS, No. 1/91), which was adopted together with the BCC (on 25 June 1991), and in which the former Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia emphasized the commitment of Slovenia to respect human rights and fundamental freedoms and its orientation towards joining international organisations which are based on respect for human dignity and which in their acts determine the fundamental international standards of human rights protection. Thus, by adopting these independence documents not only the fundamental the fundamental relationship entailing state sovereignty between the Republic of Slovenia and the SFRY was severed, but there was also a fracture with the fundamental value concept of the constitutional order.
8. Differently than the former SFRY, the Republic of Slovenia is a state governed by the rule of law whose constitutional order proceeds from the principle of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms already on the basis of the basic constitutional documents. From the BCC, the Preamble to the Constitution, and numerous constitutional decisions there proceeds the fact that human dignity is the fundamental value which permeates the entire legal order and therefore it also has an objective significance in the functioning of authority not only in individual proceedings but also when adopting regulations. In its substance, human dignity entails the presumption that every human being has equal and absolute inner worth because he or she is a human being. Respect for human dignity therefore entails the protection of the inherent worth of the individual against unjustified interferences by and the requirements of the state and society.

---

7 The Treaty of Lisbon refers to the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union in the first paragraph of Article 6 of the Treaty on European Union, the first sentence of which reads as follows: “The Union recognizes the rights, freedoms and principles set out in the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union of 7 December 2000, as adapted at Strasbourg, on 12 December 2007, which shall have the same legal value as the Treaties.”

9. As the fundamental value, human dignity has a normative expression in numerous provisions of the Constitution; it is especially concretized through provisions which ensure individual human rights and fundamental freedoms; they are intended precisely for the protection of different aspects of human dignity.<sup>8</sup> Among them, those that are especially strongly connected with the individual as a person with absolute inherent worth can be pointed out: the prohibition of discrimination (the first paragraph of Article 14), the inviolability of human life (Article 17), the prohibition of torture (Article 18), the protection of personal liberty (Article 19), the protection of human personality and dignity in legal proceedings (Article 21), the legal guarantees in criminal proceedings (Article 29), the right to personal dignity and safety (Article 34), freedom of expression (Article 39), and freedom of conscience (Article 41).<sup>9</sup>
10. As a special constitutional principle, the principle of respect for human dignity is directly substantiated in Article 1 of the Constitution, which determines that Slovenia is a democratic republic. The principle of democracy (with which also other constitutional principles are most tightly connected, such as the principle of a state governed by the rule of law determined in Article 2 of the Constitution and the principle of the separation of powers determined in the second sentence of the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution<sup>10</sup>) in its substance and significance exceeds the definition of the state order as merely a formal democracy in which laws and other regulations are adopted in accordance with the rule of the majority. On the contrary, the principle of democracy substantively defines the Republic of Slovenia as a constitutional democracy, thus as a state in which the acts of authorities are legally limited by constitutional principles and human rights and fundamental freedoms, precisely because individuals and their dignity are at the centre of its existence and functioning. In a constitutional democracy the individual is a subject and not an object of the functioning of the authorities, while his or her (self) realization as a human being is the fundamental purpose of the democratic order. Only such state order is truly democratic in which respect for human dignity is the principle guideline for the functioning of the state. In a substantive democracy based on respect for human dignity of every person it therefore cannot be said, as was erroneously stated by the opposing party, that adopting regulations in representative bodies at the state or local level entails the exercise of “a democratic right of the majority” of the elected members of the representative body. The principle of democracy determined in Article 1 of the Constitution in fact envisages free and periodic elections to representative bodies, thereby, however, it does not grant rights to the elected majority, but imposes a duty on all authorities – first of all on those that issue general legal acts – to respect the boundaries which proceed from the constitutional order, whose central principle is precisely the principle of respect for human dignity, when exercising their constitutional and statutory powers.

8 This is precisely the reason why in constitutional theory human dignity is defined as the origin of human rights and as a precondition for respect for other human rights. See, for instance, L. Šturm in: L. Šturm (Editor), Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije [Commentary on the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia], Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Ljubljana 2002, p. 362.

9 The constitutional significance of human dignity is clearly evident also from Article 3a of the Constitution, which determines that the exercise of part of the sovereign rights can be transferred only to international organisations which are based on respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, democracy, and the principles of the rule of law (the same applies for the state entering into a defensive alliance). The ratification of the Treaty of Lisbon and Slovenia's support for the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union to become binding EU law thus also emphasised the commitment of the Republic of Slovenia to respect human dignity.

10 As regards the principle of the separation of powers, in Decision No. U-I-158/94, dated 9 March 1995 (Official Gazette RS, No. 18/95 and OdlUS IV, 20), the Constitutional Court stressed that its role is, inter alia, to protect and ensure the freedom of individuals.

11. Regardless of the above-described constitutional regulation, a firm and complete a priori definition of human dignity is not possible, as, in addition to constitutional and international standards, the notion is filled with historical and ethical substance that has been developing and expanding over time. The substantive openness of this principle (as well as individual human rights and freedoms) therefore entails that individual aspects of human dignity are realised in individual legal proceedings, whereby the courts and the Constitutional Court play a key role in determining the possible violations thereof. The boundaries of the admissible conduct of state authorities are developed through the decisions of the courts and the Constitutional Court, which take into consideration the specific circumstances of individual cases. In such manner an abstract but fundamental constitutional value becomes living law.
12. In the case at issue, the question is raised whether Article 2 of the Ordinance which reintroduced a Tito Street in Ljubljana<sup>11</sup> is inconsistent with the principle of respect for human dignity. With reference to such, the Constitutional Court stresses that the objective of these proceedings is not a review of the personality and individual actions of Josip Broz Tito, nor a historical review of facts and circumstances. The Constitutional Court is a guardian of the Constitution and consequently a guardian of the values on which the Constitution is based. Its task is to establish constitutionally important circumstances taking into consideration the constitutional order in force and on such basis decide on the constitutionality of the challenged regulation.
13. In the case at issue, a symbolic dimension of Article 2 of the Ordinance is constitutionally relevant. When reviewing the constitutionality of regulations of local communities by which streets, roads, squares, parks, or other public spaces are named, namely not only the practical (i.e. informative) purposes of such naming can be taken into consideration (e.g. to enable easier orientation, greater transparency and accessibility of data in public records and registers, and demonstrating residence or place of business). When naming public spaces the public interest is indeed in the foreground, so that easier everyday functioning in personal and public life is ensured. However, it cannot be overlooked that such naming also bears clearly evident symbolic significance and therefore demonstrates the manner of symbolic conduct of the public authority concerned. Naming public spaces always emphasises the significance of important historical events or historical figures,<sup>12</sup> and consequently inevitably emphasises or exposes social values that mark such events or figures. Due to the fact that naming public spaces is an official act, this entails that the authority gives such values recognition, supports them, or identifies with them.<sup>13</sup> Naming public spaces after certain individuals thus undoubtedly expresses public recognition of their work, achievements, or the values that they encouraged. Due to its symbolic expressive power, such naming can also contribute to spreading and strengthening certain opinions, ideas, and values.

---

11 On 8 October 1991, the former Assembly of the City of Ljubljana renamed sections of Tito Street as Dunajska cesta [Dunajska Street], Štajerska cesta [Štajerska Street], and Slovenska cesta [Slovenska Street] (Articles 2 and 3 of the Ordinance on Determining, Changing, and Terminating Names or Courses of Streets and Squares in the Territory of the City of Ljubljana, Official Gazette RS, No. 21/91).

14. It can be stated that a regulation or other act of the authorities which has symbolic significance is unconstitutional in cases in which such symbol, through the power of the authority, expresses values which are incompatible with fundamental constitutional values, such as human dignity, freedom, democracy, and the rule of law. Official acts of state and municipal authorities which have a symbolic significance can namely not be considered to be equivalent to a situation in which individuals or groups express different opinions and convictions; their right to express opinions and standpoints that can even be contrary to the fundamental constitutional values is within the framework of a free and pluralistic society supported in the constitutional provisions on freedom of conscience and freedom of expression. However, when authorities express certain values it is not a matter of freedom of expression, as it is in the nature of this human right that only individuals and associations are entitled to it, and not authorities. Authority must always act in the public interest, whereby it must respect the constitutional restrictions which proceed from constitutional principles and from human rights and fundamental freedoms. Due to the fact that expressing values that are contrary to the fundamental constitutional values cannot be in the public interest, the review of the constitutionality of the acts of authorities is not subject to the principle of proportionality (i.e. weighing between 12 The second paragraph of Article 20 of the ADANMSSB determines that the name of a street is determined in accordance with a geographical name, the name of an event or date connected to history, or after a person who significantly contributed to the development of the settlement or is important in the broader social environment, or in accordance with the cultural heritage.

13 Numerous historical experiences confirm this. During important social changes, foreign occupation, or changes of the state order, the names of streets, roads, squares, and other public spaces, as a general rule, were extensively changed, which was undoubtedly a direct consequence of the change in values which were expressed through these names and for which the authorities of relevant periods had preference.

the public interest and the affected constitutional values), but such acts are in and of themselves unconstitutional. From the constitutional point of view, there is a great difference if certain unconstitutional values are defended and supported by individuals due to their personal convictions or if authority identifies with such values through symbols.<sup>14</sup>

15. A symbolic dimension of Tito Street is inseparably connected with the symbolic significance of the name Josip Broz Tito, Marshal of Yugoslavia and later President for life of the SFRY. The name Tito does not only symbolize the liberation of the territory of present-day Slovenia from the Fascist occupation in World War II, as alleged by the opposing party, it also symbolises the post-war totalitarian communist regime, which was marked by extensive and gross violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms, especially in the decade directly following World War II. Historical facts recorded in numerous documents and scientific historical works bear witness also to extrajudicial post-war executions, political criminal proceedings,<sup>15</sup> executions of persons fleeing across the state borders, and to abuses of authority in order to preserve the one-party system and to prevent democracy. The fact that Josip Broz Tito was the leader of the former state entails that it is precisely his name that to the greatest extent symbolises the former totalitarian regime. Tito's symbolic significance cannot be divided such that only the significance of the actions that the opposing party attributes to his historical role and personality are considered. Once again naming a street after Josip Broz Tito, who is a symbol of the Yugoslav communist regime, can be understood as support not only for him as a historical figure or his individual actions, but also as support for the entire historical period of his rule and for his rule as such. Therefore, it is not important what the municipal authority wished to achieve by introducing Tito Street or which objectives it pursued; it is important that the challenged Ordinance must objectively be understood as a form of recognition conferred on the former undemocratic regime.
16. Authorities expressing recognition of the totalitarian regimes which in the 20th century shook Europe and led to millions of victims and systematic violations of human rights is contrary to promoting respect for human dignity, human rights and fundamental freedoms, and other values which contemporary European constitutional democracies share. In past years, various European institutions adopted documents condemning the totalitarian regimes, including those of Nazism, Fascism, and Communism. The following documents must be mentioned: Resolution No. 1481 of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe of 26 January 2006 on the need for international condemnation of crimes of totalitarian

---

14 Cf. The European Court of Human Rights in Vajnai v. Hungary (judgment dated 8 October 2008), in which the Court held that the prohibition on wearing the red star is an inadmissible interference with Article 10 of the ECHR, which guarantees freedom of expression. In its judgment the Court pointed out that there is an important difference if an individual wears such red star during a political speech or if a bearer of public authority when exercising power identifies with such symbol (paragraphs 48 and 49 of the reasoning).

15 The Constitutional Court dealt with this topic in Decision No. U-I-247/96, dated 22 October 1998 (Official Gazette RS, No. 76/98 and OdlUS VII, 195).

Communist regimes, and the European Parliament resolution of 2 April 2009 on European conscience and totalitarianism. In these resolutions the emphasis is most of all on honouring the memory and faiths of the individuals who in totalitarian regimes, including the communist regime under the leadership of Josip Broz Tito, experienced violations of human rights in criminal and other proceedings or were inflicted with great sadness and pain due to the unlawful suffering of those close to them. Authorities at all levels must show the victims of all totalitarian regimes, if not active sympathy, understanding, and recognition of their suffering, at least passive respect by refraining from acts which are not in compliance with the fundamental constitutional values and for which it can be foreseen and expected that they will cause new pain. Also the National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia in its Declaration of awareness of the European Parliament resolution of 2 April 2009 on European conscience and totalitarianism (Official Gazette RS, No. 84/09) stated, inter alia, that by adopting this Declaration it expresses “respect for all victims of totalitarian regimes” and that it will “strive that the tragic acts and divisions during World War II and during the one-party socialist system following the War and their consequences be remembered as historical facts which should not cause new divisions, opposition, or hatred.”

17. The incompatibility of the former communist regime with the European standards for the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms, to which the Republic of Slovenia is committed, has also been established several times by the Constitutional Court. In Decision No. U-I-69/92, dated 10 December 1992 (Official Gazette RS, No. 61/92, and OdlUS I, 102), the Constitutional Court held that the former state was “a state whose authorities of that period had after the war conducted mass executions of former military and current political opponents, legally unacceptable criminal trials followed by death penalties, illegal seizures of property, the obstruction and liquidation of political parties in violation of its own legal system, etc., thus making the injured parties afraid, with good reason, for their lives in case they resided in such a country.” In the same spirit, in Decision No. U-I-158/94, dated 9 March 1995, the Constitutional Court wrote that “the former Yugoslav system of constitution and government institutions, as well as the former Slovene system within its framework, did not put human rights in the first place and did not define any clear legal restrictions applying to state authorities and their violence. Thus, it made possible arbitrary government, and its Constitution was not a legal instrument in the full sense as understood by modern European legal civilization.” The Constitutional Court emphasized the difference between the former totalitarian regime and the new system, which is based on the protection of individual human rights as well as on free democratic elections, in Decision No. Up-301/96, dated 15 January 1998 (Official Gazette RS, No. 13/98, and OdlUS VII, 98) as follows: “Due to the painful experience of Slovene society during the period of governance by the former totalitarian system, one of the most fundamental goals of the Slovene Constitution is to prevent any attempt at restoring the totalitarian regime; this was included in its historical mission.” Furthermore, mention must be made of Decision No. U-I-248/96, dated 30

September 1998 (Official Gazette RS, No. 76/98 and OdlUS VII, 176), in which the Constitutional Court stressed that a free democratic society can be spoken of only in a system “which, by excluding any kind of violence and arbitrariness, represents the social order of a state governed by the rule of law which is grounded on the self-determination of its people respecting the will of the majority, freedom, and equality. In the basic principles of such an order at least the following key presuppositions should be included: respect for the human rights determined in the Constitution, the right of the individual to life, the inviolability of personality rights, the sovereignty of the people, the separation of powers, the responsibility of the Government and the lawful functioning of the executive branch of power, the independence of the courts, a multiparty political system, and equal opportunities for all political parties, including the right to form an opposition and participate therein according to the Constitution.” In complete opposition to the above-mentioned, the Constitutional Court continued in the Decision, in Slovenia the post-war authorities were ready to enforce their power “by also using violence, by violating the law in criminal proceedings, and by systematically and severely violating human rights. Statutes were not only applied with the intent to punish collaborationists, but also to destroy the class enemy, to assume power, and to consolidate the totalitarian system. A free social system was established in Slovenia only in 1990, after the first free elections to the multiparty parliament had been held.”

18. In Slovenia, where the development of democracy and free society based on respect for human dignity began with the break up with the former system, whereby this break-up is clearly evident also at the constitutional level (first with the amendments to the Constitution of the Socialist Republic of Slovenia and subsequently with the adoption of the BCC and the Constitution, as the fundamental constitutional documents), the glorification of the communist totalitarian regime by the authorities by naming a street after the leader of such regime is unconstitutional. Such new naming of a street no longer has a place here and now, as it is contrary to the principle of respect for human dignity, which is at the very core of the constitutional order of the Republic of Slovenia. Naming a street after Josip Broz Tito namely does not entail preserving a name from the former system and which today would only be a part of history. The challenged Ordinance was issued in 2009, eighteen years after Slovenia declared independence and established the constitutional order, which is based on constitutional values that are the opposite of the values of the regime before independence. Not only the victims or opponents of the former regime, but also other members of the public can understand such act of the authority at issue in the present time as newly emerged official support for the former communist regime. Such act is contrary to the values on which the Constitution is based.
19. On the basis of the above-mentioned, the Constitutional Court decided that Article 2 of the Ordinance is unconstitutional as it violates the principle of respect for human dignity. This principle is substantiated in Article 1 of the Constitution and entails a limitation on the deciding of democratically elected representative bodies. The Constitution binds the state as well as municipalities when exercising their competences. The decision of the Municipal Council of Ljubljana Municipality that a street in Ljubljana be once again named after Josip Broz Tito is therefore subject to substantive limitations which proceed from the Constitution, especially if the case concerns the protection of the fundamental values of the constitutional order, among which human dignity holds the central position. As Article 2 of the Ordinance is inconsistent with the principle of respect for human dignity, the Constitutional Court annulled it.

C

20. The Constitutional Court reached this Decision on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 45 of the CCA, composed of President Dr Ernest Petrič, and Judges Dr Mitja Deisinger, Dr Dunja Jadek Penssa, Mag. Marta Klampfer, Dr Etelka Korpič – Horvat, Mag. Miroslav Mozetič, Jasna Pogačar, Mag. Jadranka Sovdat, and Jan Zobec. The Decision was reached unanimously. Judges Jadek Penssa, Korpič – Horvat, Sovdat, Petrič, and Zobec submitted concurring opinions.

Dr Ernest Petrič
President

---

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE DR DUNJA JADEK PENSsa

I agree with the principles which case No. U-I-109/10 establishes. I am submitting this concurring opinion because I wish to express some thoughts that were motivated by the process of deciding in the case at issue and which refer to the following: (1) the scope of the message which is embedded in the disputable name Titova cesta [Tito Street], and (2) the need that authorities proceed from all known facts when adopting decisions and that they direct their acts towards ensuring tolerance in society proceeding from respect for human dignity.

1. Words in and by themselves have no reality.<sup>1</sup> If they are read in a one-dimensional way, without depth perspective, they hide ideas rather than communicate them.<sup>2</sup>
2. Naming a street by municipal ordinance serves the purpose of learning the state of the facts that does not directly proceed from the naming of an element of the public infrastructure (in the case at issue, a street). As the name in such an instance does not indicate the essence of such element (i.e. that it is a street) itself, it goes beyond the perception of this element of the public infrastructure. The informative value of the name by which such element (i.e. a street) is named, is thus not neutral.
3. Naming an element of the public infrastructure – after an important person – exceeds the informative purpose for which the naming of streets in towns is intended. This surpassing of the informative purpose of such naming is double. First, naming a street after a person by an official act informs one that this person is attributed special significance by the authority, that the authority confers recognition on such person. In this sense, the fact of naming the street itself as an official act bears a symbolic significance. And secondly, the name of a person who made an important mark on a certain historical period, due to the person having had a great influence thereon, exceeds connecting his or her name merely with the person as such.

---

<sup>1</sup> E. Fromm, Umetnost življenja [The Art of Being], Mladinska knjiga, Ljubljana 2003, p. 24.

<sup>2</sup> Ibidem.

4. The name of a person will symbolise<sup>3</sup> a certain historical period if the name is connected with a certain amount of information relating to the characteristics of such period. If this is true, the name itself operates in the field of associations, as it stimulates the formation of associations between the name (of the person) and a certain historical period. It is not necessarily for such associations of individuals to be the same.
5. The dispute at issue has its origin precisely due to the fact that the name Tito evokes different associations in the petitioners and the opposing party. The petitioners namely (inter alia) allege that regardless of certain positive elements which can be attributed to (Josip Broz) Tito, the disputable naming of the street after him recalls the period of violence, intolerance, and executions of people by the communist regime, as he personifies the communist regime. The opposing party also points out the historical significance of (Josip Broz) Tito. However, the opposing party focuses on his achievements (inter alia, on his role in World War II), which, in the opinion of the opposing party, contributed to creating the possibilities for the independence of Slovenia. As follows from the allegations of the petitioners and the opposing party, the name Tito (and the disputable naming of the street) incorporates messages that are opposing regarding values. It is not possible to distinguish between such messages in the disputable instance of naming.
6. Individuals' understanding of messages that are conveyed through the name of an important person is an expression of values and thereby necessarily subject to numerous and various subjective assessments. In addition, it is clear that meanings are not embedded in words (i.e. in the name of a person) but emerge and are perspicuous in the light of the background conditions of intelligibility<sup>4</sup> and are, understandably, different in the case of every individual. Therefore, it is not surprising that individuals have different ideas, opinions, value judgments, and beliefs regarding the same statements. In a democratic and pluralistic society it is usual that individuals, as a general rule, freely express such different, opposing, or even exclusive opinions and beliefs. Polemics are usual in a pluralistic society. As it is a characteristic of individuals' beliefs that they are not based on (all) the facts, facts (which do not support their beliefs) therefore cannot refute them.<sup>5</sup> It is

---

3 "Thus a word [...] is symbolic when it implies something more than its obvious and immediate meaning." C. G. Jung, Človek in njegovi simboli, Mladinska knjiga, Ljubljana 2002, p. 22; translation taken from C. G. Jung et al., Man and His Symbols, London: Aldus Books & Jupiter, 1974, p. 20.

4 Don't Know Much About the Middle Ages: Posner on Law and Literature (in) Doing What Comes Naturally, p. 295. Cited after T. Martino, Trademark Dilution, London Press Oxford, 1996, p. 87.

5 This thought is paraphrased from a novel by M. Proust, V Swannovem svetu [Swann's Way], Delo, d. d., Ljubljana 2004, p. 145.

precisely because of this that the beliefs of certain individuals, even if they are in the majority, are never a reliable enough criterion nor can they be the only argument for the decisions of authorities. It is also clear that the concept of “democracy” cannot be reduced merely to looking for an answer to the question of what the opinion of the majority is. In a pluralistic and democratic society it is thus necessary that the authorities in their functioning devote as much attention as possible to all the different views and conflicting standpoints of individuals, whereas when adopting decisions they should consistently take into consideration all the known facts and the value system in which respect for human dignity has the central role.

7. A name which evokes associations with a totalitarian regime inevitably also evokes associations with the victims of the violence of the authorities of this regime and their horrible and intolerable suffering. Naming a street such a name by an official act can be understood such that the authority is (at least) neglecting the horrible and intolerable suffering of these victims. This act of the authority (i.e. naming the street) which has such an effect and which therefore does not express due respect for all victims of violence within recent history is not in compliance with the requirement that the inviolability of human dignity be respected as the fundamental legal ethical and constitutional principle, which holds the central role in the formation of the value system of the Republic of Slovenia and which due to its daily implementation binds all authorities in their functioning. Such official act is also contrary to the basic guideline on the functioning of authorities, i.e. maintaining and promoting tolerance among residents, which is necessary for harmony.

Dr Dunja Jadek Pensa

---

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE DR ETELKA KORPIČ - HORVAT JOINED BY JUDGE MAG. MARTA KLAMPFER

1. I voted in favour of the Decision, as I agree with its operative provision that Article 2 of the Ordinance on Determining and Changing the Names and Course of the Roads and Streets in the Territory of Ljubljana Municipality (Official Gazette RS, No. 44/09) be annulled; I do not, however, agree with the entire reasoning of the Decision.
2. I voted in favour of the Decision primarily because an important informative value of the Decision of the Constitutional Court is that it deemed the interference with human dignity to be a violation of the fundamental constitutional principle determined in Article 1 of the Constitution, i.e. that Slovenia is a democratic republic. With reference to such, the Constitutional Court clearly explained that constitutional democracy in Slovenia does not merely entail that the formal state order of Slovenia is that of a republic, but that in its substance it also includes the protection of human dignity, which in a broader sense also includes other human rights from the catalogue of human rights and fundamental freedoms determined in the Constitution. The Constitutional Court, as a guardian of constitutionality, for the first time elaborated the substance of Article 1 of the Constitution and attributed special significance and weight to the protection of human dignity. As stated in the Decision, in certain countries already the constitution framers determined the inviolability of human dignity to be a value and placed it among the general principles of the constitution. In the Republic of Slovenia this was now done by the Constitutional Court.

3. By the Decision at issue the Constitutional Court thus expressed that it would protect human dignity against all interferences by authorities. In the democratic state of Slovenia there is no place for any act by authorities that harms the dignity of individuals, even if such is adopted by a majority decision of a representative body. Therefore, Article 2 of the above-mentioned Ordinance does not belong in the present time, as some citizens were harmed because of injustices and suffering in the former system under the rule of Tito. Many have justifiably taken the name Titova cesta [Tito Street] as a provocation and can be injured.
4. The Decision of the Constitutional Court should be conciliating, namely in that the residents of Slovenia will be protected against such and any interferences with human dignity, which is the highest value of a human being. Therefore, the reasoning of the Constitutional Court should only be based on a constitutional review and not on an explanation and evaluation of the facts and circumstances of the relevant historical period, which is indeed stated in Paragraph 12 of the Decision, however, in my opinion, this is not respected most of all in Paragraphs 15 and 16 of the Decision and its scope is unbalanced in the reasoning on which the review is based. In addition, the main emphasis in the Decision is lost; namely that human dignity is a fundamental value already protected by the fundamental principle of Article 1 of the Constitution.
5. The Decision of the Constitutional Court should not harm those to whom Tito's name symbolises the positive aspects of his era. Recognition and respect for human rights is what unites us and not what divides us. This is the minimal consensus that we must reach in order to live in peace with each other.

Dr Etelka Korpič – Horvat

Mag. Marta Klampfer

---

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE DR ERNEST PETRIČ

1. I agree with the Decision of the Constitutional Court, not only with the operative provision, but also with the main logic of its reasoning. However, I wish to point out certain reasons that led me to such position, regardless of the fact that I might have reservations over individual positions in the reasoning.
2. First, I wish to point out that I see the essence of the decision therein in that it implements a constitutional position that that which – even if only on a symbolic level – expresses recognition and consequently approval of any totalitarian regime and its “values” is contrary to the constitutional values of the present democratic order of our state, and thus contrary to the Constitution, which proceeds from respect for human dignity and fundamental human rights.

3. It is precisely respect for human dignity and fundamental human rights that is the value and legal-ethical essence of the constitutions of democratic states, including the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia. Such respect arose and was consolidated in the historical process from the end of the 18th century until the adoption of the contemporary constitutions of democratic states, and has also been implemented at the international level in numerous documents dealing with respect for human dignity and the fundamental human rights proceeding therefrom. The implementation of these values was also an essential element – in addition to its aspirations regarding national liberation – of Slovenia’s efforts with regard to independence.
4. What totalitarian regimes, including the former Yugoslav communist regime, have in common is that in the name of some “great goal” (e.g. “a new order in Europe”, “a classless society”, “communism”) they brutally trampled human dignity and fundamental human rights. Regardless of the specific differences between them, they entailed the denial of those values and the legal-ethical principles on which the constitutional order of the Republic of Slovenia is based, and they caused violent death, torture, suffering, discrimination, and gross denial of fundamental human rights to millions of people. They harmed and strained the development and normal lives of numerous nations, especially in Europe – also that of the Slovene nation by it being tragically divided and other consequences as regards its development in the circle of other European nations.
5. The consequences of totalitarianism still burden numerous nations and European history. It is precisely for this reason that the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe emphasised the need for condemnation of the crimes of totalitarian regimes and these regimes as such, and the European Parliament expressed respect for the victims of all totalitarian regimes. Furthermore, in numerous decisions the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Slovenia pointed out the incompatibility of the former communist regime with contemporary European standards of protection of fundamental human rights.
6. The consequence of the above-mentioned was that official expressions of recognition of the “values” of the totalitarian regimes was deemed constitutionally unacceptable. Every glorification, also on a symbolic level, of the “values” inherent in totalitarian regimes by authorities is inconsistent with the principle of respect for human dignity as proceeds from Article 1 of the Constitution. The same applies for Article 2 of the reviewed Ordinance on Determining and Changing the Names and Course of the Roads and Streets in the Territory of Ljubljana Municipality, regardless of the intentions of those who voted in favour of the Ordinance and regardless of the fact that I do not claim that their intention was to glorify any totalitarian regime.
7. It is important that the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Slovenia did not enter into a review of the specific historical circumstances and specific roles of the protagonists of these events, including J. B. Tito. It remained at the level of a review of whether the official recognition of “Tito” by naming a street after him, regardless of the various dimensions of his role in specific historical events, thus recognition of this symbol of the Yugoslav communist totalitarian order, which “Tito” undoubtedly was, thus entailed an interference with constitutionally protected values, specifically with human dignity, and thus with the Constitution that protects such values.

8. With regard to my support for the unanimous Constitutional Court decision, it is also important that the case at issue does not concern preserving a name from the former order and which is thus a part of history. The reviewed Ordinance was adopted in a period when new constitutional values had already been implemented which proceed from the dignity of human beings and are contrary to what “Tito” symbolises and contrary to the new naming of a street after him. The Constitutional Court did not interfere with the evaluation of history nor with what recalls the past periods and events and which at the same time calls to mind past evils. By the Decision that newly naming something after what symbolises any totalitarian order or other official recognition thereof is constitutionally unacceptable from the viewpoint of the Constitution and the values on which such is based and which it protects, the Constitutional Court has contributed to the prevention of divergences and future disputes in similar cases. In this I see the special value of the unanimous decision in the case at issue.
9. Allow me to particularly point out that regarding the decision of the Constitutional Court on the legal interest in the case at issue I join the argumentation of Judge Mag. Jadranka Sovdat in her concurring opinion. I only wish to add that although the protection of human values entails that we all have a duty to respect and protect such, this does not entail that everyone has a specific legal interest (actio popularis) in cases such as the case at issue. Recognizing legal interest to everyone would also entail a substantial departure from the hitherto case law of the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Slovenia, which recognises the legal interest to challenge general legal regulations only to individuals whose legal interests are direct and specific, if a successful challenge of such regulation would improve their specific legal position.

Dr Ernest Petrič

---

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE MAG. JADRANKA SOVDAT

1. I voted in favour of the Decision because I agree with the fundamental message which is conveyed in the argumentation of the Constitutional Court. However, I am of the opinion that certain parts of the reasoning require additional emphases, which I wish to point out in this separate opinion. The first part of my viewpoints that I wish to especially present refers to legal interest, whereas the second part refers to the essential reasons for the established unconstitutionality.

I

2. There are several petitioners in the case at issue, however, not all of them, in my opinion, can be recognised legal interest. The Constitutional Court did not enter into a review of the legal interest of all the petitioners, as it recognised such to one of the petitioners. However, with reference to such, something must nevertheless be added regarding Paragraph 4 of the reasoning of the Decision. If the Constitutional Court had decided on the legal interest of the petitioners, it would have had to decide, in my opinion, that they did not have legal interest. What reasons lead to such a conclusion? In accordance with the established constitutional case law, legal interest to challenge the regulation of the municipality is not demonstrated by referring to the fact that the regulation is challenged by the councillors of the municipal council that adopted the challenged regulation. I have to agree with this. In addition, in my opinion, legal interest also cannot be recognised to a petitioner who claims that he lived in the former state in which human rights were violated. These three petitioners could have been recognised legal interest only if such had been recognised to everyone. From certain statements in Paragraph 4 of the reasoning of the Decision it could even be concluded that the Constitutional Court in fact recognised everyone's legal interest and that therefore the first and second parts of Paragraph 4 are in contradiction. However, I think that this is not the case.
3. I agree that naming elements of the public infrastructure, such as a public street, has legal effect with regard to everyone. I also agree that naming streets after historical figures has an emphasised symbolic significance. However, this does not entail that everyone who walks on such street or who lives in the country that has such a street has a legal interest to challenge the regulation that determines its name. A legal interest must namely be direct and specific, while the petitioner's successful challenging of the regulation before the Constitutional Court must affect his or her legal position. This cannot be said for the grounds offered by the above-stated petitioners. Furthermore, Paragraph 4 of the reasoning of the Decision states that in the case at issue questions are raised which refer to human dignity as the fundamental value and legal starting point of Slovene democracy. Such questions indeed are raised. However, this does not entail that anyone who raises such questions has a legal interest to initiate proceedings for the review of the constitutionality of the regulation. Recognizing everyone's legal interest already on the basis of the fact that in an individual case (also) a question of human dignity could be raised would namely entail that a direct and specific legal interest is replaced by a general interest. A general interest is the interest that everyone has, especially every citizen of this country, that laws and other regulations are in compliance with the Constitution, that they are in compliance with all its provisions and especially with the fundamental values on which the Constitution is based and which are as such a constituent part of the Constitution – that regulations are thus also in compliance with the fundamental value which is the starting point of the constitutional order in force, i.e. with the value of human dignity, which precisely in this Decision the Constitutional Court finds within the ambit of Article 1 of the Constitution. The fact that a general legal interest is not sufficient to open the door to access to the Constitutional Court also undoubtedly proceeds from the established constitutional case law. If such had sufficed for the constitutional review proceedings to be initiated, this would have been a case of actio popularis. However, a petition is not such already according to the Constitution (the second paragraph of Article 162), and even less so according to the law (Article 24 of the Constitutional Court Act). However, this part in the reasoning, in my opinion, cannot be understood in this manner. Therefore, there is no contradiction in the reasoning. I understand this part of the reasoning precisely in connection with the reasoning of the recognition of the legal interest of the petitioner. I do agree that she demonstrated such.

4. The petitioner was recognised the status of a former political prisoner by a special act. The essence of this act is not that on its basis the petitioner has certain special (possibly also property) entitlements with which the challenged regulation could interfere. The decision on the recognition of the status of political prisoner is primarily and most of all intended to morally rehabilitate the petitioner, whose human rights were violated in the former state. Her right to freedom of expression was violated by punishment and humiliating deprivation of liberty (i.e. in a correctional camp). The symbolic significance of such rehabilitation in a democratic state is therefore an integral part of the petitioner's legal position that she was recognised by this special act. The allegations of the petitioner have to be considered in the light of the above-mentioned, namely that she experiences the naming of the element of the public infrastructure after the person who symbolises the regime in which her human rights were grossly violated as a new punishment for her political convictions, although her rehabilitation has already been recognised. Human dignity in this respect acquires direct and specific significance. And in the case at issue this suffices for the recognition of a legal interest.

II

5. I agree with the basic starting point of the Decision, namely that the Constitutional Court in the role of guardian of the Constitution is not called upon to evaluate history. Therefore, it is also not called upon to review what kind of person Josip Broz was and what his significance or the significance of his actions in the history of the former state were. This evaluation is in the domain of historians. It may as well be in the domain of every individual, as the question of how an individual evaluates his role is a constituent part of individuals' right to freedom of expression (the first paragraph of Article 39 of the Constitution). By no means, however, does such evaluation fall within the competence of the Constitutional Court. Therefore, it cannot be sought in the Decision because it is not there.
6. It is a fact, however, that the additional name of Josip Broz, namely "Tito", represents a symbol (the same as a five-pointed red star) of the former federal state, which was established during the National Liberation War against the occupying forces and which after the War was first constituted as the Democratic Federal Yugoslavia, later as the Federal People's Republic of Yugoslavia, and finally as the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. I agree with this. Individuals may use this symbol, they may identify with it; also this is a constituent part of freedom of expression, which is a human right. If such symbol is used by public authority – either state or municipal or their bodies, the question arises whether the use of such a symbol is constitutionally admissible – whether it is in compliance with the Constitution.

7. I fully agree with the position stated in the Decision that public authority does not have rights, but has powers which are, in their legal nature, duties that are granted to public authority by the legal order.<sup>1</sup> All bearers of public authority, state and local alike, should be very well aware of this. They were given a mandate to perform these duties by democratic election. A fundamental duty in this regard is precisely to respect the Constitution. Respect for the Constitution especially entails respect for the human rights and fundamental freedoms of all (not only some!) citizens and other residents. Public authority cannot violate human rights under the guise of referring to rights to which it is not entitled. On the contrary, it must ensure that they are respected with regard to all, to which it is especially and explicitly bound also by the first paragraph of Article 5 of the Constitution. This provision is binding to the same extent also on local community authorities in the state. Precisely because public authority does not have rights but duties, it does not suffice for conduct to be deemed to be in compliance with the Constitution to refer to the fact that a decision was adopted by a democratically elected body in proceedings which are determined for adopting regulations and by the majority which is prescribed for the adoption of such regulation. If this were sufficient, every regulation adopted in such manner would have been in and of itself in compliance with the Constitution. Therefore, I agree with the emphasis that public authority is in a substantive sense bound by the Constitution, as otherwise human rights would be an illusion and the Constitution would be empty words on paper. And this is what the Constitutional Court reviewed in the Decision at issue. It did not review what kind of a person Josip Broz was; it reviewed whether it is in compliance with the Constitution that public authority, which is bound to respect the Constitution, prescribes that a public street be named after “Tito” considering the objective contents of this symbol of the former state. The annulment of the challenged regulation is an answer to this question and not to the question of what kind of a person Josip Broz was and what historical significance his actions had for the existence and development of the Slovene nation.
8. I agree that the significance of the symbol “Tito” cannot be divided, although such can also be multi-dimensional. I furthermore agree that he is a symbol of the former state, which the Preamble to the BCC, i.e. the fundamental constitutional document by which independent Slovenia was constituted, states gravely violated human rights. Citizens of Slovenia gave up this state in 1990 by an extremely convincing majority at a plebiscite. As I have already stated in my separate opinion to Decision No. U-II-2/11, dated 14 April 2011 (Official Gazette RS, No. 30/11), the constitutional essence of the independence of the Republic of Slovenia can be found not only in the fact that as a former unit of the federal state we became an independent and sovereign state, but “most of all also in the fact that this independent state was established as a democratic state governed by the rule of law that recognises human dignity and the human rights and fundamental freedoms of every person. Therefore, independence and sovereignty will in our conscience always entail primarily also that the state was established on new value foundations, which, regardless of the fact that independence was achieved in a lawful manner, entail a fracture with the former undemocratic state in which grave and severe violations of human rights took place.” I can thus only agree with the fact that the Constitution of this state is based on the fundamental value of respect for human beings and their dignity. I furthermore agree that this fundamental starting point of the Constitution and as such contained in Article 1 of the Constitution and further concretised in a number of individual human rights. Precisely this is an essential difference between a democratic order and an order of this or that type of totalitarian state, regardless of the fact that there were (important) differences between them in different periods; however, their common essence was precisely in denying the dignity of human beings and their human rights and fundamental freedoms. Therefore, I agree that the use of this symbol by authorities is contrary to Article 1 of the Constitution.

<sup>1</sup> Pavčnik M., Teorija prava, Prispevek k razumevanju prava [Theory of Law, A Contribution to Understanding Law], Cankarjeva založba, Ljubljana 2007, p. 205.

9. I thus agree with the argumentation of the Decision that leads to the above-mentioned conclusion. However, I wish to particularly draw attention to the argument which the Constitutional Court stated in Paragraph 19 of the reasoning of the Decision and which was very important for me in reaching this decision. We were not dealing with the name of a street that has been retained still today as a part of history. We were dealing with the naming of a street after such symbol that happened today in a democratically elected representative body. The conduct of an existing public authority, which is bound to respect the Constitution, was thus reviewed. The situation would namely not have been the same if we had been dealing with the name of a street that was a part of the historical remains of the former state. This thus concerns a question whether the Constitutional Court by this Decision adopted a position that every use of this symbol in the legal order, even if such remained in force after the entry into force of the Constitution and had been determined before that, already entails an unconstitutionality. I think that the Constitutional Court in the Decision at issue answered this question. And the answer is: no, it did not adopt such position.
10. The implementation of the constitution of a democratic state, which the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia is, after a change in the social and political system does not entail that such requires the removal of all symbols, for instance monuments which are a part of history. If the implementation of the Constitution entailed this, then a number of elements of the public infrastructure and monuments would be demolished, for instance also Napoleon's monument in front of Križanke. Napoleon certainly does not symbolize the values on which the Constitution is based. How far back in history do we have to go? It is natural that upon a change in the regime from undemocratic to democratic or directly following its change the anger of people is directed towards the symbols of the former regime. This has always happened and is still happening, not only in Slovenia. This also indicates how important symbols are in the objective sense. However, such does not constitute conduct of the authorities and does not entail that a new, in this case democratic, system must demolish half of the elements of the public infrastructure in the country if they happen to display the historical facts of the former regime. This concerns elements of the public infrastructure built in the past. The case at issue, however, concerns the functioning of the authorities today. Precisely this distinguishing aspect is, in my opinion, important in the case at issue. What occurred in history should remain a part of history, even if we cannot be entirely or particularly proud of it, also as a part of the national cultural heritage, such as, for instance, monuments are. The Constitution requires the preservation of the cultural heritage (the first paragraph of Article 5). What occurred in history, occurred in the period in which public authority was not bound to respect the Constitution. Today, however, public authority is bound by the Constitution and all its obligations to act in a certain manner are reviewed in accordance with the Constitution. The state and local public authorities or their bodies must respect fundamental constitutional values and the human rights and fundamental freedoms of all its citizens, including the victims of the former undemocratic regime. It is not a coincidence that the European Parliament resolution on European conscience and totalitarianism requires that authorities ensure the victims of totalitarianisms at least passive respect by refraining from acts which are not in compliance with fundamental constitutional values and for which it can be foreseen and expected that they will cause new pain, as also stressed by the Decision. Human dignity is precisely this fundamental value. Also, therefore, there is an essential difference whether we are dealing with something that occurred in history and has been preserved in an objective sense as a part of history (e.g. the names of streets, squares, monuments) or if the matter concerns a situation in which public authorities today adopt active measures which, contrary to the above-mentioned, objectively cause new pain for the victims of the former political trials.

11. The message of the Decision of the Constitutional Court at issue is, in my opinion, clear. The Constitutional Court is not called upon to judge history and its figures. It is called upon to protect the Constitution, and in performing its fundamental duty there is a message: It is unconstitutional for public authority to prescribe the use of a symbol of the former undemocratic state which, by its significance, objectively expresses values that are incompatible with the Constitution – especially with its fundamental starting point: human beings and their dignity.

Mag. Jadranka Sovdat

---

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE JAN ZOBEC
JOINED BY JUDGE MAG. MIROSLAV MOZETIČ

“You are responsible as individuals.”

J. P. Sartre

1. With this concurring opinion I wish to emphasize and explain my position that in the case at issue all petitioners and not only Lidija Drobnič have a legal interest. I agree with the position in Paragraph 4 of the reasoning that “naming public spaces does not only concern the residents of these areas, but such also has legal effect with regard to everyone who encounters or apprehends such name,” that “such naming has an emphasised symbolic significance that also concerns everyone”, that therefore the naming at issue has “erga omnes effects, which arise directly on the basis of the Ordinance on the day of its implementation” and that the case at issue concerns “the most elementary questions regarding the relation of the state or authorities towards individuals, regarding the position and significance of human beings and humanity in the state, and regarding the fundamental purpose of a free and democratic state in general.”
2. Precisely because of the general legal effect of naming a public space after someone who symbolises values that are completely opposite to the eternal, unchangeable, and inviolable core of constitutionality, i.e. human dignity, legal interest cannot be recognised only to those whose factual and real suffering is based on personal, direct experience of the repressiveness of a totalitarian regime. Is it really necessary for factual and real personal suffering that a petitioner himself or herself, directly, on his or her own skin (physically) felt and experienced what the petitioner Lidija Drobnič experienced? I am firmly convinced that it is not. If the Constitutional Court is to effectively protect human dignity as the cardinal constitutional value, then it must recognize the legal interest to file a petition to review the constitutionality of general acts which at least at the symbolic level violate such value, to everyone who could achieve a specific practical goal by the petition (i.e. a “casuistic cassation effect”) – in the case at issue, the abolishment of the naming of a public good after someone whose name symbolises the totalitarian regime. I accept with difficulty the idea that because of such acts of state or self-governing local authorities only those who had personal, direct experience of totalitarianism, which the challenged official act glorifies and for which it expresses support, would be recognised as having experienced procedurally relevant suffering. Is the question of humanity and democracy not something that directly touches upon every human being – simply because these questions are not limited only to (an ever) narrower circle of people, but because they par excellence concern everyone? We do not have, respect, and protect the fundamental constitutional values of humanity (i.e. human dignity) and democracy (only) because of the victims of totalitarianisms (of this or that colour), but first of all because of people, because of every single human being, here and now.
3. Denying procedural legitimacy to those who did not directly experience the horrors of totalitarianisms, while they are, however, aware of the deep unconstitutional nature of the acts of the authorities that sympathise with totalitarian regimes, support them, glorify them, hold them up as an example, or offer them as a solution for this or that (political, social, economic) crisis and are affected because of that (which they express externally already by filing a petition with the Constitutional Court) would entail nothing other than legal unresponsiveness to the articulation of the individual's critical conscience and his or her historical memory – although precisely these two components of human conscience are the strongest remedies for the anti-totalitarian immune system. I ask myself what then when there is no one left who suffered directly and physically in the totalitarian regime (I hope that time and nature will take care of this, and not some person). After the death of the last victim of Nazi fascism, will it be constitutionally admissible to name streets, squares, and towns after persons who symbolize such regimes and to glorify their achievements (although with the excuse that they successfully dealt with unemployment and crime, that they provided pensions, built highways, encouraged economic growth, etc.) – if none of the statutorily determined privileged official and semi-official petitioners (in the case at issue, these are the National Assembly, one third of the deputies of the National Assembly, the National Council, the Government, and the Ombudsman for Human rights) defend human dignity, as they failed to do in the case at issue involving such naming?

4. Therefore, in my opinion, in cases such as the case at issue it cannot be otherwise than to accept the thesis with regard to the legal interest of every atomised bearer of human dignity that a petitioner does not need to particularly prove his or her direct, personal suffering – such is simply assumed; assumed already on the basis of the fact that he or she is entitled to human dignity as a human being and that by acts of official glorification of the symbols of totalitarianism (with this or that ideological-political connotation)<sup>1</sup> human dignity is jeopardised, hurt, humiliated – not yesterday, not tomorrow, but here and now. And that he or she is, being aware of his or her human essence, as a being endowed with reason and ethical sensibility, hurt because of it. I am wondering if also for challenging, for instance, laws on establishing concentration camps, on the execution of persons fleeing across the state border, on segregation, on secret political police, etc., legal interest would be recognised only to those who were or are directly personally hurt due to such (that is to say, concentration camp prisoners or shot, segregated, and monitored opponents of the regime). In order to challenge laws on establishing concentration camps for Jews or for persons holding different opinions, would a petitioner have to demonstrate that he or she is a Jew or holds different opinions? Would denying legal interest to an individual, a bearer of the sovereignty of the people, in such cases also entail denying his or her critical conscience and historical memory and thereby the right to control bearers of power (although such power naturally originates from him or her) – or would he or she be recognised such right only by casting a vote in an election every four years? Would this not entail a constitutional conceptualization of an individual as an apathetic, uninterested, static unit existing in limbo? Regardless of the fact that an individual (in addition to the courts) is the only one determined by the Constitution who can initiate proceedings before the Constitutional Court – other so-called privileged petitioners can initiate proceedings only if such is determined by a law.

1 From a constitutional perspective, totalitarianisms are entirely colourless and one-dimensional. It is utterly unimportant what nature any of them declares itself to be or what nature its opponents believe it to be – “left” or “right”, “progressive” or “reactionary”, “conservative” or “liberal”, religiously fundamentalist or fundamentalist atheistic. From the constitutional perspective, they are all the same – the same in their essence, entailing contempt for human dignity.

5. Therefore, in my opinion, the presumption holds true that upon the acts of authorities against human dignity, even if such “merely” concern a symbolic glorification of a regime based on systematic violations of human rights, every individual, a bearer of human dignity, is directly (personally) injured and therefore has a legal interest to challenge such acts of the authorities (regarding which it is correctly stated in paragraph 4 that they have legal effect with regard to everyone who encounters or apprehends such symbolic glorification). Only because he or she is a human being and because of such is assumed to be sensitive with regard to what is imminent and inalienable in humans – i.e. human dignity. Regardless of the fact whether he or she has experienced in person, directly, what it means to be monitored, politically persecuted, incarcerated because of a different conviction, world-view, skin colour, etc., and regardless of the fact whether he or she at all belonged to a social group whose human dignity was violated by a totalitarian regime. The matter concerns the question of on what to build the interpretation of the notion “legal interest”: on an active citizen, on an individual, who is, as stated by Stéphane Hessel, a free and active participant in the complex system of social relations who is aware of and therefore also assumes responsibility for the existence of the fundamental ethical consensus in society, i.e. universal agreement on, acceptance of, and respect for human dignity;<sup>2</sup> or on the “sand of individuals” who are focused on their own narrow private, direct, tangible (more or less financial) interests and benefits, on the uninterested, indifferent, apathetic masses, permeated by a lack of concern, resigned to their fate, the fundamental particles of which have in common only the conviction that, no matter what, they cannot change anything – and which, sooner or later (at least that is what historical experience teaches), become an easy target of totalitarianisms.<sup>3</sup>
6. There will be as much rule of human dignity as there will be individuals who are aware of this highest constitutional and civilization values and as much as they themselves are willing to do to affirm it.

Jan Zobec

---

2 Cf. The presentation of his booklet Time for Outrage! (French title: Indignez vous!) that was organised by Forum 21 in Ljubljana on 12 September 2011. On the active status of citizens, see also the German Federal Constitutional Court – R. Zuck, Das Recht der Verfassungsbeschwerde, C. H. Beck, München 2006, Marginal No. 9, 12, 13 and the cited decisions.

3 For more on such masses being like the humus from which totalitarianisms are born, see H. Arendt, Izvori totalitarizma (English title: The Origins of Totalitarianism), Claritas, Ljubljana 2003, pp. 388 et sub.

I join the concurring opinion of Judge Jan Zobec and I support it in its entirety. In cases which concern a question of fundamental values, especially human dignity, without the respect and protection thereof we cannot speak of real (true) democratic order and constitutional democracy, I cannot agree with the position that every human (citizen) is not called upon to protect these fundamental values, in the first place with all legal remedies, also with a petition for the review of the constitutionality of regulations that inadmissibly interfere with these fundamental values. Therefore, I strived for this to be clearly written in the Decision.

It is my deep conviction that the Constitutional Court is a guardian and guarantor of the constitutional order. In Decision No. Up-301/96, dated 15 January 1998 (Official Gazette RS, No. 13/98), the Constitutional Court stated that the historical mission of the Slovene Constitution includes its most fundamental goal, i.e. to prevent any attempt at restoring the totalitarian regime. The protection of this goal is also the task of the Constitutional Court. Naming a street after the most visible representative of the totalitarian system certainly does not (yet) entail an attempt at restoring such system. However, I completely agree with the position of the Decision at issue that in the new constitutional order, which is based on respect for human dignity, which is at the very core of the constitutional order of the Republic of Slovenia and is its foundation and one of the key reasons for Slovenia's independence, such new naming of a street no longer has a place. I deem that not only such new naming but also the existing names [of elements of the public infrastructure], if they bear such symbolic message, are determined to be unconstitutional in the Decision.

Mag. Miroslav Mozetič

I completely agree with and join the written opinion of Judge Mag. Miroslav Mozetič.

Jan Zobec

DECISION

At a session held on 20 March 1997, in proceedings to examine the petitions of Dr Aleksander Weingerl, Graz, Austria, and the Most svobode [Freedomsbridge] International Society, Maribor, represented by Ludvik Kolnik, attorney in Maribor, Adolf Arne Titus Perles from Cleveland, United States of America, represented by Bojan Ozimek, attorney in Ljubljana, Edeltraut Urbanc, Caracas, Venezuela, represented by Dr Anton Urbanc, Caracas, Venezuela, Martin Jaklič, Ljubljana, Karl Palm, Graz, Austria, represented by Aleš Vest, Ljubljana, Peter Krisper, Ljubljana, Peter and Nino Mihalek, Ljubljana, represented by Zdenka Štucin, attorney in Ljubljana, Carl Count de Villavicencio-Margheri, Ljubljana, and Anneliese Walsch, Schruns, Austria, represented by Dr Mirko Silvo Tischler, attorney in Ljubljana, and Maria Wogerer-Maclean, Knoxville, United States of America, represented by Dušan Ludvik Kolnik, attorney in Maribor, and in the proceedings to review constitutionality, initiated upon the petitions of Dr Aleksander Weingerl, Adolf Arne Titus Perles, Edeltraut Urbanc, Martin Jaklič, Karl Palm, Peter Krisper, Peter Mihalek, Nino Mihalek, and Maria Wogerer-Maclean, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. The provisions of the first and second paragraphs of Article 9 and the third paragraph of Article 63 of the Denationalisation Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 27/91 and 31/93) are not inconsistent with the Constitution.
2. The words “of the second paragraph” in the provision of Article 12 of the Denationalisation Act is abrogated.
3. The application of the provision of the second paragraph of Article 35 of the [Federal People’s Republic of Yugoslavia] Citizenship Act (Official Gazette DFY [Democratic Federal Yugoslavia], No. 64/45, and Official Gazette FPRY, Nos. 54/46 and 105/48) in proceedings for determining citizenship is not inconsistent with the Constitution.
4. The petition of Dr Aleksander Weingerl to review the constitutionality of the third paragraph of Article 9, and of Articles 10 and 11 of the Denationalisation Act, the petition of Arne Titus Perles to review the constitutionality of the third paragraph of Article 9 and the first paragraph of Article 10 of the Denationalisation Act, the petition of Carl Count de Villavicencio-Margheri, and the petition of Anneliesa Walsch to review the constitutionality of the third paragraph of Article 6, the second paragraph of Article 9, the third paragraph of Article 63 of the Denationalisation Act, and the second paragraph of Article 35 of the FPRY Citizenship Act, and the petition of the Freedomsbridge International Society to review the constitutionality of Articles 9, 10, 11, and 12 of the Denationalisation Act are rejected.

5. Each party to the proceedings bears their own costs of proceedings.

Reasoning

A

1. The petitioners, Dr Aleksander Weingerl and the Freedomsbridge International Society challenge Articles 9, 10, 11 and 12 of the Denationalisation Act (hereinafter referred to as the DenA). In the opinion of the petitioners, the cited provisions are not consistent with the provisions of Articles 14, 22, 23, and 26 of the Constitution and are contrary to the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide. It is alleged that, by excluding certain groups of people from exercising their right to denationalisation due to their national affiliation, the DenA violated the principle of equality and the principle of equal legal protection. In Articles 9, 11, and 12 of the DenA, which allegedly restrict the pool of those entitled to denationalisation, the Act supposedly confirmed the AVNOJ [Anitfašistični svet narodne osvoboditve Jugoslavije – the Anti-Fascist Council for the National Liberation of Yugoslavia] Decree of 1944 on the transition of enemy goods to state property. As a result, this validated a decree that enacted a genocide against persons of German nationality. The petitioner, Dr Aleksander Weingerl, based his legal interest for challenging the cited provisions on the fact that the assets of his mother and his father (deceased at the time), both of German nationality, were nationalised in 1945 on the basis of the AVNOJ Decree. A negative decision on citizenship was issued to the petitioner, who was allegedly the only heir. The Freedomsbridge International Society bases its legal interest on the fact that its statutorily defined task is to ensure that human rights are in fact exercised, and the petitioner, Dr Aleksander Weingerl, is a member thereof. The petitioners' attorney demanded the costs of proceedings to be reimbursed.
2. The petitioner, Adolf Arne Titus Perles, challenges Article 9, the first paragraph of Article 10, Article 12, and the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA on the grounds of non-compliance with Articles 8, 14, 153, and 155 of the Constitution. In the opinion of the petitioner, Article 9 violates the principle of equality since, in addition to the conditions for obtaining the status of beneficiary under Article 3 of the DenA, it adds new conditions, allegedly failing to treat persons equally, which is contrary to the principle of fairness and the general principles of international law. It is alleged that the provision of Article 9 contradicts itself since, according to the first paragraph of the article, the position of the beneficiary is tied to citizenship, but, according to the second paragraph, it is linked to records of citizens, thereby supposedly not treating persons of German nationality, whose assets were nationalised as Yugoslav citizens, to the same standard as the rest of the population. The nationalisation of assets is said to have taken place in 1945, whereas an amendment to the second paragraph of Article 35 of the FPRY Citizenship Act (hereinafter referred to as the CA) was implemented in 1948. In this way, the authority at the time retroactively revoked the citizenship of all persons of German nationality who were staying abroad, without first determining whether they had been disloyal. The second paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA is thus believed to have enacted, in conflict with the principles of international law, the retroactive effect of the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA which was used to convict a specific group of individuals without due process and a court ruling, contrary to general principles of law. The provision of the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA is believed to be unconstitutional since it prevents the determination of (dis)loyal conduct. According to democratic principles, it should be admissible to present evidence, if it exists, of individuals not fighting on the side of the Fascists, or such facts would need to be determined by the relevant administrative authority. According to the provisions of the first paragraph of Article 10, Articles 11, and 12, the pool of beneficiaries was said to be determined in conflict with the principle of fairness and equality, thereby also making these provisions contrary to Articles 8 and 153 of the Constitution. The petitioner demonstrated his legal interest by the fact that he, as the legal heir of Pavlo Perles and Franc Perles, whose assets were nationalised based on the AVNOJ Decree owing to them being persons of German nationality, had an interest in annulling the challenged provisions, as they prevented him from inheriting the assets. A negative decision on citizenship was issued to both of the aforementioned persons, as well as to the petitioner's two uncles who were allegedly found not to have been citizens of FPRY as they had no right of domicile in the Kingdom of Yugoslavia as on 6 April 1941.

3. The petitioner, Edeltraut Urbanc, challenges the provisions of the second paragraph of Article 9, the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA, and the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA. In the opinion of the petitioner, the last provision is contrary to the provisions of Articles 14, 32, 61, and 63 of the Constitution, and she therefore urges the Constitutional Court to prohibit its use. Similarly, she proposes the abrogation of the listed provisions of the DenA, as they explicitly provide for the application of the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA. Persons of German nationality were allegedly forcibly displaced after the Second World War, with the Slovene legislature allegedly denying them the right to citizenship merely for reasons of national affiliation, since it made no distinction between loyal and disloyal citizens. This is allegedly contrary to the spirit of the Constitution and to the general principles of international law. Here, during the procedure for determining citizenship, the administrative bodies were allegedly using data from the population census, which was conducted in 1941, contrary to Article 38 of the Constitution. The petitioner, Edeltraut Urbanc, bases her legal interest on the fact that, according to the third paragraph of Article 63, she was issued a negative decision in the proceedings on determining the citizenship for the reasons specified in the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA, and that the assets of her father were allegedly confiscated in 1945.

4. The petitioners, Carl Count de Villavicencio-Margheri, and Anneliese Walsch, challenge the third paragraph of Article 6, the second paragraph of Article 9, and the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA, as well as the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA. They argue that the challenged provisions are inconsistent with Articles 2, 14, 21, 22, and 25 of the Constitution. It is alleged that the aforementioned provisions are not consistent with Article 2 of the Constitution, given that the proceedings under the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA cannot serve as the basis for establishing that the affected persons whose assets were dispossessed being of German nationality did not commit any criminal offence, or that they could demonstrate solidarity with the liberation movement as anti-Nazis. The challenged provision was also contrary to the principle of the state governed by the rule of law as it limited evidence during the enforcement of rights, thus allegedly representing also inconsistency with Article 22 of the Constitution. The petitioners believe that the Decree, based on which the assets were dispossessed, was inconsistent with the principles of the state governed by the rule of law. The Constitutional Court had supposedly already abrogated such general acts in similar cases (in case No. U-I-6/93; OdlUS III, 33). In this case, the sanction was ostensibly founded on the national status of an individual, allegedly imposing it without bringing charges against the individual and without the individual being convicted. The petitioners believe that the assets were seized contrary to the provisions of Articles 2, 10, 11, and 17 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the provisions of Articles 14, 15, 26, and 27 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (Official Gazette SFRY [- Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia], MP, No. 7/71). They also refer to the provision of Article 6 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR) and draw attention to Article 4 of Protocol No. 4 and Article 1 of Protocol No. 7 to this Convention. This was allegedly a collective removal of citizenship, including expulsion, and the collective dispossession of assets, therefore a collective punishment. Therefore, this purportedly was an unlawful measure based on the grounds of race and nationality, and therefore contrary to Article 14 of the Constitution, Article 14 of the ECHR, and Article 2 of the aforementioned international covenant. The inability to prove loyalty during the Second World War is also said to be contrary to the protection of human personality and dignity – contrary to Article 21 of the Constitution. This provision allegedly deprived individuals of the right to be a subject in proceedings before a state authority; human dignity was said to be trampled over by establishing the presumption of Nazi collaboration without the possibility of demonstrating the truth. The provision is also allegedly contrary to Article 25 of the Constitution, since all the decisions issued on the basis of the challenged provision allegedly failed to contain the reasons supporting the decisive facts. As proof of their claims, the petitioners refer to the positions of the Constitutional Court in cases

Nos, U-I-20/92 (OdlUS I, 85), U-I-98/91 (OdlUS I, 101), and U-I-69/92 (OdlUS I, 102). They also refer to the practice of the European Commission of Human Rights and the case law of the Austrian Constitutional Court. In the opinion of the petitioners, the general provision of the third paragraph of Article 6 of the DenA is believed to be questionable as it enables discrimination. The possibility of discrimination lies in the fact that it does not determine the exclusions and limitations which should be taken into account, causing the provision to be indeterminable and allegedly open to arbitrary application. The petitioners also draw attention to the legal criticism of the decision of the Czech Constitutional Court, which ruled on a similar petition brought by Sudeten Germans.

5. The petitioner, Carl Count de Villavicencio-Margheri, bases his legal interest on the fact that he lodged a denationalisation claim and that a decision had been issued in proceedings on determining citizenship on the basis of the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA, establishing that the petitioner's father could not be deemed a Yugoslav citizen. The petitioner, Anneliese Walsch, bases her legal interest on the assertions that she lodged a denationalisation claim and that it was found during proceedings on determining citizenship that her parents were considered Yugoslav citizens. The procedure of denationalisation has yet to be completed, but the finding regarding citizenship under the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA is alleged to have come into question on account of the Act on Temporary, Partial Suspension of Assets Restitution (Official Gazette RS, No. 74/95).
6. The petitioner, Maria Wogerer-Maclean, similarly challenges the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA. She believes that the challenged provision is inconsistent with Articles 14, 27, and 61 of the Constitution. She alleges that the provision of the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA is a retaliatory measure, alongside the AVNOJ Decree, directed at persons of German nationality. It supposedly punishes Yugoslav citizens of German nationality who, owing to their disloyalty and occasional criminal behaviour during the war, did not deserve Yugoslav citizenship. According to the explanation of the Ministry of the Interior, this provision is said to have applied retroactively from 28 August 1945, despite the administrative bodies allegedly determining whether a person was of German nationality and his absence from the state as on 4 December 1948. The Supreme Court is allegedly of the same opinion, and interprets the challenged provision as being a statutory fiction, implying that the disloyal behaviour requirement is a given for persons who are not registered in the record of citizens, and so an administrative authority is not required to determine this and the party at issue in the proceedings cannot challenge it. In the opinion of the petitioner, when the Supreme Court interpreted the challenged provision, it thereby accepted a position of presumed guilt, that the party to proceedings cannot challenge, and this is contrary to the provisions of Article 27 of the Constitution.
7. The petitioner, Maria Wogerer-Maclean, bases her legal interest on the fact that she requested the determination of citizenship on the basis of Article 29 of the Citizenship of the Republic of Slovenia Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 1/91-I, 30/91-I, and 38/92 – hereinafter referred to as the CRSA). Pursuant to the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA, the responsible authority issued a joint decision on her request and the application submitted subsequently by the body responsible for conducting the denationalisation procedure, in accordance with which the petitioner was deemed not to be a Yugoslav citizen.

8. The petitioners, Martin Jaklič, Peter Mihalek, and Nino Mihalek, challenge Article 12 of the DenA. Due to the restriction to the first line of succession, the petitioner, Martin Jaklič, challenges this Article as it puts other legal successors in an unequal position, thereby restricting the constitutionally protected right to inheritance under Article 33 of the Constitution. This petitioner substantiates his legal interest by stating he is one of the nephews who lodged a claim for the denationalisation of the assets confiscated from his aunt. She left Yugoslavia as an “exile” [optant] in the exodus of Gottscheers in 1942. The petitioners, Peter and Nino Mihalek, believe that the challenged provision is contrary to the principle of fairness and the principle of equality before the law because it refers only to persons of German nationality, and the petitioners are the legal successors of an Italian citizen of Slovene descent who was married to a Slovene and Yugoslav citizen and whose children are also Slovenes holding Slovene citizenship. The petitioners substantiate their legal interest by the fact that the competent authority rejected their denationalisation claims, stating in the reasoning that the challenged provision relates only to cases where the natural person referred to in the second paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA is not a beneficiary under the DenA.
9. The petitioners, Karl Palm and Peter Krisper, challenge the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA for reasons of non-conformity with Article 14 of the Constitution. The petitioner, Karl Palm, believes that the challenged provision is contrary to the Constitution, as it retroactively interfered with the rights of persons who supposedly held Yugoslav citizenship pursuant to the Citizenship Act of 1945. In unlawful proceedings, the FPRY allegedly found the majority of citizens of German, Austrian or Hungarian nationality to be disloyal, before expulsing them and retroactively depriving them of their citizenship in 1948. The petitioner demonstrates his legal interest by the fact that, during the procedure for determining citizenship pursuant to third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA, he was issued a negative decision on the grounds referred to in the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA. The petitioner, Peter Krisper, believes that the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA is also contrary to the freedom of movement referred to in Article 32 of the Constitution and the right to expression of national affiliation referred to in Article 61 of the Constitution. He bases his legal interest on the fact that his parent’s assets were confiscated pursuant to the AVNOJ Decree, as they were persons of German nationality and due to the negative declaratory decision on citizenship issued on the grounds stemming from the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA, the restitution of assets within the denationalisation procedure became impossible.
10. The petitions were submitted to the National Assembly. The National Assembly replied to the petitions under Paras. 1 through 3 and Paras 8 and 9 of this reasoning. According to the position of the National Assembly, the challenged provisions are not contrary to the Constitution, the generally valid principles of international law or treaties. The National Assembly believes that the CA dating back to the years after the Second World War cannot be subject to a review of constitutionality since it had already ceased to be valid for decades prior to the implementation of the Constitution; it would, however, be possible to review the constitutionality of only those provisions of the DenA which relate to the use of this statutory regulation in the procedures currently being conducted, i.e. the provisions of Articles 9, 10, and 11 and the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA. These provisions are allegedly also not contrary to the prohibition of retroactivity determined in Article 155 of the Constitution, since the DenA affects the already completed legal relations only from its enactment onward for the legitimate purpose of remedying injustices in favour of dispossessed assets beneficiaries. It is also alleged that the DenA is not contrary to the right to private property under Article 33 of the Constitution, given that it is only on the basis of this Act that private property with respect to socialised assets was established, meaning the Act does not seize assets, interfere with them and places no restrictions on them. The National Assembly believes that Article 9 of the DenA is not contrary to Article 14 of the Constitution, since the two conditions for determining the beneficiary status, i.e. the original ownership of the assets and Yugoslav citizenship, are defined equally for all beneficiaries. The Yugoslav citizenship criterion is supposedly founded on the principle of legal continuity and expressed in the Constitutional Act Implementing the Basic Constitutional Charter on the Independence and Sovereignty of the Republic of Slovenia by the fact that the Kingdom of Yugoslavia was not only a victim of the fascist coalition's aggression during the Second World War but was also occupied, as well as by the fact that the FPRY entered into a number of peace treaties with other states that oblige foreign states (Italy, Hungary and Austria) to compensate their citizens for the assets seized from them in Yugoslavia, which is also purportedly expressly regulated by the provision of Article 10 of the DenA.

11. The National Assembly is of the view that the second paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA does not make a distinction in terms of the right to denationalisation by nationality of the person affected, but by that person's position or activity during the war. This provision allegedly enables persons of German nationality who lived abroad to be beneficiaries if they had been interned or fought on the side of the anti-fascist coalition. In addition, the provision of the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA allegedly favours beneficiaries, since it allegedly prevents the aversion of the affected persons to the previous political regime from being considered as disloyalty. In the opinion of the National Assembly, all of those persons affected who require the determination of their Yugoslav citizenship in declaratory proceedings conducted by competent authorities, have the possibility of lodging legal remedies, including judicial protection in a judicial review of administrative acts procedure. Therefore, they should be guaranteed equal protection of their rights in accordance with Articles 22, 23, and 25 of the Constitution. The challenged provisions are supposedly not discriminatory but instead serve as exceptions to the basic criterion for denationalisation eligibility, which are necessary given the different circumstances, status, and actions of potential beneficiaries. The National Assembly believes that the DenA does not recognise or tolerate genocide, nor does it restrict freedom of movement or the expression of national affiliation.

12. The provision of Article 12 of the DenA is not contrary to the Constitution, since, in the opinion of the National Assembly, the DenA does not regulate the issue of inheritance, but determines who denationalisation beneficiaries are, and in addition regulates this issue as a further exception in favour of the closest relatives (spouses and descendants) of the persons whose assets were seized, but were not Yugoslav citizens. The National Assembly believes that this statutory regulation is not contrary to the principle of equality nor to Article 67 of the Constitution, since the second paragraph of this article specifies that a law will determine the conditions and methods of inheritance, which in Slovenia and in other countries does not provide the same status and equal rights to all heirs, depending on their relation to the decedent.
13. The positions of the National Assembly were submitted to the petitioners who responded to its statements. All the petitioners insist on the alleged inconsistency of the challenged provisions, supplementing their statements in response to the National Assembly's position.
14. The petitioners, Dr Aleksander Weingerl and the Freedomsbridge International Society, further state that the seizure of assets was enacted when it was published in the Official Gazette DFY, dated 6 February 1945, and its entry into force was retroactively determined for 21 November 1944, when the AVNOJ resolution that all persons of German descent lose Yugoslav citizenship, all civil rights and all their assets are confiscated and converted to state property was allegedly adopted. An obligatory interpretation of point 2 of Article 1 of the AVNOJ Decree was published in the Official Gazette DFY, No. 39/45. The petitioners believe that the legislature overlooked the fact that person's assets were confiscated pursuant to the second paragraph of Article 1 only if that person was a Yugoslav citizen. The confiscation decisions supposedly always indicated that a Yugoslav citizen was involved. Therefore the citizenship of persons of German nationality was not deprived by the CA dated 28 August 1945, but no earlier than by the amendment to this Act in 1948, which cumulatively determined three conditions for deregistration from the register of citizens; in reality, only the absence of a person from the state was determined. According to the assertions of the petitioner, no examination of disloyalty took place, and German nationality was said to be determined via a subsequently composed list of Kulturbund members. This list was allegedly compiled in 1948 for expropriation purposes and was not identical to the original Kulturbund member lists, which supposedly had not been preserved in their entirety. By not applying one of the aforementioned cumulatively determined conditions, the regulation in fact became stricter, not more lenient. In addition, the second paragraph of Article 9 and the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA supposedly transferred the burden of demonstrating loyalty to the beneficiary, further restricting the beneficiary in the demonstration of loyalty to submitting evidence of internment or fighting on the side of the anti-fascist coalition.

15. The confiscation of assets was supposedly carried out in 1946, while the provision regarding registration in the record of citizens to which the second paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA refers, i.e. an amendment to the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA, was promulgated no earlier than in the Official Gazette FPRY, No. 105/48. The second paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA allegedly explicitly determined that citizenship needs to be determined at the time the assets were dispossessed, with the entry in the register of citizens. The petitioners believe it should be noted that the registers of citizens were only introduced in 1947, whereupon the first entry made was based on permanent residence notifications and homeland registers. An individual deported after the war was therefore never entered in the register of citizens, and the amendment to the CA in 1948 supposedly only legalised the already implemented situation. The petitioners believe that the DenA re-enacts the application of the CA, thereby supposedly demonstrating the need to review the constitutionality of these provisions, and clearly expressing the legislature's intention in this regard for persons of German nationality to not enjoy the same rights as other beneficiaries. The petitioners reiterate that it is not possible to consider persons born in Slovenia as foreigners, thereby substantiating the alleged inconsistency with Article 14 of the Constitution. They also draw attention to the fact that the competent ministry uses the provision of the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA retroactively, despite the amendment of 1948 not applying retroactively and, consequently, the application of this provision was not even consistent with the constitution valid at the time. The petitioners also believe that the procedures determining citizenship reveal that the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA is not used to the benefit of beneficiaries, but instead clearly to their detriment. The competent authorities' reference to national origin is allegedly also directly contrary to Article 14 of the Constitution.
16. The petitioners also state that, based on the treaty on implementing the provisions of the Austrian State Treaty, symbolic damages were only awarded to Austrian citizens who had Austrian citizenship prior to 1938 and those who regained it in April 1945; similarly, damages were supposedly also awarded to the citizens of the German Reich in the Federal Republic of Germany. However, damages were not awarded to persons whose properties were nationalised as Yugoslav citizens of German nationality. The petitioners believe that the principle of legal continuity, expressed in the Constitutional Act Implementing the Basic Constitutional Charter on the Independence and Sovereignty of the Republic of Slovenia, has no direct connection with this issue and that the argument regarding the occupation of the Kingdom of Yugoslavia on the part of the fascist coalition is irrelevant in the legal sense. The petitioners believe that, in accordance with Article 2 of the Constitution, the challenged provisions need to be abrogated, given that the condition of Yugoslav citizenship is allegedly set only in order to exclude from the denationalisation process those persons of German nationality who were deported after the Second World War and now live abroad. The petitioners believe that the principle of equality is also binding on the legislature, which must ensure equal rights for everyone, and implies a general ban on discrimination that is not based on facts but instead on personal characteristics such as race, sex, or even nationality. Even if it is not evident from the wording of a law itself, inequality is also said to exist whenever apparent inequality exists when applying a law. The petitioners believe it is also necessary to take into account that the first paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA does not make the beneficiary's status contingent on being a citizen of the Republic of Slovenia, but on the citizenship of some other state, as a result of which the legislature will not be able to base its different treatment on Articles 13 and 68 of the Constitution.

17. The petitioners believe that the challenged provisions are contrary also to the provisions of Article 14 of the EHCR and Article 1 of Protocol No. 1 to this Convention, dated 20 March 1952. Respect for property should not only be interpreted as the effective protection of property and the enjoyment of rights stemming from property, but also its restitution if the property has been dispossessed in an unlawful manner and contrary to Article 14 of the Convention. The petitioners also refer to the reasoning of the Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-75/92, dated 31 March 1994 (OdlUS III, 27) regarding remedying the consequences incurred due to the implementation of the regulations that violated human rights and fundamental freedoms. The challenged provisions are said to have violated these rights by introducing a distinction on the grounds of nationality. They believe that fairness also requires the restitution of the assets at issue.
18. The petitioner, Adolf Arne Titus Perles, contests the claim of the National Assembly that the alleged retroactivity in the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA is unfounded, as well as the claim that the provisions of Articles 9, 10, and 12, and the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA favour the beneficiaries. The provision of the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA allegedly prevents beneficiaries from knowing what type of disloyalty they have been accused of committing, and prevents beneficiaries from refuting this "conviction" or "qualification". The petitioner believes that it is clear from the very reasoning of the National Assembly that aversion to the previous regime alone was deemed to be disloyal. In the opinion of the petitioner, the National Assembly should also clarify how it is possible that a natural person whose assets were nationalised in 1945 was not entered in the register of citizens that year due to the grounds referred to in the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA, which was implemented in 1948. The petitioner believes that the second paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA inadmissibly equates the citizenship status with the entry of persons in the records, whereas the individual was not informed as to whether he/she was entered in the records and did not have any legal remedy to appeal such decision.
19. The petitioners, Edeltraut Urbanc and Peter Krisper, further state that in the procedure for determining citizenship the competent administrative authority limits itself only to determining German nationality and residence abroad. By consistently denying persons of German nationality entry into the register of citizenship, the administrative authority is supposedly guilty of ethnic discrimination contrary to Article 14 of the Constitution and to treaties. The petitioner, Edeltraut Urbanc, believes that the second paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA confirms this discrimination, or even intensifies it when compared with the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA. The latter allegedly at least required a distinction between persons of German nationality to those who were loyal and those who were disloyal, whereas the Slovene legislature supposedly treated all these individuals the same. The challenged provisions are thus said to be contrary to Articles 16, 61 and 153 of the Constitution and contrary to Article 14 of the EHCR and Article 2 of Protocol 4 to this Convention. The petitioner, Peter Krisper, also believes that guaranteed judicial protection in judicial review of administrative acts procedure is of no help to a beneficiary precisely because of the provision of the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA.

20. The petitioner, Karl Palm, states that the competent authority issued him a decision of rejection regarding citizenship on the basis of the provision of the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA, which the National Assembly claims is no longer valid. In the petitioner's opinion, it should be noted that also all the Slovenes who were deported on account of the communist revolution and to whom German nationality was supposedly ascribed by UDBA (state security agency) are categorised as persons of German nationality who were deported after the war. The petitioner was placed on this list out of personal revenge. The petitioner believes that the provision of the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA is detrimental to beneficiaries, since it significantly alters the original intention of the challenged provision of the CA. The Citizenship Act adopted in 1945 was intended to impose sanctions on those members of German nationality who, through their actions, harmed the interests of the nations and state of Yugoslavia, while the amendment of 1948 introduced sanctions against those persons of German nationality who, as victims of the terror imposed by the authority at the time, were supposedly deported from their homeland on account of their assets. The third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA supposedly, by removing the loyalty condition, imposed sanctions on persons who were forcibly deported from Slovenia, who were allegedly attributed German nationality by repressive authorities, overlooking whether or not the individual was a criminal. The challenged provision of the CA, which the Ministry of the Interior uses with retroactive effect despite it being allegedly unclear from the amendment to the CA introduced in 1948 that this Act could be applied retroactively, allegedly allows the arbitrary use of this Act. This is said to be evident from the fact that citizenship is recognised for some persons and not for others in the same circumstances. The amendment to the CA of 1948 supposedly also introduced a review of citizenship (Article 35.a) which has been said to also allow for the retroactive removal of citizenship. The petitioner was supposedly entered in the electoral register with the Kranj Local Court Decision, dated 28 September 1945, which means that his citizenship was also recognised at the time. The petitioner was said to have been forcibly taken to a concentration camp in Maribor and deported to Austria in April 1946 based on a secret list of "Volksdeutsche" by the president of the Local National Committee. The petitioner believes that it is legally inadmissible that the authorities of the Ministry of the Interior repeat UDBA procedures from 1945 in terms of content and methodology for the purpose of changing facts that were legally attested by the Kranj Local Court in 1945.

21. In the proceedings examining the petition, clarifications regarding the petitions were also obtained from the Ministry of Justice and the Ministry of the Interior. The Ministry of Justice believes that the DenA does not take away property rights and that the right to denationalisation is not tied to personal circumstances but instead to citizenship. The issue with regard Article 12 and the first paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA is the suitability of the regulatory framework which is to be determined by the legislature. The Ministry of Justice believes that the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA no longer applies as of 1 January 1965. In addition to not being able to determine disloyalty under the provisions of the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA, the systemic regulatory framework, according to which an administrative decision may be rendered void, allegedly enables that the confiscation of assets decisions are challenged in all cases where the previous owner was not in fact a German national. The Ministry of Justice lists the conclusion of agreements on global compensation which the former state entered into with other states in order to compensate for the damage sustained by the nationalisation of assets as the reason why foreigners are not eligible for denationalisation. The provision of the second paragraph of Article 9 and Article 12 of the DenA, as well as the provision of the first paragraph of Article 10 of the DenA, supposedly expand the pool of denationalisation beneficiaries; therefore, it supposedly cannot be considered a restriction or instance of unequal treatment. The provision of Article 11 of the DenA is said to be of a legally technical nature, as the assets of a deceased person cannot be nationalised, since the deceased loses ownership of the assets at the time of death.
22. The Ministry of the Interior explained that the first paragraph of Article 35 of the CA specifies that all persons who were domiciled in one of the Yugoslav municipalities as on 6 April 1941 obtained citizenship of the FPRY, since records of the rights of domicile were kept in the Kingdom of Yugoslavia, but no citizen records. The Ministry is not aware of the practice for determining citizenship prior to the introduction of the registers of citizens which were introduced with the Rules on Implementing FPRY Citizenship (Official Gazette FPRY, No. 98/46). The entries made in the register of citizens were not constitutive in nature, and records were never kept of negative declaratory decisions that could have been issued. The CA was supplemented in 1948 (Official Gazette FPRY, No. 105/48) with the second paragraph of Article 35, which is being challenged in these proceedings, with the provision having retroactive effect. In the opinion of the Ministry, the persons referred to in the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA did not become citizens of the FPRY and could not be entered in the registers of citizens. When assessing the citizenship of persons who were discovered to have failed to become citizens of the FPRY based on the second paragraph of Article 35, the Ministry of the Interior took into account evidence of German nationality (origin, personal statements made at the beginning of the occupation in 1941 when the population census was conducted, deciding for the German Reich at the time of Slovenia's division, Kulturbund membership, Heimatbund or Volksbund membership if the person in question obtained permanent German citizenship based on the Nazi Decree of 1941) and of absence from the FPRY, at no point assessing the disloyalty condition under the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA. The Ministry obtains evidence of German nationality from the Archives of the Republic of Slovenia, the Institute of Contemporary History, regional archives and museums, the archives of district courts and the Archives of the Ministry of the Interior. According to statements provided by the Ministry, the existence of disloyal behaviour was established immediately after the Second World War on the basis of checks performed by the secret services, which now cannot be verified retroactively owing to the substantial length of time that has elapsed. That is also the reason for the enactment of the provision of the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA. The Ministry of the Interior explicitly draws attention to the distinction made between the persons referred to in the third paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA (whose citizenship, which they held and obtained on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 35 of the CA, was revoked by way of a decision) and the persons referred to in the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA, who never became citizens of the FPRY. The Ministry of the Interior believes that the regulations associated with the protection of personal data and the regulations regarding population censuses are irrelevant, singling out the provision of Article 39 of the CRSA, which ensures legal continuity with the previous legal orders, as being important.

B – I

23. The Constitutional Court joined the petitions mentioned in part A of the reasoning for their joint consideration and decision-making.
24. The Constitutional Court first examined whether it had the jurisdiction to assess the provisions of the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA, and whether the petitioners had demonstrated a legal interest in challenging the individual provisions of the law. Pursuant to the provision of Article 24 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), anyone who demonstrates legal interest may lodge a petition to initiate proceedings. Legal interest is deemed to be demonstrated if a regulation or general act issued for the exercise of public authority, the review of which has been requested by the petitioner, directly interferes with his rights, legal interests, or legal position.
25. The CA did not become a constituent part of the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia on 25 June 1995, as it was not in force at the time. In general, the Constitutional Court cannot decide on the constitutionality of a law which has ceased to be valid prior to the lodging of a petition. However, the Constitutional Court may review the constitutionality of such regulation if it is still in use and the petitioner requires constitutional court protection. The Constitutional Court already adopted such a position in Decision No. U-I-6/93, dated 1 April 1994 (OdlUS III, 33), and Decision No. U-I-67/94, dated 21 March 1996 (OdlUS V, 31). In this respect, the constitutionality of the regulation as such is not reviewed, but a review is made whether its use in ongoing individual legal proceedings could be constitutionally inadmissible. In accordance with the provision of Article 39 of the CRSA, when determining the citizenship of an individual it is necessary to apply the regulations regarding citizenship from the individual's birth to the day of the determination of citizenship. This means that the competent authority may also apply the provision of the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA in current proceedings, and issue a declaratory decision on the existence or non-existence of citizenship on this basis. A provision which does not apply in the formal legal sense is thus used in its entirety in current proceedings. Such application of a legal provision cannot remain beyond the scope of the review of the Constitutional Court, if a petitioner demonstrates a need for judicial protection of his or her rights or positions. The petitioners, Karl Palm, Peter Krisper, and Edeltraut Urbanc, demonstrate a legal interest to review the constitutionality of the use of this legal provision, since a negative declaratory decision was issued to them and to their predecessors, precisely on the basis of this statutory provision in proceedings for determining citizenship.

26. The petitioner, Edeltraut Urbanc, also demonstrates a legal interest to review the constitutionality of the second paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA and the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA, since the former provision regulates which persons who were not Yugoslav citizens under the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA are nevertheless deemed beneficiaries, and the latter provision prevents the petitioner from putting forward the objection of loyalty in proceedings determining citizenship in connection with denationalisation according to the valid practice of the competent administrative authorities and case law of the Supreme Court.
27. The petitioner, Dr Aleksander Weingerl, fails to demonstrate a legal interest for challenging the provisions of the third paragraph of Article 9, Article 10, and Article 11 of the DenA. The provision of the third paragraph of Article 9 refers to persons whose assets were nationalised as a result of the termination of citizenship by way of revocation, while the provision of the first paragraph of Article 10 refers to persons from the Zone B region of the Free Territory of Trieste, to whom citizenship was recognised in 1947. The two cited provisions do not directly interfere with the rights of the petitioner. Their potential abrogation would not alter the legal position of the petitioner. Similarly, the provision of the second paragraph of Article 10 of the DenA does not alter the legal position of the petitioner. It is evident from treaties in which compensation for nationalised assets was agreed with individual foreign states (including Austria) that the compensation obligation was assumed by these states only for persons who were their citizens either prior to the war or at the time of the assets nationalisation at the latest. Even a possible abrogation of the provision of Article 11 of the DenA would not alter the petitioner's legal position, since according to his own statements, a negative decision was issued both for him and for his father, putting the petitioner in the same legal position, if it were deemed that the assets were transferred to the heirs on the day of his father's death and nationalised in relation to them, as though it were deemed that the persons to whom the decision regarding nationalisation was actually referring to were the beneficiaries.
28. For the reasons cited in the previous Paragraph of this reasoning, the petitioner, Adolf Arne Titus Perles, also fails to demonstrate his legal interest for challenging the provision of the third paragraph of Article 9 and the first paragraph of Article

10 of the DenA. The petitioner does not separately substantiate his legal interest in relation to the provision of Article 11 of the DenA, but it is possible to conclude from his other statements that he fails to demonstrate his legal interest. The determination of citizenship is said to have been requested for all his legal predecessors, thereby making it impossible to conclude that this provision interferes directly with the petitioner's legal position.

29. The Freedomsbridge International Society has not demonstrated its legal interest for challenging the provisions of the DenA. These provisions do not interfere with the rights or legal position that it holds as an association. The legal interest of this society for challenging the provisions which directly interfere with the rights or legal position of its members, however, cannot be recognised on the basis of its general endeavours for human rights and fundamental freedoms.
30. The petitioner, Carl Count de Villavicencio-Margheri, did not demonstrate his legal interest for challenging the provision of the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA. It is clear from the petitioner's assertions that he is challenging the mentioned provision in the part specifying that it is impossible to determine the existence of disloyal actions against the interests of the nations and state of the FPRY in proceedings determining citizenship for the purpose of a denationalisation procedure, i.e. the part in which the provision requires the modified use of the provision of the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA in proceedings determining citizenship. It is evident from the decision of the Ministry of the Interior enclosed by the petitioner that, in determining the citizenship of the petitioner's predecessor, the provision of the second paragraph of Article 35 was not applied at all. According to the aforementioned decision, the petitioner's predecessor did not become a citizen of the then People's Republic of Slovenia and FPRY owing to the provisions of the first paragraph of Article 35 and Article 37 of the CA. Therefore, any possible abrogation of the provision of the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA in the part which refers to the use of the provision of the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA, cannot directly affect the petitioner's legal position. His legal position was determined by the provision of the first paragraph of Article 35 of the CA and the first paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA, which the petitioner is not challenging. Therefore, the petitioner also does not demonstrate a legal interest to review the provision of the second paragraph of Article 35 of the DenA or to review the second paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA. The petitioner did not state how the potential abrogation of the provision of the third paragraph of Article 6 of the DenA could alter his legal position. Therefore, the legal interest to challenge such provision was also not demonstrated.
31. Similarly, the petitioner, Anneliese Walsch, failed to demonstrate a legal interest to challenge the second paragraph of Article 9, the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA or the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA. The petitioner herself states that it was established during the procedure for determining citizenship of her legal predecessors that her parents were citizens of the People's Republic of Slovenia and FPRY and her assertions are confirmed by the documents enclosed with her petition. The two decisions determining the citizenship of her mother and father were based on the provision of the first paragraph of Article 35 and Article 37 of the CA. Even in this case, as in the cases referred to in the previous Paragraph of the reasoning, the provision of the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA was not applied. Therefore, any abrogation of the second paragraph of Article 9 and the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA in the part that is also challenged by the petitioner, or a potential ban on the application of the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA, cannot bring about a change to her legal position, notwithstanding the provisions of the Act on Temporary, Partial Suspension of Assets Restitution, the constitutionality of which was decided by the Constitutional Court with Decision No. U-I-107/96 dated 5 December 1996 (Official Gazette RS, No. 1/97). Much like the petitioner referred to in the previous Paragraph of this reasoning, this petitioner also demonstrated a legal interest to challenge the provision of the third paragraph of Article 6 of the DenA.

32. The Constitutional Court dismissed in whole or in part the petitions for which the petitioners did not demonstrate a legal interest. The Constitutional Court accepted for consideration the petitions that challenged the first and second paragraphs of Article 9, Article 12, the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA, and the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA, initiated proceedings to review constitutionality and, on the basis of the fourth paragraph of Article 26 of the CCA, immediately proceeded to decide on the merits of the case.

B – II

33. The first paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA reads:

“The natural persons referred to in Articles 3, 4, and 5 of this Act are deemed beneficiaries if they were Yugoslav citizens at the time their assets were nationalised, and this citizenship was recognised after 9 May 1945 by law or treaty”.

This provision sets one of the fundamental rules for assessing whether a person whose assets were nationalised was entitled to denationalisation. This rule requires that the person held the status of a Yugoslav citizen at the time of nationalisation and that this citizenship was recognised after 9 May 1945 by law or treaty. As is evident from the materials for the adoption of the DenA in the legislative process, the intention of the legislature was to remedy within the framework of possibilities the injustices that were committed, particularly during the post-war period regarding the interference of the state in ownership relations on account of the so-called revolutionary transformation of society at the time and on account of dealing with enemies of the regime. To that end, the legislature adopted the premise that all disposessions of assets based on regulations and acts of the state and its authorities during a specific period that interfered with the private property of Yugoslav citizens were, as a rule, deemed injustices unless they received appropriate compensation (proposal to adopt the DenA, including the draft law, Gazette of the People's Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia, No. 7/91). Denationalisation is also intended to privatise that part of the social property which was created through the unjust nationalisation of private property, by returning the assets to the owner or his legal successors as priority beneficiaries in the process of social property privatisation. The Constitutional Court agrees with the National Assembly's position that the DenA does not take possession over assets and does not interfere with property rights, but under specific conditions allows the acquisition of the title to property which until now had been social property. The DenA did not abrogate regulations and individual decisions, on the basis of which nationalisation was carried out during the post-war period. These regulations interfered with property rights at the time the assets were nationalised. Therefore, in this respect, questions cannot be raised regarding the constitutional admissibility of restricting property rights and so the challenged provisions of the DenA are not contrary to Article 33 of the Constitution and to Article 1 of Protocol No. 1 to the ECHR. Similarly, they are also not contrary to Article 155 of the Constitution, which invokes a ban on retroactive regulations. The Constitutional Court may therefore not assess the constitutionality of regulations which serve as the basis for denationalisation under Article 3 of the DenA but are now no longer valid or used, and may only assess the constitutionality of specific provisions of the DenA. Therefore, the Constitutional Court did not review the assertions of the petitioners in so far as they allege that the Decree which served as the basis for the dispossession of the assets was unconstitutional and which the DenA categorised among the legal bases for denationalisation.

34. The legislature enacted a distinction between persons whose assets were nationalised on the basis of regulations referred to in Article 3 of the DenA depending on whether they were considered Yugoslav citizens at the time of the nationalisation. Therefore, it is necessary to assess whether there are constitutionally admissible grounds for the enactment of such distinction.
35. The reasons set out in Paragraph 33 of this reasoning indicate that neither the challenged provision nor the other provisions of the DenA could have interfered with the private property of the petitioners, since this type of property did not exist when this typically transitional law came into force. However, in specific cases and to a specific degree, the DenA regulates a special method of obtaining property rights. The manner in which property is acquired and enjoyed is the subject of statutory regulation pursuant to the provision of Article 67 of the Constitution, with the function of the legislature being to determine restrictions on the constitutional right to private property in order to ensure the economic, social, and environmental function of ownership. In addition, Article 68 of the Constitution sets out a specific restriction under which aliens may acquire property rights to real estate only under the conditions provided by law. In accordance with the second paragraph of this article, aliens may not acquire title to land except by inheritance, under the condition of reciprocity. Article 13 of the Constitution explicitly determines that, in accordance with the relevant treaties, aliens in Slovenia are to enjoy all the rights guaranteed by this Constitution and laws, except for those rights which, pursuant to this Constitution or law, only citizens of Slovenia may enjoy. Articles 13 and 68 of the Constitution therefore serve as the basis for regulating differently the acquiring of property if Slovene citizens are not concerned. The Constitution leaves the regulation of conditions for obtaining property rights by aliens to statutory regulation. In this regard, the margin of appreciation of the legislature is wider than in cases where the Constitution itself determines and regulates the constitutional right in question. In accordance with the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution, the legislature is obliged to adhere to the principle of equality before the law. In this respect, it must regulate the same legal positions equally, but may regulate certain legal positions differently on the condition that this is not done in an arbitrary manner. The legislature cannot be deemed to act arbitrarily when the distinction is based on reasonable grounds derived from the matter at hand, or on the basis of another objectively substantiated reason.

36. According to the assessment of the Constitutional Court, the legislature had well-founded reasons for the distinction in this case. The assets were confiscated at a time when Yugoslavia had been ravaged after the end of the Second World War, with its citizens sustaining war damage of considerable magnitude. There were also internationally binding war reparations agreed for the compensation of this damage, and the treaties with numerous other countries on the indemnification of their citizens for the confiscated assets demonstrate that foreign citizens had either already been compensated for the confiscated assets or were entitled to compensation.
37. The National Assembly's claim that the SFRY concluded a number of treaties under which foreign states assumed the obligation to compensate their citizens for the nationalised assets is true. For example, the provision of the second paragraph of Article 27 of the State Treaty for the Re-establishment of an Independent and Democratic Austria (Official Gazette FPNRY [Federal National Republic of Yugoslavia], MP, No. 2/56) specifies that the FLRY has the right to seize, retain or liquidate Austrian assets, rights, and interests within Yugoslav territory at the time this treaty comes into force, and the Austrian government undertakes to compensate Austrian citizens whose assets are confiscated in this manner. The Decree on the Liquidation of Austrian Assets on the basis of the State Treaty for the Re-establishment of an Independent and Democratic Austria (Official Gazette FPNRY, No. 6/57) determined (point II) that goods, rights, and benefits directly attached to the Austrian state or Austrian legal entities or natural persons shall be considered Austrian goods. The Instructions for Implementing the Decree, which the Federal State Secretary of Finance issued on the basis of the authority vested in him by the Decree (Official Gazette FPNRY, No. 4/67), determined (point 3) that assets owned by an Austrian citizen on 13 March 1938 (the day of the Anschluss) and that remained such on 28 April 1945 (the day Austria was established) will be deemed Austrian assets that were transferred to the ownership of the FPNRY on the basis of the Act on the Transfer of Enemy Assets to State Ownership and on the Sequestration of Assets of Absent Persons (Official Gazette DFY, No. 2/45, and the Official Gazette FPNRY, No. 63/46; – hereinafter referred to as the ATEA) or on any other legal grounds. For nationalisations carried out on the basis of the regulations referred to in point 8 of the first paragraph of Article 3 of the DenA, the states concluded the Treaty between SFRY and the Republic of Austria on the Regulation of Specific Property Law Issues (Official Gazette SFRY, MP, No. 9/81), according to which (first paragraph of Article 2), similarly, Austrian citizenship at the time of the nationalisation was taken into account as the criterion. Pursuant to the Treaty between the Governments of the USA and the FPRY on the Financial Claims of the USA and its Citizens (Official Gazette Presidium of the People's Assembly of FPRY, No. 25/51), in which the question of compensation for US assets on account of nationalisation and other dispossessions of assets between 1 September 1939 and the day the treaty was concluded was regulated, only the persons with US citizenship at the time of the nationalisation or other dispossession are entitled to compensation (Article 3).

38. Treaties were also concluded with other states (Hungary, Italy, Switzerland, and Turkey). One of the criteria for compensation under these treaties is the requirement that the individuals were citizens of this foreign state at the time the assets were nationalised (e.g. the second paragraph of Article 5 of the Treaty between the FPRY and the Swiss Confederation, which refers to the compensation of Swiss interests in Yugoslavia affected by measures of nationalisation, dispossession and restrictions (Official Gazette FPRY, No. 16/49) and Article 6 of the Protocol on the Compensation of Turkish Assets and Property Interests in Yugoslavia (Official Gazette FPRY, No. 23/50)). With the provisions of the first paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitutional Act Implementing the Basic Constitutional Charter on the Independence and Sovereignty of the Republic of Slovenia, Slovenia explicitly regulated the legal succession of the treaties concluded by Yugoslavia. Therefore, Slovenia is also obliged and entitled to adhere to these treaties when adopting the laws, in accordance with Article 8 and the second paragraph of Article 153 of the Constitution. The third paragraph of Article 10 of the DenA also explicitly states that persons who received or were entitled to compensation from a foreign state for confiscated assets were not deemed beneficiaries under this Act.
39. As is evident from the aforementioned and other treaties, aliens had the opportunity to claim compensation for confiscated assets from the state whose citizenship they possessed. Yugoslav citizens however did not have this option. It is evident from the legislature's aforementioned basis for drafting this Act that the legislature considered precisely those confiscations of property for which no appropriate, or even any, compensation was paid to be unjust. Yugoslav citizens who left Yugoslavia after the Second World War were generally unable to obtain foreign citizenship quickly, and shared the ill fate of displaced persons. Those Yugoslav citizens who remained in the state were deprived of the right to free economic initiative for decades owing to the constant and systematic threat to human rights and fundamental freedoms in the then communist system. Also for this reason, the status of aliens at the time differed from the status of Yugoslav citizens.
40. For the reasons stated above, a distinction based on citizenship in the challenged provision is constitutionally admissible. The legislature had objectively substantiated reasons due to which it could implement the aforementioned distinction. Therefore, it is impossible to accuse it of acting arbitrarily. In view of the aforementioned, the challenged provision is not inconsistent with Article 14 of the Constitution, which introduces the principle of equality. For the same reasons, the challenged provision is also not contrary to the provisions of the treaties that bind Slovenia and prohibit the legislature from acting in an arbitrary manner. Above all this applies to the provisions of Article 14 of the ECHR and Article 26 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. At the time of its establishment, Slovenia recognised legal continuity with the former Yugoslav state and with the provision of Article 39 of the CRSA it also explicitly established legal continuity in relation to the issues of citizenship. Therefore, the challenged provision is also not problematic with respect to it relying on the Yugoslav citizenship that existed at the time of nationalisation.

B – III

41. It is not the second paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA that denies the status of beneficiary to a petitioner who has been issued a negative declaratory decision on citizenship in an administrative procedure on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA, but the first paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA, since the latter provision determines that a beneficiary is someone who was a Yugoslav citizen at the time of the nationalisation and whose citizenship was recognised after 9 May 1945 by law or treaty. The answer to the question of who was a Yugoslav citizen is evident from the regulations applicable for determining the existence of citizenship. The Constitutional Court may review the constitutional admissibility of the application of the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA from the perspective of whether the provision was, at the time of its creation, contrary to the general principles of law which were recognised by civilised nations and, in that respect, whether its application in the present day proceedings conducted by state authorities is consistent with the Constitution.
42. The DFY Citizenship Act (Official Gazette DFY, No. 64/45 – hereinafter referred to as the DFYCA), which entered into force on 28 August 1945, determined in the first paragraph of Article 35 that, from the day this Act enters into force, all those who were Yugoslav citizens under valid regulations are deemed Yugoslav citizens. The provision of Article 36 of the DFYCA specified that, unless determined otherwise by a treaty, Yugoslav citizenship under the provisions of this Act shall be obtained by all those who have a right of domicile or a domicile in the jurisdiction of municipalities in the territories which become part of the DFY according to a treaty and those who by nationality belong to one of the nations of Yugoslavia and reside in this territory, unless they emigrate from the Yugoslav state territory or unless based on special regulations they opt for their previous citizenship. Pursuant to the provisions of Article 36 of the DFYCA, it is not possible to state that all persons who were domiciled in municipalities of the Kingdom of Yugoslavia automatically became citizens of the DFY, since this Act prescribed two conditions for obtaining citizenship. The second, negative condition was that the persons must have not emigrated or opted for their previous citizenship. In the opinion of the Constitutional Court, this condition refers to both the aforementioned categories of persons. The Act Confirming and Amending the DFY Citizenship Act, dated 23 August 1945, confirmed and amended the DFYCA based on the third paragraph of Article 136 of the Constitution of the FPRY, also renaming it to: the FPRY Citizenship Act (CA). This Act specified in the first paragraph of Article 35 that persons who were citizens of the FPRY under regulations in effect on 28 August 1945 shall be deemed citizens of the FPRY. The provision of Article 36 of the DFYCA that tied the acquisition of Yugoslav citizenship to the condition of domicile jurisdiction and to an additional condition was retained: “if such a person does not emigrate from the state territory of the FPRY or does not opt for their previous citizenship under special regulations”. With the amendment to the Act in 1948 (Official Gazette FPRY, No. 105/48), the provision of Article 36 remained unchanged, adding a new second paragraph to Article 35 of the CA, according to which the persons of German nationality who lived abroad and who during or prior to the war violated their civic responsibilities through their disloyal conduct against the national and state well-being of the nations of the FPRY shall not be deemed citizens of the FPRY pursuant to the first paragraph of Article 35.

43. The CA did not envisage the issue of declaratory decisions regarding which persons obtained Yugoslav citizenship on the basis of statutory provisions. In accordance with Article 26 of the CA, under which the minister of the interior was authorised to prescribe the manner of keeping records of citizens and regarding the issuance of citizen identity cards, Rules on the Implementation of the CA (Official Gazette FPRY, No. 98/46) were issued. These Rules determined that a register of citizens was to be established by no later than 31 December 1947. In accordance with the provision of Article 12 of these Rules, entries in the register of citizens were carried out ex officio, the first entry being made on the basis of the notification of permanent residents from the territory of the People’s Councils, for which a register of citizens had been kept based on the registers of domiciled people and other evidence available at the time. This entails that the determination of whether a person obtained Yugoslav citizenship was not made for persons who did not register for entry into the register of citizens unless they themselves requested the issue of declaratory decisions. Obtaining citizenship in accordance with the provisions of Articles 35 and 36 of the CA had an ex lege effect. If the conditions were not met, citizenship also could not be obtained. Entry in the register of citizenship, i.e. the register of citizens, was only carried out after the declaratory proceedings and was only a reflection of whether citizenship was obtained or not. The entry, as petitioners claim, was only carried out in 1947, after the establishment of the registers of citizens.
44. The provisions of the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA cannot be interpreted without taking into consideration the provision of Article 36 of the CA which has remained unchanged in terms of content since 28 August 1945. It is evident from the historical sources (Dr Dušan Nećak: Nekaj osnovnih podatkov o usodi nemške narodnostne skupnosti v Sloveniji po letu 1945 [Some Key Data on the Fate of the German National Community in Slovenia after 1945]; Zgodovinski časopis, No. 3, Ljubljana 1993) that the majority of the so-called “Volksdeutsche” left Slovenia together with the departing German army; a few thousand remained who are said to have “vanished” after the departure of the German occupation army, while it is said to be indisputable that at the end of 1946 “there was practically not a single German living in the territory of Lower Styria (Štajerska)”. It is evident even from the documents the petitioners submitted that the petitioners, or their legal predecessors, emigrated from Slovenia in 1945 or 1946, or were deported by the authorities at the time. In 1948, when the amendment to the CA, including the challenged provision, was implemented, these persons were therefore abroad. In view of the aforementioned provision of Article 36 of the CA, already valid as of 28 August 1945, persons who had emigrated from Yugoslavia did not obtain citizenship of the DFY or the FPRY, even if they had been domiciled in municipalities in a territory which belonged to Yugoslavia. The challenged provision of the CA, as the petitioners allege, and as the competent administrative authority itself states, was applied retroactively from 28 August 1945 to its date of entry into force and is now applied in the same way by the competent administrative authorities in the present day proceedings for deciding on citizenship.

45. According to this regulatory framework, the post-war Yugoslav authorities denied Yugoslav citizenship to persons of German nationality who were loyal to the German Reich during the occupation. This decision was the subject of the sovereign assessment of the newly created state and a reflection of the international situation at the time. Every state has the right to determine who its citizens are through its legislation. Other states recognise such a regulatory framework if it complies with the international customs and general principles of law recognised by civilised nations. The Constitutional Court cannot review the content of the decision itself. However, it needs to be established that such a regulatory framework was not contrary to the general principles of law that were already recognised at that time by the civilised nations victims of the Nazi regime during the Second World War. In addition, the legal foundations that defined the responsibility of the German nation for crimes committed and damage caused during the Second World War were established through the appropriate international legal acts that were issued by the allies (the Potsdam Agreement, concluded on 2 August 1945, became the basis for peace treaties). In view of the post-war conditions at the time and the outcome of the war, despite the enforcement of actual retroactivity in the challenged provision, it is impossible to accuse the legislature of acting inadmissibly. In accordance with the principle of legal continuity in determining citizenship, even in present day proceedings conducted by competent authorities on the basis of the challenged provision, the legal validity of this provision must therefore be recognised. Here, the assertions of the petitioners that the application of the challenged provision is contrary to Articles 32, 61, and 63 of the Constitution are unfounded since it does not relate to the regulation of the current legal position of petitioners but to the regulation of their position during the enactment of the regulations regarding Yugoslav citizenship. If the legislature was to implement such a regulatory framework today, it would undoubtedly be contrary to the cited constitutional provisions. In the time at issue, given the aforementioned relevant circumstances of international law, it is impossible to accuse the legislature of violating the freedom of movement, the free expression of affiliation to an individual's own nation or encouraging national discrimination. Back then, the legislature denied Yugoslav citizenship only to those persons of German nationality who were deemed disloyal - so the basis for the inequality was not nationality, but as the National Assembly alleges, the activity of individuals during the war. Therefore, the application of such a provision in determining citizenship is admissible from the point of view of legal continuity. Similarly, the allegation that the challenged provision is contrary to Article 27 of the Constitution is also without merit. The presumption of innocence is a special constitutional right guaranteed by this constitutional provision to anyone who is accused of a criminal offence. Neither the provision of the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA nor the provision of the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA relate to criminal proceedings or to the regulation of criminal liability.

B – IV

46. The provision of the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA reads: "At the request of the authority referred to in Article 54 or 56 of this Act, the municipal administrative authority responsible for internal affairs shall issue a declaratory decision on the citizenship of a beneficiary if the latter is not registered in the register of citizenship. It is not possible to determine disloyal conduct against the interests of the nations and the state of the FPRY in this procedure". This provision is comprised of two parts. The petitioners are challenging the second part; i.e. the part that relates to the determination of disloyalty. The regulatory framework therefore prohibits the competent authority from determining the disloyalty of persons in the procedure determining citizenship in cases where it is necessary to apply the provisions of the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA. According to the assertions of the National Assembly, this provision supposedly favours beneficiaries, since it prevents the aversion of the affected persons to the previous political regime from being considered disloyalty. However, the position in the case law is different – not that disloyalty should not be established, but the position of the Supreme Court (which is evident from the judgments presented by the petitioners) is to interpret the provision of the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA as a legal fiction of disloyalty which is impossible to disprove. The Constitutional Court believes that such an interpretation of the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA does not constitute a legal fiction, but can only be considered an irrebuttable legal presumption. Legal presumption exist when it is deemed by law, without evidence, that certain facts exist or do not exist on the basis of their relation to other facts, the existence (or non-existence) of which is demonstrated under general rules. Presumptions thus presuppose two facts which are in correlation: the first fact which is difficult to prove and whose existence (non-existence) is presumed by law, and the second, which ordinarily has a specific relation to the first fact, is easier to prove and must be demonstrated under general rules. In this event, after establishing the facts that the person was of German nationality and lived abroad, which is proven under general rules, the competent authorities considered these persons to also have been disloyal on the basis of the challenged statutory provision. On the other hand, a legal fiction is when a regulation deems a specific fact to be true, despite it knowing that it is not or that it does not even exist, or vice versa (a fact is deemed non-existent despite existing in reality). A legal fiction thus differs from a legal presumption in that a presumption presupposes as true something that is probably true, whereas a legal fiction considers as true something that is known to be untrue. In the case in question, such an interpretation actually creates an irrebuttable legal presumption, which precisely due to its irrefutability closely resembles a legal fiction, but is not a legal fiction.

47. Given the aforementioned, the Constitutional Court believes it is inadmissible for a competent authority to apply the provision of the second paragraph of Article 35 such that it relates to all persons of German nationality, without making distinctions on the basis of the criterion determined by the legislature at the time (the disloyalty criterion). Such use of the provisions of the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA entails a discrimination against persons of German nationality contrary to the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution. In addition to the CA, the post-war regulations, which serve as the basis for the nationalisation of German assets, indicate that it was possible to deprive of their citizenship only citizens of German nationality who were disloyal. Discrimination in this case is not discrimination according to criterion of nationality but discrimination which had its basis at the time on the German occupation and on the fact, confirmed by historical sources, that the majority of the persons with German nationality were Nazified at the time of the occupation. The aforementioned case law is not consistent with the principle of equality as it sets different conditions compared to the conditions that existed at the time the assets were nationalised. In view of the aforementioned historical reasons, which were based on the internationally established liability of persons of German nationality on account of their loyalty to the Nazi regime, the legislature could establish a presumption of disloyalty, but not in a way that would prevent its rebuttal. With this kind of interpretation, the measure of not recognising Yugoslav citizenship relates to all persons of German nationality, including those who could prove their loyalty, as well as those who were considered disloyal without reason, perhaps due to the unlawful and unjust behaviour of the post-war Yugoslav authorities. The legislature did not cover these persons under the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA. If it had done so, it would have set a distinction by nationality, instead of a distinction according to the loyalty criterion. In addition, the legislature could have designed the regulatory framework according to criteria that differ from the criteria that applied at the time of the confiscation of assets, which would have been deemed unequal treatment without any grounds in the circumstances that existed at the time. The interpretation of the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA, under which the presumption of disloyalty cannot be challenged by evidence to the contrary, is therefore contrary to the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution.
48. The aforementioned interpretation of the challenged provision is also contrary to the provision of Article 22 of the Constitution. A party in the procedure is prevented from proving their loyalty; however, as is evident from the positions of the National Assembly and the clarifications of the Ministry of the Interior, the competent authorities responsible for proving the status of German nationality may also put forward evidence which essentially proves the disloyalty of persons. A party may not challenge such allegations, since the Act supposedly prohibited this under the interpretation that has been used to date. Therefore, the provision of the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA should be interpreted as a presumption against which evidence to the contrary is possible and admissible, thereby allowing a party to prove his or her loyalty.

49. In the disputed part of the challenged provision, the legislature instructed the competent authority to not conduct the taking of evidence during the procedure for determining citizenship and to not demonstrate the disloyalty of a person. However, it did not prevent individuals from proving their loyalty under such a regulatory framework. It is possible to reach the conclusion that this was the intention of the legislature from the provision of the second paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA. It is constitutionally admissible for the legislature to emphasise the presumption of disloyalty; this is grounded in historically proven circumstances, if it simultaneously does not prohibit individuals from proving the opposite in the process of exercising their rights. The erroneous interpretation of the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA in specific proceedings does not constitute grounds to abrogate this provision, as under general rules of interpretation it is only possible to interpret it in the manner described above. That is why the Constitutional Court decided that the provision of the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA is not inconsistent with the Constitution. Here, the Constitutional Court did not decide on the allegations regarding the use of specific data in procedures for determining citizenship, since these can only be subject of specific proceedings and, therefore, also subject of the potential specific constitutional court review of acts issued in these proceedings.

B – V

50. The DenA classified the Avnoј Decree on the Transfer of Enemy Assets to State Ownership, the State Management of the Assets of Absent Persons and on the Seizure of Assets which was Forcibly Confiscated by the Occupation Authorities (hereinafter referred to as the DTEA) and the ATEA among the legal bases for denationalisation (points 20 and 21 of Article 3). At the same time, the existence of Yugoslav citizenship at the time of the nationalisation was set as a criterion in the first paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA. In accordance with point 1 of the first paragraph of Article 1 of the DTEA, all the assets of the German Reich and its citizens were transferred to state property. Pursuant to point 2 of the first paragraph of Article 1 of the DTEA, all assets belonging to persons of German nationality, with the exception of the Germans who fought in the ranks of the National Liberation Army and Yugoslav partisan detachments or were citizens of neutral countries and showed no hostility during the occupation were also transferred to state property. The presidency of AVNOJ issued a special mandatory explanation (Official Gazette DFY, No. 39/45) of the cited point 2 of the DTEA, in which it specified: “2. Civil rights and assets shall not be dispossessed from the citizens of Yugoslavia of German nationality or of German origin or surname:

- a) who took part as partisans or soldiers in the national liberation struggle or actually took part in the national liberation movement;
- b) who were already assimilated as Croats, Slovenes or Serbs before the war and did not join the Kulturbund nor appear as members of the German national community during the war;
- c) who during the occupation refused to become part of the German national community when requested to do so by the occupying or Quisling authorities;
- č) who, despite their German nationality, concluded a mixed marriage with persons of one of the Yugoslav nationalities, or with persons of Jewish, Slovak, Rusyn, Hungarian, Romanian or any other recognised nationality.” All these groups had to ensure that their actions during the occupation were not contrary to the liberation struggle of the nations of Yugoslavia and did not aid the occupier in any way. The substance of this interpretation was incorporated into the provisions of the ATEA. The assets belonging to those persons of German nationality who were not disloyal could therefore not be confiscated on the basis of the DTEA or the ATEA. The legislature clearly deemed that injustices had occurred in the confiscation of property, especially due to the behaviour of the post-war authorities at the time, which were meant to be remedied with the implementation of the DenA. The legislature, in adopting such a regulatory framework, drew particular attention to the fact that the DenA does not allow for the restitution of property to persons of German nationality to whom Yugoslavia denied citizenship on account of them opting for the Third Reich (“Volksdeutsche”) or their disloyal behaviour towards the national and state interests of the nations of the FPRY (draft DenA, Gazette of the National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia, No. 21/91). The legislature therefore deliberately excluded disloyal persons of German nationality from denationalisation. The classification of the regulations alone under Article 3 of the DenA does not automatically give a person the status of a denationalisation beneficiary. This status is provided only by the provisions which the petitioners are challenging. With this regard, the second paragraph of Article 9 and Article 12 of the DenA, in addition to the first paragraph of Article 9, relate to persons of German nationality.

51. The second paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA determines:

“Natural persons under Articles 3, 4, and 5 of this Act who, at the time the assets were nationalised, were not entered in the records of citizens (register of citizens) for reasons referred to in the second paragraph of Article 35 of the FPRY Citizenship Act (Official Gazette DFY, No. 64/45, and Official Gazette FPRY, Nos. 54/46 and 105/48) are not considered beneficiaries unless the individual was interned for religious or other reasons or fought on the side of the anti-fascist coalition.”

Pursuant to the second paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA, persons who were not entered in the register of citizens at the time of the nationalisation for reasons referred to in the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA, were supposedly nevertheless deemed beneficiaries if they had been interned or fought on the side of the anti-fascist coalition. At the time of the confiscation of assets of persons of German nationality, these persons clearly could not have been entered in the register of citizens, as the petitioners correctly state, since such register was not kept at that time. Given that the entry in the register of citizens was merely considered a record and not constitutive in nature, the provisions of the second paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA cannot be interpreted in a way to tie the reasons referred to in the second paragraph of Article 35 CA to entries in the records, but rather to obtaining or not obtaining citizenship - the entry in the records then follows only after obtaining citizenship. If a person did not obtain citizenship on these grounds, then they also could not be subsequently entered into the records at the time the registers of citizens were established or thereafter.

52. In the above paragraphs of this reasoning, the Constitutional Court defined how the provision of the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA must be interpreted. The provisions of the second paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA cannot be interpreted without reference to what was explained above. In order to establish whether a person did not become a Yugoslav citizen for reasons determined in the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA, it is first necessary to carry out the procedure for determining citizenship in which a rebuttable presumption of disloyalty applies to persons of German nationality. The individual is given the opportunity to provide evidence to the contrary by any means of evidence. In the second paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA, the legislature provided parties means of evidence that have greater value in declaratory proceedings. An individual who demonstrates that he was interned for religious or other reasons or who demonstrates that he fought on the side of the anti-fascist coalition, is thus deemed to have succeeded in demonstrating loyal actions for the requirements of the procedure for determining citizenship as a condition for entitlement to denationalisation on the basis of the challenged provision. Such evidence creates the presumption of their loyalty. The challenged provision therefore favours potential beneficiaries to which the provision refers. At the same time, it does not interfere with the legal position of other potential beneficiaries to denationalisation, nor with the legal position of the persons of German nationality who can invoke the position of denationalisation beneficiary by proving their loyalty in the proceedings determining citizenship under the third paragraph of Article 63 of the DenA, as follows from this reasoning. The legislature may treat different legal positions differently, so the allegation that the challenged provision, contrary to the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution, creates inequality between potential denationalisation beneficiaries is without merit.
53. The Potsdam Agreement explicitly opened the possibility of the reimbursement of reparation claims to individual states from German assets located outside the western zones. The Agreement on Reparation from Germany, on Establishing Inter-Allied Reparation Authorities and Restitution of Monetary Gold (concluded in Paris on 21 December 1945), of which Yugoslavia was also a signatory, even explicitly envisaged the right of individual countries to confiscate German assets in their territory as repayment of their claims for reparations because of the war damage caused by German military occupation. These were international legal sources, which also bound and entitled the then Yugoslavia to a special (non-contractual) method of obtaining reparations for war damage. For these reasons, the challenged provision of the second paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA is not contrary to the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, nor to the general principles of international law. Similarly, it is also not contrary to Article 26 of the Constitution, as the first petitioner claims, without providing any grounds for the lack of conformity. The first paragraph of Article 26 of the Constitution guarantees compensation for damage caused to an individual by a state authority, local government authority or a bearer of public authority through its unlawful conduct in performing its duty or any other activity. This constitutional right to compensation is a special right, which may be regulated differently for denationalisation rights, which are not common claims for damages but the specific reparation of injustices. Therefore, the provision of the second paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA is not inconsistent with this constitutional provision.

B – V

54. Article 12 of the DenA determines:

“If a natural person referred to in the second paragraph of Article 9 of this Act is not a beneficiary hereunder, his spouse or heir who is first in line to inherit shall be deemed a beneficiary, provided that Yugoslav citizenship was recognised under the regulations referred to in the first paragraph of Article 9 of this Act.”

Through this provision, the legislature actually widened the pool of beneficiaries entitled to denationalisation in the specific cases in which persons whose assets were nationalised, would not be entitled to denationalisation on account of the principle determined in the first paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA. This intention of the legislature is entirely legitimate and cannot be disputed. The legislature would not have acted in an inadmissible manner if he had not opted for such a solution. Since it did, however, it should treat similar cases, essentially, in a similar manner if there are no objective or well-founded grounds to differentiate between them.

55. According to Article 12 of the DenA, only the legal successors of the persons who did not obtain Yugoslav citizenship for the reasons determined in the second paragraph of Article 35 of the CA may become denationalisation beneficiaries. The status of such beneficiary is only given to the spouse and the heirs who are first in line to inherit under specific conditions: 1) to a spouse only if, taking into account the provisions of the first paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA, he/she was a Yugoslav citizen at the time the assets of the spouse – the owner of the property – were nationalised, and this citizenship was recognised to him/her after 9 May 1945 by law or treaty; 2) to children, if their citizenship was recognised on that date by a law or treaty referred to in the first paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA, or later at birth. In Article 12, the Act restricted the determination who can be a beneficiary to the persons who were the closest relatives of the owner of the nationalised assets, i.e. to those who were generally directly affected by the loss of the assets - clearly the spouse and descendants of the owner of the nationalised assets. Referring to the spouse, such can only be the person who was the spouse of the owner at the time the assets were nationalised. Since the challenged provision maintains the principle of Yugoslav citizenship as a condition under the first paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA, this also applies to the spouse, who must have been a Yugoslav citizen at the time of nationalisation. In accordance with the first paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA and Article 12 of the DenA, this citizenship must also have been recognised after 9 May 1945. The descendants of the decedent, regardless of their birth date, were directly affected by the confiscation of the assets, so it is impossible to require that they would have to have been born at the time of the confiscation of the property.

56. The challenged provision does not give such a status to the legal successors of other persons who also were not Yugoslav citizens. The Constitutional Court agrees with the petitioners that the legislature had no objectively grounded reasons for such a distinction. Therefore, such a distinction is contrary to the principle of equality set out in the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution. Since this is an instance in which the legislature failed to regulate a certain issue by a statutory provision, which it should have regulated in accordance with the principle of equality, the Constitutional Court only abrogated the part of the wording of Article 12 of the DenA preventing such regulation, i.e. the words “of the second paragraph”, which ties the challenged provision only to the second paragraph of Article 9 of the DenA. The Constitutional Court draws attention to the fact that, pursuant to the provision of the second paragraph of Article 10 of the DenA, persons who were awarded or had the right to be awarded compensation for confiscated assets from a foreign state may not obtain the position of denationalisation beneficiary under any circumstances.
57. However, it is impossible to agree with the position that the challenged provision interferes with the constitutional right to inheritance determined in Article 33 of the Constitution. In accordance with the provision of the second paragraph of Article 67 of the Constitution, the manners and conditions of inheritance shall be determined by law. The legislature may treat differently the manner of inheritance and the conditions under which it is possible to inherit from a decedent in relation to the different relations of relatives to the decedent. The subject of the provision of Article 12 of the DenA does not even refer directly to the regulation of inheritance itself. The provision regulates the widening of the pool of beneficiaries, that is those with respect to whom it is even possible, on the basis of the right to inheritance, to enter into legal succession, which the DenA regulates in the same manner for all legal successors in the provision of Article 15. A beneficiary should generally be that person whose assets were confiscated. Therefore, the conduct of the legislature that limited the transfer of the beneficiary position only to those who were in the closest relationship with the person whose assets were nationalised is not arbitrary. In this respect, the provision is not inconsistent with Article 14 of the Constitution.

58. The Constitutional Court decided on the costs of proceedings claimed by the parties in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 34 of the CCA, as there was no reason to adopt a different decision.

C

59. The Constitutional Court adopted this decision on the basis of the first paragraph of Articles 40 and 25 and the first paragraph of Article 34 of the Constitutional Court Act, composed of Dr Tone Jerovšek, the President, and Judges Mag. Matevž Krivic, Mag. Janez Snoj, Dr Janez Šinkovec, Dr Lovro Šturm, Franc Testen, Dr Lojze Ude, and Dr Boštjan M. Zupančič. The decision was reached unanimously.

Dr Tone Jerovšek
President

Decision No. U-I-146/07, dated 13 November 2008

DECISION

At a session held on 13 November 2008 in proceedings to review constitutionality initiated upon the petition of Evgen Bavčar, Ajdovščina, represented by Jože Hribernik, attorney in Ljubljana, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. The Civil Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 26/99, 96/02, 12/03 – official consolidated text, 2/04, 36/04 – official consolidated text, 52/07, 73/07 – official consolidated text, and 45/08) is inconsistent with the Constitution, as it does not regulate the right of blind and partially sighted persons to access court documents and written applications of parties and other participants in proceedings in a form accessible to them.
2. The National Assembly must remedy the established inconsistency within a period of one year from the publication of this Decision in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia.
3. Until the established inconsistency is remedied, courts in civil proceedings must provide blind and partially sighted persons, upon their request, access to court documents and written applications of parties and other participants in proceedings in a form accessible to them. The costs required for such are to be paid from the funds of the court.

Reasoning

A

1. The petitioner challenges Article 102 of the Civil Procedure Act (hereinafter referred to as the CPA), which regulates the right of participants in proceedings to use their language at hearings and during other oral parts of the proceedings. He alleges that the challenged provision is inconsistent with the Constitution as it does not regulate the right of blind persons to Braille transcripts of court documents and the written applications of parties and other participants in proceedings. He explains that he has been blind since the age of twelve and therefore in the pending civil proceedings against him he requested a transcription of the claim and other documents into Braille at the expense of the opposing party. The court of first instance allegedly dismissed his request by stating that the CPA does not require courts to provide blind persons with Braille transcripts of written applications. According to the court's assessment, Article 102 of the CPA ensures participants in proceedings only the right to use their language at hearings and during other oral parts of the proceedings, but not also in written applications, which have to be prepared in the official language of the court. The court allegedly dismissed the petitioner's allegations regarding his unequal position in proceedings by stating that he is ensured an equal position due to the fact that he is represented by a lawyer. It allegedly also informed the petitioner that he could deposit an advance payment for a transcription of the relevant written applications into Braille. In the petitioner's opinion, the above-described conduct of the court proves that blind persons are subject to indirect discrimination in civil proceedings. Therefore, the challenged regulation is allegedly inconsistent with the principle of equality before the law determined by Article 14 of the Constitution. The petitioner further states that the obligation of the state to ensure to everyone the equal protection of rights in proceedings also follows from Article 22 of the Constitution. Therefore, he also claims a violation of that provision. Furthermore, he claims that the challenged statutory regulation does not enable blind persons to effectively communicate with the court and the opposing party, and therefore it is allegedly also inconsistent with the right to judicial protection (Article 23 of the Constitution) and the right to an effective legal remedy (Article 25 of the Constitution). The fact that the legislature failed to provide a special regulation for blind persons that would enable them to effectively exercise their rights in judicial proceedings is allegedly also constitutionally disputable in light of the fact that the legislature already appropriately regulated the special position of some categories of persons with disabilities in proceedings before courts and other state authorities. The petitioner draws attention to the fact that in accordance with the Slovene Sign Language Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 96/02 – hereinafter referred to as the SSLA), deaf persons have the right to use Slovene sign language in proceedings before state authorities, whereby the payment of the costs of an interpreter must be provided by the state authorities. In the petitioner's opinion, the positions of blind and deaf persons in proceedings before state authorities are essentially similar. Therefore, he believes that no sound reasons exist for their different treatment. Such allegedly constitutes another reason substantiating the inconsistency with Article 14 of the Constitution.

2. The National Assembly replied that the regulation contained in Article 102 as well as in Articles 103 and 104 of the CPA entails the implementation of the right to use one's language and script determined by Article 62 of the Constitution. It drew attention to the fact that the legislature enjoys a broad field of discretion when determining the manner of the implementation of that right. What is allegedly crucial is that the legislature fulfils the purpose pursued by the cited provision, i.e. to ensure a fair trial. Therefore, in the opinion of the National Assembly, the right to use one's language and script applies particularly to the oral part of the proceedings.

However, when regulating the right to use one's script in the written part of the proceedings, the legislature allegedly enjoys a particularly broad field of discretion. Such is allegedly understandable, as a party who does not understand the language is at a severe disadvantage during [the oral part of] the proceedings, whereas he or she may prepare written applications also with the assistance of other persons. According to the National Assembly, the same, mutatis mutandis, also applies to blind persons. As the nature of their disability allegedly does not prevent them from following the oral part of the proceedings and actively participating therein, their disability allegedly does not render their active participation at hearings impossible. In addition, they can allegedly understand written applications with the assistance of a third party (as equally applies to other persons). The National Assembly emphasises that when interpreting the content of the above-mentioned constitutional provision, Article 11 of the Constitution, which determines that in Slovenia the official language is Slovene, must also be taken into consideration. Thus, already pursuant to the Constitution, the Slovene language is allegedly privileged in relation to other languages. Moreover, in principle the right to use one's language allegedly does not ensure parties to proceedings the right to the free assistance of an interpreter.

3. In the opinion of the National Assembly, other procedural provisions ensure the right of blind persons to a fair trial with regard to the written part of the proceedings. The National Assembly assesses that blind persons can participate in the written part of the proceedings through an authorised representative. If due to their unfavourable financial situation they cannot cover the cost of such a representative, they may, in the opinion of the National Assembly, request that the court appoint them a lawyer free of charge (Article 170 of the CPA) or they may request free legal aid in accordance with the rules determined by the Free Legal Aid Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 96/04 etc. – hereinafter referred to as the FLAA). A constitutionally consistent interpretation of Article 102 of the CPA allegedly also allows courts to provide blind persons with an interpreter for Braille to assist them in participating in the written part of the proceedings. However, with regard to such, the National Assembly stresses that a blind person has not necessarily been trained to read Braille. The National Assembly is furthermore of the opinion that an authorised representative or interpreter can also assist a blind person to review the content of a written document that is produced at a hearing for evidentiary purposes. If a blind person does not have an authorised representative and he or she does not propose that the court appoint him or her an interpreter, the National Assembly is of the opinion that also the court could inform that person of the content of a document (Article 12 of the CPA) or that it could appoint an interpreter ex officio (Article 102 of the CPA). The National Assembly also draws attention to the fact that when regulating civil procedure the legislature must take into consideration the requirements of expeditious, economical, and effective proceedings, the aim of which is to ensure the right of (both) parties to a trial without undue delay and with as little cost as possible.
4. The National Assembly furthermore explains that the regulation of civil procedure does not differ from other procedural regulations. Article 62 of the General Administrative Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 80/99 etc. – hereinafter referred to as the GAPA) allegedly determines that parties who due to their disability cannot use the language in which the proceedings are conducted have the right to follow the course of proceedings with the assistance of an interpreter. However, in accordance with Articles 113 and 115 of the GAPA, each party is allegedly required to cover their own costs in advance. Furthermore, the National Assembly explains that Article 70 of the Criminal Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 63/94 etc. – hereinafter referred to as the CrPA) indeed determines that a defence with the assistance of a legal representative is also mandatory in instances in which a defendant is mute, deaf, or otherwise unable to conduct his or her own defence, and that, in accordance with Article 92 of the CrPA, the costs and payment of the appointed legal representative are initially paid from the funds of the authority that is conducting the criminal proceedings. However, the National Assembly emphasises that these costs are subsequently recovered from those who are required to pay them in accordance with the law. Moreover, in the opinion of the National Assembly, it must also be taken into consideration that Article 29 of the Constitution guarantees defendants in criminal proceedings additional procedural safeguards in order to ensure them a fair trial.

5. As regards the allegations regarding the unequal regulation of the procedural position of blind persons in comparison to deaf persons, the National Assembly replied that their positions are not comparable due to the different nature of their disabilities. The National Assembly explained that the right to the free assistance of a sign language interpreter is guaranteed to deaf persons due to the fact that they are not capable, either alone or with the assistance of an authorised representative, to effectively follow the oral part of the proceedings and effectively participate therein. The position of blind persons is allegedly different, as the nature of their disability does not prevent them from following the oral parts of the proceedings and actively participating therein. As regards their written communication with the court, the constitutional procedural safeguards are (as already explained) allegedly ensured to blind persons through other measures. The National Assembly moreover draws attention to the provisions of the CPA that allow the audio recording of hearings and thereby provide for the possibility that a blind person can access such audio recordings also after the hearing has been conducted. In light of the above, the National Assembly is of the opinion that also for such reason the regulation of civil procedure is not inconsistent with Article 14 of the Constitution.
6. In the opinion of the Government, Article 102 of the CPA is not inconsistent with the Constitution. The challenged provision allegedly does not place anyone in a less favourable position, nor does it provide anyone with a particular advantage, but, on the contrary, it guarantees the equal treatment of all persons in accordance with Article 14 of the Constitution. Moreover, the Government does not agree with the petitioner that blind persons do not have the right to use Braille already on the basis of Article 102 of the CPA. Therefore, in the opinion of the Government, the challenged provision is also not inconsistent with Articles 22, 23, and 25 of the Constitution.

However, the Government is of the opinion that the petition does justifiably raise the question of whether a special law should also ensure blind persons certain financial entitlements in proceedings before state authorities (e.g. payment for transcriptions into Braille), such as the SSLA ensures deaf persons with reference to the right to use Slovene sign language. The Government adds that the Ministry of Justice will strive to provide the appropriate technical equipment in order to also enable blind persons to follow the course of court hearings by themselves.

7. The petitioner replied that his requests are based on the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (Official Gazette RS, No. 37/08, MP, No. 10/08 – hereinafter referred to as the CRPD), which is also binding on Slovenia. He stated that the idea of a lawyer as a conveyor of documents and the idea of “interpreting Braille” (the latter is allegedly also complete nonsense) have been endorsed without previously being assessed by experts. He emphasises that blind persons who can read Braille are independent when reading, whereas in cases when others read to them they are dependant. And allegedly nobody has the right to force dependency on them. The standpoint that as [the petitioner is] a blind person it is only possible to interact with him orally, allegedly places him in the position of a merely speaking, but illiterate, citizen. He emphasises that such attitude is contemptuous of the rehabilitation of blind persons and the 200-year-old tradition of literacy programmes for blind persons that have provided them with the opportunity to lead dignified and independent lives.

B – I

8. By Order No. U-I-146/07, dated 13 March 2008, the Constitutional Court accepted the petition for consideration and decided to consider the case with absolute priority.
9. The petitioner claims that Article 102 of the CPA is inconsistent with the Constitution as it does not explicitly regulate the right of blind persons to free access to court documents and the written applications of parties and other participants in proceedings in Braille. The challenged statutory provision reads as follows:
  - “(1) The parties and other participants in proceedings may use their language at hearings and during other oral parts of the proceedings before the court. If the proceedings are not conducted in the language of the party or of other participants in the proceedings, they shall be provided, upon a motion filed to this effect or when the court finds that they do not understand the Slovene language, an oral translation of the statements made at the hearing and an oral translation of the documents used as evidence at the hearing.
  - (2) The parties and other participants in proceedings shall also be advised of their right to follow the oral proceedings in their own language through an interpreter. They may waive the right to translation by declaring that they understand the language in which the proceedings are conducted. The fact that the parties were advised thereof and their statements in this regard are entered into the minutes of the hearing.
  - (3) The translations shall be provided by interpreters.”

10. The challenged statutory provision only regulates the right of participants in civil proceedings to use their language in oral (and not written) communication with the court. Therefore, the allegations put forward by the petitioner cannot substantiate its unconstitutionality. However, due to the alleged existence of a so-called unconstitutional legal gap, the Constitutional Court had to establish whether the right of blind persons to Braille transcripts is regulated by some other statutory provision, and, if such is not the case, whether the requirement to regulate such instances follows from the Constitution.
11. With regard to written communication between the court and parties to proceedings, Article 103 of the CPA determines that summons, decisions, and other court documents are sent to the parties and other participants in proceedings in the language officially used by the court. In accordance with Article 104 of the CPA, the same applies to applications that the parties (or other participants) send to the court. The statutory text does not provide a clear answer to the question of whether upon the motion of a party and on the basis of mutatis mutandis application of the above-cited statutory provisions a court in civil proceedings should order a Braille transcription of court documents and the written applications of participants in proceedings. Moreover, however, it is of essential importance that no basis for the interpretation that blind persons are ensured transcripts of court documents and the written applications of other participants in proceedings in an accessible form at the expense of the court can be found in the provisions of the CPA. Article 152 of the CPA determines that (as a general rule) each party covers in advance the payment for costs resulting from their actions. In the final analysis, the criterion for the assessment as to who is to cover the costs of proceedings is the criterion of the parties' success in the litigation (Article 154 of the CPA), which is supplemented by the principle of guilt (Article 156 of the CPA), which has a corrective nature, and by individual special rules (Articles 158 through 161 of the CPA), which are not relevant to the case at issue. Unless blind persons are ensured a Braille transcript of court and other documents in proceedings at the expense of the state, we cannot speak of the right to use Braille. Thus, the right of blind persons to free access to court and other documents in proceedings in an accessible form cannot be deduced from the existing procedural provisions on civil procedure by means of interpretation. Such a right of blind persons is also not regulated by any other law. Therefore, the same rules apply to them as apply to all other participants in civil proceedings.
12. The petitioner claims that due to such equal treatment, which fails to take into consideration their special needs, blind persons do not have equal opportunities as regards the possibility to review the content of court and other documents in proceedings in comparison with the opposing party, and that therefore they do not have equal opportunities as regards effective communication with the court and with the opposing party. By these allegations the petitioner claims in substance that blind persons do not have equal opportunities to exercise their right to an adversarial procedure and the right to the equal treatment of parties in civil proceedings. The right to an adversarial procedure guarantees parties that courts will treat them as active participants in proceedings and enable them to effectively defend their rights and thereby give them the opportunity to actively influence decisions in cases that interfere with their rights and interests. The significance of this right is thus to ensure that the parties are subjects to proceedings and not merely objects thereof.<sup>1</sup> In this respect, it is important that in proceedings the parties cannot effectively exercise the right to be heard unless they are previously given the opportunity to review the entire body of procedural materials.<sup>2</sup> An essential element of the right to the equal treatment of parties in civil proceedings is the requirement of the equality of arms, which entails that the parties to proceedings before the court must be guaranteed equal procedural positions. The parties must thus be ensured equal opportunities when reviewing procedural materials, when presenting their positions, including evidence, and when defending themselves against the opposing party's allegations. In accordance with established constitutional case law, both of the above-mentioned rights follow from the right to the equal protection of rights determined by Article 22 of the Constitution. In view of the fact that this is the central provision of the Constitution that refers to the right to a fair trial,<sup>3</sup> the Constitutional Court hereinafter reviewed whether blind persons are discriminated against in exercising the rights stemming from that constitutional provision because they are treated equally. The right to use one's language and script in judicial proceedings is specifically protected within the framework of Article 62 of the Constitution,<sup>4</sup> however, (as the Constitutional Court has emphasised many times)<sup>5</sup> the constitutional framework of this right follows precisely from the constitutional standards of a fair trial. Therefore, a review of the position of blind persons with regard to the exercise of their constitutional procedural safeguards stemming from Article 22 of the Constitution also encompasses a review of their position from the perspective of the enjoyment of the mentioned human right.

13. As the petitioner does not dispute the position of blind persons during the oral part of proceedings, the Constitutional Court limited its review to only the question of whether blind persons are discriminated against in exercising their right to a fair trial as regards the written part of proceedings.

---

1 Held by the Constitutional Court already in Decision No. Up-39/95, dated 16 January 1997 (OdlUS VI, 71), wherein, regarding the right determined by Article 22 of the Constitution, it wrote that "[...] it is based on respect for human personality, since it ensures everyone the possibility to be heard in proceedings that affect their rights and interests, and thus prevents a person from becoming simply an object of the proceedings."

2 See also Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-108/00, dated 20 February 2003 (Official Gazette RS, No. 26/03, and OdlUS XI, 49).

3 See, A. Galič, Ustavno civilno procesno pravo [Constitutional Civil Procedure Law], GV Založba, Ljubljana 2004, p. 219.

4 Article 62 of the Constitution reads as follows: "Everyone has the right to use his language and script in a manner provided by law in the exercise of his rights and duties and in procedures before state and other authorities performing a public function."

5 See, inter alia, Order of the Constitutional Court No. Up-43/96, dated 30 May 2000 (OdlUS IX, 141), and Decision No. Up-404/05, dated 21 June 2007 (Official Gazette RS, No. 64/07, and OdlUS XVI, 101).

B – II

The Prohibition of Discrimination due to Personal Circumstances

14. The first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution determines that in Slovenia everyone shall be guaranteed equal human rights and fundamental freedoms irrespective of national origin, race, sex, language, religion, political or other conviction, material standing, birth, education, social status, disability, or any other personal circumstance. This constitutional provision thus prohibits discrimination with regard to guaranteeing, exercising, or protecting human rights and fundamental freedoms regardless of an individual's personal circumstances. With reference to such, it is important that in order to determine a violation of the constitutional prohibition of discriminatory treatment it is sufficient to establish the existence of inadmissible discrimination in the enjoyment of a human right, whereas a petitioner does not have to demonstrate an interference with that human right.<sup>6</sup>
15. The principle of non-discrimination (as a fundamental element of the principle of equality) within the meaning of the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution is established in an essentially different manner than within the meaning of the second paragraph, since non-discrimination with regard to guaranteeing human rights regardless of an individual's personal circumstances exceeds the usual formal framework of equality.<sup>7</sup> The standpoint that from the requirement of non-discriminatory treatment there follows not only the requirement of formal equal treatment but the requirement of substantive equal treatment as well has also been adopted in recent (Slovene and comparative) constitutional case law<sup>8</sup>, as well as in the case law of the ECtHR.<sup>9</sup> A substantive approach to understanding and exercising

6 In its recent case law also the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR) exceeded the dependant, ancillary nature of the right to equality in accordance with which a violation of Article 14 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR) could only be successfully enforced in connection with a violation of one of the Convention rights (regarding the older case law, cf. P. Mahnič, Enakost in enakopravnost [Equality and equality before the law], in: Javna uprava [Public Administration], Inštitut za javno upravo, No. 3, Vol. 38, Ljubljana 2002, p. 362). In its recent decisions, the ECtHR has namely emphasised that the application of Article 14 of the ECHR no longer presupposes a breach of other Convention rights and that therefore Article 14 of the ECHR is to this extent autonomous. For Article 14 to become applicable it suffices that the facts of a case fall within the ambit of another substantive provision of the ECHR or its Protocols (cf. Thlimmenos v. Greece, Judgment dated 6 April 2000, No. 34369/97, Para. 40).

7 M. Cerar, Nekateri (ustavno)pravni vidiki načela nediskriminacije [Some (Constitutional) Legal Aspects of the Principle of Non-Discrimination], in: D. Zagorc (Ed.), Enakost in diskriminacija, Sodobni izzivi za pravosodje [Equality and Discrimination: Modern Challenges for the System of Administration of Justice], Mirovni inštitut, Ljubljana 2005, p. 46.

8 Cf. L. Šturm, Člen 14 (načelo enakosti) [Article 14 (The Principle of Equality)], in: L. Šturm (Ed.), Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije [Commentary on the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia], Fakulteta za poudiplomske državne in evropske študije, Ljubljana 2002, p. 181. See also, P. Mahnič, op. cit., p. 358.

9 In recent years, the ECtHR has made a shift from a formal understanding of the prohibition of discrimination, which follows from Article 14 of the ECHR and Article 1 of Protocol No. 12 to the ECHR (Slovenia has not (yet) ratified the Protocol and therefore it is not binding on Slovenia), to a substantive understanding of that concept. In equality draws attention to the fact that (formal) equal treatment of individuals in equal (i.e. essentially similar) positions does not ensure de facto equality of those (formally) equally treated individuals who, due to individual circumstances (e.g. due to a marginal social position, prejudice and stereotypes that are silently lurking in the social morality of the majority, due to past discrimination, or under-representation in certain areas of social life) find themselves in a de facto less privileged position.<sup>10</sup> Therefore, the principle of equality allegedly also entails a normative power that allows the law to legitimately create certain differences in order to abolish the differences that are a result of traditional and long-lasting discrimination between people.<sup>11</sup> Such concerns the implementation of the principle of equal opportunities. The Constitutional Court has already recognised such a positive aspect of equality (cf. Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-298/96, dated 11 November 1999, Official Gazette RS, No. 98/99, and OdlUS VIII, 246).

16. Thus, by implementing the concept of substantive equality a differentiated manner of exercising equality is implemented that within a certain scope and under certain conditions includes the prevention of de facto or indirect discrimination.<sup>12</sup> Such a concept of equality was also adopted in the Implementation of the Principle of Equal Treatment Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 61/07 etc. – hereinafter referred to as the IPETA), which defines equal treatment as the absence of direct and indirect discrimination on grounds of any of the personal circumstances referred to in Article 2 of that Act (Article 4 of the IPETA). In accordance with the third paragraph of Article 4 of the IPETA, indirect discrimination exists when due to an apparently neutral regulation, criterion, or practice a person with a certain personal circumstance was, is, or would be placed in a less favourable position compared to other persons in equal or similar circumstances and conditions, unless these provisions, criteria, or practices are objectively justified by a legitimate aim and the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary. Discrimination thus also exists when individuals or social groups are formally ensured equal rights or an equal scope of rights, however, individuals who are in a de facto less favourable position are disadvantaged with regard to the exercise of their rights or the fulfilment of their obligations.<sup>13</sup> accordance with recent ECtHR case law, the right to non-discriminatory treatment in the enjoyment of Convention rights is not only violated when a state treats persons in similar situations differently without providing an objective and reasonable justification, but also when a state without an objective and reasonable justification fails to treat differently persons whose positions are significantly different (cf. the above cited case of Thlimmenos v. Greece; for a more detailed consideration of this question, see O. De Schutter, Reasonable Accommodations and Positive Obligations in the European Convention on Human Rights, in: A. Lawson & C. Gooding (Eds.), Disability Rights in Europe: From Theory to Practice, Hart, Oxford and Portland, Oregon 2005, p. 52). Cf. K. Reid, A Practitioner's Guide to the European Convention on Human Rights, 3rd edition, Thomson, Sweet & Maxwell Ltd, London 2008, p. 273.

---

10 B. Flander, Pozitivna diskriminacija [Positive Discrimination], Univerza v Ljubljani, Fakulteta za družbene vede, Ljubljana 2004, p. 66.

11 P. Mahnič, op. cit., p. 367.

12 B. Flander, op. cit., p. 72.

13 Ibid., p. 71.

17. The requirement of substantive equality follows already from the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution. It is thus important that not only formal equality is ensured, since, as explained above, constitutional case law already exceeded such an understanding of equality. In cases of alleged indirect discrimination, it must be established whether there exists an inequality, not in the legal regulation itself, but in the effects of the legal regulation. In preventing indirect discrimination, the protection of the affected interests or expected benefits namely refers to the result or consequences of the legal regulation (i.e. the differentiation). Such protection requires that the consequences of the adopted legal norms be analysed and that the potential discriminatory effects of the legal regulation be eliminated.<sup>14</sup>
18. In the event of a review of the legal position of a disadvantaged social group (due to a specific personal circumstance determined by the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution), what may also prove to be constitutionally inadmissible is the failure to determine an exception to the general norm if such general norm has discriminatory effects for that social group. In certain instances, the prohibition of discrimination namely also entails the requirement to implement special legal positions or special rights, including certain positive measures that aim to prevent a less favourable position or marginalisation of the weakest links in society and to promote and create equal opportunities for such categories of people in order to ensure their participation in social life on an equal basis with others.<sup>15</sup> Positive measures that are adopted with such a purpose do not entail an interference with the principle of equality,<sup>16</sup> but are intended precisely for its implementation. The ECtHR also adopted the standpoint that from the prohibition of discrimination there also follows the requirement of the prevention of indirect discrimination and consequently also the requirement to adopt appropriate reasonable accommodations that aim to ensure de facto equal treatment of disadvantaged social groups.<sup>17</sup>

14 Ibid.

15 Legal theory refers to this legal instrument with the expression “positive discrimination in the broader sense”. In contrast, according to legal theory “positive discrimination in the narrower sense” is a legal instrument which implements the unequal (privileged) legal treatment of certain categories of persons in the exercise of rights which as a general rule are ensured to all legal addressees to the same extent and under the same conditions in order to promote or create equal opportunities, in order to promote their more equal representation in the political, economic, social, and other areas of life in society, and in order to eliminate or prevent indirect discrimination and the consequences of past discrimination. Positive discrimination in a narrower sense exists when certain categories of persons are exceptionally and provisionally treated differently (i.e. in a privileged manner) when exercising their rights that as a general rule are ensured to members of different social groups or to all persons under the same conditions and to the same extent (for more, see B. Flander, ibid., pp. 101–102).

16 In Decision No. U-I-283/94, dated 12 February 1998 (Official Gazette RS, No. 20/98, and OdlUS VII, 26), The Constitutional Court indeed adopted the position that ensuring a certain social group special rights entails a deviation from the principle of equality. However, the cited case is different from the case at issue. In the cited case, the Constitutional Court namely reviewed the constitutional admissibility of the special right of the members of autochthonous national minorities to a so-called double right to vote as a form of positive discrimination in the narrower sense.

17 Cf. D. H. and Others v. the Czech Republic (Grand Chamber Judgment, dated 13 November 2007): the Grand

B – III

The Prohibition of Discrimination due to Disability

19. Numerous international instruments increasingly emphasise that as an objectively disadvantaged social group, persons with disabilities must be ensured de facto equal treatment. Such demands are a consequence of the changing social attitude towards persons with disabilities: from a person with a disability as an object, to a person with a disability as a bearer of rights, thus, from a situation in which others decide on their behalf, to a situation in which they decide independently for themselves.<sup>18</sup> In addition to the prohibition of discrimination within the meaning of implementing formal equality, already the Standard Rules on the Equalisation of Opportunities for Persons with Disabilities<sup>19</sup> promoted the idea that society must ensure equal opportunities for persons with disabilities by means of active measures. They also explicitly emphasised the overall importance of accessibility (also to information and communication) in the process of the equalisation of opportunities in all spheres of society (Rule 5). The steadily increasing social awareness of the need to equally integrate persons with disabilities into society is also reflected in the amendment of Article 15 of the European Social Charter (The right of persons with disabilities to independence, social integration, and participation in the life of the community), to which a new third paragraph was added during the revision of the European Social Charter. That paragraph explicitly states that it is necessary to promote the full social integration and participation in the life of the community of persons with disabilities.<sup>20</sup>
20. Also in the legal order of the European Union it has been increasingly underlined that the legislature may not only take into account the prohibition of discrimination,

---

Chamber established that the Czech Republic violated Article 14 (the Prohibition of Discrimination) of the ECHR read in conjunction with Article 2 (the Right to Education) of Protocol No. 1 to the ECHR as it did not attempt to eliminate the discriminatory effect caused by legislation in the sphere of education that was the same for all children by means of different (accommodated) treatment of the members of the Roma community.

- 18 Cf. Malaga Ministerial Declaration on People with Disabilities: “Progressing towards full participation as citizens”, which was adopted in 2003 at the Second European Conference of Ministers Responsible for Integration Policies for People with Disabilities, organised by the Council of Europe. The text of the Declaration is published on the website: http://www.mddsz.gov.si/si/delovna\_podrocja/invalidi/malaska\_deklaracija\_o\_invalidih/.
- 19 Even though the Rules, which were adopted by Resolution No. 48/96, dated 20 December 1993, were not adopted as a binding international instrument, their introduction stated that although the Rules are not mandatory, they could become international customary law if they were applied by a great number of states that have decided to respect the rules of international law.
- 20 The third paragraph of Article 15 of the revised European Social Charter (Official Gazette RS, No. 24/99, MP, No. 7/99) reads as follows: “With a view to ensuring to persons with disabilities, irrespective of age and the nature and origin of their disabilities, the effective exercise of the right to independence, social integration and participation in the life of the community, the Parties undertake, in particular: to promote their full social integration and participation in the life of the community in particular through measures, including technical aids, aiming to overcome barriers to communication and mobility and enabling access to transport, housing, cultural activities and leisure.”

but that it must be active in ensuring the equal treatment of persons with disabilities by encouraging them as members of society to participate in all forms of social life.<sup>21</sup> Within the framework of the European Year of Persons with Disabilities, a European Action Plan (2004–2010): “Equal opportunities for people with disabilities” was adopted that provides for the adoption of two-year action plans. In 2006, the European Parliament resolution on the situation of people with disabilities in the enlarged European Union: the European Action Plan 2006–2007 (2006/2105(INI)) was adopted,<sup>22</sup> which, inter alia, draws attention to the fact that it is necessary that documentation produced by European institutions should always be made available on demand in accessible formats, particularly as regards forms being fully accessible to blind and partially sighted persons (paragraph 31).<sup>23</sup> Within the framework of the European Year of Persons with Disabilities, also Slovenia adopted The Action Plan for Persons with Disabilities 2007–2013,<sup>24</sup> which among the general principles and obligations emphasises the obligation to accept disabilities as part of human diversity, the obligation to ensure equal opportunities, the obligation to ensure the full and effective participation and integration of persons with disabilities in society, the obligation to respect their personal dignity and independence, including their right to their free choice and independence as well as accessibility, as the fundamental conditions for exercising their rights and ensuring their social integration. Moreover, the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union (OJ C 303, 14 December 2007) emphasises that persons with disabilities must be ensured not only formal (legal) equality, but also de facto (substantive) equality, which is intended to ensure equal opportunities and equality of results in order to eliminate de facto inequalities. The first paragraph of Article 21 of the Charter namely not only emphasises that discrimination based on disability is prohibited, but Article 26 (Integration of persons with disabilities) explicitly recognises and guarantees persons with disabilities the right to benefit from measures designed to ensure their independence, social and occupational integration, and participation in the life of the community.

21. Another reflection of the ever greater social awareness of the significance of ensuring equal opportunities for persons with disabilities is the amendment of 21 At the level of the European Union, the general principle of the prohibition of discrimination has been included in the Treaty Establishing the European Community (hereinafter referred to as the EC Treaty) with the Treaty of Amsterdam. Cf. Article 13 of the EC Treaty (OJ C 340, 10 November 1997, and Official Gazette RS, No. 27, MP, No. 7/04 – consolidated text). The provision speaks of “appropriate action to combat discrimination.” This can also be understood as the possibility to adopt positive measures.

22 OJ C 316 E, 22 December 2006, pp. 370–378.

23 In 2007, Europol adopted the Rules for Access to Europol Documents (OJ C 072, 29 March 2007, pp. 37–40), which in Article 10 (Access following an application) determine, inter alia, that documents shall be supplied in an existing version and format (including electronically or in an alternative format such as Braille, large print, or tape) and in one of the available linguistic versions in accordance with the applicant’s preference.

24 The Action Plan is published on the website: <http://www.mddsz.gov.si/si/splosno/novice/novica/article/1939/5367/?cHash=075eded6b1>.

the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution,<sup>25</sup> by which the right to non-discriminatory treatment was extended,<sup>26</sup> and now disability is explicitly listed among the personal circumstances that may not be a basis for discrimination.<sup>27</sup> Even prior to such, disability was undoubtedly considered one of the personal circumstances that may not be a basis for discriminatory treatment, however, such symbolic emphasis in the Constitution with regard to the protection of persons with disabilities against discrimination gives it even greater significance at the symbolic level.<sup>28</sup>

22. Moreover, it must be taken into consideration that in 2008 the CRPD<sup>29</sup> and its Optional Protocol came into force, which is the first binding instrument of the UN with regard to the human rights of persons with disabilities. States Parties have, inter alia, undertaken to ensure and promote the full realisation of all human rights and fundamental freedoms for all persons with disabilities without discrimination of any kind on the basis of disability and to adopt all appropriate legislative, administrative, and other measures for the implementation of the rights recognised in the present Convention (Article 4 of the CRPD). According to the CRPD, discrimination on the basis of disability also includes the denial of necessary and appropriate modifications

---

25 Cf. The Constitutional Act Amending Article 14 of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia (Official Gazette RS, No. 69/04).

26 In recent years, such extensions of the principle of non-discriminatory treatment have also been adopted in certain other European countries. In 1994, the German Bundestag adopted an amendment to Article 3 of the Basic Law, which now explicitly determines that no one may be placed at a disadvantage due to their disability (cf. Maunz-Dürig, Grundgesetz Kommentar, Band I, GG-Text, Art. 3, Verlag C. H. Beck München, p. 353a).

27 The Slovene legal order does not contain a uniform definition of disability. Disability and the status of a person with a disability depend on the individual fields of legal regulation (cf. M. Kalčič, Invalidnost kot osebna okoliščina [Disability as a Personal Circumstance], in: Prepoved diskriminacije, Med varstvom človekovih pravic in konkurenčnostjo delodajalca [The Prohibition of Discrimination, Between the Protection of Human Rights and the Competitiveness of the Employer], Inštitut za delo pri Pravni fakulteti Univerze v Ljubljani, Ljubljana 2007, p. 361). The second paragraph of Article 1 of the CRPD defines persons with disabilities as persons who have long-term physical, mental, intellectual, or sensory impairments that in interaction with various barriers may hinder their full and effective participation in society on an equal basis with others. The notion of disability is, however, explicitly determined in the Preamble. Disability is defined as an evolving concept and as a result of the interaction between persons with impairments and attitudinal and environmental barriers that hinders their full and effective participation in society on an equal basis with others (Recital e). From both definitions it clearly follows that they establish a connection between an individual – a person with disabilities – and his or her environment. Thereby, both definitions indirectly oblige the States Parties to remove barriers in the environment that cause discrimination and render equal opportunities impossible (ibid., p. 359).

28 Cf. L. Šturm, Ustavnopravni vidiki načela enakosti [The Constitutional Law Aspects of the Principle of Equality], in: Človekove pravice in invalidi, Za 14. člen – od ideje do ustavnega zakona [Human Rights and Persons with Disabilities, For Article 14 – from an Idea to a Constitutional Amendment], p. 43, published on the website: http://www2.arnes.si/ljzdis1/books/ZDIS\_zbornik\_2005.pdf. Cf. M. Cerar, Ustavna razprava pred prehodom v drugo fazo [The Constitutional Debate before Reaching the Second Stage], Pravna praksa, No. 44/2003, Uvodnik, pp. 3–4.

29 The Convention and the Optional Protocol thereto were adopted by the General Assembly of the UN in December 2006 by Resolution No. A/61/611. In accordance with Article 45 of the Convention, it entered into force on the thirtieth day after the deposit of the twentieth instrument of ratification or accession, i.e. on 30 May 2008.

and adjustments not imposing a disproportionate or undue burden, where needed in a particular case, to ensure to persons with disabilities the enjoyment or exercise on an equal basis with others of all human rights and fundamental freedoms (Article 2 of the CRPD). The CRPD, inter alia, explicitly requires that States Parties ensure effective access to justice for persons with disabilities on an equal basis with others, including through the provision of procedural and age-appropriate accommodations, in order to facilitate their effective role as (direct and indirect) participants, including as witnesses, in all legal proceedings, including at investigative and other preliminary stages (cf. Article 13 – “Access to Justice”). Slovenia has also ratified the CRPD.<sup>30</sup> This entails that in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 153 in conjunction with Article 8 of the Constitution, from the day of its entry into force, its provisions are binding on the National Assembly when adopting laws. The duty to adopt appropriate accommodations that would enable blind persons to (independently) effectively participate in proceedings before courts is thus imposed on the legislature also by a binding treaty.

B – IV

The Position of Blind and Partially Sighted<sup>31</sup> Persons in Civil Proceedings

23. In consideration of all the above, the Constitutional Court notes that the existing regulation of civil procedure, which does not ensure special rights to blind persons, but treats them equally as other participants in proceedings, despite the fact that they are an objectively disadvantaged social group, interferes with their right to non-discriminatory treatment (the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution). Preventing access to court and other documents in civil proceedings in a form that is accessible to blind persons namely entails a significant obstacle for blind persons, which (in comparison with other [i.e. sighted] persons in the same position) makes the exercise of their right to fair treatment significantly more difficult. In order to remedy the disadvantaged position of blind persons in civil proceedings, the implementation of certain appropriate accommodations would be necessary. The National Assembly namely failed to demonstrate that blind persons are ensured an equal position in exercising their rights in civil proceedings by means of other, already existing, procedural institutions.
24. The Constitutional Court has already emphasised<sup>32</sup> that in determining the constitutional framework of the right to use one's language or script in judicial proceedings, the fact that in Slovenia the official language is Slovene (and in certain areas also Italian and Hungarian) must be taken into consideration.<sup>33</sup> Furthermore, 30 Slovenia signed the CRPD together with the Optional Protocol on 30 March 2007. The National Assembly ratified it on 4 April 2008.

31 Partially sighted persons may also find themselves in the same position as blind persons. Hereinafter, the Constitutional Court refers to all such persons as blind persons.

32 Cf. the above-cited Order No. Up-43/96, Paragraph 18 of the reasoning.

33 Cf. T. Jerovšek, Člen 62 (pravica do uporabe svojega jezika) [Article 62 (The Right to Use One's Own Language)], in: L. Šturm (ed.), op. cit., p. 615.

the Constitutional Court has already adopted the standpoint that the fact that a party to civil proceedings must him- or herself provide for the translation of court and other documents into a language that he or she understands is in and of itself not inconsistent with the right to use one's language in proceedings as the party is, nevertheless, ensured a fair trial.<sup>34</sup> However, the position of blind persons cannot be equated with the position of persons who do not understand the Slovene language. A Braille transcript of court or other documents in proceedings is namely still a document in Slovene and not in a foreign language. Therefore, the position of blind persons can only be compared with the position of persons who, like blind persons, understand the Slovene language. In consideration of the above, there is no doubt that with regard to the possibility of reviewing the content of court documents or the written applications of parties and other participants in proceedings, blind persons are in a disadvantaged position in comparison with other [i.e. sighted] persons. Despite the fact that they partake in literacy programmes adapted to their disability, which, regardless of the obstacles caused by their blindness, enables them to review by themselves the content of court and other documents in proceedings in the Slovene language, the state does not ensure them appropriate accommodations.

25. As regards the possibility of reviewing the content of the written documents of the court and the participants in proceedings, blind persons are in a disadvantaged position not only in comparison with [sighted] persons who understand the Slovene language, but are also in a substantially more difficult position in comparison with [sighted] persons who do not understand the Slovene language. Blind persons namely cannot obtain court or other documents in proceedings in a form that they can understand in the same manner as persons who do not understand the Slovene language can. As highlighted by the petitioner, the existence of interpreters for Braille is conceptually impossible. In order to obtain a Braille transcript, the form of the document must be "translated" into another form with the help of technical equipment. This can be done either by printing the documents in Braille or by converting the writing to Braille using an electronic Braille pad (or into a spoken form using a speech synthesiser). However, in order to use either method blind persons must be provided an electronic version of the document. The fact that court or other documents in proceedings are served on them [only] in printed form thus makes it substantially more difficult for blind persons to obtain transcriptions of documents in a form that is accessible to them.
26. Moreover, the institution of authorised representation cannot ensure blind persons an equal position as regards the exercise of their rights in civil proceedings. If only blind persons were required to exercise their rights with the assistance of an authorised representative, such would namely not entail a special benefit (not even if such representation was provided at the expense of the state), but the discrimination of blind persons, as they could not exercise their rights in judicial proceedings under the same conditions as others (who can freely choose [whether to avail themselves of the assistance of an authorised representative or not]). Such would namely entail that blind persons would be denied the capacity to represent themselves already at the first and second instances, while it is recognised to other persons (who possess contractual capacity or the capacity to sue or be sued). Moreover, the institution of authorised representation would not eliminate the unequal position of blind persons in civil proceedings even if mandatory representation by a lawyer were prescribed equally for all parties to proceedings.<sup>35</sup> Blind persons would still be in a disadvantaged position in comparison with others despite the fact that the capacity to validly act in proceedings without a lawyer would be equally limited for all. Access to transcripts of court and other documents in a form that is accessible to blind persons would namely still be substantially more difficult in comparison with other persons (as follows from the preceding paragraphs of the reasoning).

---

34 See, Order of the Constitutional Court No. Up-1378/06, dated 20 May 2008 (Official Gazette RS, 59/08).

27. In accordance with all of the above, the existing regulation of the exemption from the payment of the costs of proceedings (which also includes the costs of legal representation) cannot by itself remedy the less favourable position of blind persons in civil proceedings as regards the exercise of their rights determined by Article 22 of the Constitution. Not only because the institution of representation by a lawyer in itself cannot as a general rule ensure a blind person an equal position in proceedings, but also because free-of-charge representation by a lawyer, even if a blind person freely decides that he or she wishes to exercise his or her rights in proceedings only in such manner, is not provided in every case. In accordance with the provisions of the FLAA,<sup>36</sup> only persons in an unfavourable financial situation are entitled to an exemption from the payment of the costs of proceedings.<sup>37</sup> The mentioned regulation does not envisage any other reasons for the exercise of the right to free legal aid. As has already been emphasised, the right to access court and other documents in proceedings in a form that is accessible to blind persons exists only if such is ensured to them at the expense of the state.
28. As the Constitutional Court established that the legislature's failure to ensure blind persons the necessary and appropriate accommodations that would enable them to exercise their right to fair treatment in civil proceedings on an equal basis with others entails an interference with their right to non-discriminatory treatment (the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution), it had to review if such interference is constitutionally admissible. An interference with human rights is constitutionally 35 As is already prescribed (an exception is determined only by the fourth paragraph of Article 86 of the CPA) in proceedings regarding extraordinary legal remedies (cf. the third paragraph of Article 86 of the CPA).

36 Article 170 of the CPA, which regulated the right of a party to be appointed a free-of-charge lawyer, was repealed on 1 October 2008 by the entry into force of the Act Amending the Civil Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 45/08). Since that time, this right is decided on only in accordance with the rules determined in the FLAA.

37 The first paragraph of Article 1 of the FLAA reads as follows: "The purpose of free legal aid in accordance with this Act is to enable persons to exercise their right to judicial protection in accordance with the principle of equality, thereby taking into account their material position, as these persons would not be able to exercise such right without detriment to their ability to maintain themselves and their family."

admissible if it is based on a constitutionally admissible, i.e. objectively substantiated, aim (the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution) and if it is in accordance with the general principle of proportionality as one of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution). The Constitutional Court performs a review of the consistency of the challenged regulation with the general principle of proportionality on the basis of a strict test of proportionality, which comprises a review of three aspects of the interference, i.e. a review of the necessity, appropriateness, and proportionality of the interference in the narrow sense, provided that it established beforehand that the limitation is based on a constitutionally admissible aim (see, Decision No. U-I-18/02, dated 24 October 2003, Official Gazette RS, No. 108/03, and OdlUS XII, 86, Paragraph 25 of the reasoning).

29. The Constitutional Court first reviewed whether there existed any constitutionally admissible reason for the failure to provide necessary and appropriate accommodations. The National Assembly, inter alia, objected that when regulating civil procedure the requirements of expeditious, economical, and effective proceedings, the aim of which is to ensure the right of (both) parties to a trial without undue delay and with as little cost as possible, must be taken into consideration. The objection with regard to the requirement of expeditious proceedings could be important from the viewpoint of the constitutional requirement that prohibits excessive interferences with the right to (effective) judicial protection determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution. However, by merely generally alleging that also this human right should be taken into consideration, the National Assembly failed to demonstrate that for this reason the right of blind persons to access court and other documents in proceedings in a form that is accessible to them could not be regulated in any (reasonable) manner. It is the obligation of the legislature to regulate the position of blind persons in civil proceedings within the framework of its field of discretion in such a manner that it does not excessively interfere with the human rights of other participants in proceedings. In addition, it must be taken into consideration that there already exists a statutory basis for the introduction of electronic operations in civil proceedings,<sup>38</sup> which will significantly facilitate the possibility of ensuring reasonable accommodations for blind persons. Furthermore, the National Assembly failed to demonstrate the existence of a constitutionally admissible reason for the established interference with this human right by relying on its duty to prevent excessive costs for the parties. As the Constitutional Court has already established, blind persons must be ensured access to court and other documents in proceedings in a form that is accessible to them at the expense of the state and not at the expense of the parties. The National Assembly did not even claim that the costs of appropriate accommodations would be so unreasonably high that such positive measures could not be carried out at all. In any event, within the framework of its field of discretion,

---

38 Cf. The Act Amending the Civil Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 52/07), which already contains provisions on the electronic operations of courts, which have, however, not yet been implemented due to the fact that appropriate executive regulations still have to be adopted and appropriate technical conditions fulfilled.

the legislature can provide appropriate accommodations in such a manner that the state budget is burdened as little as possible. As, in accordance with the above clarification, the National Assembly did not demonstrate that the failure to provide necessary and appropriate accommodations that would enable blind persons to exercise their rights to fair treatment in civil proceedings on an equal basis with others is justified by any constitutionally admissible aim, already the first condition required by the Constitution for limitations of human rights is not fulfilled.

30. The Constitutional Court therefore established that the challenged regulation of civil proceedings, which does not take into consideration the special position of blind (and partially sighted) persons who participate in such proceedings and who are thus not ensured an equal position as regards the exercise of their right to fair treatment (Article 22 of the Constitution), is inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution (Point 1 of the operative provisions). The Constitutional Court namely established that there exists a legal gap in the regulation of civil proceedings that cannot be filled and that its substance is deficient to such an extent that filling it in concrete cases would be arbitrary as there exist no predictable and legally reliable criteria that would indicate how to proceed in individual cases.<sup>39</sup> The equal protection of rights in authoritative decision-making procedures can namely be ensured only if the rules of procedure that authorities must respect when deciding on the rights, duties, and legal interests of individuals are precisely determined in advance. In view of the nature of this right, it is thus necessary that the manner of its exercise be determined by law (the second paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution).<sup>40</sup> As in the case at issue the legislature did not regulate a certain issue that it should have regulated, an abrogation is not possible. Therefore, on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 48 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 64/07 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), the Constitutional Court adopted a declaratory decision. On the basis of the second paragraph of Article 48 of the CCA, it required the legislature to remedy the established inconsistency within a period of one year from the publication of this decision in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia (Point 2 of the operative provisions).

31. In order to satisfy the constitutional and Convention requirements of equal treatment of blind (and partially sighted) persons in civil proceedings, the legislature will have to appropriately regulate their right to access court and other documents in proceedings in a form that is accessible to them. Thereby, from the perspective of the right of blind persons to personal dignity, it is of essential importance that (within the framework of reasonable options) they are ensured the possibility to choose the manner in which they wish to review the content of documents (e.g. in the physical form of the document in Braille, a digital form of the document, a reading with the assistance of another person). The possibility to participate in proceedings on an equal basis with others regardless of blindness namely depends on the particular capabilities of the individual. In the assessment of the Constitutional Court, mandatory representation by a lawyer as a manner of ensuring that blind persons exercise their right to a fair trial on an equal basis with others could only be constitutionally admissible in cases where blind persons, due to their personal circumstances, cannot be ensured effective protection of their rights by other appropriate accommodations. However, in such cases blind persons would have to be guaranteed representation by a lawyer at the expense of the state, regardless of their financial situation and income.

39 M. Pavčnik, Argumentacija v pravu, Od življenjskega primera do pravne odločitve [Legal Argumentation (From the Real Life Event to the Legal Decision)], the second amended and supplemented edition, Cankarjeva založba, Ljubljana 2004, pp. 123 et seq.

40 F. Testen, Člen 22 (enako varstvo pravic) [Article 22 (Equal Protection of Rights)] in: L. Šturm, op. cit., p. 240.

32. Despite the fact that in the case at issue the Constitutional Court reviewed only whether the regulation of civil procedure ensures blind persons the opportunity to exercise their right to fair treatment in civil and other judicial proceedings in which the provisions of the CPA are applied mutatis mutandis<sup>41</sup> on an equal basis with others, the Constitutional Court draws attention to the fact that the question of the necessity of an appropriate regulation of the equal rights of blind persons also in other judicial proceedings and proceedings before other state authorities has been raised. Therefore, the adoption of a uniform statutory regulation for all judicial proceedings (as well as for other proceedings before state authorities, local community authorities, and bearers of public authority in which an individual's rights, obligations, or legal interests are decided on) should be considered, such as has already been adopted, for example, with regard to deaf persons. Even though the Constitutional Court established the constitutional inconsistency of the CPA, this does not entail that within the framework of its field of discretion the legislature is not allowed to regulate the inconsistency established in this Decision by a special law (such as the act adopted with regard to deaf persons), or in the Equalisation of Opportunities for Persons with Disabilities Act,<sup>42</sup> the Courts Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 19/94 etc.), or any other law.
33. As the Constitutional Court established that the challenged regulation of the civil procedure is inconsistent with the principle of non-discriminatory treatment within the meaning of the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution, it did not review the allegations of the unequal treatment of blind persons in comparison with deaf

---

41 The provisions of the CPA namely do not apply only in civil, but (mutatis mutandis) also in other judicial proceedings. Cf. Article 15 of the Execution of Judgments in Civil Matters and Securing of Claims Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 51/98, etc.), Article 37 of the Non-litigious Civil Procedure Act (Official Gazette SRS, Nos. 30/86, etc.).

42 From the legislative materials of the draft Act on the Ratification of the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities and the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, No. EVA 2007-1811-0110, dated 21 February 2008, it follows that the Ministry of Labour, Family, and Social Affairs is preparing the text of the draft of the Equalisation of Opportunities for Persons with Disabilities Act, which, as a lex specialis in the field of the protection of persons with disabilities, will, in addition to the IPETA, regulate the prohibition of discrimination due to disability and measures for the equalisation of opportunities of persons with disabilities.

persons (i.e. the alleged violation of the principle of equality before the law or in the law on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution).

34. In order to guarantee blind persons a position that will enable them to exercise, effectively and on an equal basis with others, their rights in civil and other judicial proceedings in which the CPA is applied mutatis mutandis until the established inconsistency is remedied, the Constitutional Court determined the manner of the implementation of the Decision on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA. In accordance with such, courts must ensure blind persons, upon their request, access to court documents and the written applications of parties and other participants in proceedings in a form accessible to them, whereby the costs of such are to be paid from the funds of the court (Point 3 of the operative provisions). The Constitutional Court is aware that due to the complexity of the issue that the legislature has to regulate, it will not be possible to fully ensure the equal position of blind persons in civil proceedings until the adoption of the appropriate statutory regulation. Until the appropriate technical solutions are adopted, the courts will namely not be able to ensure in every case that blind persons can review the procedural materials in the manner of their choice. However, in order to ensure that during this transitional period blind persons are guaranteed at least minimum procedural safeguards, the courts will have to provide blind persons, upon their request, Braille transcripts of at least the more important procedural materials (i.e. documents that have to be served on parties). A different manner of reviewing the content of procedural materials (e.g. by providing a reading or an appropriate oral summary of the relevant content of the procedural materials or in some other appropriate manner) can be applied in cases where due to the circumstances of the individual case (either due to the format of the recorded information – e.g. a photograph or a sketch – or due to other, e.g. technical, obstacles) this right of blind persons cannot be ensured by means of Braille transcripts of documents. Until the adoption of appropriate legislation, it is particularly important that blind persons are ensured access to court and other documents in proceedings in a form that is accessible to them to such an extent that will enable them to effectively protect their rights in proceedings.

C

35. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of Article 48 and the second paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA and the fifth paragraph of Article 46 of the Rules of Procedure of the Constitutional Court (Official Gazette RS, No. 86/07), composed of President Jože Tratnik and Judges Mag. Marta Klampfer, Mag. Marija Krisper Kramberger, Mag. Miroslav Mozetič, Dr Ernest Petrič, Jasna Pogačar, Dr Ciril Ribičič, and Jan Zobec. The decision was adopted unanimously.

Jože Tratnik
President

Decision No. U-I-425/06, dated 2 July 2009

DECISION

At a session held on 2 July 2009 in proceedings to review constitutionality initiated upon the petition of Mitja Blažič, Dobrovo v Brdih, and Viki Kern, Vodice, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. Article 22 of the Registration of a Same-Sex Civil Partnership Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 65/05) is inconsistent with the Constitution.
2. The National Assembly must remedy the established inconsistency within six months from the publication of this decision in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia.
3. Until the established inconsistency is remedied, the same rules apply for inheritance between partners in registered same-sex partnerships as apply for inheritance between spouses in accordance with the Inheritance Act (Official Gazette SRS, Nos. 15/76 and 23/78 and Official Gazette RS, No. 67/01).

Reasoning

A

1. The petitioners challenge Article 22 of the Registration of a Same-Sex Civil Partnership Act (hereinafter referred to as the RSSCPA), which regulates inheritance between partners in such partnerships. They claim that they are partners in a same-sex partnership and that they have registered their partnership in accordance with the RSSCPA, and on the basis of this registration they have acquired the right to inheritance from a deceased partner in accordance with this act. In their opinion, the challenged regulation on inheritance from a same-sex partner is discriminatory. They allege that the challenged provision inadmissibly differentiates between the inheritance of the separate and the community property of partners in same-sex partnerships and as it does not specifically regulate the inheritance of separate property and does not determine a forced portion to be inherited by a same-sex partner, it entails an unconstitutional differentiation between partners in same-sex partnerships and spouses or common-law partners. In their opinion, the challenged provision is inconsistent with Articles 14, 15, 33, and 66 of the Constitution.

2. The National Assembly did not reply to the petition.
3. The Constitutional Court accepted the petition and due to the fact that the conditions provided for in the fourth paragraph of Article 26 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 64/07 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the CCA) were satisfied, it immediately proceeded to decide on the merits.
4. The first paragraph of Article 22 of the RSSCPA determines that in the event of a partner's death, the surviving partner of a registered same-sex partnership (hereinafter referred to as a same-sex partner) has the right to inheritance of the decedent's share of the community property in accordance with this act. This provision establishes a legal foundation for inheritance between same-sex partners. Neither the Inheritance Act (Official Gazette SRS, No. 15/76 etc. – hereinafter referred to as the IA) as a general regulation, nor any other regulation in the field of inheritance namely includes same-sex partners in the circle of heirs.<sup>1</sup> The second and third paragraphs of Article 22 of the RSSCPA regulate the manner of inheritance of the community property between same-sex partners. If a decedent has children, the community property is inherited by the surviving partner and the decedent's children in equal shares (the second paragraph of Article 22); if a decedent does not have any children, the surviving partner inherits the entire share on the community property (the third paragraph of Article 22). The fourth paragraph of the challenged Article 22 of the RSSCPA regulates the inheritance of the decedent's separate property and determines that this property is inherited in accordance with the general regulations on inheritance. These regulations are applied also for inheritance of the share of the decedent's community property, if the RSSCPA does not determine otherwise. The fifth paragraph of Article 22 of the RSSCPA determines that local courts have subject-matter jurisdiction to decide in probate proceedings in accordance with this act.

B – II

5. One of the petitioners' allegations regarding the challenged regulation is that, in the field of inheritance, it entails discrimination against same-sex partners in comparison with spouses or common-law partners and is therefore inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution.
6. The first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution determines that in Slovenia everyone is guaranteed equal human rights and fundamental freedoms irrespective of national origin, race, sex, language, religion, political or other conviction, material standing, birth, education, social status, disability, or any other personal circumstance. The above-mentioned constitutional provision prohibits discrimination in ensuring, exercising, and protecting human rights and fundamental freedoms regarding individuals' personal circumstance.

---

1 Another regulation which does not include same-sex partners in the circle of heirs is the Inheritance of Agricultural Holdings Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 70/95), which is not, however, a subject of review in the case at issue.

7. In order to review this allegation as regards unequal, discriminatory treatment, the following questions must be answered in the case at issue: 1) whether the alleged different treatment refers to ensuring or exercising a human right or a fundamental freedom; 2) if so, whether the petitioners or a person to whom the petitioners compare themselves are receiving different treatment; 3) whether the actual positions that the petitioners are comparing are essentially the same and thus the differentiation is based on a circumstance determined in the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution; and 4) if the differentiation is indeed based on a circumstance determined in the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution and thus there is an interference with the right to non-discriminatory treatment, whether such interference is constitutionally admissible. If the answers to the first three questions are affirmative and the interference does not stand the so-called strict test of proportionality, the discrimination is not constitutionally admissible.
8. The first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution prohibits discrimination in ensuring, exercising, and protecting human rights and fundamental freedoms regarding individuals' personal circumstances. In order to establish a violation of the constitutional prohibition against discriminatory treatment, the determination of the existence of inadmissible discrimination in the enjoyment of any human right suffices, whereby a petitioner does not need to demonstrate the interference with this human right in and of itself.<sup>2</sup> In the case at issue, the petitioners claim discriminatory treatment in the statutory regulation of inheritance. In accordance with Article 33 of the Constitution, the right to inheritance is a human right. The allegation thus concerns inadmissible discrimination in ensuring a human right.
9. The IA does not differentiate between the inheritance of the separate and community property of spouses, but regulates the inheritance of both types of property in the same manner. Pursuant to this act, the spouse, as a heir in the first degree, and the decedent's children inherit equal shares (Article 11 of the IA). If a decedent did not have descendants, the heirs in the second degree are the decedent's parents, who inherit one half of the estate (or their descendants on the basis of the right to assume their parents' position; in accordance with Articles 15 and 16 of the IA), and the surviving spouse, who inherits the other half (in accordance with the first and second paragraphs of Article 14 of the IA). In such a case, the surviving spouse inherits the entire estate only in the event that both of the decedent's parents have died without descendants before the decedent (Article 17 of the IA). In accordance with the first paragraph of Article 33 of the IA, under certain conditions the surviving spouse has the right to have household goods be excluded from the estate. With reference to inheritance on the basis of testacy, the first paragraph of Article 25 of the IA provides for a spouse as among the forced heirs. The spouse's forced portion amounts to one half of the share which he or she would be entitled to in the case of intestacy (the second paragraph of Article 26 of the IA). The same rules apply for inheritance between a man and a woman who live in a lasting partnership and are not married (i.e. common-law partners) if there are no reasons for which a marriage between them would be void (the second paragraph of Article 10 of the IA). Any reference in this decision to (only) spouses (a marriage) shall be deemed to also constitute a reference to common-law spouses (a common-law marriage).

---

2 The Constitutional Court has adopted such position already in Decision No. U-I-146/07, dated 13 November 2008 (Official Gazette RS, No. 111/08). Also the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR) in its recent case law superseded the dependant, ancillary nature of the right to equality, according to which a violation of Article 14 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR) could be successfully exercised only in connection with a violation of one of the Convention rights. In its recent decisions, the ECtHR has namely underlined that the application of Article 14 of the ECHR does not presuppose a violation of one or more of the substantive provisions of the Convention and its Protocols, and that Article 14 of the ECHR was therefore to this extent autonomous. For Article 14 of the ECHR to become applicable, it suffices that the facts of a case fall within the ambit of another substantive provision of the Convention or its Protocols (cf. Thlimmenos v. Greece, 6 April 2000, § 40).

10. In the RSCPA, the inheritance of the separate and community property of partners is regulated differently. The first paragraph of Article 22 of the RSCPA determines that in the event of a partner's death, the surviving same-sex partner has the right to inheritance of the share of the community property in accordance with this act. If a decedent has children, the community property is inherited by the surviving partner and the decedent's children in equal shares (the second paragraph of Article 22); if a decedent does not have any children, the surviving partner inherits the entire share on the community property (the third paragraph of Article 22). As regards all other matters, the general regulations on inheritance are applied for the inheritance of the share of the decedent's community property (the second sentence of the fourth paragraph of Article 22 of the RSCPA). This entails, inter alia, that in the case of testacy, a same-sex partner is not entitled to a forced portion. The IA, as a general regulation on inheritance, namely does not include same-sex partners in the circle of forced heirs (Article 25 of the IA). In addition, they are not entitled to the right that household goods be excluded from the estate (Article 33 of the IA). The fourth paragraph of Article 22 of the RSCPA determines that the decedent's separate property is inherited in accordance with the general regulations on inheritance. Considering the fact that the general regulations on inheritance do not include same-sex partners in the circle of heirs, they cannot inherit the separate property of their partners.
11. It is evident from the above-mentioned summary of the statutory regulation that there are essential, important differences between the regulation of inheritance between spouses and between same-sex partners. The differences, which have also been stated by the petitioners, can be summarised as follows:
  - If a decedent does not have any children, the surviving same-sex partner inherits the entire share on the community property, whereas a spouse, as a heir in the second degree, inherits only one half of the estate, while the decedent's parents inherit the other half (or their descendants on the basis of their right to assume their parents' position). If a decedent does not have any children, the surviving spouse inherits the entire estate only if both of the decedent's parents have died without descendants before the decedent.

- Same-sex partners, differently than spouses, cannot inherit the separate property of their partners.
  - Same-sex partners, differently than spouses, do not fall within the circle of forced heirs and do not enjoy the right to have household goods be excluded from the estate.
12. There is evidently discriminatory treatment in cases in which the state (on the basis of personal circumstances) treats individuals in the same situation differently.<sup>3</sup> If the situations being compared are not essentially the same, it is not a matter of unconstitutional discrimination. From the perspective that is important for the review of the challenged regulation (the right to inheritance from a deceased partner, Article 22 of the RSSCPA), it is thus essential whether the petitioners' position is comparable in its essential and legal elements to the position of spouses. The Constitutional Court holds that the answer is affirmative. A registered partnership is a relationship that is in terms of substance similar to a marriage or a common-law marriage. The essential characteristic of such partnerships is also the stable connection of two persons who are close to, help, and support each other.<sup>4</sup> The ethical and emotional essence of registered partnerships, which is expressed in Article 8 of the RSSCPA, and according to which partners must respect, trust, and help each other, is similar to the community between a woman and a man. Also the legal regulation of this relationship is similar to that of marriage. The RSSCPA ensures partners certain mutual rights and obligations, protects the weaker partner, and regulates legal positions toward third persons, the state, and the social environment.<sup>5</sup> In the field of property relations during the period of a registered partnership, the RSSCPA almost entirely follows the regulation of property regime between spouses laid down in the Marriage and Family Relations Act (Articles 9 through 18 of the RSSCPA). Moreover, it regulates the obligation to ensure the maintenance of a partner who does not have sufficient funds for living (Article 19 of the RSSCPA). However, the legislature did regulate inheritance between partners in registered partnerships differently. In the case of such partnerships, the legislature did not enact, as applies for a marriage, the presumed will of the deceased partner that, although he or she did not leave a will, the person with whom he or she had shared his or her life be economically provided for by inheritance. In both a marriage and registered partnership, the decedent's presumed will is based on the same empirical and ethical arguments – to ensure also after one's death the financial security and stability of the person with whom the decedent was emotionally, intimately, financially, and in all areas of life most closely connected.<sup>6</sup>

---

3 With reference to such, the ECtHR refers to analogous situations (see, Van der Musselle v. Belgium, 23 November 1983, § 46).

4 V. Žnidaršič Skubic, Dedovanje v istospolni partnerski skupnosti [Inheritance in the Same-Sex Partnership], Podjetje in delo, No. 6-7/08, p. 1533.

5 N. Brlič, Istospolni partnerji in njihov pravni položaj [Same-Sex Partners and the Regulation of their Position], Pravna praksa, No. 47/05, Priloga, p. III.

6 In this sense, also V. Žnidaršič Skubic, ibidem.

- 13 With regard to all of these essentially the same actual and legal bases of partnerships – not only registered same-sex partnerships, but also partnerships between a woman and a man – it is evident that the differences in the regulation of inheritance are not based on any objective, non-personal circumstance, but on sexual orientation. Sexual orientation is, although not explicitly mentioned therein, undoubtedly one of the personal circumstances provided for in the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution. It is namely a human characteristic that importantly defines an individual, influences his or her life, and follows him or her through his or her entire life, just as circumstances such as race, sex, and birth do. Sexual orientation, as a circumstance which may not be a basis for differentiation, is also regarded as such by the ECtHR, although it is not among the explicitly enumerated circumstances in Article 14 of the ECHR.<sup>7</sup>
- 14. This different regime of inheritance between same-sex partners interferes with the petitioners' right to non-discriminatory treatment (the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution), which requires a review of the constitutional admissibility of the interference. Interferences with human rights are constitutionally admissible only if they are based on a constitutionally admissible, i.e. objectively justified, aim (the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution) and are consistent with the general principle of proportionality as one of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution). The Constitutional Court carries out a review of whether a challenged regulation is consistent with the general principle of proportionality on the basis of the so-called strict test of proportionality, which comprises a review of three aspects of the interference, i.e. a review of the necessity, appropriateness, and proportionality of the interference in the narrower sense if it is established beforehand that the limitation is based on a constitutionally admissible aim (see, Decision No. U-I-18/02, dated 24 October 2003, Official Gazette RS, No. 108/03, and OdlUS XII, 86; Paragraph 25 of the reasoning).
- 15. The Constitutional Court first reviewed whether there exists any constitutionally admissible reason for a different regulation of inheritance between spouses and common-law partners, on one hand, and same-sex partners, on the other. In the case at issue, such a reason cannot be found. The National Assembly did not reply to the petition, and also from the legislative materials there does not follow a constitutionally admissible reason for the challenged regulation, which interferes with the right determined in the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution. Consequently, already the first condition which is required by the Constitution in cases of the limitation of human rights is not satisfied.
- 16. The Constitutional Court therefore established that the challenged regulation of inheritance in accordance with the RSSCPA is inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution (Point 1 of the operative provisions). Due to the fact that the Constitutional Court established an inconsistency with the above-mentioned constitutional provision, it did not review the petitioners' further allegations as regards inconsistencies with other provisions of the Constitution. In the case at issue, the annulment of the challenged provision is not possible, as it would not remedy the consequences of the established unconstitutionality, but would only exacerbate the inequalities and could even entail an interference with some other human rights of the petitioners. Therefore, on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 48 of the CCA, the Constitutional Court adopted a declaratory decision. On the basis of the second paragraph of Article 48 of the CCA, it required that the legislature remedy the established inconsistency within six months from the publication of this decision in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia (Point 2 of the operative provisions).

<sup>7</sup> E.g. Salgueiro da Silva Mouta v. Portugal, 21 December 1999, § 36, and E.B. v. France, 22 January 2008, § 89.

17. On the basis of the second paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA, the Constitutional Court can determine the manner of the implementation of its decision. In order to ensure that inheritance be regulated in a manner that is not discriminatory for partners in registered same-sex partnerships until the established inconsistency is remedied, the Constitutional Court decided that until the established inconsistency is remedied, the same rules apply for inheritance between partners in registered same-sex partnerships as apply for inheritance between spouses in accordance with the IA.

C

18. The Constitutional Court reached this decision on the basis of Article 48 and the second paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA, composed of: Jože Tratnik, President, and Judges Mag. Marta Klampfer, Mag. Marija Krisper Kramberger, Mag. Miroslav Mozetič, Dr Ernest Petrič, Jasna Pogačar, Dr Ciril Ribičič, and Jan Zobec. The decision was reached unanimously.

Jože Tratnik
President

Decision No. Up-555/03, Up-827/04, dated 6 July 2006

DECISION

At a session held on 6 July 2006 in proceedings to decide upon the constitutional complaints of A. A., Y., and B. B., Z., represented by C. C., attorney in X., the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

The complainants' right to an effective legal remedy determined by the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution in relation to Article 13 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94) was violated.

Reasoning

A

1. The complainants lodged two constitutional complaints. In the first one, they challenge Order No. I Kp 652/2003, dated 29 May 2003, by which the Ljubljana Higher Court upheld Order No. Ks 801/2002, issued by a panel of the Ljubljana District Court and dated 27 September 2002, on the dismissal of a request to initiate a criminal investigation that they filed as subsidiary prosecutors. They challenge the part of the mentioned Order that refers to the criminal offences of violating the inviolability of dwellings determined by the first, second, and third paragraphs of Article 152 of the Penal Code (Official Gazette RS, No. 63/94 et seq. – hereinafter referred to as the PC). They allege a violation of the right to judicial protection (Article 23 of the Constitution), the right to the equal protection of rights (Article 22 of the Constitution), the principle of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution), and the right to the inviolability of dwellings (Article 36 of the Constitution).
2. The complainants allege that on 3 April 2000, six police officers entered by force into the locked hallway leading to the apartment of A. with their pistols raised. They allegedly knocked down D. D. (the complainants are his wife and father, respectively), handcuffed him while beating him, and dragged him into his apartment. Afterwards, they allegedly also knocked down the complainant, handcuffed her behind her back, and ordered her to look down at the floor. According to the complainants, the police officers entered the apartment without authorisation, they did not communicate the reason for their entrance to D. D. or the complainant, nor did they serve on them a house search warrant. The police officers, proceeding in the manner described above, allegedly unlawfully restricted their freedom of movement and violated the inviolability of their dwelling. D. D. died during the police procedure. Immediately after that, a group of four other police officers allegedly searched the apartment. Furthermore, the police officers allegedly also carried out a personal search of D. D., namely without a warrant and contrary to their authorisations, first when he was still alive and later, after he died, one more time. The complainant states that during the procedure she was not enabled access to a lawyer.

3. With regard to the alleged violation of Article 36 of the Constitution, the complainants allege that the first group of police officers entered by force into the apartment contrary to the law, as they allegedly unjustifiably referred to the house search warrant issued by the investigating judge. In the opinion of the complainants, they did not enter the apartment for the purpose of executing the house search warrant, because it was known in advance that the house search was going to be carried out by another group of criminal investigators. The police officers allegedly entered the apartment by force at the same moment as a visitor entered. Their assumption that the visitor was there to buy drugs cannot, in the opinion of the complainants, justify such entrance by force. Furthermore, such assumption was rebutted by the subsequent flow of events. However, had the police officers arranged that the visitor was to buy drugs from D. D., this entails, in the opinion of the complainants, police entrapment, therefore also the forced entrance into the apartment by the police was unlawful.
4. The complainants are also of the opinion that their right determined by Article 23 of the Constitution was violated by the challenged Order, as considering the fact that they were not allowed to present the evidence that they proposed they were in fact not ensured an adversarial procedure (Article 22 of the Constitution). In the opinion of the complainants, the balance between the rights of the subsidiary prosecutors in relation to the state authority (the police) was not established in the disputed judicial decisions. The evidence that they proposed was allegedly neither presented nor correctly evaluated in the judicial decisions. On the other hand, the police reports were taken into consideration in their entirety, i.e. the reports of the authority in which the suspects were employed. Individual reports for the District State Prosecutor's Office were allegedly even signed by a police employee who himself was one of the suspects, with regard to which the criminal complaint against him had not yet been decided on. With regard to the above, also Article 2 of the Constitution was allegedly violated.
5. In the second constitutional complaint, the complainants challenge the Order issued by a three-judge panel for pre-trial appeals of the Ljubljana District Court, No. Ks 1295/2003, dated 28 October 2003, which in one part rejected the request of the injured parties acting as prosecutors (the complainants) for a retrial in conformity with Article 409 of the Criminal Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 63/94 etc. – hereinafter referred to as the CrPA) regarding the criminal offence of negligent homicide determined by the first paragraph of Article 129 of the PC, and in the second part dismissed the request for a retrial regarding the aforementioned criminal offence. They also challenge Koper Higher Court Order No. Kp. 167/2004, dated 1 September 2004, by which the appellate court dismissed their appeal against the mentioned Order.

6. They allege a violation of the right to judicial protection (Article 23 of the Constitution), of the right to the equal protection of rights, and of the principle of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution). They are of the opinion that their request for a retrial and [request] to initiate a criminal investigation refers to a criminal offence that is incriminated such that it protects a person's right to life and "the right to the prohibition of torture". These two rights are, in their opinion, also protected by the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR), the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (Official Gazette RS, No. 24/93, MP, No. 7/93 – hereinafter referred to as the Convention against Torture), the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the Universal Declaration of the UN), and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (Official Gazette SFRY, MP, No. 7/71, and Official Gazette RS, No. 35/92, MP, No. 9/92 – hereinafter referred to as the International Covenant). Furthermore, they state that in conformity with the provisions of the Convention against Torture, each State Party shall ensure that its competent authorities proceed to a prompt and impartial investigation, wherever there is reasonable ground to believe that an act of torture has been committed in any territory under its jurisdiction. Each State Party shall ensure that any individual who alleges he has been subjected to torture in any territory under its jurisdiction has the right to complain to, and to have his case promptly and impartially examined by its competent authorities. They add that the Slovene legislation indeed does not regulate the specific criminal offence of torture; however, the criminal offences that were the subject of the request to initiate an investigation and the request for a retrial substantively correspond to the definition of the term torture and other forms of prohibited (cruel and degrading) treatment. The complainants emphasise that by ratifying the mentioned conventions and declarations, Slovenia bound itself to respect them. Moreover, they allege that the state also encapsulated the protection of the mentioned values and rights in Articles 17, 18, 19, 21, 36, and in other articles of the Constitution. They note that the mentioned rights also cannot be relativised. Nevertheless, they note that in actuality they do not enjoy legal protection.
7. They allege that all the judicial decisions that prevented a criminal investigation were based exclusively on the suspects' statements of defence supported by the reports issued by the Ljubljana Police Directorate, which were allegedly a construct elaborated on the basis of the suspects' statements. In their opinion, much of the evidence that they themselves collected indicates that the suspects' statements are not true, however, in the judicial decisions such evidence was either not mentioned or was erroneously assessed, or motions to take such evidence were a priori rejected.

8. The challenged decision of the appellate court allegedly violates their right determined by Article 23 of the Constitution. They allege that “the challenged Order does not substantively provide them with this right, because, in fact, by not allowing the taking of evidence that was proposed by the subsidiary prosecutors it does not ensure [the complainants] an adversarial procedure” (Article 22 of the Constitution). They are of the opinion that the balance between the rights of the injured parties acting as prosecutors in relation to the state authority (the police) has not been established in the disputed judicial decisions.
9. Furthermore, they allege that they also appealed due to the fact that at the trial at the first instance a judge was deciding against whom they had previously filed a criminal complaint and subsequently a subsidiary indictment (case No. III K 56/2003 of the Ljubljana Local Court), therefore the judge should have recused herself or should have requested that the President of the Court issue an appropriate decision thereon. However, the appellate court dismissed their appeal with the reasoning that they had not requested such recusal, irrespective of the fact that they were not informed of the composition of the panel. In the opinion of the complainants, this entails a violation of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law.
10. By Order No. Up-555/03, Up-827/04, dated 23 March 2006, the Constitutional Court accepted the two constitutional complaints for consideration. In conformity with the provisions of the first and fourth paragraphs of Article 26 in relation to Article 49 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), the constitutional complaints were sent to the Ljubljana Higher Court and the Koper Higher Court, which did not reply thereto. In conformity with Article 22 of the Constitution, the constitutional complaints were also sent to the opposing parties in the police procedure, which also did not reply thereto.

B – I

11. In Orders No. Up-285/97, dated 10 May 2001 (Official Gazette RS, No. 52/01, and OdlUS X, 115) and No. Up-168/98, dated 10 May 2001 (Official Gazette RS, No. 52/01, and OdlUS X, 116), the Constitutional Court adopted the position that an injured party acting as a prosecutor (a subsidiary prosecutor) and a private prosecutor do not have active standing to file a constitutional complaint against a final judgment of acquittal or some other judicial decision by which the criminal procedure was concluded finally.
12. The case at issue is substantively different than the two mentioned above. The complainants namely challenge a final order on the dismissal of a request to initiate a criminal investigation and a final order on the dismissal of a request for a retrial in conformity with Article 409 of the CrPA, which they filed against the persons who at the time when they allegedly committed the criminal offences with which they are charged were taking part, as police officers, in a police action during which one person died. Hitherto, the Constitutional Court has not yet adopted a position with regard to whether the filing of constitutional complaints is justified in such cases. Therefore, in the case at issue, the Constitutional Court decided to consider the matter on its merits. It resolved that it would decide on both constitutional complaints by one decision.

B – II

13. The Constitutional Court consulted file No. II Kpr 70/2001 of the Ljubljana District Court.
14. The file shows that after a state prosecutor had rejected their criminal complaint, the complainants acting as subsidiary prosecutors (i.e. the injured parties acting as prosecutors) filed a request to initiate an investigation against six police officers (the first group of police officers) on grounds of a reasonable suspicion that they had committed the criminal offences of negligent homicide, a violation of the inviolability of dwellings, two criminal offences of the unlawful deprivation of liberty (of the complainant and D. D.), the criminal offence of a wrongful personal search (of D. D.), and two criminal offences of the violation of personal dignity (of the complainant and D. D.) by the abuse of office or official duties. Against one of these police officers and another three police officers (the second group of police officers), the injured parties acting as prosecutors filed a request to initiate an investigation on grounds of a reasonable suspicion that they had committed the criminal offences of the abuse of office or official duties and a violation of the inviolability of dwellings. Due to the death of one of the police officers they later withdrew the request to initiate an investigation against him.
15. The investigating judge of the Ljubljana District Court decided, by Order No. II Kpr 70/2001, dated 28 May 2002, that an investigation be carried out against the police officers from the first group on grounds of a reasonable suspicion that they had committed the criminal offences of negligent homicide determined by Article 129 of the PC and the violation of personal dignity (of D. D.) by the abuse of office or official duties determined by Article 270 of the PC in relation to Article 25 of the PC. With regard to the police officers from the second group, the investigating judge initiated an investigation against them on grounds of a reasonable suspicion that they had committed the criminal offence of a violation of the inviolability of dwellings as determined by the first, second, and third paragraphs of Article 152 of the PC in relation to Article 25 of the PC.
16. The investigating judge decided on the request to initiate an investigation only in the above-mentioned part. In the remaining part, he requested that a three-judge panel for pre-trial appeals decide on the matter, as he did not agree that an investigation should be initiated.
17. The defence counsels of all the defendants but two appealed against the order initiating the investigation. By Order No. Ks 801/2002, dated 29 September 2002, the three-judge panel for pre-trial appeals of the District Court granted the appeals and modified the order issued by the investigating judge so as to dismiss in its entirety the request to initiate a criminal investigation (points I A and I B of the Order). Furthermore, it dismissed ex officio the request to initiate a criminal investigation against the two police officers who did not appeal. By the above-mentioned Order, the decision of the three-judge panel for pre-trial appeals mentioned in point I became final.

18. By the same Order, the panel also decided on the remaining part of the request to initiate an investigation such that it concurred with the investigating judge's opinion that there was no reasonable suspicion that the defendants committed the alleged criminal offences; therefore, also in this part it dismissed the request to initiate an investigation (points II A and II B of the Order).
19. The complainants as subsidiary prosecutors filed an appeal against point II of the Order of the panel of the Ljubljana District Court and claimed that there had been an erroneous finding on the state of the facts. By Order No. I Kp 652/2003, dated 29 May 2003, the Ljubljana Higher Court dismissed their appeal as unfounded.
20. Thereupon, the complainants filed a request for a retrial, in conformity with Article 409 of the CrPA, against the police officers from the first and second groups for having committed the criminal offence of negligent homicide as determined by Article 129 of the PC. By point I of Order No. Ks 1294/2003, dated 28 October 2003, the three-judge panel for pre-trial appeals of the Ljubljana District Court rejected the request of the injured parties acting as prosecutors for a retrial against the police officers from the second group. By point II it dismissed as unfounded the request of the injured parties acting as prosecutors for a retrial against the police officers from the first group.
21. Both subsidiary prosecutors appealed against point II of the Order of the three-judge panel for pre-trial appeals. By Order No. Kp 167/2004, dated 1 September 2004, the Koper Higher Court (the jurisdiction of this court was determined, upon the motion of the subsidiary prosecutors to transfer the territorial jurisdiction, by a Supreme Court order) dismissed their appeal, and rejected a supplement to the appeal for being too late.

B – III

22. In the proceedings that were concluded by the challenged judicial decisions, the injured parties requested that a criminal investigation be initiated against the police officers that participated in the police action during which one person (the husband or son of the complainants, respectively) died. The complainants allege a violation of the right to a fair trial. They allege, inter alia, that their request that a criminal investigation be initiated and that a retrial be carried out refers to criminal offences that interfered with the human rights determined by Articles 17, 18, 19, 21, and 36 of the Constitution. They also refer to the provisions of the ECHR and in particular emphasise the violation of a person's right to life and "the right to the prohibition of torture". The complainants are of the opinion that by not allowing the criminal investigation to be initiated, the courts violated the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution. They request that a fair investigation be carried out by an impartial court independent from the police in which they will be given the opportunity to present the incriminating evidence in their possession.

23. In their constitutional complaint, the complainants emphasise in particular the interference by the police officers with the human rights determined by Articles 17, 18, and 21 of the Constitution, which refer to protection from interferences with fundamental human rights. Article 17 of the Constitution guarantees the inviolability of human life. Article 18 of the Constitution (the prohibition of torture) determines, inter alia, that no one may be subjected to torture, inhuman or degrading punishment or treatment. Article 21 of the Constitution (the protection of human personality and dignity) guarantees respect for human personality and dignity in criminal and all other legal proceedings, as well as during the deprivation of liberty and enforcement of punitive sanctions. Moreover, it prohibits violence of any form on any person whose liberty has been restricted in any way and the use of any form of coercion in obtaining confessions and statements. The above-mentioned constitutional provisions are intended to protect individuals from the interferences of the state or its public officials with their life, physical and mental integrity, and dignity. In Decision No. Up-183/97, dated 10 July 1997 (OdlUS VI, 183), the Constitutional Court adopted the position that the provision of Article 18 of the Constitution is above all intended to protect persons from the use of various forms of (physical and psychological) violence during the exercise of the state authorities' repressive authorisations.
24. Human life, a person's physical and mental integrity, and dignity are the highest values within the hierarchy of human rights; as such, they are protected by numerous international instruments. Already the International Covenant and the Universal Declaration of the UN guarantee these rights special protection. As the complainants correctly state, the above-mentioned fundamental human rights are also guaranteed by the ECHR and the Convention against Torture. The right to life is guaranteed by Article 2 of the ECHR and Article 1 of Protocol No. 6.<sup>1</sup> The second paragraph of Article 2 [of the ECHR] expressly lists the instances in which the deprivation of life that is the result of the use of force which is no more than absolutely necessary is not deemed to entail a violation of the above-mentioned provision. Protection against torture and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment is ensured by Article 3 of the ECHR,<sup>2</sup>

1 Article 2 of the ECHR (the right to life) reads as follows:

- "1. Everyone's right to life shall be protected by law. No one shall be deprived of his life intentionally save in the execution of a sentence of a court following his conviction of a crime for which this penalty is provided by law.
2. Deprivation of life shall not be regarded as inflicted in contravention of this article when it results from the use of force which is no more than absolutely necessary:
- (a) in defence of any person from unlawful violence;
  - (b) in order to effect a lawful arrest or to prevent the escape of a person lawfully detained;
  - (c) in action lawfully taken for the purpose of quelling a riot or insurrection."

Article 1 of Protocol No. 6 to the ECHR (the abolition of the death penalty) reads as follows: "The death penalty shall be abolished. No one shall be condemned to such penalty or executed."

2 Article 3 of the ECHR (the prohibition of torture) reads as follows: "No one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment."

which allows no exceptions and which in conformity with the case law of the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR) is also absolute. As regards the differentiation between torture and inhuman or degrading treatment, in its case law the ECtHR has relied on the differentiation determined by the Convention against Torture.<sup>3</sup> Torture is also unconditionally prohibited by the Convention against Torture. Acts of torture determined by the first paragraph of Article 1 of the Convention against Torture<sup>4</sup> are, as a general rule, those committed by public officials. The first paragraph of Article 16 of the Convention against Torture determines the duty of states to undertake to prevent in any territory under its jurisdiction other acts of cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment committed by public officials. The first paragraph of Article 4 of the Convention against Torture determines that each state shall ensure that all acts of torture are offences under its criminal law. Article 12 of the Convention against Torture determines that each state shall ensure that its competent authorities proceed to a prompt and impartial investigation wherever there is reasonable ground to believe that an act of torture or inhuman treatment has been committed on its territory. Furthermore, in conformity with Article 13 of the Convention against Torture, each state shall ensure that any individual who alleges he or she has been subjected to torture in any territory under its jurisdiction has the right to complain to and to have his or her case promptly and impartially examined by its competent authorities. Also from the case law of the ECtHR it follows that states are obliged, within the framework of their positive duties, to prevent violence that results in the death of a person and to consistently track down the alleged perpetrators [of the criminal offence] and conduct an investigation against them.<sup>5</sup>

25. The first paragraph of Article 5 of the Constitution binds the state to protect human rights and fundamental freedoms on its own territory. With regard to the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms, the state has so-called negative and positive obligations. Negative obligations entail that the state must refrain from interferences with human rights and fundamental freedoms. Positive obligations, on the other hand, bind the state and its individual branches of power (the judicial, legislative, and executive powers) to actively protect human rights and fundamental freedoms. Thus, the protection of human rights should not be regarded only as the duty of the state to refrain from conduct that would interfere with human rights or limit the same; the protection of human rights also obliges the state to actively

---

3 This is stated by the ECtHR in Selmouni v. France, dated 28 July 1999, No. 25803/94, Para. 97.

4 The first paragraph of Article 1 of the Convention against Torture reads as follows: “For the purposes of this Convention, the term “torture” means any act by which severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, is intentionally inflicted on a person for such purposes as obtaining from him or a third person information or a confession, punishing him for an act he or a third person has committed or is suspected of having committed, or intimidating or coercing him or a third person, or for any reason based on discrimination of any kind, when such pain or suffering is inflicted by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity. It does not include pain or suffering arising only from, inherent in, or incidental to lawful sanctions.”

5 This is stated by the ECtHR in Avsar v. Turkey, dated 10 July 2001, No. 25657/94, Para. 393.

carry out activities such that it creates opportunities for the most effective exercise of human rights possible. In one of its decisions, the Constitutional Court stated: “In a state governed by the rule of law, there must exist such a system of organisation as enables the implementation of the Constitution and laws, and such system of procedures as enables the exercise of rights and freedoms” (the Decision in case No. U-I-13/94, dated 21 January 1994, Official Gazette RS, No. 6/94, and OdlUS III, 8). The mentioned requirement also follows from the case law of the ECtHR. In principle, the positive obligations of the state are all the more emphasised as the protected value is placed higher in the hierarchy of human rights.<sup>6</sup> Due to the fact that human rights that protect life, physical and mental integrity, and the dignity of individuals are the fundamental values in a democratic society, the state is obliged to protect them in a particularly active manner and to create opportunities for their most effective exercise possible.

26. In conformity with the mentioned positive obligation, the state protects individuals from the most severe interferences with their lives, integrity, and dignity also in such manner that in its criminal law it defines such interferences as criminal offences. In fact, torture and inhuman treatment are not defined as separate criminal offences in the PC. However, certain criminal offences determined by the PC (which also include those with regard to which the complainants requested that a criminal investigation be initiated) encompass specific conduct that follows from the definitions of the human rights determined by Articles 17, 18, and 21 of the Constitution.
27. In conformity with the CrPA, the prosecution of perpetrators of criminal offences that are prosecuted ex officio is in the hands of state prosecutors. A criminal investigation is initiated upon the request of the authorised prosecutor. In conformity with point 1 of the second paragraph of Article 45 of the CrPA, in respect of criminal offences that are prosecuted ex officio, public prosecutors have the jurisdiction to do what is necessary with regard to the detection of criminal offences, tracking down the perpetrators, and directing the police procedure. They carry out their prosecutorial function in conformity with the principle of legality, provided that the law does not determine otherwise. In conformity with the mentioned principle, a public prosecutor is obliged to initiate criminal prosecution if a reasonable suspicion exists that an individual has committed a criminal offence that must be prosecuted ex officio. If a public prosecutor establishes that a reasonable suspicion does not exist that such criminal offence has been committed, he or she does not institute criminal prosecution. In conformity with Article 51 of the CrPA, a public prosecutor may also discontinue prosecution. In both instances, an injured party acting as a prosecutor may take his or her place (the second paragraph of Article 60 of the CrPA). This possibility is envisaged as a corrective for the prosecutor's assessment of the non-existence of the statutory conditions necessary to initiate criminal prosecution, which for various reasons may be erroneous or even illegal and which may have detrimental consequences for the injured party. An injured party acting as a prosecutor has the right to file a request that a criminal investigation be initiated or a direct indictment in order to enforce his or her interests.<sup>7</sup> If the injured party enters criminal proceedings in the above-described manner, he or she becomes a party to the criminal procedure.

<sup>6</sup> B. M. Zupančič in: L. Šturm (Ed.): Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije [Commentary on the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia], Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Ljubljana 2002, pp. 112 and 113.

28. The first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution determines that everyone has the right to have any decision regarding his rights, duties and any charges brought against him made without undue delay by an independent, impartial court constituted by law. The Constitutional Court has already adopted the position that the right to judicial protection does not entail the right to a precisely determined type of judicial proceedings.
29. In the case at issue, the complainants requested, in conformity with the above-mentioned provisions of the CrPA, that a criminal investigation be initiated; their request was decided by a court order that became final. Thus, within such scope, the judicial protection of the complainants' rights determined by the CrPA was ensured. In fact, the complaints do not deny this. However, they maintain that due to the alleged interference with human rights, a judicial investigation should be carried out against the suspects in which they would have the right to actively participate as injured parties.
30. With regard to Articles 2 and 3 of the ECHR, it follows from the Convention against Torture and the case law of the ECtHR that the state must additionally protect individuals who were deprived of liberty and who are therefore in a particularly vulnerable position. The ECtHR emphasises that any recourse to physical force during the deprivation of an individual's liberty that is not in the strict sense provoked by the individual's behaviour, curtails the individual's dignity and in principle violates the right determined by Article 3 of the ECHR.<sup>8</sup> If an individual, when under the actual physical control of repressive authorities, suffers serious injuries or dies, the state must provide a plausible explanation of how such consequences occurred.<sup>9</sup> To this end, it must ensure that procedures be carried out in which all the relevant facts and circumstances in respect of the concrete event are investigated and determined in conformity with the principle of directness, as well as, above all, the possible reasons for the death or injuries of such individual.<sup>10</sup>

---

7 The procedure with regard to the request to initiate an investigation is determined by Article 169 of the CrPA. Upon receiving the request to initiate an investigation, the investigating judge examines, on the basis of the file that is enclosed with the request by the state prosecutor, whether the standard of proof of reasonable suspicion is fulfilled. If the investigating judge does not agree to grant the request to initiate an investigation, he or she requests that the three-judge panel for pre-trial appeals decide thereon. An appeal to the Higher Court is allowed against the decision of this panel. In fact, this entails a special phase of the police procedure in which the court decides whether the criminal procedure should be initiated or not.

8 This is stated by the ECtHR in Ribitsch v. Austria, dated 4 December 2005, No. 42/1994/489/571, Para. 38.

9 This is stated by the ECtHR in Selmouni v. France, Para. 87, and in Avsar v. Turkey, Para. 391.

10 See the case law of the ECtHR, e.g. Ribitsch v. Austria, Para. 34; Andronicou and Constantinou v. Cyprus, dated 9 October 1997, No. 86/1996/705/897, Para. 171 (also the dissenting opinion of Judge Pikis, who emphasised the importance of errors when planning an action by the repressive authorities in selecting the participating

31. The ECtHR also assessed the case Rehbock v. Slovenia in light of the above-mentioned criteria.<sup>11</sup> The ECtHR established, inter alia, that due to the manner in which the applicant was treated (the case concerned the arrest of a suspect who allegedly smuggled drugs) during the procedure resulting in the deprivation of his liberty there was a violation of Article 3 of the ECHR. With regard to the serious nature of his injuries, the ECtHR was of the opinion that the Government failed to provide convincing and plausible arguments on the basis of which it would be possible to explain or justify the degree of force used during the arrest. According to the assessment of the ECtHR, the force used in the given circumstances was excessive and unjustified. The consequence of such use of force were injuries that undoubtedly caused the applicant serious suffering, therefore he was being treated inhumanly.<sup>12</sup>
32. Article 13 of the ECHR guarantees everyone whose rights and freedoms as set forth in the ECHR were violated to have an effective remedy before a national authority notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity. In conformity with the case law of the ECtHR, judicial proceedings do not necessarily always entail an effective (legal) remedy. Nevertheless, the legal remedy must be effective in practice as well as in law, in particular in the sense that its exercise must not be unjustifiably hindered by the acts or omissions of the authorities of the state.<sup>13</sup> From the case law of the ECtHR relating to Article 13 of the ECHR in instances involving allegations of the violation of the rights and freedoms determined by Articles 2 and 3 of the ECHR, it follows that the nature of the right that was allegedly violated by the repressive authorities also has an influence on the type of legal remedies that must be guaranteed to victims. According to the ECtHR, in instances where an allegation of the violation of Articles 2 and 3 of the ECHR is probable, the notion of an effective (legal) remedy in the sense of Article 13 of the ECHR must also entail a thorough and effective investigation capable of leading to the identification and punishment of the perpetrators, as well as effective access officers, weapons, etc., when what is at issue are actions in which human health or life could be threatened); and Salman v. Turkey, dated 27 June 2000, No. 21986/93, Para. 99.

---

11 Judgment dated 28 November 2000, No. 29462/95.

12 In this decision, the ECtHR referred to two other decisions; namely to the Judgment in Ribitsch v. Austria, in which the ECtHR (after an in-depth assessment of the facts established before the domestic courts in the criminal procedure) established a violation of Article 3 of the ECHR and stated that the government failed to provide a plausible explanation of how the applicant sustained injuries and also failed to produce appropriate evidence by which it could raise doubts with regard to the applicant's allegations. In this respect, it stated the mere reference to the outcome of the criminal procedure in which it was established that the high standard of proof needed for a criminal conviction was not satisfied does not suffice. The second Judgment [referred to] is Klaas v. Germany, dated 22 September 1993 (No. 27/1992/372/446). In this case, [the complainant] sustained less serious injuries during the course of an arrest and the national courts (in civil proceedings) had, in the opinion of the ECtHR, satisfactorily established the facts after having had the opportunity to hear witnesses first hand and to assess their credibility.

13 This is stated by the ECtHR in Aksoy v. Turkey, dated 18 December 1996, No. 100/1995/606/694, Para. 95.

by the injured party or his or her relatives to the investigation procedure.<sup>14</sup> With regard to the above, in instances where an individual has lost his or her life while under the control of the repressive authorities, the state is obliged to establish all the relevant facts and circumstances of the case and enable the effective participation of the relatives of the deceased in such procedure. The investigation must be carried out by independent investigators, unimpeded by the state.<sup>15</sup> In conformity with the case law of the ECtHR, a prompt and thorough investigation is particularly important, as an incomplete investigation is tantamount to undermining the effectiveness of any other remedies that may have existed.<sup>16</sup>

33. The Constitution does not expressly guarantee the above-mentioned right. It follows from the Constitution that no human right or fundamental freedom regulated by legal acts in force in Slovenia may be restricted on the grounds that this Constitution does not recognize that right or freedom (the fifth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution). The fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution guarantees judicial protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms, and the right to obtain redress for the violation of such rights and freedoms. This is a general constitutional provision that reflects the requirement determined by Article 13 of the ECHR, which imposes on the contracting states the duty to guarantee effective (legal) protection of human rights. As applies to determining the right to judicial protection determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution, also in determining the content of the above-mentioned right one must proceed from the general premise in conformity with which the possibility of the effective and actual exercise of human rights must be ensured, as it is not the purpose of the Constitution to recognise human rights only formally and theoretically (Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-257/97, dated 16 July 1998, OdlUS VII, 231). With regard to the above, the provision of the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution must be understood in such a manner so as to also encompass the right to an independent investigation of the circumstances of an incident in which a person was allegedly subjected to torture or inhuman or degrading treatment by the repressive authorities of the state, or in which a person died during an action carried out by the repressive authorities of the state. Furthermore, the mentioned right also includes the right of the affected persons to effective access to such investigation. Although the provision of the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution guarantees judicial protection of human rights, the above-mentioned case law of the ECtHR relating to Article 13 of the ECHR determines that in such situations as mentioned above already an investigation carried out outside [the framework] of judicial proceedings is sufficient, provided that it is independent and that it ensures the affected persons effective participation therein.

---

14 This is stated by the ECtHR in Kaya v. Turkey, dated 19 February 1998, No. 158/1996/777/978, Para. 107.

15 J. Simor et al. (Ed.): Human Rights Practice, Sweet and Maxwell, London 2002, p. 13,009, Para. 13,002.

16 This is stated by the ECtHR in Aksoy v. Turkey, Para. 99.

34. Hence, from the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution and Article 13 of the ECHR it does not follow that an independent investigation should be carried out within the framework of a criminal procedure. The fundamental purpose of a criminal procedure is namely to establish whether the defendant committed a criminal offence and whether he or she is guilty thereof, and, if the answer to both questions is affirmative, to impose a criminal sanction on him or her. As regards the purpose of the criminal procedure, such procedure can neither be extended to the investigation of the circumstances of the incident within the sense of the requirements that follow from the case law of the ECHR, nor can it be regarded as a substitute therefor. The Constitutional Court has already adopted the position that the right of the injured party in a criminal procedure to take over criminal prosecution does not also entail that he or she also has a constitutionally protected right to achieve a criminal conviction (the Constitutional Court stated this in Decision No. Up-285/97). Furthermore, limiting an independent investigation to a criminal procedure would annul the possibility of an independent investigation of state violence in instances where it could not be alleged that persons have committed a criminal offence or where obstacles to initiating criminal proceedings would exist. With regard to the above, the complainants' right determined by the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution in relation to Article 13 of the ECHR was not violated merely because no criminal investigation was initiated with respect to the incident.
35. With regard to what was established, the Constitutional Court had to provide an answer to the question of whether the complainants were ensured appropriate legal protection of their rights, i.e. in conformity with the requirement determined by the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution in relation to Article 13 of the ECHR.<sup>17</sup>
36. At the time of the incident in question, persons who believed that the actions of a police officer or a police officer's failure to act violated their rights and freedoms also had the possibility to file a complaint with the police (Article 28 of the Police Act, Official Gazette RS, No. 49/98 – hereinafter referred to as the PA). The second paragraph of the mentioned article of the PA determined that representatives of the public and representatives of the police union shall participate in the resolution of such a complaint. From the Instructions on the Resolution of Complaints (Official Gazette RS, No. 103/2000) in force at the time it follows that the panel that considered the complaints was composed of three members and was presided over by the Director General of the Police, the Director of a Police Directorate, or by some other police employee to whom they conferred their authorisation, respectively. Furthermore, the Director General of the Police or the Director of a Police Directorate appointed the representatives of the public and the representatives of the police union. However, from the constitutional complaint it is not evident whether the complainants had filed such a legal remedy or not. Due to the fact that the mentioned legal remedy did not fulfil the conditions determined for an independent investigation within the meaning of the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution in relation to Article 13 of the ECHR, the Constitutional Court did not have to adopt a position with regard to the question of whether the complainants had exhausted this legal remedy.

<sup>17</sup> Decision No. Up-277/96, dated 7 November 1996 (OdlUS V, 189), referred to a similar situation.

37. The criminal file shows that on the basis of the Rules on Police Powers (Official Gazette RS, No. 51/2000 – hereinafter referred to as the Rules), on 13 September 2000 a commission was established at the Ljubljana Police Directorate whose task was to determine the circumstances of the carrying out and course of the procedure on 3 April 2000 (with regard to the use of measures involving the use of force), during which D. D. died. The minutes of the meeting of the mentioned commission on 11 October 2000 show that in conformity with the legislation in force at that time, the commission was composed of four members employed by the Police Directorate; however, the complainants did not have any influence thereon.<sup>18</sup> With regard to the above, also this investigation of the circumstances of the incident did not match the criteria introduced by the ECtHR with regard to the right to an effective legal remedy determined by Article 13 of the ECHR.
38. In conformity with the second paragraph of Article 59 of the CCA, if the Constitutional Court establishes that the challenged decision is based on an unconstitutional law, it can initiate proceedings for the review of its constitutionality ex officio. Due to the fact that Article 28 of the PA was subsequently amended (by the Act Amending the Police Act, Official Gazette RS, No. 79/03 – hereinafter referred to as the PA-B), and because the possible establishment of the inconsistency of the disputed regulation with the Constitution would not have any influence on the legal position of the complainants, the Constitutional Court did not review the constitutionality of Article 28 of the PA in force at the time when the alleged police violence occurred.
39. In conformity with the provision of the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution in relation to Article 13 of the ECHR, the state must, in instances such as in the case at issue, provide for an independent investigation of the circumstances of the incident and enable the complainants effective access to such investigation. The state failed to provide such an investigation. Since the Constitutional Court established that the complainants' human rights and fundamental freedoms were not violated merely because the criminal investigation was not initiated (Paragraph 34 of the reasoning), it did not abrogate the challenged provisions, but adopted a declaratory decision instead. It granted the constitutional complaints by deciding that the complainants' right to an effective legal remedy determined by the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution in relation to Article 13 of the ECHR was violated.

---

18 Already in the Judgment in Rehbock v. Slovenia, the ECtHR established that the investigation carried out by the Police Directorate, whose employees had been involved in the applicant's arrest, was not appropriate (Para. 74).

C

40. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of Article 47 in relation to Article 49 of the CCA, composed of: Dr Janez Čebulj, President, and Judges Dr Zvonko Fišer, Lojze Janko, Mag. Marija Krisper Kramberger, Milojka Modrijan, Dr Ciril Ribičič, Dr Mirjam Škrk, Jože Tratnik, and Dr Dragica Wedam Lukić. The decision was reached unanimously. Judges Ribičič and Škrk submitted concurring opinions.

*Dr Mirjam Škrk,
Vice President*

*on behalf of
Dr Janez Čebulj
President*

---

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE DR RIBIČIČ

1. When deciding, a judge of the Constitutional Court needs a penetrating mind, a clear view, a still hand, and not least, with regard to the Court being overburdened, he or she must be in good condition. My motivation to persist<sup>1</sup> lies, on the one hand, in cases such as the case at issue, in which the Constitutional Court granted the constitutional complaints, despite its negative attitude towards the right of subsidiary prosecutors to file a constitutional complaint, its reserved position with regard to declaratory decisions, and second thoughts with regard to certain standards of the protection of rights as introduced by the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR) in its case law. On the other hand, I am motivated by separate opinions, such as that written by Judge Pikis, which is mentioned in Note No. 10 of the Decision of the Constitutional Court regarding which I am writing this concurring opinion. In this opinion, I wish to emphasise the significance and the particularities of the Decision in the case at issue, in favour of which I voted, as well as the significance of its legal effects.
2. G. Pikis, an ad hoc judge, submitted a dissenting opinion in the case of Andronicou and Constantinou v. Cyprus, in which he was opposed to the decision of the majority of the judges of the chamber of the European Court of Human Rights that on 9 October 1997 decided by five votes against four that Cyprus had not violated Article 2 of the European Convention on Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECHR), which is intended to protect human life. It is rarely the case that when assessing a state's 1 If you try to imagine someone who has been given the opportunity, as I was, to write this separate opinion in three days, and there was a small cloud of mosquitoes from the other branches of power buzzing around and biting him, once in the hand, then in the temple, again in the eye, then you can visualise circumstances in which it is not easy to persist.

---

responsibility, a judge who comes from a respondent state is objective and critical to the same degree, let alone more rigorous than the majority in the ECtHR's chamber. Judge Pikis supported his rigorous standpoint by the fact that the state he is a citizen of did not meticulously enough plan and carry out the rescue operation, the purpose of which was to rescue a captive, and in which both the perpetrator of violence as well as his victim, whom he used as a living shield (Elsie Constantinou), died as a result of the gunshots fired by the Cyprus special police forces. In the opinion of Judge Pikis, the duty of the state to protect the lives of its citizens should be assigned the highest priority. Therefore, an operation that includes a danger to human life "must be planned and controlled in a way eliminating every foreseeable element of unnecessary risk to life on account of the use of force." Choosing the special police task force officers who were trained to shoot to kill and equipping them with machine guns, as well as insufficient instructions and control resulted in the final consequence that two special squad officers, when they perceived a danger to their safety, reacted reflexively, resulting in a fatal consequence, the death of two people.

3. What is the substantive connection between the cited separate opinion of Judge Pikis and the present case? The similarity is in the circumstances in which the fate of an individual is left to the mercy of armed repressive authorities of the state. In such circumstances, not only in the opinion of Judge Pikis, but also according to the position of the ECtHR, the responsibility of the state for the consequences is much greater than otherwise, e.g. in instances where an armed conflict occurs suddenly and there is no time to plan and control the use of police force. Such position of the ECtHR was directly and painfully pointed out to Slovenia in the judgment in the case Rehbock v. Slovenia, dated 28 November 2000 (Application No. 29462/95), in which the applicant suffered severe injuries (a double fracture of his jaw and facial contusions) in the course of his arrest, which the police were able to comprehensively [plan and] well prepare in advance. In this case, it was established that Slovenia violated Article 3 of the ECHR (torture and inhuman and degrading treatment). The present case, which in fact occurred five years after the Rehbock case and half a year before the judgment in the Rehbock case was adopted, and which unfortunately is not the only such case, demonstrates that it was not a one-time mistake in police operations, but that the problem is more serious. In order to illustrate the matter, the case Matko v. Slovenia (Application No. 43393/98) can be mentioned, regarding which the ECtHR has not yet decided on the merits, but which it has established is ready to be decided on (the ECtHR accepted the application for consideration on 8 July 2004), also with regard to the question of whether the applicant's rights determined by Article 3 of the ECHR were violated when he was brutally beaten during his arrest, which was carried out due to the fact that he did not stop his vehicle when requested to do so by police officers. The applicant, Aleksander Matko, alleged that he did not exhaust all the legal remedies available within the Slovene legal order because he had lost confidence in the Slovene system of justice during the criminal proceedings, in which a suspended sentence was imposed on him for having attempted to obstruct an official carrying out official duties. In his opinion, the police often exceed their powers and courts do not dare to hold the state liable. Similar holds true for actions for damages, which in addition last a very long time. On the basis of such testimonies regarding police operations, the picture of Slovenia and the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms in Slovenia that results is anything but exemplary.

4. In my opinion, in the present case during the police action that led to the death of D. D., who was suspected of unlawfully dealing in narcotic drugs, the police made many incomprehensible mistakes (as regards poor planning and carrying out the action, deficient preparations therefor, a lack of information on the health condition of the victim, who suffered from severe asthma, police officers poorly trained to provide medical help, brutal and degrading treatment of the arrested person), which resulted, according to the testimony of his wife, in him dying handcuffed on the floor of his apartment in the presence of his wife and child, unable to take his medications. Furthermore, the significance of the Decision of the Constitutional Court in the present case is also that the Court established a violation of the ECHR and the Constitution, because the complainants, whose son or husband, respectively, died, did not have the opportunity to initiate and participate in an independent investigation into all the circumstances in which the death occurred. In fact, the Constitutional Court relatively often refers to the ECHR and the judgments of the ECtHR; however, probably in no case until the present one was the core of its decision based on the ECHR and numerous ECtHR judgments, from which the Constitutional Court derived the right to an independent investigation, as follows from the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution and Article 13 of the ECHR. In particular, in Paragraphs 30 through 32 of the reasoning of the present Decision, the Constitutional Court refers to judgments of the ECtHR, the common element of which is that they all deal with the responsibility of states in cases in which applicants are left to the mercy of armed repressive authorities of the state. One could say that in the present case the Constitutional Court interpreted the Constitution in a manner friendly to the ECHR and the case law of the ECtHR.
5. The ECtHR operates in conformity with the principle of subsidiarity. In other words: the application of the ECHR in all 46 Member States of the Council of Europe with 800 million inhabitants cannot be ensured by the ECtHR itself. Therefore, the states assign the ECHR the force of a binding national legal act, which has, e.g. in Slovenia, the position of a regulation superior to laws and inferior to the Constitution. Individual provisions of the ECHR even have, as follows from the present Decision of the Constitutional Court and [as is the case] in the case at issue, the force of law, such as the constitutional provisions on human rights have, namely on the basis of the provision of the fifth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, which determines that no human right or fundamental freedom regulated by legal acts in force in Slovenia (and the ECHR undoubtedly is such an act) “may be restricted on the grounds that this Constitution does not recognise that right or freedom or recognises it to a lesser extent.” Hence, it follows from the above that states themselves by means of their regulations and the operation of regular and constitutional courts ensure the application of the ECHR. In a number of states, their constitutions determine, as regards individual constitutional rights or freedoms, a higher level of protection than determined by the ECHR, which can in no manner be regarded as disputable from the viewpoint of the provisions of the ECHR. It namely follows from Article 17 of the ECHR that the Convention may not be interpreted or abused in a manner such that would lead to a violation or limitation of human rights and freedoms. Consequently, the ECtHR must only intervene in instances where an individual state does not respect the level of protection of human rights and freedoms determined by the ECHR (the so-called minimum European standards of protection of human rights and freedoms).

6. The particularity of the ECHR is that it is an act that is constantly evolving and being extended by means of the case law of the ECtHR, which is its undisputable guardian and master. On the basis of the judgments of the ECtHR, it can be predicted with high probability that the ECtHR, had it decided on the merits of the present case, would have established a violation of Articles 2 or 3 of the ECHR. In my opinion, there is no doubt that the ECtHR would have established that Slovenia violated the aforementioned provisions of the ECHR, if such violation had not been established by the present Decision of the Constitutional Court. The judgment of the ECtHR in the case Lukenda v. Slovenia provides a convincing illustration of how a state that in its regulations and case law is not willing to consistently observe the case law of the ECtHR is held liable for such, in this case due to violations of the principle of a trial within a reasonable time and with regard to effective legal remedies available to those whose right to a trial within a reasonable time have been violated. It is important also from this point of view that the Constitutional Court granted the constitutional complaints in the present case. The constitutional courts that consider themselves particularly responsible for the enforcement of European human rights law operate in such manner.
7. In numerous decisions, the Constitutional Court proceeded from the standpoint that private and subsidiary prosecutors cannot file a constitutional complaint, as a criminal judgment does not refer to them, but rather concerns the guilt of the defendant who was acquitted by a final judgment. The Constitutional Court must not interfere with such a judgment, as such is prohibited by the principle of ne bis in idem determined by Article 31 of the Constitution (the prohibition of double jeopardy). According to the Constitutional Court, not even a shadow of a doubt may be cast upon a final judgment of acquittal. For such reason, the Constitutional Court rejects such constitutional complaints on the grounds that they were not filed by entitled applicants. Furthermore, the Constitutional Court, i.e. its criminal panel, proceeds in the same manner also in instances where the constitutional complaint does not challenge a final judgment of acquittal, but some other act by which a criminal (or police) procedure was concluded finally, and thus has an effect very similar to a final judgment of acquittal. I cannot agree with such position of the Constitutional Court with regard to the constitutional complaints of private and subsidiary prosecutors. I am namely of the opinion that the protection of the rights of a person who has been acquitted by a final judgment cannot extend so far that the Constitutional Court cannot establish a violation of the complainant's procedural rights, under the condition that it does not directly interfere with a final judgment of acquittal. It is indeed true that in the event of such a declaratory decision, a shadow of a doubt is cast on the judgment of acquittal; however, this cannot entail a sufficient reason for such declaratory decision to not be admissible.

8. The particularities of constitutional decision-making should allow, in addition to black and white adjudication, which is characteristic of the regular courts' decision-making in criminal cases (conviction – acquittal), also a different, more balanced outcome (a judgment of acquittal and the establishment of a violation of the procedural rights of a private or a subsidiary prosecutor in a criminal procedure that led to a judgment of acquittal). In the case at issue, in view of the fact that what was at issue was not a final judgment of acquittal, the Constitutional Court could even have gone beyond a declaratory decision and annulled the decisions that prevented the carrying out of a criminal investigation or it could even have ordered such investigation by itself. The question is whether such a decision would be reasonable. I have in mind the fact that the incident happened in the spring of 2000 and an investigation would have been ordered only six years later, which could possibly have led to a lengthy criminal procedure concerning a very distant set of events, under the pressure of the possibility that the prosecution may become time-barred. From such viewpoint, the adopted declaratory decision has its advantages.
9. It follows from Paragraph 39 of the reasoning of the Decision in the present case that the Constitutional Court granted the constitutional complaints by means of a declaratory decision. In my opinion, this part of the reasoning should be clearer and with regard to its significance belongs in the operative provisions of the Decision. Nevertheless, it is completely undisputable that the present declaratory Decision entails the granting of the constitutional complaints; for the constitutional complainants this means that they have succeeded, that they have won the proceedings before the Constitutional Court. Why is this success of theirs important to them and why is it important in a broader sense? The highest guardian of human rights and freedoms in Slovenia, which is what the Constitutional Court is, granted the constitutional complainants an authoritative and comprehensively substantiated affirmation that their constitutional rights and rights determined by the ECHR were violated. This alone entails a moral satisfaction, which should not be underestimated. Obviously, these are not the only legal effects of the declaratory Decision adopted by the Constitutional Court in the present case.
10. For regular courts, which in ensuring that the Constitution and the ECHR are respected must not merely rely on the Constitutional Court, the Decision in the present case means that in [future] similar cases they will have to proceed from the positions adopted by the Constitutional Court. Consequently, in the future it should not happen again that the Constitutional Court establishes, six years after an incident that led to fatal consequences, that an independent investigation such as required by the Constitution and the ECHR has not even been conducted in a manner that the relatives of the deceased person are ensured appropriate access to participate therein.

11. Article 26 of the Constitution guarantees an injured person the right to compensation for damage caused by an unlawful action of a state authority. The injured party may pursue satisfaction due to an interference with human rights directly in a criminal procedure by means of filing a claim for indemnification in so-called ancillary proceedings. However, the injured party has the right to primarily pursue his or her claim for damages in a lawsuit, namely entirely independently of whether or not the criminal procedure was actually initiated or how it was concluded. The legislation in force gives the injured person the possibility to file an action for damages. Such action is decided on by a court in civil proceedings in conformity with the general rules on the law of damages. On such basis, the court can grant the injured person compensation for pecuniary and non-pecuniary damage if the conditions for the liability for damages are fulfilled. The criminal file shows that the complainants filed an action for damages. There is no doubt that the decision in the present case and the establishment therein of the violation of the complainants' constitutional rights and the rights determined by the ECHR will improve their position in their efforts to be awarded appropriate damages. In fact, it is true that in order for a decision on such pecuniary satisfaction to be adopted neither a criminal judgment of conviction nor such a declaratory decision as adopted by the Constitutional Court in the present case is necessary. However, the notorious case of O. J. Simpson proves how a decision in an action for damages can constitute important pecuniary satisfaction and a specific correction of the outcome of criminal proceedings in which the alleged perpetrator of damage has been acquitted.
12. In my opinion, the present Decision also has a great significance from the viewpoint of broadening the legislation. Also the separate opinion of Judge Dr Mirjam Škrk submitted with regard to the present Decision deals with this issue; it draws attention to the fact that in the Slovene legislation no criminal offence is determined that is based on the constitutional and the ECHR's prohibition of torture. The legislature will have to find solutions that will ensure that in instances where severe consequences occur to an individual who was "under the actual physical control of repressive authorities" (Paragraph 30 of the reasoning of the Decision in the present case), an effective investigation is provided, and that the access of the injured party or his or her relatives to the investigation is ensured. And that is not all. This Decision entails a new warning to all those concerned with the reputation of Slovenia that much more has to be done in order to prevent police violence and to ensure effective supervision over the cases in which there is a suspicion that unjustified violence has occurred. Also from this perspective the Decision in the present case resembles the case law of the ECtHR, which with numerous landmark or pilot judgments in recent years (e.g. Broniowski v. Poland)<sup>2</sup>

---

2 In the ECtHR's so-called pilot or leading judgment dated 22 June 2004, which in my opinion has a revolutionary significance for the case law of the ECtHR, the Court established a violation of the rights determined by the ECHR of Jerzy Broniowski, the heir of an owner who had lost his real properties when the borders between Poland and the Soviet Union were changed after the Second World War. The judgment was not limited to [only] remedying the injustice inflicted on the applicant, but required of Poland to do the same in tens of thousands of other similar cases. The incredibly far-reaching consequences of the judgment are evident from has paved new paths towards the effective protection of human rights; in doing so, it has not limited itself to criticising judicial decisions, but has also established systemic deficiencies that entail a violation of the ECHR and required that they be remedied. The compliment regarding the fact that the Decision in the present case can be compared to landmark judgments of the ECtHR is all the more justified, because both courts, the ECtHR and the Constitutional Court, adopted these decisions while being incredibly overburdened, which prevents them from dealing thoroughly with the development of the protection of human rights and freedoms.

13. With the present Decision, the Constitutional Court has perhaps not succeeded in re-establishing to a satisfactory extent the balance that was lost by the death of the complainants' husband and son, respectively, and by the fact that no independent and effective investigation into the circumstances of this death was carried out in which the complainants were able to participate. Nevertheless, this Decision undoubtedly established a basis for this to not happen again in similar cases in the future. Furthermore, it also is similarly crucial that by its Decision in the present case the Constitutional Court demonstrated an especially responsible stance towards the obligations of Slovenia that stem from the ECHR and the case law of the ECtHR, in particularly those in relation to applications against Slovenia. The effects of such an approach can be beneficial for everyone: for the citizens and the protection of their rights when they find themselves in the vice of repressive authorities; for the state, which is not indifferent to its reputation;<sup>3</sup> and for the ECtHR in that it will not have to assess cases concerning police violence if this is effectively prevented and punished [already] before Slovene courts. This is especially true when what is at stake is the obligation of the state, which stems from the Constitution and the ECHR, to protect the lives of people who find themselves subject to its interferences. I see the moral of the Decision in the present case in that in instances where a suspicion of police violence arises Slovenia must not a priori take the side of the state police, as it would thereby neglect its primary obligation the second judgment of the ECtHR in the same case, dated 28 September 2005, by which the ECtHR affirmed the friendly settlement agreement between the applicant and the Polish Government. It follows therefrom that Poland, by means of a judgment of its constitutional court and on the basis of a special law, established a legal basis for the injured persons to finally be granted the promised right to credit on account of the loss of their real properties, which was even increased by a quarter (from 15% to 20% of the value of the lost real properties). The judgment of the ECtHR in the case of Broniowski also deserves special examination for being a successful attempt to strengthen the role of the Court and the protection of rights under the condition of being greatly overburdened. Most certainly, the ECtHR could not have achieved such great shifts with respect to the effects of its judgments as introduced by the Broniowski case by amending the ECHR.

---

- 3 In the opinion of Dr Boštjan M. Zupančič, "in Europe, a single conviction of such nature stigmatises the Republic of Slovenia as an heir of a police state. This means that the case Rehbock must be regarded as a serious warning that not only are amendments of the criminal procedure needed de lege ferenda, but above all that – particularly in the judicial branch of power – the entire stance and attitude towards the suspect and defendant as an equal subject in the criminal-procedural dispute must be changed." (Introduction, in: Z. Dežman, A. Eberžnik, Kazensko procesno pravo Republike Slovenije [Criminal Procedural Law of the Republic of Slovenia], GV Založba, Ljubljana 2003, p. 9).

and responsibility in the field of the protection of human rights and freedoms, namely to protect the lives and dignity of its residents, which would be contrary to the Constitution, the ECHR, and the attained standards of civilised nations.

Dr Ciril Ribičič

---

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE DR ŠKRK

1. In Paragraph 26 of the reasoning of the Decision in favour of which I voted, the Constitutional Court established that the Penal Code (hereinafter referred to as PC) does not regulate torture as a separate criminal offence. Further on, the same paragraph states that certain criminal offences determined by the PC, which also include criminal offences regarding which the complainants requested that a criminal investigation be initiated, include specific types of conduct that follow from the definitions of the human rights determined by Articles 17 (the inviolability of human life), 18 (the prohibition of torture), and 21 (the protection of human personality and dignity) of the Constitution. In its Decision, the Constitutional Court did not attempt to form a value judgment on whether the legislature has acted correctly in that in the thirteen years since Slovenia acceded to the universal Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (hereinafter referred to as the Convention against Torture) and became a contracting party to such,<sup>1</sup> the criminal offence of torture has not yet been enacted in the PC.
2. However, what “strikes the eye” in the present case, among other matters, is precisely the fact that the legislature has not enacted torture as a separate criminal offence in the PC, as defined in Article 1 of the Convention against Torture.<sup>2</sup> The constitutional complainants (and, not least of all, also the courts) had to resort, when defining the police violence against the victim who died during such violence and regarding whom they filed the constitutional complaints, to the incrimination of other criminal offences determined by the PC which in their intensity do not attain the level of torture such as defined by the Convention against Torture and as defined by the current case law of certain states, as well as by the case law of international courts and tribunals. What I have in mind are in particular the criminal offences of negligent homicide (Article 129 of the PC) and the violation of personal dignity by abuse of office or official duties (Article 270 of the PC) (see Paragraph 15 of the reasoning of the Decision).
3. Paragraph 24 of the reasoning of the decision states, inter alia, that the first paragraph of Article 4 of the Convention against Torture determines that each state shall ensure<sup>3</sup> that all acts of torture are offences under its criminal law. The same provision of the Convention against Torture furthermore determines that the same shall apply to an attempt to commit torture and to an act by any person which constitutes complicity or participation in torture. The second paragraph of Article 4 determines the obligation of each State Party to make these offences punishable by appropriate penalties which take into account their grave nature.

---

1 Act of Accession, 16 July 1993. Multilateral Treaties Deposited with the Secretary General, status as of 31 December 2001, Volume I, UN, New York, p. 271. On 31 December 2001, there were 127 State Parties to the Convention.

2 For the definition of torture in the Convention against Torture, see note 4 of the Decision.

4. The Convention against Torture binds the states to establish a universal jurisdiction over torture. In conformity with the first paragraph of Article 5 of the Convention against Torture, each State Party shall establish its jurisdiction over the offences of torture in the following cases: (a) when torture is committed in any territory under its jurisdiction (or on its aircrafts or ships); (b) when the alleged offender is a national of that state; and (c) under certain conditions, when the victim is a national of that state. In conformity with the second paragraph of Article 5, each State Party shall establish its jurisdiction over the prosecution of the offender if the offender is present in any territory under its jurisdiction (and if the conditions for extradition determined by Article 8 of the Convention are not fulfilled or if it does not extradite him). Article 6 determines that any State Party shall take the alleged perpetrator of torture into custody, carry out certain investigative acts, and inform thereof the states referred to in the first paragraph of Article 5, with regard to which it also must express its intentions regarding whether it will carry out the criminal procedure by itself. In the first paragraph of Article 7, the rule aut iudicare aut dedere is enacted: the State Party in a territory under whose jurisdiction a person alleged to have committed the criminal offence of torture is found shall carry out a criminal procedure if it does not extradite him to any of the states determined by the first paragraph of Article 5.
5. At this point, the question is raised whether or not does the mere fact that Article 18 of the Constitution prohibits torture, inhuman, or degrading punishment or treatment compel the legislature to enact the criminal offence of torture and prescribe an appropriate penalty therefor. With regard to the significance of the prohibition of torture, which falls within the scope of legal and societal demands of the highest rank, it seems that this question could be answered in the affirmative.
6. The Convention against Torture certainly does bind the legislature to incriminate torture in the PC, namely in such a form as this criminal offence is defined in Article 1 of the mentioned Convention. The Convention against Torture leaves the determination of the penalty to the national legislature, with regard to which it binds the legislature to define torture, as regards the prescribed penalty, as a severe criminal offence. In fact, these requirements of the Convention against Torture cannot be assigned the nature of self-executing provisions or provisions that are directly applicable before Slovene criminal courts.<sup>4</sup> The requirement to respect the principle of legality (nullum crimen nulla poena sine lege praevia), which is a universally recognised general principle of law, recognised by civilised nations and written in Article 28 of the Constitution, entails an impediment to the direct application of the Convention against Torture in the prosecution of alleged offenders who have committed torture. However, obligations imposed by means of treaties bind the state to really fulfil such obligations (this was also stated by the Constitutional Court in Opinion Rm-1/97, dated 5 June 1997, Official Gazette RS, No. 40/97, and OdlUS VI, 86). If treaties are not directly applicable, such ratified and published treaties create international obligations for the state to adopt in its national legal order appropriate national legal acts by which it ensures compliance with such obligations (this was stated by the Constitutional Court in Decision No. U-I-312/00, dated 23 April 2003, Official Gazette RS, No. 42/03, and OdlUS XII, 39). As regards the discussed issues, the Constitutional Court refers to the generally recognised pacta sunt servanda principle of the international law of treaties, which binds the contracting states to implement treaties in good faith.<sup>5</sup> Hence, as regards the Convention against Torture, there exists the obligation of the state to ensure its application in the national legal order as determined in the Convention against Torture itself, otherwise it is held responsible under international law for such failure to act.

3 At this point, the Decision correctly uses the Slovene verb “zagotoviti”, after the English original to ensure. The translation of the Convention in Slovene in the Official Gazette namely reads “vsaka država članica [si] prizadeva...” [each State Party shall strive...], which is imprecise. In the international law of treaties, the verb to strive does not entail that the state must realise the objective that is the subject of an international obligation. The phrase “shall ensure”, however, undoubtedly entails the obligation of result.

7. Such obligation does not bind the state only to ensure that it is capable of criminally prosecuting alleged offenders who have allegedly committed criminal offences of torture in any territory under its jurisdiction. Within the scope of international cooperation in repressing torture, as established by the Convention against Torture, the state must be capable of criminally prosecuting the perpetrators of criminal offences of torture, if these perpetrators are in its territory, irrespective of the fact where such torture occurred, or it must extradite them to another state. The second paragraph of Article 123 of the PC determines universal jurisdiction. However, it is difficult to imagine on what legal basis an alien who as an official is suspected of having committed the criminal offence of torture in the state of which he or she is a national or in which he or she unlawfully acted in the capacity of an official, would be tried in Slovenia. In the event of a possible review of the conditions for the extradition of an alien suspected of torture, the non-incrimination of the criminal offence of torture in the PC could cause difficulties in the application of the rules on double criminality and speciality,<sup>6</sup> which are two established international standards of every extradition procedure.
8. In addition to all of the above, we must not overlook the fact that the Convention against Torture, which defines torture as an international offence under criminal law, was adopted on 10 December 1984.<sup>7</sup> Today, the prohibition of torture belongs, alongside

---

4 This does not mean, however, that the definition of torture as contained in the Convention cannot be directly applied in some different context.

5 See, inter alia, Opinion No. Rm-1/97. The Constitutional Court refers therein to Article 26 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties of 1969.

6 With regard to the rule of speciality, see the considerations in paragraph 2 above.

7 In deliberations on the Convention on Torture, the Judgment of the House of Lords in the Pinochet case, dated 24 March 1999, refers to the Handbook on the Convention against Torture [and Other Cruel, Inhuman the prohibition of genocide and grave and mass breaches of human rights, among the absolutely binding (peremptory) norms of customary international law (ius cogens)<sup>8</sup> that have erga omnes effects. Therefore, what is at issue are norms of international law that in the hierarchy of legal norms are above other norms and principles of international law. Such a standpoint, as can be seen from the Al-Adsani case, is also accepted by the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR) when what is at issue is the criminal responsibility of an individual for an alleged commission of the criminal offence of torture.<sup>9</sup> Paragraph 24 of the reasoning of the Decision states that the protection under the prohibition of torture determined by Article 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECHR) does not determine any exceptions and is, in conformity with the case law of the ECtHR, absolute.

9. As noted in Paragraph 31 of the reasoning of the Decision, in the case Rehbock v. Slovenia the ECtHR established that Article 3 of the ECHR, which prohibits torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, was violated.
10. Therefore, on the basis of the obligations assumed by the accession to the Convention against Torture in 1993, under international law there certainly exists an obligation for Slovenia to incriminate in the PC the criminal offence of torture as defined in Article 1 of this Convention.

Dr Mirjam Škrk

---

or Degrading Treatment or Punishment] by Burgers and Danelius. In their opinion, the standpoint that only the Convention against Torture established the unlawfulness of torture under international law and only for its State Parties is erroneous. The authors are of the opinion that the Convention against Torture proceeds from the comprehension that the practice of torture was declared unlawful under international law already before the adoption of the Convention. The fundamental purpose of the Convention against Torture was to enforce the already existing prohibition of torture by measures designated for that purpose. UK House of Lords: Regina v. Bartle and the Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis and Others ex parte Pinochet, 24 March 1999, 38 International Legal Materials (ILM) 581 (1999), p. 650.

- 8 In the Judgment in Al-Adsani v. the United Kingdom, dated 21 November 2001, Application No. 35763/97, the ECtHR referred to the Judgment of the ad hoc International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia in Prosecutor v. Furundzija, dated 10 December 1998 (p. 10, Para. 30), and to the standpoint of the House of Lords in the Pinochet case. In the opinion of the ECtHR, the House of Lords in the mentioned case adopted the position that the prohibition of torture had acquired the status of a ius cogens norm in international law and that torture had become an international crime, See Judgment of the ECtHR, p. 16 (Para. 51) and p. 20 (Para. 64).
- 9 In the Al-Adsani case, the ECtHR otherwise adopted a negative standpoint as to the question of waiving the immunity of states ratione personae before foreign courts for their responsibility for damage that arises from violations of ius cogens norms of international law. "While the Court accepts, on the basis of these authorities, that the prohibition of torture has achieved the status of a peremptory norm in international law, it observes that the present case concerns not, as in Furundzija and Pinochet, the criminal liability of an individual for alleged acts of torture, but the immunity of a State in a civil suit for damages in respect of acts of torture within the territory of that State." Ibidem, p. 19 (Para. 61).

DECISION

At a session held on 16 October 2014, in proceedings to decide upon the constitutional complaint of Janko Pibernik and Slavka Pibernik, both from Krško, Mojca Pibernik and Jan Pibernik, both from Brežice, and Kana Pibernik, Ljubljana, all represented by Bojan Klakočar, attorney in Krško, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

Supreme Court Judgment No. II Ips 435/2010, dated 5 April 2012, Ljubljana Higher Court Judgment No. II Cp 3775/2009, dated 12 May 2010, and Ljubljana District Court Judgment No. P 3614/2007-III, dated 18 June 2009, are abrogated in the part in which the claims of Janko Pibernik, Slavka Pibernik, Mojca Pibernik, and Kana Pibernik were dismissed. In this part, the case is remanded to the Ljubljana District Court for new adjudication.

*ReasoningA

1. The challenged judgments were issued in a civil procedure in which the complainants (the parents of the deceased Samo Pibernik, his partner Mojca Pibernik, and their two children) demanded the payment of compensation for non-pecuniary damage that occurred due to the death of Samo Pibernik that was allegedly caused by the unlawful conduct of police officers in a police action on 3 April 2000. The court of first instance required the defendant (the Republic of Slovenia) to pay complainant Mojca Pibernik (the third applicant in the lawsuit) compensation for non-pecuniary damage in the amount of EUR 1,000 with statutory default interest, and dismissed the compensation claims of the other complainants (the plaintiffs in the lawsuit). Both the complainants and the defendant filed appeals against the judgment of the first instance. The Higher Court dismissed all the appeals and upheld the judgment of the court of first instance. The Higher Court determined that Article 26 of the Constitution and Article 172 of the Obligations Act (Official Gazette SFRY, Nos. 29/78, 39/85, and 57/89 – hereinafter referred to as the OA), which was in force at the time when the damaging incident occurred, is the basis for the liability of the state for damages. The challenged decision is based on the assessment that the complainants failed to prove the unlawfulness of the conduct of the police in the procedure against the deceased Samo Pibernik, therefore their claims for the payment of compensation for [having suffered] psychological damage due to the death of a relative (Article 201 of the OA) and compensation for lost alimony and support (Article 194 of the OA) are not substantiated. Following from the finding that Samo Pibernik died of an acute asthma attack triggered by the physical and emotional strain during the arrest, the courts proceeded by focusing, in particular, on the assessment of the question of whether police officers acted lawfully in their action and in conformity with the police authorisations and instructions on the use of measures involving the use of force that were applicable at the time. According to the positions of both the court of first instance and the Higher Court, the police officers did not act unlawfully in the circumstances of the concrete case. The courts established that on that day police officers were charged with executing the Order of the investigating judge on duty, No. I Kpd 381/2000, dated 3 April 2000, by which a house search was ordered due to the suspicion that criminal offences related to drug trafficking had been committed. With respect to the findings in the evidentiary proceedings, the deceased resisted the orders of the police officers, therefore, in the assessment of the courts, the police officers applied measures involving the use of force appropriately. The first and second instance courts also concurred with regard to the assessment that it is not possible to criticise the police officers for not enabling the deceased to receive timely and appropriate medical help (i.e. that they were or should have been acquainted with the medical situation of the deceased and the possibility that he could suffocate due to an acute asthma attack), and that with regard thereto it is not possible to allege inadequate diligence when planning the action. Both courts concurred that a causal link between such conduct and the death of Samo Pibernik does not exist even if with regard thereto it were proven that the conduct of the police officers was inappropriate.

2. The Supreme Court partially granted the revision filed by the complainants and in the part in which they refer to the fourth complainant (i.e. the minor son of the deceased) abrogated the judgments of the courts of the first and second instance, and in such scope remanded the case to the court of first instance for new adjudication. In the assessment of the Supreme Court, the court of first instance rejected, without substantiation, the taking of evidence by hearing the minor Jan Pibernik, because at the time of the damaging incident he was still a child (although he was an eyewitness to the relevant incident in the apartment). The court of first instance refused to hear him, arguing that due to the fact that the son was [only] a little more than 5 years old when the incident happened, it would constitute an inappropriate piece of evidence. According to the Supreme Court, also a child can be examined as a party as it has been scientifically established that also very small children have the same sensory capacities as adults. In the action, the hearing of the son as a party was proposed due to the fact that he was present during the key moments when the police officers carried out the actions due to which the defendant could be liable for damages. In the assessment of the Supreme Court, the defendant justifiably requested the taking of evidence by hearing the minor son of the deceased as a party to proceedings and this does not entail an inappropriate piece of evidence that the court could refuse to take in advance. The Supreme Court dismissed the revision allegations of the other complainants. It concurred with the substantive law assessment of the lower courts that the arrest procedure involving Samo Pibernik did not entail inadmissible conduct and that the reaction of the police officers to the asthmatic attack did not entail negligent conduct. Therefore, also in the assessment of the Supreme Court, not all the prerequisites for the liability of the defendant for damages are fulfilled.

3. The complainants allege violations of the rights determined by Article 14, the fourth paragraph of Article 15, and Articles 22, 23, and 26 of the Constitution. First of all, they stress that they were the distinctly weaker party in the dispute against the state. They refer to Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-555/03, Up-827/04, dated 6 July 2006 (Official Gazette RS, No. 78/06, and OdlUS XV, 92), by which it was established that the right of complainants Mojca Pibernik and Janko Pibernik to an effective legal remedy determined by the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution and in relation to Article 13 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR) was violated. According to the allegations of the complainants, this Decision of the Constitutional Court was not implemented in the concrete civil proceedings for damages. They reproach the [respective] court for having carried out the civil proceedings in a discriminatory manner. According to the complainants' allegations, although the court was acquainted with the mentioned Decision of the Constitutional Court, it did not carry out the proceedings in such a manner so as to determine the state of the facts and to establish the liability of the defendant. The complainants find the fact that the court rejected the taking of virtually all evidence that they proposed to be particularly unacceptable. On the other hand, the court took all the evidence proposed by the defendant. The complainants stress that the challenged decision was adopted without them being heard as parties to proceedings (with the exception of the minor Jan Pibernik, with regard to whom the Supreme Court remanded the case to the court of first instance for new adjudication). They are convinced that this entails a violation of the principle of parties' right to be heard as determined by the Civil Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 73/07 – official consolidated text and 45/08 – hereinafter referred to as the CPA) and, at the same time, also a violation of the right to make a statement (Article 22 of the Constitution). That the proceedings were carried out in a discriminatory manner was allegedly also evident when other evidence proposed by the complainants in order to establish the liability of the defendant were rejected (especially the motion for examining the expert witness Dr Miroslav Žaberl, expert on questions regarding the exercise of police authorisations). The complainants are convinced that the civil trial court did not assess with sufficient expertise the testimonies of the police officers who participated in the action at issue. They find the position of the court that the police officers were not obliged to comply with the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 63/94, 70/94 – corr., 72/98, and 6/99 – hereinafter referred to as the CrPA) on house searches to be unacceptable, because in fact they were not yet carrying out such a search, but only “created the conditions for carrying out a house search.” Allegedly, the court uncritically followed the allegations of the defendant, who justified the intrusion of police officers by the necessity of the house search. The complainants allege that the Supreme Court unjustifiably overlooked infringements of essential procedural requirements of the provisions of the CPA, which at the same time also entailed a violation of human rights and fundamental freedoms. The court allegedly completely overlooked their allegations regarding the violations of the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (Official Gazette RS, No. 24/93, MP, No. 7/93 – hereinafter referred to as the Convention against Torture). This allegedly happened precisely because the proposed evidence was not taken (i.e. due to the refusal to hear the complainants, the rejection of the expert opinions of permanent court-appointed medical experts Dr Dolšek and Dr Čakar, the rejection of the opinion of pulmonologist Dr Skralovnik, and the refusal to take evidence by appointing an expert pulmonologist). In such context, the complainants underline that during the direct examination of the court-appointed expert Dr Turel it became apparent that the appointed expert is not a pulmonologist, but an internist who referred to his individual experience in the field of the treatment of pulmonary patients. According to the complainants, the appropriate specialisation and expertise of the appointed expert were thus not ensured. Such conduct of the court is particularly unacceptable for the complainants due to the fact that the court rejected other motions for evidence that, in the opinion of the complainants, were essential for establishing the liability of the defendant. In such context, the complainants also draw attention to the unacceptable application of Article 213 of the CPA (when the court negatively assessed in advance the quality of a certain evidentiary means). What was at issue in the disputed police action was, according to the complainants, a violation of human rights and fundamental freedoms (determined by Articles 17, 18, 19, and 21 of the Constitution). The complainants are convinced that the defendant itself caused the dangerous conduct of the police officers, therefore it must be liable for damages resulting from the tragic outcome. The state carried out the action as planned, but in the opinion of the complainants it was poorly planned. Numerous circumstances regarding the incident allegedly demonstrate that what was at issue was not an action carried out with negligence (severe violence by police officers that lasted for a prolonged period of time, numerous bodily injuries, loss of blood, the refusal to provide [medical] assistance in time). The complainants are convinced that the force was applied contrary to the principles of necessity and proportionality (i.e. the application of the mildest measures involving the use of force) and respect for the personality and dignity of the deceased. In order to assess the liability of the defendant, it would also be necessary, according to the complainants, to take into consideration the appropriate provisions of the ECHR and the Convention against Torture (which explicitly determines that the state shall ensure to victims of torture an enforceable right to fair and adequate compensation including the means for as full rehabilitation as possible; in the event of the death of the victim as a result of an act of torture, his dependents shall be entitled to compensation). With regard to the above, the complainants propose that the challenged judgments be abrogated and the case remanded to the court of first instance for new adjudication.

4. By Order No. Up-679/12, dated 2 April 2013, the Constitutional Court accepted the constitutional complaint for consideration. The Constitutional Court rejected the constitutional complaint of Jan Pibernik against the Supreme Court Order (by which that court abrogated the judgments of the lower courts with regard to the decision regarding his claim and in such scope remanded the case to the court of first instance for new adjudication) due to the non-exhaustion of legal remedies. In the new proceedings, the court will namely decide anew on the substantiation of his claim, and after the exhaustion of all legal remedies the mentioned complainant will also be able to file a constitutional complaint.
5. In conformity with the first paragraph of Article 56 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 64/07 – official consolidated text and 109/12 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), the Constitutional Court notified the Supreme Court that it had accepted the constitutional complaint for consideration. In conformity with the second paragraph of the mentioned Article of the CCA, the Constitutional Court sent the constitutional complaint for a reply to the opposing party from the civil procedure, who did not reply thereto.

B

6. The complainants claim that the challenged decision of the courts is based on standpoints regarding the liability of the state for damages that are unacceptable from the viewpoint of the right to compensation for damage determined by Article 26 of the Constitution. They are opposed to the substantive law assessment of the courts that in the police action that was carried out in order for Samo Pibernik to be arrested the police officers did not act in an inadmissible manner. According to the allegations of the complainants, in the mentioned action there was police violence, and already during the civil proceedings they also referred to the provisions of the ECHR and the Convention against Torture. Also unacceptable for the complainants is the assessment of the courts that the reaction of the police officers to the asthmatic attack of the deceased did not entail insufficiently diligent conduct and that therefore the conduct of the police officers was not unlawful, which is one of the prerequisites for the liability of the state for damages. The complainants stress that during the civil procedure they also referred to Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-555/03, Up-827/04, by which it was established that the right of the first complainant (the father of the deceased) and the third complainant (the partner of the deceased) to an effective legal remedy determined by the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution in connection to Article 13 of the ECHR was violated because the state did not carry out an independent investigation of the circumstances of the incident (the death of Samo Pibernik). According to the complainants, this Decision of the Constitutional Court was not implemented in the civil proceedings for damages at issue.

7. In conformity with the established constitutional case law, a violation of the right determined by Article 26 of the Constitution is expressed when a court bases its decision on a certain legal standpoint that would be unacceptable from the viewpoint of that right.<sup>1</sup> For such reason, the Constitutional Court must assess the standpoints that the courts adopted in relation to Article 26 of the Constitution in the challenged judgments. The central question that arises is the question regarding unlawfulness as one of the prerequisites of the liability of the state for damages. In the case at issue, this question is tightly intertwined with the content of the right to life (Article 17 of the Constitution) and the positive and negative obligations of the state with regard to the protection of this human right.
8. Article 17 of the Constitution determines that human life is inviolable. By the right to life one of the supreme constitutional values is protected in free and democratic societies, i.e. human life.<sup>2</sup> By this human right, the physical existence of a human as the prerequisite for his intellectual existence, personal freedom, and acting in general is protected.<sup>3</sup> A human's right to life is an essential and the underlying element of human dignity as hierarchically the highest constitutional value that represents the value starting point of all human rights.<sup>4</sup> As such, the Constitution guarantees it as an absolute right, therefore it cannot be limited even on the basis of the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution. In conformity with the established constitutional case law, there exist negative and positive obligations of the state in relation to the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms. The negative obligations entail that the state must refrain from interferences with human rights and fundamental freedoms, especially interferences with the right to life (Article 17 of the Constitution) and the right to the prohibition of torture (Article 18 of the Constitution). The positive obligations, however, oblige the state and its individual branches of power (the judicial, legislative, and executive powers) to actively protect human rights and fundamental freedoms, whereby possibilities for their as effective as possible exercise shall be created. In such context, it is clear that the positive obligations of the state escalate in conformity with the importance of the affected constitutionally protected value. Since human rights that protect the life, health, security, physical and mental integrity and dignity of individuals are the fundamental values

---

1 Cf. Order of the Constitutional Court No. Up-2/04, dated 4 May 2005 (OdlUS XIV, 46) and Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-695/11, dated 10 January 2013 (Official Gazette RS, No. 9/13).

2 Its supreme importance is also evident from the second paragraph of Article 16 of the Constitution, in accordance with which the right to life is placed among the human rights that cannot be temporarily suspended or restricted even during a war or state of emergency.

3 Cf. B. Ivanc in: L. Šturm (Ed.), Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije: dopolnitev komentarja – A [Commentary on the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia: Supplement to the Commentary – A], Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Ljubljana 2011, p. 207, Para. 1.

4 Ibidem, p. 208, Para. 3. See also Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-109/10, dated 26 September 2011 (Official Gazette RS, No. 78/11, and OdlUS XIX, 26).

of a democratic society, the state must protect them in a particularly active manner and it must create possibilities for their maximally effective exercise.<sup>5</sup>

9. The right to life is first and foremost a defensive right of individuals that prohibits authoritative and intentional interferences of the state with human life as a constitutionally protected good.<sup>6</sup> In the event of the death of a person due to the use of force by the repressive authorities of the state (e.g. the Police or the military), the state must ensure an effective and independent official investigation of the circumstances of the death. Thereby, the procedural aspect of the right to life is protected. Within the framework of procedures initiated due to an event that leads to the death or injury of an individual, the state must credibly and plausibly justify the occurrence of such consequences. The state carries the burden of proof in demonstrating that in the circumstances of a concrete event it acted in conformity with the statutorily determined competences and authorisations, and in particular also in conformity with the positive obligation to protect the inviolability of life and the physical integrity of the persons involved. Within the framework of its positive obligations, the state must namely, by its active conduct (which includes diligent planning and supervision of the measures taken when force is used), prevent the occurrence of fatal consequences for individuals.
10. Furthermore, from the case law of the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR) it follows that the right to life (Article 2 of the ECHR)<sup>7</sup> is, together with Article 3 of the ECHR (the prohibition of torture),<sup>8</sup> one of the most fundamental values in a democratic society that connect the Member States of the Council of Europe. The objective or purpose of Article 2 of the ECHR as an instrument for protecting the individual from the state arbitrarily depriving him or her of his or her life requires that this Article be in such respect interpreted narrowly and applied in a manner that enables effective and practical supervisory measures.<sup>9</sup> From the wording of Article 2 of the ECHR taken as a whole, it follows that the right to life applies not only to intentional killing, but also to situations where the use of force is allowed and where such use of force ends with the deprivation of life, although unin-

---

5 Cf. Decisions of the Constitutional Court No. Up-555/03, Up-827/04, Paragraph 25 of the reasoning, and No. Up-1082/12, dated 29 May 2014 (Official Gazette RS, No. 43/14), Paragraph 14 of the reasoning.

6 Cf. B. Ivanc, op. cit. p. 216, Para. 18.

7 Article 2 of the ECHR (right to life) reads as follows:

“1. Everyone’s right to life shall be protected by law. No one shall be deprived of his life intentionally save in the execution of a sentence of a court following his conviction of a crime for which this penalty is provided by law.

2. Deprivation of life shall not be regarded as inflicted in contravention of this Article when it results from the use of force which is no more than absolutely necessary:

- (a) in defence of any person from unlawful violence;
- (b) in order to effect a lawful arrest or to prevent the escape of a person lawfully detained;
- (c) in action lawfully taken for the purpose of quelling a riot or insurrection.”

8 Article 3 of the ECHR (prohibition of torture) reads as follows: “No one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.”

9 Cf. judgments of the ECtHR in Andronicou and Constantinou v. Cyprus, dated 9 October 1997, and in Huohvainen v. Finland, dated 13 March 2007.

tentionally. Any use of force must be “absolutely necessary” to achieve one or more purposes determined by subparagraphs (a) through (c).<sup>10</sup> From Article 2 of the ECHR there follows the requirement that the force applied must be strictly proportionate to the achievement of admissible objectives.<sup>11</sup> With regard to the importance of Article 2 of the ECHR in a democratic society, the justifiability of an interference with the right to life must be assessed in accordance with the most detailed and strict criteria. In such framework, the ECtHR assesses whether the death of a person was caused intentionally by the use of force, and in doing so it takes into consideration not only that the action was caused by the representatives of the state who in fact control the force, but also other circumstances, such as the planning and supervision of measures taken involving the use of force. According to the ECtHR, when what is at issue is the use of force by the Police, it is difficult to distinguish between the negative and positive obligations of the state on the basis of the ECHR. In such instances, the ECtHR assesses whether the police action was planned with a sufficient degree of diligence and whether it was supervised by the competent authorities, all with a view to maximally reducing the possibility of a fatal outcome. It also assesses whether all precautionary measures were taken when choosing the means and methods with regard to the safety of the action carried out.<sup>12</sup> The requirement of there being an investigation and the indisputable problems that accompany the combatting of criminality cannot justify a limitation of the protection that is ensured with regard to the right to life and the right to one’s physical integrity. In such respect, the ECtHR stresses that also when combatting terrorism and organised crime, the ECHR absolutely prohibits torture and inhuman or degrading treatment, as well as the deprivation of life, regardless of the victim’s conduct. If during the process of arresting a person or while a person is under police supervision consequences occur that are fatal for his or her life (or physical integrity), reasonable doubt arises with regard to the conformity of the conduct from the viewpoint of the above-mentioned standards that impose on the state not only negative, but also positive obligations with regard to the protection of the right to life (or the right to the protection of one’s physical integrity). For such reason, the state must present credible and plausible arguments on the basis of which it can explain or justify the type of force that it applied during the police operation.<sup>13</sup>

-
- 10 This means that the necessity of such measure must be assessed more strictly and more diligently than normally during the assessment of whether a measure by the state is “necessary in a democratic society.”
- 11 Cf. judgment of the ECtHR in Kelly and Others v. the United Kingdom, dated 4 May 2001.
- 12 Cf. judgments of the ECtHR in McCann and Others v. the United Kingdom, dated 27 September 1995; Andronicou and Constantinou v. Cyprus; Ergi v. Turkey, dated 28 July 1998; Hugh Jordan v. the United Kingdom, dated 4 May 2001; Makaratzis v. Greece, dated 20 December 2004; and Finogenov and Others v. Russia, dated 20 December 2011.
- 13 Cf. judgments of the ECtHR in Rehbock v. Slovenia, dated 28 November 2000; Matko v. Slovenia, dated 2 November 2006; and Butolen v. Slovenia, dated 26 April 2012. In all the mentioned cases the Republic of Slovenia was convicted due to a violation of Article 3 of the ECHR because the Government failed to submit credible and plausible arguments by which it could explain or justify the type of force that it applied during the police action depriving the individuals involved of their liberty. Consequently, the ECtHR established, by taking into consideration the circumstances of each mentioned case, that the force applied was excessive and unjustified.

11. When the state does not act in accordance with the obligations that follow from Article 17 of the Constitution and Article 2 of the ECHR, the question of its liability for damages determined by Article 26 of the Constitution inevitably arises. In conformity with the first paragraph of Article 26 of the Constitution, everyone has the right to compensation for damage caused through unlawful actions in connection with the performance of any function or other activity by a person or authority performing such function or activity within a state or local community authority or as a bearer of public authority. From this human right there follows, first and foremost, the general prohibition of exercising power in an unlawful manner, namely regardless of through which branch of power the damage is caused.<sup>14</sup> By establishing the liability of the state for damages, affected individuals are protected in the event damage occurs due to the authoritative actions of authorities.<sup>15</sup> The basis of such responsibility is (1) the unlawful conduct of a state authority, local community authority, or bearer of public authority (2) when exercising power or in relation to such being exercised, a consequence of which is (3) the occurrence of damage.<sup>16</sup> The complex relationship between the state as the power and individuals, within the framework of which also falls the liability of the state for damages, is essentially a public law relationship (a vertical legal relationship). When exercising power, or with regard to its exercise, the state enters such legal relationship vertically and is, with regard to such, bound by the constitutional prohibition of unlawful authoritative conduct.<sup>17</sup> The liability of the state for damage caused when exercising the function of authority, or with regard to its exercise, establishes the responsibility of the state for ex iure imperii conduct.<sup>18</sup>

14 Cf. J. Zobec, Odškodninska odgovornost sodnika in odgovornost države zanj [Liability of a Judge for Damages and the Liability of the State for such Judge], Pravni letopis 2013, p. 201.

15 This is stated by I. Crnić, Odgovornost države za štetu, Pravo u gospodarstvu, Zagreb, 1–2, 1996, p. 117.

16 The majority standpoint in legal theory and also an established standpoint in the case law places the institute of the liability of the state for damages within the system of civil non-contractual liability for damages and applies for such the general rules of the law of obligations determined by the Code of Obligations, Official Gazette RS, No. 97/07 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the CO (and, before [it entered into force], the rules determined by the OA), namely the institute of vicarious liability for damages (Articles 147 and 148 of the CO, which regulate the liability of employers and legal entities). For more details, see D. Možina, Odškodninska odgovornost države v sistemu obligacijskega prava [Liability of the State for Damages Within the System of the Law of Obligations], Gradivo za dneve civilnega in gospodarskega prava [Materials for the Civil and Commercial Law Days], Portorož 2013, p. 56.

17 This is stated by J. Zobec, op. cit., pp. 185–228.

18 Cf. R. Pirnat, Protipravnost ravnanja javnih oblasti kot element odškodninske odgovornosti javnih oblasti [The Unlawfulness of the Conduct of Public Authorities as an Element of the Liability of Public Authorities for Damages], in: Odgovornost države, lokalnih skupnosti in drugih nosilcev javnih pooblastil za ravnanje svojih organov in uslužbencev [The Liability of the State, Local Communities, and Other Bearers of Public Authority for the Conduct of their Authorities and Officials], Zbornik Inštituta za primerjalno pravo [Proceedings of the Institute for Comparative Law], III. dnevi civilnega prava [3rd Civil Law Days], Ljubljana 2005, p. 21. From this paper it follows that special rules for liability refer to ex iure imperii conduct of public officials and authorities, and not to ex iure gestionis conduct. The state, local communities, and bearers of public authority can, of course, as is the case with any other person, be liable in accordance with the general rules of the law of obligations, but

What is at issue is a specific form of liability that originates from the special position of the state vis-à-vis persons and entities (citizens and legal entities, as well as other persons on its territory). With regard to such, it is evident that in order to assess the liability of the state for damages, the classic rules of vicarious civil liability for damages do not suffice; when assessing individual prerequisites as regards the responsibility of the state, specificities that originate from the authoritative nature of the functioning of its authorities, officials, and employees must be taken into consideration.<sup>19</sup>

12. In light of the mentioned starting points, also the content of the legal standard of unlawfulness is different than it is in classic civil law relationships regarding damages (where unlawfulness entails the violation of a right or a legally protected interest).<sup>20</sup> With regard to so-called public law unlawfulness, the question regarding the due action by the state as the entity of authority arises, i.e. how a state authority or another bearer of public authority should act in an individual case and what the concrete and objectively necessary diligence of the authority is when performing the function of authority.<sup>21</sup> The foundation of the liability of the state for damages thus lies in the obligations of the state and its authorities that are particularly emphasised when human rights that protect the fundamental values of democratic society (such as the right determined by Article 17 of the Constitution) are at issue: the state is not only obliged to refrain from taking measures by which it would interfere in an inadmissible manner with the protected interests of individuals or their human rights, but it also must protect these interests and rights by its active conduct or measures.
13. From Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-555/03, Up-827/04, there follow important starting points for the courts deciding in the civil dispute at issue with regard to the assessment of the liability of the defendant for damages. In that Decision, the Constitutional Court accentuated the procedural aspect of the obligation of the state with regard to the protection of the right to life. With regard to the fact that during the action of the repressive authorities of the state a person died, the state should, in conformity with the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution in relation to Article 13 of the ECHR, carry out an independent investigation of the circumstances of the incident and enable the relatives of the deceased (the complainants) effective access to such investigation. The state did not carry out such an investigation within the framework of the criminal procedure, nor did it carry out any other investigation that would fulfil the mentioned criteria.<sup>22</sup> In such context, only with regard to acts concerning their operations.

---

<sup>19</sup> Ibidem.

<sup>20</sup> J. Zobec, op. cit., p. 202.

<sup>21</sup> In Germany, Austria, and Slovenia, objective diligence with regard to conduct is one of the decisive aspects of the assessment of unlawfulness; in order for unlawfulness to be established, it is required that what is at issue is a violation of specific and objectively necessary diligence. For more details on this subject, see M. Bukovec, Odškodninska odgovornost države [The Liability of the State for Damages], doctoral dissertation, Faculty of Law, University of Ljubljana, Ljubljana 2008, pp. 171–172.

<sup>22</sup> In fact, within the Police Administration of Ljubljana, a commission was founded whose task was to determine the circumstances of the performance [of the action] and course of the incident at issue; however, the

it must be emphasised that in order for the procedural obligation of the state with regard to the protection of the right to life to be fulfilled, it is not necessary that such investigation be ensured within the framework of the criminal procedure. In fact, the state cannot satisfy this obligation by mere proceedings for damages; however, if such proceedings are initiated, the relatives of the deceased must have the possibility in adversarial proceedings (as an independent investigation was not carried out) to impartially and objectively investigate and determine the circumstances of the death and the possible liability of the state for the death of the individual when he or she was under the physical supervision of its repressive authorities. In such proceedings for damages, it is the state that must dispel any doubt with regard to [the question of whether] the conduct of its authorities was in conformity with the fundamental constitutional requirements and the requirements of the Convention. If the state does not succeed in credibly and plausibly substantiating its allegations regarding its lawful and sufficiently diligent conduct (the planning and supervision over the carrying out of the action) in the circumstances of an individual case, in particular also that it has done everything in its power to prevent the occurrence of consequences fatal to persons, this suffices to conclude that there was unlawfulness as one of the fundamental conditions for the liability of the state for damages.<sup>23</sup>

14. The assessment of the courts in the challenged judgments is not in conformity with the mentioned constitutional requirements. The challenged decision imposes on the complainants the burden of taking a position and proving the unlawfulness of the conduct of the police in the police procedure against the deceased Samo Pibernik. Both the court of first instance and the Higher Court adopted the position that Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-555/03, Up-827/04 cannot influence the assessment with regard to whether the prerequisites for the liability of the defendant for damages are fulfilled. Such standpoint of the courts is fundamentally unacceptable from the viewpoint of the right protected by Article 26 of the Constitution. The assessment of the courts thereby negates the importance of the constitutionally imposed procedural duty of the state to ensure an independent, objective, and effective investigation of the circumstances of the death, which extends to the interpretation of the term unlawfulness from Article 26 of the Constitution. The reason for this is that such interpretation does not take into consideration that doubt as to the constitutional conformity of the conduct of authorities with regard to the protection of the complainants had no influence on whom this commission was composed of. With regard to that, also this investigation of the circumstances of the incident did not fulfil the criteria that the ECtHR established with regard to the right to an effective legal remedy determined by Article 13 of the ECHR.

---

- 23 Cf. judgment of the ECtHR in Shchiborshch and Kuzmina v. Russia, dated 16 January 2014. In that case, the ECtHR established a violation of the substantive aspect of the right to life, which is protected by Article 2 of the ECHR. In its reasoning, the Court stressed that the police action (the purpose of which was the forced hospitalisation of Shchiborshch) was carried out in an uncontrolled and careless manner and that the measures applied by the police were not in conformity with the standard of caution to be expected from law enforcement officers in a democratic society, in particular not with the principle of minimising to the greatest extent possible any risk to the life and health of Shchiborshch.

right to life was not eliminated, therefore in a dispute regarding damages one must proceed from the presumption that the death occurred due to the unlawful conduct of the authorities. Consequently, the court should impose on the state the burden to plausibly substantiate that it acted lawfully when carrying out the police action, that the use of force was proportionate, and that it implemented, to the highest possible degree, measures by which it was to prevent any foreseeable risk as regards the life and health of the persons investigated.

15. The courts limited their assessment only to the question of whether in the action the police officers acted lawfully and in conformity with the police authorisations in force at that time and whether there existed a lawful basis for their actions. According to the findings of the courts, the police officers had such a legal basis in the Order of the investigating judge on duty, No. I Kpd 381/2000, dated 3 April 2000, which was issued on the basis of Articles 215 through 218 of the CrPA in force at the time. However, in the circumstances of the case at issue, the mere existence of a court order for a house search is not a sufficient reason to conclude that the conduct of the police officers was in conformity with the constitutional requirements and the requirements of the Convention with regard to the protection of the right to life. Moreover, the reference of the courts to the Instructions on the Use of Measures Involving the Use of Force (Official Gazette SRS, No. 25/81) as the [legal] basis for the use of force and the finding that the police officers used measures involving the use of force justifiably, because the deceased did not obey their orders, but tried to escape from the hallway into an apartment protected by a security door, also do not suffice. In the assessment it is necessary to proceed from the nature of a house search, which in itself is not an invasive measure and does not, as a general rule, represent a risk for the life or health of the investigated person. The task of the police when carrying out a house search is limited only to preventing the obstruction of the investigation. Therefore, the defendant (i.e. the state) had to prove that the force used when performing the mentioned investigative act was limited to the least degree necessary. The centre of gravity of the assessment of the courts should be in establishing whether during the performance of the investigative measure ordered the police officers did everything [in their power] to protect the life and health of the person investigated and to prevent the risk to such person. The reasoning of the challenged judgments does not contain concrete findings or an assessment of the circumstances of the performance of the mentioned investigative act on the basis of which it would be possible to conclude that the police officers acted in conformity with the principle of applying the least force necessary and that they prepared and supervised the action diligently enough in order to exclude any foreseeable risk for the life and health of individuals.
16. With regard to the above, the position of the courts in accordance with which the complainants failed to prove the unlawfulness of the conduct of the police officers is unacceptable from the viewpoint of the right to compensation for damage protected by Article 26 of the Constitution. Therefore, the Constitutional Court abrogated the challenged judgments in the part in which the claims of Janko Pibernik, Slavka Pibernik, Mojca Pibernik, and Kana Pibernik were dismissed and in this part remanded the case to the court of first instance for new adjudication. With regard to the fact that it abrogated the challenged judgments due to a violation of the right determined by Article 26 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court did not examine the other alleged violations of human rights.

C

17. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 59 of the CCA, composed of: Dr Jadranka Sovdat, Vice President, and Judges Dr Mitja Deisinger, Dr Dunja Jadek Pensa, Dr Etelka Korpič – Horvat, Dr Ernest Petrič, Jasna Pogačar, and Jan Zobec. The decision was reached unanimously.

Dr Jadranka Sovdat
Vice President

Decision No. U-I-292/09, Up-1427/09, dated 20 October 2011

DECISION

At a session held on 20 October 2011 in proceedings to examine a petition for the review of constitutionality and to decide upon the constitutional complaint of A. B. and C. D., both from X., represented by Mag. Matevž Krivic, Spodnje Pirniče, and E. F. and G. H., represented by Mag. Matevž Krivic on the basis of the power of attorney granted by their legal representatives A. B. and C. D., the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

- 1 The third paragraph of Article 22 of the International Protection Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 11/11 – official consolidated text) is abrogated.
- 2 Supreme Court Judgment No. I Up 425/2009, dated 7 October 2009, is abrogated and the case is remanded to the Supreme Court for new adjudication.
- 3 The petition for the initiation of proceedings to review the constitutionality of the fifth indent of the third paragraph of Article 21 and Article 26 of the International Protection Act is rejected.

Reasoning

A

1. On the basis of the second indent of the first paragraph of Article 52 in relation to the first indent of Article 53 of the International Protection Act (hereinafter referred to as the IPA), the Ministry of the Interior (hereinafter referred to as the MI) dismissed the applications of the complainants for international protection. At the same time, it decided that the complainants must leave the Republic of Slovenia in seven days after the decision becomes final. Due to the fact that the complainants in the procedure did not submit any evidence (not even personal documents by which they could have demonstrated their identity), but substantiated their applications merely by their allegations, the MI carried out an assessment on the basis of the third paragraph of Article 21 of the IPA. In the framework of such assessment, the MI established that the majority of the allegations by which the complainants substantiated their applications for international protection were not convincing or probable. On the basis of a comprehensive assessment of all the allegations and the conduct of the complainants in the procedure, the MI assessed that they are in general not credible. The Administrative Court found for the complainants [who had filed an] action, annulled the challenged decision of the MI, and remanded the case to the MI for a new procedure. The Administrative Court assessed that the findings of the MI do not suffice for adopting an assessment of the evidence entailing that the [allegations of] the complainants are in general not credible. The MI filed an appeal against the Administrative Court Judgment, which the Supreme Court granted and changed the Administrative Court Judgment so as to dismiss the action. The Supreme Court concurred with the assessment of the MI that the adult complainants did not make enough effort to base their allegations on evidence and to demonstrate their credibility in general. Since in the assessment of the Supreme Court the assessment of the MI that the complainants did not demonstrate their general credibility was well founded, it did not have to verify the information on the country of origin, with respect to the fourth paragraph of Article 22 of the IPA.

2. The complainants claim that the challenged Supreme Court Judgment violates their rights determined by Article 22 of the Constitution. They stress that the reasons stated in the Judgment regarding one of the decisive facts (i.e. the citizenship of the complainants) are unclear, contradictory, and inconsistent with the case file. Allegedly, the MI clearly established in its decision that the complainants are Chinese citizens. Consequently, when the Supreme Court stated that the MI only presumed, on the basis of the legislation and the case law studied, that they are most probably Chinese citizens, it only created an unclarity. In the opinion of the complainants, this entails a manifestly erroneous finding (which is inconsistent with the case file). They also allege that the statement of reasons for the adopted decision, which are allegedly not true and are inconsistent with the case file, in Paragraphs 16 and 17 of the reasoning of the judgment, entails a violation of the right determined by Article 22 of the Constitution. In the opinion of the complainants, the Decision of the MI is unlawful, because the MI did not assess the conditions for granting a subsidiary form of protection therein (as an obligatory element of the assessment in the procedure for granting international protection), but it only hypothetically (subordinately) stated that in the event the complainants are without citizenship, they cannot in any manner be refouled to China, “resulting in the fact that no subsidiary protection is then possible.” Furthermore, the complainants draw attention to the fact that the Supreme Court Judgment is unsubstantiated in the part that refers to the alleged inadmissibility of the application of the fourth paragraph of Article 22 of the IPA. In this respect, the Administrative Court Judgment includes a very detailed reasoning, whereas the Supreme Court did not substantiate its position that differed from the position of the court of first instance. The complainants also allege a violation of the right to asylum as a right that follows from the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees and the Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees (Official Gazette of the Federal People’s Republic of Yugoslavia, MP, No. 7/60; Official Gazette of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, MP, No. 15/67; Official Gazette RS, No. 35/92, MP, No. 9/92 – hereinafter referred to as the Geneva Convention) and from Article 35 of the Constitution. They are of the opinion that the MI should have treated them as applicants sur place – i.e. as applicants who are under threat of being persecuted in China, their country of origin, and who fled from D. out of fear of being refouled to China. In this part, the applicants allege that the courts erroneously applied substantive law, due to which the right to asylum determined by the Geneva Convention and Article 35 of the Constitution was allegedly directly violated.

3. By Order of a panel of the Constitutional Court, No. Up-1427/09, dated 8 January 2010, the Constitutional Court accepted the constitutional complaint for consideration and decided that until a final decision of the Constitutional Court is adopted, the execution of the decision of the MI is suspended. In conformity with the first paragraph of Article 56 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 64/07 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), the Constitutional Court notified the Supreme Court thereof. On the basis of the first paragraph of Article 56 of the CCA, the Constitutional Court sent the order on the acceptance and the constitutional complaint to the MI.
4. In its application dated 27 January 2010, the MI proposed that the constitutional complaint be dismissed. The allegation of the complainants with regard to the unclarity regarding the citizenship of the complainants caused by the Supreme Court judgment was, in the assessment of the MI, unfounded. According to the MI, it was clear from the entire context that in the part where the Supreme Court stated that the MI only “presumed” that the adult complainants are Chinese citizens, this was only a clumsy formulation and not a conviction of the Supreme Court. The MI underlined that it established in its decision that the applicants are Chinese citizens. It rejected the allegation that when assessing the conditions for acquiring refugee status it deemed the complainants to be Chinese citizens, whereas in the framework of the assessment of a subsidiary form of protection it deemed them to be persons without citizenship. With regard to the allegation regarding the unlawfulness of the decision, which allegedly did not contain an assessment of the conditions for acquiring subsidiary protection status, the MI underlined that the credibility of the complainants cannot be considered separately when what is at issue is the granting of refugee status or subsidiary protection status, because this is decided on in a uniform procedure. For such reason, the allegation that the MI did not adopt a decision on both statuses is not true. The MI underlined that it did not adopt the assessment that the complainants were in general not credible only on the basis of one statement or only several statements, but it took into consideration the majority of the statements and the conduct of the complainants in the procedure. The allegations of the complainants with regard to citizenship were only a part of the assessment of their credibility, with regard to which it was crucial for an assessment of their statements that during their interview they did not state everything they knew with regard to their citizenship.
5. The Constitutional Court notified the complainants of the positions of the MI with regard to the allegations in the constitutional complaint. In the application dated 9

July 2010, the complainants maintain the allegations and proposals stated in the constitutional complaint. They draw attention to the fact that the position in accordance with which the “refusal to grant the application for international protection does not automatically entail forced removal to the country of origin, which consequently entails that the refusal to grant the application does not result in a violation of the principle of non-refoulement, which is something that the state must prevent ex officio, due to which in the procedure for granting international protection it does not have to verify the information regarding the country of origin if general non-credibility is established,” is not tolerable. They are of the opinion that when deciding on international protection, it is not admissible to avoid this question.

6. The complainants also filed a petition to initiate proceedings for a review of the constitutionality of the fifth indent of the third paragraph of Article 21, the fourth paragraph of Article 22, and Article 26 of the IPA. The complainants substantiate the alleged unconstitutionality of the fifth indent of the third paragraph of Article 21 of the IPA by claiming that the term general credibility of the applicant itself “markedly contradicts fundamental human rights, especially the right to human dignity, and also the right to a fair trial and administrative decision-making.” In their opinion, also the fourth paragraph of Article 22 of the IPA is unconstitutional, which allows the competent authority to disregard the information on the country of origin if the general credibility of the applicant is not established. The complainants are convinced that this Article is contrary to the principle of non-refoulement, as one of the fundamental principles of the Geneva Convention. Even if unclarities arise and there are contradictions in the statements of the applicant, in the opinion of the complainants, this cannot entail an admissible reason for the competent authority to not be obliged to verify the information on the country of origin. The complainants also draw attention to an internal contradiction of the provisions of the IPA, which in multiple places envisages comparing the content of the applicant’s statements with the information on the country of origin (cf. the third indent of the third paragraph of Article 21 of the IPA and the fourth indent of the first paragraph of Article 55 of the IPA). Therefore, the fourth paragraph of Article 22 of the IPA is, in their opinion, also contrary to the fundamental principles of a state governed by the rule of law, from which follows the requirement of clear and non-contradictory laws. The complainants also allege the inconsistency of Article 26 of the IPA with the Geneva Convention. In conformity with this Convention, applicants for international protection do not have to prove that they have already been persecuted, but must demonstrate a “reasonable fear of persecution.” Allegedly, the result of the fact that Article 26 of the IPA refers to “acts of persecution” is that on the basis of this provision this standard has been legally incorrectly interpreted in the administrative and judicial case law.
7. The Constitutional Court sent the petition to the National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia, which did not reply thereto.
8. In their application dated 23 February 2010, the complainants added to the petition the argumentation from the action in the Tenzin case, which was allegedly considered by the Administrative Court and which allegedly contains a motion to initiate proceedings for the review of the constitutionality of the entire third paragraph of Article 21 of the IPA. They allege that this statutory provision as a whole is severely inconsistent with Council Directive 2004/83/EC of 29 April 2004 on Minimum Standards for the Qualification and Status of Third Country Nationals or Stateless Persons as Refugees or as Persons Who Otherwise Need International Protection and the Content of the Protection Granted (OJ L 304, 30 September 2004, pp. 12–23 – hereinafter referred to as the Qualification Directive), and consequently also with Article 3a of the Constitution.

B – I

The petition for the initiation of proceedings for a review of the constitutionality of the third paragraph of Article 22 of the IPA

9. The complainants filed a constitutional complaint against the Supreme Court Judgment (by which that Court modified the Administrative Court Judgment and dismissed the action filed against the decision of the MI), which is, inter alia, based on the position that in conformity with the fourth paragraph of Article 22 of the IPA the competent authority did not have to take into consideration the information on the country of origin of the complainants, because their general credibility was not established. In the assessment of the Constitutional Court, the complainants have a legal interest to initiate proceedings for a review of the constitutionality of the mentioned statutory provision. Since the decision on the constitutional complaint also depends on the decision on the petition, the Constitutional Court had to first decide on the latter.
10. In conformity with the second paragraph of Article 22 of the IPA, in the procedure the competent authority verifies the statements of the applicant relating to the information on the country of origin referred to in the eighth and ninth indents of Article 23 of the IPA (i.e. general information on the country of origin, in particular on the social-political situation and the adopted legislation, and specific in-depth detailed information on the country of origin related exclusively to the concrete case, but may also include the manner of implementation of laws and other regulations of the country of origin. The challenged fourth paragraph of Article 22 of the IPA determined: “If the general credibility of the applicant is not established, the competent authority shall disregard the information on the country of origin referred to in the preceding paragraph.” When adopting the Act Amending the International Protection Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 99/10 – hereinafter referred to as the IPA-B), the legislature transferred the content of the challenged fourth paragraph of Article 22 of the IPA to the third paragraph of the same article of the [amended] Act. Since only a modification of the enumeration of the Article was at issue, whereas the content of the challenged statutory provision was not amended, the Constitutional Court assessed the allegations of the petitioners in the framework of the third paragraph of Article 22 of the IPA.
11. The petitioners allege that the challenged statutory provision is contrary to the principle of non-refoulement, as one of the fundamental principles of the Geneva Convention. In their opinion, eventual unclarities and contradictions in the statements of the applicant cannot entail an admissible reason for the competent authority to not be obliged to take into consideration the information on the country of origin.

12. The principle of the non-refoulement of persons to countries where they may face a certain danger, persecution, or where their life, personal integrity, or freedom is endangered in some other manner is a generally recognised international principle.<sup>1</sup> The obligation to respect this principle follows from the first paragraph of Article 33 of the Geneva Convention and the first paragraph of Article 3 of the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (Official Gazette RS, No. 24/93, MP, No. 7/93 – hereinafter referred to as the Convention against Torture).<sup>2</sup> Substantively, this obligation also follows from Article 3 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR), which prohibits torture and inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment. When assessing asylum cases from the viewpoint of Article 3 of the ECHR, the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR) has formed the position that the extradition of an individual to another state is prohibited when there exist weighty reasons that justify the conclusion that there exists a real threat that the person at issue will be subjected to torture, inhuman or degrading treatment, or punishment.<sup>3</sup> The first paragraph of Article 21 of the Qualification Directive determines that Member States shall respect the principle of non-refoulement in accordance with their international obligations.
13. In Decision No. Up-78/00, dated 29 June 2000 (Official Gazette RS, No. 66/2000, and OdlUS IX, 295), the Constitutional Court defined the fundamental starting points that must be taken into consideration when deciding on asylum and the extradition of individuals to another state or their expulsion. It included the assessment of the circumstances related to the principle of non-refoulement under Article 18 of the Constitution (the prohibition of torture). In conformity with the established standpoint of the Constitutional Court, this Article prohibits that a person with regard to whom there exists a realistic threat that in the event of his or her return to the country of origin he or she would be subjected to inhuman treatment is extradited to that state or expelled thereto. When adopting such standpoint, the Constitutional Court

---

1 S. Rakočević, Nekatera pravna vprašanja glede priznavanja statusa begunca in načelo nevračanja (non-refoulement) [Some Legal Questions Regarding Granting Refugee Status and the Principle of Non-Refoulement], Pravnik, Vol. 55, Nos. 6–8 (2000), p. 468.

2 In conformity with the first paragraph of Article 33 of the Geneva Convention, it is prohibited to expel or return (“refouler”) by force a refugee to the frontiers of territories where his life or freedom would be threatened on account of his race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion. Also the first paragraph of Article 3 of the Convention against Torture expressly prohibits expelling, returning (“refouler”) or extraditing a person to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture. In conformity with the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Convention against Torture, all relevant considerations including the existence in the State concerned of a consistent pattern of gross, flagrant or mass violations of human rights, are in such context taken into account.

3 Cf. the judgments of the ECtHR in Soering v. the United Kingdom (judgment dated 7 July 1989), Vilvarajah and Others v. the United Kingdom (judgment dated 30 October 1991), Ahmed v. Austria (judgment dated 17 December 1996), Salah Sheekh v. the Netherlands (judgment dated 11 January 2007), and Saadi v. Italy (judgment dated 28 February 2008).

also relied on the standpoints of the ECtHR with regard to the content of Article 3 of the ECHR. Due to the fact that the final dismissal of an application for international protection entails that the applicant can be removed by force to the state from which he or she came, the dismissal of an application for international protection must also include, according to the position of the Constitutional Court, an assessment that such removal by force will not cause his or her life or freedom to be jeopardised and that the applicant will not be subjected to torture, inhuman and degrading treatment, or punishment in that state.<sup>4</sup> Furthermore, in the constitutional case law the position was adopted that also the right determined by Article 18 of the Constitution is of an absolute nature, meaning that it cannot be limited even on the basis of the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution.<sup>5</sup>

14. The requirements that follow from the mentioned international legal instruments and Article 18 of the Constitution are binding on the legislature when it regulates the procedure for granting international protection. The procedure for the consideration of applications for international protection must be conceived in such a manner that the applicants are ensured respect for the guarantees determined by Article 18 of the Constitution. This includes, in particular, the possibility to assess all the circumstances that could have an influence on the assessment of the competent authority that the return of the applicant to his or her country of origin will not cause his or her life or freedom to be jeopardised or that he or she will be exposed to torture or inhuman and degrading treatment. With regard thereto, it must be assessed whether the challenged statutory provision that allows the competent authority to disregard information regarding the country of origin if it establishes the general non-credibility of the applicant interferes with Article 18 of the Constitution.
15. The challenged third (previously the fourth) paragraph of Article 22 of the IPA is placed in Chapter III of the IPA, which regulates the assessment of the conditions for international protection. In Article 21 of this Act, the legislature determined the duties of the applicant with regard to the substantiation of the application (the so-called subjective element), and in Article 22 it determined the verification procedure to be carried out by the competent authority (the so-called objective element). Consideration of an application for international protection is carried out by taking into consideration two fundamental elements: the subjective element, in the framework of which the applicant must state all the facts and circumstances that justify his or her fear of persecution or serious harm, and present all the documents and all available evidence by which he or she substantiates his or her application; and the objective element, in the framework of which the competent authority verifies the statements of the applicant from the viewpoint of objective facts and information on the country of origin.<sup>6</sup> For instances where the applicants cannot present any evidence

4 Cf. Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-238/06, dated 7 December 2006 (Official Gazette RS, No. 134/06, and OdUS XV, 83), and Decision No. Up-763/09, dated 17 September 2009 (Official Gazette RS, No. 80/09).

5 Cf. Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-238/06, Paragraph 14 of the reasoning.

6 Cf. R. Thomas, Assessing the Credibility of Asylum Claims: EU and UK Approaches Examined, European Journal of Migration and Law, Vol. 8, No. 1 (2006), pp. 79–96. It follows from this article that in the frame-but substantiate their application merely by their statements, the legislature determined, in the third paragraph of Article 21 of the IPA, special assessment conditions.<sup>7</sup>

16. The regulation in the IPA is based on the principle in conformity with which the applicant must substantiate an application for international protection.<sup>8</sup> From the constitutional viewpoint, the duty of the applicant to cooperate when substantiating the application is in itself not disputable. However, if the guarantees determined by Article 18 of the Constitution are to in fact be ensured, the applicant must not be given too heavy a burden as regards proving his or her endangerment. It follows from Constitutional Decision No. Up-78/00 that by the nature of the matter it is the affected person who must allege that there exist circumstances entailing his or her endangerment. In the procedure, the competent authority must assess (1) whether the circumstances due to which the affected person is requesting international protection are such that he or she can feel endangered and (2) whether such fear is objectively justified. When assessing the existence of the first element, the competent authority must take into consideration the allegations of the affected person in their entirety, as well as possible other evidence, and carry out a reliable assessment of the credibility of these allegations. The assessment of the existence of the second element must include an assessment of the situation in the country to which the applicant would have to return in the event of a decision of dismissal.<sup>9</sup> From the constitutional case law there also follows the standpoint that the competent authority can take into consideration, as one of the assessment conditions, the general credibility of the work of the subjective element, the existence of the applicant's subjective fear of persecution is established, whereas in the framework of the objective element, it is verified whether there exist reasonable grounds for the conclusion that the applicant's subjective fear is objectively justified.

---

- 7 On the basis of the third paragraph of Article 21 of the IPA, in its assessment the competent authority takes into consideration the following conditions:
- that the applicant made his or her best effort to substantiate his or her application;
  - that the applicant presented reasonable grounds why he or she was unable to submit evidence;
  - that his or her statements are coherent and probable and do not contradict available general information related to his or her case;
  - that he or she applied for international protection as soon as possible, unless he or she can present reasonable grounds why he or she did not do so;
  - that his or her general credibility was established.
- 8 In the IPA, the Republic of Slovenia adopted the possibility that the first sentence of the first paragraph of Article 4 of the Qualification Directive offers to Member States, namely that they may consider it the duty of the applicant to submit as soon as possible all elements needed to substantiate the application for international protection (i.e. the duty to substantiate the application for international protection). For Member States that apply this principle, also the application of the fifth paragraph of Article 4 of the Qualification Directive is obligatory. The legislature transposed this provision of the Qualification Directive into the third paragraph of Article 21 of the IPA. For more details on the content of Article 4 of the Qualification Directive, see K. Hailbronner (Ed.), EU Immigration and Asylum Law, Commentary on EU Regulations and Directives, Verlag C. H. Beck oHG, München 2010, p. 1024 et seq.
- 9 Cf. Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-78/00.

applicant.<sup>10</sup> The competent authority must, in each individual procedure in which it decides on an application for international protection, give substance to this indefinite legal term by applying methods of interpretation and then determine whether in the case at issue there exist circumstances that correspond to the mentioned term. The establishment of general credibility must always be the result of a comprehensive assessment of the statements and actions of the applicant before and during the procedure for acquiring international protection.<sup>11</sup>

17. Similar requirements follow from the standpoints of the ECtHR adopted in the framework of Article 3 of the ECHR. Also the ECtHR underlines that an applicant is obliged to provide to the greatest possible extent the documentation and information that allow the competent national authorities, as well as the [competent] court, to estimate the risk to which the applicant would be exposed if removed to his or her country of origin.<sup>12</sup> If necessary, the ECtHR also acquires individual pieces of data by itself (proprio motu). In each individual case, the ECtHR focuses on an assessment of the predictable consequences in the event the applicant is returned to his or her country of origin, namely both from the viewpoint of the general situation in his or her country of origin and from the viewpoint of the personal circumstances of the applicant. The responsibility of contracting states in the framework of Article 3 of the ECHR is to ensure that the individual is not exposed to torture or inhuman and degrading treatment. Therefore, the existence of risk is primarily assessed with regard to the facts that were known or should have been known to the contracting state during the time of expulsion or extradition of the applicant.<sup>13</sup> Also important for the ECHR is recent information on the situation in the state during the time when the court is adopting its decision, which is [i.e. the information] gathered after the national authorities have adopted their final decision.<sup>14</sup> As a general rule, the ECtHR draws this information from the reports of international organisations on the general situ-

10 Cf. Decisions of the Constitutional Court No. Up-1970/08, dated 2 April 2009 (Official Gazette RS, No. 36/09), and No. Up-2012/08, dated 5 March 2009 (Official Gazette RS, No. 22/09).

11 See also R. Thomas, op. cit., p. 81. The author defines three fundamental criteria for assessing the credibility of the applicant:

- (1) internal inconsistencies in the narrative of the applicant established either within the same interview or written statement or when comparing the applicant's statements in different phases of the procedure, or when comparing the statements of two or more applicants connected by common circumstances;
- (2) external inconsistencies established when comparing the applicant's statements with objective information on the situation in [his or her] country of origin;
- (3) the criterion of the probability of the events such as described by the applicant.

The author underlines that the authority that decides in asylum cases is in a specific position, as only the testimony of the applicant is available to it, which the authority can only verify in such manner that it compares it with objective data on the situation in the [applicant's] country of origin (as opposed to, e.g., in civil procedure, where each party presents its own perspective on the same events and, after the procedure for taking evidence has been carried out, the court decides in favour of one party or the other).

12 Cf. Judgment of the ECtHR in Said v. the Netherlands, dated 5 July 2005.

13 Cf. Judgment of the ECtHR in Vilvarajah and Others v. the United Kingdom, Para. 107 of the reasoning.

14 Cf. Judgment of the ECtHR in Chahal v. the United Kingdom, dated 15 November 1996.

ation in the state to which the applicant is to be extradited. However, the finding that serious violations of human rights do occur in an individual state does not of itself suffice to find for the applicant [before the ECtHR]. Namely, the ECtHR each time assesses whether the personal situation of the applicant is such that his or her extradition to the state of origin would be contrary to Article 3 of the ECHR. In doing so, it also assesses the general credibility of the statements of the applicant that have been given to national authorities and in the procedure before the ECtHR.<sup>15</sup> According to the ECtHR, due to the specific position in which applicants often find themselves, the principle that must be respected is that when in doubt, the decision must be in favour of the applicant. However, the applicant must provide, in the event that with regard to the available information there exists a serious doubt concerning the credibility of his or her statements, a satisfactory interpretation as to the established inconsistencies.<sup>16</sup>

18. What was stated above demonstrates that, with regard to the requirements that follow from Article 18 of the Constitution and international instruments, it is not possible, in the procedure for the consideration of applications for international protection, to avoid an assessment of the circumstances that are important from the viewpoint of respect for the principle of non-refoulement. The statements of the applicant with regard to the threat that in the event of his or her return to his or her country of origin he or she would be exposed to torture or inhuman and degrading treatment can only be assessed, by the nature of the matter, in such a manner that the competent authority also includes in its assessment information on the situation in the state to which the applicant would have to return in the event of a decision of dismissal. The scope of establishing these facts and information depends primarily on the allegations and statements of the applicant with regard to his or her subjective endangerment. Nonetheless, the competent authority must also by itself collect all the necessary data and is not limited only to [consideration of] the applicant's allegations or submitted evidence.<sup>17</sup> In the assessment of the Constitutional Court, the legislature interfered with the right determined by Article 18 of the Constitution by allowing the competent authority to disregard information on the country of origin if the general credibility of the applicant is not established. In the assessment of the Constitutional Court, the challenged statutory provision allows the competent authority to dismiss an application for international protection without taking into consideration all the circumstances that could have an influence on the assessment of whether there exist weighty reasons that substantiate the conclusion that there exists a real threat that in the event of the forced removal of the applicant, [the applicant's right determined by] Article 18 of the Constitution would be violated. Taking into consideration the standpoint that the right determined by Article 18 of the Constitution is of an absolute nature, meaning that it cannot be limited even on the basis of the third paragraph of Article

---

15 Cf. order of the ECtHR in Nasimi v. Sweden, dated 16 March 2004.

16 Cf. orders of the ECtHR in Collins and Akaziebie v. Sweden, dated 8 March 2007, Nasimi v. Sweden, and S. M. v. Sweden, dated 10 February 2009.

17 Cf. Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-763/09, Paragraph 6 of the reasoning.

15 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court assesses that the mentioned interference is not admissible. For such reason, the Constitutional Court abrogated the third paragraph of Article 22 of the IPA (point 1 of the operative provisions).

B – II

The decision on the constitutional complaint

19. Due to the fact that the challenged Supreme Court Decision is based on a provision of the IPA which the Constitutional Court assessed is not in conformity with Article 18 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court also granted the constitutional complaint, abrogated the challenged Judgment and remanded the case to the Supreme Court for new adjudication (point 2 of the operative provisions). In the new proceedings, the Supreme Court will not be allowed to base its decision on the abrogated statutory provision.<sup>18</sup>
20. Since the Constitutional Court abrogated the challenged Judgment already due to a violation of Article 18 of the Constitution, it did not address the other alleged violations of human rights.

B – III

The petition to initiate proceedings for a review of the constitutionality of the fifth indent of the third paragraph of Article 21 and Article 26 of the IPA

21. By Order No. U-I-55/09, Up-257/09, dated 26 January 2011 (Official Gazette RS, No. 14/11), the Constitutional Court substantiated what a petition for the initiation of proceedings for a review of the constitutionality of a law or another regulation must include.
22. Since in the part where the review of the constitutionality of the fifth indent of the third paragraph of Article 21 of the IPA is proposed the petition does not fulfil the mentioned statutory conditions, the Constitutional Court rejected it (point 3 of the operative provisions) without requesting that the complainants complete it.
23. Due to the fact that the complainants' applications for international protection were not dismissed on the basis of an assessment of the circumstances determined by Article 26 of the IPA, which determines the characteristics of acts of persecution, the complainants do not have legal interest to initiate proceedings for a review of the constitutionality of this statutory provision. Therefore, the Constitutional Court also in this part rejected their petition (point 3 of the operative provisions).
24. The Constitutional Court did not deem the supplement to the petition filed by the complainants on 23 February 2010 to be a petition for the initiation of proceedings for a review of the constitutionality of the entire third paragraph of Article 21 of the IPA. If the Constitutional Court had assessed that this was necessary for [the adoption of] the decision on the constitutional complaint, it could have initiated proceedings for a review of the constitutionality of this statutory provision by itself on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 59 of the CCA.

<sup>18</sup> In conformity with the first paragraph of Article 99 of the IPA-B, procedures initiated in conformity with the International Protection Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 111/07 and 58/09) are to be continued and concluded in conformity with the provisions of this Act.

C

25. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of Article 43, the first paragraph of Article 59, and the third paragraph of Article 25 of the CCA, composed of: Dr Ernest Petrič, President, and Judges Dr Mitja Deisinger, Dr Dunja Jadek Penssa, Mag. Marta Klampfer, Dr Etelka Korpič – Horvat, Jasna Pogačar, Mag. Jadranka Sovdat, and Jan Zobec. The decision was reached by seven votes against one. Judge Klampfer voted against. Judge Jadek Penssa submitted a concurring opinion.

Dr Ernest Petrič
President

---

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE DR DUNJA JADEK PENSA

In this concurring opinion, I wish to state the reasons [substantiating]

- (1) that the Constitutional Court did not overlook that from the second paragraph of Article 1 of the International Protection Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 11/11 – official consolidated text, hereinafter referred to as the IPA) there follows the finding that this Act is in conformity with multiple directives;
  - (2) why this finding, however, is not true insofar as it refers to the abrogated third paragraph of Article 22 of the IPA; and
  - (3) that, therefore, the need for reflection on the effect of the third paragraph of Article 3a of the Constitution was not expressed before the review of the (un) constitutionality of this latter provision of the IPA.
1. A directive is binding, as to the result to be achieved, upon each Member State to which it is addressed (the third paragraph of Article 288 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, OJ C 83, 30 March 2010 – consolidated version – hereinafter referred to as the TFEU). The same provision of the TFEU leaves to the national authorities the choice of form and methods for the transposition of directives. In such respect, it is clear (i) that the transposition of a directive into a national legal order with regard to the pursued objective must be carried out in conformity with mandatory regulations in generally binding acts, (ii) [namely] in a manner that will enable, in the European Union (hereinafter referred to as the EU), the harmonisation of a certain segment of the legal order. These two requirements are necessary prerequisites for the construction of a coherent EU legal order in Member States introduced by a certain directive.
  2. In individual cases, the foundation for the implementation and interpretation of (e.g.) laws by which a Member State fulfils its duty to transpose a directive into its national legal order is the concrete wording of these laws. Any corrections to the wording of directives during their transposition entails a basis for a different understanding and thus for the threat that the objectives pursued by the directive that were the exact purpose of harmonisation will not be achieved.<sup>1</sup> This holds true,

---

1 This was also one of the main arguments expressed in the British House of Lords when the British law on mutatis mutandis, (i) for the adding of text on the theme of the content comprised by the objectives of the directive and (ii) for the use of legal terms from the transposed directive in the text added in such manner.

3. In this context, it should also be underlined that the transposition of directives into the legal order of Member States brings with it a new (broader) legal context and thus a new legal framework of our thinking. Seeking the true (legal) content of the words and legal terms defined thereby in such laws thus always requires that they be placed within the EU legal space. Due to the fact that also when interpreting such laws the true (legal) meaning of words by which legal terms are defined is still being ascertained, this is the only manner in which a single (and common) starting point for the application of EU law in all Member States can be ensured. This is a further necessary prerequisite for the uniform application of EU law in all Member States, the interpretation of which lies in the jurisdiction of the Court of Justice of the EU (Article 267 of the TFEU).
4. Such a starting point directs me, when defining the meaning of the term “the general credibility of the applicant”, to proceed from the content of the provision of the fifth paragraph of Article 4 of Council Directive 2004/83/EC (hereinafter referred to as the Qualification Directive), which introduces this phrase; the IPA, on the other hand, by which the Republic of Slovenia fulfilled its duty to transpose this Directive, (can only) also apply this phrase.<sup>2</sup> Therefore, as I understand, in the case at issue, the Qualification Directive is important, and its principal objective was to ensure that Member States shall apply (minimum) common criteria for identifying persons genuinely in need of international protection.<sup>3</sup>
5. From the fifth paragraph of Article 4 of the Qualification Directive there follows a duty of Member States, if they determine that the applicant must substantiate by him- or herself an application for international protection (such approach was also trademarks was being adopted, favouring the highest conformity of the wording of the law with the wording of Directive 89/104/EEC, and which was, at the same time, expressed against otherwise weighty reservations due to unclear definitions of prerequisites for a broadened protection of trademarks with a reputation in this Directive. Taken from Tony Martino, Trademark Dilution, London Press, Oxford 1996, p. 103. The author cites the position of Lord Strathclyde: “I, too, wish to avoid anything in the Bill which would appear contradictory or silly. Therefore, I appreciate the noble Lord’s wish to improve the drafting. Again, at the risk of sounding boring, I do not want to run the risk of changing the meaning of a provision which aims to mean the same in all Member States.”

---

- 2 In other words: In my opinion, the phrase “the general credibility of the applicant” in the IPA cannot be simultaneously attributed two [different] meanings: firstly, the meaning that follows from the context of the Qualification Directive, and secondly, the meaning that we would only seek within the context of national law, regardless of the meaning that it has within the context of the Qualification Directive. If we allowed the possibility that the same phrase can have multiple legal meanings within the same law, this would, as I understand it, on the one hand, lead to severe terminological dilemmas, and on the other, such situation would make a favourable basis for substantive differences in individual states in the field of law comprised by the objectives of the Directive to arise. Therefore, I doubt that such an approach could be acceptable.
- 3 Recital 6 of Directive 2004/83/EC in its entirety reads: “The main objective of this Directive is, on the one hand, to ensure that Member States apply common criteria for the identification of persons genuinely in need of international protection, and, on the other hand, to ensure that a minimum level of benefits is available for these persons in all Member States.”

enacted in the IPA). In such case, Member States must relieve the applicant of this duty if the exhaustively listed conditions in points (a), (b), (c), (d), and (e) are fulfilled.<sup>4</sup> This is the rule of the so-called relaxation of proof.<sup>5</sup>

6. The third paragraph of Article 21 of the IPA is intended to transpose this duty of Member States from the Qualification Directive. In this provision, as in the Qualification Directive, the phrase “the general credibility of the applicant” (only) defines one of the conditions for the application of the rule on the relaxation of proof. It logically follows therefrom
  - (1) that the (concrete) assessment of the general credibility of an applicant for international protection is only one of the bases for the application of the rule on the relaxation of proof,
  - (2) which is precisely for such reason inevitably incorporated in the content of the third paragraph of Article 21 of the IPA in such manner that it forms, together with the other [bases], a sensible whole.
7. The wording of the abrogated third paragraph of Article 22 of the IPA defined the prerequisite for relieving the competent authority of the duty to verify the statements of the applicant regarding the key reasons for the application for international protection in connection with general and specific information on the situation in the country of origin referred to by the eighth and ninth indents of Article 23 of the IPA. This prerequisite was defined by the phrase that “the general credibility of the applicant is not established.” Due to the use of the phrase “the general credibility of the applicant [...],” such definition is imposed in the context of the third paragraph of Article 21 of the IPA (which is intended to transpose the fifth paragraph of Article 4 of the Qualification Directive; cf. the sixth paragraph of this opinion). Then, the third indent of the third paragraph of Article 21 of the IPA determines the duty of the competent authority (as does point (c) of the fifth paragraph of Article 4 of the Qualification Directive) to assess the conformity and probability of the statements of the applicant on the key reasons for the application in relation to accessible specific and general information on the situation regarding the protection of human rights in the country of origin related to the applicant’s case. In fact, the IPA at one point (in the third indent of the third paragraph of Article 21) determines that the criterion for the assessment of the convincingness of the statements referring to the alleged key reasons for the application is objective (i.e. the accessible general and specific information – cf. the second paragraph of Article 22 of the IPA and the eighth and ninth indents of Article 23 of the IPA). At another point, i.e. in the abrogated third paragraph of Article 22 of the IPA, a different criterion was determined for verifying the statements of the applicant on these key reasons for the application, namely the assessment of the competent authority that “the general credibility of the applicant is not established.” I did not find such a provision in the Qualification Directive.

---

4 K. Hailbronner (Ed.), EU Immigration and Asylum Law, Commentary on EU Regulations and Directives, Verlag C. H. Beck oHG, München 2010, p. 1031.

5 Ibidem.

8. It is clear that the abrogated provision of the IPA defined the standard for determining which persons need international protection in a manner that was not more favourable for the applicants. Therefore, as I understand it, the legislature did not have an authorisation in either recital 8 or Article 3 of the Qualification Directive to choose such definition.<sup>6</sup>
9. To conclude: In my conviction, the abrogated third paragraph of Article 22 of the IPA was neither taken from the Qualification Directive nor was there a basis for such in those provisions of the mentioned Directive that leave the choice of more favourable standards to Member States. As I understand it, the finding of the legislature in the second paragraph of Article 1 of the IPA that this Act is in this part in conformity with the Qualification Directive was therefore erroneous.

Dr Dunja Jadek Pensa

---

6 “It is in the very nature of minimum standards that Member States should have the power to introduce or maintain more favourable provisions for third country nationals [...] where such a request is understood to be on the grounds that the person concerned is either a refugee within the meaning of Article 1(A) of the Geneva Convention, or a person who otherwise needs international protection.” Taken from recital 8 of the Qualification Directive. The possibility to introduce or retain more favourable standards for determining who qualifies as a refugee or as a person eligible for subsidiary protection, and for determining the content of international protection, in so far as those standards are compatible with the Qualification Directive is also expressly given to Member States in Article 3.

Decision No. Up-75/95, dated 7 July 1995

DECISION

At a session held on 7 July 1995 in proceedings to decide upon the constitutional complaint of A. A., represented by attorney B. B., the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. Ljubljana Higher Court Order No. Kp 425/95, dated 23 May 1995, and Ljubljana District Court Order No. Ks 532/95, dated 12 May 1995, are abrogated.
2. The case is remanded for new adjudication to the Ljubljana District Court, which has to decide within 48 hours.

Reasoning

A

1. The complainant challenges the Ljubljana Higher Court Order by which the Higher Court dismissed the appeal against the Order of the court of first instance. By that Order, the three-judge panel for pre-trial appeals extended the duration of the detention of the complainant, which was imposed on 17 May 1994 due to the risk of recidivism. On the basis of an indictment for the continuous criminal offence of grand theft determined by the third paragraph of Article 212 of the Penal Code of the Republic of Slovenia (Official Gazette RS, No. 63/94, hereinafter referred to as the PC), a [criminal] procedure is pending against the complainant. The complainant is of the opinion that the extension of his detention entails a violation of his right with regard to the imposition and duration of detention determined by Article 20 of the Constitution and of his right with regard to the duration of detention determined by Article 5 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, MP, No. 7/94, hereinafter referred to as the ECHR).
2. In the complainant's opinion, the imposition of detention due to the risk of recidivism presupposes that he is guilty of a future [criminal] offence, which allegedly violates his right to the presumption of innocence determined by Article 27 of the Constitution. The court's substantiation that due to the scope and gravity of the criminal offences there exists the risk of recidivism is allegedly not a sufficient reason for imposing the detention. Both courts allegedly unjustifiably refused to take into consideration the circumstances that the complainant allegedly had the possibility to obtain employment, that his mother was allegedly willing to support him, and that allegedly all the members of the gang to which the applicant belonged were in detention, due to which it is allegedly not possible to substantiate the risk of recidivism with the fact that the defendants in the criminal procedure collaborated. The complainant is also of the opinion that with regard to the constitutional requirement that the imposition of detention must be absolutely necessary for reasons of public safety, the risk of recidivism cannot exist merely due to a criminal offence against property.

3. The complainant is of the opinion that the Constitutional Court has the jurisdiction to assess, with regard to the provision of Article 5 of the ECHR, which determines the [right to a] trial within a reasonable time, and the second paragraph of Article 200 of the Criminal Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 63/94, hereinafter referred to as the CrPA), which determines that detention may only last the shortest possible time, whether the length of the detention in the applicant's case is still reasonable, because he has already been detained for more than one year. The complainant is of the opinion that, regardless of the gravity of the criminal offence due to which the procedure against him is pending and regardless of the complexity of the procedure, the period of time that he has thus far spent in detention is too long and disproportionate to the gravity and nature of the criminal offence, because it could already be compared with the average length of sentences imposed by courts for such criminal offences.
4. The complainant has at the same time also filed a petition for the review of the constitutionality of Article 201 of the CrPA, on which the Constitutional Court will decide in separate proceedings.
5. The complainant proposes that the Constitutional Court release him from detention.
6. By the challenged Order, the Ljubljana District Court extended the detention of the complainant and his co-defendant with the substantiation that the extent and the gravity of the criminal offences alleged by the indictment, as well as the manner of their perpetration, indicate a danger that the complainant and his co-defendant might commit criminal offences again if released. This is allegedly justified by the fact that the complainant allegedly committed the criminal offence of grand theft in collaboration with other defendants in a relatively short period of time, that the defendants constituted an organised gang that engaged in comprehensive and carefully planned criminal activities, and that the defendants demonstrate a higher degree of readiness and determination to commit criminal offences.
7. By the challenged Order, the Ljubljana Higher Court dismissed as unfounded the appeal filed by the defence counsel of the complainant against the Order of the court of first instance. In the reasoning it stated that the court of first instance correctly established that in the complainant's case there exist grounds for detention, namely the risk of recidivism, because the extent and the gravity of the criminal offences (a continuous criminal offence of theft consisting of nine criminal offences) that the complainant allegedly committed in a short period of time are already by themselves such as to justify the fear that the complainant, when released, might commit further criminal offences. The Higher Court is of the opinion that the statements in the complaint that criminal procedures are pending against all of the alleged criminal offenders and that therefore there is no danger that the gang might recommence its [illegal] activities, are irrelevant, because the risk of recidivism is based on the facts and circumstances from the defendant's past that are [being examined] in this criminal procedure. The Higher Court states another circumstance, namely that the complainant was convicted finally of the criminal offence of theft for having taken possession of the licence plates of someone else's car in 1992. According to the appellate court, the possibility of employment gives no guarantee that the complainant could not possibly continue to commit criminal offences if released, neither is the circumstance that his mother is willing to support him a novelty, because allegedly he was also living with his mother at the time when he allegedly committed the criminal offences with which he is charged.

B – I

8. At a session held on 15 June 1995, the Constitutional Court accepted the constitutional complaint for consideration.
9. The Constitutional Court examined the criminal case file of the Ljubljana District Court No. K 686/95.

B – II

10. The second paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution determines that no one may be deprived of his liberty except in such cases and pursuant to such procedures as are provided by law. The first paragraph of Article 20 determines that a person reasonably suspected of having committed a criminal offence may be detained only on the basis of a court order when this is absolutely necessary for the course of criminal proceedings or for reasons of public safety. In accordance with the provision of the second paragraph of Article 20, detention may last only as long as there are legal grounds for such (the Constitution itself, then, requires further statutory specification of the two constitutional reasons determined by the first paragraph of Article 20).
11. The most important provisions relevant to the case at issue that are determined by the statutory regulation of detention, i.e. in the CrPA, are the following: Article 192 (types of measures, the principle of leniency), Articles 196–199 (provisions on bail as one of such measures), Article 200 (principal and introductory provisions on detention), the second paragraph of Article 201 (grounds for detention), especially point 3, in conformity with which detention may be imposed on a person for which there exists a reasonable suspicion that he or she has committed a criminal offence “if special circumstances justify the fear that the person might again commit a criminal offence, complete an attempted criminal offence, or commit the criminal offence he or she threatens to commit,” and the second paragraph of Article 202, which determines, inter alia, that an order of detention must also include “a short reasoning in which the grounds for detention are specifically substantiated.”

12. Since due to the complexity of the issue the Constitutional Court will assess the complainant's petition for the review of the constitutionality of Article 201 of the CrPA at a later date, in the case at issue it was necessary to assess whether the challenged Orders violated the complainant's constitutional rights, although they were issued on the basis of a statutory regulation that the complainant considers to be inconsistent with the Constitution. Since the Constitutional Court established that his rights had been violated and that the challenged Orders therefore had to be abrogated, it was possible and reasonable to decide on the constitutional complaint before a decision regarding the constitutionality of the statutory basis [of these two Orders] is adopted.
13. Pursuant to the provision of the first paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, human rights and fundamental freedoms (hereinafter jointly referred to as constitutional rights) are exercised directly on the basis of the Constitution, whereas judges are, in conformity with the provision determined by Article 125 of the Constitution, bound by the Constitution and laws. The cited provision of Article 15 does not relieve judges from being bound by laws in conformity with Article 125 and must be interpreted in the context of Article 15 as a whole, whose second paragraph provides for the possibility of the statutory regulation of the manner of the exercise of constitutional rights, while the third paragraph provides for the possibility of their (statutory) limitation, and the fourth paragraph ensures their judicial protection and the right to have the consequences of their violation remedied, all of which is, of course, also regulated by law. Already in such context, the provision of the first paragraph must be understood in the sense that, on the one hand, the exercise of certain constitutional rights does not require statutory regulation of the manner of their exercise and that, on the other hand, also where such statutory regulation may in fact be admissible and possibly even necessary, its absence or inconsistency with the Constitution does not prevent, as a general rule, that constitutional rights would in such case be exercised directly on the basis of the Constitution. However, where the manner of the exercise, possible limitations, and the judicial protection of these rights are also regulated by law, the judiciary is also bound, in accordance with both Article 15 and Article 125 of the Constitution, by the statutory regulation of these issues. If a judge considers a law that he or she is to apply to be unconstitutional, he or she must, in conformity with Article 156 of the Constitution, stay the proceedings and request a review of the constitutionality of the law in question before the Constitutional Court. This constitutional provision also binds the courts to respect laws until they are abrogated and prevents them from adopting decisions that circumvent laws or that are in conflict with them. Any other interpretation of the first paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution would also be inconsistent with the constitutional principle of the separation of powers, because it would lead to a situation where the judiciary would not be obliged, in its decision-making, to abide by the laws that the legislative power adopted while exercising its constitutional tasks determined by Article 15 of the Constitution. The only exception in this context is the above-mentioned Article 156 of the Constitution, which determines that courts are not bound to apply an allegedly unconstitutional law until the Constitutional Court decides on its constitutionality.

14. If a deficient or possibly even partly unconstitutional statutory regulation does not prevent courts from nonetheless ensuring, in concrete cases, judicial protection of the allegedly infringed constitutional rights of the affected persons, they are obliged to ensure it in spite of the deficiency. The protection of human rights is namely a fundamental obligation of a state governed by the rule of law; also Article 5 of the Constitution binds the state, i.e. all three branches of power, including the judiciary, to protect constitutional rights.
15. The statutory regulation of detention due to the risk of recidivism, which is the disputable question in the case at issue, is deficient in several points and aspects. The constitutional regulation that also allows detention in cases where this is “absolutely necessary for [...] public safety,” thereby also allows detention due to a so-called risk of recidivism, whereby the law should allow a more reliable implementation of this constitutional provision and the necessary legal certainty by providing courts with clearer criteria for assessing the question of when exactly detention is absolutely necessary to ensure public safety (namely whether public safety can only be jeopardised by criminal offences against life and body or also by, e.g., thefts). Since the law does not regulate this question, but states that only the fear that a person might again commit (any) criminal offence is sufficient grounds for detention, this entails the first issue that the Constitutional Court had to resolve while examining the constitutional complaint at issue, i.e. whether the potential repetition of the criminal offence of grand theft could possibly jeopardise public safety, so that the imposition of detention would be admissible due to the danger of the repetition of such criminal offence. The next question that is raised (if the first question is answered in the affirmative) is to what degree and in what manner such danger must be demonstrated in order to justify the imposition of detention. Also in this respect the law itself does not provide courts with sufficiently clear and useful criteria, because it only requires that “special circumstances” that “justify the fear that a person might again commit the criminal offence” be established; where the statutory regulation is so incomplete, the case law should by all means also directly rely on the constitutional provision that allows detention only in cases where this is “absolutely necessary” to ensure public safety (i.e. when such aim cannot be achieved by any other means and by any other milder measure than that of the deprivation of the suspect’s freedom).
16. The question of whether the above-mentioned deficiencies also entail the unconstitutionality of such statutory regulation is, as already mentioned, an issue on which the Constitutional Court will decide separately due to its complexity. However, regardless of the outcome of that assessment, it was possible to establish beforehand that in the constitutional complaint case at issue the complainant’s constitutional rights were violated despite the fact that courts are bound by the statutory provisions in force, due to which it was necessary to abrogate both challenged Orders on detention and remand the case to the competent court for new adjudication.
17. In doing so, the Constitutional Court did not assess whether the detention had been imposed and extended until the challenged Orders were issued in a manner that entailed a violation of the complainant’s constitutional rights, but it only concentrated on the assessment of the two challenged Orders.

B – III

18. The Order of the court of first instance was issued at a time when the main hearing had already been announced, i.e. after the indictment had become final. Unless there existed reasonable suspicion that the complainant had committed a criminal offence, the court should have dismissed, for such reason, the indictment even before the main hearing was announced (point 4 of the first paragraph of Article 277 of the CrPA). Therefore, in this respect, it is not possible to reproach the court for not specifically justifying in the reasoning of the Order on the extension of the detention the existence of such reasonable suspicion, which is something that the Constitutional Court otherwise considers to be an obligatory part of the substantiation when imposing detention prior to the initiation of an investigation. When assessing the order on the extension of detention, the Constitutional Court cannot examine the question of whether or not in the criminal case involving the complainant there exists reasonable suspicion, because this issue was already resolved when the indictment became final. However, such does not entail that in deciding on the extension of detention courts are not obliged to substantiate all the other elements that present the argument that detention is absolutely necessary for public safety and that in the complainant's case there exist clear and precisely expressed circumstances on the basis of which it is possible to infer, with the necessary degree of probability, that there exists the risk that the complainant might again commit the same criminal offence.
19. Since detention is one of the most serious interferences with the constitutionally protected personal liberty of humans, courts are obliged to assess, not only when imposing detention, but whenever they must adopt a decision regarding detention (either upon the proposal of the detainee or ex officio), whether the constitutional and statutory conditions for detention are fulfilled, and if they are, they also must substantiate them appropriately. Due to the fact that detention entails the deprivation of liberty based merely on a certain degree of probability that a person has committed a criminal offence, whereas with regard to detention based on the risk of recidivism even only on the basis of the probability that the person might again commit the same criminal offence if released, the constitutional and statutory provisions regarding detention must be interpreted even more restrictively.
20. The complainant has already been convicted once for the criminal offence of so-called petty theft, which he allegedly committed two years before the criminal offences that are the subject of the indictment. In the present case, however, the indictment charges the complainant with nine criminal offences of car theft. Both the final conviction and the alleged criminal offences exclusively concern so-called criminal offences against property. Criminal offences against property differ with regard to their content; some of them, such as robbery, for example, at the same time also entail a direct assault on an individual's physical integrity, whereas others are such that by themselves they do not entail a direct threat to a person's life, health, or his or her physical integrity; however, for such reason it is still not possible to generalise that they either do pose or do not pose a threat to public safety.

21. The answer to this question first depends on how we interpret the provision determined by the first paragraph of Article 20 of the Constitution, which states that detention is also possible when this is absolutely necessary for reasons of public safety. Although Article 356 of the PC (subversion) uses the term “public safety” in a sense that is obviously limited to the safety of an individual’s physical integrity, it cannot be concluded with certainty that in the Constitution this term is also used in the same sense. Such (a narrow) interpretation of this term could in fact be accounted for by the fact that the fifth paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution (inviolability of dwellings) determines that an official may enter the dwelling of another person without a court order and in the absence of witnesses where this is absolutely necessary (inter alia) “to protect people or property.” The following interpretation might, then, be possible: an interference with the inviolability of a dwelling is also exceptionally constitutionally admissible in order to protect property, whereas detention as a form of interference with personal liberty, i.e. with a more important value than that of the inviolability of a dwelling, is constitutionally admissible only for the purpose of protecting people and not also their property.
22. However, when comparing the mentioned two constitutional provisions it is not possible to overlook a significant difference: Article 36 refers to the “protection” of people and property, whereas Article 20 refers to public “safety”. However, it is probably difficult to speak of public safety if in practice the state only guaranteed people safety from assaults on their life and body, but not also from assaults on their property, especially that property on which their work, making a living, manner of life, etc., depend to an important degree.
23. Although neither of the above two interpretations is completely reliable, the Constitutional Court has decided, in assessing the case at issue, to give priority to the second, i.e. the broader, interpretation. It is otherwise true that, when in doubt, unclear legal norms by which rights are limited must be interpreted in a narrow sense, not in a broad sense, but in the case at issue this constitutional norm, which due to the exceptional admissibility of detention limits the defendant’s right to personal liberty, must at the same time also be understood as a constitutional norm that should ensure respect for the constitutional right of others to safety, which is guaranteed (together with [the right to] personal dignity) by Article 34 of the Constitution. Too narrow an interpretation of the term “public safety” contained in Article 20 of the Constitution could directly cause too narrow an interpretation of the term ‘everyone’s safety’ referred to in Article 34 of the Constitution, where this term is no longer an element of the norm that limits a right, but an element of the norm that ensures it. What is at issue is a collision of two constitutionally protected values in which in conformity with generally recognised rules of the [legal] profession and also in conformity with the generally recognised foreign constitutional case law, including the case law of the European Court of Human Rights, the principle of proportionality must be applied (and which also the Constitutional Court has already applied several times) in order to resolve such collisions.
24. Therefore, from the content of the phrase ‘absolutely necessary for reasons of public safety’ contained in Article 20 of the Constitution it is not possible to exclude in advance criminal offences against property by alleging that public safety cannot be jeopardised at all therewith; however, when deciding on detention due to the risk of recidivism, courts must, while applying the principle of proportionality, weigh whether in a concrete case the threat that the release of a defendant might pose to public safety entails such a significant or grave interference with people's constitutional right to safety as to outweigh an interference with the defendant's right to personal liberty, while it has not yet been proved that he or she actually has committed the criminal offence that he or she is charged with (except if the defendant had already been convicted of such offences before) and when it is also not possible to "predict" with certainty whether he or she would again commit such criminal offences if released. Such principled position naturally entails that the threat that the individual would again commit criminal offences against property (even if such threat is established and substantiated more concretely and convincingly than in the hitherto predominant case law) will not be able, as a general rule, to outweigh interferences with personal liberty, except in cases of graver criminal offences with elements of violence or any other interferences with the most important constitutionally protected values of other people.

25. The application of the principle of proportionality entails that courts must, prior to the imposition of an interference with a constitutional right, assess the following: firstly, whether the concrete interference is actually appropriate for achieving the desired constitutionally admissible aim (this standard first step of the assessment of the admissibility of interferences can be omitted when detention is imposed by the judiciary, because this assessment has already been carried out by the legislature); secondly, whether the interference is necessary ("absolutely necessary") in the sense that the desired aim cannot be achieved in any other manner, i.e. by applying a milder measure (milder than those determined by Article 192 of the CrPA – although probably the only appropriate milder measure available "to ensure the defendant's attendance in court and the successful carrying out of a criminal procedure," and for preventing the risk of recidivism would be bail, at least for certain types of criminal offences); and thirdly, whether the interference is reasonably proportionate to the aim, i.e. that value that is to be protected by the interference, and to the reasonably expected effect of such protection (so-called proportionality in the narrower sense).
26. The preceding paragraph provides a principled answer only to the first part of the question raised in paragraph 15 above, namely to what degree and in what manner the risk of recidivism must be demonstrated in order for the imposition of detention to be justified. With regard to the manner in which this should be established, the corresponding provision of the CrPA only requires the establishment of "special circumstances that justify the fear" that the person in question might again commit his or her criminal offence. The constitutional provision regarding the "absolute necessity" must also be applied when interpreting this statutory provision; when in the case law this provision is applied in such manner that the statement of circumstances that give rise to the mere "fear" of a court that the person in question might again commit his or her criminal offence is sufficient, such application will not, as a general rule, pass the test of the conformity of such judicial decision with constitutionally guaranteed rights. Namely, in order for such interference to be admissible, the Constitution requires judicial establishment of its “absolute necessity”. Therefore, concrete circumstances must be established from which courts can reach a conclusion based on life experience that there truly exists a real danger (and not just a “fear”) that precisely the affected individual might again commit a determined and specific criminal offence (while the question of whether this danger is sufficient in order to justify detention was addressed in the preceding paragraph).

B – IV

27. The substantiation of the courts as to why and how the circumstances stated in the reasoning of the Orders justify the fear (danger) that the complainant might again commit the same criminal offence is not evident from the challenged Orders. The Orders state that what is at issue is an organised and comprehensive criminal activity, which allegedly entails by itself the risk of recidivism. Such statement is general and abstract, unless the court substantiates why precisely with regard to the complainant this implies the risk of recidivism. As is evident from the criminal file, the other complainants have now been released from detention, which entails that the fact that what is at issue is a comprehensive and organised criminal activity that was carried out during a short period of time is not by itself sufficient grounds, because the court fails to substantiate in any manner why granting liberty to this particular complainant would entail a real danger that he would commit new criminal offences. The court of first instance claims that the defendants demonstrate a higher degree of readiness and determination to commit criminal offences, however the existence of this circumstance regarding either the complainant or other defendants is not in any manner substantiated.
28. The circumstance that the complainant alleged in his favour, namely that there is no danger that the gang might recommence its illegal activities, because criminal procedures are pending against all of the alleged criminal offenders, is merely qualified as “completely irrelevant” in the Order of second instance, without such reasoning being explained in any manner. Surely, the situation would be different from the current situation wherein all the criminal offenders are known and where criminal procedures are pending against all of them if, were the complainant to be released from detention, he could join his accomplices who were still unknown to the authorities. When assessing this question, the court [of second instance] should also have taken into consideration that the initiation of a criminal procedure undoubtedly has a certain influence on defendants’ conduct during the time before the hearing, and should have assessed the possible extent of this effect concretely with regard to the complainant.
29. Above all, from the challenged Orders it is not evident whether the courts actually carried out an assessment of whether in the case at issue detention was in fact absolutely necessary for reasons of public safety, i.e. whether the defendant possibly again committing the criminal offence could affect public safety to such an extent that in order to prevent such danger the deprivation of the liberty of the defendant even before a possible final conviction is really absolutely necessary.

30. Neither is it evident from the challenged Orders whether in the case at issue detention was really applied as the last resort, i.e. whether the courts considered the possibility of preventing the potential risk of recidivism with regard to the criminal offence by applying a milder measure, namely appropriate bail.
31. For such reasons, the Constitutional Court reached the conclusion that the competent courts failed to adopt the decision on the extension of detention in accordance with the conditions determined by Article 20 of the Constitution and point 3 of the second paragraph of Article 201 of the CrPA or that this is at least not evident from the challenged Orders. This entails a violation of the complainant's constitutional right determined by Article 25 of the Constitution, which in accordance with the established case law of the Constitutional Court must be interpreted as the right to an effective legal remedy (which is violated if the reasoning does not contain sufficiently precise grounds on which the decision is based); however, whether in the case at issue also the complainant's right to personal liberty was violated by the possibly unjustified extension of detention will only be possible to assess on the basis of the new decision that the competent courts adopt on the basis of this Decision. On the basis of the authorisation determined by the second paragraph of Article 40 of the Constitutional Court Act, and by mutatis mutandis application of the provision determined by the second sentence of the second paragraph of Article 20 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court imposed on the court of first instance a 48-hour time limit to adopt such decision.
32. In the case at issue, the Constitutional Court decided to adopt such decision regarding the manner of the assessment of the question of whether by the hitherto judicial decision-making also the complainant's right to personal liberty was already violated by taking into consideration the fact that due to the deficient statutory regulation courts were [until now] not provided with sufficiently clear criteria in accordance with which they are obliged to assess whether detention is justified or not; these criteria are laid down more clearly only in this Decision. This Decision does not, of course, prejudice further decision-making by the Constitutional Court with regard to resolving constitutional complaints in cases concerning detention.
33. The complainant also alleges that he has been kept in detention for an unreasonably long period of time, whereby his right to a trial within a reasonable time has allegedly been violated. This right is determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution, which provides that a court must decide on charges without undue delay. For cases where the defendant is also detained, the same right is also expressly determined by the third paragraph of Article 5 of the ECHR, in accordance with which everyone is entitled to a trial within a reasonable time or to release pending trial. Since the Constitutional Court established that the challenged Orders must be abrogated due to the reasons stated above, whereby the process of establishing the existence of this additional reason could further delay the decision-making, the Constitutional Court adopted its decision regarding the constitutional complaint at issue without resolving this question.

C

34. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 59 of the Constitutional Court Act, composed of: Dr Tone Jerovšek, President, and Judges Dr Peter Jambreč, Mag. Matevž Krivic, Mag. Janez Snoj, Dr Lovro Šturm, Franc Testen, Dr Lojze Ude, and Dr Boštjan M. Zupančič. The decision was reached unanimously.

Dr Tone Jerovšek
President

Decision No. U-I-18/93, dated 11 April 1996

DECISION

At a session held on 11 April 1996 in proceedings to review constitutionality initiated upon the petitions of Hermej Gobec, Ivo Turnšek and Srečo Seršen, all Ljubljana, Ervin Dokič, Piran, Simon Horvat, Nožice, represented by Miro Senica and Barbara Menart Senica, attorneys in Ljubljana, Darko Zupan, Velenje and Matevž Jenko, Ljubljana, represented by Ervin Dokič, an attorney in Piran, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. The following provisions of the Criminal Procedure Act are abrogated:
  - The first paragraph of Article 201 and the first paragraph of Article 361
  - the part of the second paragraph of Article 202 which reads as follows: “a brief statement specifically explaining the grounds for detention”.
2. Point 3 of the second paragraph of Article 201 of the Criminal Procedure Act and point 2 of the first paragraph of Article 432 of the Criminal Procedure Act are inconsistent with the Constitution.
3. The Criminal Procedure Act is inconsistent with the Constitution insofar as it does not provide any milder measures for the prevention of the risk of recidivism.
4. The provisions of the Criminal Procedure Act governing the decision-making procedure for ordering, extending and releasing an individual from detention are inconsistent with the Constitution.
5. The National Assembly must remedy any established inconsistency with the Constitution within one year.
6. The petition to initiate proceedings to review the constitutionality of points 1 and 2 of the second and third paragraphs of Article 201 of the Criminal Procedure Act is dismissed.

Reasoning

A

1. The petitioners Hermej Gobec, Ivo Turnšek and Srečo Seršen challenge the provision of point 3 of the second paragraph of Article 191 of the Criminal Procedure Act (Of ficial Gazette of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, nos. 4/77, 14/85, 26/86, 57/89 and 3/90 – hereinafter referred to as the CrPA-77).

2. The petitioners state that the reason for detention due to the risk of recidivism as determined in the challenged provision is imprecisely and abstractly defined and, as such, allows the courts to use it frequently, often without any substantiated reasoning. In the opinion of the petitioners, these grounds for detention cannot be based on Article 20 of the Constitution, pursuant to which detention is allowed only on the basis of a court order when this is absolutely necessary for the course of criminal proceedings or for reasons of public safety. Detention due to the risk of recidivism is also allegedly contrary to Article 27 of the Constitution since during preliminary proceedings it assumes guilt for future acts and offences not yet committed. The petitioners point out that detention should be an extraordinary measure, as the personal liberty of detainees is even more restricted than that of persons convicted by way of a final judgment and serving their sentence. They argue that using the risk of recidivism as grounds for detention represents a violation of human rights and fundamental freedoms pursuant to the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution.
3. In an extensive supplement to his petition, Hermej Gobec emphasises that the risk of recidivism is not in any way related to ensuring that criminal proceedings are conducted smoothly. He draws attention to the differences between the continental and Anglo-Saxon systems of criminal law, and makes references to specific cases of detention orders being issued due to the risk of recidivism, which in his opinion point to unlawful judicial practice. The majority of detainees are kept in detention due to the risk of recidivism. The usual justification for a detention order is merely the fact that the defendant has already committed several criminal offences within a short period of time, that the criminal offences are extremely serious, and that the offender is unemployed or with no means of support. He was unable to find a single case where a court justified a detention as required by the first paragraph of Article 20 of the Constitution. As a state governed by the rule of law, Slovenia should protect the individual, even when that individual is in detention. Given its function, the Constitutional Court should enforce this principle and guide the case-law of the ordinary courts accordingly.
4. The petitioner Hermej Gobec maintains that the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, International Agreements, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR) – referring to the provision of point (c) of the first paragraph of Article 5 – only determines the risk of recidivism in relation to arrest, but not detention.
5. All three petitioners propose the challenged provision be abrogated.
6. The petitioner Ervin Dokič challenges the provision of point 3 of the second paragraph of Article 201 of the Criminal Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 63/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CrPA). He maintains that the legal definition, particularly the reference to “special circumstances”, allows for detention orders to be decided upon arbitrarily, which in his opinion is contrary to Article 2 of the Constitution. The challenged provision is allegedly also contrary to point (c) of the first paragraph of Article 5 of the ECHR, pursuant to which detention may be ordered only if it would prevent a criminal offence that is already being prepared, or for which individual preparatory steps have been taken, from being committed. He proposes the abrogation of the challenged provision.

7. The petitioners Simon Horvat and Matevž Jenko submitted petitions that are identical in content. They challenge the provision of Article 201 of the CrPA in its entirety. Pursuant to Article 20 of the Constitution, detention is allegedly only permitted in exceptional circumstances. It should therefore first be established whether detention is absolutely necessary in each case. Therefore the provision of the first paragraph of Article 201 which envisages obligatory detention is allegedly contrary to the Constitution. It is allegedly unclear from the provision of the second paragraph of Article 201 that detention may only be used as a last resort, and only when there are no other means to ensure the smooth conduct of criminal proceedings or for reasons of public safety. The statutory provision allegedly requires only an evaluation of the grounds for detention and not whether the same result could be achieved by granting bail. This, the petitioners claim, is especially the case regarding grounds for detention based on the risk of absconding.
8. The petitioners Horvat and Jenko argue that the most questionable aspect from a constitutional perspective is detention due to the risk of recidivism. The risk of repeating a criminal offence allegedly has no connection with ensuring the proceedings are conducted smoothly; and the only logical connection with ensuring public safety is with those criminal offences that could represent a threat thereto. They claim that the statutory provision allowing a detention order on the grounds of risk of recidivism is contrary to the presumption of innocence determined by Article 27 of the Constitution. They claim that the assumption that a new criminal offence will certainly be committed on the basis of a reasonable suspicion that a criminal offence has already been committed cannot be allowed. By ordering detention due to the risk of recidivism, a court presumes guilt for a future action for which not only has guilt not been established, but the said offence has not even been committed. The petitioners believe that, in a society which embraces the principle of the state governed by the rule of law, liberty should be the rule and the deprivation of a person's liberty only a strictly limited exception. They propose the abrogation of the challenged provisions.
9. The petitioner Darko Zupan challenges the provision of point 3 of the second paragraph of Article 201 of the Criminal Procedure Act. He believes that the Criminal Procedure Act provides for a narrowing of the conditions for detention compared to Article 20 of the Constitution. The contested provision allegedly allows a court to neither evaluate nor state the reasons for the degree of real danger to the public and property that is required for a detention order to be issued. Since it allegedly permits a court to decide on a detention order without taking into consideration the provision of the first paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, the challenged provision is allegedly also contrary to Article 2 of the Constitution. He proposes the abrogation of the challenged provision.
10. In its reply, the National Assembly states that detention represents a profound interference with human rights and fundamental freedoms, that the basic provisions are already determined by the Constitution itself, and that the contested provision merely expands upon Article 20 of the Constitution in more detail. In this case, it argues that the challenged provision does not assume the guilt of the defendant, but that this is merely one of the presumptions made to ensure the smooth conduct of criminal proceedings and appropriate public safety. In the opinion of the National Assembly, the challenged provision of the CrPA-77 is not contrary to Articles 15, 20 and 27 of the Constitution. The National Assembly took the same view in its reply to the Constitutional Court's decision to accept the petitions and commence the proceedings to review the constitutionality of the challenged provision of the CrPA- 77.

B – I

11. With Order No. U-I-18/93, dated 13 July 1993, the Constitutional Court accepted the petitions lodged by Hermej Gobec, Ivo Turnšek and Srečo Seršen and commenced the proceedings to review the constitutionality of point 3 of the second paragraph of Article 191 of the CrPA-77 which, pursuant to the Constitutional Act Implementing the Basic Constitutional Charter on the Independence and Sovereignty of the Republic of Slovenia (Official Gazette RS, No. 1/91-I), was applied mutatis mutandis as a Slovene regulation insofar as it was not contrary to the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia. The Constitutional Court decided to review whether the challenged statutory provision, pursuant to which a court may order the detention of a defendant due to the risk of recidivism, is consistent with Articles 20 and 27 of the Constitution.
12. The CrPA-77 (including the challenged provision) ceased to be in force when the new CrPA entered into force, i.e. on 1 January 1995. Pursuant to Article 47 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), if an act ceases to be in force during the proceedings and the consequences of its unconstitutionality are not remedied, the Constitutional Court shall decide that the challenged provision is not consistent with the Constitution. Even if the Constitutional Court held that the challenged provision of the CrPA-77 was unconstitutional, this would not have had any consequence for the petitioners. Therefore, the Constitutional Court did not rule explicitly on the challenged provision of the CrPA-77. Since the provision of point 3 of the second paragraph of Article 191 of the CrPA-77 is completely identical in terms of substance to the provision of point 3 of the second paragraph of Article 201 of the new CrPA, this reasoning also applies to the challenged provision of the CrPA-77.
13. The petitioners Ervin Dokič, Simon Horvat, Darko Zupan, and Matevž Jenko challenge the provisions of the new CrPA. The Constitutional Court joined all the cases under petition No. U-I-18/93.
14. The petitioner Ervin Dokič did not demonstrate legal interest with regard to the challenged provision of the second paragraph of Article 201 of the CrPA, and the petitioners Simon Horvat and Matevž Jenko did not demonstrate legal interest with regard to the first paragraph, points one and two of the second paragraph, and the third paragraph of the aforementioned CrPA provision.
15. Pursuant to the provisions of Article 24 of the CCA, legal interest must be demonstrated when a petition to initiate proceedings is lodged. Legal interest is deemed to be demonstrated if a review of a regulation has been requested by the petitioner and this directly interferes with his rights, legal interests, or legal position.

16. The petitioner Ervin Dokič demonstrated his legal interest simply by claiming that the challenged provision could be applied to him as a citizen of the Republic of Slovenia. Since its Decision No. U-I-330/94, dated 2 February 1995 (OdlUS IV, 7), the Constitutional Court has repeatedly ruled that in claiming such the petitioner does not demonstrate that there has been direct interference with his rights, legal interests or legal position – and the same holds true for this case.
17. The petitioners Simon Horvat and Matevž Jenko demonstrated their legal interest by the fact that their detention was ordered and extended on the basis of the challenged statutory provision. The Constitutional Court holds that the petitioners were kept in detention on the basis of point 3 of the second paragraph of Article 201 of the CrPA. Therefore they only demonstrate direct interference with their rights or legal position in connection with this provision.
18. In the remaining part, the Constitutional Court accepted the petitions to review the constitutionality of point 3 of the second paragraph of Article 201 of the CrPA and proceeded to decide on the merits of the case on the basis of the fourth paragraph of Article 26 of the CCA.
19. Pursuant to Article 30 of the CCA, and for the reasons described below, the Constitutional Court also decided on the constitutionality of the first paragraph of Article 201 of the CrPA, the first paragraph of Article 361 of the CrPA, point 2 of the first paragraph of Article 432 of the CrPA, and the provisions of the CrPA governing the decision-making process for ordering, extending or being released from detention.

B – II

20. The concept of the state governed by the rule of law as determined in Article 2 of the Constitution contains elements of procedural and substantive law. The rule of law is therefore not only enshrined in the laws of the state – despite trust in the independence and impartiality of the judiciary in principle, it is nevertheless the principle of legality that prevails in criminal procedure and criminal substantive law – but also in its institutions (courts, administration, etc.), and primarily in the manner these institutions actually apply the law in their procedures. Trust in the judiciary, originating from the habeas corpus logic of the first paragraph of Article 20 of the Constitution and described below, does warrant a certain measure of discretion, to which independent, impartial courts that are constituted by law are certainly entitled (Article 23 of the Constitution). However, this increased level of constitutional trust in the judiciary (compared to the executive branch of power), and with it the judicial right to discretionary assessment, is not justified merely by a different personal composition of the judiciary. Pursuant to Article 23 of the Constitution, the right to judicial protection is a result of the legally enshrined, genuine independence and impartiality of the courts.
21. Criminal proceedings are not just a means to enforce substantive criminal law. The provisions of the criminal procedure represent a separate issue concerning the principle of the state governed by the rule of law in that they specify substantive constitutional provisions concerning the constitutional rights of an individual against arbitrary, malicious or similar use of executive and judicial power in the state. In terms of constitutional law, criminal proceedings are regarded as a procedure of substantive importance in the decisions of constitutional courts. The subject of criminal proceedings determined by law are the substantive constitutional rights of the individual.

22. Within the context of criminal proceedings, a state governed by the rule of law does not treat the procedural rights of an individual arbitrarily and is not willing to sacrifice these rights in the interest of the efficient application of substantive criminal law. Substantive criminal law may not be enforced through a violation of human rights, whether this takes the form of torture or an unfounded deprivation of liberty. The price would be too high.
23. By respecting human rights as imposed by the Constitution and with an effective and professional police force, a state governed by the rule of law must strive to enforce the provisions of substantive law. To ignore a violation of the constitutional rights of an individual in the name of the effectiveness of criminal law enforcement therefore runs contrary to the rule of law. Policing by the state must not compromise the constitutionally protected integrity of an individual in order to be effective.
24. The provisions of the Constitution are explicitly restrictive in nature. Therefore, the fundamental value of the Constitution, which must serve as the basis for matters of this nature, is to protect the individual from any interference with his integrity within the context of the criminal proceedings.

B – III

25. The Constitutional Court's decision is based on two key premises, both of which are contained in the second paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution.
26. The Constitution first establishes the general rule that everyone has the right to personal liberty; in the second paragraph of the same article, two general conditions are provided under which this right may be restricted: "No one may be deprived of his liberty except in such cases and pursuant to such procedures as are provided by law."
27. These two premises are described in more detail in subsequent provisions of the Constitution. The first premise, regarding detention, is stipulated in the first paragraph of Article 20 of the Constitution, providing that a person (a) reasonably suspected of having committed a criminal offence may be detained only (b) on the basis of a court order (c) when this is absolutely necessary for the (ca) course of criminal proceedings or for (cb) reasons of public safety.
28. The framework for the second premise represent the provisions of Articles 22 (Equal Protection of Rights), 23 (Right to Judicial Protection), 25 (Right to Legal Remedies), 27 (Presumption of Innocence) and 29 (Legal Guarantees in Criminal Proceedings).
29. The Constitution distinguishes between three types of interference with personal liberty in the context of criminal law, with all three involving interference with the same constitutionally-protected human right to personal liberty.
  - (1) Reference is made in the third paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution to depprivation of liberty (arrest). The concepts of arrest and deprivation of liberty refer to temporary interference by the executive branch of power with the freedom of an individual. Already for an arrest to be constitutionally permissible, the Constitution requires this interference to be made in accordance with a procedure determined by law and in cases determined by law.

- (2) Reference is made in Article 20 of the Constitution to detention as being an extended deprivation of liberty which may only be ordered by the judiciary.
  - (3) Article 28 of the Constitution makes reference to a person being punished, which taking into consideration Articles 17 and 18 means that such a person may be sentenced to a custodial sentence (imprisonment) in the worst case scenario.
30. The most important point is that the general provision of Article 19 of the Constitution, which states that no person may be deprived of his liberty except in cases and pursuant to such procedures as provided by law, clearly refers to arrest, as stated in the following paragraph, and even more so to detention (Article 20) and custodial sentences (Article 28), since in these cases the duration of the interference is even longer.
31. The following is clear from the wording of Article 19. Firstly, it follows from the subtitle "Protection of Personal Liberty" that this article contains a general provision concerning this aspect of the Constitution. Secondly, the first paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution is concise and explicit in stating that: "Everyone has the right to personal liberty". This categorical prescriptive norm is one of the greatest achievements of post-feudal European civilisation. And since, thirdly, Article 17 prohibits the capital punishment and Article 18 prohibits corporal punishment, torture etc., interference with personal liberty is the gravest possible intrusion by the state into the personal integrity of an individual.
32. The second paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution then goes on to set out two key ideas. The first is that "no one may be deprived of his liberty". The Constitution therefore differentiates between freedom and liberty. [Translator's note: In the Slovene language, the Constitution actually differentiates between the two: svoboda (freedom) and prostost (liberty).] No one may be deprived of his freedom; it may only be restricted temporarily through deprivation of liberty. The dependent clause that follows provides in general terms that a person may be deprived of liberty but only if this is foreseeable and determined by substantive and procedural law. The third paragraph of Article 19 then deals with deprivation of liberty, and it follows from the remaining wording and context of Article 19 that this applies to arrest etc. (within the meaning this provision has for the criminal procedure).
33. The general nature of the provision of the second paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution, i.e. that it explicitly refers to every restriction (deprivation) of liberty, be it arrest (the third paragraph of Article 19), detention (Article 20) or a custodial sentence (the first paragraph of Article 28), can be concluded as stated in (a) the subtitle of Article 19 ("Protection of Personal Liberty"), (b) the general nature of the provision of the first paragraph of Article 19 ("Everyone has the right to personal liberty.") and (c) the general wording of the second paragraph of Article 19 itself ("No one may be deprived of his liberty except in such cases and pursuant to such procedures as are provided by law").

34. It follows logically that the provision of the third paragraph of Article 19 (arrest, deprivation of liberty), all of Article 20 (detention) and the provision of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution (custodial sentence) – as special provisions relating to the general nature of the provision of the second paragraph of Article 19 – should be interpreted in the light of the specific prescriptive and categorical requirements of the second paragraph of Article 19.
35. More specifically, this means that every arrest, detention and custodial sentence must be carried out in accordance with the principle of legality (lex certa), and procedural guarantees provided by the Constitution must exist for each of the three types of intrusion into personal liberty that are determined by the Constitution.
36. The Constitution says least about custodial sentences, which is the longest and therefore the most serious interference with the personal liberty. The reason for this, of course, is that all substantive law guarantees are contained in the concept of the “Principle of Legality” (the subtitle of Article 28), and in the exact same expression (“as provided by law”) which the Constitution uses in the general provision of the second paragraph of Article 19.
37. The decisive wording in the Constitution in both cases is that it is provided by law. The Constitution explicitly obliges the legislature not only to regulate every subject of interference with liberty by law, but to do so precisely and unambiguously. Any possibility of a public authority making an arbitrary decision must be excluded. The measures and conditions under which they may be ordered must be foreseeable. Legal certainty (lex certa) is a primary element of the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution) and would apply as an imperative constitutional starting point even if the Constitution did not explicitly refer to it. All the laws are therefore part of a legal system and subordinate to the Constitution, and every constitution is a part of the civilisation order, which is reflected inter alia in international acts.
38. It is therefore logical that the higher the stakes in legal proceedings, the higher level of emphasis must be placed on the requirement of legal certainty, which is a constituent element of lawfulness. Since human liberty (the highest stake) is at issue in criminal proceedings, much emphasis in criminal law is placed on the principle of legal certainty (principle of legality, lex certa). The criminal courts are thus required to interpret the law strictly.
39. In the context of the Slovene Constitution, the principle of legality regarding the state’s right to punish is explicitly determined in Article 28 of the Constitution; Article 19 is even more explicit in its demands for determinability (lex certa) for all those forms of interference with the personal liberty of an individual by the executive branch of power or judiciary even before the presumption of innocence is upended (from Article 27 of the Constitution). If, in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 39 of the Criminal Code of the Republic of Slovenia (Official Gazette RS, No. 63/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CC), the principle of nulla poena sine lege praevia applies for a sentence of, for example, fifteen days, then it is entirely unacceptable from a constitutional perspective that the principle of legality that is at least as strict would not apply to detention which may last sixty times longer, i.e. two and a half years, pursuant to the provision of the second paragraph of Article 20 of the Constitution and the fifth paragraph of Article 207 of the CrPA.

40. With regard to detention, the general nature of the provision of the second paragraph of Article 19 is the reason why Article 20 of the Constitution contains no such explicit legal limitation. If it was not interpreted in the light of the second paragraph of Article 19, it would result in the impossible conclusion that the Constitution intended to regulate the subject of detention by itself and exhaustively in Article 20.
41. That the Constitution had no intention of exhaustively regulating the subject by itself is clear from the third sentence of the second paragraph of the same Article 20, providing: "Detention may last only as long as there are legal reasons for such [...]". The legal reasons must therefore precisely specify that which is stated in the first paragraph of Article 20 of the Constitution.
42. This precision is substantive in nature ("No one may be deprived of his liberty except in such cases as are provided by law.") and procedural in nature ("No one may be deprived of his liberty except pursuant to such procedures as are provided by law."). Neither in respect of the first nor the second does the Constitution differentiate between the various degrees of legal certainty (substantive and procedural) for deprivation of liberty, detention or custodial sentences. The same absolute constitutional requirement of prior definition exists for all three forms of intrusion into personal liberty for cases where a person may be deprived of liberty and that there is a legal determination of the specific procedure following which a person's liberty may be restricted and deprived before the conviction becomes final.

B – IV

43. Since this is an extraordinary and preventive interference with personal liberty, the constitutions of most democratic countries stipulate in great detail the conditions under which such interference is possible at all. The first paragraph of Article 20 of the Slovene Constitution stipulates three conditions under which detention may be ordered:
(1) a court order;
(2) reasonable suspicion; and
(3) absolute necessity for the course of criminal proceedings or for reasons of public safety.
44. The fact that the Constitution specifies that a person may be detained only on the basis of a court order means that an explicit constitutional requirement is laid down that this person be delivered to the judiciary through a temporary restriction of liberty carried out by the executive branch of power after the deprivation of liberty (arrest). This is the Slovene version of an ancient human freedom, originally derived from the English Habeas Corpus Act (ad subjiciendum) from 1679. Only the judiciary has the right to order anything more than just a temporary deprivation of liberty. Accordingly, the Slovene Constitution must be seen as the heir to the values of our civilisation.
45. The emphasis that detention may only be based on a court order shows that this is a case of habeas corpus, as opposed to the third paragraph of Article 19 which refers to a "competent body" in the impersonal (passive) form. Hence it follows, and this is also common in other constitutional systems, that temporary “deprivation of liberty” (deprivation of liberty, arrest) falls within the remit of the executive branch of power.

46. From (1) the differentiation between the constitutional concept of “deprivation of liberty” (third paragraph of Article 19), which is complete and temporary, and the constitutional concept of “detention” (Article 20), which is incomplete and may last longer, and (2) (a) from the provision of the third paragraph of Article 5 of the ECHR, according to which anyone arrested or detained in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 1 (c) of this Article shall be brought promptly before a judge or other officer authorised by law to exercise judicial power, and (b) from Article 23 of the Constitution, pursuant to which anyone deprived of their liberty has the right to have a decision made on the deprivation of liberty “without undue delay” by an independent, impartial court constituted by law, i.e. not the executive branch of power, it follows that anyone deprived of their liberty must be delivered by the executive branch of power to the judiciary “without undue delay”.
47. Consequently, the executive branch of power (the police) must bring the person deprived of liberty, albeit the deprivation being entirely in accordance with the Constitution and the law, promptly (without undue delay) to the judiciary. As to whether the provisions of the CrPA governing the deprivation of liberty itself are consistent with the Constitution is a separate issue which had to be resolved in this case.
48. The second condition for ordering detention is a reasonable suspicion that a certain person has committed a criminal offence. The provision of Article 20 of the Constitution only applies where there is a high probability that a person has committed a specific criminal offence for which decision opening the investigation has already been issued. The assumption that a person will repeat a specific criminal offence may actually only be made on the basis of the constitutionally required and actually established reasonable suspicion that the person in question has already committed such an offence. The “recidivism” can only be inferred from something that has already happened. This is, to the extent to which the Constitution allows such a decision at all, based on an incomplete induction and if it is absolutely necessary for the public safety, then the major premise of this conclusion is restricted at least to the reasonable suspicion that the person did commit a specific criminal offence. It is therefore not the Constitution that gives the court general authorisation to deduce that detention is necessary for public safety, but instead the risk that may result from a reasonable suspicion that a specific criminal offence has already been committed. When ordering detention, the Constitution allows for such danger to the public to be inferred only if the danger is causally connected to a criminal offence which is reasonably suspected to have been committed.
49. The constitutional implication here is that the right of the judiciary to order that such a person be detained originates solely in the reasonable suspicion that he has already committed the criminal offence, i.e. in the probability, demonstrated beforehand, that this person, by allegedly committing a criminal offence, infringed the specific constitutionally-protected interest of a particular subject being protected in case of specific criminal offence. If this was not the case, the ascertainment of the reasonable suspicion that a person has, for example, committed the criminal offence of tax evasion determined by Article 254 of the CC would give the court a blanket right to conclude, for example, that there is a risk that the defendant will commit a criminal offence against life and body, as determined in Chapter XV of the CC. Such conclusion, which goes beyond the constitutionally imposed major premise of reasonable suspicion, would have no constitutional foundation arising from the right of the state to interfere with the right to personal liberty only to the extent to which the defendant infringed a subject protected by the criminal law and if a reasonable suspicion exists for such infringement. The mere ascertainment of a reasonable suspicion that a person has committed a specific criminal offence shall not give full right to the court to order detention due to any danger to the public because the right of the judiciary to assess criminal liability and to order a far more severe interference with personal liberty, i.e. imprisonment, is limited solely to the act which is reasonably suspected to have been committed.

50. This substantive link between the reasonable suspicion for the decision opening the investigation to be issued against the defendant, and the conclusion reached regarding the risk of the defendant repeating or carrying out a criminal offence for which a reasonable suspicion has already been demonstrated, arises from the current provision of point 3 of the second paragraph of Article 201 of the CrPA. The question here is whether this link should also apply to the third concern referred to in this provision, i.e. that the defendant will commit a criminal offence he has threatened to commit. This substantive link will exist every time a perpetrator who is reasonably suspected to have committed a violent criminal offence threatens to carry out the same kind of offence. The current provision of the CrPA describes the natural regression from recidivism to an attempt, and from an attempt to a threat as the precursor to an attempt or the perpetration of the same kind of criminal offence as that for which a reasonable suspicion has already been demonstrated. It is certainly possible for a person charged with a non-violent criminal offence to make a serious threat against a hostile witness. However, such a threat can be dealt with in the context of the risk of obstruction of the proceedings.
51. In addition to the quantitative element of probability, which must first be demonstrated (reasonable suspicion), the Constitution prescribes the qualitative element of a substantive link between the specific criminal offence for which a reasonable suspicion has already been demonstrated and the presumption of an act with which the defendant is allegedly endangering public safety.
52. Article 20 of the Constitution refers to further detention as being “absolutely necessary for the course of (criminal) proceedings or for reasons of public safety”. The expression “course of proceedings” refers mainly to ensuring the presence of the defendant. Since ensuring the presence of the defendant is the first procedural requirement in any legal order and because the first requirement of the legal order is that the parties submit themselves to a legal – and not illegal – solution to the dispute, practically all legal orders regulate the problem of the risk of absconding in one way or another.
53. The part of the provision which refers to “public safety” serves as the foundation for the legislature’s definition of detention due to the risk of recidivism. The Constitutional Court takes the view that the constitutional expression “protection of society” does not refer only to immediate danger to the life and body of an individual. Life and body are at the very centre of the concentric circles forming an individual's privacy, but public safety may also be endangered by an assault on those objects of criminal law protection that protect other broader aspects of their privacy and safety. This does not concern, for example, just theft turned into robbery as a combined assault on property and body, but an act where the object of protection (also) involves an individual, human rights and freedoms, the individual's health or the health of community, and similar. Public safety lacks credibility if, in practice, the state only guarantees protection against assault on life and body but not against assault on other objects that are subject to criminal law protection.

54. This constitutional norm which, by permitting detention as an exception, restricts the right of the defendant to personal liberty must be understood also as a constitutional norm ensuring respect of the constitutional right of others to safety, which (in addition to personal dignity) is guaranteed by Article 34 of the Constitution. Too strict an interpretation of the concept "public safety" determined by Article 20 of the Constitution could result in an excessively strict interpretation of the concept of "everyone's safety" referred to in Article 34 of the Constitution, this term no longer being an element of a norm restricting a right but instead now an element of a norm guaranteeing a right. For instance, offences against property cannot be precluded in advance and in general from the concept of "public safety" on the grounds that they cannot endanger the public safety in any way. On the other hand, this also means that the risk of recidivism for criminal offences against property cannot as a rule outweigh the interference with personal liberty unless the criminal offences are serious and interfere with the most important, constitutionally-protected interests of others.
55. The Constitution provides an additional restriction: detention must be absolutely necessary for reasons of public safety. Article 20 expressly introduces the principle of proportionality into the Constitution, which is also otherwise recognised as a general constitutional principle deriving from the principle of the state governed by the rule of law. As a result, when determining the conditions for ordering detention, the legislature is required to provide the courts with the option, on the one hand, to assess whether intervention is necessary because there are no milder measures available to achieve the desired aim. On the other hand, it imposes upon the legislature the obligation to restrict the possibility of ordering detention for cases where such intervention is reasonably proportionate to the aim, i.e. the interests that are to be protected by such intervention, and with the reasonably anticipated effects thereof.
56. At the declaratory level, the legislature embraced the principle that, when deciding which measures to apply in order to ensure the presence of the defendant and in order to successfully carry out the criminal proceedings, the competent body must abide by the conditions that apply to specific measures and ensure that a measure stricter than necessary is not used if the same purpose may be achieved by applying a milder measure (Article 192 of the CrPA).
57. The legislature did not follow this principle when legally defining these measures. In the chapter entitled "Measures to ensure the presence of the defendant and for the suc-successful conduct of criminal proceedings”, it actually did define several possible measures for the enactment of these procedural requirements, from the mildest (summons) to the most severe (detention), and explicitly provided that specific stricter measures, in addition to the general provision of Article 192, are to be applied in a subsidiary manner if the same aim could not be achieved with the aforementioned milder measures.

58. The chapter referred to also covers the issue of detention due to the risk of recidivism. Systemically, these grounds for detention do not belong to the chapter on measures to ensure the presence of the defendant and for the successful conduct of criminal proceedings. While this erroneous classification of the challenged provision is not unconstitutional in itself, in terms of content it means that the provision of Article 192 of the CrPA is not applicable in relation to this measure because neither this chapter nor any other provision of the CrPA provides the court with any milder measure for the same purpose, i.e. eliminating or reducing the risk of recidivism.
59. The legislature therefore violated the principle of proportionality that requires that, when pursuing a constitutionally permitted aim (in this case, public safety), the legislature chooses measures to interfere with human rights that are based on the proportional criteria of absolute necessity. An assessment made in accordance with the principle of absolute necessity requires that the legislature makes available those alternative measures that are known to legal professionals that are in compliance with the principle of proportionality and suitable for achieving a specific legislative aim. In so doing, it is required to establish whether the desired aim can be achieved by applying milder measures, thereby restricting personal liberty as little as possible. The milder measures that could be used in certain cases to ensure public safety and, at the same time, interfere to the least extent possible with the personal liberty of the defendant, are widely known in theory and enacted in certain other legal orders. These include the obligation to report to the police, a ban on leaving town without the court's permission, a restraining order, supervision and assistance by a body appointed by the court, house arrest and other measures which can reduce the risk of recidivism but at the same time interfere less with the liberty of the defendant than being detained.
60. The legislature did not make any of these measures available to the courts. In terms of public safety, it provided only the measure that interferes the most with the personal liberty of the defendant. In so doing, it violated the principle of proportionality.
61. Furthermore, the CrPA does not give sufficient guarantees that the courts may order (or extend) detention only in cases where the threat to public safety resulting from the release of the defendant would represent such a serious interference with the right to safety that it would outweigh the interference with the right of the defendant to personal liberty, even though it has not yet been proven that he has actually committed the alleged criminal offence nor can it be “predicted” with certainty that he will repeat such an offence once free. Pursuant to the provision of point 3 of the second paragraph of Article 201 of the CrPA, detention may be ordered if special circumstances justify the concern that a specific person will actually repeat a criminal offence, carry out an attempted criminal offence or commit a criminal offence he has threatened to commit. In its decisions on constitutional complaints against detention orders based on the cited provision, the Constitutional Court has already stated that the actual circumstances must be established from which the court may, from experience, draw a conclusion about whether there is a real danger – and not just a concern – that the individual concerned will repeat a specific criminal offence (Decision No. Up-75/95, dated 7 July 1995). In Decision No. Up 123/95, dated 6 October 1995, the Constitutional Court stated that the circumstances and gravity of the alleged criminal offence do not justify such a conclusion in themselves. This conclusion may only be drawn after the personality of the defendant, the environment and the circumstances in which he lives as well as his previous way of living allow a reliable and specific conclusion to be reached as to the existence of the necessary degree of danger. In Decision No. Up 160/95, dated 26 February 1996, the Constitutional Court stressed that in cases in which there is a risk of repeating criminal offences representing a serious danger to public safety (the case at issue involved the sale of explosives), a lower probability threshold that the criminal offence will be repeated is necessary than in cases in which public safety is not so seriously jeopardised.

62. The challenged statutory provision of point 3 of the second paragraph of Article 201 of the CrPA is contrary to the constitutional requirement that cases where detention may be ordered due to the risk of recidivism shall be determined by law (lex certa). Since the Constitution does not prohibit detention due to the risk of recidivism, the Constitutional Court, based on Article 48 of the CCA, established that the challenged provision of the CrPA was unconstitutional and gave the legislature a deadline for this to be remedied. In place of the current formulation, which is not consistent with the Constitution (“special circumstances that justify the concern...”), and in accordance with the Constitution, the legislature will have to require that the courts establish the actual risk of such a criminal offence being repeated and, where there is a real risk that it will be committed, justify in the case in question the interference with the defendant’s personal liberty (in accordance with the principle of proportionality and taking the specific circumstances into account). It will have to precisely specify criminal offences, not merely in terms of the length of the prescribed sentence but also by other criteria, for which it will find that they are of such nature that in an abstract manner they meet the constitutional requirement of danger to public safety – and thereafter the court will have to assess on a case-by-case basis whether, in accordance with the principle of proportionality, such interference is justified. It will be required to stipulate alternative preventive measures that allow the courts to strike a balance between ensuring public safety and ordering less severe interferences with the personal liberty of a suspect or defendant.
63. While reviewing the constitutionality of point 3 of the second paragraph of Article 201 of the CrPA, the Constitutional Court also reviewed the constitutionality of point 2 of the first paragraph of Article 432 of the CrPA (Article 30 of the CCA). Both provisions regulate detention due to the risk of recidivism, the difference being that the first applies to regular procedures while the other to fast-track procedures. In determining the degree of the risk of recidivism of criminal offences that must exist in order for a court to order detention, both provisions use the same wording of “if special circumstances justify the concern”. For the reasons referred to in the above paragraphs of this reasoning, the Constitutional Court established that the provision of point 2 of the first paragraph of Article 432 of the CrPA was unconstitutional. Accordingly, the legislature will be required to redefine the conditions for ordering (and extending) detention due to the risk of recidivism in the fast-track procedure in accordance with the above.

B – V

64. The Constitutional Court rejects the petitioners’ allegation that the ECHR does not permit detention due to the risk of recidivism. In point (c) of the first paragraph of Article 5, the ECHR specifies the possibility of ordering detention in cases “when it is reasonably considered necessary to prevent the defendant from committing an offence”. Numerous examples from the case law of the European Court of Human Rights show that detention due to the risk of recidivism is not contrary to the Convention – provided, of course, that the other conditions are met, which are also defined in the Constitution.
65. The Constitutional Court also rejects the petitioners’ allegation that the ordering of detention is contrary to the presumption of innocence referred to in Article 27 of the Constitution. Despite the general assumption that preventive deprivation of liberty is contrary to the presumption of innocence, this is actually true to a much lesser extent than expected. This neglects the role of presumptions in law in general.
66. In particular, the purpose of legal presumption is to allow the court to make a decision even in circumstances when the facts are not yet clear. Since the law normally deals with historical events, which are by definition part of the past and therefore not scientifically accessible (through an experiment), it is clear that in certain circumstances a court cannot completely eliminate all remaining doubts concerning the relevant facts.
67. The fundamental presumption in criminal proceedings is of the innocence of the suspect, the defendant or the accused. It has its origins in the old (enlightened) guideline for the legislative-political decision-making, which avers that it is better to acquit ten guilty people than to sentence one innocent person. However, the presumption of innocence does not primarily entail that everyone is regarded as positively innocent in an absolute manner and actually outside the scope of the criminal law and procedure. If that were true, then it would be impossible to even instigate criminal proceedings against anyone because, due to the presumption of innocence, it would be impossible to talk about a “reasonable suspicion” that the person committed a criminal offence. This reasonable suspicion would be a logical contradiction to the principle of innocence if the latter were interpreted as a static actual state and not as a dynamic procedural transfer of the burden of proof. It is however true that Article 27 of the Constitution states that any person charged with a criminal offence shall be presumed innocent (praesumptio iuris) unless found guilty by way of a final judgment. The presumption of innocence therefore applies to guilt under criminal law and encapsulates three concepts: the first is that the burden of proof (onus probandi) rests with the plaintiff (the state) and not the defendant. The second is that the state, as the plaintiff, carries the risk of failing to provide proof: “Actore non probante reus absolvitur”. And thirdly, which is identical in terms of meaning, is the principle of in dubio pro reo, meaning that when in doubt a court must always acquit the accused.

B – VI

68. The second constitutional condition for the deprivation of liberty originates in the second part of the provision of the second paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution: “No one may be deprived of his liberty except pursuant to such procedures as are provided by law”. Therefore, as is the case when determining the substantive conditions for ordering and extending detention, here the Constitution also defines the framework of the legislative regulation.
69. The first restriction is determined by the provision of the first paragraph of Article 20, pursuant to which detention is only permitted on the basis of a court order. The notion of a court order necessarily includes the guarantees provided by the right to judicial protection determined by Article 23 of the Constitution: only an independent, impartial court constituted by law may decide on detention. A court may be deemed impartial only if prior to making a decision on detention it hears the views of both parties, i.e. when deciding on detention, it must hear the prosecutor and the person whose detention is being decided upon.
70. The requirement of a judicial decision also encompasses the constitutional provisions on the equal protection of rights (Article 22 of the Constitution) and legal guarantees in criminal proceedings (Article 29). The provision of Article 22 guarantees the equal protection of the rights of all in any proceedings before a court. Pursuant to Article 29, anyone charged with a criminal offence must be guaranteed
  - (1) the right to have adequate time and facilities to prepare his defence;
  - (2) the right to be present at his trial and to conduct his defence;
  - (3) the right to produce all evidence to his benefit;
  - (4) the right not to incriminate himself or his relatives or those close to him, or to admit guilt.
71. The provision of Article 22 guarantees a person whose detention is being decided upon by a court the same rights as those enjoyed by the opposite party in the proceedings, i.e. the prosecutor. A minimum level of rights is guaranteed by Article 29. In accordance with the Constitution, the person concerned has the right to be heard and thereby the right to prove (1) the nonexistence of a reasonable suspicion that he has committed the alleged criminal offence; (2) that detention is not absolutely necessary for reasons of public safety, and (3) that in order to ensure public safety, a milder measure of restricting liberty would suffice. The person must be given the opportunity to reply to the evidence presented against him, and submit evidence to support his statements. In order to make this possible, he must be given the opportunity to familiarise himself with the facts and evidence against him.
72. The Constitutional Court stresses in particular that the person concerned is not obliged to prove anything. Under the provision of Article 27 of the Constitution, a court is also subject to restrictions when deciding on detention. The wording of this provision does indeed state that a person must be found guilty in order to overturn the presumption of innocence. However, if the presumption of innocence applies to criminal offences that have already been committed, then it must apply a fortiori in respect of criminal offences that the person concerned may commit at some point in the future. A different interpretation of the provision of Article 27 would imply that the state presumes in advance that someone will commit a criminal offence. The burden of proving the existence of a reasonable suspicion as an absolute necessity for detention because of public safety concerns must rest with the prosecutor. If in doubt, the court must rule that the conditions for detention have not been met.

73. The Constitution guarantees the right to legal remedies for a person against whom detention has been ordered (Article 25). In this regard, note must be made of the provision of the second paragraph of Article 20 of the Constitution which, in relation to the detention order in particular, specifies that a detained person must be provided with the written court order with a statement of reasons, against which he may appeal. In case No. U-I-98/91, dated 10 December 1992 (OdlUS I, 101), the Constitutional Court took the view that the purpose of the provision of Article 25 of the Constitution is not merely to give the person concerned the possibility to file a legal remedy. It is primarily to enable the person concerned to effectively defend his rights or legal interests. The right to legal remedy against a detention order may only be effective if the court decision is explained point by point in a precise (and not general or abstract) manner, thereby enabling an assessment to be made as to whether the state has sufficiently met all the requirements imposed by the aforementioned statutory provisions regarding the burden of allegation and the burden of proof. In view of the requirements that must be met in order to comply with this Decision of the Constitutional Court, the right to effective legal remedy cannot be guaranteed if the detention order only contains the elements explicitly prescribed by the provision of the second paragraph of Article 202 of the CrPA. This provision, in addition to elements of an entirely formal nature, merely requires “a brief statement specifically explaining the grounds for detention” in relation to the substantive elements. Apart from the elements listed therein, a decision to deprive a suspect or an accused person of his liberty due to a risk of recidivism must include a justification as to why the deprivation of liberty is absolutely necessary for reasons of public safety, and list the specific circumstances on the basis of which it is possible to conclude that the suspect or accused person will repeat the criminal offence, carry out an attempted criminal offence or commit an offence he is threatening to commit, and why the court considers this act to represent a danger to public safety.
74. The Constitutional Court finds that the provisions of the CrPA do not provide these procedural guarantees to a person whose detention is being decided by a court. The court may order and extend detention without giving the person concerned the right to be heard and without giving him the opportunity to familiarise himself with the facts and evidence against him (provisions of Articles 202, 203, 205, 207 and 361 of the CrPA). The person concerned has the right to inspect the file only once the investigation has been initiated (fifth paragraph of Article 128 in conjunction with Article 144 of the CrPA); in the event he has a defence counsel, the defence counsel may then inspect the file after the prosecutor has lodged a request for criminal prosecution (Article 73 of the CrPA). In the detention order the court is required only to provide a brief statement specifically explaining the grounds for detention (second paragraph of Article 202 of the CrPA). The state prosecutor always has the option to state his opinion on the matter before the court of second instance adopts its decision; however, the detainee is not informed of that opinion (first paragraph of Article 377 in conjunction with first paragraph of Article 403 of the CrPA).

75. Since the proceedings for deciding on the ordering, extension and release from detention due to the risk of recidivism for a person whose detention is being decided upon do not provide guarantees provided by the Constitution, they are not consistent with the Constitution. Abrogation of those provisions of the CrPA governing the proceedings for deciding on detention – with the exception of the second paragraph of Article 202 of the CrPA – would mean that the courts could no longer order detention. Based on Article 48 of the CCA the Constitutional Court therefore only found that these provisions are unconstitutional and it set a deadline within which the legislature must remedy the aforementioned unconstitutionality. However, it abrogated that part of the provision of the second paragraph of Article 202 of the CrPA that defines the content of the statement of reasons for a detention order.
76. The Constitutional Court takes the view that, from a procedural law perspective, the legislature must regulate this subject-matter so that, with regard to the risk of recidivism, a special hearing will be provided by law where the judge will adjudicate between the statements made by the state prosecutor and the defence, and where there is doubt, the judge will rule that there is no risk of recidivism. The abrogated provision of the second paragraph of Article 202 of the CrPA can be replaced by defining the content of the detention order in accordance with the views expressed in this decision. The legislature will regulate the procedural subject-matter in detail and, in this regard, the Constitutional Court draws attention to the constitutional requirement that, firstly, every interference with the right to personal liberty must be determined by procedural law and, secondly, that all constitutional guarantees apply in this procedure as they stem from the fact that the person is given over to the judiciary precisely in order to benefit from judicial guarantees which cannot be provided by the executive branch of power (second paragraph of Article 20 of the Constitution). This habeas corpus logic would be meaningless if the judicial branch followed the same logic as the executive branch, i.e. predominantly based on the principle of efficiency and not observing the procedural guarantees.

B – VII

77. When considering point 3 of the second paragraph of Article 201 of the CrPA, the Constitutional Court, in accordance with Article 30 of the CCA, also considered the issue of the constitutionality of the first paragraph of Article 201 and the first paragraph of Article 361 of the CrPA. Since in its review of constitutionality the Constitutional Court is not bound by the proposal of the applicant or petitioner, and it judged the provisions of the first paragraph of Article 201 and the first paragraph of Article 361 of the CrPA to be related to the constitutional review of point 3 of the second paragraph of Article 201 of the CrPA, it abrogated these two provisions as well.

78. The first paragraph of Article 201 of the CrPA provides for the obligatory detention of a person reasonably suspected to have committed a criminal offence for which a sentence of imprisonment of more than twenty years is prescribed by law. A court may decide that “reasonable grounds exist” for it not to order detention, but the paragraph implies that the legislature provided a presumption that there is a risk of absconding, risk of obstruction of the proceedings or risk of recidivism in all cases when the defendant is facing twenty years of imprisonment. From a criminal procedural law perspective, such presumption is unacceptable and indicates the legislature’s supplementary motivation to allow detention to be ordered due to public disturbance, which is not permitted by the Constitution. Such a presumption also presupposes a constitutional assumption that, in cases which are punishable by twenty years of imprisonment, detention is absolutely necessary either for the course of the criminal proceedings or public safety.
79. In order to establish the legal presumption that it is absolutely necessary for a person who might be sentenced to twenty years of imprisonment to be detained for the criminal proceedings or for reasons of public safety is contrary to the first paragraph of Article 20 of the Constitution. This provision requires a specific court order. The Constitution here builds on the assumption that the legislature will prescribe such legal grounds that allow the court to make a specific decision in each case as to whether such grounds (still) exist. The general legal presumption for the necessity of detention is also constitutionally unacceptable because it does not allow for an assessment of whether detention is really absolutely necessary in each case. This problem is somewhat mitigated, however, by the statutory provision that a court may decide not to order detention if reasonable grounds exist – presumably grounds that would refute the aforementioned general legislative presumption. However, the latter presumption is not even specified, as the first paragraph of Article 201 does not state whether it applies to the risk of absconding, the risk of proceedings being obstructed, the risk of recidivism, or whether it really is just a matter of “public disturbance”. Therefore it is also unclear what, in the legislature’s opinion, would constitute “reasonable grounds” that could refute such a presumption. And because this is not clear, then such provision is contrary to the constitutional right to legal remedies determined by Article 25 of the Constitution; in such circumstances it is not possible for the defence to know what should be stated as “reasonable grounds” for the court to decide not to order detention. Moreover, the CrPA gives the impression that the burden of proof (a mirror image of the legislative presumption) is placed on the investigative judge or the three judge panel for pre-trial appeals, being required to state the “reasonable grounds” that would refute the legislative presumption of the necessity for detention. In reality, the burden of proof is, naturally, on the defence contrary to Article 27 of the Constitution. Reference has already been made to the fact that this article does not exactly introduce actual innocence, but it certainly unequivocally demands that the burden of proof in criminal matters be borne by the prosecution. There is no reason why this basic constitutional and procedural logic should not apply to detention orders. For these reasons the Constitutional Court abrogated the first paragraph of Article 201 of the CrPA.

80. The first paragraph of Article 361 of the CrPA provides that, if the accused is not already in detention, a court may order detention if it imposes a sentence of imprisonment of five or more years. The legislature does not determine the rules for assessing whether detention should be ordered. This decision is left to the court. This provision is clearly contrary to the first paragraph of Article 20 of the Constitution, which demands a court order that must establish the absolute necessity for the course of criminal proceedings or public safety. The Constitutional Court therefore also abrogated the first paragraph of Article 361 of the CrPA.

C

81. The Constitutional Court adopted this decision pursuant to Articles 30, 43 and 48 of the Constitutional Court Act, composed of: Dr Tone Jerovšek, President, and Judges Dr Peter Jambreč, Mag. Matevž Krivic, Mag. Janez Snoj, Dr Janez Šinkovec, Dr Lovro Šturm, Franc Testen, Dr Lojze Ude, and Dr Boštjan M. Zupančič. The decision was reached unanimously. Judges Krivic, Ude, and Zupančič gave concurring separate opinions.

Dr Tone Jerovšek
President

---

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE ZUPANČIČ

In the case in question, I voted in favour of the Operative Provisions of the Decision and the reasoning behind it, given that I agree with them both – to the extent of what they covered. In my opinion, however, they both fell short of what they should have covered. I have listed seven reasons for this position, which in my opinion represent a broader frame of reference, within which we should also examine the issue of detention in terms of the risk of recidivism.

First, it is evident that the Constitution does not support primarily inquisitorial, so-called “mixed” criminal proceedings, but instead supports an adversarial system, which the National Assembly also supported when adopting the currently valid Criminal Procedure Act (hereinafter referred to as the CrPA). It is quite evident from a series of constitutional provisions that the required constitutional concept in criminal proceedings is adversarial (accusatorial).

Here, I must first bring attention to the provision of Article 23 of the Constitution, which grants every individual the right that the charges brought against him or her are decided on by an impartial court. The notion of impartiality is essentially epistemological in nature. As is already evident from the term “impartiality” itself, this implies, in particular, the absence of bias (prejudice). Since the era of Francis Bacon, the lawyer, prosecutor, and father of epistemology, it has been clear that every instance of research, even empirical and scientific research (in legal terminology: “investigation”), is subject to initial bias. This early bias is derived inevitably from the urgency of creating a working hypothesis that serves as the foundation for every research study and investigation. However, this inevitable bias of the researcher in empirical sciences is ultimately neutralised through scientific experiment, which through the language of objective reality either confirms or dismisses the working hypothesis. Since empirical sciences deal with repetitive events, given that they study natural laws that are permanent, objective and experimental verification is possible in science, thus providing a final verification of the scientific hypotheses.

However, the subject of legal assessment does not cover natural laws that would be permanent and thus could be subject to experimental verification. The subject of legal assessment is a one-time (historical) event. Historical events cannot be repeated through an experiment and as such also cannot be demonstrated in experimental terms.

The sole guarantor of legal impartiality (objectivity) is the objectivity (impartiality) of a court. The latter ultimately decides the accuracy of this or that hypothesis. If a court lacks objectivity, then there is also no other feedback that would ensure that a case would produce an objectively determined truth. Judicial bias is therefore a completely essential element of a state’s rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution).

So what is the constitutionally presumed bias of the courts?

Epistemological findings clearly indicate that bias is a protracted susceptibility to information, and in legal situations, susceptibility to evidence from both parties to a dispute. This also proceeds from a Slovene proverb that states that the truth can only be learned through the sound of both bells.

Even bias, as the term itself indicates, is no different than (1) a premature and excessive susceptibility to the arguments of one party and as a result of this (2) non-susceptibility to the other party’s arguments in the dispute. The Slovene term “pred-sodek” (pre-judging) similarly points to the core issue when it implies that bias prematurely disconnects the communication flow that provides information in conflict with prejudice (evidence). Judicial impartiality is thus a protracted (in)decision – until the court’s final decision is made – in a dispute. Throughout the legal history of Western civilisation it has been shown that legal impartiality (objectivity, undecidedness) is the product of a focused confrontation of two biases. As a result, procedural adversity is nothing but an exchange of the actual burden of proof of both parties in a dispute (the principle of free disposition) which (1) makes the court ambivalent (thus even indecisive), as it lingers between the evidence presented by one or the other party, and which (2) frees the court of its active involvement in the investigation of the criminal case, as it forces it into a passive role.

The court’s ambivalence and passiveness are therefore constitutive elements of judicial impartiality.

It is apparent that there are two leading principles of, in large part, inquisitorial (mixed) criminal proceedings: the ex officio principle (in contrast to the principle of free disposition) and the inquisitorial principle – in direct contrast to the constitutionally premised impartiality of courts. How is a criminal court supposed to be impartial, without even mentioning the investigating (so-called) “judge”, insofar as the court acts on its own initiative (the ex officio principle) and insofar as it is committed to independently investigating the magnitude of the criminal case in question (the inquisitorial principle)?

In both aspects of its work, a criminal court in Slovene criminal proceedings is bound by its initial working hypothesis regarding the defendant’s guilt. Without this hypothesis of guilt, the criminal court itself (according to the ex officio principle and the inquisitorial principle) would have no grounds for action. The constitutionally defined presumption of innocence (Article 27), which must include three procedural implications (the burden of proof on the prosecutor, the risk of failing to provide proof that lies with the prosecutor, and in dubio pro reo), thus cannot find sufficient expression in our, i.e. Slovene proceedings.

However, even more crucial for the impartiality of a criminal court is the procedural requirement presented before the criminal court indicating that the criminal courts themselves must bear the burden of proof, as they are responsible for the complete and accurate determination of the facts. This systemically forces them into active identification with the initial hypothesis (regarding guilt) and systemically excludes the possibility of their protracted undecidedness (until the end of the main hearing) until a final judgment of acquittal or conviction is reached.

I therefore believe that (1) the term “investigating judge” is a contradictio in adjecto, as such an actively involved investigator cannot be unbiased by nature but is literally paid to act from a constitutionally largely problematic hypothesis (presumption, assumption) regarding the guilt of the defendant. The ordering of detention by such an investigator systemically inevitably leads to bias to the detriment of the defendant. This is, inter alia, illustrated in detail by the large number of constitutional complaints in detention cases.

In a situation where detention is being decided upon, a completely adversarial hearing should be conducted, at which the burden of proof and the risk of failing to provide proof regarding the substantive criteria associated with the danger the defendant poses to society would be borne by the prosecutor. The court should be in a position to be able to apply the presumption of innocence whenever doubt arises. This is even more true in this case, given that it involves aleatory speculation with regard to some future (not historic) event as to whether the defendant will indeed (or not) repeat the criminal offence, carry out the attempted criminal offence, or in fact commit the offence he is threatening to commit, in the future.

(2) As much as the main criminal hearing is merely a re-enactment of what was established by the investigator during the criminal investigation, and insofar as the criminal court conducting the hearing is committed to the ex officio principle and the inquisitorial principle, it is impossible to raise questions about the impartiality of the criminal court conducting the hearing. Despite certain adversarial additions in the current CrPA, the criminal court conducting the hearing has been placed in a role in which it alone bears the “burden of proof” and the “risk of failing to provide proof” – meaning vis-à-vis an appellate court, the latter mostly acting ex officio (Article 383 of the CrPA).

Secondly, the adversarial criminal proceedings concept is the only one alongside the constitutionally presumed equality of arms in a dispute between the state and an individual (Article 29 of the Constitution) that satisfies the legality requirement in the sense in which this legality is also imposed on the state by Article 2 of the Constitution. On the other hand, this entails that primarily inquisitorial proceedings are by nature not only unlawful, but also conceal the unlawfulness of repression in the tradition of an undemocratic police state.

The unlawfulness of primarily inquisitorial proceedings increases proportionately to the pressures making the suspect or defendant an object of court proceedings – instead of being the subject of a legal dispute based on equality, as is prescribed by Article 29 of the Constitution. The sole reason a defendant in criminal proceedings is made an object of proceedings (in contrast to, for example, the subjectivity of a procedural party to civil proceedings), is precisely the alleged danger attributed to the defendant, which is also the reason for his prior detention. All those who, on account of the alleged danger of the perpetrator, draw the conclusion that it would be impractical, unrealistic, etc., to speak of criminal proceedings as a dispute of equal parties despite the unambiguous constitutional provision, implicitly renounce the legality of criminal proceedings itself. Why?

Since the era of Hobbes, the fundamental postulate of the rule of law has been the prevention of arbitrariness (using one's own force) as an instrument to resolve disputes. The purpose of law in general, the legality of a state, the rule of law, etc., is to substitute the power of logic for the logic of power. The main function of each specific legal process and of the rule of law in general lies in this relocation of the brute dominance of the superior party (also the state) to the level of the lawful (logical) processing of disputes. This is self-evident in private law, as that is the venue where two equally vulnerable parties confront each other as equals before the law and the court.

However, when the plaintiff is the state, such as in criminal proceedings, some start pointing to the raison d'état; they suddenly overlook that the basic condition of any legality should never be changed. If a party to a civil dispute were to prevail over the other party by imposing restrictions on that party's freedom, thus forcing it, for example, to testify to its own detriment, this would be deemed completely unacceptable to that party. But when this occurs during criminal proceedings, this profound inconsistency is often justified by the need to determine the truth in criminal proceedings – albeit at the price of the most serious interferences with an individual's personal integrity, dignity, and privacy. Hobbes already understood that this "truth" in substantive criminal law is mainly an expression of the same predominance of the state, which by way of criminal laws establishes the major premise of criminal liability, and that this "truth" is relative, with no more profound significance than that pursued by the legislature, noting that crimes cease once the laws labelling them as crimes cease to exist (civil laws ceasing, crimes also cease.)

However, precisely on account of this "truth", which often only serves as a veil for the blatant (and unlawful) predominance (of the power) of the state (as a party) in criminal proceedings, some remain unwilling to see this most fundamental inner absurdity of criminal proceedings that contaminates the legitimacy and legality of criminal proceedings.

Criminal proceedings, where the stakes are the highest - namely a person's liberty as a disputed subject is at stake, have a highly visible symbolic significance in society and in the state. The unlawful contamination of criminal proceedings on account of "effectiveness", "the truth", etc., in the long term compromises the exact same normative integration (general prevention) that is the sole profound moral and social meaning of a society's punitive practice.<sup>1</sup>

Thirdly, in light of the two standpoints mentioned above, it is evident that the state (the executive branch) has no legitimate right to interfere with the privacy, dignity, and personal integrity of citizens in general, if it fails to prove beforehand in a determined, articulated, and specific manner that the citizen in question violated the laws of the state. Taking action against an individual merely on the premise of a reasonable suspicion is seen as some sort of sanction in advance and is clearly contrary to the aforementioned "complete equality" (Article 29 of the Constitution). The state, as a party, is not only given the right to act in criminal proceedings, but also the priority right to actually interfere with the integrity of a citizen.<sup>2</sup> Therefore, it is no coincidence that constitutional courts in democratic states already devote attention to reasonable suspicion as the threshold for the commencement of such interferences.<sup>3</sup> In Slovenia, the term reasonable suspicion, as determined in the Constitution and the CrPA, is still an empty abstraction without the specified positions in the case law of the ordinary courts or the Constitutional Court.

If constitutions allow the prior interference of the state with an individual's integrity, then that is a major exception from the above-mentioned principle of the aforementioned reciprocity between the detriment to an individual or to the state. Whenever detention is at issue, this detriment is much worse than when investigations, seizures, and the temporary deprivation of liberty (arrest) are implemented, even though they all require an articulated, specific, and concrete reasonable suspicion.

Fourthly, this means that (a) the state gains the right to punish a citizen only when

- (1) the facts have been correctly and fully established,
- (2) the substantive legality principle has been strictly adhered to, and
- (3) the constitutional rights of the citizen have been adhered to during the proceedings – the citizen's criminal liability has been demonstrated before an impartial and independent court.

---

1 For more on this, see Prvine pravne kulture [Elements of Legal Culture], Proces [Procedure], Ljubljana 1995, pp. 179-206.

2 See part of the extensive foreign case law regarding this issue in Ustavno kazensko procesno pravo [Constitutional Criminal Procedural Law of the Republic of Slovenia], Ljubljana 1995, the chapter entitled Preiskave in zasegi [Searches and Seizures], pp. 377-324.

3 See part of the extensive foreign case law regarding this issue in Ustavno kazensko procesno pravo [Constitutional Criminal Procedural Law of the Republic of Slovenia], Ljubljana 1995, the chapter entitled Preiskave in zasegi [Searches and Seizures], pp. 377-324.

However, the state gains the right to the preventive deprivation of liberty solely on account of an explicit constitutional provision. This detention is restricted to the grounds of jeopardising public safety.

Fifthly, this logically results in the prior deprivation of liberty (detention) on grounds of the risk of recidivism only being a very exceptional advance version of the final punishment.

All the correctness and completeness in determining the factual issues, all the substantive legal criteria, and all the constitutional procedural guarantees to which a suspect and defendant are entitled in the process of determining a person's final criminal liability should be a fortiori provided at a time when it is still not even finally resolved that such person is guilty of anything and when an interference with their freedom, dignity, privacy, and civic integrity is ordered against such person based on pure speculation that that person might (or may not) repeat in the future something that has yet to be proven was even committed by this person, carry out an attempted criminal offence for which his liability has yet to be demonstrated, or commit an act that was merely threatened.

Sixthly, this anticipation of punishment and the ensuing detention as its immediate legal consequence represent an anomaly and contradiction in the constitutional dimensions of criminal proceedings. Since the Constitution explicitly states (in its Article 20) that a person reasonably suspected of having committed a criminal offence may be detained only when this is absolutely necessary for reasons of public safety, this anomalous exception should be accepted. A discussion could be initiated as to whether this constitutional provision collides with some other provisions – even, for example, with the presumption of innocence determined in Article 27. However, precisely for that reason, it is clear that a prior interference with the integrity of the accused citizen requires just the opposite logic than that characterising the provisions of the CrPA in question (regarding detention) and as a result the majority of case law based thereupon.

Since detention for the person concerned, regardless of the refinements in legal terminology, is punishment in the present for something he has not committed, and on the basis of criminal liability, which still needs to be, if at all, determined, such (1) determination of reasonable suspicion regarding criminal liability for some act, as well as (2) the determination of the likelihood that the person could possibly commit another criminal offence, should be subject to that much more accurate substantive law and procedural regulation. Since it does not specify special adversarial proceedings and does not specify (lex certa) in which cases detention is permitted, the valid CrPA essentially does not separately regulate this type of determination. A provision in the second paragraph of Article 202 best characterises this segment, as it merely requires that a “brief explanation” be provided by the investigating “judge” for the detention order.

Seventhly, I strongly believe that such problems in the valid CrPA are symptomatic of the authoritative and police-centred conception of criminal proceedings. Similarly, I am deeply convinced that this and the same kind of concept of criminal proceedings is completely incompatible with the Constitution.<sup>4</sup>

4 For more on this, see Med državo in posameznikom: Privilegij zoper samoobtožbo [Between the State and the

As mentioned above, the Constitution requires the impartiality of the courts (Article 23), while the investigating “judge” and the court ruling on the matter both adhere to the ex officio principle and the inquisitorial principle, which are both incompatible with the notion of court impartiality.<sup>5</sup> In Article 29, the Constitution requires the complete equality of parties (between the state and the individual) to criminal proceedings. However, the drafter of the CrPA satisfied this required equality of parties merely formally, despite the National Assembly expressly requesting the drafting of a systemically adversarial criminal procedure during the adoption of this Act. What is the point of speaking of party equality if the CrPA systemically puts the court itself in a biased inquisitorial position that opposes that of the defendant? This also applies to the detention order. Here, the defendant and the investigating “judge”, and not the defendant and the prosecutor, as is normally the case, are put on opposing sides.

There is no wording in the Constitution indicating that criminal proceedings have to be primarily inquisitorial, thus mostly oriented towards the effectiveness of criminal repression. On the contrary, the Slovene Constitution dedicates at least twelve articles (Articles 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 23, 24, 27, 28, 29, 30, and 31) to the rights of the defendant. The tenor of these provisions is clear and in favorem defensionis.

Since the aforementioned provisions include the achievements of Western civilisations from the Magna Carta (1215) to the present day, they cannot be considered merely in the grammatical and exegetical sense.

In that respect the Constitution represents a hermeneutical top of the spiral of civilisation.

The phrases noted in individual constitutional provisions evoke countless and extremely complicated aspects of a person’s freedom. Dozens of principles, hundreds of doctrines, and thousands of rules covering a specific branch of law hide behind the constitutional syntagmas. For example, behind the following sentence in Article 28 of the Constitution: “No one may be punished for an act which had not been declared a criminal offence under law or for which a penalty had not been prescribed at the time the act was performed.”, there lies hidden criminal substantive law that is comprehensive, complex, systemic, and, in its details, highly complicated. Therefore, through its understanding and when assessing the constitutionality of individual statutory provisions, including those covering detention, it is the Constitutional Court’s task to identify the purpose of the Constitution as an advancement of civilisation and to assess the specific constitutional beginnings in light of the whole from which they originated.

---

Individual: Privilege against Selfincrimination], Pravnik, No. 1-3/96, p. 19.

5 For more on this, see the paper Prispevek k teoriji kontradiktornosti v kazenskem procesu [A Contribution to the Theory of Adversarial Procedure in Criminal Proceedings], Kazensko procesno pravo [Criminal Procedural Law of the Republic of Slovenia], Official Gazette RS, Ljubljana 1991, pp. 285-310. Here, in particular, the epistemological findings regarding impartiality should be emphasised – with regard to the fact that the person investigating an issue alone (the inquisitorial principle, the ex officio principle), thus the one who formulates the initial and working hypothesis, cannot be impartial. This initial hypothesis for the court can only be a hypothesis of the guilt of the defendant under the current legislation on criminal proceedings. The formulation of this hypothesis of guilt should be completely shouldered by the prosecutor’s office (the burden of proof), instead of burdening the court via this systemic bias!

If the majority were able to see this whole in the case in question, I strongly believe that the present biased context of the inquisitorial ordering of detention would at a minimum be abrogated as it contravenes the constitutional intention. The legislature would thus be given a clear message as to the constitutional inadmissibility of not only such regulatory framework for ordering detention, but also of the primarily inquisitorial conception of the valid Criminal Procedure Act in general. The aforementioned explicit instruction of the National Assembly is one more reason to support such a decision.

The ignominious tradition of a police state, which, after all, is characterised as prioritising the repression of criminal acts over the protection of citizen's subjectivity, which the Slovene Constitution explicitly specifies as its fundamental postulate, would thus be terminated.

Dr Boštjan M. Zupančič

---

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE DR LOJZE UDE, JOINED BY JUDGE MAG. MATEVŽ KRIVIC

I voted for the Operative Provisions of the Decision, but I do not entirely agree with the reasoning in the Decision of the Constitutional Court, which was adopted unanimously with regard to the operative provisions. In particular, I would like to point out two definitions in the reasoning that are in my opinion theoretically questionable or that make it possible that too far-reaching conclusions can be drawn thereupon.

1. It is stated in the last sentence of Paragraph 21 of the reasoning (the reasoning under B – II) that at the level of constitutional law the criminal procedure is regarded as a “procedure of a substantive importance” in the decisions of constitutional courts. The substantive constitutional rights of an individual are the legislative subject of the criminal procedure.

Theoretically, it is not acceptable to use the concept of the procedure of a substantive importance. It would appear from the wording of Paragraph 21 that the procedure of a substantive importance allegedly consists of the constitutional procedural rights. It does not entail that certain procedural rights acquire the quality of substantive rights by being determined in the Constitution. Rather, they are procedural rights of such rank that they form a part of the so-called procedural public order. If these fundamental procedural rights are not regulated and guaranteed in a specific procedure, then we cannot speak of proceedings in a civilised society. However, these constitutional rights have a procedural nature. It seems that the definitions in the Decision try to give greater weight to procedural rights by including them within the concept of the “procedure of a substantive importance”. Procedural rights themselves are of such importance and in specific situations even prevail over substantive rights so that they do not need such a terminological crutch. The constitutional rights determined in particular in Articles 22, 23, 24, and 25 of our Constitution, and with regard to the criminal procedure also in Articles 19 and 20, are of a rather distinctive procedural nature. It is, however, true that in some constitutional provisions procedural and substantive rights are intertwined.

I would not feel the need to respond to the individual terms in the reasoning if some of those terms did not entail a risk of underestimating the purely procedural rights that are actually crucial in judicial proceedings.

2. In Point 4 of the Operative Provisions, the Constitutional Court decided that the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Act governing the decision-making procedure for ordering, extending, and releasing an individual from detention are inconsistent with the Constitution. It further appears from the reasoning that according to the Constitutional Court these provisions are not consistent with the Constitution because the court may order and extend detention without giving the person concerned the possibility to be heard and to familiarise himself with the facts and evidence against him (Paragraph 74 of the reasoning in section B – VI). The state prosecutor always has the possibility to state his opinion on the matter before the court of second instance adopts its decision, however, the detainee is not informed of that opinion.

In general, I agree with such reasoning. At the same time, however, I would like to draw attention to the open issue of the adversarial nature of criminal proceedings. I do not agree with the simplified position that criminal proceedings have to be adversarial in their entirety or that it is exclusively and only adversarial criminal proceedings that satisfy the principle of the state governed by the rule of law referred to in Article 2 of the Constitution. I am not, of course, a proponent of inquisitorial criminal proceedings. But I am of the opinion that the adversarial nature of criminal proceedings still needs to be examined in detail. It has to be taken into account, namely, that criminal proceedings do not involve two parties that have, as in civil proceedings, conflicting interests, i.e. their own interests. In criminal proceedings a state (i.e. an organised society) is represented by the state prosecutor, who does not have his own personal interest in succeeding in criminal proceedings. On the opposite side is the defendant with his own personal interests; furthermore, also the injured party (either as a potential subsidiary prosecutor or as a claimant demanding damages within criminal proceedings) defends his own interests in criminal proceedings. For this reason, the issue of the adversarial nature of criminal proceedings is more complex than in the case of civil proceedings.

Of course, in criminal proceedings the question arises as to whether and to what extent this adversarial principle should be applied during the specific stages of proceedings, for example during the investigation procedure, representing the basis for issuing an indictment or for discontinuing criminal proceedings, or to what extent such adversarial principle should be applied when ordering detention. To apply the adversarial principle in its entirety also while discussing the concept of a “reasonable doubt” would give rise to the question of whether the investigation as a special part of the procedure is reasonable.

I draw attention to these issues because otherwise the requirement to give the defendant the possibility to acquaint himself with the incriminating facts also when the decision is being adopted regarding ordering, extending, or being released from detention, could also be understood in the sense that when a decision regarding detention is being adopted the defendant has to be granted the same rights as during the adversarial main hearing.

Dr Lojze Ude

Mag. Matevž Krivic

DECISION

At a session held on 24 October 1996 in proceedings to decide upon the constitutional complaint of P. K., M., represented by L. Š.-U., attorney in L., the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

The constitutional complaint of P. K. against Kranj District Court Order No. Ks 20/96, dated 30 January 1996, in conjunction with Ljubljana Higher Court Order No. Kp 153/96, dated 13 February 1996, is dismissed, and in the remaining part the constitutional complaint is rejected.

*ReasoningA

1. On 30 January 1996, the complainant lodged a constitutional complaint claiming that his detention had expired on 29 January 1996; however, neither he nor his attorney received an order extending his detention.
The complainant is allegedly being detained without a court order. Consequently, his rights determined by Articles 19, 20, 27, and 32 of the Constitution have allegedly been violated. On 21 February 1996, the complainant supplemented his constitutional complaint by stating that he challenges the Orders referred to in the operative provisions of this Decision as his detention was allegedly extended by a note of the court, not by a court order. In addition, he claims that the risk of absconding on which his detention is grounded does not exist. The complainant proposes that he be released.
2. By the challenged Order, the District Court decided to extend the detention. It decided on the extension prior to the expiry of two months following the last session of the three-judge panel for pre-trial appeals when an order on extension had been issued with the reasoning that it was adopted to remedy the uncertainty in the operative provisions of District Court Order No. Ks 220/95, dated 21 December 1995, with regard to the period for which the detention had been extended. In the opinion of the District Court, the grounds for detention due to the risk of absconding are substantiated by the existence of concrete circumstances. The District Court refers to the complainant's wish and possibility to take up employment and live in A., which it substantiates by statements of witnesses questioned during the investigation and at the main hearing. The Higher Court rejected the complainant's appeal against this Order as unfounded. It rejected the complainant's statements regarding the date of the decision on his detention on the grounds that the three-judge panel for pre-trial appeals acted in accordance with the provisions of the second paragraph of Article 207 of the Criminal Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 63/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CrPA). In the opinion of the Higher Court, according to this provision, the three-judge panel for pre-trial appeals must review, following the expiry of two months from the last [detention] order, whether the grounds for detention still exist, and, if it decides to extend the detention, it is not obligated to decide explicitly on the duration of the extension, as the court of first instance is alleged to have needlessly done. The Higher Court also confirmed the reasons in the first instance Order regarding the existence of the grounds for detention due to the risk of absconding.

3. On the basis of Article 56 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), the constitutional complaint was sent to the Kranj District Court and the Ljubljana Higher Court. The courts did not reply to the statements made in the constitutional complaint.

B

4. The panel of the Constitutional Court accepted for consideration the constitutional complaint against the acts referred to in the operative provisions of this Decision; however, it did not accept the constitutional complaint [in the part] in which the complainant challenged the previously issued detention orders. The reasons for such decision of the Constitutional Court are substantiated in Order No. Up-185/95 of the Constitutional Court, dated 19 June 1996.
5. The Constitutional Court examined the case file of the Kranj District Court in the criminal case against the complainant, No. K 315/95.
6. The complainant alleges that the conditions for detention were not fulfilled, since the grounds for detention due to the risk of absconding did not exist. According to the provision of the second paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution, no one may be deprived of their liberty except in such cases and pursuant to such procedures as are provided by law.

According to the provision of the first paragraph of Article 20 of the Constitution, a person reasonably suspected of having committed a criminal offence may be detained only on the basis of a court order when this is absolutely necessary for the course of criminal proceedings or for reasons of public safety.

The notion “necessary for the course of criminal proceedings” also refers to ensuring the defendant's presence at the criminal proceedings, as otherwise the criminal proceedings cannot be carried out. Detention on the basis of the so-called grounds for detention due to the risk of absconding may only be ordered if the conditions determined by the Constitution and the law are fulfilled. Point 1 of the second paragraph of Article 201 of the CrPA determines that detention may be ordered if the [affected] person is in hiding, if it is not possible to ascertain their identity, or if there are other circumstances indicating the risk that they may abscond.

7. A court's conclusion that there exists a risk of absconding must be based on clearly established circumstances on the basis of which it can be concluded with high probability that the interested person would flee. It cannot be substantiated only by the gravity of the criminal offence or the severe penalty prescribed. However, these circumstances may confirm or refute the risk of absconding if they are linked to other circumstances that concern above all the [affected] person's character, residence, profession, assets, family links, and all other ties with domestic or foreign environments, as well as the expectation of a severe sentence. The court must determine if such circumstances exist and assess if the risk of absconding is greater than the uncertainty that an individual would undoubtedly face if he or she absconded. Such a standpoint regarding the risk of absconding as grounds for detention (paragraph 1 (c) of Article 5 of the Convention on the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms; Official Gazette RS, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR) has repeatedly been adopted by the European Court of Human Rights (e.g. in the Judgment in the case of Wemhoff v. Germany, dated 27 June 1968 – Publ. ECHR, Ser. A, Vol. 7; in the Judgment in the case of Neumeister v. Austria, dated 27 June 1968 – Publ. ECHR, Ser. A, Vol. 8; in the Judgment in the case of B. v. Austria, dated 28 March 1990 – Publ. ECHR, Ser. A, Vol. 175; in the Judgment in the case of Letellier v. France, dated 26 June 1991 – Publ. ECHR, Ser. A, Vol. 207).
8. In relation to the complainant, the courts based the suspicion that he might abscond not only on the gravity of the criminal offence that the complainant was charged with, but also on the other circumstances referred to in Paragraph 2 of the reasoning of this Decision. The courts thus satisfied the above-cited conditions in relation to establishing the risk of absconding. The detention of the complainant was extended in conformity with the conditions determined by Articles 19 and 20 of the Constitution. Consequently, the challenged acts did not violate the complainant's right to personal liberty.
9. The complainant further asserts violations of Articles 27 and 32 of the Constitution, without explaining what allegedly constituted these violations.
Insofar as the alleged violations may relate to the challenged acts, it has to be noted that ordering or extending detention in accordance with constitutional provisions does not constitute a violation of the presumption of innocence under Article 27 of the Constitution. On the basis of the explicit provision of the first paragraph of Article 20 of the Constitution, an interference with personal liberty is already admissible if reasonable suspicion has been established. In this regard, the Constitutional Court refers to the reasons stated in its Decision No. U-I-18/93, dated 11 April 1996 (OdlUS V, 40) in their entirety. In the cited Decision, the constitutionality of certain provisions of the CrPA regarding detention were decided on. The fact that interferences with personal liberty are admissible, however, entails that interferences with the right determined by Article 32 of the Constitution are admissible as well, and therefore there has also been no violation insofar as the complaint concerns a restriction of freedom of movement.

10. As, in view of the above, the challenged acts did not result in the alleged violations of human rights, it was necessary to dismiss the constitutional complaint as unfounded. Moreover, the alleged violation of the right to personal liberty resulting from the fact that the complainant had been detained for a specific period of time without a court order cannot be part of the constitutional complaint against the challenged acts. The District Court Order can take effect regarding the complainant only from the moment it has been served on him and thus cannot refer to a prior deprivation of liberty. This part of the constitutional complaint may only entail that the complainant's right to personal liberty was violated by a potentially unlawful action that was allegedly not based on a court order. According to the provision of the second paragraph of Article 157 of the Constitution, if other legal protection is not provided, the court having jurisdiction to review administrative acts decides on the legality of individual actions that interfere with constitutional rights. In accordance with the statutory regulation in force, this is the Supreme Court. Therefore, in relation to the violations of rights that the complainant alleges in this part, not all legal remedies have been exhausted.
11. According to the provision of the first paragraph of Article 51 of the CCA, a constitutional complaint may only be lodged after all legal remedies have been exhausted. According to the provision of the second paragraph of this Article, the Constitutional Court may exceptionally decide on a constitutional complaint before the exhaustion of all extraordinary legal remedies if the alleged violation is manifestly obvious and if irreparable consequences for the complainant would result from the implementation of the individual act. In this part, the complainant's proposal that his constitutional complaint be considered as soon as possible may be understood as a proposal for exceptional consideration. The Constitutional Court therefore assessed whether the conditions determined by the second paragraph of Article 51 of the CCA were fulfilled.
12. Before the challenged District Court Order was issued, the complainant had been in detention on the basis of Kranj District Court Order No. Ks 220/95, dated 21 December 1995, in conjunction with Ljubljana Higher Court Order No. Kp 1203/95, dated 29 December 1995. The cited District Court Order was served on the complainant, with 23 November 1995 stated as the date of the session of the Court, and by Order No. Ks 220/95, dated 8 January 1996, the Court issued an order correcting the mistake in relation to the date of the session of the court. The operative provisions of that Order determined that the complainant's detention was to be extended on the grounds of a risk of absconding "for a further two months, i.e. until 29 January 1996." In accordance with the second paragraph of Article 207 of the CrPA, this Order, which was issued on 21 December 1996, could have extended the detention for two months, i.e. until 21 February 1996. Considering the cited provision of the CrPA, a court decision in which the date is not defined would produce effects for two months or until a different decision is adopted. However, the court of first instance added a precise date determining the duration of the detention. It was not required to do so, as the Higher Court observes, and by doing so it generated an inherent contradiction in the operative provisions of the challenged Order.

This contradiction was neither remedied by the appellate court when it decided on the appeal against the extension of the detention, nor by the three-judge panel for pre-trial appeals of the court of first instance, to which the judge presiding over the complainant's trial panel submitted the case file for a decision on the extension of the detention. Such concerns a question of legality, which the Constitutional Court only considers insofar as it may also entail a violation of a constitutional right. According to the provision of the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, the constitutional right to personal liberty may be limited only by the rights of others and in such cases as are determined by the Constitution. The first paragraph of Article 20 of the Constitution, however, determines that a person may be detained only on the basis of a court order. This entails that detention is only possible if it is "covered" by a judicial decision. An exception, which the Constitution envisages in this regard, is contained in the second paragraph of Article 20. It determines that upon detention, but no later than 24 hours thereafter, the detained person must be handed a written court order with a statement of reasons.

13. The constitutional provision of Article 20 regulates the admissibility of interferences with a constitutional right. The constitutional provision as well as the statutory regulation adopted on the basis thereof to regulate this interference in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution must therefore be interpreted restrictively and applied in such manner that there will be no doubt about the manner and the moment of the interference with the constitutional right. In the complainant's case, however, such doubt existed. Therefore, it would have been necessary to presume that the District Court extended the detention until the date that is clearly defined in the operative provisions of the Order, which in the case at issue would have been to the benefit of the complainant. The complainant's detention was ordered on 15 September 1995 at 7:30. Therefore, the extension of the detention until 29 January 1996 entailed an extension until 7:30 on that date. If the court failed to serve on the complainant a reasoned order extending his detention by that time, then, considering the first sentence of the second paragraph of Article 20 of the Constitution, it was required to do so no later than within 24 hours. According to the complainant's statements, confirmed by the documents in the case file, District Court Order No. Ks 20/96, dated 30 January 1996, was served on the complainant on 30 January 1996 at 15:40. The detention of the complainant on 30 January 1996 between 07:30 and 15:40 thus lacked the legal basis required by the provision of the second paragraph of Article 20 of the Constitution. A delay may, of course, occur in the implementation of a court decision to annul [a detention order] or to not extend detention. In the complainant's case, however, this delay amounted to more than eight hours following the expiry of the constitutional time limit for serving a court order.

As a result, a violation of the first paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution in this part is manifestly obvious.

14. However, the other condition determined by the second paragraph of Article 51 of the CCA is not fulfilled. It allows the exceptional consideration of a constitutional complaint only if a Constitutional Court decision can prevent the implementation of an unconstitutional act that would cause the complainant to suffer irreparable detrimental consequences. However, as regards the complainant, these detrimental consequences had already ceased with the serving of the Kranj District Court Order referred to in the operative provisions of this Decision.

In the constitutional complaint the complainant did not demonstrate that he had initiated legal protection against the alleged violation in accordance with the provision of the second paragraph of Article 157 of the Constitution, and the Constitutional Court did not explicitly require him to do so, as the above-mentioned condition for exceptional consideration of the constitutional complaint was in any event not fulfilled. The part of the constitutional complaint that challenges the legality of the interference with the applicant's constitutional rights by an action had to be rejected, in accordance with the provision of the second indent of the first paragraph of Article 55 of the CCA, because the procedural conditions for its consideration are thus not fulfilled.

C

15. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 59 and the second indent of the first paragraph of Article 55 of the CCA, composed of: Dr Tone Jerovšek, President, and Judges Mag. Matevž Krivic, Mag. Janez Snoj, Dr Janez Šinkovec, Dr Lovro Šturm, Franc Testen, Dr Lojze Ude, and Dr Boštjan M. Zupančič. The Decision was reached unanimously.

Dr Tone Jerovšek
President

DECISION

At a session held on 11 December 2003 in proceedings to decide upon the constitutional complaint of A. A., from Z., the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

The constitutional complaint of A. A. against Maribor Higher Court Order No. Kp 556/2001, dated 19 June 2001, in relation to Maribor District Court Order No. Ks 393/2001, dated 12 June 2001, is dismissed.

Reasoning

A

1. The complainant filed a constitutional complaint against a Maribor Higher Court Order. By that Order the Higher Court dismissed her appeal against the Maribor District Court Order by which home detention imposed on the complainant was extended by an additional month. On 15 March 2001, due to the reasonable suspicion that the complainant had committed the criminal offence of abuse of office or official duties determined by the second paragraph in conjunction with the first paragraph of Article 244 and with Article 25 of the Criminal Code (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 63/94 etc. – hereinafter referred to as the CC), the investigating judge ordered home detention on grounds of the risk of absconding. A three-judge panel for pre-trial appeals (hereinafter referred to as the panel of judges) then extended the home detention until 14 June 2001.
2. Upon the proposal of the investigating judge, on 12 June 2001 the panel of judges again extended the home detention until 14 July 2001 by the challenged Order. In the reasoning of the Order the panel explained that there existed a reasonable suspicion that the complainant had committed the alleged criminal offence, and that the investigation had to be continued. Only after all the evidence had been taken within the framework of the investigation would the State Prosecutor's Office be able to decide whether it should file an indictment against the complainant, and more time was needed to take this evidence. In the opinion of the panel of judges, the previous course of the investigation had shown that the investigating judge had striven for the investigation to be concluded as quickly as possible. Furthermore, also the complainant allegedly contributed to the duration of the investigation, as in her written statement of defence, which she filed only on 31 May 2001, she had made a motion that certain evidence be taken. The panel of judges assessed that there still existed a real danger that the complainant would avoid criminal proceedings by fleeing abroad, as she was unemployed and also her husband was abroad, as he had left the country right after release from home detention. The measure of having to regularly report to the police station, which the complainant had proposed as a substitute measure, was allegedly not appropriate considering the real risk of absconding and the seriousness of the alleged criminal offence, therefore home detention was allegedly absolutely necessary in order for the criminal proceedings to be carried out. The complainant appealed against the Order issued by the panel of judges to the Higher Court, which dismissed her appeal. It concurred with the findings and reasoning of the court of first instance regarding the existence of the risk of absconding, which is one of the grounds for detention.

3. In the constitutional complaint the complainant inter alia alleges that the extension of home detention was simply decided on by the panel of judges of the District Court, and that there were allegedly no grounds for home detention. In the constitutional complaint, which was not drafted by a lawyer, the complainant states certain facts that allow the conclusion that she challenges the existence of the risk of absconding and that she wishes to demonstrate that home detention could be substituted for by a more lenient measure (e.g. that she was willing to surrender her and her children's passports and that the investigation had been instituted against her when she was in Y. Y. Y., after which she had nevertheless returned home).
4. An indictment against the complainant was filed before the Maribor District Court on 31 August 2001.
5. At a session held on 9 October 2001, the panel of the Constitutional Court accepted the constitutional complaint for consideration in the part and regarding the allegations that refer to the two Orders mentioned in the operative provisions of the present Decision. In the remaining part, the constitutional complaint was rejected, and thus that part is not a subject of the present decision.
6. On the basis of Article 56 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), the Constitutional Court sent the constitutional complaint to the District and Higher Courts to reply thereto. None of them replied.
7. On 20 December 2001, the panel of judges released the complainant from home detention. Upon being invited to respond thereto by the Constitutional Court, the complainant replied that she maintained her position as stated in the constitutional complaint.

B – I

8. At the time of reviewing the constitutional complaint, the challenged judicial decisions imposing home detention had already ceased to be in force. Considering the fact that the complainant persisted with the constitutional complaint, the Constitutional Court first had to establish whether the procedural prerequisites for deciding by the Constitutional Court were still fulfilled. As a general rule, the Constitutional Court deems that in cases where at the time of decision-making an individual act is no longer in force legal interest for deciding by the Constitutional Court is not demonstrated. However, in Decision No. Up-315/00, dated 3 July 2003 (Official Gazette RS, No. 70/03), the Constitutional Court adopted the position that legal interest for deciding on a constitutional complaint is always demonstrated if what is at issue is an interference with the right to personal liberty determined by the first paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution. An interference with this constitutional right is certainly one of the most severe interferences with human rights and fundamental freedoms. Effective protection of the right to personal liberty thus requires that persons affected be ensured the possibility to obtain a judicial decision on the interferences with the mentioned human right, even if the interference is no longer in effect. Therefore, a decision on whether the Constitutional Court must in such cases establish whether the decision-making of the courts was carried out in conformity with the procedural guarantees provided by the Constitution depends on the answer to the question of whether home detention entails an interference with the right to personal liberty or an interference with the right to the freedom of movement.

9. The first paragraph of Article 32 of the Constitution guarantees the right to the freedom of movement. In conformity with the second paragraph of the same Article, “[t]his right may be limited by law, but only where this is necessary to ensure the course of criminal proceedings,” and in some other cases. Hence, by this provision the Constitution-framers allowed the legislature to limit the right to the freedom of movement in order to ensure the course of criminal proceedings, which is a legitimate goal due to which it is admissible, in accordance with the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, to limit the right to the freedom of movement. When prescribing a limitation of the mentioned right, the legislature is of course bound by the general principle of proportionality<sup>1</sup> determined by Article 2 of the Constitution, which prohibits excessive interferences by the state with human rights also in cases where they pursue a legitimate aim. This principle is also binding on judges deciding in concrete cases on limitations in proceedings in which constitutional procedural

---

1 The assessment of the admissibility of an interference is carried out on the basis of the test known as the strict test of proportionality. The mentioned test includes a review of three aspects of the interference:

- 1) whether an interference is really absolutely necessary (indispensable), in the sense that the aim cannot possibly be achieved without (any) interference, or that the aim cannot be achieved without the assessed interference (at issue) by some other milder interference;
- 2) whether the assessed interference is appropriate for achieving the pursued aim, in the sense that the pursued aim can in fact be achieved by the interference; if such aim cannot be achieved thereby, the interference is not appropriate;
- 3) whether the gravity of the consequences of the assessed interference with the affected human right is proportionate to the value of the pursued aim, i.e. to the benefits that will occur as a result of such interference (i.e. the principle of proportionality in the narrower sense). See Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-18/02, dated 24 October 2003 (Official Gazette RS, No. 108/03).

guarantees are ensured, particularly those determined by Articles 22, 23, 25, and 29 of the Constitution. Finally, in concrete cases also the Constitutional Court reviews the constitutional admissibility of possible interferences with the right to the freedom of movement according to these criteria.

10. The right to personal liberty is ensured by the first paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution. The second paragraph of this Article determines that no one may be deprived of his liberty except in such cases and pursuant to such procedures as are provided by law. The Constitutional Court stressed in Decision No. U-I-18/93, dated 11 April 1996 (Official Gazette RS, No. 25/96, and OdlUS V, 40), that the mentioned two fundamental conditions for the admissibility of interferences with the right to personal liberty are more precisely determined in the following provisions of the Constitution. The first condition (cases in which a person may be deprived of his or her liberty) is determined by Article 20 of the Constitution, while the second one (pursuant to such procedures as are provided by law) is determined by the provisions of Articles 22 (the equal protection of rights), 23 (the right to judicial protection), 25 (the right to legal remedies), 27 (the presumption of innocence), and 29 (legal guarantees in criminal proceedings) of the Constitution, in which the procedural guarantees set out by the Constitution are determined. In accordance with the first paragraph of Article 20 of the Constitution, a person reasonably suspected of having committed a criminal offence may be detained only on the basis of a court order when this is absolutely necessary for the course of criminal proceedings or for reasons of public safety. Hence, when what is at issue is the deprivation of liberty and detention, the Constitution itself determined the constitutional criteria on the basis of which interferences with the right to personal liberty are possible. In concrete cases, courts decide on the admissibility of interferences [with human rights] in proceedings in which constitutional procedural guarantees must also be ensured, particularly those determined by the second paragraph of Article 20 of the Constitution and those determined by Articles 22, 27, and 29 of the Constitution.
11. Similarly as in the Constitution, the right to personal liberty is also guaranteed by the first paragraph of Article 5 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, and No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR). The latter contains the same requirement as is determined by the second paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution, as it exhaustively enumerates the instances in which it is allowed to deprive an individual of his or her liberty. Among these instances, point (c) of the first paragraph [of Article 5] provides for the lawful arrest or detention of a person effected to prevent him or her from fleeing after having committed a criminal offence. Furthermore, the third and fourth paragraphs determine procedural guarantees that must be ensured in proceedings for deciding on the deprivation of liberty (the person must be brought promptly before a judge; adjudication without undue delay or release from detention; the right to initiate proceedings in which a court will decide speedily on the lawfulness of the detention [i.e. the deprivation of liberty], and order release if the detention is not lawful). The right to the freedom of movement is guaranteed by the first paragraph of Article 2 of Protocol No. 4 to the ECHR.<sup>2</sup> The third and fourth paragraphs thereof determine the possible limitations of this right – those that are determined by law and necessary in a democratic society, inter alia for preventing criminal offences or due to the public interest.

12. It is self-evident that the deprivation of liberty encompasses a limitation of the freedom of movement and that at the same time it entails a more severe interference than does an interference with the freedom of movement. Therefore, it is not surprising that the criteria determined by the Constitution and the ECHR for a limitation of the right to personal liberty are stricter than those determined for a limitation of the right to the freedom of movement. If the constitutional provisions are compared, detention must be “absolutely necessary” for the course of criminal proceedings, whereas a limitation of the freedom of movement must only be “necessary” to ensure the course of criminal proceedings. The ECHR exhaustively enumerates the admissible instances of interferences with personal liberty, while it leaves the determination of limitations of the right to the freedom of movement to the legislature; the legislature is bound only by the principle of proportionality. The procedural guarantees determined by the second paragraph of Article 20 of the Constitution require stricter conditions for decision-making by courts, which must proceed with such within very short time limits, as any interference with this fundamental freedom is so severe. In the third paragraph of Article 20 of the Constitution a special sanction is envisaged for cases where an indictment is not filed by the expiration of the time limits determined by the second paragraph of the same Article. Also Article 5 of the ECHR provides substantively similar procedural guarantees for detention cases.
13. Article 20 of the Constitution does not expressly regulate home detention, nor does the ECHR contain special provisions thereon. Therefore, a question may be raised as to whether limitations of human rights caused by ordering home detention particularly regarding their nature, degree, duration, and the manner of carrying out such limitations are such that they only entail a limitation of the freedom of movement, or such that they entail the deprivation of liberty, and thus a limitation of the right to personal liberty.
14. After Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-18/93 was adopted, by which an inconsistency of the Criminal Procedure Act with the Constitution was established, the legislature introduced more lenient measures “as alternatives to detention” (Bulletin of the National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia, No. 56/97, p. 17), including home detention among them. In accordance with the first paragraph of Article 199a of the Criminal Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 63/94 etc. – hereinafter referred to as the CrPA), home detention may be ordered if the grounds determined by points 1 through 3 of the first paragraph of Article 201 of the mentioned Act exist, and if ordering detention is not absolutely necessary for the safety of people or the course of criminal proceedings. By a home detention order the court determines that the defendant must not leave the premises where he or she resides; a court may restrict or prohibit contact with persons who do not reside with the defendant; it may exceptionally allow the defendant to leave the premises determined for home detention for an assigned period of time, if this is absolutely necessary to provide him- or herself with the minimum necessities for life, or to work (the second and third paragraphs of Article 199a of the CrPA).

---

2 The provision reads as follows: “Everyone lawfully within the territory of a State shall, within that territory, have the right to liberty of movement and freedom to choose his residence.”

15. By the nature of the matter, detention and home detention are fundamentally equal. In both cases a person must reside at a precisely determined place. As regards duration, the same restrictions may apply. The essential difference is the degree (intensity) of the restriction and the manner in which such restriction is carried out. In contrast to detention, where defendants are isolated in a closed public institution in which they are under constant supervision by authorised officials, defendants in home detention are in home environments, in the presence of their families. However, it follows from the statutory regulation that they may only leave their residence after obtaining the express prior permission of a court. The court may only give such permission in the above-mentioned instances and only when this is absolutely necessary. Hence, it follows already from the statutory regulation of home detention that it entails a limitation of human rights that in its intensity and the manner of implementation limits personal liberty. Such view is also in line with the judgments of the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR) in which the ECtHR decided on the question of whether the criterion for the review of limitations of human rights is the provision of the first paragraph of Article 5 of the ECHR or that of Article 2 of Protocol No. 4 to the ECHR.<sup>3</sup>

-
- 3 1. In Mancini v. Italy, the complainant was transferred from detention to home detention. This measure required that the complainant stay at home, and was only allowed to leave home with the prior permission of the competent authorities. The ECtHR stated that the first paragraph of Article 5 of the ECHR indeed does not determine the conditions for ordering detention, and it does not ensure the right to be placed in a less severe form of detention than that of a traditional prison regime. However, also in this case the Court deemed, with regard to the effects and the manner of carrying out home detention, that home detention entails a deprivation of liberty based on the grounds determined by the first paragraph of Article 5 of the ECHR (ECtHR Judgment dated 2 August 2001, Paras. 16-17).
  - 2 In Raimondo v. Italy, the complainant was under special police supervision, which included the following – he was prohibited from leaving his residence without prior notification of the police, he had to report at the police station on certain days, he had to return home before nine o'clock in the evening and could not leave before seven o'clock in the morning unless he had justified reasons for leaving and notified the competent authorities prior to leaving. The ECtHR did not consider such limitations to entail limitations of the right to personal liberty but rather limitations of the right to the freedom of movement determined by Article 2 of Protocol No. 4 to the ECHR (Judgment dated 23 September 1993, Paras. 13 and 39).
  - 3 In Guzzardi v. Italy, the complainant was placed under special police supervision on the island Asinara, where he had to notify the supervisory authorities of the address of his residence, and was not allowed to leave his residence without prior notification. He had to report to the supervisory authorities twice a day and whenever called upon to do so; he had to lead an honest life, obey regulations, and not give cause for suspicion; he was not allowed to associate with persons who had been convicted of criminal offences, he had to stay at home

16. The complainant was placed under home detention, which was to be carried out at the address of her permanent residence and initially included only limited movement in the garden surrounding the house. Subsequently, the judge allowed her to move around in the garden without restrictions. The investigating judge allowed the complainant to visit a dentist and to consult the criminal investigation file and business documentation in order to prepare her defence, however, he did not allow her to visit a hairdresser, an insurance company, and her daughter's grammar school graduation party. From the above-mentioned concrete circumstances of the case it is evident that while under home detention the complainant was indeed allowed to reside in her home environment but that she was allowed to leave her residence on the basis of the prior permission of the investigating judge only in the instances enumerated in the third paragraph of Article 199a of the CrPA. Hence, also the concrete circumstances of the case allow the conclusion that home detention does in fact entail the deprivation of liberty and as such entails an interference with the right to personal liberty determined by the first paragraph of 19 of the Constitution. In view of the above, the procedural prerequisite for deciding on the complainant's constitutional complaint is fulfilled.

B – II

17. By establishing that home detention entails an interference with the right to personal liberty, also the framework of the constitutional criteria for the review of the admissibility of the interference with the complainant's right to personal liberty is determined. Article 20 of the Constitution only regulates detention, but not also home detention. It follows from the principle of proportionality and from the criterion of absolute necessity determined by the first paragraph of Article 20 that courts must be given the possibility, in cases where all other conditions for ordering detention are indeed fulfilled but where the constitutionally admissible goal can be achieved by a milder measure, i.e. by home detention, to apply such milder measure. This is also how in the first paragraph of Article 199a of the CrPA the legislature defined the conditions for ordering home detention.
18. Hence, the Constitution does not expressly determine the constitutional guarantees for ordering home detention. However, since home detention entails a measure that is essentially similar to detention, it is necessary to determine in which key circumstances stricter criteria for ordering home detention regarding procedural guarantees (the second paragraph of Article 20 of the Constitution) must apply compared between ten o'clock in the evening and seven o'clock in the morning, unless he had to urgently and with prior notification leave home; he was not allowed to bear arms; he was not allowed to visit bars and night clubs and take part in public gatherings. He had to inform the supervisory authorities in advance of the telephone number and the name of any person he wished to have a long distance telephone conversation with. The ECtHR stated that the difference between the deprivation of liberty and the limitation of the freedom of movement is nonetheless merely one of degree and intensity, and not one of the nature or substance of the limitations, and that any one of the factors of such police supervision taken individually cannot be considered to entail the deprivation of liberty; however, since they were carried out cumulatively and in combination, such did entail the deprivation of liberty (Judgment dated 6 November 1980, Paras. 12, 93, 94, and 95).

---

to the general procedural guarantees that otherwise follow from Articles 22, 23, and 25 of the Constitution. The sixth paragraph of Article 199a of the CrPA determines that, regarding the ordering, duration, extension, and release from home detention, the provisions of the CrPA on detention apply mutatis mutandis. By such provision, in the existing regulation there are already built in guarantees that follow from the first three sentences of the second paragraph and from the third paragraph of Article 20 of the Constitution. However, the legislature regulated the manner of judicial decision-making on home detention differently. In instances where the Constitution requires that the Supreme Court decide on the extension of detention, the legislature determined that it is the panel of judges that has competence to decide on the extension of home detention (the seventh paragraph of Article 199a of the CrPA). Consequently, the question is raised whether such different regulation is constitutionally admissible.

19. From the requirement of equality before the law (the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution) there follows the obligation of the legislature to treat equal factual and legal situations equally. The legislature may only treat such situations differently if it has reasonable grounds for differentiation that follow from the nature of the matter. Detention is undoubtedly the most severe interference possible with the right to personal liberty. The Constitution-framers wished to particularly emphasise this fact by expressly determining the competence of the Supreme Court as the highest court in the state to decide on the extension of a term of detention that has lasted for three months and that was ordered and extended even before an indictment was filed (the last sentence of the second paragraph of Article 20 of the Constitution). Home detention is nevertheless, as follows from the above, a milder form of the deprivation of liberty, and the legislature therefore had reasonable grounds to enact a different regulation regarding judicial decision-making on extending detention prior to filing an indictment. Such regulation is also not inconsistent with the general constitutional procedural guarantees, as ordering or extending home detention is decided by a court in proceedings in which the rights determined by Article 22 and the first paragraph of 23 of the Constitution must be ensured, and against the decision thereof the right to appeal is guaranteed (Article 25 of the Constitution).
20. Since home detention entails the deprivation of liberty, which in the majority of the key characteristics is similar to detention, it is clear that the criteria for a constitutional review of the admissibility of an interference with the right to personal liberty by means of home detention must be fundamentally the same as in cases of detention. Exceptions are possible where, as follows from the preceding paragraph of the reasoning, differentiation is admissible due to the nature of the matter. Therefore, in the constitutional review of home detention also the Constitutional Court must proceed from the same criteria and on the basis thereof review whether by ordering or extending home detention all the constitutional guarantees were ensured. On the basis thereof, the Constitutional Court also reviewed the two challenged judicial decisions.

B – III

21. The complainant alleges that it is the Supreme Court that should have decided on the extension of detention and not the panel of judges of the court of first instance. As follows from Paragraph 17 of the present reasoning, by such judicial decision-making the complainant's constitutional guarantees provided by the Constitution could not have been violated. Therefore, this allegation is unfounded.
22. The complainant alleges that the grounds for ordering home detention were not fulfilled. Home detention against the complainant was extended due to the grounds determined by point 1 of Article 201 of the CrPA in relation to the first paragraph of Article 199a of the CrPA, in accordance with which home detention may also be ordered or extended if there exists a so-called risk of absconding. The Constitutional Court stated in Decision No. Up-185/95, dated 24 October 1996 (OdlUS V, 186), that the reasoning of courts on the existence of a risk of absconding must be based on concretely demonstrated circumstances on the basis of which it can be inferred with high probability that there exists a danger of the defendant absconding. Such cannot be assumed merely on the basis of the seriousness of the criminal offence, or the possible prescription of a severe punishment. However, if this circumstance is compounded by other circumstances, which above all concern the character of the person, his or her residence, profession, financial situation, family ties, and everything concerning his or her domestic or foreign environment, the risk of absconding may be confirmed or rebutted, also considering the possible expected severe punishment. Courts must establish whether such circumstances exist, and assess whether the risk of absconding is greater than the uncertainty that an individual would undoubtedly be subjected to in the event of absconding. It follows from the challenged judicial decisions (Paragraph 2 of the reasoning of the present Decision) that the courts at issue carried out this task. In doing so, they in particular reasoned, in conformity with the principle of proportionality, why home detention could not be replaced by an even less severe measure. It cannot be argued that their assessment was unreasonable.
23. It is evident from the above that in deciding on the extension of home detention the courts did not violate constitutionally ensured guarantees, as the complainant claims, and therefore the challenged judicial decisions did not interfere with her right to personal liberty as determined by the first paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution.

B – IV

24. In her subsequent applications, the complainant furthermore alleges that her human rights and fundamental freedoms determined by Articles 22, 23, 25, and the third paragraph of Article 29 of the Constitution, as well as by Article 6 of the ECHR, were violated. These allegations partly refer to the part of the constitutional complaint that the Constitutional Court already rejected, whereas in the second part the complainant did not demonstrate how her rights had allegedly been violated. Considering the above, the Constitutional Court could not review the allegations stated in the filed constitutional complaint, therefore it did not assess whether these applications had been filed in time (the first paragraph of Article 52 of the CCA).

25. In her application dated 30 January 2002, the complainant proposed that the Constitutional Court exempt her from paying the costs of the proceedings regarding the constitutional complaint at issue. Since court fees are not charged in proceedings before the Constitutional Court, and the complainant was also not required to pay other costs, the proposal of the complainant was pointless, hence the Constitutional Court did not decide thereon. However, if the complainant wishes to be granted a refund of the expenses that she incurred in filing the constitutional complaint, it is here established that she did not declare these expenses, therefore the Constitutional Court could not decide on the possible reimbursement thereof either.

C

26. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 59 of the CCA, composed of: Dr Dragica Wedam Lukić, President, and Judges Dr Janez Čebulj, Lojze Janko, Mag. Marija Krisper Kramberger, Milojka Modrijan, Dr Ciril Ribičič, Dr Mirjam Škrk, and Jože Tratnik. The decision was reached by seven votes against one. Judge Ribičič voted against and submitted a dissenting opinion.

Dr Dragica Wedam Lukić
President

---

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE DR RIBIČIČ

1. In the present dissenting opinion I will explain the reasons due to which I could not vote in favour of the Decision of the Constitutional Court by which the Court dismissed the constitutional complaint of A. A. But before I explain the reasons for my decision, let me note that I concur with the major part of the reasoning of the mentioned Decision. The only doubt I have refers to the fact that the Constitutional Court in its Decision assessed that the statutory regulation in accordance with which a three-judge panel for pre-trial appeals decides on the extension of home detention in cases similar to those in which the Supreme Court decides on the extension of detention, for which it is competent directly on the basis of the Constitution, is consistent with the Constitution.
2. I agree with the statement in Paragraph 15 of the reasoning of the Decision in accordance with which detention and home detention are by the nature of the matter fundamentally equal. The Constitutional Court correctly established that also home detention entails a limitation of personal liberty and that for this reason the complainant had the right to allege by means of a constitutional complaint violations concerning the ordering of home detention, despite the fact that in the meantime the complainant had been released from home detention. I also agree with the assessment of the Constitutional Court in Paragraph 18 of the reasoning that home detention is essentially similar to detention, due to which, in cases concerning home detention, considering the fact that the Constitution does not expressly determine the constitutional guarantees for such a measure, the legal guarantees referring to detention must be applied mutatis mutandis.

3. The complainant alleges that the Supreme Court should have decided on the extension of home detention, as determined by Article 20 of the Constitution for cases of the extension of detention. The Constitutional Court did not concur with such reasoning, as it found that the legislature had reasonable grounds for enacting a different regulation. According to the position of the Constitutional Court, it is nonetheless necessary that all fundamental legal guarantees be respected in instances of ordering home detention except the provision of Article 20 of the Constitution, which reads as follows: “The Supreme Court may extend the detention a further three months.”<sup>1</sup>
4. Notwithstanding the fact that detention and home detention are different to a certain extent, they both concern such a severe interference with the liberty of an individual that all the legal guarantees determined by the Constitution must be observed without omitting any of them. Therefore, I question such regulation and practice in accordance with which all fundamental legal guarantees determined by the Constitution should be observed when ordering home detention, but not, however, one single part of the puzzle regarding interferences with personal liberty as regulated by the Constitution. In my opinion, following an in depth assessment, the Constitutional Court should have reviewed whether the statutory regulation is consistent with the Constitution, insofar as it gives a three-judge panel for pre-trial appeals the power to extend home detention in cases in which the Constitution grants competence to extend detention to the Supreme Court. The result of such review would then determine whether the Constitutional Court in its decision should establish a violation of the [mentioned] right of the complainant or reject her constitutional complaint. The Constitutional Court did not carry out such a review, but a priori proceeded from the assessment that the statutory regulation of home detention is based on reasonable grounds, thereby covertly reviewing the constitutionality of such regulation.
5. Since I cannot concur with only a part of the reasoning of the Decision of the Constitutional Court, I had to vote “against” and submit a dissenting opinion (and not a concurring one), namely due to the fact that my position could also lead to a different decision (i.e. establishing the unconstitutionality of the statutory regulation and issuing a declaratory decision on the violation of the complainant’s constitutional rights) regarding the question of constitutional guarantees concerning home detention than voted in favour of by the majority.

Dr Ćiril Ribičič

---

1 Notwithstanding the criticisms regarding the constitutional solution in accordance with which only the Supreme Court may extend detention following a period of three months from the day of the deprivation of liberty (these criticisms draw attention to the fact that it could be to the detained persons’ advantage if it was not the highest regular court in the state that was to decide thereon), it must be taken into consideration that what is at issue is a binding constitutional provision that will certainly not be amended in the foreseeable future.

Decision No. U-I-60/03, dated 4 December 2003

DECISION

At a session held on 4 December 2003 in proceedings to review constitutionality initiated upon the petition of A. B., from C, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. Due to the reasons stated in the reasoning of the present Decision, the provisions of Articles 70 through 81 of the Non-litigious Civil Procedure Act (Official Gazette SRS, No. 30/86, and Official Gazette RS, No. 87/02) are inconsistent with the Constitution.
2. The sixth indent of Article 47, Article 48, the first paragraph of Article 49, and the fourth paragraph of Article 51 of the Health Services Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 9/92, 37/95, 8/96, 90/99, 31/2000, and 45/01) are not inconsistent with the Constitution.
3. The National Assembly must remedy the inconsistency referred to in Point 1 of the operative provisions within six months from the publication of this Decision in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia.
4. Until the established inconsistency referred to in Point 1 of the operative provisions is remedied, the following shall be ensured in the procedure for involuntarily committing persons to a mental health care institution:
  - upon the initiation of the procedure, the involuntarily committed person shall ex officio be assigned a counsel by a court;
  - the notification of involuntary commitment that the authorised person of the health care institution is obliged to submit to the court shall also contain the grounds substantiating the absolute necessity of the involuntary commitment.

Reasoning

A

1. The petitioner challenges the provisions of Chapter 7 (Articles 70 through 81) of the Non-litigious Civil Procedure Act (hereinafter referred to as the NLCPA), which regulate the procedure for committing persons to mental health care institutions, and the provision of Article 49 of the Health Services Act (hereinafter referred to as the HSA), which refers to this procedure.

He claims that the grounds for involuntary commitment to psychiatric health care institutions determined by the statutory regulation in force do not fall within the ambit of the admissible limitations of human rights determined by the Constitution and international acts. The petitioner believes that involuntary commitment primarily entails an interference with the right to personal liberty as guaranteed by Article 19 of the Constitution, Article 5 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR), Article 9 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (Official Gazette SFRY, No. 7/71, MP, No. 9/92), and Article 9 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. In the event the measure of involuntary treatment is carried out it also causes interferences with certain other human rights and fundamental freedoms, such as the freedom of movement (Article 32 of the Constitution), the right to personal dignity and safety (Article 34 of the Constitution), the inviolability of one's physical and mental integrity, privacy, and personal rights (Article 35 of the Constitution), the right to the protection of personal data (Article 38 of the Constitution), and the right to health care (Article 51 of the Constitution). The petitioner alleges that persons involuntarily committed to psychiatric hospitals are not provided even minimal legal certainty under the legislation in force. He believes that the deprivation of liberty of mental patients is completely arbitrary, as the NLCPA and the HSA allow such deprivation of liberty without fulfilling the conditions determined by the Constitution. The petitioner alleges that the provision of Article 49 of the HSA allows the deprivation of the liberty of mental patients even in cases where this is not absolutely necessary, which entails a violation of point (e) of the first paragraph of Article 5 and Articles 8 and 18 of the ECHR, as well as Articles 19 and 20 of the Constitution. Furthermore, the petitioner criticises the fact that the legislation currently in force does not provide for any milder measures that could substitute for involuntary commitment to a closed ward of a psychiatric hospital. The challenged provisions of the NLCPA are, according to the petitioner, inconsistent with the fourth paragraph of Article 5 of the ECHR, which guarantees individuals judicial review of the lawfulness of his or her deprivation of liberty. The petitioner alleges that the provisions of the NLCPA create a misleading impression that courts decide on the involuntary commitment of persons to psychiatric institutions. In fact, psychiatric hospitals firstly commit a patient involuntarily and only then are judicial proceedings initiated ex officio, in which courts merely decide whether the patient should remain committed, not whether the original involuntary commitment carried out by the psychiatric hospital was lawful. The petitioner further draws attention to the fact that the legislation currently in force does not ensure an involuntarily committed person the legal assistance of a lawyer or other counsel. According to the petitioner, the legislation should ensure the involuntarily committed person appropriate representation and protective conditions, as well as strict supervision over the execution of each individual medical procedure. The petitioner also believes that the procedural guarantees provided by the third paragraph of Article 19 and the second paragraph of Article 20 of the Constitution apply to all instances of the deprivation of liberty, including the involuntary commitment of mental patients. The only procedural guarantee an involuntarily committed person enjoys under the legislation currently in force is the obligation of the authorised person of a health care institution to notify the court of the involuntary commitment within a period of 48 hours (the second paragraph of Article 71 of the NLCPA). However, such notification does not include the principal grounds justifying the involuntary commitment. Moreover, it is not the involuntarily committed person who receives the notification but only the court. Hence, the legislation in force does not prescribe any procedure that would ensure that the rights of involuntarily committed individuals determined by the third paragraph of Article 19 and the second paragraph of Article 20 of the Constitution are observed. Consequently, an involuntarily committed person also cannot effectively invoke his or her right to legal remedies, which according to the petitioner entails a violation of Article 25 of the Constitution and Article 13 of the ECHR. The petitioner further underlines that the legislation in force does not determine the conditions under which it is admissible to perform medical procedures without the consent of the involuntarily committed patient, nor does it ensure judicial review of the performance of these procedures, especially regarding the appropriateness and necessity of the interference. Since the legislation in force does not provide any protective conditions or procedures for supervision, control, or appeal, the petitioner believes it is inconsistent with Article 7 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and the Dignity of the Human Being with regard to the Application of Biology and Medicine: The Convention on Human Rights and Biomedicine (Official Gazette RS, No. 70/98, MP, No. 17/98 – hereinafter referred to as the CHRB). Forced medication against the will of the affected person represents, according to the petitioner, one of the most humiliating acts a person can be subject to and a degradation of the human being as a person, as it constitutes a deprivation of free will and a deprivation of the right to make decisions about oneself. The petitioner, invoking the right to make decisions about oneself guaranteed by Article 35 of the Constitution, Article 8 of the ECHR, and Article 1 of the CHRB, believes that the involuntary commitment of a mental patient to a psychiatric hospital does not per se justify the performance of an involuntary medical procedure.

2. The petitioner also challenges the provisions of the sixth indent of Article 47, Article 48, and the fourth paragraph of Article 51 of the HSA. He alleges that the rights of individuals determined by Article 47 of the HSA are typically violated where persons involuntarily committed to psychiatric hospitals are concerned, with regard to which all violations are justified with the doctor's assessment that the exercise of the right would have a detrimental effect on the patient's health (the sixth indent of Article 47 of the HSA). The petitioner draws attention to the fact that one consequence of the limitation of the right to access medical records is that the affected person is not informed of the purpose, nature, consequences, and risks of the procedure, due to which the affected person cannot effectively exercise the right to complain as guaranteed by the ninth indent of Article 47 of the HSA, or the right to judicial protection guaranteed by the fourth paragraph of Article 15 and Article 23 of the Constitution, and Article 23 of the CHRB. This also entails a violation of Article 25 of the Constitution and Article 13 of the ECHR. According to the petitioner, the sixth indent of Article 47 of the HSA furthermore represents a violation of the rights guaranteed by the third paragraph of Article 38 and the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution. As to the provision of Article 48 of the HSA, the petitioner alleges that it does not determine the person or authority that could substitute for the will of a patient and give consent to an emergency medical procedure, nor does the Act define the term “emergency procedure”. The mentioned provision is, according to the petitioner, inconsistent with the third paragraph of Article 51 of the Constitution, which binds the legislature to precisely determine by law the cases in which involuntary treatment is admissible, and also with the third paragraph of Article 6, Article 7, and Article 8 of the CHRB.

The petitioner alleges that the assessment of the necessity of a medical procedure is left to the sole discretion of the treating physician. In his view, such regulation allows arbitrariness and does not ensure individuals personal safety. The provision of the fourth paragraph of Article 51 of the HSA, on the basis of which only the treating physician can give the patient’s close relatives or guardian information regarding the patient’s health condition, is, in the petitioner’s opinion, inconsistent with Articles 35 and 38 of the Constitution, Article 8 of the ECHR, and also with the first paragraph of Article 10 of the CHRB. According to the petitioner, the mentioned provision allows an interference with the inviolability of the privacy of individuals and with the right to the protection of personal data without fulfilling the conditions determined by the Constitution and international law.

3. The National Assembly did not reply to the petition. In its submitted opinion, the Government assesses that the challenged provisions of the NLCPA and the HSA are not inconsistent with the Constitution and that they ensure individuals appropriate protection of their rights. The provisions of the NLCPA that regulate the procedure for the involuntary commitment of persons to psychiatric health care institutions are, according to the Government, in conformity with Article 19 of the Constitution, which allows the deprivation of liberty in such cases and pursuant to such procedures as are provided by law. The Government stresses that involuntary commitment to psychiatric hospitals is only admissible when a court establishes that the relevant statutory conditions have been fulfilled. The Government also explains in detail the duties of courts in proceedings for involuntary commitment as determined by the NLCPA (e.g. questioning the involuntarily committed person; questioning treating physicians; the order that the involuntarily committed person be examined by a certified psychiatric specialist from another health care institution). As to the challenged provisions of the HSA, the Government believes they are not unconstitutional, and that some provisions of this Act (especially the provision of Article 48) are indeed ambiguous but have to be interpreted in conjunction with other legal acts that regulate human rights. For example, the provision of the sixth indent of Article 47 of the HSA must be interpreted in conjunction with the provisions of the second and third indents of the same Article, and by also taking into consideration the provision of the third paragraph of Article 18 of the Personal Data Protection Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 59/99, etc. – hereinafter referred to as the PDPA), which imposes on personal data file controllers the duty to allow individuals to access and copy personal data [from such files], in accordance with point 1 of the first paragraph of Article 18 of the PDPA, no later than 15 days after receipt of such a request, or else notify the individual within the same period of the grounds why such access and copying cannot be granted. According to the Government, individuals have several possibilities to access their personal data: by invoking their right to obtain a second opinion; by invoking the right to be informed of the diagnosis of their illness, and the scope, manner, quality, and expected length of treatment; and in proceedings for judicial protection under the PDPA. Especially the patient's right to learn of the diagnosis and course of treatment allegedly also enables the patient indirect access to his or her medical records. According to the Government, restrictions on direct access were put in place primarily due to the possibility that patients might falsely interpret entries in their medical records (e.g. x-ray images). Allegedly, the purpose of this restriction is to prevent the potential occurrence of a psychological state that could make treatment less successful. The government stresses that the mentioned provision does not constitute an absolute prohibition of patients' access to their medical records, but merely a restriction on access to entries [in such records] that do not include an explanation in instances where the patients might misunderstand such entries. The absolute denial of patients' right to access their medical records without a written reasoning would, even in the Government's opinion, constitute an unjustifiable interference with their fundamental constitutional rights and freedoms. As regards the provision of Article 48 of the HSA, the Government is of the opinion that it is not overly broad, as it must be interpreted as narrowly as possible. Only cases where the patient is truly incapable of forming his or her true and real will (e.g. due to unconsciousness or a state of reduced consciousness) should thus be considered to be cases where the patient cannot give prior consent to the performance of a certain medical procedure. The Government underlines in such context that the Act addresses emergency medical procedures, i.e. procedures intended primarily to preserve a person's life, not to improve a person's health condition. The mentioned provision allegedly indeed enables that there arises a temporary conflict of interests, namely the interest of the treating physician to carry out treatment, on the one hand, and the interest of the patient to not undergo treatment, on the other. However, the patient's interest is superior to the interest of the doctor. The Government stresses that doctors must always establish the patient's will (by carrying out a conversation with the patient or his or her relatives as soon as possible), and that, in accordance with the fourth indent of Article 47 of the HSA, they must also respect it. According to the Government, also the provisions of the CHRB can be used as an aid in the interpretation of Article 48 of the HSA. The Government believes that such conflicting situations could be eliminated if the Human Rights Ombudsman were authorised to substitute for the patient's will in such cases. The Government also maintains that the provision of the fourth paragraph of Article 51 of the HSA is not inconsistent with the Constitution. The limitation determined by this provision must allegedly be interpreted in the light of the active role of the patient's close relatives in the treatment process. In such context, the Government draws attention to the provision of the seventh indent of Article 47 of the HSA, which provides the patient the possibility to prohibit the provision of information regarding his or her health condition [to other people,] (even to his or her closest relatives).

4. In his reply to the opinion of the Government, the petitioner expressed disagreement with the Government's claims and draws attention to the fact that the Government even failed to express its position on certain essential allegations referring to the challenged provision of Chapter 7 of the NLCPA and Article 49 of the HSA. The petitioner again stresses that the statutory regulation concerning the involuntary commitment of mental patients entails inadmissible discrimination based on personal circumstances (illness or mental state). According to the petitioner, the legislature had no reasonable grounds to treat mental patients differently, as it cannot be assumed that they are more dangerous than average people (for example, the legislature did not envisage different treatment for other more dangerous groups, such as drug and alcohol addicts). The petitioner believes that an individual who has been subject to involuntary commitment to a psychiatric institution does not enjoy any dignity in today's society and has very little chance of starting to live a dignified life. In the petitioner's opinion, care for persons incapable of taking care of themselves requires a different solution, one which would in particular take into account the fact that the affected person is willing to accept a certain form of help. According to the petitioner, the interests of the doctor and the cooperation of relatives in the treatment should "have no place" in the framework of the regulation of this issue. As for the provisions of the sixth indent of Article 47 and Article 48 of the HSA, the petitioner highlights the statement of the Government, which acknowledged that these two provisions are ambiguous, which allows for unequal implementation of the Act and arbitrary decision-making by state authorities and bearers of public authority.
5. On the basis of the second paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), the Constitutional Court obtained the opinion of the Human Rights Ombudsman. The Human Rights Ombudsman states that since the establishment of the office of the Ombudsman it has been assessing, inter alia, petitions of persons involuntarily committed to a closed ward of a psychiatric hospital. Moreover, it regularly visits psychiatric hospitals, where it pays special attention to involuntarily committed mental patients. One subject of the Ombudsman's assessment is also the right to voluntary treatment. Concerning this right, the Ombudsman expresses his conviction that involuntary commitment does not automatically include an authorisation for (unlimited) interference with the patient's right to refuse treatment. The Human Rights Ombudsman presented the treatment of persons with mental disorders in greater detail in the Special Report of 1999,<sup>1</sup> in which he also drew attention to the shortcomings of the current legislative framework.

---

1 The treatment of persons with mental disorders (an analysis of the current situation based on visits by the Human Rights Ombudsman to certain psychiatric hospitals and social care institutions) – Special Report – Ljubljana, January 1999.

B – I

6. By Order No. U-I-60/03, dated 3 April 2003, the Constitutional Court accepted the petition for consideration and decided to consider it as a priority matter.

B – II

7. Involuntary commitment to a closed ward of a psychiatric hospital entails a severe interference with a patient's human rights and fundamental freedoms, in particular the right to personal liberty (the first paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution) and the right to the inviolability of one's mental integrity (Article 35 of the Constitution), as well as the right to voluntary treatment (the third paragraph of Article 51, which guarantees both the right to medical treatment and the right to refuse treatment). However, the human rights and fundamental freedoms guaranteed by the Constitution are not unlimited. The Constitution provides for the possibility of limiting the right to personal liberty by allowing that the cases and procedures in which it is possible to deprive a person of his or her liberty (the second paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution) be determined by law. As to the right to voluntary treatment, the Constitution allows that exemptions from the principle of voluntary treatment (the third paragraph of Article 51 of the Constitution) be determined by law. The legitimate aim and purpose of involuntary commitment to and treatment in a psychiatric hospital is to avert the danger that the patient poses to him- or herself or to others due to the illness,<sup>2</sup> and also to eliminate the causes due to which involuntary commitment was ordered. However, the constitutional power authorising the legislature to determine limitations on the right to personal liberty and exemptions from the principle of voluntary treatment does not mean that the legislature may determine such limitations arbitrarily.
8. One of the bases for limiting constitutional rights is the general principle that human rights and fundamental freedoms are limited by the equally strong rights and freedoms of others (the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution). This principled limitation of constitutional rights is also the basis for involuntary commitment to a psychiatric hospital when a patient poses a danger to the life of others or causes them serious harm.<sup>3</sup> The situation is different when a patient is involuntarily committed to a psychiatric hospital because he or she poses a danger to his or her own life or causes serious harm to him- or herself. In such cases, when the patient is incapable of making a wilful and deliberate decision on treatment due to the nature of his or her illness, the protection of his or her other rights requires that his or her decision be substituted for by that of the state. In fact, the state also has the duty to do so due to the special constitutional protection of severely disabled persons (the second paragraph of Article 52 of the Constitution). Only if the patient is incapable of making by him- or herself a wilful and deliberate decision on treatment due to his or her mental illness, and if the deprivation of liberty and involuntary treatment are absolutely necessary in order to ensure the protection of the patient's other fundamental human rights, is it acceptable under constitutional law for a law to prescribe the involuntary commitment of those mental patients who pose a danger to themselves due to their illness.<sup>4</sup> The fundamental guiding principle in such instances must be the presumed will of the patient – it is presumed that the patient, were he or she capable of making judgments, would probably agree to such treatment.

2 For more detail, see A. Galič, Prisilna hospitalizacija psihiatričnega bolnika, Medicina in pravo, Izbrana poglavja 1999-2000 [Involuntary Commitment of Mental Patients; in The Medicine and Law, Selected Topics 1999-2000], pp. 47-58.

3 Ibidem.

9. The task of the statutory regulation is to regulate the involuntary commitment of mental patients to a closed ward of a psychiatric hospital in such a manner so as to ensure effective implementation of the legitimate purpose that justifies such measure (i.e. averting the danger that the patient poses to him- or herself or to others due to his or her mental illness, and the elimination of the reasons causing such danger), while also ensuring respect for the human rights and fundamental freedoms of patients in accordance with international standards for the protection of human rights and taking into account appropriate solutions in comparable modern European legal orders. The catalogue of fundamental human rights comprises both the most basic rights that ensure basic survival (physical integrity), as well as rights that protect the human being as an integral personality and emphasise a person's free development (mental integrity).<sup>5</sup> In addition to the inviolability of physical integrity, Article 35 of the Constitution also guarantees the inviolability of one's mental integrity. The latter entails, in particular, the prohibition of any interference with the freedom to make decisions, stressing the right to self-determination, i.e. the right to make decisions about oneself.<sup>6</sup>
10. The first paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution guarantees everyone the right to personal liberty. The second paragraph of the same Article then determines two special conditions under which this right may be limited, stating that individuals may only be deprived of their liberty in such cases and pursuant to such procedures as are provided by law. Hence, for any interference with the right to personal liberty the Constitution envisages statutorily determined procedures and cases. In Decision No. U-I-18/93, dated 11 April 1996 (Official Gazette RS, No. 25/96, and OdlUS V, 40), which in fact referred to the deprivation of liberty in a criminal procedure, the Constitutional Court defined the conditions under which an interference with an individual's personal liberty is constitutionally admissible. The Constitutional Court stressed in the mentioned Decision that two basic premises can be derived from the provision of the second paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution. That provision first states that "[n]o one may be deprived of his liberty," whereby the Constitution distinguishes between [two different Slovene expressions for] liberty. No one may be deprived of his or her liberty [in the broader sense], however, the latter may be temporarily limited by the deprivation of liberty [in the narrower sense]. Hence, an

---

4 Ibidem.

5 A. Polajnar - Pavčnik, Varstvo ustavnih človekovih pravic med zdravljenjem [The Protection of Constitutional Human Rights During Treatment], Podjetje in delo, No. 6/98.

6 Ibidem.

individual may be deprived of his or her liberty [in the narrower sense], however such must always be envisaged in advance and regulated from both procedural and substantive law aspects. The generality of the provision of the second paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution, i.e. that this provision expressly refers to any limitation of liberty, can be inferred from

- (a) the subheading of Article 19 (“Protection of Personal Liberty”);
- (b) the generality of the provision of the first paragraph of Article 19 (“Everyone has the right to personal liberty.”); and
- (c) the general wording of the second paragraph of Article 19 (“No one may be deprived of his liberty except in such cases and pursuant to such procedures as are provided by law.”).

11. Also the ECHR determines, in the first paragraph of Article 5, that everyone has the right to liberty and security of person, and that no one shall be deprived of his or her liberty save in the cases exhaustively enumerated in that Article. One such case is precisely the lawful detention of persons of unsound mind (point (e) of the first paragraph of Article 5 of the ECHR). In Winterwerp v. the Netherlands,<sup>7</sup> the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR) introduced three fundamental requirements that must be fulfilled in order for the detention of mental patients to be lawful. The position of the ECtHR was that the detention of mentally ill persons is only admissible if a mental disorder has been reliably demonstrated on the basis of objective medical expertise, and if the patient’s mental disorder is of such a kind or such a gravity as to make him or her an actual danger to others or to him- or herself. The third requirement refers to the duration of detention. Detention may last only as long as the mental disorder justifying it persists. The ECtHR stresses that psychiatric involuntary commitment must be medically indicated.<sup>8</sup> However, it allows that in emergency cases mental patients be involuntarily committed even without a prior in-depth medical examination.<sup>9</sup> In addition to the existence of a mental illness, the serious danger that the patient poses to others or to him- or herself must always also be demonstrated.

12. The third paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution determines the procedural safeguards that anyone who has been deprived of his or her liberty must be ensured. Since the involuntary commitment of a mental patient to a closed ward of a psychiatric hospital undoubtedly represents one example of the limitation of personal liberty, these procedural safeguards need to be applied mutatis mutandis also in the procedure for the involuntary commitment of persons to a closed ward of a psychiatric hospital. Such requirement also follows from the second paragraph of Article 5 of the ECHR, which states that everyone who is arrested must be informed promptly, in a language which he or she understands, of the reasons for his or her arrest, [i.e. for being deprived of his or her liberty]. The ECtHR adopted the position that this provision refers to all examples of the deprivation of liberty, not only in criminal procedures.<sup>10</sup> The reasons for involuntary commitment of mental patients to a psychiatric hospital must therefore be explained to them in an appropriate manner, taking into account their medical condition. Moreover, they must be informed of their right to the legal assistance of a counsel that they may choose freely.

7 Ser. A, No. 33, Para. 40.

8 Judgment of the ECtHR in Varbanov v. Bulgaria (Reports of Judgments and Decisions 2000-X): In this case, the ECtHR underlined that the expert medical opinion on (the assessment of) the patient must be based on the person’s current health status, not merely on past events.

9 Judgment of the ECtHR in X v. The United Kingdom, Ser. A, No. 46, Para. 45.

13. One of the fundamental rights that every involuntarily committed mental patient must be ensured is the right to judicial protection concerning the lawfulness of the detention [i.e. involuntary commitment]. The fourth paragraph of Article 5 of the ECHR determines that everyone who is deprived of his or her liberty by arrest or detention is entitled to initiate proceedings by which the lawfulness of his or her detention is to be decided speedily by a court and his or her release ordered if the detention is not lawful. This provision provides involuntarily committed mental patients the right to judicial protection (judicial review) concerning the lawfulness of their detention, which is undoubtedly one of the most important rights arising from Article 5 of the ECHR. Independent judicial review within the framework of which courts speedily decide whether detention has been ordered lawfully is essential in order to safeguard such patients' rights. The requirement determined by the fourth paragraph of Article 5 of the ECHR is fulfilled if mental patients are guaranteed the possibility to propose that a court verify whether the statutory grounds for involuntary commitment (still) exist, or, if automatic periodic verification is provided for, whether grounds for involuntary commitment still exist. Such position of the ECtHR already follows from the Winterwerp case, in which the Court stated that it was essential that the person concerned should have "access to a court" and "the opportunity to be heard either in person or, where necessary, through some form of representation." Hence, the ECtHR requires even in such procedures that the right to an adversarial procedure be respected. The so-called "equality of arms" must be ensured in court proceedings, with regard to which it is important that the involuntarily committed person has the right to access records that contain information on the basis of which he or she was committed, and to submit evidence to the contrary.<sup>11</sup>
14. An involuntarily committed mental patient also has the fundamental procedural right to be represented in court proceedings by a counsel.<sup>12</sup> In particular, in cases

---

10 Judgment of the ECtHR in Van der Leer v. The Netherlands, Ser. A, No. 170, Para. 27.

11 In Nikolova v. Bulgaria (Reports of Judgments and Decisions 1999-II), the ECtHR stated that equality of arms is not ensured if a court denies access to those documents in the investigation file that are essential for the adoption of the decision on the lawfulness of detention.

12 In Megyeri v. Germany (Ser. A, No. 237-A), the ECtHR established a violation of the right determined by the fourth paragraph of Article 5 of the ECHR because the applicant was not provided legal representation in proceedings before the court when the court examined the grounds for detention. The ECtHR explained that persons involuntarily committed to a psychiatric hospital for having committed a criminal offence, which they cannot be held responsible for on account of their mental illness, must be provided legal representation not only in the procedure for ordering involuntary commitment, but also for determining the duration of such measure and release from the psychiatric hospital.

where the patient is incapable of ensuring the exercise of his or her own rights in the proceedings, it is necessary to provide him or her legal representation, as the right to judicial protection would otherwise be merely ink on paper. According to the ECtHR, the court carrying out the proceedings should assess on a case-by-case basis and considering the circumstances of the case, whether the person concerned is capable of exercising his or her rights in the proceedings him- or herself. Were it to conclude that this is not the case, the involuntarily committed person must be provided legal representation at the state's expense. The importance of the protected value (i.e. the protection of personal liberty) and the situation of a patient who is in a state of diminished mental capacity, certainly justify the conclusion that the patient must be provided appropriate representation in such proceedings.

15. Article 8 of the ECHR is important from the viewpoint of the patient's rights during treatment in a psychiatric hospital; on the basis of this Article everyone has the right to respect for his or her family life, home, and correspondence. Public authorities may not interfere with the exercise of this right unless such is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety, or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others (the second paragraph of Article 8 of the ECHR). The position of the ECtHR is that the right to private life also includes one's mental integrity. In the event of psychiatric detention [i.e. commitment], Article 8 of the ECHR is relevant from various perspectives, for example from the perspective of the freedom of correspondence, the right to adequate housing, access to non-pharmacological treatment, access to fresh air and recreation, the privacy of visits, the confidentiality of medical information, the right to be aware of current events, etc. Any interference with privacy must be in conformity with the law and justified by the achievement of a (certain) legitimate goal. The more serious an interference with an individual's rights is, the more it must be justified and substantiated by the state. Article 8 of the ECHR not only provides for the right to correspondence, but also to telephone and electronic communication. The "right to communicate" is emphasised, due to which the state must not limit communications, except in the cases stated in the second paragraph of Article 8 of the ECHR. The right to correspondence and consultation with one's counsel is particularly important from the viewpoint of the protection of human rights.

The ECtHR emphasises that privacy and confidentiality must be ensured in such context. Any limitation of the right to send documents to the court and to receive documents from it would also constitute a violation of Article 8 of the ECHR. Furthermore, the provision of Article 3 of the ECHR must be noted, which prohibits torture and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment of individuals. The prohibition is absolute. The ECtHR stresses that this is a fundamental right that allows no exceptions or limitations. Considering the particular vulnerability of persons with mental disorders, this must be given special attention in cases of involuntary commitment to a psychiatric hospital so as to avoid any violation of Article 3 of the ECHR. This applies in particular to the application of compulsory treatment and coercive and confinement measures (see Paragraphs 22 and 23 of the reasoning).

16. The provisions on the protection of the rights of mental patients are also included in the CHRБ, which is considered the first international human rights document that refers to biology and medicine.

It regulates very sensitive issues regarding interferences with one's physical and mental integrity.<sup>13</sup> Article 7 of the Convention expressly regulates the protection of persons with mental disorders. A person who has a mental disorder of a serious nature may be subjected, without his or her consent, to a medical procedure aimed at treating his or her mental disorder only where, without such treatment, serious harm is likely to result to his or her health, with regard to which it is necessary to observe the protective conditions prescribed by law, including supervisory, control, and appeal procedures. In emergency medical cases, where the appropriate consent cannot be obtained, any medically necessary procedures may be carried out immediately for the benefit of the health of the individual concerned (Article 8 of the CHRБ). However, in such cases the individual's will and the desires he or she expressed prior to the occurrence of the circumstance that rendered him or her incapable of giving valid consent need to be taken into account (Article 9 of the CHRБ). Article 10 of the CHRБ guarantees the right to privacy and the right to be informed [of his or her health]. On the basis of this provision, everyone has the right to have his or her privacy concerning the information regarding his or her health respected.

Everyone has the right to be informed of all collected information regarding his or her health. However, an individual's wish that such information not be communicated to him or her must also be respected. Only as an exception may the exercise of these rights be limited by law for the patient's benefit.

B – III

17. By enacting involuntary commitment to a closed ward of a psychiatric hospital, the legislature indeed interfered with the right to personal liberty (the first paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution), the right to the protection of one's mental integrity (Article 35 of the Constitution), and the right to voluntary treatment (the third paragraph of Article 51 of the Constitution); however, the legislature had a legitimate, i.e. objectively justifiable, aim for such interference (see Paragraphs 7 and 8 of the reasoning). From this perspective, the interference at issue is not inadmissible, as the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution determines that human rights and fundamental freedoms may be limited by the rights of others or due to the public interest. While an interference with human rights may only be based on a legitimate, objectively justifiable aim, the established constitutional case law also requires that it must always be assessed whether such aim is in accordance with the principles of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution), namely with that principle that prohibits excessive interferences by the state even in cases where such pursue a legitimate aim (the general principle of proportionality). The Constitutional Court carries out the assessment of whether an interference is excessive on the basis of the so-called strict test of proportionality. This test comprises an assessment of three aspects of the interference:

---

13 See V. Žnidaršič, Konvenција o človekovih pravicah v zvezi z biomedicino [Convention on Human Rights and Biomedicine], Pravna praksa, No. 22/98.

- 1) whether an interference is really absolutely necessary (indispensable), in the sense that the aim cannot possibly be achieved without (any) interference, or that the aim cannot be achieved without the assessed interference (at issue) by some other, milder, interference;
- 2) whether the assessed interference is appropriate for achieving the pursued aim, in the sense that the pursued aim can in fact be achieved by the interference; if such aim cannot be achieved thereby, the interference is not appropriate;
- 3) whether the gravity of the consequences of the assessed interference with the affected human right is proportionate to the value of the pursued aim and the benefits that will occur as a result of such interference (the principle of proportionality in the narrower sense or, [simply,] the principle of proportionality).

Only if the interference passes all three phases of the test is it constitutionally admissible. This also applies to cases where the interference is admissible due to the rights of others or the public interest, as well as to cases where the limitation of a human right is expressly allowed by the Constitution. Even the constitutional authorisation granted to the legislature to limit a human right (in the case at issue, the authorisation to limit individuals' right to personal liberty and to prescribe exemptions from voluntary treatment) does not entail that the legislature may determine limitations or interferences arbitrarily. The general constitutional principle of proportionality must be considered in every limitation of human rights and fundamental freedoms, regardless of the basis on which the legitimacy of the limitation rests.

The Review of the Provisions of Chapter 7 of the NLCPA

18. Chapter 7 (Articles 70–81) of the NLCPA regulates the procedure for involuntarily committing persons to psychiatric health care institutions. In the procedure for involuntarily committing persons to psychiatric health care institutions and other institutions or departments of institutions that are intended for the treatment of mental patients (hereinafter referred to as health care institutions), a court must decide, on the basis of Article 70 of the NLCPA, on the involuntary commitment of persons to a closed ward of a health care institution if due to the nature of the mental disorder or the person's mental state it is absolutely necessary that his or her freedom of movement be limited or that the person be prevented from having contact with the outside world because he or she poses a danger to his or her own life or the lives of others, or causes serious harm to him- or herself or to others. If a health care institution commits a person to a closed ward for treatment without his or her consent or without a court order, the authorised person of this institution must, without delay, and at the latest within 48 hours, notify the court of local jurisdiction thereof (the first paragraph of Article 71 of the NLCPA). The notification of involuntary commitment must comprise information regarding the committed person, his or her health status, and the person who brought him or her to the health care institution (the second paragraph of Article 71 of the NLCPA). It is deemed that a person is committed to a health care institution involuntarily if his or her actions, medical findings regarding his or her mental state, and other circumstances indicate that the person is capable of expressing his or her will and actually refuses to undergo treatment at the health care institution, or if medical findings regarding the committed person's mental state indicate that he or she cannot express his or her will, or if the committed person is a minor or a person deprived of legal capacity (the third paragraph of Article 71 of the NLCPA). The court must initiate the proceedings ex officio as soon as it receives the notification of involuntary commitment or learns in another way of the involuntary commitment of a particular person to a health care institution (the second paragraph of Article 73 of the NLCPA). In the procedure for involuntary commitment, the court must, without delay, and at the latest within three days after it receives the notification of involuntary commitment, visit the involuntarily committed person in the health care institution and question him or her, unless such questioning would harm his or her treatment or if this is impossible considering the person's medical condition (Article 74 of the NLCPA). In the procedure for involuntary commitment, the court must question the doctors who are treating the involuntarily committed person, as well as other persons who can provide information regarding the committed person's mental state. The court orders that the committed person be examined by a psychiatric specialist from another health care institution (Article 75 of the NLCPA). On the basis of the evidence taken, the court decides whether the committed person should remain involuntarily committed to the health care institution or released (the first paragraph of Article 76 of the NLCPA). If the court decides that the person is to remain involuntarily committed to the health care institution, it determines the period of involuntary commitment, which may not exceed one year. The court must issue the decision without delay, and at the latest within 30 days of receipt of the notification of involuntary commitment (the second paragraph of Article 76 of the NLCPA). The health care institution may also transfer the involuntarily committed person from a closed ward to an open ward, or discharge him or her from the health care institution even before the expiry of the time period determined in the involuntary commitment order, provided that it establishes that the grounds for involuntary commitment have ceased to exist. In such case, the health care institution does not have the duty to inform the court of the return of the involuntarily committed person to a closed ward until the expiry of the time period determined in the involuntary commitment order (the third paragraph of Article 76 of the NLCPA). The court must serve the order on the involuntarily committed person, his or her legal representative or guardian, the competent social security authority, and the health care institution (the first paragraph of Article 77 of the NLCPA). The involuntarily committed person, his or her legal representative or guardian, the competent social security authority, his or her spouse or the person with whom the involuntarily committed person lives in a long-term partnership, his or her lineal or second degree collateral relative, or the health care institution may appeal against the involuntary commitment order (the second paragraph of Article 77 of the NLCPA). The appeal must be filed within three days and it does not suspend the execution of the order (the third and fourth paragraphs of Article 77 of the NLCPA). The court of second instance must decide on the appeal within three days (the fifth paragraph of Article 77 of the NLCPA). An appeal to the Supreme Court is admissible against the decision of the court of second instance (the sixth paragraph of Article 77 of the NLCPA). If the health care institution establishes that the treatment of the involuntarily committed person must continue beyond the expiry of the period determined in the involuntary commitment order, it must propose to the court at least 15 days before the expiry of the time period, or 30 days if the period of involuntary commitment has been longer than three months, that it extend the involuntary commitment. The court must decide on the matter before the expiry of the involuntary commitment period (Article 79 of the NLCPA). On the proposal of the involuntarily committed person, his or her legal representative or guardian, the competent social security authority, his or her spouse or the person with whom the involuntarily committed person lives in a long-term partnership, or his or her lineal or second degree collateral relative, or ex officio, the court may decide to release the involuntarily committed person from the closed ward of the health care institution before the expiry of such a time period as determined in the involuntary commitment order, provided that it concludes that the grounds for involuntary commitment have ceased to exist (Article 80 of the NLCPA).

19. The involuntary commitment of a mental patient to a closed ward of a psychiatric hospital undoubtedly constitutes a limitation of personal liberty (the first paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution). Article 70 of the NLCPA determines the substantive grounds for involuntary commitment, stating that the involuntary commitment of a mentally ill person is only admissible if due to the nature of the mental disorder or the person's mental state it is absolutely necessary that his or her freedom of movement be limited or that the person be prevented from having contact with the outside world because he or she poses a danger to his or her own life or the lives or others, or causes serious harm to him- or herself or to others. As already mentioned, whenever a limitation of human rights and fundamental freedoms is at issue, the general constitutional principle of proportionality as one of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution) must be observed. On the one hand, this constitutional principle requires that in determining conditions for involuntary commitment the legislature provide courts the possibility to assess whether the interference is necessary, in the sense that the desired aim cannot be achieved by any other means. On the other hand, it also imposes on the legislature the duty to restrict the measure of involuntary commitment only to cases where such a measure is in reasonable proportion to the aim, i.e. to the value that is to be protected by such interference, and to the reasonably expected effect of such protection. The Constitutional Court established that the legislature did not fully fulfil the mentioned requirements in the regulation of involuntary commitment. Namely, in addition to the involuntary commitment of a mental patient, the NLCPA does not prescribe any other measures for achieving the same aim. The legislature thereby violated the principle of proportionality, which requires that in pursuing the constitutionally admissible aim (i.e., in the case at issue, averting the danger that the patient poses to him- or herself or to others due to his or her mental illness, and eliminating the causes of the danger) it choose the means by which it interferes with human rights in accordance with the criterion of absolute necessity (indispensability). The assessment in accordance with the criterion of absolute necessity requires that the legislature provide for alternative measures<sup>14</sup> that are in conformity with the principle of proportionality and appropriate for achieving individual legislative aims. Involuntary commitment to a closed ward of a psychiatric hospital is a measure that should only be applied in cases where it is impossible to eliminate the danger by means of other measures outside (a closed ward) of a psychiatric hospital. Since the legislature did not provide for any other measures aside from involuntary commitment to a psychiatric hospital, it interfered, contrary to Article 2 of the Constitution, with personal liberty as guaranteed by the first paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution.

20. One of the fundamental rights that every involuntarily committed mental patient must be guaranteed is the right to judicial protection concerning the lawfulness of involuntary commitment. This right follows from the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution. An essential part of the right to judicial protection is the right to a trial without undue delay. Its purpose is to ensure the effectiveness of judicial protection; belated judicial protection may namely nullify its effects. If judicial protection is provided too late, the affected person would be in a position equivalent to that if no judicial protection were provided at all.<sup>15</sup> The requirement of prompt judicial protection regarding the lawfulness of detention [i.e. involuntary commitment] in a psychiatric hospital also follows from the provision of the fourth paragraph of Article 5 of the ECHR, on the basis of which everyone who is deprived of his or her liberty by arrest or detention is entitled to initiate proceedings by which the lawfulness of his or her detention is to be decided speedily by a court and his or her release ordered if the detention is not lawful. The NLCPA prescribes judicial review of the lawfulness of involuntary commitment. The proceedings are initiated ex officio as soon as the court receives notification of involuntary commitment or learns in any other way of the involuntary commitment of a particular person to a health care institution (the second paragraph of Article 73 of the NLCPA). However, the time period for the issuance of the order determined by the second paragraph of Article 76 of the NLCPA

---

14 Dutch law, for example, determines that involuntary commitment is only admissible if it is not possible to provide treatment outside a psychiatric hospital (Article 20). Similar is stated by the Austrian and Bavarian laws; Article 3 of the latter determines different forms of help outside a psychiatric hospital. Taken from A. Galič, Pravna ureditev neprostoVOLjne hospitalizacije v psihiatrični bolnišnici [The Legal Regulation of Involuntary Commitment to a Psychiatric Hospital]; in A. Polajnar - Pavčnik, D. Wedam Lukić (Eds.), Pravo in medicina [The Law and Medicine], in the Pravna obzorja collection, Cankarjeva založba, Ljubljana 1998, p. 298.

15 J. Čebulj, in: L. Šturm, (Ed.), Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije [Commentary on the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia], Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Ljubljana 2002, p. 253, Para. 2.

(the court must issue the order without delay, and at the latest within thirty days of receipt of the notification of involuntary commitment) may in some cases be too long. The Constitutional Court assesses that in proceedings to review the lawfulness of involuntary commitment to a closed ward of a psychiatric hospital the legislature should have provided for appropriately short time periods for decision-making, as only prompt judicial review of the lawfulness of involuntary commitment can ensure effective protection of patients' rights. The thirty-day time period for the issuance of a court order is (or may be) too long, especially if it transpires that the involuntary commitment to a psychiatric hospital was ordered unlawfully. The legislature can indeed determine a certain reasonably short time period necessary for the observation of the patient when it is not yet certain whether he or she is in fact mentally ill and dangerous as a result thereof.<sup>16</sup> Attention should also be drawn to the deficiency of the provision of the first paragraph of Article 76 of the NLCPA, which states that the court must decide, on the basis of the evidence taken, whether the involuntarily committed person should remain involuntarily committed to the health care institution or released. It can be discerned from the wording of this statutory provision that the court decides merely on whether the involuntarily committed person should "remain involuntarily committed" to the psychiatric hospital, but not on the lawfulness of the original deprivation of liberty (involuntary commitment). Another obstacle in establishing whether the original involuntary commitment had been ordered lawfully is posed by the provision of the second paragraph of Article 71 of the NLCPA, which determines the mandatory content of the notification of involuntary commitment that the authorised person of the health care institution sends to the court. The notification of involuntary commitment must include information regarding the committed person, his or her health status, and the person who brought him or her to the health care institution. The Act does not determine expressly whether the notification should also include the grounds that necessitated ordering that the patient be involuntarily committed. However, only on the basis of these grounds can the court assess whether involuntary commitment was indeed necessary in a particular case (ultima ratio). With regard to the above, the Constitutional Court assesses that the challenged statutory provision is inconsistent with the right to (effective) judicial protection as guaranteed by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution.

21. The right to adversarial judicial proceedings as a fundamental human right requires respect for the principle of the equality of arms. The regulation of proceedings compliant with this principle ensures the equal status of parties and is therefore the most important expression of the right to equal protection of rights before a court (Article 22 of the Constitution). Courts must give each party the opportunity to make a statement regarding the allegations and claims of the opposing party. It follows from the Constitution that proceedings must be carried out by observing the fundamental requirement of equality and the procedural balance of parties, and by observing their right to defend themselves from all procedural acts that may affect their rights or interests. In such manner, proceedings are based on respect for human personality, as they provide everyone the opportunity to have a say in proceedings that affect his or her rights and interests, thereby preventing a person from becoming merely an object of proceedings. Parties to proceedings and everyone with a status equal to that of a party must therefore be allowed to present arguments supporting their positions and to make a statement regarding both points of law and fact. Each party must be ensured the right to state facts and evidence, and to make a statement regarding the claims of the opposing party and the results of the taking of evidence, as well as the right to be present when evidence is taken. The right of a party to make a statement in the proceedings is correlative to the duty of the court to record all allegations made by the party, assess their relevance, and take a position in the reasoning of the judgment on those claims that are crucial for the decision (See Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-39/95, dated 16 January 1997, OdlUS VI, 71). The requirement of adversarial proceedings as an expression of the right to the equal protection of rights must be observed in all proceedings, including the procedure for involuntarily committing persons to psychiatric hospitals. Accordingly, Article 4 of the NLCPA determines that parties to proceedings must be given the opportunity to make a statement regarding the claims of other parties, to participate in the taking of evidence, and to discuss the results of the proceedings. Hence, each party must be allowed to actively participate in the proceedings and thereby defend his or her rights and interests before the court. The provision of Article 74 of the NLCPA, which imposes on courts the duty to question the involuntarily committed person unless such questioning would harm his or her treatment or if this is impossible considering the person's medical condition, does not limit the principle of adversarial proceedings. A court may indeed omit the questioning of the patient from the evidentiary material that it uses to create an opinion on his or her health status, however this does not deprive the patient of his or her right to actively participate in the proceedings.<sup>17</sup> It must be emphasised that in any event the court must allow the involuntarily committed person to make a statement, and take his or her statement into account.<sup>18</sup> However, it must also be taken into consideration in such context that due to his or her illness, the patient him- or herself is in most cases unable to or incapable of exercising the right to active participation in the proceedings and thereby to defend his or her rights (including the right to appeal determined by Article 30 of the NLCPA). It is not enough that the Act merely formally recognises the right to active participation before a court (which is a manifestation of equality before a court determined by Article 22 of the Constitution) and that it recognises in principle the constitutional right to appeal (Article 25 of the Constitution). From the Constitution there also follows the requirement to ensure effective and actual implementation of constitutional rights. If the law does not provide for the actual implementation of these rights, the constitutional rights to equality before a court and appeal are in effect violated. A patient who is incapable of understanding and invoking his or her rights in the proceedings must therefore be provided appropriate representation, which shall constitute effective protection of the rights and interests of the patient in the proceedings. Since the challenged provisions of the NLCPA do not provide for that, they are inconsistent with Articles 22 and 25 of the Constitution.

16 B. v. France (52 Decisions and Reports, Paras. 111 and 125). Taken from A. Galič, Pravna ureditev neprostoVOLjne hospitalizacije v psihiatrični bolnišnici [The Legal Regulation of Involuntary Commitment to a Psychiatric Hospital]; in A. Polajnar - Pavčnik, D. Wedam Lukić (Eds.), Pravo in medicina [The Law and Medicine], in the Pravna obzorja collection, Cankarjeva založba, Ljubljana 1998, p. 290.

17 Taken from A. Galič, Pravna ureditev neprostovoljne hospitalizacije v psihiatrični bolnišnici [The Legal Regulation of Involuntary Commitment to a Psychiatric Hospital]; in A. Polajnar - Pavčnik, D. Wedam Lukić (Eds.), Pravo in medicina [The Law and Medicine], in the Pravna obzorja collection, Cankarjeva založba, Ljubljana 1998, pp. 303, 304.

18 D. Wedam Lukić, A. Polajnar - Pavčnik, Nepravdni postopek, Zakon s komentarjem [Non-litigious Civil Procedure, The Act with Commentary], 1989, pp. 14 and 67.

22. A further shortcoming of the legislation currently in force is the lack of legal regulation of the status and rights of patients during involuntary commitment in a closed ward of a psychiatric hospital. Neither the NLCPA nor the HSA regulate the rights and legal status of patients in psychiatric hospitals after the issuance of the involuntary commitment order. The obligation to observe the rights of mental patients during their treatment in psychiatric hospitals follows from Article 35 of the Constitution, as well as from Articles 3 and 8 of the ECHR, and Articles 7, 8, and 10 of the CHRB. Special attention is accorded to the protection of the personality rights of mental patients and the protection of their dignity. Limitations of patients' rights are allowed only under conditions expressly determined at the constitutional level and by law.<sup>19</sup> The measure of the involuntary commitment of a patient to a psychiatric hospital is clearly associated with treatment (and thus carried out at a hospital). One of its purposes is to eliminate the causes that led to this measure. Hence, the involuntary commitment of a patient to a psychiatric hospital includes certain types of treatment that follow from the very purpose and nature of such measure. Understandably, this cannot constitute unlimited authorisation to perform any treatment measures without appropriate external supervision. The requirement of supervision over the performance of treatment measures also follows from Article 7 of the CHRB, which states that a person who has a mental disorder of a serious nature may be subjected, without his or her consent, to a medical procedure aimed at treating his or her mental disorder only where, without such treatment, serious harm is likely to result to his or her health, with regard to which it is necessary to observe the protective conditions prescribed by law, including supervisory, control, and appeal procedures. Where, according to law, an adult does not have the capacity to consent to a medical procedure because of a mental disability, a disease, or for similar reasons, the procedure may only be carried out with the authorisation of his or her representative or an authority or a person or body provided for by law. The individual concerned must as far as possible take part in the authorisation procedure (the third paragraph of Article 6 of the CHRB). It must be taken into consideration that involuntary commitment to a psychiatric hospital in and of itself does not automatically entail that the patient does not have mental capacity and is thus incapable of forming an intention concerning the treatment that is legally valid. Among involuntarily committed mental patients there are also patients who can understand the cause and importance of treatment, and are thus capable of expressing their will; hence, treatment against their will is not admissible.<sup>20</sup> The legislature should therefore have determined, on the one hand, the types of treatment that follow from the very purpose and nature of involuntary commitment and that are logically connected therewith, and the types of treatment that exceed such framework and necessitate the express consent of the patient, on the other. The Constitutional Court established that the lack of legal regulation of the status and rights of patients during their involuntary commitment to psychiatric hospitals represents an unconstitutional legal gap inconsistent with the principle of legal certainty (Article 2 of the Constitution). The challenged statutory regulation is also inconsistent with the third paragraph of Article 51 of the Constitution, which imposes upon the legislature the duty to determine cases in which involuntary treatment is admissible.

19 In foreign legal systems (e.g. Austrian, Dutch, American), the rights of patients during treatment in a psychiatric hospital are determined in considerable detail (e.g. the right to written communication with the outside world and one's patient advocate, the right to visits, the protection of human personality and dignity, etc.). Therein, the conditions under which it is admissible to limit a patient's movement in a hospital and, in particular, the admissibility of the application of involuntary medical and protective measures during a hospital stay, are expressly determined.

23. It is necessary to distinguish treatment measures from coercion and limitation measures, whose purpose is to ensure safety when a patient poses a direct danger to him- or herself or to others in the hospital (other patients or medical personnel). The NLCPA does not state anything regarding the application of these measures, which means that the decision on the application of coercive and limitation measures depends merely on the assessment of the psychiatrist treating individual patients. In order to protect patients' rights, the legislature should have clearly defined the cases and conditions that allow the application of coercive and limitation measures. In addition, a certain form of supervision (control mechanisms) over the application of these measures should have been provided for.<sup>21</sup>
24. Having established that the NLCPA does not regulate certain important issues associated with the involuntary commitment of persons to a closed ward of a psychiatric hospital (see Paragraphs 17 through 23 of the reasoning), the Constitutional Court established, in conformity with the provision of Article 48 of the CCA, the unconstitutionality of the challenged statutory provisions (Point 1 of the operative provisions). The Constitutional Court opted to adopt a declaratory decision because the abrogation of the challenged provisions would cause an unconstitutional legal gap. The interconnectedness of the challenged provisions of the NLCPA namely renders 20 Cf. the first paragraph of Article 36 of the Austrian Unterbringungsgesetz. Treatment against the will of the patient is only admissible for patients with mental incapacity, whereby his or her consent is substituted for by a parent or guardian, who may also express, on the patient's behalf, his or her will as to the treatment (the second paragraph of Article 36 of the Austrian Unterbringungsgesetz). If there is no such representative, the admissibility of the measure is decided on by a court (the third paragraph of Article 36 of the Austrian Unterbringungsgesetz).

---

21 Article 33 of the Austrian Unterbringungsgesetz, for example, states that the court shall decide without delay on the admissibility of the measure, at the request of the patient or his or her representative.

it impossible to exclude and abrogate only individual provisions of this Chapter. The abrogation of the entire chapter would cause the abolishment of the institute of involuntary commitment to a closed ward of a psychiatric hospital in its entirety. The Constitutional Court set a time limit of six months by which the legislature must regulate anew the procedure for the involuntary commitment of persons to psychiatric hospitals, taking into account the reasons stated in the present Decision. The Constitutional Court decided on such a time limit because it is evident from the report of the Human Rights Ombudsman that a new draft act (entitled the “Mental Health Act”) has already been prepared, which, it has been claimed, comprehensively regulates the institute of involuntary commitment to a closed ward of a psychiatric hospital.

25. In order to provide, until the challenged statutory regulation is harmonised with the requirements set forth in the present Decision, involuntarily committed persons fundamental procedural safeguards in decision-making on involuntary commitment to a closed ward of a psychiatric hospital, the Constitutional Court also determined, on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA, the manner of the implementation of the Decision (Point 4 of the operative provisions). The Constitutional Court determined that, until the established unconstitutionality is remedied, upon the initiation of the procedure, all involuntarily committed persons shall be ex officio assigned a counsel by a court. It furthermore decided that the notification of involuntary commitment that the authorised person of the health care institution is obliged to submit to the court shall also contain the grounds substantiating the absolute necessity of involuntary commitment.

The Review of the First Paragraph of Article 49 of the HSA

26. The referral and involuntary commitment of a patient to treatment in a psychiatric hospital are also regulated by the first paragraph of Article 49 of the HSA. The latter regulates the possibility to refer a patient who due to mental illness poses a danger to his or her own life or to the lives of others, or causes serious harm to him- or herself, or to others, to treatment in a psychiatric hospital even without his or her consent. It should be emphasised that the conditions for the referral and involuntary commitment of a patient to treatment in a psychiatric hospital determined by the first paragraph of Article 49 of the HSA are intended solely for the doctor’s assessment. On the basis of objective health standards, the doctor must establish whether a mental illness is present and, from the medical point of view, assess the danger that the patient poses to others or to him- or herself due to such illness. It is on the basis of such assessment that the doctor decides whether referral for treatment in a psychiatric hospital is necessary or not. However, the question of whether the nature of the mental illness requires that the patient’s freedom of movement be limited and that his or her contact with the outside world be prevented is subject to a legal assessment, which is carried out by a court. In proceedings to decide upon the lawfulness of the involuntary commitment of a patient to a closed ward of a psychiatric hospital, the court assesses whether the conditions determined by Article 70 of the NLCPA have been fulfilled. Hence, the basis for the court’s assessment is not the first paragraph of Article 49 of the HSA, but Article 70 of the NLCPA. Considering the above, the Constitutional Court assesses that the provision of the first paragraph of Article 49 of the HSA is not inconsistent with the Constitution.

B – IV

The Review of the Sixth Indent of Article 47 of the HSA

27. In accordance with the provision of the sixth indent of Article 47 of the HSA, everyone has the right under equal conditions and in accordance with the law to access medical records referring to his or her health status, unless a doctor concludes that this could adversely affect the patient's health.
28. The petitioner draws attention to the fact that the limitation of the right to access medical records results in affected persons not being informed of the purpose and nature of the medical procedure, as well as of its consequences and risks, due to which they are unable to effectively exercise their right to complain as guaranteed by the ninth indent of Article 47 of the HSA, and the right to judicial protection guaranteed by the fourth paragraph of Article 15 and Article 23 of the Constitution, and Article 23 of the CHRB. According to the petitioner, the sixth indent of Article 47 of the HSA constitutes a violation of the rights determined by Article 25 of the Constitution, Article 13 of the ECHR, the third paragraph of Article 38 of the Constitution, and the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution.
29. The right of a patient to access his or her medical records constitutes an important underpinning aspect of informed consent in the treatment process, and the limitation of this right constitutes a severe limitation of the patient's right to judicial protection. Without access to his or her records, the patient often cannot decide to seek judicial protection or perhaps to undergo treatment with another doctor or in another health care institution. Moreover, in a given case, once the event has already occurred and all of its consequences are already known, the expertise of a doctor's treatment can only be assessed on the basis of existing medical records.<sup>22</sup>
30. The legislature has limited a patient's right to directly access his or her medical records due to the possibility of false interpretation of the diagnoses in the records. The objective of the legislature was to prevent the potential occurrence of adverse consequences for the patient's health. In such context, the constitutionally protected value is a patient's right to medical treatment as guaranteed by the first paragraph of Article 51 of the Constitution. The limitation of a patient's right to access his or her medical records constitutes an interference with another constitutional right of the patient that is guaranteed by the third paragraph of Article 38 of the Constitution, i.e. the patient's right to access the collected personal data that relates to him or her, and the right to judicial protection in the event of any abuse of such data. The Constitutional Court assesses an interference with a human right on the basis of the so-called strict test of proportionality, as explained in Paragraph 17 of the reasoning of the present

---

22 V. Flis, Medicinska dokumentacija in pravice bolnikov [Medical Records and the Rights of Patients], Pravna praksa, No. 19/98.

Decision. In the case at issue, the Constitutional Court carried out an assessment of whether the interference with the patient's constitutional right to access his medical data is admissible due to the protection of another constitutional right of the patient, i.e. the right to medical treatment. As stated in Paragraph 17 of the reasoning above, limitations of constitutional rights intended to protect the rights of others are only admissible if three [cumulative] conditions of the principle of proportionality are fulfilled: necessity, appropriateness, and proportionality in the narrower sense. The Constitutional Court applied the mentioned criteria also in the case at issue, which concerned a conflict between two human rights of the same person.

31. After assessing whether an interference with a patient's constitutional right to access his or her medical data is necessary to achieve the desired, constitutionally admissible aim of preventing the occurrence of adverse consequences for the patient's health, the Constitutional Court established that indeed the legislature could not have achieved such aim by any milder measure. The very wording of the provision of the sixth indent of Article 47 of the HSA contains the criterion of necessity, as the limitation of a patient's right to access his or her medical records is only admissible where such is necessary to avoid adverse consequences for the patient's health. Neither can there be any doubt regarding the appropriateness of the measure that the legislature selected for achieving its legitimate aim, for it is undoubtedly possible to achieve such an aim by limiting access to one's medical records.
32. In the framework of the assessment of proportionality in the narrower sense, the Constitutional Court weighs the importance of the right affected by the interference against the right to be protected by such interference, and determines the weight of the interference according to how affected the right is. It follows from Article 51 of the Constitution that the state must provide – with respect to the given conditions – appropriate medical treatment possibilities directed towards ensuring an individual's health. Health care may be understood in the broader sense (as including a variety of measures, including preventive ones, that have a direct or indirect positive impact on the preservation or improvement of health), or in the narrower sense as treatment in cases of individuals' direct need for health care. The constitutional right to health care includes both aspects.<sup>23</sup> The limitation of the right to access medical records concerns the broader aspect of the right to health care. It entails a preventive measure whose purpose is to prevent the occurrence of adverse consequences for an individual's health. It should be emphasised in such context that the limitation of the right to access medical records does not interfere with the patient's right to learn of the diagnosis of his or her illness and the scope, manner, quality, and expected length of treatment (the third indent of Article 47 of the HSA). Moreover, the limitation of the right to access medical records must be considered an exception to only be applied where necessary (in exceptional cases).
33. The fourth paragraph of Article 8 of the Health Care Databases Act (Official Gazette

23 B. Kresal, in: L. Šturm (Ed.), Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije [Commentary on the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia], Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Ljubljana 2002, p. 548, Para. 8.

RS, No. 65/2000 – hereinafter referred to as the HCDA) determines that the procedure determining how individual citizens can exercise their right to access their personal health data is prescribed by the minister responsible for health care. As the HCDA does not contain any particular provisions regulating the right to access personal health data, the provisions of the PDPA regulating this right must be taken into account. Article 18 of the PDPA determines that a personal data file controller must enable an individual, upon his or her request, to access personal data contained in the personal data file that refer to him or her, and grant him or her the permission to copy such data (point 1 of the first paragraph of Article 18 of the PDPA), and as well provide such individual a copy of the personal data contained in the personal data file that refer to him or her (point 2 of the first paragraph of Article 18 of the PDPA). The data controller must enable the individual to access and copy personal data in accordance with point 1 of the first paragraph of this Article within a period of 15 days following receipt of the request, or inform him or her in the same period in writing of the grounds due to which access and copying will not be allowed (the third paragraph of Article 18 of the PDPA). Hence, in accordance with the mentioned statutory provision, a patient has the right to access and copy data contained in his or her medical records. The exemption provided for by the sixth indent of Article 47 of the HSA must be interpreted restrictively and used only in exceptional cases where accessing health data could actually harm the patient's health. In comparative legal systems, this limitation is applied precisely in relation to psychiatric records.<sup>24</sup> In any event, should there arise a dispute with the doctor, the patient can request that he or she be granted access to the entirety of his or her medical records through a court. The patient is provided this possibility by the provision of Article 20 of the PDPA, on the basis of which an individual who establishes that his or her rights determined by that Act are being violated may request, by means of an action, judicial protection for as long as the violation persists. If the violation has ceased, the individual may still file an action for a declaration that a violation occurred. Such an action is decided on by the Administrative Court in accordance with the provisions of the law regulating proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts, unless otherwise determined by the PDPA. The proceedings initiated by such an action are urgent proceedings.

34. As regards the special rules and principles to be applied in addition to the general rules and principles concerning personal data in the field of medicine, in 1997 the Council of Ministers of the Council of Europe adopted a special Recommendation (No. R (97) 5) on the Protection of Medical Data. The Recommendation includes,

---

24 For more detail on the regulation of this issue in other countries, see V. Flis, Medicinska dokumentacija in pravice bolnikov [Medical Records and the Rights of Patients], Pravna praksa, No. 19/98. The German Federal Court restricted the limitation of a patient's right to access his or her own medical records only to individual cases of psychiatric and psychotherapeutic treatment. In accordance with the cited judgment of this Court, also a psychiatric patient has an unlimited right to access all objective medical data (lab reports, x-ray images, etc.), while the psychiatrist may limit or prevent the patient's access to his or her own [i.e. the psychiatrist's] personal notes and assessments in the records, the disclosure of which could severely disturb the treatment process or the psychiatrist-patient relationship.

inter alia, provisions on the right to access data. The person to whom the medical data refer should have the right to access such data either directly, through a doctor, or through a health-care professional employed at the institution. The information must be accessible in an understandable form. Access may only be limited if so determined by law and only in expressly determined cases, including, inter alia, in the event that access to medical data would harm the health of the person whom the data refer to and who requests access thereto.<sup>25</sup>

35. As already stated, the limitation of the right to access medical records must be considered an exception to only be applied where necessary (in exceptional cases). As a general rule, the doctor must, at the patient's request, at all times and unconditionally enable the patient to access all of his or her objective and original medical data, and to transfer the content of the data (by copying). In exceptional cases, the doctor may limit or prevent access to his or her own personal notes and assessments in the records, the disclosure of which could severely disturb the treatment process or the doctor-patient relationship. This is the only way the challenged provision of the sixth indent of Article 47 of the HSA can be interpreted. It is of essential importance that in the event of a dispute with a doctor, the patient can exercise his or her right to access medical records through a court (in proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts). Considering all of the above, the Constitutional Court assesses that the challenged provision of the sixth indent of Article 47 of the HSA is not inconsistent with the Constitution.

B – V

The Review of Article 48 of the HSA

36. On the basis of the provision of Article 48 of the HSA, an emergency medical procedure may be carried out without the prior consent of the patient, but only if the patient is incapable of making a decision thereon due to his or her health condition.
37. The HSA in principle also resolves the issue of the consent of the patient and the associated explanatory duty.<sup>26</sup> On the basis of Article 47 of the HSA, everyone is guaranteed the following rights:
- to learn of the diagnosis of his or her illness and the scope, manner, quality, and expected length of treatment;
  - to give consent to any medical procedure and to be informed in advance of all possible diagnosis and treatment methods, and their consequences and effects;
  - to reject the proposed medical procedures.

For children under the age of 15 and persons under guardianship, these rights are exercised by their parents or guardians (the second paragraph of Article 47 of the HSA). The provision of Article 48, on the other hand, refers to situations where the patient's 25 Taken from J. Čebulj, Načela varstva osebnih podatkov na področju medicine [The Principles of the Protection of Personal Data in the Field of Medicine], Pravna praksa, No. 19/98.

26 A. Polajnar - Pavčnik, Obligacijski vidiki razmerja med bolnikom in zdravnikom [Aspects under the Law of Obligations concerning the Relationship Between Patient and Doctor]; in A. Polajnar - Pavčnik, D. Wedam Lukić (Eds.), Pravo in medicina [The Law and Medicine], in the Pravna obzorja collection, Cankarjeva založba, Ljubljana 1998, p. 113.

health condition renders him or her incapable of giving consent to an emergency medical procedure. As a general rule, the doctor must respect the patient's right to make decisions about him- or herself, which is based on appropriate information regarding the relevant facts that refer to the medical procedure.<sup>27</sup> However, in the event that the patient's health condition renders him or her incapable of giving prior consent and the medical procedure must be urgently carried out, the patient's objective interest in being healthy must also be taken into account. In such an event, deeming the patient's right to make decisions about him- or herself to be an absolute right would be excessive.

38. The CHRB, too, determines that in emergency medical cases, where the appropriate consent cannot be obtained, any medically necessary procedures may be carried out immediately for the benefit of the health of the individual concerned (Article 8). In such cases, the wishes of the individual relating to a medical procedure expressed prior to the moment when the situation preventing him or her from giving valid consent arose must be taken into account (Article 9 of the CHRB). Also important is the provision of the first paragraph of Article 6 of the CHRB, which determines that, subject to the provisions of Articles 17 and 20 of the Convention, a medical procedure may only be carried out on a person who does not have the capacity to consent, for his or her direct benefit. Where, according to law, an adult does not have the capacity to consent to a medical procedure because of a mental disability, an illness, or for similar reasons, the procedure may only be carried out with the authorisation of his or her representative, or an authority or a person or body provided for by law (the third paragraph of Article 6 of the CHRB).
39. Article 48 of the HSA deals with the conflict of two personality rights of the patient, the right to life and health, on one hand, and the right to make decisions about oneself, on the other. Both of these two personality rights are also protected at the constitutional level, as they are derived from Article 35 of the Constitution. The aim that the legislature pursued in drafting the provision of Article 48 of the HSA was the protection (preservation) of the patient's life. In order to achieve this aim, the legislature interfered with the patient's right to make decisions about him- or herself. The Constitutional Court therefore assessed whether the interference with the mentioned right of the patient is admissible in order to safeguard another of his or her personality rights, i.e. the right to life and health. As already stated in Paragraph 17 of the reasoning, the Constitutional Court assesses every interference with a human right in accordance with the strict test of proportionality.
40. The Constitutional Court first assessed whether the interference with the right to make decisions about oneself is necessary to achieve the legislature's admissible aim, i.e. to protect the patient's life. It follows from the wording of the Act that only an emergency [i.e. absolutely necessary] medical procedure may be carried out without the prior consent of the patient. The decision on when a medical procedure is absolutely necessary must be left to the medical profession. Only a doctor can decide on the basis of the rules of the medical profession whether the health condition of the person concerned is such that it is urgently necessary to perform a particular medical procedure. These are cases of extreme urgency, when the person concerned cannot give consent, and the medical procedure cannot be refused.<sup>28</sup> In the context of the assessment of the provision of Article 48 of the HSA, it must be emphasised that personality rights not only include the right to make decisions about oneself, but are also directed towards the protection of life and health.<sup>29</sup> In such cases, the doctor is bound by the ethical maxim to preserve life. In a conflict of personality rights, with the right to make decisions about oneself on the one hand, and the right to life and health, on the other, the latter prevails. These are exceptional cases where the protection of the right to life and health cannot be guaranteed without an interference with the right to make decisions about oneself. Human life is beyond a doubt one of the fundamental values protected by the Constitution. The Constitutional Court thus assesses that the interference with the right to make decisions about oneself that the legislature determined by Article 48 of the HSA is necessary and appropriate for achieving the desired legitimate aim i.e. to protect the patient's life.

---

27 Ibidem.

41. In the assessment of proportionality in the narrower sense, the Constitutional Court weighs the importance of the right affected by the interference against the right to be protected by such interference, and determines the weight of the interference according to how affected the right is. The very wording of the provision of Article 48 of the HSA contains the criterion of proportionality, as the legislature envisaged an interference with the right to make decisions about oneself only for emergency cases, where the patient's health condition renders him or her incapable of forming a legally relevant intent and the medical procedure is urgently necessary. In emergency cases, the doctor must act so as to save the patient's life. In such cases, the law draws on the conclusion that the doctor, were there to be a violation of the right to make decisions about oneself, will later be able to observe this right; if, however, due to doubt, the doctor had not saved the patient's life, this right would have been lost forever.
42. Considering all of the above, the Constitutional Court decided that the provision of Article 48 of the HSA is not inconsistent with Article 35 of the Constitution.

B – VI

The Review of Article 51 of the HSA

43. In accordance with the provision of the fourth paragraph of Article 51 of the HSA, only the treating physician can give the patient's close relatives or guardian information regarding the patient's health condition. The petitioner alleges that this provision is inconsistent with Articles 35 and 38 of the Constitution, Article 8 of the ECHR, and also the first paragraph of Article 10 of the CHRB. The mentioned statutory provision allegedly allows an interference with the inviolability of an indi-28 Cf. A. Finžgar, Osebnostne pravice [Personality Rights], Slovenska akademija znanosti in umetnosti, Ljubljana 1985, p. 67.

29 A. Polajnar - Pavčnik: A person's will is pushed to the background also in certain other instances, for example in instances of first aid, treatment following an attempted suicide, and euthanasia, where the doctor does not and must not follow the patient's will, but is bound by the ethical maxim to preserve life (p. 115).

vidual's privacy and the right to the protection of personal data without fulfilling the conditions determined therefor by the Constitution and international legal acts.

44. The petitioner's allegation is unfounded. The mentioned statutory provision must namely be interpreted in conjunction with the provision of the seventh indent of Article 47 of the HSA, on the basis of which anyone may request that medical staff and their co-workers not provide information on his or her health condition to anyone without his or her express consent. Hence, every patient has the possibility to expressly prohibit the provision of any information on his or her health condition, even to his or her closest relatives. This also applies to cases of treatment in a psychiatric hospital.

C

45. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of Articles 21, 48, and the second paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA, and the second indent of the third paragraph of Article 46 of the Rules of Procedure of the Constitutional Court (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 93/03 and 98/03 – corr.), composed of: Dr Dragica Wedam Lukić, President, and Judges Dr Janez Čebulj, Lojze Janko, Mag. Marija Krisper Kramberger, Milojka Modrijan, Dr Ciril Ribičič, Dr Mirjam Škrk, and Jože Tratnik. The decision was reached unanimously.

Dr Dragica Wedam Lukić
President

Decision No. U-I-294/12, dated 10 June 2015

DECISION

At a session held on 10 June 2015 in proceedings to review constitutionality initiated upon the request of the Human Rights Ombudsman, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. The third sentence of the second paragraph and the third sentence of the third paragraph of Article 74 of the Mental Health Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 77/08) are abrogated.
2. The abrogation shall take effect one year following the publication of the present Decision in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia.
3. Until a different statutory regulation is adopted or, at the latest, until the expiry of the time limit referred to in the preceding Point, judicial review regarding the deprivation of liberty of persons deprived of legal capacity must be ensured. A person deprived of legal capacity shall be committed to a secure ward of a social care institution with the permission of his or her legal representative. Within eight days of a person's commitment to a secure ward, the social care institution must submit to a court the proposal for the person's commitment in accordance with the procedure determined by Article 75 of the Mental Health Act.
4. In cases where persons deprived of legal capacity have been committed to secure wards on the basis of the regulation referred to in Point 1 of the operative provisions of this Decision and are still committed thereto on the day of the publication of this Decision, social care institutions must submit to a court, within 30 days from the publication of this Decision in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia, the proposal for the person's commitment in accordance with the procedure determined by Article 75 of the Mental Health Act.

Reasoning

A

1. The applicant challenges the second and third paragraphs of Article 74 of the Mental Health Act (hereinafter referred to as the MHA) in the part in which it regulates the procedure for committing a person deprived of legal capacity to a secure ward of a social care institution. It is of the opinion that the challenged regulation is inconsistent with the third and fourth paragraphs of Article 5 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 33/94, MP, and 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR), as well as with Articles 14, 19, 22, and 23 of the Constitution, because it does not ensure judicial protection to a person deprived of legal capacity in the event he or she is committed to a secure ward of a social care institution with the consent of his or her legal representative. It underlines that the challenged regulation does not even enable a person deprived of legal capacity to participate in the procedure for commitment to a secure ward. The commitment of a person deprived of legal capacity to a secure ward is namely deemed, in accordance with Article 74 of the MHA, to entail voluntary commitment, although it is only the legal representative who gives his or her consent to the commitment. In connection therewith, the MHA also does not determine any form of supervision over the decision made by the person's legal representative. Legal protection is allegedly completely excluded in such cases. Such a regulation allegedly differs significantly from the previous regulation determined by the Non-litigious Civil Procedure Act (Official Gazette SRS, Nos. 30/86, etc. – hereinafter referred to as the NLCPA), which determined, in Article 71, that the commitment of a person deprived of legal capacity entailed involuntary commitment, and provided for judicial review of such. With regard to the above, the applicant is of the opinion that in comparison with the regulation previously in force, the MHA substantially worsened the position of such persons and exposed them to the risk of possible abuses. Any person who with the consent of his or her legal representative is committed to a secure ward should be ensured the procedural safeguards determined by the third and fourth paragraphs of Article 5 of the ECHR. Since this is not so, the challenged regulation is allegedly inconsistent with Article 5 of the ECHR and Article 8 of the Constitution. The applicant is also of the opinion that the challenged regulation is inconsistent with Article 19 of the Constitution, as it concerns a de facto deprivation of liberty and an interference with the right to personal liberty (the first paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution), with regard to which the MHA does not determine a procedure in which, after the procedure for taking evidence is carried out, an appropriate (judicial) authority would decide on a proposal for the limitation of the right to personal liberty of a person deprived of legal capacity. Allegedly, the challenged regulation does not provide such a person even the basic safeguards that would allow the procedure to be fair and adversarial, i.e. the right to a counsel and the right to request that a court-appointed expert witness who is not bound (e.g. contractually) by the institution to which the person is to be committed give his or her opinion on the person's health condition. Such a person is thus allegedly put in a position that is worse than that of a person not deprived of legal capacity. The applicant is of the opinion that in cases where what is at issue is the question of the personal liberty of an individual, the legal representative should only be empowered to assist the person deprived of legal capacity to make a decision and should not be empowered to represent such a person in expressing his or her will or even to substitute for the will of such person. The applicant draws attention to the fact that this interference with personal liberty has no limitations and that there is no supervision over it. Only the legal representative of such a person can withdraw his or her consent to the commitment thereof to a secure ward. Such an interference with personal freedom is thus allegedly arbitrary and unacceptable. Allegedly, in Shtukaturv v. Russia, dated 27 March 2008 and in Stanev v. Bulgaria, dated 17 January 2012, also the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR) expressly drew attention to the need for judicial review in such cases. Furthermore, various legal acts of the Council of Europe, as well as the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (Official Gazette RS, No. 37/08, MP, No. 10/08 – hereinafter referred to as the CRPD), express the need to ensure the protection of the human rights and dignity of persons with mental disorders, especially those who are committed or treated against their will. The challenged regulation is allegedly also inconsistent with Article 23 of the Constitution, as judicial protection regarding the lawfulness of their commitment is not ensured to such persons. Since the challenged regulation also does not determine the possibility of their (active) participation before a court and, hence, does not ensure effective exercise of their rights, it is, allegedly, also inconsistent with Article 22 of the Constitution. Persons deprived of legal capacity who with the consent of their legal representative are committed to a secure ward are allegedly also in an unequal position in comparison with other persons that are involuntarily committed in conformity with the MHA, which allegedly also constitutes a violation of Article 14 of the Constitution. Namely, only in a situation concerning the former does their legal representative exclusively decide on both commitment to and discharge from such a ward.

2. In its reply to the applicant's request, the National Assembly alleges that the challenged regulation is based on the presumption that such a person is not capable of forming an intention and therefore cannot give his or her consent. Since a person deprived of legal capacity is allegedly incapable of consenting, his or her will is substituted for by the will of his or her guardian. The Marriage and Family Relations Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 69/04 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the MFRA), which regulates the tasks of the guardian of a person deprived of legal capacity, also introduced mechanisms designed to ensure the protection of a ward's interests and determined the obligation of supervision over the guardian's work and his or her obligation to report to a social work centre. For such reason, the National Assembly is of the opinion that in proceedings for depriving such a person of legal capacity, as well as in the procedure in which he or she is placed under guardianship, in the procedure for appointing or discharging a guardian, and in the determination of the scope of the guardian's tasks, such a person is ensured legal, i.e. judicial, protection. Due to the protection of the rights of persons in the field of mental health, the MHA also provided for the institute of a representative. According to the National Assembly, although the challenged regulation interferes with personal liberty, it cannot be equated with the deprivation of liberty within the meaning of the fourth paragraph of Article 5 of the ECHR and Articles 19, 32, 34, and 35 of the Constitution. It is also of the opinion that the other alleged inconsistencies of the challenged regulation with the Constitution do not exist.

3. Also the Government submitted an opinion, in which it draws attention to the fact that in order to commit a person deprived of legal capacity to a secure ward the conditions set out in the first paragraph of Article 74 of the MHA must be fulfilled and the consent of his or her legal representative must be given. The conditions determined by the first paragraph allegedly entail the principal grounds for commitment to a secure ward. The existence of these grounds must allegedly be monitored and verified throughout the stay of the person concerned in a secure ward. The social care institution should therefore establish by itself that with regard to a certain person there exists a need for permanent care and protection that cannot be provided in any other manner. If during the provision of services to a person in such a ward it is established that the grounds for the placement of this person in such a ward have ceased, i.e. that the conditions determined by the first paragraph of Article 74 of the MHA have ceased, then such a person should allegedly be transferred, i.e. discharged, from the secure ward without the necessity to also obtain the consent of his or her legal representative. The Government also disagrees with the allegation of the applicant that the MHA substantially worsened the position of persons deprived of legal capacity. In its opinion, the NLCPA did not regulate the procedure for committing such persons to a secure ward of a social care institution.
4. The reply of the National Assembly and the opinion of the Government were sent to the applicant. In its reply to the allegations of the National Assembly and the Government, the applicant continues to pursue the request and maintains all the allegations contained therein. Concerning the allegations of the Government that the legal representative merely substitutes for the consent of the person in the procedure for commitment to a secure ward of a social care institution after the conditions set out in the first paragraph of Article 74 of the MHA have been fulfilled, it adds that this is precisely where the key disputable part of the challenged regulation lies. Allegedly, it is precisely for this reason (because it is deemed that the matter concerns voluntary commitment) that a person deprived of legal capacity may not even participate in such a procedure. Furthermore, with regard to the allegation of the Government that the challenged regulation follows the line of the regulation of guardianship in the MFRA, the applicant replies that in a study entitled "Daleko od očiju", the Mental Disability Advocacy Centre already drew attention to the disputability of a similar regulation of guardianship in the Republic of Croatia. This study is accessible on the website of that organisation. With regard to the opinion of the Government that before the adoption of the MHA the procedure for committing persons to a secure ward was not statutorily regulated, the applicant states that according to its findings presented in the 2008 Annual Report of the Ombudsman the case law of various local courts differed as regards involuntary commitment to social care institutions and retirement homes.

B

5. The MHA determines the system of health care and social care in the field of mental health, who performs this activity, and the rights of persons during their treatment in a ward under the special supervision of a psychiatric hospital, care in a secure ward of a social care institution, and supervised care (the first paragraph of Article 1 of the MHA). The programmes and services<sup>1</sup> determined by the MHA are carried out as a public service (Article 4 of the MHA).<sup>2</sup>
6. One of the services or programmes determined by the MHA is the provision of care for persons in a secure ward of a social care institution. This entails a form of assistance offered to persons with mental health difficulties whose (psychiatric) treatment has been concluded and with regard to whom the need for acute hospital treatment no longer exists, whose needs, however, do necessitate round-the-clock care, as they are not capable of satisfying by themselves or with the assistance of a home care assistant or relatives their basic life needs (due to which their health might be in danger, and possibly their life as well). Hence, this service covers not only treatment, but also a social care mechanism, due to which care for a person in a secure ward must be deemed to entail a service in which the right to social security determined by the first paragraph of Article 50 of the Constitution and the right to health care determined by the first paragraph of Article 51 of the Constitution are intertwined.
7. A person is committed to a secure ward of a social care institution if all of the following conditions are fulfilled:
  - acute hospital treatment has been concluded or is not necessary;
  - the person needs round-the-clock care that cannot be provided in a domestic environment or otherwise;
  - the person poses a danger to his or her own life or to the life of others, he or she poses a severe danger to his or her own health or to the health of others, or he or she causes substantial material damage to him- or herself, or to others;
  - the danger referred to in the preceding indent is a consequence of a mental disorder due to which the person has a severely disturbed assessment of reality and the capacity to control his or her own actions;
  - the stated causes and dangers referred to in the third and fourth indents of this paragraph cannot be prevented by other forms of assistance (outside of the social care institution, in supervised care);
  - the person fulfils the other conditions for commitment to a social care institu-

---

1 In such manner it regulates the procedures for the commitment of persons (individuals with a mental disorder who are treated or cared for within the framework of the network of providers of mental health programmes and services; point 13 of Article 2 of the MHA) to treatment in a ward under the special supervision of a psychiatric hospital, to care in a secure ward of a social care institution, to supervised care, or to care in a community.

2 The MHA was intended to determine the legal framework for long-term and comprehensively conceived mental health protection (Gazette of the National Assembly, No. 61/08, p. 4). It superseded Articles 70 through 81 of the NLCPA, which regulated the procedure for the involuntary commitment of persons to psychiatric health care institutions. By Decision No. U-I-60/03, dated 4 December 2003 (Official Gazette RS, No. 131/03, and OdlUS XII, 93), the Constitutional Court established that the regulation of involuntary commitment to a closed ward of a psychiatric hospital was (for various reasons) inconsistent with the Constitution.

tion determined by the regulations in the field of social care (the first paragraph of Article 74 of the MHA).

8. If all of the mentioned conditions are fulfilled cumulatively, a person is committed to a secure ward with or without his or her consent (Article 73 of the MHA). Commitment to a secure ward without a person's consent is only admissible on the basis of a court order following a procedure in which Articles 40 through 52 of the MHA are applied mutatis mutandis; these articles regulate commitment to treatment in a psychiatric hospital without consent, namely in a ward under special supervision, on the basis of a court order (Article 75 of the MHA).<sup>3</sup> In the procedure, obligatory representation by an authorised representative who is an attorney is prescribed (the first paragraph of Article 31 of the MHA). The person concerned is examined on the basis of a court order by a court-appointed expert witness, namely a psychiatric expert, who submits his or her opinion on the person's health condition (the first paragraph of Article 43 of the MHA). A court decides on the commitment of the person on the basis of direct contact with him or her so that, before issuing the order, it sees the person and, if his or her health condition allows it, talks to him or her (the second paragraph of Article 46 of the MHA). If the person does not have legal capacity, the court allows him or her to carry out procedural actions by him- or herself if he or she is able to comprehend the meaning and the legal consequences of such actions (the second paragraph of Article 32 of the MHA). As concerns the discharge of a person from a secured ward, Article 71 of the MHA, which regulates the discharge of a person from a ward under special supervision, applies. In the event a person is committed to a secure ward with his or her consent, such consent must be an expression of the person's free will based on comprehension of the situation and formed on the basis of an appropriate explanation regarding the nature and purpose of care for him or her. The consent must be given in written form (the second paragraph of Article 74 of the MHA). A person who has consented to being committed to a secure ward can, at any time, expressly or by actions from which such can be inferred, withdraw his or her consent and request that he or she be discharged from the secured ward.
9. The consent [in the name] of a person deprived of legal capacity<sup>4</sup> to be committed to a secure ward of a social care institution is given by his or her legal representative.<sup>5</sup>

---

3 A person deprived of legal capacity is committed to a psychiatric hospital for treatment in a ward under special supervision on the basis of a court order (Articles 40 through 52 of the MHA). Also the legal representative of such a person may submit a proposal for the commitment thereof to such ward (the second paragraph of Article 40 of the MHA).

4 Persons who due to their mental illness, mental retardation, alcohol or drug dependence, or any other reason that affects their psychophysical condition, are not capable of taking care of themselves and of securing their own rights and interests, shall be partially or entirely deprived of their legal capacity (Article 44 of the NLCPA).

5 Social work centres assign a person deprived of legal capacity a guardian (the first paragraph of Article 206 of the MFRA). A guardian represents his or her ward (the first paragraph of Article 192 of the MFRA). A guardian must in particular foster his or her ward's personality and, in doing so, take into account the reasons due to which the person concerned was deprived of legal capacity. He or she must also strive to eliminate these reasons so as to enable the ward to learn how to live and work independently (Article 207 of the MFRA). In accordance

The latter can also request that his or her ward be discharged, namely by withdrawing his or her consent (the second and third paragraphs of Article 74 of the MHA). In such manner, the legal representative substitutes for the will of the person deprived of legal capacity. For such reason, it is deemed that such a person is being treated and cared for in a secure ward of a social care institution of his or her own volition.

10. The subject of review in the case at issue is the procedure for committing a person deprived of legal capacity to care in a secure ward of a social care institution<sup>6</sup> with the consent of his or her legal representative, as regulated by the third sentence of the second paragraph and the third sentence of the third paragraph of Article 74 of the MHA. The applicant's fundamental allegation is that the challenged regulation, although it is statutorily defined as "voluntary commitment", unconstitutionally interferes with the right of the person deprived of legal capacity to personal liberty determined by the first paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution and the first paragraph of Article 5 of the EHCR.
11. In the first paragraph of Article 19, the Constitution guarantees the right to personal liberty. The Constitution prescribes special safeguards for all instances of limitations of personal liberty. The general safeguard relating to the limitation of the right to personal liberty is determined by the second and third paragraphs of Article 19 of the Constitution. The second paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution determines that no one may be deprived of his or her liberty except in such cases and pursuant to such procedures as are provided by law. An interference with the right to personal liberty is thus only admissible in statutorily determined cases and in accordance with statutorily determined procedures for the deprivation of liberty.<sup>7</sup> The third paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution then determines further safeguards that apply to persons at the moment of being deprived of their liberty (the instruction regarding the grounds for the deprivation of liberty and the instruction regarding certain rights). These procedural safeguards must be taken into account mutatis with the MHA, a guardian as the legal representative of a person deprived of legal capacity can participate in the procedures and measures regulated by that Act in different ways. For instance, he or she can submit a proposal for such a person to be committed without his or her consent, on the basis of a court order, to treatment in a ward under special supervision (the second paragraph of Article 40 of the MHA), a proposal for treatment in supervised care (Article 81 of the MHA), or a proposal to carry out administrative supervision over the ordering and implementation of a special security measure (the eighth paragraph of Article 29 of the MHA).

---

- 6 A social care institution is a general or special public social care institution or holder of a concession that provides services within the framework of a network of a public service and is intended for the protection, accommodation, and life [in general] of persons whose acute hospital treatment related to a mental disorder has concluded or is not necessary.
- 7 The Constitutional Court defined the conditions under which an interference with the personal liberty of an individual is constitutionally admissible already in Decision No. U-I-18/93, dated 11 April 1996 (Official Gazette RS, No. 25/96, and OdlUS V, 40), which referred to the deprivation of liberty in criminal proceedings. It stressed that the Constitution differentiates between [two different expressions for] liberty. No one may be deprived of his or her liberty [in the broader sense]; however, it is possible to temporarily limit it. An individual may namely be deprived of his or her liberty [in the narrower sense], but this must at all times be envisaged and legally regulated from both the substantive and procedural aspects.

mutandis in any procedure for the deprivation of liberty.<sup>8</sup> Hence, it does not follow from the Constitution that regardless of the nature and purpose of the deprivation of liberty the decisions regarding such a measure should (only) be adopted in a criminal procedure or in a procedure that satisfies the safeguards of a criminal procedure.<sup>9</sup>

12. By the second paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution, the constitution-framers determined that the cases in which it is admissible to interfere with the right to personal liberty and the determination of the procedure in accordance with which competent state authorities must act in such instances shall be regulated by law. In doing so, the legislature must observe other constitutional provisions, in particular, the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, in accordance with which human rights and fundamental freedoms may be limited only due to the rights of others and in such cases as are provided by the Constitution. It also must observe the principles of a state governed by the rule of law determined by Article 2 of the Constitution, including, inter alia, the general principle of proportionality, which binds the legislature when determining limitations of human rights. The Constitutional Court stressed already in Decision No. U-I-18/93 that the two mentioned fundamental conditions (i.e. that the law must determine the instances and the procedure for the deprivation of liberty) for an interference with the right to personal liberty to be admissible are determined in more detail in the provisions of the Constitution that follow, in particular, those that regulate constitutional procedural safeguards (i.e. Articles 22, 23, and 25 of the Constitution). Hence, liberty may only be limited in instances expressly determined by law, and in accordance with a procedure that is, taking into account the constitutional procedural safeguards, determined by law. The fundamental prerequisite of a constitutionally consistent limitation of liberty is the right to be the subject of such a procedure.
13. Similarly as in the Constitution, the right to personal liberty is also guaranteed by the first paragraph of Article 5 of the ECHR. The latter provision contains the same obligation as is determined by the second paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution, with the only difference being that it exhaustively determines the instances in which it is admissible to deprive an individual of his or her liberty. Among them, in point (e)<sup>10</sup> of the first paragraph of Article 5 it provides for the lawful detention [i.e. involuntary commitment] of persons of unsound mind (aliénés). The second paragraph of Article 5 determines that everyone who is arrested shall be informed promptly, in a language which he understands, of the reasons for his arrest and of any charge against him. The third and fourth paragraphs of Article 5 then deter-

---

8 Cf. Decisions of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-60/03, dated 4 December 2003 (Official Gazette RS, No. 131/03, and OdlUS XII, 93, Paragraph 12 of the reasoning), and No. Up-153/05, dated 12 May 2005 (Official Gazette RS, No. 53/05, and OdlUS XIV, 42, Paragraph 5 of the reasoning).

9 Cf. Decisions of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-60/03; No. U-I-344/06, dated 20 November 2008 (Official Gazette RS, No. 113/08, and OdlUS XVII, 61); and No. Up-1116/09, dated 3 March 2011 (Official Gazette RS, No. 22/11).

10 This provision refers to very diverse groups of persons. From the case law of the ECtHR it follows that the reason for the deprivation of the liberty of persons referred to therein can be of a medical and/or social nature (Judgment of the ECtHR in Witold Litwa v. Poland, dated 4 April 2000).

mine the procedural safeguards that must be ensured in the procedure for the deprivation of liberty (i.e. bringing the person promptly before a judge; a trial within a reasonable time or his release pending trial; the right to initiate proceedings by which the lawfulness of his detention is decided speedily by a court and his release ordered if the detention is not lawful). The latter safeguard, i.e. the right to judicial protection (judicial review) regarding the lawfulness of detention, is one of the fundamental rights of an involuntarily committed person suffering from a mental disorder. The requirement stated in the fourth paragraph of Article 5 of the ECHR is fulfilled if a person with a mental disorder is ensured the possibility to propose that a court verify whether the statutory grounds for detention (still) exist or if automatic periodic verification of whether grounds for detention still exist is ensured.<sup>11</sup> This position of the ECtHR follows from its judgment in Winterwerp v. the Netherlands, dated 24 October 1979, in which the Court stated that it is of essential importance that persons are ensured access to a court and the possibility to make a statement, either by him- or herself, or, whenever this is not possible, by means of some form of representation. Hence, also in such procedures the ECtHR requires that the right to an adversarial procedure be observed. In proceedings before a court the so-called “equality of arms” must be ensured.<sup>12</sup> In such context, it is important that a person who has been detained [or involuntarily committed] has the possibility to access the documents containing the information on the basis of which he or she has been detained, and to present evidence to his or her benefit.<sup>13</sup>

14. In Winterwerp v. the Netherlands, the ECtHR introduced three fundamental requirements that must be fulfilled in order for the detention of persons with a mental disorder to be lawful.<sup>14</sup> In accordance with the position of the ECtHR, the detention of persons with a mental disorder is only admissible if on the basis of objective health standards a mental disorder (troubles mentaux) is demonstrated and if due to the nature or severity of the mental disorder the patient poses a serious danger to others or to him- or herself. The third requirement refers to the duration of detention. The detention may only last as long as the mental disorder that justifies it persists. The ECtHR stresses that psychiatric involuntary commitment must be medically indicated.<sup>15</sup> However, in cases of emergency it does allow that a person with a mental disorder be involuntarily committed even without a prior exhaustive medical examination.<sup>16</sup> In accordance with the case law of the ECtHR, these requirements do not apply only to instances of involuntary commitment on the basis of a decision by a 11 Cf. the Decision of the Grand Chamber of the ECtHR in Stanev v. Bulgaria.

12 See Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-60/03.

13 In Nikolova v. Bulgaria, dated 25 March 1999, the ECtHR stated that equality of arms is not ensured if a court denies a party access to those documents which are essential in order for a decision on detention to be made.

14 The ECtHR keeps reiterating and underlining these requirements over and over again. See, e.g. the Judgments in Shtukaturov v. Russia, Stanev v. Bulgaria, and Zagidulina v. Russia, dated 2 May 2013.

15 In Varbanov v. Bulgaria, dated 5 October 2000, the ECtHR stressed that an expert medical opinion (assessment) regarding a patient must be based on the current health condition of the person and not merely on past events.

16 Judgment of the ECtHR in X v. the United Kingdom, dated 5 November 1981.

court, but also (even more so) to instances where the commitment of a person is a consequence of the decision or proposal of another natural person, i.e. a guardian of the person committed, with regard to which the authorities in power are in different ways included or involved in the procedure for involuntary commitment.<sup>17</sup>

15. With regard to the fact that the MHA treats the commitment of a person deprived of legal capacity to a secure ward of a social care institution in the same manner as the commitment of a person who gave his or her consent by him- or herself, i.e. as voluntary commitment, it is first necessary to answer the question of whether the case at issue concerns an interference with personal liberty. A person who is committed to a secure ward by the consent of his or her legal representative and not by his or her own consent also cannot leave such ward of his or her own volition. He or she may only leave such in the event the social care institution establishes that the conditions determined by the first paragraph of Article 74 of the MHA are no longer fulfilled or if [the consent for] placement in a secure ward is withdrawn by the person's legal representative. In such context, it must furthermore be noted that the MHA does limit the length of time that a person committed to a secure ward by the consent of his or her legal representative may be placed therein, which differs from the [regulation concerning the] placement of persons in such a ward on the basis of a court order. The length of commitment in a secure ward on the basis of a court order can be determined to be up to one year at most. Prolongation of commitment is only possible on the basis of a court order and under the conditions determined by Article 70 of the MHA. It undoubtedly follows from the above that the challenged regulation interferes with the right of these persons to personal liberty, which is determined by the first paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution.<sup>18</sup>
16. The first requirement for the admissibility of the deprivation of liberty in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution is that the case concerns a situation provided by law. The ECHR expressly determines the cases in which it is admissible to deprive an individual of his or her liberty. The ECHR classifies among such cases the lawful detention of persons of unsound mind (point (e) of the first paragraph of Article 5). Both the ECHR and the Constitution provide equal protection of the right to personal liberty. Therefore, the Constitutional Court carried out the assessment of the challenged regulation within the framework of the Constitution.<sup>19</sup> The first paragraph of Article 74 of the MFRA determines the substantive conditions for the commitment of a person to a secure ward. By defining the conditions (cited

---

17 See also the Judgments of the ECtHR in Shtukaturv v. Russia (concerning an individual who had been committed to a psychiatric hospital); Mihailovs v. Latvia, dated 22 January 2013 (concerning an individual who had been committed to a state social care centre); Storck v. Germany, dated 16 June 2005 (regarding which the police returned a woman who had escaped from a private clinic). In D. D. v. Lithuania, dated 14 February 2012, a guardian proposed that his ward be committed to a social care institution and his proposal was granted by the competent city and social care authorities. These cases are similar to the case at issue.

18 Cf. what was stated above with the Judgments of the ECtHR in Shtukaturv v. Russia, Stanev v. Bulgaria, and Kędzior v. Poland, dated 16 October 2012.

19 Cf. Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-12/12, dated 11 December 2014 (Official Gazette RS, No. 92/14).

in Paragraph 7 of the present reasoning) for the deprivation of the liberty of persons with regard to whom the circumstances set out by the first paragraph of Article 74 of the MHA do exist, the legislature satisfied the requirement to statutorily regulate the interference with the personal liberty of persons suffering from a mental disorder.

17. The second requirement that follows from the second paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution is that the deprivation of liberty is only carried out “pursuant to such procedures as are provided by law”. In Decision No. U-I-18/93 the Constitutional Court stressed that the Constitution determines the framework of the legislature’s regulation of the procedure. Also the procedure has to be determined in advance and in accordance with the constitutional procedural safeguards. Concerning the requirement of the lawfulness of the procedure for the deprivation of liberty, the ECtHR requires not only that the procedure for the deprivation of liberty is to be regulated by law and that each individual deprivation of liberty is to be carried out in accordance with these rules, but also that the statutory regulation is in conformity with the ECHR, including with the general principles expressed or contained therein.<sup>20</sup> It underlines that the “procedure for the deprivation of liberty prescribed by law” must be a fair and proper procedure, i.e. any measure depriving a person of his or her liberty should issue from and be executed by an appropriate authority and should not be arbitrary.<sup>21</sup> The key purpose of the first paragraph of Article 5 of the ECHR is the protection of individuals from arbitrary actions.<sup>22</sup> The ECtHR also stresses that in order for the deprivation of liberty to be “non-arbitrary” within the meaning of the first paragraph of Article 5 of the ECHR, the possibility of an ex post judicial review of the lawfulness of the deprivation of liberty as required by the fourth paragraph of Article 5 of the ECHR does not suffice. The safeguards that follow from the first paragraph of Article 5 of the ECHR cannot be equated with the safeguards that follow from the fourth paragraph of Article 5 of the ECHR. Namely, the first paragraph strictly delimits the circumstances in which a person may be deprived of his or her liberty, whereas the fourth paragraph requires ex post judicial review of the lawfulness of the deprivation of liberty.<sup>23</sup> It is thus necessary to equally ensure the fulfilment of the conditions for the deprivation of liberty and the conditions for the ex post review thereof.
18. Also the Constitution guarantees the mentioned constitutional procedural safeguards. The right to the equal protection of rights determined by Article 22 of the Constitution and the procedural safeguards that follow therefrom must be ensured in all procedures relating to decision-making on the rights, duties, and legal inter-

20 See the Judgments of the ECtHR in Winterwerp v. the Netherlands, Kędzior v. Poland, and Zagidulina v. Russia.

21 See, e.g., the Judgment of the ECtHR in Kędzior v. Poland.

22 The ECtHR stresses in its case law that lawfulness cannot be interpreted narrowly, as it does not concern only legality in the sense of a (mere) regulation by law but something more than that. One can only speak of a lawful deprivation of liberty where a person is deprived thereof in accordance with a procedure upon which not even a shadow of a doubt may be cast regarding its [non-]arbitrariness. See, e.g., the Judgments of the ECtHR in Winterwerp v. the Netherlands; D. D. v. Lithuania; Shtukaturov v. Russia; Sýkora v. the Czech Republic, dated 22 November 2012; and L. M. v. Slovenia, dated 12 June 2014.

23 See the Judgment of the ECtHR in H. L. v. the United Kingdom, dated 5 October 2004.

ests of individuals. The right to make a statement is a direct and the most important expression thereof.<sup>24</sup> It guarantees that everyone has the possibility to make a statement in a procedure that affects his or her rights and interests and thus prevents a person from becoming merely an object of the procedure.<sup>25</sup> The procedure for the commitment of a person deprived of legal capacity to a secure ward of a social care institution does not give such person the right to make a statement or any possibility whatsoever to participate in the procedure for the deprivation of his or her liberty. The fact that in such a procedure persons deprived of legal capacity are denied the rights determined by Article 22 of the Constitution is a consequence of the erroneous presumption (see the reply of the opposing party, Paragraph 2 of the reasoning) that persons without legal capacity<sup>26</sup> also do not have the capacity to give consent to a medical procedure or another similar measure or to refuse such. The assessment of whether an individual (not only a person suffering from a mental disorder) has the capacity to give consent is reserved for a doctor or some other [authorised] provider of medical care. Since a person's consent is required for each individual medical procedure or treatment, a doctor assesses such consent in each individual case of treatment separately. The legislature must expressly prescribe any exceptions to this rule. A necessary precondition for so-called informed consent<sup>27</sup> to be given is that the duty of explanation has been fulfilled, to which a doctor is bound (also) by the third paragraph of Article 51 of the Constitution, in accordance with which no one may be compelled to undergo medical treatment except in cases provided by law.<sup>28</sup> When giving an explanation, a doctor must always proceed from the circumstances of the individual case and must always adapt the explanation to each individual patient.<sup>29</sup> In order for the consent to be legally valid, (merely) the 24 See A. Galič in: L. Šturm (Ed.), Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije, Dopolnitev – A [Commentary on the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia, Supplement – A], Fakulteta za državne in evropske študije, Ljubljana 2011, pp. 276–277.

25 See also Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-60/03.

26 Legal capacity is a legally recognised capacity to express one's intention to be legally bound and to thereby form, amend, or terminate legal relations by one's own actions (see Z. Krušič Matè, Pravica do zasebnosti v medicini [The Right to Privacy in Medicine], GV Založba, Ljubljana 2010, p. 54).

27 Consent regarding a medical procedure is only legally valid if the patient is fully informed regarding such procedure. The doctor must explain to the patient, in a manner he understands, everything that is necessary for him or her to be appropriately informed of the medical procedure and treatment. Only when the doctor fulfils this obligation can the consent be attributed real meaning, as only the informedness ensures the possibility to decide; once the doctor fulfils this obligation, the patient can shape his or her will in a legally valid manner (A. Polajnar Pavčnik, Varstvo človekovih pravic med zdravljenjem [The Protection of Human Rights During Treatment], (Part 1), Podjetje in delo, No. 6 (1998)). For more on informed consent, see Z. Krušič Matè, op. cit., pp. 44–108.

28 Cf. B. Ivanc in: L. Šturm (Ed.), Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije, Dopolnitev – A [Commentary on the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia, Supplement – A], Fakulteta za državne in evropske študije, Ljubljana 2011, pp. 852–853.

29 See A. Žmitek, Zakon o duševnem zdravju: problemi v praksi [The Mental Health Act: Problems in Practice], Pravna praksa, No. 33 (2009), pp. 6–9. The author states that from both the human side as well as due to the better cooperation of the patient during the treatment, voluntary commitment is significantly more appropriate fact that the person has mental capacity – i.e. a certain level of maturity<sup>30</sup> that allows the person to comprehend the meaning of the explanation and to appropriately decide on the basis thereof – suffices.<sup>31</sup> On the other hand, this means that even a person who has been deprived of legal capacity (and placed under guardianship) due to his or her mental health problems might be able to give consent to a medical or similar procedure, and also that a person might not be able to give valid consent to a medical procedure although he or she has not been deprived of legal capacity.<sup>32</sup> Hence, the mere fact that a person has been deprived of legal capacity cannot entail that the person is not capable of comprehending the importance and consequences of his or her decision in other fields where legal capacity is not required in order for his or her decisions to be valid.<sup>33</sup>

19. (In fact,) the MHA derives the criteria for [assessing] the capacity to give or reject consent from the Patient Rights Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/08 – hereinafter referred to as the PRA),<sup>34</sup> which in relation to the MHA is a general regulation. When determining the measure at issue, the legislature neglected the positions adopted in legal theory and case law that were stated in the preceding paragraph (and which also the PRA is based on). Therefore, due to the presumption that a person deprived of legal capacity is also incapable of giving or refusing consent to his or her treatment and care in a secure ward, the challenged regulation introduces an automatism that renders the assessment of whether a person is capable of giving or refusing his or her consent completely impossible, and thereby prevents him or her from being included in the procedure for the deprivation of his or her liberty. The will of such person and thereby all the safeguards of a fair trial that are guaranteed to him or her within the framework of Article 22 of the Constitution are replaced by a statement of the person's legal representative. The care that is exercised by the

---

than involuntary commitment. See also J. Markič, Pridržanje oseb z motnjami v duševnem zdravju [Involuntary Commitment of Persons with Mental Health Disorders], Pravna praksa, Nos. 16–17 (2009), pp. 6–7.

- 30 In modern law, the capacity to consent (aptitude à consentir) is in general linked with mental capacity in decision-making, i.e. the capacity to comprehend the meaning and consequences of one's decision. See B. Novak, D. Korošec, B. Ivanc, and J. Balažic in: J. Balažic, U. Brulc, B. Ivanc, D. Korošec, K. Kralj, B. Novak, N. Pirc Musar, and A. Robida, Zakon o pacientovih pravicah s komentarjem [The Patient Rights Act with Commentary], GV Založba, Ljubljana 2009, p. 42. This is also stated in A. Polajnar-Pavčnik, Obligacijski vidiki razmerja med bolnikom in zdravnikom, Pravo in medicina [Aspects under the Law of Obligations concerning the Relationship Between Patient and Doctor; in: The Law and Medicine], Cankarjeva založba, Ljubljana 1998, p. 106).
- 31 Z. Krušič Matè, op. cit., p. 55.
- 32 B. Novak, D. Korošec, B. Ivanc, and J. Balažic, op. cit., p. 42.
- 33 Cf. Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-346/02, dated 10 July 2003 (Official Gazette RS, No. 73/03, and OdlUS XII, 70). See also the Judgments of the ECtHR in Kędzior v. Poland, Stanev v. Bulgaria, and Shtukaturov v. Russia.
- 34 In accordance with the PRA, a person has the capacity to adopt decisions regarding him- or herself if, with respect to his or her age, maturity, health condition, and other personal circumstances, the person is capable of comprehending the meaning and consequences of the invocation of rights determined by that Act, in particular of consent, refusal, or withdrawal of the refusal to accept a medical procedure or health care (point 19 of Article 2 of the PRA).

legal representative or guardian for his or her ward in accordance with the express statutory definition (Article 207 of the MFRA) cannot be interpreted as meaning that it also includes decision-making on the deprivation of the person's liberty for the purpose of his or her treatment or placement in a social care institution. The deprivation of liberty concerns a value so important that it must be a consequence of a decision adopted in a fair trial. In such context, it must be underlined that when persons with mental disorders and thus possibly also with difficulties with the exercise of their (free) will are at issue, a fair and proper procedure must, despite this fact, ensure such persons as comprehensive and complete participation in the procedure as possible and thereby also the exercise of their human rights and fundamental freedoms. Also the first paragraph of Article 52 of the Constitution, which guarantees persons with disabilities special protection in accordance with the law, obliges the legislature to adopt such (adapted) regulation of the procedure.<sup>35</sup> In such a procedure also a legal representative (a guardian of a person deprived of legal capacity) can be included in an appropriate manner, as care for his or her ward is his or her fundamental task. He or she must thereby also observe the CRPD, by signing of which the Republic of Slovenia committed itself to ensuring and promoting the full realisation of all human rights and fundamental freedoms for all persons with disabilities without discrimination of any kind on the basis of disability and to adopting all appropriate legislative, administrative, and other measures for the implementation of the rights recognised in the [mentioned] Convention (Article 4 of the CRPD).<sup>36</sup> In such context, also the positions of the UN Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities with regard to the general obligations of the Member States under the CRPD must be underlined.<sup>37</sup> The Committee draws attention to the fact that the CRPD requires signatory states to abolish guardianship systems (including the deprivation of legal capacity) and their replacement with systems of support during the decision-making.<sup>38</sup>

20. The challenged regulation of the commitment of persons deprived of legal capacity to a secure ward of a social care institution does not fulfil the requirements that follow, with regard to the procedure in accordance with which such persons can be deprived of their liberty, from the second paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution (and which are defined in more detail by other constitutional provisions). Due

---

35 Cf. the Judgments of the ECtHR in Zagidulina v. Russia and Stanev v. Bulgaria.

36 Also the European Union ratified the CRPD. It has applied therein since 25 January 2011.

37 United Nations, Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, Eleventh Session, 31 March–11 April 2014, General Comment No. 1 (2014), Article 12: Equal recognition before the law, adopted on 11 April 2014. The text is accessible in several languages on the following website: http://tbinternet.ohchr.org/\_layouts/treatybodyexternal/Download.aspx?symbolno=CRPD/C/GC/1&Lang=en.

38 The Committee also draws attention to the fact that depriving persons with disabilities (or personnes handicapées) of legal capacity and their commitment to institutions against their will, i.e. without their consent or on the basis of the consent of their guardian, entails an arbitrary deprivation of liberty and violates Articles 12 (equal recognition before the law) and 14 (liberty and security of the person) of the CRPD.

to their inconsistency with the second paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution (Point 1 of the operative provisions), the Constitutional Court abrogated the third sentence of the second paragraph of Article 74 of the MHA, which reads as follows: “Consent for a person deprived of legal capacity shall be given by his or her legal representative,” and the third sentence of the third paragraph of Article 74 of the MHA, which reads as follows: “In the event the person’s legal representative withdraws his or her consent, the social care institution shall proceed in the same manner.”

21. The Constitutional Court decided that the abrogation shall take effect one year following the publication of the present Decision in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia (Article 161 of the Constitution and Article 43 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 64/07 – official consolidated text, and 109/12 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA)). The reason why it opted for such a solution is that the complexity of the regulated content renders an immediate abrogation impossible. In order to provide the legislature with enough time to regulate the procedure for the commitment of persons deprived of legal capacity to secure wards of social care institutions in a constitutionally consistent manner, and taking into account the reasons stated in this Decision, the Constitutional Court decided to suspend the effect of the abrogation for the longest period possible, i.e. for one year (Point 2 of the operative provisions).
22. In order to ensure, during the period of suspended effect of abrogation, at least the essential procedural safeguards when limiting the personal freedom of persons deprived of legal capacity, the Constitutional Court determined, on the basis of its authorisation determined by the second paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA, the manner of the implementation of its Decision. It determined that, during this period, an ex post judicial review regarding the commitment of persons deprived of legal capacity to secure wards of social care institutions shall be ensured. To this end, social care institutions must submit to a court, within eight days of the commitment of a person deprived of legal capacity to a secure ward, a proposal to carry out the procedure determined by Article 75 of the MHA (Point 3 of the operative provisions). In order to ensure persons deprived of legal capacity who on the day of the publication of this Decision are [still] committed to secure wards of social care institutions equal fundamental constitutional procedural safeguards, the Constitutional Court determined, also as regards these persons, the manner of the implementation of this Decision. It determined that social care institutions must submit to a court, within 30 days of the publication of this Decision in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia, a proposal to initiate a procedure in accordance with Article 75 of the MHA (Point 4 of the operative provisions). In such manner, ex post judicial control as determined by Article 75 of the MHA will be ensured to both persons deprived of legal capacity who are placed in secure wards, and to persons who have yet to be committed to secure wards during the time period until a constitutionally consistent statutory regulation is adopted or until the expiry of the period of suspended effect of abrogation referred to in Point 2 of the operative provisions of this Decision.

C

23. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of Article 43 and the second paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA, composed of: Mag. Miroslav Mozetič, President, and Judges Dr Mitja Deisinger, Dr Dunja Jadek Pensa, Mag. Marta Klampfer, Dr Etelka Korpič – Horvat, Dr Ernest Petrič, Jasna Pogačar, and Dr Jadranka Sovdat. The decision was reached unanimously.

Mag. Miroslav Mozetič

President

Decision No. Up-333/96, dated 1 July 1999

DECISION

At a session held on 1 July 1999 in proceedings to decide upon the constitutional complaint of R. M. from L., the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. Supreme Court Judgment No. U 1195/94, dated 11 September 1996, Decision of the Ministry of the Interior No. 0013/7-226/179-94, dated 18 July 1994, and Decision of the Secretariat for Internal Affairs of the City of Ljubljana No. P-226/4-2190/94, dated 8 June 1994, are annulled.
2. Supreme Court Judgment No. I Uv 14/95, dated 16 October 1997, is annulled.
3. Until a law regulating the status of citizens of other successor states to the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the Republic of Slovenia is adopted or until the expiration of the deadlines set out therein, the Administrative Unit must register the complainant in the register of permanent residents of the Republic of Slovenia and issue the complainant a driving licence for this period.

Reasoning

A

1. The complainant has had a registered permanent residence in Slovenia and lived here since 1965. Since he, as a citizen of another republic of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (hereinafter referred to as the SFRY), failed to apply for Slovene citizenship in accordance with Article 40 of the Citizenship of the Republic of Slovenia Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 1/91-I, 30/91-I, 38/92, 61/92 – OdlUS, and 13/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CRSA) following Slovenia's independence, the Ljubljana Administrative Unit removed him ex officio from the register of permanent residents on 26 February 1992 and transferred his details to the register of aliens. The complainant's application for the renewal of his driving licence was also dismissed on the grounds that he, as an alien, did not reside lawfully in the Republic of Slovenia and therefore did not fulfil the criteria for the issuing of a Slovene driving licence determined by Article 112 of the Road Traffic Safety Act (Official Gazette SRS [Socialist Republic of Slovenia], Nos. 5/82, 40/48, 29/86, and Official Gazette RS No. 1/91-I). Therefore, the complainant lodged an “application for protection due to an unlawful act on the part of the respondent that infringes the already acquired constitutional right to choose his place of residence determined by Article 32 of the Constitution” before the Supreme Court. He also initiated proceedings for judicial review of administrative acts with regard to the refusal to renew his driving licence.

Up-333/96

1 July 1999

2. The Supreme Court dismissed the lawsuits in both cases. It took the view that the citizens of other republics of the former SFRY who did not apply for Slovene citizenship in accordance with Article 40 of the CRSA had, in accordance with Article 13 of the Constitutional Act Implementing the Basic Constitutional Charter on the Independence and Sovereignty of the Republic of Slovenia (Official Gazette RS, No. 1/91-I – hereinafter referred to as the CAIBCC), equal rights and obligations as the citizens of the Republic of Slovenia only until 26 February 1992 when the provisions of the Aliens Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 1/91- I, 44/97, and 50/98 – OdlUS – hereinafter referred to as the AA) began to apply to them in accordance with Article 81 of the AA. In the Supreme Court’s opinion, in cases such as the complainant’s case, the legal status of persons who were not citizens of the Republic of Slovenia was changed ex lege, without any administrative act having been issued; therefore, the conduct of the Administrative Unit cannot be deemed an unlawful interference with a constitutional right. Since the complainant, as an alien, failed to initiate proceedings in order to legalise his residence according to the provisions of the AA (he had neither temporary nor permanent residence), the Administrative Unit was correct to also dismiss his application for the renewal of the driving licence.
3. In the constitutional complaint, the complainant emphasises that the position taken by the Supreme Court in the challenged decisions is erroneous. He argues that such an interpretation of the second paragraph of Article 81 of the AA violates the third paragraph of Article 32 of the Constitution and the right to judicial protection determined by Article 23 of the Constitution. He states that he did not deregister his permanent residence in Ljubljana, which he had registered on 30 March 1965, that he did not vacate the property without deregistering, and that he was unlawfully removed from the register of permanent residents by the Administrative Unit. He believes that the change in the legal status of the Republic of Slovenia as a state that the Supreme Court referred to cannot result in the termination of permanent residence as the newly established state is obliged to assume permanent residents in accordance with the generally applicable principles of international law (Article 8 of the Constitution). As no decision regarding his erasure had been issued, he was also deprived of the right to a legal remedy determined by Article 25 of the Constitution. He further asserts that he expressly proposed that the Supreme Court decide on the existence of the already acquired right to permanent residence in the proceedings concerning the renewal of his driving licence as a preliminary question. He also alleges that his right to enjoy private property under the conditions determined by law was violated when his valid driving licence was not renewed. He proposes that the Constitutional Court not only annul the challenged decisions, but also establish that the complainant has had a permanent residence in Ljubljana since 30 March 1965, and order that the Administrative Unit renew his driving licence.

4. By the Order dated 26 May 1999, the Constitutional Court accepted the constitutional complaint for consideration. The Supreme Court did not reply to the constitutional complaint.

B

5. During the proceedings to decide on the constitutional complaint, by way of Decision No. U-I-284/94, dated 4 February 1999 (Official Gazette RS, No. 14/99), the Constitutional Court decided that the AA was inconsistent with the Constitution as it failed to specify the conditions to be met in order for the persons referred to in the second paragraph of Article 81 to obtain a permanent residence permit after the expiration of the time-limit for applying for Slovene citizenship if they did not apply for it, or after the day on which the decision rejecting Slovene citizenship became final; the Constitutional Court further decided that the legislature must remedy the established inconsistency no later than six months following the day of the publication of that Decision in the Official Gazette, and that, until the established inconsistency is remedied, no deportations may be ordered against citizens of another republic of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia according to Article 28 of the AA, provided that on the day of the plebiscite, i.e. 23 December 1990, they had a registered permanent residence in the territory of the Republic of Slovenia and they also actually live in the Republic of Slovenia.
6. In the aforementioned decision, the Constitutional Court found that the AA regulates the acquisition of temporary and permanent residence permits for aliens; however, due to its content, this regulation was not appropriate for the status of the relevant group of citizens of other republics of the former SFRY, and it also could not be applied to these persons by means of statutory and legal analogy. These persons had permanent residence status in the territory of Slovenia in accordance with the regulation in force at the time and they also actually resided in the territory of Slovenia. Permanent residence and actual residence in the territory of the Republic of Slovenia are essential circumstances that place the persons concerned in a special legal position, and therefore the provisions of the AA that regulate the acquisition of permanent and temporary residence are not relevant in their case. The legislature should have regulated the position of the persons concerned or their transition to the status of alien in a special manner in the transitional provisions of the AA or in a special statute. The provisions regulating the different legal positions of aliens are based on the assumption that an alien enters the Republic of Slovenia with the intention of staying there for a certain period of time and gradually begins to arrange his or her legal status as an alien in accordance with the AA (from a temporary residence permit to a permanent residence permit). In its reasoning, the Constitutional Court expressly stated that the provisions of the second paragraph of Article 13 and the first paragraph of Article 16 of the AA should not have been applied to citizens of other republics of the former SFRY who have not obtained Slovene citizenship and that the competent authorities should not have transferred those persons from the existing register of permanent residents into the register of aliens ex officio, without issuing any decision or informing the person concerned thereof. They had no legal basis for such conduct. The Inhabitants' Residence Records and Population Registry Act does not provide for an ex lege deletion of permanent residence. It was on these grounds that the Constitutional Court concluded that the AA – which does not regulate in its transitional provisions the legal status of citizens of other republics of the former SFRY who had permanent residence in the Republic of Slovenia and also actually lived there as aliens in the Republic of Slovenia – violated the principles of a state governed by the rule of law determined by Article 2 of the Constitution. Upon the expiration of the time-limits set out in the second paragraph of Article 81, the citizens of the other republics of the former SFRY found themselves in an uncertain legal position. From the transitional provision that refers to the provisions of the AA these persons could not grasp what kind of status is applicable to them as aliens and which provisions of the Act should apply to them and thus, due to the undetermined legal status of the citizens of other republics as aliens in the Republic of Slovenia, the principle of the protection of trust in the law, which is one of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law, was violated. Apart from this violation, the Constitutional Court also found a violation of Article 14 of the Constitution. In the reasoning of its decision, it stated that at the time when Slovenia gained independence persons resided in the territory of the Republic of Slovenia who had the status of an alien in accordance with the Federal Movement and Residence of Aliens Act (Official Gazette SFRY, Nos. 56//80, 53/85, 30/90, and 26/90) that applied to the territory of the Republic of Slovenia either until independence was gained or until the AA entered into force, as appropriate. The legal status of those persons, who were already deemed aliens before Slovenia gained independence, was regulated in the third paragraph of Article 82 of the AA. It determined that permanent residence permits issued on the basis of the law previously in force shall continue to apply to all aliens who had permanent residence in the territory of the Republic of Slovenia when the AA entered into force. Based on this provision all aliens who had a permanent residence permit were allowed to continue to reside in Slovenia without any new conditions. The Act, however, failed to regulate the transitional legal status of the citizens of other republics of the former SFRY who also legally resided in the territory of Slovenia and had permanent residence there, and as a result they found themselves in a worse legal position than those aliens who already had the status of alien before the Republic of Slovenia gained independence. As there are no objectively justified reasons for the described differentiation that would dictate that the transitional legal status of the citizens of other republics of the former SFRY who had permanent residence in the Republic of Slovenia and legally resided there would have to be substantially different from the legal status of those persons that had already had the status of an alien with permanent residence before Slovenia's independence, the failure to regulate the legal status of those persons entails a violation of the principle of equality determined by the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution.

7. The Supreme Court adopted the challenged decisions already before the unconstitutionality of the AA was established. It took the view that the provisions of the AA that regulate the status of aliens who enter the Republic of Slovenia with the objective of staying there for a certain period of time and gradually begin to arrange their legal status as aliens in accordance with the provisions of the AA (from a temporary residence permit to a permanent residence permit) also apply to the complainant – the citizen of another republic of the former SFRY who had registered permanent residence in the Republic of Slovenia and legally resided in its territory – and that the Administrative Unit lawfully removed the complainant from the register of permanent residents. On the grounds that the Constitutional Court stated in the above-mentioned decision, an interpretation of the AA such as the Supreme Court applied in the challenged decisions is unconstitutional.
8. Equality before the law determined by the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution entails that regulations shall apply to each individual in a non-arbitrary manner. In proceedings before the courts, other state authorities, local community authorities, and bearers of public authority, this implies that these authorities are required, when applying the law to specific cases, to treat equal situations equally without taking into consideration personal circumstances that are not determined as decisive by the legal norm. This entails that the same rules must be applied to the same factual situations or that the same rules must not be applied to fundamentally different factual situations. Article 22 of the Constitution entails the application of the general principle of equality before the law (the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution) to the protection of rights. It is a special case of the principle of legal equality that guarantees to everyone equal protection of rights in proceedings before the courts, other state authorities, local community authorities, and bearers of public authority. An interference with this constitutional right would exist if the individual act was adopted in proceedings wherein the complainant was unable to enforce this right or could enforce it only in a limited way, which could consequently also interfere with another of his rights. Such could also occur if the complainant fulfilled the conditions determined by law for the enforcement or recognition of the right, but was unable to enforce this right due to an unconstitutional or unlawful procedure.
9. The Supreme Court based its decision on Article 81 of the AA, in relation to which the Constitutional Court established in Decision No. U-I-284/94 that the AA is inconsistent with the Constitution due to an unconstitutional legal gap. The interpretation of Article 81 of the AA in the challenged Supreme Court Judgments put the complainant in an unequal position in comparison to aliens that were not citizens of other republics of the former SFRY, but had permanent residence in the Republic of Slovenia when the AA entered into force. Thus the right of the complainant to equality before the law determined by the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution was violated, which, in the proceedings to decide on rights, duties, or legal interests, is expressed as a violation of Article 22 of the Constitution (the equal protection of rights). The Constitutional Court thus granted the constitutional complaint and annulled the challenged decisions.

10. In Decision No. U-I-284/94, wherein the Constitutional Court established that the AA was unconstitutional, it required the legislature to remedy the established unconstitutionality within six months from the day of the publication of the Decision. It follows from the legislative materials (Gazette of the National Assembly, No. 35/99) that the draft of the Act Regulating the Status of Citizens of Other Successor States of the Former SFRY in Slovenia (hereinafter referred to as the ARSCOSS) that will specifically regulate the acquisition of permanent residence permits for citizens of other republics of the former SFRY who did not apply for Slovene citizenship in accordance with the provisions of Article 40 of the CRSA or were issued a negative decision (or the persons referred to in the second paragraph of Article 81 of the AA, which includes the complainant) is in the process of being adopted. Only after the adoption of this law or its entry into force will it be possible to decide on the permanent residence of the complainant. Therefore, until such time, the complainant must be granted the same legal status as he would have had in accordance with Article 13 of the CAIBCC before the deadline determined by the second paragraph of Article 81 of the AA expired. This entails that the address where the complainant had been registered before he was unlawfully removed from the register of permanent residents has to be recognised as his permanent residence until the ARSCOSS is adopted or until the deadlines set out by this Act for resolving his status expire, and that the Administrative Unit must renew the complainant's driving licence for this period. When the ARSCOSS is adopted and enters into force, the complainant will be required to regularise his status in accordance with the provisions of this Act. Therefore, in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 40 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), in Point 3 of the operative provisions, the Constitutional Court determined the authority that is to implement the Decision and the manner of its implementation.
11. As the Constitutional Court already granted the constitutional complaint because the challenged decisions violated the right determined by Article 22 of the Constitution, it was not necessary to consider the violation of the rights determined by Articles 23, 25, 32, and 33 of the Constitution.

C

12. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 40 in conjunction with Article 49 and the first paragraph of Article 59 of the CCA, composed of Franc Testen, President, and Judges Dr Janez Čebulj, Dr Zvonko Fišer, Dr Miroslava Geč-Korošec, Lojze Janko, Dr Lojze Ude, Dr Mirjam Škrk, and Dr Dragica Wedam-Lukić. The decision was reached unanimously.

Franc Testen
President

Decision No. U-I-145/03, dated 23 June 2005

DECISION

At a session held on 23 June 2005 in proceedings to review constitutionality initiated upon the petition of Alenka Reisner, Domžale, and Andrej Lužar, Kamnik, represented by Dr Andrej Berden, Ljubljana, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. In the provision of the third paragraph of Article 11 of the Civil Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 26/99, 96/02, 12/03 – official consolidated text, 2/04, and 36/04 – official consolidated text), the words “a natural person” and “and a legal entity, sole proprietor, or attorney with a maximum fine of 1,000,000 Slovene tolar” are abrogated.
2. The provisions of the fifth to seventh paragraphs of Article 11 of the Civil Procedure Act are abrogated.
3. The provision of Article 109 of the Civil Procedure Act is not inconsistent with the Constitution.

Reasoning

A

1. The petitioners challenge the provisions of the Civil Procedure Act (hereinafter referred to as the CPA) regulating fines for the abuse of procedural rights and the provisions on written submissions insulting the court, a party, or other participant in proceedings. Article 109 of the CPA provides that a civil court shall punish a person who by a written submission insults the court, a party, or other participant in proceedings. The court may fine the offending person on the basis of the provisions of the third to seventh paragraphs of Article 11 of the CPA, and such penalty does not bar additional criminal sanctions in the criminal proceedings. The first paragraph of Article 11 of the CPA contains the principle that proceedings be expeditious and economical and the principle of the prohibition of the abuse of rights. The second paragraph provides the possibility of issuing a fine for the abuse of procedural rights.

U-I-145/03

23 June 2005

The challenged third to seventh paragraphs of Article 11 (which are applied also for fines under Article 109 of the CPA) determine that in the event rights are abused, the court may impose on a natural person a maximum fine of 300,000 Slovene tolar, and a legal entity, sole proprietor, or attorney a maximum fine of 1,000,000 Slovene tolar. The court issues a fine by a court order that determines the deadline for paying the fine, which cannot be shorter than 15 days or longer than three months. If a natural person, sole proprietor, or attorney does not pay the fine within the deadline set by the court, the fine is enforced in the following manner: for every 10,000 Slovene tolar of the fine, a maximum of one day imprisonment is determined, whereas the imprisonment of a natural person cannot exceed 30 days, while for a sole proprietor or attorney the maximum is 100 days. The penalty of imprisonment is enforced pursuant to the act on serving the criminal penalty of imprisonment. The conversion of the fine into imprisonment is decided by a special court order, in accordance with the preceding paragraph [of the Article]. The seventh paragraph of Article 11 of the CPA determines that if a legal entity does not pay the fine within the deadline set by the court, the court shall enforce ex officio this fine increased by 50%. The order on the fine so determined constitutes an execution title.

2. The petitioners argue that the above-mentioned provisions of the CPA are contrary to the principle of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution), the right to equality before the law (Article 14 of the Constitution), the right to judicial protection and to an impartial court (Article 23 of the Constitution), the principle of legality in criminal law (Article 28 of the Constitution), and to freedom of expression (Article 39 of the Constitution). They state that the essential aim of Article 11 of the CPA is to ensure that proceedings are carried out without delay and at the minimum cost possible, and that Article 109 of the CPA extends the fines to instances that do not concern procedural rights and the abuse thereof, but entail a penalty for insults outside the scope of the rules and procedures otherwise determined by penal law. This institution allegedly does not contribute to the speeding up and economy of proceedings, and does not have any relation to the prohibition of the abuse of rights. They opine that it is an institution that is comparable with the sanctioning of verbal offences in the former Yugoslavia, and is as such allegedly intended to protect the structure and system of power against the freedom of speech. Contrary to Article 169 of the Penal Code (Official Gazette RS, No. 64/94 – hereinafter referred to as the PC), the challenged provision allegedly does not take into account the principle of proportionality as the grounds for excluding illegality are not foreseen – if other constitutional rights are at stake, a statement should be illegal only if an insulting intention is proven. They opine that such applies in particular to attorneys, as was confirmed by the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter ECtHR) in the Judgment in Nikula v. Finland. The threat of a penalty thus allegedly prevents the expression of justified criticism. The concept of the abuse of rights determined by Article 11 of the CPA is allegedly not defined precisely enough, and the concept of insults in Article 109 of the CPA does not contain exculpatory grounds for excluding the illegality of such statements. The petitioners deem such to be contrary to the principle of legality in criminal law, determined by Article 28 of the Constitution. Furthermore, due to the lack of appropriate procedural provisions, they deem that a judge can act completely arbitrarily. They also assert that it is contrary to the right to an impartial judge that the same judge who was or is alleged to have been insulted decides on the penalty for such insults. The judge would thus decide on his or her own case. They opine that when a judge's personality, honour, or good reputation are offended, it should also apply that the judge him- or herself or, if statute so determines, the state prosecutor's office, can institute criminal proceedings due to such insults. As the statutory regulation is different, the right to equality before the law is allegedly violated. This triggers the initiation of criminal proceedings that allegedly take place without any rules of criminal substantive or procedural law within the sphere of civil law judicial decision-making. Moreover, they assert that the statutory regulation makes criminally sanctioning the same act twice possible. It can also happen that the civil court punishes a perpetrator, while the criminal court acquits him or her. Without respect for the requirements of holding a main hearing, adversarial, and oral proceedings, the direct taking of evidence, and publicity, anything could allegedly happen in the civil proceedings, as the judge would not be bound by the safeguards of criminal law. The petitioners perceive such to be a violation of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law determined by Article 2 of the Constitution. The same principles are allegedly also violated due to the fact that the sanctions determined by the provisions of Article 109 and Article 11 of the CPA are not proportionate to those determined for the criminal offences in the PC; the possible sentence of imprisonment is allegedly not proportionately determined. The petitioners also do not see any grounds why substantially higher fines are determined by Article 11 of the CPA for attorneys, particularly in view of the fact that the Criminal Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 63/94, etc.) in its comparable provisions does not determine such different fines; furthermore, the fines prescribed therein for insulting the court are essentially lower.

3. The National Assembly did not reply to the petition. The Government opines that the challenged provisions are not contrary to the Constitution. It states that the provisions of the third to seventh paragraphs of Article 11 of the CPA ensure the effectiveness of the provisions on the prohibition of the abuse of procedural rights and on the prohibition of insults in written submissions. The penalty for insults within civil procedure allegedly does not entail criminal law protection, as Article 109 of the CPA especially emphasises by stating that a penalty pronounced for an insulting written submission is not an obstacle to a penalty for a criminal offense. The purpose of prohibiting insults, combined with an effective penalty, lies namely in restricting the expression of negative value judgments. This should allegedly not preclude the effective use of rights in court proceedings. Furthermore, the Government argues that it is acceptable to determine prohibited conduct using an open legal term. Moreover, the Government states that the purpose of the challenged provisions is not the protection of a judge as an individual. By a negative value judgment, by which the dignity of a judge is offended in relation to his or her work, it is the reputation of the judicial branch of power in the State that is affected. The Government asserts that freedom of expression is not unlimited, and that limitations thereof can be sanctioned by both criminal as well as civil law. It pointed out the case law of the ECtHR, according to which the legitimate interest of a state in protecting the reputation of judges is not contrary to an applicant's interest in being ensured participation in a discussion on the issue of the structural impartiality of the court. Furthermore, the Government alleges that the challenged provisions are not contrary to the right to an impartial court. It opines that the difference in the amounts of the prescribed fines between (other) natural persons, on the one hand, and attorneys, on the other, is not unfounded. It is allegedly legitimately expected from an attorney as a legal expert bound by the Attorneys Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 18/93, etc.) and the autonomous professional rules of attorneys that they demonstrate greater care, and that violations of their obligations are to be more severely punished.

B – I

4. A petition to initiate proceedings for the review of constitutionality can be lodged by any person provided that he or she demonstrates legal interest (the first paragraph of Article 24 of the Constitutional Court Act, Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA). Pursuant to the second paragraph of the mentioned article of the CCA, legal interest is demonstrated if the regulation whose review is proposed by the petitioner directly interferes with his or her rights, legal interests, or legal position. The first petitioner demonstrated her legal interest as she was punished in the civil proceedings as an attorney representing her client on the basis of the challenged CPA provisions (she lodged a constitutional complaint against the order on the fine). As the petitioner undoubtedly demonstrated her legal interest to lodge a petition, the Constitutional Court did not need to establish whether legal interest was also demonstrated by petitioner Andrej Lužar. The Constitutional Court accepted the petition for consideration and, given the fulfilled conditions under the fourth paragraph of Article 26 of the CPA, immediately proceeded to decide on the merits of the case. As the provision of the seventh paragraph of Article 11 of the CPA is related to the provisions of the third to sixth paragraphs of Article 11, the Constitutional Court also commenced sua sponte proceedings for a review of the constitutionality of this provision (Article 30 of the CCA).

B – II

5. The Constitutional Court first reviewed whether the mere possibility of a penalty on the basis of Article 109 of the CPA, irrespective of the system of penalties determined by Article 11 of the CPA, is inconsistent with any human right. Concerning such, the petitioner referred to the freedom of expression determined by the first paragraph of Article 39 of the Constitution. However, it is necessary to consider that the purpose of the words (both concerning oral statements as well as in written submissions) delivered before the court by a party (or his or her representative or attorney) is to effectively exercise constitutional procedural safeguards. Thus, the Constitutional Court did not review the allegation that the challenged statutory provisions were inconsistent with the freedom of speech determined by the first paragraph of Article 39 of the Constitution independently. It reviewed such in the framework of a review of the conformity of this statutory regulation with the right to make statements before the court determined by Article 22 of the Constitution.

6. Concerning the statements of attorneys made when representing a client in a particular case before the court (the same would apply to sanctioning the statements of a party participating in proceedings without an attorney), the prohibition of insulting statements in proceedings before the court is thus related to the right to make statements before the court, which is part of the right to the equal protection of rights determined by Article 22 of the Constitution. However, this does not entail that such constitutes an interference with the mentioned constitutional right, whose admissibility should therefore necessarily be reviewed on the basis of the strict test of proportionality. In the view of the Constitutional Court, such only concerns the determination of a manner of exercise of this right, in conformity with the second paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution. As regards statements made to exercise the right to make statements before the court on the basis of Article 22 of the Constitution (only statements that in terms of their content are such that they can contribute to the effective protection of rights in proceedings before the court are relevant for the review of this issue), the law namely does not restrict the party as regards what he or she may or may not state in proceedings before the court. The challenged statutory provisions only prohibit a party from making statements that could benefit the party in protecting his or her rights in proceedings in an offensive or defamatory manner. Therefore, the human right at issue is not limited, it is the manner of its exercise that is determined. Furthermore, it is necessary to emphasise in relation to such that the crucial circumstance of the case at issue is that it concerns statements before the court and not, for example, instances of artistic expression. For the latter area, the Constitution (in the framework of guaranteeing freedom of speech determined by the first paragraph of Article 39) ensures the protection of both the content and the form of making statements, and a limitation imposed on a person that determines the form of expression can be considered a limitation of this constitutional right. Making statements before the courts entails a different and specific position; for court proceedings, it is naturally necessary that the manner or form of carrying out procedural activities, including making statements before the court, be regulated and subject to certain formal requirements (inter alia) concerning the manner of making statements. It is also necessary to consider that the delimitation between the determination of the manner of the exercise of human rights and the limitation of constitutional rights is not always simple. The fact that the constitution framers were aware of the possibility that in determining the manner of the exercise of human rights a law would often be on the verge of interfering with such is clear from the wording of the second paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution: without an explicit constitutional basis with regard to an individual right, such a regulation is admissible only if it is necessary due to the particular nature of the right itself.

“Necessity” already points to one of the elements of proportionality, which must be considered in interferences with or limitations of constitutional rights.<sup>1</sup> In considering the case at issue, the Constitutional Court took into account this starting point, in particular due to the fact that the case concerns a statutory regulation in which the determination of the manner of the exercise of a human right approaches the line where it could already entail its limitation.<sup>2</sup>

7. First of all, it is necessary to note that human rights relating to the conduct of parties to proceedings before the court, particularly including the right to make statements, are already by their nature such that they require detailed regulation by law. Court proceedings can namely be effective only if a certain level of formality and order is ensured in such.
8. It evidently follows directly from the meaning of the right to make statements before the court that it cannot entail the right of a party (or his or her representative or authorised person) to make any kind of statement before the court. The right to make statements before the court is guaranteed in connection with the right to effective judicial protection determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution, and logically refers to statements that are important for the court’s decision on a case at issue. In so far as the statements prohibited by Article 109 of the CPA only generally and indiscriminately express contempt for the judiciary or entail a personal attack on a judge and have no relation to the decision at issue, it is evident that such statements have no connection with the protection of the rights of a party to proceedings, or can in no manner contribute to such protection. Thus, the prohibition of such statements does not in any way limit the right to make statements before the court concerning issues due to which this right is guaranteed, i.e. to ensure the protection of one’s rights before the court and to be able to effectively influence the court’s decision. With regard to statements whose content could be essential for a decision, the requirement that in a particular case any criticism stated by a party (or his or her representative or authorised person) with regard to a judicial decision or the conduct

---

1 Testen, in: Šturm et al., Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije [Commentary on the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia], Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Ljubljana (2002), p. 196.

2 It is necessary to mention that comparison with the ECtHR, which in the framework of freedom of speech determined by Article 10 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR) uses the wording (admissible) “restrictions”, cannot be decisive. Also, concerning the comparison with the case law of the ECtHR, Jaklič establishes that the adjective “necessary” does not always correspond to the strictest constitutional test, which requires that the means (legal restrictions) are “indispensable” to attaining a legitimate aim, and neither does it correspond to the less demanding constitutional test of the “reasonable” connection between the means and the legitimate aim. The necessity test simply requires that for a restriction of the freedom of expression the state demonstrates the existence of a “pressing social need”, whereby the restriction must be proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued, which includes a review of whether the grounds why the state limited the freedom of expression are relevant and sufficient in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 10 of the ECHR. Jaklič, in: Šturm et al., Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije, p. 425 (and the Judgment in The Sunday Times v. the United Kingdom, dated 26 April 1979, No. 65338/74, Para. 59).

of the court be formulated in a respectable manner so that it preserves the dignity and authority of the court is also neither exaggerated nor too restrictive. The prohibition of insulting the court determined by Article 109 does not prevent a party from harshly, openly, and critically presenting arguments, e.g. in a legal remedy against the challenged judicial decision, which in his or her opinion point to the illegality of the judicial decision; Article 109 of the CPA only determines the limits of the manner of stating such criticism. Criticism of a given judicial decision or the conduct of the court in a particular case can always be stated in such a manner that it does not damage the reputation of the court or the entire judiciary, or does not personally attack, e.g., the judge's capacity to perform judicial office.<sup>3</sup> The Constitutional Court cannot agree with the arguments of the petitioner, who in connection with the aim of ensuring an effective defence would like to make the freedom of speech of an attorney in representing a party before the court absolute. In the case of Nikula v. Finland, the ECtHR also explicitly dismissed the argument of the applicant in that case that the freedom of speech of an attorney in representing a client should not be limited by any measure.<sup>4</sup>

9. Regarding the prohibition of insulting written submissions determined by Article 109 of the CPA, the purpose of the legislature is to protect the trust in the judiciary and the reputation and authority of the judiciary; not that of a particular judge or a court, but the judicial branch of power in its entirety. This thus only concerns the protection of the reputation of the judicial branch of power, not the protection of the reputation of the state in its entirety, as was erroneously claimed by the Government in its response. There are namely special reasons why it is legitimate for the judiciary to enjoy special protection, different than other branches of state power. Undoubtedly, it is true for the work of the judiciary – for a particular judge as well as for the courts in general – that building respect and trust in the judiciary is primarily a task for the courts themselves, and they can most easily accomplish this by conducting proceedings lawfully and appropriately, by deciding disputes (without undue delay) on the merits correctly and lawfully, and by providing well-substantiated reasons for judicial decisions. The system of penalties for insulting written submissions thus cannot be a fundamental manner of ensuring the reputation and authority of the courts. This is, however, an additional (and subordinate) measure enabling the protection of the existing reputation and authority of the courts when an atmosphere of distrust in the work of the courts is created by demeaning value judgments and by general attacks on the work of a court or the personality of a particular judge that are unnecessary for the protection of rights in a particular case. As established by the ECtHR, it is necessary to take into account the special role the judiciary plays in society. As the guardian of justice, a fundamental value in a state governed by the rule of law, it must enjoy the trust of the public in order to be successful in performing its role. Therefore, it may appear to be necessary to protect this trust against destructive attacks that are evidently unfounded, in particular considering the fact that judges who have been criticised are bound by certain principles that make it impossible for them to respond to an attack.<sup>5</sup> The purpose of such limitations is to protect the authority of the judiciary, more precisely the aim that the public must respect the courts and trust that the latter are able to perform their function.<sup>6</sup> The protection of the authority of the courts relates to the awareness that it is precisely the courts that are the forums intended for dispute resolution or deciding on guilt or innocence, whereby it is important that the public trust to a great extent that the judiciary is able to accomplish its tasks.<sup>7</sup>

<sup>3</sup> Cf. the ECtHR's reasoning in the Judgment in Barfod v. Denmark, dated 22 February 1989, No. 11508/85 (Paras. 33 and 35).

<sup>4</sup> Nikula v. Finland, Judgment dated 21 March 2002, No. 31611/96 (Para. 49).

10. The petitioner indeed argued that there is no need (i.e. necessity) for the special penalty for insulting the court determined by Article 109 of the CPA, as appropriate protection is already afforded by the provisions in the PC determining criminal offenses against honour and good reputation (e.g. the criminal offense of an insult determined by Article 169 of the PC), and that it is always possible to prosecute these criminal offenses in a separate criminal procedure. However, these arguments of the petitioner are not substantiated. The possibility of independent protection under criminal law is not an appropriate (at least not always) substitute and cannot ensure the above-mentioned effects. The petitioner's arguments are already erroneous in claiming that when a judge's personality, honour, or good reputation is insulted, the judge him- or herself can institute proceedings. As established above, the purpose of the sanctioning provision of Article 109 of the CPA is not the protection of a particular judge and does not concern the protection of his or her honour and good reputation; it is the values of the respectability and authority of the entire judiciary that are protected. The PC does not even contain a special criminal offense that would incriminate insults against the entire judiciary as a branch of state power (and not perhaps only a particular court as a state body). Additionally, it is necessary to consider that it is of great and symbolic significance that behaviour undermining the authority of the courts may trigger an immediate reaction such that it is evident for all participants in proceedings (in particular, the opposing party, and when a penalty on an attorney is concerned, also for the party this attorney represents) that the court will not tolerate such behaviour. When the matter concerns statements by an attorney, it is especially important that the parties are able to realise that the offensive sharpness of the attorney's representation before the court is not proof of the quality of his representation and that it will not contribute to success in the litigation. By such, the attorney is also directed away from acting on the wish he or she might have to make a good impression on the client not by means of the quality of his or her legal arguments (which a lay party is frequently unable to assess), but by the sharpness and offensiveness of his or her performance. However, it is generally true that additional court proceedings intended to ensure the effectiveness of court proceedings cannot be a proper approach. It is necessary to mention that also the ECtHR,

---

5 Prager and Oberschlick v. Austria, Judgment dated 26 April 1995, No. 15974/00 (Para. 34).

6 The Judgment in The Sunday Times v. the United Kingdom (Para. 55).

7 Worm v. Austria, Judgment dated 29 August 1997, No. 83/1996 (Para. 41).

in the Judgment in Nikula v. Finland (which is also cited by the petitioner), explicitly adopted the position that the duty of the courts and the presiding judge is to direct proceedings in such a manner so as to ensure the proper conduct of the parties and the fairness of the trial – rather than to examine in a subsequent trial the appropriateness of a party's statements in the prior proceedings.<sup>8</sup> Moreover, the ECtHR has also determined that courts may respond to such conduct when it is neither necessary nor practicable to bring a criminal charge against the perpetrator thereof.<sup>9</sup>

11. The petitioner otherwise opines that the prohibition of insulting written submissions is in no way connected with the prohibition of the abuse of rights and the aim of ensuring the principle of economy and the speeding up of proceedings. However, her claims must be rejected. In addition to the reasons already mentioned in Paragraphs 8 and 9 of the reasoning of this Decision, it must be noted that, understood in the broadest sense, the prohibition determined by Article 109 of the CPA can also contribute to the effectiveness of court proceedings by ensuring respect and cooperation between the subjects of the procedure, as well as the focus of the statements in submissions on the elements essential for the decision. Insulting written submissions (as well as submissions that digress from the relevant issues or are overloaded with emotion) burden court proceedings and make it difficult to carry out such proceedings, thus causing the risk that the parties' statements will depart from what is essential for the decision in a dispute, and particularly make the pursuit of a peaceful resolution of the dispute or the conclusion of a court settlement difficult (which is especially emphasised in Article 305 of the CPA).
12. As the petitioner is an attorney, it is necessary to note that her attempt at arguing that the limitation on an attorney's speech makes it impossible for him or her to fulfil his or her task defending a party before the court is manifestly contrary to the rules and ethical standards that have developed in the autonomous professional rules of attorneys' themselves. As one of the violations of the attorney's duty, Article 77a of the Statute of the Bar Association (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94, etc.) cites inappropriate or insulting conduct or statements in the performance of the attorney's profession. From among the Attorneys' Code of Ethics, certain rules, e.g. the second paragraph of Article 9, should be mentioned, according to which in the performance of their tasks attorneys must enjoy the trust of their clients and, at the same time, of the judicial authorities before which they represent such. Therefore, they should try to win that trust, sustain it, and not undermine it by any act. An attorney's legal and general culture must be evident from his or her professional work, appearance, submissions, speech, and in contacts with clients, colleagues, and judicial and other authorities (Article 15). Attorneys must not make their personal and professional ethics dependant on their loyalty to a client. In their work, they should never lose their independence and objectivity. They must always remain dignified, polite, and objective in relation to the opposing party, their representative, and judicial and other state authorities (Article 43). Regarding the mentioned issue, Article 18 of the Code is of particular importance: “In their professional capacity, attorneys must protect the reputation of courts and other authorities. Their duty is to strengthen the trust of the public in their work. Therefore, they must not make insulting or disdainful statements regarding the work of these bodies and their decisions. They should also advise their clients to adopt a respectful approach.” In view of the above, it follows that it is undoubtedly accepted in the independent rules of the attorney’s profession that the “freedom of speech” of an attorney in appearances by such before the court is not without limits, and that an attorney as part of the system of the administration of justice has a special role and responsibility in establishing trust in and respect for the judiciary. The cited rules also prove that attorneys themselves are becoming aware of the fact that not only does the prohibition of insulting and disdainful statements not prevent the effective performance of attorneys’ duties, but enhances their performance. Making appropriate and respectful statements is of great importance for an attorney to be able to fulfil his or her duties in respect of the client that he or she represents, as well as for the responsibility that he or she has as a part of the system of the administration of justice for the legal order as a whole. Furthermore, due to the mentioned rules adopted by the independent organisation of attorneys itself, the petitioner’s arguments that the prohibition of insulting written submissions prevents her from performing the profession of an attorney loses its persuasiveness.

<sup>8</sup> The Judgment in Nikula v. Finland (Para. 53).

<sup>9</sup> E.g. Putz v. Austria, Judgment dated 22 February 1996, No. 18892/91 (Para. 33).

13. Thus, the prohibition of insulting written submissions determined by Article 109 of the CPA does not limit a party’s right to make statements before the court with regard to those issues due to which the right to make statements is guaranteed as a human right – as a part of the right to the equal protection of rights in proceedings in accordance with Article 22 of the Constitution. Therefore, Article 109 of the CPA does not limit this right, but only determines the manner of its exercise. When applying the mentioned statutory provision, a court must of course give due consideration to the above-mentioned aspects in every particular case. A court deciding on applying Article 109 of the CPA must carefully weigh whether critical and perhaps sharp statements (e.g. in a legal remedy against a challenged court decision) entail an admissible manner of exercise of the right to make statements in proceedings determined by Article 22 of the Constitution, which is necessary for the effectiveness of the right to judicial protection (as well as the right to appeal determined by Article 25 of the Constitution). If in a particular case the court does not consider these aspects to a sufficient extent, it could entail a limitation, a kind that is inadmissible, of the right to make statements. As also held by the ECtHR<sup>10</sup>, this concerns the need to strike the right balance and to determine certain bounds that must not be overstepped. At the statutory level, this cannot be precisely defined; it is for the court in each particular case to give due consideration thereto; thus, in every particular case the court must consider the principle of proportionality. Consequently, it is necessary, on the one hand, to consider that the circumstance that these statements are made in defence of rights before the court speaks in favour of greater tolerance. On the other hand, it is necessary to take into account the special significance that trust in the judiciary and respect for the authority of the courts holds for the judicial branch of power in the performance of its duties.

---

10 Schöpfer v. Switzerland, Judgment dated 20 May 1998, No. 25405/94 (Para. 33).

14. The above also addresses the petitioner's allegation as to the inconsistency with the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution, which refers to the fact that only judges – in the event their personality, honour, or good reputation is harmed – do not need to request that separate criminal proceedings be initiated. The Constitutional Court emphasised regarding such the particularly well-founded reasons for such regulation, as well as the circumstance that the object of protection when penalising insulting written submissions is different than in the instance of the criminal offense of insult determined by Article 169 of the PC, making the petitioner's allegation unfounded.
15. In light of the above-mentioned reasons, the Constitutional Court established that the provision of Article 109 of the CPA is not inconsistent with the Constitution.

B – III

16. The petitioner alleges that it is inconsistent with the right to an impartial judge (the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution) that the judge to whom such insults are directed decides in his or her own case. Irrespective of the fact whether the penalty on the basis of Article 109 in conjunction with Article 11 of the CPA entails a matter in which all of the procedural guarantees pursuant to Article 23 of the Constitution should be fulfilled, it is evident that the statutory regulation is not inconsistent with the right to an impartial trial determined by Article 23 of the Constitution. The petitioner erroneously understands the function and purpose of the penalty according to Article 109 of the CPA. From the law, the national case law, the case law of the ECtHR<sup>11</sup>, and comparative law (e.g. the institution of contempt of court in Anglo-Saxon legal orders<sup>12</sup>), it follows that as regards institutions of this type, the protected value is not the honour and good reputation of the particular judge, but the protection of trust in the judiciary and the protection of the authority of the judicial branch of power. When the matter concerns imposing a fine on the basis of Article 109 of the CPA, a particular judge is not the “victim” and does not protect his or her own honour and good reputation when deciding on the basis of Articles 109 and 11 of the CPA. If his or her honour and good reputation are harmed, the judge can certainly request protection through the institutions of penal and tort law. Considering this aim and the purpose of imposing a fine on the basis of Article 109 of the CPA (in conjunction with Article 11 of the CPA), it follows that the allegation that judges decide on a case wherein they themselves have been the victim or the injured party is not substantiated (if, of course, they properly interpret Article 109 of the CPA and include appropriate reasoning in the order issuing the fine). Therefore, the challenged regulation is not inconsistent with the right to an impartial judge determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution.

11 E.g. the Judgment in Putz v. Austria; Ravnsborg v. Sweden, Judgment dated 23 March 1994, No. 14220/88.

12 See, e.g., Barrie & Cowe, The Law of Contempt, 3rd Ed., Butterworths, London, 1996, p. 522.

B – IV

17. Having found that the prohibition of and penalties for insulting written submissions in civil proceedings are not inconsistent with the right to make statements before the court determined by Article 22 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court proceeded with the review of the system of fines determined by the third to seventh paragraphs of Article 11 of the CPA. It is only with regard to such that Article 109 of the CPA refers to Article 11 of the CPA, namely in relation to the prohibition of insulting written submissions. The petitioner's allegations referring to the definition of the abuse of rights determined by the first and second paragraphs of Article 11 of the CPA are not relevant for the decision in this case (the petitioner also did not challenge them and in the case on which her legal interest for this petition is based, the ordinary court did not apply such), therefore it was not necessary for the Constitutional Court to respond to these allegations.
18. The third to sixth paragraphs of Article 11 of the CPA determine penalties in the event of insulting written submissions determined by Article 109 of the CPA. The issue is raised whether such a system of penalties and imposing such fines is at all admissible within the framework of civil proceedings. With regard to such, the Constitutional Court had to review whether such penalties entail deciding on charges that would necessitate all the procedural guarantees of criminal proceedings and all substantive constitutional guarantees regarding decisions on criminal offenses (inter alia, also the principle of legality in the criminal law determined by the second paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution, as was expressly asserted by the petitioner).
19. The Constitutional Court cannot agree with the argument that every penalty entails a consideration of criminal "charges", even if the law defines such as a "punishment", as this would at the same time exclude the possibility that such issues be decided on in the framework of another, e.g. civil, procedure. The Constitutional Court has already adopted the position that not every definition of prohibited conduct (and sanctions for the violation of such prohibition) must be considered a definition of a criminal offense, in the event of which the substantive guarantees determined by the Constitution for criminal offenses must be fulfilled. Likewise, deciding on penalties for the violation of these prohibitions cannot always be considered a criminal procedure, in which all the constitutional procedural guarantees particularly referring to a criminal procedure should therefore be fulfilled (Decision No. U-I-220/03, dated 13 October 2004; Official Gazette RS, No. 123/04, and OdlUS XIII, 61). However, even if the prohibited conduct is not to be considered a criminal offense, and the penalties for such conduct do not need to be considered in criminal proceedings, the general principles of a state governed by the rule of law determined by Article 2 of the Constitution still apply; in addition, the general guarantees of a fair trial determined by Article 22 of the Constitution must be ensured in all court proceedings. The above-mentioned starting points must be taken into account when reviewing the regulation of penalties determined by Article 109 of the CPA. Firstly, it is necessary to emphasise (such, however, is not decisive in itself) that the legislature did not regulate this matter in the sphere of criminal law. This is even more evident as in the challenged provision the CPA explicitly determines that issuing a penalty on the basis of Article 109 does not prevent a punishment for a criminal offense. Such does not entail a determination of a criminal offense (in either the formal or substantive sense) in particular with regard to the purpose of the prohibition determined by Article 109 of the CPA and also its character. This is more a measure of the conduct of proceedings, whose purpose is to ensure the orderly conduct of civil proceedings and necessary procedural discipline. The possibility of pronouncing such a measure is based on the premise that the court has the right and the duty to ensure the proper conduct of proceedings. Therefore, the provision of Article 109 of the CPA in itself cannot concern the determination of such conduct that would require that the substantive guarantees of criminal law (e.g. according to Article 28 of the Constitution) be fulfilled, necessitating also that penalties be issued within a separate procedure in which all the constitutional criminal procedural guarantees are safeguarded. However, with regard to this issue it is necessary to also consider the system of penalties on the basis of Article 11 of the CPA. The reasoning that the prohibition of insulting written submissions in civil proceedings and the possibility of imposing penalties within civil proceedings for the violation of this prohibition entails a matter that is closer to a disciplinary sanction and not to the determination of a criminal offense, can only be substantiated if the penalties that can be pronounced for such activities are not overly severe. Namely, the very nature and the amount of a penalty prescribed can reach such a degree that it can only be pronounced within proceedings that fully satisfy all the constitutional guarantees of a criminal procedure. In Decision No. U-I-117/93, dated 2 February 1995 (Official Gazette RS, No. 13/95, and OdlUS IV, 10), the Constitutional Court already adopted the position that deciding on a sentence of imprisonment entails such a severe interference with the rights of the affected person that this entails a “criminal charge”. The Constitutional Court adopted this position when it used the possibility of pronouncing a sentence of imprisonment as the argument that such must be decided within appropriate court proceedings.<sup>13</sup>

20. Furthermore, in the case law of the ECtHR (in cases concerning the issue of whether Article 6 of the ECHR is applicable) criteria have been established whether deciding on “penalties” entails a decision on “criminal charges”, and whether, therefore, all criminal procedural guarantees must be satisfied. The answer whether the matter concerns “deciding on criminal charges” depends on the domestic classification of the charge, the nature of the offence, and the nature and severity of the penalty. Concerning the first criterion, it is decisive whether the legislation classifies a certain violation within the system of criminal law and criminal procedure. In this regard, the ECtHR reviews which law determines the prohibited conduct, which law determines the procedure in which such conduct is decided on, the issue of whether the pronounced penalty is entered into the criminal records, and whether there are other consequences usually resulting from a criminal conviction.<sup>14</sup> The use of the word “punishment” itself is not decisive.<sup>15</sup> With regard to the second criterion (the nature of the offence), the ECtHR has established that such penalties as the one in the case at issue are more akin to the exercise of disciplinary powers than to the imposition of a penalty for the criminal offense committed.<sup>16</sup> Moreover, the ECtHR has found that powers of such type vested in the court are a common feature of the legal orders of the Contracting States. Such rules and sanctions derive from the inherent power of a court to ensure the proper and orderly conduct of its own proceedings. Concerning the statutory regulation in the Slovene law, as was explained above, neither the first nor the second criterion, which would entail that the penalty determined by Article 109 of the CPA concerns a criminal charge, is fulfilled. Only the third criterion remains: the nature and severity of the prescribed penalty. Even if the case does not meet either of the first two criteria for a “criminal charge”, the ECtHR will establish that it concerns such if the prescribed penalties (i.e. those that are at stake for the party) are sufficiently severe. With regard to the Austrian regulation of penalties for insulting written submissions, which is very similar to the statutory regulation in the CPA, the ECtHR held that the prescribed fine of approximately 1500 EUR (which can be converted into a sentence of imprisonment not exceeding ten days) was not so severe that what was at stake was sufficiently important to warrant the fulfilment of the third criterion.<sup>17</sup> However, the ECtHR adopted the opposite conclusion when a sentence of imprisonment of up to 16 days was at stake.<sup>18</sup>

13 “Minor offense judges can also pronounce, for certain minor offenses, a sentence of imprisonment. By issuing security measures, they can also interfere with constitutionally protected rights. Thus, minor offense judges should be considered a constituent part of the judicial power, both on the basis of Article 23 of the Constitution as well as with regard to the type of penalties they can issue.”

21. In light of the already established positions of the Constitutional Court and the case law of the ECtHR, it follows that the regulation of penalties determined by Article 11 of the CPA, particularly regarding the sentence of imprisonment, which for a natural person may reach 30 days, while for an attorney (inter alia) it may reach even up to 100 days, evidently attains such a degree of severity that it warrants classifying such as entailing a decision on criminal charges (warranting, therefore, that all the procedural and substantive guarantees of criminal procedure and regarding criminal offenses must be ensured).<sup>19</sup> It is evident that the statutory regulation of penalties – not in itself, but due to the severity of the penalties prescribed – determined by Article 11 of the CPA (thus in the framework of civil procedure) is not consistent with the requirements of the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution and Article 6 of the ECHR, as well as the guarantees in criminal procedure. The CPA could determine such penalties only if such punishment would be decided on within a procedure that fully satisfies the guarantees of not only Article 23 of the Constitution, but also of Article 29 of the Constitution (the guarantees in criminal procedure; e.g. the right to have adequate time to prepare one’s defence). The statutory regulation of penalties

---

14 E.g. the Judgment in Putz v. Austria (Para. 37).

15 E.g. Weber v. Switzerland, Judgment dated 22 September 1990, No. 11034/84 (Para. 31).

16 E.g. the Judgments in Putz v. Austria (Para. 33) and Ravnsborg v. Sweden (Para. 34).

17 The Judgment in Putz v. Austria.

18 Weber v. Switzerland, the Judgment dated 22 September 1990, No. 11034/84.

19 E.g. the Judgment in T. v. Austria, dated 14 November 2000, No. 27783/95.

in Article 11 of the CPA (in conjunction with Article 109 of the CPA) is, in view of the above-mentioned reasons, inconsistent with the Constitution. It is inconsistent with the Constitution not because it would not be possible to issue penalties in the framework of the civil procedure, but due to determining such severe penalties that they warrant classifying such as entailing a decision on criminal charges and that, therefore, all the procedural guarantees concerning criminal procedure, also those referred to in Article 29 of the Constitution, must be satisfied. The statutory regulation in Article 11 of the CPA would be consistent with the Constitution if the penalties prescribed were not so severe. This in particular concerns the prescribed sentence of imprisonment. Consequently, the Constitutional Court abrogated the possibility of pronouncing the sentence of imprisonment in the procedure and manner determined by Article 11 of the CPA in conjunction with Article 109 of the CPA (the fifth and sixth paragraphs of Article 11 of the CPA).

22. The issue of the severity of the prescribed penalties arises also with regard to the fines. The additional issue of whether the difference between the prescribed fines for natural persons, on the one hand, and those for attorneys (as well as legal persons and sole proprietors), on the other, is justified also underlies this review. The Constitutional Court deems that the severity of the prescribed fine for natural persons (300,000 Slovene tolar) does not reach such a degree to warrant that it could only be issued in a procedure fulfilling all the criteria of a criminal procedure, and not in the framework of a civil procedure. The prescribed fine for attorneys (one million Slovene tolar) is, however, so severe that it would be in conformity with the requirements of the Constitution only if it is decided on in a procedure that fulfils all the criteria of a criminal procedure. The Constitutional Court does not consider that, regarding insulting written submissions, it is inadmissible in itself that the law is stricter on an attorney than on a party to proceedings. The reasons for the stricter punishment of attorneys can be found in the fact they are legal experts, whose task is (inter alia) to represent parties before courts as a part of their profession, and who are a constituent part of the system of the administration of justice and responsible for contributing to the maintenance of the reputation of the courts and trust in their work. This circumstance (emphasised also by the ECtHR<sup>20</sup>) is undoubtedly important and justifies the possibility of a stricter approach to inadmissible statements of attorneys than in the event such are made by other participants in proceedings. However, the court can take this aspect into account already when pronouncing the fine in a range of up to the prescribed 300,000 Slovene tolar. However, the prescribed fine in the amount of up to one million Slovene tolar is too high to be decided on within civil proceedings without satisfying all the procedural guarantees of a criminal procedure. In addition, such a severe fine is also not necessary to achieve the purpose of the penalty on the basis of Article 109 of the CPA. Furthermore, it is necessary to emphasise, also with regard to the penalties for insulting written submissions, that the symbolic significance of such penalties is in the forefront, by ensuring an immediate response of the court to conduct that could jeopardise the course of court proceedings and the authority of the judiciary. As the punishment for insulting written submissions on the basis of Article 109 of the CPA also does not exclude criminal responsibility, which can be decided on within criminal proceedings, there are no objective grounds for the penalties prescribed by Article 11 of the CPA to be so severe (as well as unacceptably severe in relation to the penalties that can be issued by a court for the criminal offense of insult pursuant to Article 169 of the PC while ensuring all the guarantees of criminal procedure and taking into account the different purpose of the penalty). Therefore, the Constitutional Court abrogated the third paragraph of Article 11 of the CPA in the part that enables the issuance of a fine in an amount exceeding 300,000 Slovene tolar.

20 The Judgment in Schöpfer v. Switzerland (Paras. 29 and 31).

23. The Constitutional Court emphasises that both with regard to its positions on issuing a sentence of imprisonment outside of criminal proceedings as well as regarding the severity of the fines, these positions refer to instances where participants in proceedings are penalised for written submissions in civil proceedings that are insulting. It is not necessary for the positions of the Constitutional Court to be the same when punishing participants in proceedings also pursues the aim of ensuring the enforcement of decisions in the narrower or broader sense, in particular in those instances where penalties are used as a means to influence the willingness of a certain person to perform a certain activity (as is, e.g., the case when punishing a witness who refuses to answer questions without justification; the second paragraph of Article 241 of the CPA). In this Decision, the Constitutional Court has not adopted a position with regard to such issues.
24. The petitioner's arguments that, concerning the definition of the prohibited conduct determined by Article 109 of the CPA, the requirements of the principle of legality in criminal law (Article 28 of the Constitution) should be fulfilled are not substantiated. As was explained above, due to the abrogation of the excessively severe fines prescribed, it can be justifiably considered that the penalties on the basis of Article 109 of the CPA in conjunction with Article 11 of the CPA do not entail criminal law protection. Thus, it is logical that also substantive constitutional guarantees relating to criminal offenses do not apply. Therefore, there is no need for the special determination of grounds that could exclude illegality, such as those determined by Article 169 of the PC. Such grounds are also not specifically determined by Article 179 of the Code of Obligations (Official Gazette RS, No. 82/01) with regard to damages for emotional distress due to insults to honour and good reputation. When deciding on the penalty determined by Article 109 of the CPA, the court must in each case apply the principle of proportionality with regard to freedom of speech and in particular to the right to make statements as a part of the right to the equal protection of rights determined by Article 22 of the Constitution in the manner that follows from this Decision. The Constitutional Court does not need to answer the question of whether the fact that the intent of insult is not demonstrated can constitute grounds for excluding illegality. It is necessary to underline again that the purpose of the prohibition of insulting written submissions determined by Article 109 of the CPA is different than that of the relevant criminal offenses against honour and good reputation (and also different than for the civil law protection of honour and good reputation).

25. As mentioned above, the principle of the precision of legal norms is also important when the matter does not concern criminal cases. A limitation of a right (as applies mutatis mutandis also to the determination of the manner of its exercise) may only be prescribed by a law that is precise and clear. The requirement that legal norms must be precise and clear ensures, on the one hand, that individuals can foresee from the norm their rights and duties and the consequences in the event of conduct contrary to the norm. On the other hand, individuals are thereby protected from instances of unjustified interferences with their rights and legal interests (Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-220/03). The petitioner did refer to violations of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law in this regard, however, it is necessary to explain that the concept of “insulting the court” (in the broad sense) is an open legal term, for which it is typical that it is not completely linguistically and technically defined in a legal act.<sup>21</sup> Legal terms are a model of a typical legal feeling;<sup>22</sup> it is for the bodies deciding in a particular case to fill them with substance. The definition of prohibited conduct by a legal term is not of itself inadmissible; a court applying a legal term by establishing its substance and giving appropriate reasons it took into account does not apply law arbitrarily, but in accordance with the will of the legislature. Furthermore, it follows from constitutional case law that the use of indefinite legal terms is not in itself inconsistent with the principles of a state governed by the rule of law according to Article 2 of the Constitution.<sup>23</sup> In the academic literature and case law, the concept of an “insult” has been concretised well enough, not only as regards criminal cases, but also in connection with claims for damages for emotional distress due to insults to honour and good reputation, providing another reason why this term is not undetermined. The same also applies for the definition of possible grounds for excluding illegality – see in this regard the reasoning provided in the previous paragraph. With regard to other allegations of inconsistency with the principles of a state governed by the rule of law (concerning the severity and comparability of the penalty), the Constitutional Court does not need to review them as it abrogated the challenged provisions as regards the amount of the fine. The petitioner’s assertions that the determination of the prohibition of insulting written submissions was in-

21 M. Pavčnik, Teorija prava [Theory of Law], Cankarjeva založba, Ljubljana (1997), pp. 52–53.

22 M. Pavčnik, Argumentacija v pravu [Argumentation in Law], Pravna fakulteta and Cankarjeva založba, Ljubljana (2004), p. 194.

23 Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-220/03: “However, the use of indefinite legal terms is not in itself inconsistent with the Constitution. The task of competent bodies (in particular, the Agency and courts) is to give to an indefinite legal term, by using methods of interpretation, a substance that is consistent with the Constitution and law. Thereby, they must not act arbitrarily. It is not possible, however, to foresee in advance that the competent bodies will interpret indefinite legal terms in a manner such that is not consistent with the Constitution, and that thereby they will act arbitrarily. Such also does not suffice for substantiating a violation of Article 2 of the Constitution.”

consistent with the principles of a state governed by the rule of law, as determined by Article 2 of the Constitution, are thus not substantiated. Moreover, the petitioner did not allege that the procedure in which the court decides on the penalty violates any guarantees of a fair trial (except the right to an impartial judge determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution – which has already been reviewed) that must be taken into consideration even if the matter does not concern a criminal case; therefore, the Constitutional Court did not need to address this issue.

26. For the reasons stated in paragraphs 19 to 22 of the reasoning of this Decision, the Constitutional Court abrogated the provisions of Article 11 of the CPA on the possibility of pronouncing a sentence of imprisonment or a fine in the amount of more than 300,000 tolar. Due to the abrogation of these provisions, it is no longer possible to pronounce such penalties also for legal entities and sole proprietors. As the provisions that prescribed the sentence of imprisonment, which the court could pronounce in the event that a fine was not paid, are abrogated, henceforth if a fine is not paid, a regular enforcement procedure applies. Furthermore, the abrogated provisions of Article 11 of the CPA cannot be applied in instances of punishment due to the abuse of rights determined by the first and second paragraphs of Article 11 of the CPA, and for obstructing a main hearing as determined by Article 304 of the CPA. In view of the abrogation of the provisions on the sentence of imprisonment, also the provision on the substitute penalty for legal entities, which could not be issued a sentence of imprisonment, loses its significance (the seventh paragraph of Article 11 of the CPA). Therefore, the Constitutional Court also abrogated this provision.
27. In view of the fact that the Constitutional Court decided that the institution of punishment by a fine (up to the limited amount) in a civil procedure is not inconsistent with the Constitution, it follows that also the provision of the fourth paragraph of Article 11 of the CPA, which merely determines the manner in which a fine is pronounced and the time limit in which such a fine must be paid, is not inconsistent with the Constitution.

C

28. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of Articles 21 and 43 of the CCA, composed of: Dr Janez Čebulj, President, and Judges Dr Zvonko Fišer, Lojze Janko, Mag. Marija Krisper Kramberger, Milojka Modrija, Dr Ciril Ribičič, Dr Mirjam Šrk, and Dr Dragica Wedam Lukić. Points 1 and 2 of the operative provisions were adopted unanimously. Point 3 of the operative provisions was adopted by five votes against three. Judges Ribičič, Šrk, and Wedam Lukić voted against. Judges Ribičič and Wedam Lukić submitted dissenting opinions.

Dr Mirjam Šrk
Vice-President

on behalf of
Dr Janez Čebulj
President

---

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE DR DRAGICA WEDAM LUKIĆ, JOINED BY JUDGE DR CIRIL RIBIČIČ AND JUDGE DR MIRJAM ŠKRK

15

1. I voted against Point 3 of the operative provisions, in which the Constitutional Court decided that the provision of Article 109 of the CPA, which authorises the court to punish a person who in his or her written submissions insults the court, a party, or another participant in the proceedings, is not inconsistent with the Constitution. This does not mean that I am of the opinion that such punishment is in itself inconsistent with the Constitution. I voted against this decision as I had serious doubts concerning the criteria on the basis of which the Constitutional Court reviewed the challenged provision.
2. The petitioners explicitly asserted (inter alia) that the challenged provision is inconsistent with the right to freedom of expression determined by Article 39 of the Constitution, which is why I argued that the Constitutional Court should apply the proportionality test to review whether the matter concerned a constitutionally (in) admissible interference with the mentioned right. However, the majority decision avoided such a review and reviewed the allegations as to the inconsistency with Article 39 of the Constitution from the viewpoint of the consistency of the challenged provision with the right to make statements before the court determined by Article 22 of the Constitution. According to the majority, the prohibition of insulting statements does not entail an interference with this constitutional right that would need to be reviewed on the basis of the strict test of proportionality, but “only concerns the determination of a manner of exercise of this right, in conformity with the second paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution” (Paragraph 6 of the reasoning).
3. Article 15 of the Constitution (the exercise and limitation of rights) provides, at the outset in the first paragraph, that human rights and fundamental freedoms shall be exercised directly on the basis of the Constitution. In accordance with the second paragraph of this Article, the manner in which human rights and fundamental freedoms are exercised may be regulated by law whenever the Constitution so provides or where this is necessary due to the particular nature of an individual right or freedom. In the case at issue, the possibility of prescribing the manner of the exercise of the right to freedom of speech in court proceedings is not explicitly prescribed by the Constitution. As follows from Paragraph 6 of the reasoning, the majority decision is based on the standpoint that for court proceedings, “it is naturally necessary that the manner or form of carrying out procedural activities, including making statements before the court, be regulated and subject to certain formal requirements (inter alia) concerning the manner of making statements.” In the text that follows, the majority established that the “delimitation between the determination of the manner of the exercise of human rights and the limitation of constitutional rights is not always simple,” and that is why they considered that a review of the “necessity” of such regulation was required. This in particular was allegedly essential as “the case concerns a statutory regulation in which the determination of the manner of the exercise of a human right approaches the line where it could already entail its limitation.”

U-I-145/03

23 June 2005

4. The nature of the right to judicial protection (Article 23 of the Constitution) and the right to the equal protection of rights (Article 22 of the Constitution) is undoubtedly such that the legislature must regulate the manner of the exercise thereof for them to be exercisable. This entails that the legislature must establish a judicial system and prescribe rules of procedure for their exercise. However, in the case at issue the matter does not concern a situation in which the determination of a penalty for insulting statements would be necessary for the exercise of the mentioned two rights. From Paragraph 9 of the reasoning of the Decision it namely follows that such determination of the manner of the exercise of the mentioned rights is necessary to protect “the trust in the judiciary and the reputation and authority of the judiciary.” This can represent a constitutionally admissible aim for the limitation of a human right, however, such does not constitute a justification for the necessity of regulating the manner of the exercise of the mentioned rights. It would be an exaggeration to state that without any punishment for insulting written submissions, as provided by Article 109 of the CPA, the mentioned constitutional rights cannot be exercised. This is also clear from a comparison with other legal systems that do not regulate such punishment or do not regulate it to such an extent.<sup>1</sup>
5. The starting point entailing that the matter only concerns the determination of the manner of the exercise of a right seems to me even more questionable with regard to freedom of speech as determined by Article 39 of the Constitution. The idea that it is possible to determine the manner of the exercise of this right without such also entailing its limitation seems to me constitutionally questionable already in and of itself. The matter namely concerns a fundamental constitutional freedom that can be exercised directly on the basis of the Constitution itself. The Constitutional Court has often emphasised that the right determined by Article 39 of the Constitution is of particular importance. The Constitutional Court defined the content of this right in Decision No. U-I-226/95, dated 8 July 1999 (Official Gazette RS, No. 60/99, and OdlUS VIII, 174), in which it decided that exceptions from the imposition of penalties for damaging someone’s honour and good reputation are not inconsistent with the Constitution. In that decision the Constitutional Court quoted a former Justice of the US Supreme Court, Justice Cardozo, who stated that freedom of expression is “the matrix, the indispensable condition, of nearly every other form of freedom.” Furthermore, the Constitutional Court emphasised that the right of an individual to express his or her opinions must be protected irrespective of whether a statement is harsh or neutral, rational or emotionally loaded, mild or aggressive, beneficial or damaging, correct or erroneous. A similar position also follows from the case law of the ECtHR, which in the Judgement in Handyside v. The United Kingdom held that freedom of expression refers “not only to [ideas] that are favourably received or regarded as inoffensive or as a matter of indifference, but also to those that offend, shock or disturb.”<sup>2</sup> However, this does not entail that in such cases the expressed

---

1 In France and Germany, e.g., there are no penalties for insults made in written submissions.

2 See L. Šturm, Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije [Commentary on the Constitution of the Republic of Slovestatements will be effectively protected. Limitations are admissible if they pursue a constitutionally admissible goal, and if they are in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution. One of the constitutionally admissible aims is the protection of the honour and good reputation of others and, on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 10 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (hereinafter referred to as the ECHR), explicitly also maintaining the authority of the judiciary. The European Court has held that a limitation of the freedom of expression is admissible if a state takes disciplinary measures against a lawyer who has broken his professional duty to refrain from aggressive and insulting conduct (X. v. Germany)<sup>3</sup>. In the second paragraph of Article 10 of the ECHR, the exceptions with regard to which the exercise of the freedom of expression may be restricted are defined somewhat differently than in the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, however, this does not entail that in these instances the application of the test of proportionality is excluded. Nevertheless, it is necessary to emphasise that in the event that the standards determined by the Constitution are higher than those in the ECHR, the Constitutional Court must apply those determined by the Constitution.

6. The majority was evidently aware of these issues and thus argued for its approach by pointing out that the case at issue concerned “statements before the court and not, for example, instances of artistic expression.” According to the majority, as regards artistic expression, “protection of both the content and the form of making statements [is ensured], and a limitation imposed on a person that determines the form of expression can be considered a limitation of this constitutional right,” whereas making statements in proceedings before the courts entails a different and specific position. For court proceedings, it is allegedly “naturally necessary that the manner or form of carrying out procedural activities, including making statements before the court, be regulated and subject to certain formal requirements (inter alia) concerning the manner of making statements.” However, this comparison is not the most appropriate. The case at issue namely does not concern only the form or manner of making certain statements. The fact is that the court punishes a party (or another person) for statements that are insulting in terms of their content, and not because of their form (written or oral)<sup>4</sup> and the manner how they are made.
7. It is also necessary to consider that the right to make statements in proceedings, guaranteed by Article 22 of the Constitution, does not cover all the aspects of the punishment determined by Article 109 of the CPA. From the majority decision it follows that the right to make statements before the court “logically refers to statements that are important for the court’s decision on a case at issue.” The prohibition nia], Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Ljubljana 2002, p. 429; and Macdonald, Matscher, Petzold, The European System for the Protection of Human Rights, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, 1993, p. 470.

3 See Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije [Commentary on the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia], p. 424; and Macdonald, Matscher, Petzold, p. 488.

4 According to Article 16 of the CPA, parties perform their procedural activities in writing outside a hearing and orally at a hearing, if the law does not determine otherwise for individual procedural activities.

of statements that only “generally and indiscriminately express contempt for the judiciary or entail a personal attack on a judge,” in the majority’s opinion, “does not in any way limit the right to make statements before the court concerning issues due to which this right is guaranteed,” as such statements have no connection with the protection of the rights of a party to the proceedings. I can agree with this, although it is often difficult to differentiate between statements that still function so as to protect a party’s right and those that “have no relation to the decision at issue.” However, the Decision gives no answer to the question of whether all such statements are prohibited and whether their prohibition entails a limitation of freedom of expression as determined by Article 39 of the Constitution.<sup>5</sup> Furthermore, the majority decision failed to establish that the right to make statements determined by Article 22 of the Constitution is the right of a party to proceedings (the person whose rights and duties are decided on), however, pursuant to Article 109 of the CPA, the court may also punish others.<sup>6</sup> This is important because the majority decision explicitly emphasises (Paragraph 13 of the reasoning) that the court must in every case weigh whether critical and perhaps sharp statements entail an admissible manner of exercise of the right to make statements in proceedings determined by Article 22 of the Constitution, since failure to perform this weighing could cause an inadmissible limitation of this right. A person who is not a party to proceedings cannot argue in constitutional complaint proceedings that due to his or her punishment the defence of the rights of a party to proceedings was curtailed. This applies even if the court punishes the party’s attorney, as in proceedings the latter does not exercise his or her own rights, his or her statements are made only for the protection of the rights of the party.<sup>7</sup>

8. Whether and to what extent the penalty imposed on the basis of Article 109 of the CPA entails a violation of the right of a party to make statements in proceedings, as determined by Article 22 of the Constitution, is a matter of individual proceedings. The effect of the prohibition of insulting written submissions on this right of a party is only indirect: when due to the threat of a penalty the party does not dare to efficiently defend his or her positions. I agree that given a correct understanding and application of the challenged provision such consequences cannot occur. Furthermore, it is necessary to emphasise that Article 109 of the CPA only determines that a person who insults the court shall be punished, however, the law does not

---

5 I hope that the sentence that the right of a party to make statements in proceedings “cannot entail the right of a party (or his or her representative or authorised person) to make any kind of statement before the court” (Paragraph 8 of the reasoning), cannot be understood as proclaiming that any statements not “made to” protect the party’s rights in the proceedings are prohibited.

6 The first paragraph of Article 109 contains the wording “a person who in his or her submissions insults the court, a party, or another participant in proceedings,” while Article 304, which determines the penalty for insulting statements made at a hearing, contains the wording “if someone who takes part in the proceedings [...] insults the court [...]”

7 The Constitutional Court rejected the constitutional complaint of an attorney lodged against a decision by which the court had dismissed a motion for the reinstatement of a case after the attorney missed the time limit for filing an appeal (Order No. Up-216/99, dated 19 December 2000, OdlUS IX, 315).

determine that individual statements that are relevant for the decision should not be considered although they have been expressed in an insulting manner. Therefore, I am of the opinion that the Constitutional Court could establish only exceptionally in constitutional complaint proceedings that a party's right determined by Article 22 of the Constitution was violated due to an (unjustified) penalty.

9. What is essential for the review of this case is, in my opinion, the issue of whether the case concerns a limitation of the freedom of expression determined by Article 39 of the Constitution. As the Constitutional Court excluded the provision of Article 39 of the Constitution from its review, and did not provide convincing reasons for such, I could not vote in favour of the majority decision.

Dr Dragica Wedam Lukić

Dr Mirjam Škrk

I join the dissenting opinion of Judge Dr Dragica Wedam Lukić. In addition, I would like to add that it is particularly important for trust in the law, legal certainty, and the foreseeability of Constitutional Court decisions that it is foreseeable in which cases the Constitutional Court must apply the strict test of proportionality due to an interference with constitutional rights, in the case at issue, due to an interference with the freedom of expression determined by Article 39 of the Constitution, and when it has no such obligation. This should not be dependent on the circumstances of a particular case.

An especially interesting case in which the Constitutional Court applied the strict test of proportionality is Decision No. U-I-141/97, which concerned the advertising of tobacco products. Although the case was not brought forward by an individual, but by producers of tobacco products, and did not concern the freedom of expression in general, but its exercise in the economic framework of advertising (i.e. commercial speech), regarding which the limitations due to concerns for public health are well justified on the basis of the detrimental effects of tobacco products, the Constitutional Court decided to apply the strict test of proportionality and provided the following reasons: "When the Constitution does not foresee a limitation of a human right or fundamental freedom, it is necessary to review whether an interference is admissible for the protection of the constitutional rights of others or due to the public benefit. As follows from the case law of the Constitutional Court [...], it is admissible to limit constitutional rights in order to protect the constitutional rights of others only if such limitations are in accordance with the principle of proportionality. For a limitation to be admissible, there must be a constitutionally admissible aim (the protection of the rights of others or even of a public benefit – the protection of the public benefit constitutes a constitutionally admissible aim either directly or indirectly – when through such the rights of others are protected). In addition, three conditions must be fulfilled:

- (1) the interference must be necessary – this entails that the aim cannot be achieved by a milder interference with the constitutional right or even without such (it cannot be replaced by other possible measures that would achieve the same aim);
- (2) the interference must be appropriate for achieving the pursued constitutionally admissible aim; and
- (3) so-called proportionality in the narrower sense must also be considered.

This entails that in the review of the necessity of the interference, the importance of the interference with the constitutional right must be weighed against the importance of the constitutionally admissible aim protecting or ensuring other constitutionally guaranteed values, and evaluated as regards whether the interference is justifiable in relation to the gravity of its consequences.” In the light of the cited case<sup>1</sup>, in a matter concerning an attorney who must suffer limitations of his or her freedom of expression appearing before the court to the benefit of his or her party in civil proceedings, the decision of the Constitutional Court to not apply the strict test of proportionality is unconvincing. However, my position that in this case it was necessary to apply the strict test of proportionality certainly does not entail that such test would not be passed successfully.

Dr Ciril Ribičič

---

1 Andraž Teršek, Primer Tobačna, d.o.o. [The Case of Tobačna Ltd.], Pravna praksa, No. 4/2002, p. 15. The author was of the opinion that the Constitutional Court would have to develop a doctrine on the application of the strict test of proportionality when the matter concerns interferences with the freedom of expression (and in general, the freedom of conduct) in the area of commercial expression (and he mentions, in addition to tobacco products, the prohibition of advertising alcohol), adding that: “Perhaps the Constitutional Court decided to apply the strict test of constitutionality on the basis of an advance evaluation that in the case at issue, the strict test of constitutionality would be passed.”

Decision No. U-I-164/09, dated 4 February 2010

DECISION

At a session held on 4 February 2010 in proceedings to review constitutionality initiated upon the request of the Ljubljana District Court, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

The second paragraph of Article 282 of the Civil Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 26/99, 96/02, 12/03 – official consolidated text, 2/04, 36/04 – official consolidated text, 52/07, 73/07 – official consolidated text, and 45/08) is abrogated.

Reasoning

A

1. The applicant proposes a review of the constitutionality of the second paragraph of Article 282 of the Civil Procedure Act (hereinafter referred to as the CPA), which, in the event a defendant is unjustifiably absent from the settlement hearing or (if the settlement hearing was not scheduled) the first session of the main hearing, determines that, if the statutory conditions are fulfilled, a default judgment is to be issued against the defendant, even if he or she had filed a defence. In its opinion, the challenged regulation represents an irrebuttable presumption that the defendant withdrew the defence or a statutory fiction that such procedural action did not happen. In any event, when issuing a default judgment, courts should allegedly disregard the allegations of the defendant in the defence, because this type of judgment is based on the prerequisite of an express recognition of the factual basis stated in the action. The applicant interprets the challenged provision in such a manner that courts must only issue a default judgment when the defendant does not appear at the first hearing, regardless of the fact that also a settlement hearing was scheduled. It is also of the opinion that it follows from this provision that when issuing a default judgment, courts must also disregard [those] objections of substantive law submitted on time until the moment of [the defendant's] non-appearance at the hearing that [by law] may only be taken into account if the defendant refers thereto (e.g. a disproportionate contractual penalty, a limitation period), and also must disregard generally known facts that benefit the defendant if he or she refers thereto.

2. The applicant is of the opinion that from Article 23 of the Constitution, which refers to the guarantee of effective judicial protection without undue delay, there follows the duty of the state to appropriately organise the judicial system and to adopt appropriate procedural regulations that will ensure, by procedural duties and limitations of parties to the procedure, that those invoking judicial protection will obtain the judicial decision in a reasonable time. Therefore, there are allegedly no obstacles of principle to enacting the duty of cooperation of parties to the procedure, which in a lawsuit is invoked in [the form of] prescribed sanctions in the sense of preclusions with regard to making allegations and presenting evidence, as well as in the limitation of legal remedies available for challenging judicial decisions. The applicant nonetheless draws attention to the fact that the sanction for the failure of a party to proceedings to perform the duty of cooperation must be proportionate to the consequence that would arise if such sanction were not prescribed. Allegedly, the function of procedural law is also to ensure that judicial decisions are substantively correct. Therefore, when pursuing the aim that proceedings are expeditious and focused, the legislature is allegedly bound by the duty to enact such sanctions for failures to act of parties to proceedings that interfere less with the parties' legal position. In the assessment of the applicant, disproportionate procedural sanctions entail an interference with the human right to judicial protection (the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution).
3. The applicant alleges that the challenged second paragraph of Article 282 of the CPA includes a sanction that is entirely disproportional to the aim of the legislature, i.e. [ensuring] that the civil procedure is focused and expeditious. In its opinion, this disproportionality is especially evident in the event substantive objections of the defendant are disregarded of which the factual basis is undisputable, which has no correlation with the length of the main hearing. The legislature allegedly has the possibility to prevent unnecessary postponement of the main hearing by enacting different sanctions, namely by limiting the taking of individual pieces of evidence, as it did in the fifth paragraph of Article 282 of the CPA. The applicant is of the opinion that, alternatively, the system that was in force before the entry into force of the Act Amending the Civil Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 45/08 – hereinafter referred to as the CPA-D) could remain in force; it was then possible for the first hearing to be carried out in the absence of the defendant, who in such manner deprived him- or herself of the possibility to actively participate in the taking of evidence. The applicant is of the opinion that the limited possibility to challenge the default judgment will eventually mean that courts will not ensure protection to true holders of substantive rights; not because of the parties' admissible revision or withdrawal of claims and objections, but due to the statutory fiction, which due to the failure to perform a procedural action nullifies another procedural action performed on time. For the above-stated reasons, the challenged regulation is allegedly also inconsistent with the right to make a statement "as one expression of the right to judicial protection". The applicant also alleges an inconsistency of the challenged provision with the right to equality before the law (the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution). In its view, the mentioned inconsistency lies in the alleged privileged position of a plaintiff who does not appear at the first hearing, compared with a defendant in the same situation. The plaintiff has allegedly the possibility to avoid the issuance of a default judgment by revoking his or her fictive statement waiving the claim without substantiating the justification for his or her non-appearance at the hearing.

4. In its reply to the request, the National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia explains that the general purpose of the new regulation of the system of sanctioning [a party's] non-appearance at the main hearing (Article 282 of the CPA) was to remedy the systemic deficiencies of the CPA, which did not enable the judicial protection of rights to be effectively ensured. Allegedly, it became evident in practice that the principle that the main hearing must be focused was not being implemented consistently, because even if the main hearing ended following its second session, that was an exception. The National Assembly explains that the CPA prior to the CPA-D did not institute instruments for ensuring [the implementation of] this principle and at the same time it did not contain sanctions for [punishing] the inactivity of the parties to judicial proceedings, especially in the event one of the parties did not appear at the hearing. This allegedly enabled the postponement of hearings and the delay of proceedings. For such reason, the amended Article 282 of the CPA allegedly pursues the aim of ensuring the greater activity and responsibility of both parties to a civil procedure and the aim of expediting the procedure, which should be concluded in the event both parties are unjustifiably absent. Allegedly, the challenged obligation to issue a default judgment thus, on the one hand, punishes the inactivity of the defendant in the procedure, and on the other hand, has an influence on whether the party does appear at the hearing and thus enables the procedure to be concluded. The National Assembly adds that already the Labour and Social Courts Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 2/04, etc. – hereinafter referred to as the LSCA-1) introduced, in 2004, exactly the same sanction – in terms of substance and effect – in the event the defendant does not appear at the hearing. The National Assembly warns that a party is not obliged to make a statement in the procedure and that a party cannot be forced to actively participate in the procedure; however, his or her inactivity may have, if the party is warned thereof in advance, certain negative consequences. In the opinion of the National Assembly, it allegedly follows from the statutory context of the challenged provision that in the procedure the defendant is given the possibility to make a statement, because a default judgment may only be issued – provided that the other conditions determined by Article 318 of the CPA are fulfilled – if the defendant was duly summoned to the hearing, warned of the consequences of his or her non-appearance, and if the defendant has given no justified reasons for non-appearance or if no generally known circumstances existed that would justify the defendant's non-appearance. The National Assembly also deems important the fact that the consequences of a [party's] non-appearance can be remedied by using the legal institute of the reinstatement of the case.
5. The National Assembly alleges that the aim of an efficient judicial procedure, which is pursued by the legislature, is constitutionally important within the framework of the right to judicial protection determined by Article 23 of the Constitution. Allegedly, the legislature limited, to a certain extent, the right to make a statement in order to ensure to a greater extent the right to judicial protection. By the challenged limitation, legal certainty and trust in the law are allegedly also ensured in the public interest. In the opinion of the National Assembly, completely the same effect on the procedure being focused and the possibility of its conclusion at the first hearing could not be achieved by other means. Insofar as the legislature could apply, within the framework of the assessment of the appropriateness of [different] means, other possibilities to achieve the same aim, it would allegedly have, with regard to this issue, certain discretion. The National Assembly is of the opinion that the challenged regulation is proportionate in the narrower sense, as such a strict sanction is proportionate to the importance of the main hearing, and in addition, the defendant allegedly had considerable possibilities to prevent the consequences of non-appearance from arising. The National Assembly rejects the allegations regarding the inconsistency with the principle of equality before the law, in particular due to the fact that the position of the defendant is not completely the same as that of the plaintiff. It also did not concur with the interpretation of the first paragraph of Article 282 of the CPA in relation to the fifth paragraph of Article 317 of the CPA, as proposed by the applicant.

6. Also the Government of the Republic of Slovenia does not concur with the constitutional allegations of the applicant. It underlines that the challenged regulation is a consequence of the findings in theory and practice that before the entry into force of the CPA-D courts did not have appropriate possibilities to ensure that the main hearing, which is the most important phase of a civil procedure, is focused. Allegedly, the principle that also the parties themselves have an obligation to contribute to expediting the procedure and make it more economical by acting diligently and responsibly in the procedure was not implemented to a sufficient degree in the past. The Government underlines the significant importance of the right to a trial without undue delay determined by Article 23 of the Constitution, with which the principle that the procedure must be economical and expeditious is connected, as is the principle that the main hearing must be focused. Allegedly, the state has an obligation to ensure such regulation of the civil procedure in which the inactivity of one party will not deprive the opposing party of an effective right to judicial protection. The Government (similarly as the National Assembly) warns of the entirety of the statutory provisions that determine, together with the second paragraph of Article 282 of the CPA, the conditions for issuing a default judgment or for the abrogation thereof. It explains that the legislature decided on such a severe sanction due to the fact that it was demonstrated in practice that the solutions in force before the CPA-D were ineffective from the viewpoint of the main hearing. In the opinion of the Government, the filing of a possible defence does not entail that courts will not even take into consideration the allegations from the defence they received [upon the filing of such]. The Government is of the opinion that the challenged regulation is not inconsistent with the Constitution.
7. The reply of the National Assembly and the opinion of the Government were sent to the applicant, who did not reply thereto.

B – I

8. The challenged second paragraph of Article 282 of the CPA took effect, as a part of the new and completely modified Article 282 of the CPA, on the day the CPA-D entered into force (i.e. on 1 October 2008). It brought to the Slovene regulation of civil procedure a second (an additional) possibility for issuing a default judgment, which before the mentioned statutory amendment [entered into force] could only be issued by the procedure envisaged in Article 318 of the CPA.<sup>1</sup> Article 282 of the CPA reads, in its entirety, as follows:

- “If the plaintiff fails to appear at the settlement hearing, or the first hearing if the settlement hearing has not been scheduled, the judgment may nevertheless be rendered on the basis of relinquishment, provided the conditions set forth in Article 317 hereof have been fulfilled.
- If the defendant fails to appear at the settlement hearing, or the first hearing if the settlement hearing has not been scheduled, the court shall, on the basis of the conditions set forth herein, render a default judgment even though a defence has been filed by the defendant. If the plaintiff’s statements do not prove that the claim is justified and if at the hearing the plaintiff does not correct the statements accordingly, the claim shall be rejected.
- If neither of the parties appears at the settlement hearing, or at the first hearing if the settlement hearing has not been scheduled, the action shall be deemed to have been withdrawn by the plaintiff.
- If the plaintiff fails to appear at a subsequent hearing and the court fails to render a judgment on the basis of the file (the fifth paragraph of this Article), the plaintiff shall be deemed to have withdrawn the action unless the defendant disagrees with the assumption of the withdrawal of the action.
- If both parties fail to appear at a subsequent hearing, the court shall decide on the basis of the file provided the hearing at which evidence is taken has been conducted and the facts sufficiently clarified (judgment on the basis of the file). The court shall decide in the same manner if one of the parties fails to appear at the hearing and the opposing party makes a motion for a decision on the basis of the file. No appeal shall be allowed against the order by which the court denies a motion for a decision based on the facts in the file.
- The provisions of the preceding paragraphs shall be applied provided the party has been duly summoned and has given no justified reasons for non-appearance, or there are no known circumstances indicating that the party was unable to appear at the hearing for justified reasons.
- The party shall be informed of the consequences of non-appearance at a hearing in the writ of summons.”

1 Before the CPA-D, Article 282 of the CPA then in force determined that if the plaintiff or defendant does not appear at the first hearing, or at any subsequent hearing, the main hearing shall nevertheless be held. The first paragraph of Article 209 of the CPA then in force determined that the procedure shall be stayed if one of the parties does not appear at the hearing after being duly summoned and if the opposing party proposes that the procedure be stayed, except when the absent party had proposed beforehand that the hearing be held in its absence.

9. The challenged provision imposes on the court of first instance<sup>2</sup> the duty to issue a default judgment (a judgment by which it finds for the plaintiff in the entirety or in a part of the claim) against the defendant if the prescribed statutory conditions therefor are fulfilled. The conditions for issuing a default judgment due to an unjustified non-appearance at a hearing are only partly directly included in the challenged provision, namely in its first sentence. From this provision it follows that the unjustified non-appearance of the defendant<sup>3</sup> at the settlement hearing, or the first hearing if the settlement hearing has not been scheduled, is sufficient for issuing a default judgment. The issuance of a default judgment is not hindered by the fact that the defendant filed a defence.<sup>4</sup> In addition to the second paragraph of Article 282 of the CPA, also the sixth paragraph of Article 282 of the CPA must be taken into consideration when assessing the conditions for issuing a default judgment, in conformity with which a default judgment may only be issued if the defendant has been duly summoned<sup>5</sup> and has given no justified reasons for non-appearance, or there are no known circumstances indicating that the party was unable to appear at the hearing for justified reasons. If a court is informed in due time of the existence of justified reasons for a party's non-appearance at the hearing, it adjourns the hearing (Article 115 of the CPA). Failure to appear at a hearing due to a justified reason also entails a basis for abrogating a default judgment and for the reinstatement of the situation in the lawsuit prior to the non-appearance at the hearing (Article 116 of the CPA). With regard to further conditions for issuing a default judgment, the challenged provision contains ("under the conditions determined by this Act") a reference to the first paragraph of Article 318 of the CPA, which determines that such judgment may be issued if: (1) the action has been duly served upon the defendant in order for such to file a defence, but the latter did not file the defence within the statutorily prescribed period of time; (2) the action does not contain a claim that the parties may not revise or withdraw; (3) it follows from the facts stated in the action that the claim is well founded;<sup>6</sup> and (4) the facts upon which the claim is based are not in con-

---

2 From Article 349 of the CPA in relation to the second paragraph of Article 348 of the CPA it follows that, in the appeal procedure, the challenged provision of the second paragraph of Article 282 of the CPA cannot even be applied mutatis mutandis.

3 A situation wherein neither of the parties to the civil dispute attends the first hearing is regulated by the third paragraph of Article 282 of the CPA.

4 The defence had to be manifestly filed on time (the first paragraph of Article 277 of the CPA) and substantiated (Article 278 of the CPA), otherwise a default judgment as referred to in the second paragraph of Article 282 of the CPA would in any case not be possible, because a default judgment against the defendant would have already been issued in conformity with the first paragraph of Article 318 of the CPA, or a so-called quasi-default judgment, in conformity with the second or third paragraph of Article 318 of the CPA.

5 The concept of duly summoning someone to a hearing is defined by the second and third paragraphs of Article 113 of the CPA, the seventh paragraph of Article 282 of the CPA, the second paragraph of Article 280 of the CPA (for a hearing), and the third paragraph of Article 305c of the CPA (for a settlement hearing).

6 The claim in the action thus must follow from the stated facts. When assessing if it does, courts take into consideration all of the plaintiff's allegations in the action and in the possible subsequent preliminary submissions before the hearing (see A. Galič, Zakon o pravnem postopku z uvodnimi pojasnili k spremembam zakona in stvarnim kazalom [The Civil Procedure Act with Introductory Explanations regarding the Amendments of tradition with the evidence adduced by the plaintiff or with generally known facts. In certain special civil procedures, the challenged provision cannot be applied,<sup>7</sup> whereas in others the parties can de facto “exclude” its application by their conduct if they renounce in writing a main hearing,<sup>8</sup> or the [mentioned] provision cannot be applied because in a commercial dispute a court issues a judicial decision without scheduling a hearing.<sup>9</sup>

10. In proceedings to decide on requests for a review of the constitutionality of laws that are filed by courts in conformity with Article 23 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 64/07 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), the Constitutional Court can be in a significantly different position than when deciding on petitions for a review of the constitutionality of regulations that do not have direct effect. Petitioners must have a legal interest to challenge [regulations], meaning that in conformity with the second paragraph of Article 24 of the CCA, they must provide evidence that they have exhausted all legal remedies. By that time, there often already exists established case law that interprets the regulation in conformity with the established methods of interpretation of legal rules. The judicial interpretation of the concrete constitutionally disputable provision contributes to high-quality and reasoned constitutional case law, as it dispels doubts regarding the meaning of the regulation.<sup>10</sup> When deciding on a request, which might be filed very soon after the entry into force of the regulation, interpretative doubts or unclariities arise more often. If such unclariities are irrelevant for the review of constitutionality, the Constitutional Court does not have to adopt a position thereon.<sup>11</sup> With regard to the other interpretative dilemmas, however, it must explain which interpretation of the challenged provision is the most sound and convincing one and it must use such as the basis for its assessment.<sup>12</sup>
11. From the Act [at issue] it follows that the purpose of the sanction for not attending a hearing is to increase the activity and responsibility of parties, and to thereby prevent delays in the procedure, i.e. to enable the procedure to also conclude in the event the

---

the Act, with Index], Uradni list RS, Ljubljana 2008, p. 40).

- 7 A default judgment does not exist in matrimonial disputes and in disputes relating to the relations between parents and children (the first paragraph of Article 412 of the CPA), whereas in small claims disputes, in certain instances of the non-appearance of a duly summoned defendant at a hearing, a judgment by consent is issued (the third paragraph of Article 454 of the CPA), and in others a legal fiction is created as to the withdrawal of all of the defendant's motions for evidence, except documentary evidence that the party has already submitted to the court beforehand (the first paragraph of Article 455 of the CPA).
- 8 Article 279a of the CPA.
- 9 Article 488 of the CPA.
- 10 Cf. Order of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-330/05, U-I-331/05, U-I-337/05, dated 18 October 2007 (Official Gazette RS, No. 101/07, and OdUS XVI, 79).
- 11 With regard to the challenged provision, the situation such [as described] is, e.g., in relation to the question of how courts act in the event the plaintiff rectifies, at the hearing, a claim that does not follow from the stated facts, which is a situation that is not resolved by the linguistic frame of the provision (see, e.g., A. Galič, Prve izkušnje z novelo ZPP-D [The First Experiences with the CPA-D Amendment], in: VII. dnevi civilnega prava [7th Civil Law Days]: 22 – 23 April 2009, Inštitut za primerjalno pravo pri Pravni fakulteti v Ljubljani, Ljubljana 2009, p. 38).
- 12 If, subsequently, a different interpretation becomes common in the case law, this entails a factor that the Constitutional Court must take into consideration in a possible repeated constitutional review of the provision at issue.

parties are unjustifiably not present.<sup>13</sup> The sanction for non-appearance applies to any first hearing to which a party was summoned. It also applies to a settlement hearing, the purpose of which is to conclude a court settlement and thus to conclude the procedure in the most efficient manner. The Constitutional Court does not concur with the reasoning of the applicant that a default judgment cannot be issued if the defendant was only absent from the settlement hearing that was scheduled independently or at the same time as the first hearing. Absence from a settlement hearing is namely an independent condition for the consequences of non-appearance to arise. Also in line with this position is the case law that has developed in relation to the first paragraph of Article 28 of the LSCA-1, which is substantively similar to the second paragraph of Article 282 of the CPA.<sup>14</sup> With regard to the issuance of a default judgment as a consequence of the unjustified non-appearance of the defendant determined by the second paragraph of Article 282 of the CPA, it must be underlined that from Article 318 of the CPA, to which the challenged provision refers, it follows that when issuing a default judgment, the court of first instance only verifies that the facts upon which the claim is based are not in contradiction with the evidence adduced by the plaintiff (and not by the defendant) or with facts that are generally known (with regard to which the principle of party presentation determined by Article 7 of the CPA applies fully and which courts must not, as a general rule, determine ex officio).<sup>15</sup> The court at issue decides on the basis of the set of documents provided only by the plaintiff. Legal experts interpret the challenged provision in such manner as well.<sup>16</sup> The Constitutional Court cannot concur with the differing position of the Government regarding the consequences of the challenged provision in the event of the unjustified non-appearance of the defendant.

B – II

12. The applicant alleges that the challenged regulation interferes with the right of the defendant to make a statement in the procedure. The applicant considers this entitlement to be a part of the right to judicial protection determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution. Nonetheless, the Constitutional Court considered this allegation, in conformity with the established constitutional case law, within the framework of the right to the equal protection of rights determined by Article 22 of the Constitution, i.e. within the framework of the right to an adversarial procedure

---

13 Gazette of the National Assembly, No. 21/08, p. 135.

14 In Judgment and Order No. Pdp 517/2005, dated 23 September 2005, the Higher Labour and Social Court stated that the court of first instance should have issued, on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Labour and Social Courts Act (the LSCA-1), a default judgment already due to the defendant's absence from the settlement hearing and that it was not necessary that, after having established that the attempt at a settlement did not succeed due to the non-appearance of the defendant at the settlement hearing, the court of first instance proceeded by holding the first hearing, on which it issued the challenged default judgment.

15 The second paragraph of Article 318 of the CPA, which refers to "circumstances regarding which inquiries must be made", does not entail a basis for determining substantively relevant facts ex officio.

16 A. Galič, 2009, op. cit., p. 37.

13. The right to an adversarial procedure is one of the most significant expressions of the right to the equal protection of rights. Courts must give each party the possibility to make a statement with regard to the allegations and claims of the opposing party. It follows from the Constitution that the procedure must be conducted by observing the fundamental requirement of the equality and procedural balance of the parties, and by observing their right to defend against all the procedural actions that could affect their rights or interests. In such manner, it is based on respect for human personality, as it ensures everyone the possibility to make a statement in a procedure that concerns his or her rights and interests and thus prevents persons from becoming nothing but an object of the procedure. Therefore, a party and everyone having a position equal to a party must thus be enabled to present arguments supporting his or her positions and to make a statement both with regard to factual and legal questions. The party must be ensured the right to state facts and present evidence, and to make a statement on the allegations of the opposing party and on the results of the taking of evidence, as well as the right to be present during the taking of evidence. The corollary to the right of a party to make a statement in the procedure is, on the opposing side, the obligation of courts to take note of all the (legal and factual) allegations of the party, to weigh their admissibility and relevance, and to adopt a position in the reasoning of the judgment on those allegations that are admissible and significant for the decision.<sup>17</sup> On the basis of Article 22 of the Constitution, parties to a lawsuit have a right entailing that courts must consider, evaluate, and in a substantiated manner accept or dismiss their allegations and positions if they are presented in conformity with the provisions of the civil procedure and if they are not manifestly legally irrelevant.<sup>18</sup>
14. Thus, the courts must, in particular, become acquainted with all the preliminary submissions and applications, statements, allegations, motions for evidence, and objections of parties; however, they only must substantively study and (if they are legally relevant) take into consideration when deciding [on the case] those that are in conformity with the procedural rules.<sup>19</sup> If a certain procedural provision must be interpreted in such a manner that (regardless of their legal significance) the allegations of the parties are, in a certain manner or after certain time limits have expired, inadmissible, or even in such a manner, as in the case at issue, that the allegations that are initially correctly presented subsequently become inadmissible due to a party's failure to participate in another procedural action without good cause, courts disregard such allegations when deciding and do not adopt a position thereon. Nonetheless, the law that prescribes such legal consequences must fulfil the requirements determined by Article 22 of the Constitution.<sup>20</sup>

17 See, e.g., Decisions of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-60/03, dated 4 December 2003 (Official Gazette RS, No. 131/03, and OdlUS XII, 93), and No. Up-373/97, dated 22 February 2001 (Official Gazette RS, No. 19/01, and OdlUS X, 108).

18 This was stated by the Constitutional Court in Order No. Up-118/95, dated 11 June 1998 (OdlUS VII, 227).

19 Cf. A. Galič, Ustavno civilno procesno pravo [Constitutional Civil Procedural Law], GV Založba, Ljubljana 2004, pp. 239–240.

15. In Slovene legal theory and practice, it is commonly accepted that a default judgment is based on the system of the so-called affirmative litiscontestatio, which considers that the defendant's inaction entails the recognition of the plaintiff's allegations of facts.<sup>21</sup> In a procedure for issuing a default judgment courts do not have to determine the state of the facts, but they must take the state of the facts as stated in the action as the basis for the default judgment.<sup>22</sup> That is why a default judgment cannot be challenged on grounds of an erroneous or incomplete determination of the state of the facts (the second paragraph of Article 338 of the CPA). The challenged second paragraph of Article 282 of the CPA only introduces the fiction of the recognition of the facts stated in the action as a sanction due to the subsequent inaction of the defendant. As the Constitutional Court explained in the ninth paragraph of the reasoning of the present Decision, it is not even possible for a default judgment to be issued due to non-appearance at the first hearing if prior to that the defendant has not submitted a defence in a timely and substantiated manner.<sup>23</sup> By such a defence, the defendant clearly demonstrated that he or she actively opposes the claim (the first paragraph of Article 278 of the CPA). Therefore, the challenged provision requires that a correctly expressed, timely procedural activity of the defendant be disregarded. This entails an interference with the right to the equal protection of rights determined by Article 22 of the Constitution. The challenged provision also limits the right determined by Article 22 of the Constitution due to the fact that it entails a deviation from the principle of a fair judicial procedure, which also entails the requirement that, within the framework of the principle of party disposition and the principle of party presentation, the composition and structure of the civil procedure allow the courts, as much as possible, [to arrive at], and facilitate for them, the correct and complete determination of the legally relevant facts of a concrete case, as well as the correct application of substantive

---

20 The German constitutional doctrine accepts the standpoint that the duty to adopt a position with regard to a party's allegations only refers to the allegations that were submitted in a substantively and procedurally correct (legal) manner, unless what is at issue is, exceptionally, a law that entails an inadmissible formation of a protected area of the first paragraph of Article 103 of the German Grundgesetz [Basic Law] (K.-G. Zierlein in: D. Umbach and T. Clemens (Ed.), Grundgesetz, Mitwirkungskommentar und Handbuch, Vol. 2, C. F. Müller Verlag, Heidelberg 2002, pp. 1210–1211).

21 This is stated, for instance, by L. Ude in Civilno procesno pravo [Civil Procedural Law], Uradni list RS, Ljubljana 2002, p. 307, and in the Supreme Court Judgment No. II Ips 840/2007, dated 6 December 2007.

22 Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-201/01, dated 6 November 2003 (Official Gazette RS, No. 117/03, and OdlUS XII, 110).

23 A [filed] defence is substantiated if the defendant states facts that substantiate the [filed] defence and also proposes evidence (A. Galič, Sankcije za neaktivnost strank v pravnem postopku [Sanctions for the Inactivity of Parties in a Civil Procedure], Zbornik znanstvenih razprav LXIII [Collection of Scientific Papers LXIII], Pravna fakulteta v Ljubljani, Ljubljana 2003, p. 161). In fact, with regard to the requirement that the defendant submit evidence, the distribution of the burden of proof in the concrete case must be taken into consideration; therefore, a defence often cannot be deemed to be formally deficient only due to the fact that evidence is not proposed therein. Furthermore, the defendant may only submit objections of a legal nature in its [filed] defence.

law, and thereby the issuance of a correct and legal judicial decision.<sup>24</sup> The principle that the procedure must be expeditious and economical should not be hypertrophied on account of this (final) aim of the civil procedure.<sup>25</sup>

16. Human rights may only be limited in cases explicitly determined by the Constitution and due to the protection of the rights of others (the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution). In conformity with the established constitutional case law, a human right may be limited if the legislature thereby pursued a constitutionally admissible aim and if the limitation is in conformity with the principles of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution), namely with that of these principles that prohibits excessive interferences by the state (the general principle of proportionality).
17. It follows from the legislative file that the principal aim of the CPA-D is to ensure that the procedure is expeditious and that the main hearing is focused, while protecting, at the same time, the guarantees of a fair trial guaranteed by the Constitution and conventions.<sup>26</sup> In such context, the proposer of the amendment deemed it necessary, inter alia, to realise and implement in practice the principle that also parties and their authorised representatives are responsible for contributing to expediting and focusing the procedure, and to determine the sanctions – or to increase the severity thereof – for the non-appearance of parties at hearings, thereby promoting the greater procedural discipline of the parties to the procedure and enabling the procedure at the first instance to conclude also in the event of the non-appearance of parties.<sup>27</sup> Allegedly, the second paragraph of Article 282 of the CPA plays an important role in achieving the mentioned aims, as it allegedly has a significant effect on the procedure being focused, expeditious, and economical.<sup>28</sup> An essentially equally defined aim of the challenged provision also follows from the reply of the National Assembly and from the opinion of the Government. In the assessment of the Constitutional Court, this undoubtedly entails a constitutionally admissible aim due to which the legislature was authorised to limit the right of the defendant determined by Article 22 of the Constitution. Ensuring that the civil procedure is focused, expeditious, and economical is namely not only an important statutory principle of the CPA (see Article 11 and the second paragraph of Article 298 of the CPA), but it is also of key importance for effectively ensuring the right to judicial protection without undue delay determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution. The inaction of the party must not cause the opposing party to be unable to invoke 24 By Order No. 2 BvR 701/80, dated 9 July 1980, the German Federal Constitutional Court underlined that the constitutional right to make a statement in a procedure determined by Article 103 of the German Grundgesetz [Basic Law] is (inter alia also) intended to clarify the factual basis of the judicial decision. As stated by K.-G. Zierlein, op. cit., p. 1192, this right contributes to the optimisation of seeking the truth in judicial procedures and to ensuring maximal protection of the substantive rights of citizens.

25 J. Zobec in: L. Ude, A. Galič (Ed.), Pravdni postopek [Civil Procedure], Zakon s komentarjem [The Act with Commentary], Vol. 1, Uradni list RS and GV založba, Ljubljana 2005, p. 110.

26 Gazette of the National Assembly, No. 21/08, p. 15.

27 Ibidem, pp. 15–16.

28 Ibidem, p. 136.

his or her right to judicial protection. The state even has the duty to ensure that the inactivity of parties to a civil procedure is penalised.<sup>29</sup> From the established case law of the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR), it follows that the right to a trial in a reasonable time is of exceptional importance for the right itself to judicial protection and that the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR) obliges the contracting states to organise their legal systems in such a manner that courts are able to fulfil the requirements determined by first paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR, including [the requirement to] ensure a reasonable length of procedures. In the assessment of the ECtHR, it follows from the positive obligation of the state with regard to the protection of human rights that the state must organise the judiciary in such a manner that the actual implementation of the right to a trial in a reasonable time is ensured.<sup>30</sup>

18. With regard to the fact that an interference with the right of defendants in civil procedures to the equal protection of rights determined by Article 22 of the Constitution pursues a constitutionally admissible aim and that from such perspective it is thus not inadmissible, it must also be assessed whether the challenged regulation is in conformity with the general principle of proportionality. The assessment of whether what is at issue is perhaps an excessive interference is carried out by the Constitutional Court on the basis of the so-called strict test of proportionality. This test includes an assessment of three aspects of the interference:

- (1) whether the reviewed interference is appropriate for achieving the pursued aim in the sense that this aim can indeed be achieved by the interference at issue;
- (2) whether the interference is truly necessary (needed) in order to achieve the pursued aim; and
- (3) whether the weight of the consequences of the reviewed interference with the affected human right is proportionate to the value of the pursued aim and to the benefits that will result from the interference (the principle of proportionality in the narrower sense).

Only if the interference at issue passes all three aspects of the test is it constitutionally admissible (see Decision No. U-I-18/02, dated 24 October 2003, Official Gazette RS, No. 108/03, and OdlUS XII, 86, Paragraph 25 of the reasoning).

19. When assessing the appropriateness of an interference with human rights, the Constitutional Court assesses whether the interference is actually appropriate for achieving the constitutionally admissible aim of a limitation of a human right. In doing so, it must consider the assessed provision in its context and ascertain what its combined effects are in practice in conjunction with the other provisions of the same regulation, as well as of other regulations. The legislature assessed that the systemic deficiency of the regulation of the civil procedure [that existed] before the CPA-D amendment was that the CPA did not give courts sufficient possibilities to ensure that the main hearing is focused, which entails one of the fundamental instruments for ensuring that the procedure is expeditious and economical.<sup>31</sup> Undoubtedly, the legislature had multiple possibilities available to achieve this aim that were known both in theory and comparative law. It is important that when pursuing the aim that the civil procedure is expeditious, economical, and focused, the legislature did not limit itself only to [adopting] a new regulation of sanctions for non-appearance at a hearing. In general, the CPA-D accentuates, more than was the case hitherto, the principle that the responsibility or burden to contribute to ensuring that the procedure is focused and expeditious, as well as to the substantive quality of judicial protection, also lies with the parties.<sup>32</sup> There are several such novelties in the CPA – those relevant to the case at issue include, e.g., the expressly written requirement of a substantiated disputation of the facts (the second paragraph of Article 214 of the CPA); the possibility that courts direct the party to submit a written summary of extensive documentation (the fourth paragraph of Article 226 of the CPA); the possibility to acquire statements of witnesses in writing (Article 236a of the CPA); the authorisation given to courts to apply measures of organisation of procedure in the phase of preparations for the main hearing in conjunction with the setting of time limits to carry out procedural actions and the rescheduling of preclusions with regard to the stating of facts and the submission of evidence to a time before the first main hearing (the first three paragraphs of Article 286a of the CPA), and the obligation to file preliminary submissions in due time so that it is not necessary to postpone a hearing (the fourth paragraph of Article 286a of the CPA). The purpose of these changes is, above all, to ensure that the materials for the procedure are collected as soon as possible, so that the procedure can be concluded already at the first hearing, as well as to increase the possibility of the courts to adapt the framework and the manner of how the procedure is conducted to the circumstances and characteristics of each individual case.<sup>33</sup>

---

<sup>29</sup> A. Galič, 2003, op. cit., pp. 158 and 160.

<sup>30</sup> The Constitutional Court went into more detail with regard to these positions of the ECtHR in Decision No. U-I-65/05, dated 22 September 2005 (Official Gazette RS, No. 92/05, and OdlUS XIV, 72).

20. Therefore, the new regulation of the civil procedure significantly increased the possibilities as to what measures of organisation of procedure can be applied, both from the time perspective and with regard to the set of statutory authorisations. The measures of organisation of procedure (i.e. the “open trial”) at a main hearing can contribute to the more complete and correct establishment of the disputed state of the facts and to the procedure being more focused and expeditious if the judge then already has a clearly elaborated legal diagnosis of the dispute.<sup>34</sup> If this method of conducting the civil procedure is extended into its written phase (before the main hearing) – together with the preclusions, the requirement of a substantiated disputation of the allegations of the opposing party within the time limit

31 Gazette of the National Assembly, No. 21/08, p. 2.

32 A. Galič, 2008, op. cit., p. 16.

33 Gazette of the National Assembly, No. 21/08, p. 16.

34 Cf. N. Betetto in: L. Ude, A. Galič (Ed.), Pravdni postopek [Civil Procedure], Zakon s komentarjem [The Act with Commentary], Vol. 2, Uradni list RS and GV založba, Ljubljana 2006, p. 584.

imposed by the court, the timely sending of preliminary submissions, and other changes – the significance of the main hearing and of the oral part of the procedure in general is thereby undoubtedly reduced to a certain extent. The latter is namely no longer necessarily the phase in which the two parties would exchange their written applications at the hearings, submit allegations, motions for evidence, and dispute each other's alleged facts. This finding cannot be changed by the circumstance that, in concrete cases, judges are given wide discretion with regard to the application of individual novelties introduced by the CPA-D, because the decision of courts will depend on the characteristics and circumstances of the concrete case.<sup>35</sup> When preparing the main hearing, courts must namely always choose the method that in the individual case is the most appropriate. In doing so, they must always respect the principle that the procedure must be focused, economical, and expeditious. When the measures of organisation of procedure are moved into the phase of preparations for the main hearing, their objective is to collect the necessary materials for the procedure already before the first hearing. Only the taking of evidence is then left for the oral part of the procedure, as well as the participation of the parties in the procedure for taking evidence, who can then orally complete their legal viewpoints, positions, and substantiations.

21. Even before the entry into force of the challenged second paragraph of Article 282 of the CPA and the other changes introduced by the CPA-D, it could have been disputed whether the non-appearance of a duly summoned defendant at the main hearing indeed always obstructs the speedy and efficient conclusion of the procedure.<sup>36</sup> The legislature's aim of ensuring the greater activity and responsibility of the parties in the procedure is namely only sensible and weighty if the [pursued] activity is reasonable and effective, and not an end in itself. The presence of the defendant at the main hearing (to which the latter is in fact always entitled) is in certain situations even unnecessary and, from a certain perspective, contrary to the legislature's tendency [to ensure] that the procedure is efficient. This, for instance, holds true in instances where the state of the facts is undisputed by the parties or where the defence is manifestly well-founded, i.e. the defendant's allegations and the evidence submitted in writing therein substantiate in themselves the dismissal of the claim (e.g. due to the objection that the [monetary] claim has been repaid, which is confirmed by a notarised creditor's receipt or by a bank certificate). The applicant also correctly draws attention to those substantive objections of the defendant that are only taken into consideration if the party refers thereto and which, in conformity with the challenged provision, must be deemed, if a default judgment is issued, to not have been submitted.<sup>37</sup>

---

35 A. Galič, 2008, op. cit., p. 36.

36 The fact that the courts rescheduled hearings despite the unjustified non-appearances of one party or another was not a systemic flaw in the procedure, but an incorrect practice when conducting the concrete procedures at issue.

37 E.g. the objection that the claim is barred by the lapsing of the time period in accordance with Article 335 and the objection of a disproportionate contractual penalty in accordance with Article 252 of the Code of Obligations (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 83/01, etc.). In practice, situations are possible where such an objection is also successful if only the facts stated by the defendant are taken into consideration, as well as situations

22. With the new authorisations given to courts and the new procedural burdens on the parties, the CPA-D has only strengthened all the reservations relating to the actual effect of forcing the defendant to participate in the main hearing (as the Constitutional Court has already indicated in Paragraph 20 of the reasoning of the present Decision). The structure of the CPA now enables courts to collect the materials for the procedure already before the main hearing and to acquire the necessary explanations from both of the parties in the procedure; by taking into consideration the greater procedural activity of the plaintiff, which will often have an effect on the outcome of the procedure, it also enables them to appropriately punish a defendant who, despite having been duly summoned, does not appear at the first main hearing. Likewise, also with regard to “compulsory” participation in the settlement hearing (which the defendant attends not out of a genuine readiness for a court settlement, but only out of fear of a default judgment being issued), it cannot be concluded that it can increase the number of court settlements by a non-negligible degree. Consequently, the Constitutional Court concluded that the challenged provision has no additional beneficial effect on achieving the aim that the civil procedure is efficient, expeditious, economical, and focused.
23. In the assessment of the Constitutional Court, all the stated reasons indicate that the assessed limitation of the defendant’s human right to an adversarial procedure is not appropriate for achieving the aims stated in Paragraph 17 of the reasoning of the present Decision. The challenged statutory regulation entails a disproportionate interference with the defendant’s right to the equal protection of rights determined by Article 22 of the Constitution. Since the Constitutional Court already established the inconsistency of the challenged regulation with the Constitution for such reason, it did not assess the other allegations of the applicant. Therefore, it abrogated the second paragraph of Article 282 [of the CPA].

C

24. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of Article 43 of the CCA and the second indent of the second paragraph of Article 46 of the Rules of Procedure of the Constitutional Court (Official Gazette RS, No. 86/07), composed of: Jože Tratnik, President, and Judges Dr Mitja Deisinger, Mag. Miroslav Mozetič, Dr Ernest Petrič, Jasna Pogačar, Mag. Jadranka Sovdat, and Jan Zobec. The decision was reached by five votes against two. Judges Mozetič and Tratnik voted against.

Mag. Miroslav Mozetič
Vice President

on behalf of
Jože Tratnik
President

---

where such legally relevant facts as stated by the defendant are very obvious and easy to establish.

DECISION

At a session held on 12 March 1998, in proceedings to review constitutionality initiated upon the request of the State Prosecutor General of the Republic of Slovenia and the petitions of Marija Bitenc Samec, Celje, and Jožica Ilenič, Ljubljana, following a public hearing held on 5 February 1998, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

The provision of Article 28 of the Asset Confiscation and Confiscation Enforcement Act (Official Gazette DFY, No. 40/45), to the extent that it enabled individual persons to be proclaimed war criminals or national enemies on its basis without a final criminal court judgment, was not in accordance with the general principles of law recognised by civilised nations at the time of its entry into force nor with the constitutional principles in force at the time. Its application in court proceedings in the present day would be inconsistent with the Constitution.

*ReasoningA

1. By a request submitted on 5 April 1994 and supplemented on 22 February 1995, the State Prosecutor General challenged the provision of Article 28 of the Asset Confiscation and Confiscation Enforcement Act (Official Gazette DFY [Democratic Federal Yugoslavia], No. 40/45 – hereinafter referred to as the ACCEA) and the provision of Article 31 of the Seizure of Assets and Seizure Enforcement Act (Official Gazette FPRY [Federal People's Republic of Yugoslavia], No. 61/46 – hereinafter referred to as the SASEA), insofar as it was still possible on the basis thereof to apply the provision of Article 28 of the ACCEA. He opines that this Act is consistent with neither the past nor the present constitutional order. The Act was allegedly not adopted by a constitutionally determined legislature, therefore it is not a legally valid law, but a revolutionary decree. The provision of Article 28 of the ACCEA allegedly entails a collective criminal conviction without a trial since all persons shot, killed, or expelled during the war were proclaimed to be war criminals or national enemies and punished by the seizure of their assets.

2. The seizure of assets was pronounced by a court on the basis of a proclamation by a District People's Council. Regarding such, the court had no power to review whether the conditions for such seizure were fulfilled. Therefore, the proclamation represented a declaratory decision on the issue of whether someone was a war criminal or national traitor. The applicant refers to the scholarly literature of the period (Dr Marjan Cigoj, Ljudski pravnik [People's Lawyer], No. 2/49) that interpreted such declaratory decisions as follows: "It was necessary to deem that, for example, an enforceable judgement had been issued against a person who had been shot, to which the court does not have access, as it was not possible to keep regular archives during the exceptional conditions of war." The erroneous nature of the statements in a proclamation could only be established in reopened proceedings. The applicant opines that the provision of Article 28 of the ACCEA thus allowed the legal fiction that an individual person was a national traitor because they had been shot. Due to the nature of the matter, this decision was allegedly equal to a criminal court judgment and therefore it should also be possible to lodge a request for the protection of legality against such. The provision allegedly incriminates merely the status of a person punishable as it contains the terms "national enemy" and "war criminal" instead of acts determined in a definite manner, and allegedly also presupposes this incrimination in certain cases. Therefore, it is allegedly contrary to the general principles of law recognised by civilised nations and also contrary to Articles 27 and 28 of the Constitution.
3. The applicant states that he has not lodged any legal remedy in relation to the application of Article 28 of the ACCEA. The issue of its constitutionality, however, had been raised in a case in which the assets of an individual who had been "executed as a national enemy" had been seized on the basis of this provision, without there having been a final criminal court judgment. The applicant states that he did not decide to lodge a request for the protection of legality due to the unconstitutionality of the challenged provision, which the Supreme Court should not apply when deciding. He opines that it should be possible to annul a proclamation by amending a final court decision through the legal remedy determined by Article 416 of the Criminal Procedure Act, if the Constitutional Court were to decide that the provision of Article 28 of the ACCEA should no longer be applied. On this basis, it would also be possible to return assets to the heirs of the disposed person in accordance with the provisions of the Enforcement of Criminal Sanctions Act.
4. At the public hearing the applicant put forward further arguments, stating that the provision of Article 28 of the ACCEA is a special provision of a criminal law nature. It allegedly contains elements of substantive law by proclaiming ex lege an individual person a war criminal and by determining a criminal sentence (the seizure of assets). In addition to this, it allegedly also contained elements with regard to the regulation of the proceedings by regulating the proclamation issued by the District People's Council. Courts allegedly only enforced the sentence of the seizure of assets by registering such in the land register. With regard to its substance, [such proclamation] allegedly constituted a repressive measure carried out by an administrative body. The proclamations of the District People's Councils allegedly were not served on the convicted person or their relatives. The majority of such proclamations also cannot be found in the court records and their content is evident only from the decisions of the courts by which the seizure of assets was enforced. The State Prosecutor General believes that there are no available legal remedies by which he could challenge decisions issued under Article 28 of the ACCEA, not even in cases in which an evident and very serious injustice was committed against individuals. Allegedly, such is not very problematic from the point of view of property law, due to the possibility of denationalisation proceedings, but conviction as a war criminal is allegedly the most problematic aspect, as it cannot be annulled in denationalisation proceedings. The State Prosecutor General believes that on the basis of a finding that the challenged provision is a provision of criminal law, the affected persons could achieve a retrial in criminal proceedings and thereby moral redress on the basis of Article 416 of the Criminal Procedure Act. In the opinion of the State Prosecutor General, the criminal proceedings would need to restart at the phase prior to the indictment being issued, but as there was no such indictment, at the investigation phase instead. In answer to the question of a judge at the public hearing, the State Prosecutor General explained that individuals had only very rarely decided to lodge exceptional legal remedies in administrative proceedings, in particular motioning for a declaration of the nullity of the proclamation of the District People's Council. There allegedly exists only one decision of a competent administrative body entailing a declaration of nullity; proceedings are allegedly still pending in all other cases.

5. The petitioners Marija Bitenc Samec and Jožica Ilenič lodged petitions on 6 January 1997 and 7 March 1997, respectively, for a review of the constitutionality of the ACCEA. They stated that they wish to join their petition to the request of the State Prosecutor General. The petitioner Marija Bitenc Samec bases her legal interest for challenging the ACCEA on the fact that by a decision of the District Court in Ljubljana the assets of her father were seized as the assets of a person who was alleged to "have fled as a collaborator with the occupier." In reality, the petitioner's father had returned from forced labour in Vienna even before the decision on seizure was issued. The petitioner Jožica Ilenič bases her legal interest on the fact that her grandfather was executed in 1943, and in 1945, on the basis of Article 28 of the ACCEA, his assets were seized.
6. Andrej Doles, attorney in Domžale, was also invited to the public hearing as the representative of the complainant Josipina Petrocokino. A procedure for consideration of the constitutional complaint (No. Up-133/96) that the complainant lodged against the judgement of the Supreme Court is pending before the Constitutional Court. By that judgement her request for the protection of legality against the criminal conviction and execution of her brother, which was carried out by the security intelligence service on 6 January 1944, was rejected as inadmissible. The assets of her brother were confiscated in accordance with Article 28 of the ACCEA by a decision of the District Court in Kranj on the basis of a proclamation of the District People's Council in Kranj. The representative of the complainant Josipina Petrocokino drew attention to the Protection of the Slovene Nation and Its Movement for Liberation and Unification Decree (Slovenski poročevalec [The Slovene Gazette], Year II, No. 19, dated 1 October 1941). This regulation also determined the procedure used against persons who offended the national honour of Slovenia: The procedure was supposed to be prompt, speedy, and secret. The judgement was allegedly issued orally, an appeal was excluded according to the provisions of the cited decree, and the judgment was enforceable immediately. Therefore, it is allegedly very difficult to obtain evidence of the trials of that period today. The only evidence that the complainant has is the proclamation of the District People's Council in which it is stated that her brother was condemned to death and executed as a national traitor. The complainant's fundamental interest is to achieve moral redress for her brother, and due to such she should at least be able to demonstrate his innocence.

7. The request was sent to the National Assembly, who did not respond to it and also did not take part in the public hearing.

B – I

8. The Constitutional Court joined the petitions and the request of the State Prosecutor General for joint consideration and deciding.
9. In reaching a decision on the matter, the Constitutional Court first had to decide whether the procedural preconditions for reviewing the constitutionality of the act were fulfilled. The provision of Article 28 of the ACCEA was already annulled by the provisions of the SASEA, and the SASEA ceased to apply with the entry into force of the Enforcement of Punishment, Security Measures and Measures for Juvenile Delinquents Act (Official Gazette FPRY, No. 47/51). The challenged statutory provisions could therefore not become a constituent part of the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 4 of the Constitutional Act Implementing the Basic Constitutional Charter on the Sovereignty and Independence of the Republic of Slovenia, since they were not in force at the time of independence. The Constitutional Court generally cannot decide on the constitutionality of laws, other regulations, and general acts which have ceased to have effect. Exceptions to this rule are only possible in specific cases. The Constitutional Court has thus already reviewed the constitutionality of certain regulations that were already not in force at the time the proceedings were initiated. In Decision No. U-I-6/93, dated 1 April 1994 (OdlUS III, 33), when reviewing the Military Courts Decree, the Constitutional Court based its decision on the provision of the second paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution. According to this provision, acts that are criminal offences will be established and the resulting penalties pronounced according to the law that was in force at the time the act was performed, except where a more recent law adopted is more lenient towards the offender. Due to this special characteristic applicable to substantive criminal regulations, according to the standpoint of the Constitutional Court, a review of the constitutionality of laws that have been formally annulled must also be admissible. This standpoint was confirmed in Decision No. U-I-67/94, dated 21 March 1996 (OdlUS V, 31), in which the Constitutional Court reviewed the Suppression of Illicit Trade, Illicit Speculation, and Economic Sabotage Act. In addition, the constitutional review of the regulation in that decision was also based on the provision of Article 416 of the Criminal Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 63/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CrPA). According to this provision, a person convicted on the basis of regulations that are found to be inconsistent with the Constitution by a decision of the Constitutional Court has the right to request the amendment of a final judgement in reopened proceedings. After his or her death, on the basis of the provision of the first paragraph of Article 411 and the second paragraph of Article 367 of the CrPA, this right can be exercised by the convicted person's spouse or common-law spouse, their direct descendants, adoptive parent, adoptee, brother, sister, or foster parent.

10. In view of the above, the issue of whether the procedural preconditions in this case are fulfilled regarding the request of the applicant, as well as regarding the petitioners, depends on the review of the legal nature of the provision of Article 28 of the ACCEA and the legal nature of individual acts issued on its basis. For the reasons cited hereunder, the Constitutional Court found that the provision of Article 28 had in particular cases a criminal law meaning (also in the substantive sense). The Constitutional Court thus has jurisdiction to review the constitutionality of the regulation. The State Prosecutor General may, under the provision of the fifth indent of the first paragraph of Article 23 of the CCA, lodge a request initiating proceedings before the Constitutional Court if a question of constitutionality arises in connection with a case he is conducting. A state prosecutor of the Republic of Slovenia may, under the provisions of the second paragraph of Article 421 of the CrPA, lodge a request for the protection of legality, both to the detriment and to the advantage of the accused, against a final court decision issued in criminal proceedings. With regard to such, in contrast to the accused and contrary to other proceedings in which he is similarly entitled to lodge a request for the protection of legality, [the state prosecutor] is not restricted by any time limit. The Constitutional Court must agree with the applicant that due to the fact that the ordinary courts would have to apply the challenged provision of Article 28 of the ACCEA in proceedings initiated by submitted requests for the protection of legality, such entails that a request for the protection of legality could only be lodged to the detriment of the petitioners or their requests would be rejected as unfounded, since the actions of the then post-war authorities had their basis precisely in this provision of the law, or they would even be rejected as inadmissible on the basis of the decision that acts issued on the basis of the challenged provision are not criminal court judgments. Therefore, the procedural preconditions determined by the fifth indent of the first paragraph of Article 23 of the CCA are fulfilled.
11. Since [the provision at issue] is a substantive criminal law regulation, on the basis of Article 416 of the CrPA the procedural preconditions are also met for consideration and review of the petitions by which the petitioners have joined the proceedings initiated upon the request of the applicant. The petitioners challenge the ACCEA as a whole, but it is evident from their statements that their legal interest is demonstrated only with regard to the review of Article 28 of the ACCEA, which was the legal basis for the enforcement of the confiscation of the assets of their forebears, therefore it was only possible to accept their petition to that extent. Since the State Prosecutor General's request was submitted to the National Assembly for a reply thereto, and the petitioners joined their petitions to the substance of the request, the condition for deciding on the petitions is also met in conformity with the provision of the fourth paragraph of Article 26 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA).

12. In the cited decision on the Military Courts Decree, the Constitutional Court already answered the question of what criteria are to be used for a review of the constitutionality of pre-constitutional regulations. It is necessary to review them from the standpoint of consistency with the constitutional and general principles of law recognised by civilised nations at the time, and, with regard to their application in new proceedings, also from the standpoint of consistency with the Constitution.
13. The standpoint of the applicant that the Act was not issued by a competent body and that, even at that period, it was already not a valid law but a revolutionary decree, is not substantiated. In the cited decision on the constitutionality of the Military Courts Decree, the Constitutional Court already found that legislative power had been vested in AVNOJ [Antifašistični svet narodne osvoboditve Jugoslavije – the Anti-Fascist Council for the National Liberation of Yugoslavia] itself from the second session of AVNOJ onward, and in the period between the two sessions to the Presidency of AVNOJ. The Presidency issued the ACCEA on the basis of the authorisation of AVNOJ in the Supreme Legislative and Representative Body of Yugoslavia Decree, and it was confirmed on 1 December 1945 by its Constituent Assembly. As the SA-SEA, it was adopted in accordance with the procedure prescribed specifically by the Constitution of the FPRY. It is therefore necessary to deem that the challenged Act was adopted by a body competent to exercise legislative power at the time.

B – II

14. The provision of Article 28 of the ACCEA reads:

“(1) At the latest within 90 days after the adoption of this law, the District People's Councils must deliver to the District People's Courts an exact inventory of the real property of those war criminals or national enemies who were shot, killed, or who died or fled during the war period, whose assets were either not confiscated at all because the assets could not be accessed, or only the movable property was confiscated or only a part of these assets was. In all such cases, the District People's Court, irrespective of whether it has at its disposal the judgement by which such a person was convicted, shall deem this conviction to be enforceable in its entirety also with regard to the operative part on such confiscation and form a decision on the confiscation of the entire assets, both movable and real property, in conformity with this law and shall fully enforce this decision and implement the transfer of the confiscated assets and the registration of the rights of the state with regard to the confiscated real property.

- (2) The District People's Councils must also report such cases in which the confiscation of real property has already been carried out, in order for the court to implement the prescribed transfer of these assets into the ownership of the state.
  - (3) Similarly, military courts and military commands must deliver to the District People's Courts from their archives a transcription of the judgements in the above cases, in order to enable the courts to fully enforce such confiscation and adopt a decision on confiscation insofar as such was not issued by the judgement."
- 15. On 3 August 1945 (Official Gazette DFY, No. 56/45), the Presidency of AVNOJ adopted an authentic interpretation of some of the ACCEA provisions, including the provision of Article 28 of the ACCEA. This reads as follows:
- "It is necessary to deem that the first paragraph, which refers to persons who were shot, killed or who died, also applies to those who died before they were sentenced.
  - It is not necessary for the courts to establish whether an individual was actually shot, killed, fled, or died, since such is in the exclusive jurisdiction of the People's Councils.
  - If the District People's Councils are in possession of the judgements in the meaning of the first paragraph of Article 28, they must deliver them together with the inventory of the assets."
- 16. By the Confirmation, Amendment, and Supplement of the ACCEA Act, dated 9 June 1945 (Official Gazette FLRJ, No. 61/46), the ACCEA was amended so that it no longer contained the provision of Article 28 of the ACCEA; however, the SASEA determined in Article 31 that the courts must conclude all those proceedings for which the District People's Councils, military courts, and commands had sent them the data under Article 28 of the ACCEA by the date this act came into force (i.e. by 6 August 1946). Under the provisions of the SASEA, new proceedings on the basis of Article 28 of the ACCEA could no longer be initiated by new proclamations of the District People's Councils. Therefore, in terms of substance, it is only the provision of Article 28 of the ACCEA that is at issue and reviewed in this matter.
- 17. The terms "war criminal" and "national enemy" used in the text of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the ACCEA are terms that can be found in that period in the Military Courts Rules [hereinafter referred to as the MCR] (Articles 13 and 14<sup>1</sup>),

---

1 These provisions read: Article 13: "The following shall be considered war criminals, irrespective of the fact that they are citizens of Yugoslavia, or occupied or other provinces: initiators, organisers, inciters, abettors, and direct perpetrators of mass killings, torture, forced expulsion of the population, or their forcible removal to concentration camps or to forced labour; of arson, destruction and looting of national and state property; as well as all individual estate owners and companies in Yugoslavia, in the occupied or other provinces, who inhumanely exploit the labour force by the forced labour of abducted people; officials of the terrorist apparatus and terrorist armed formations of the occupier and locals in the occupier's service; and those who have carried out the mobilisation of our people for the enemy army." Article 14: "The following shall be considered national enemies: all active Ustashi, Chetniks, and members of other armed formations in the enemy's service in any kind of capacity – as spies, informers, couriers, agitators and similar; those who have forced the people to hand over weapons to the occupier; those who have betrayed the national battle and have collaborated with the occupier; those who defected from the national authority and work against it; those who undermine the national army or in other the constitutionality of which the Constitutional Court already decided on in case No. U-I-6/93, cited above. At that time, the Constitutional Court determined that all those elements of the provisions of the Rules that were, and to the extent that they were, used in particular criminal proceedings to incriminate merely the status of a person and did not refer to the acts of the accused determined in a definite manner (Paragraph 11 of the reasoning of the cited Decision) and that were, and to the extent that they were, the basis for arbitrary decision-making by the courts of the time in particular criminal proceedings due to these provisions not being specific enough (Paragraph 13 of the reasoning of the cited Decision), were contrary to the general principles of law recognised by civilised nations, and are contrary to the Constitution in the present day. This definition does not refer to those provisions of the Rules that determine clearly and specifically enough the criminal offences or incriminate participation in such acts (for example, perpetrators or participants in mass killings, torture, forced displacement of populations, arson, destruction and looting of state and national property, etc. – Paragraph 19 of the reasoning of the cited Decision). It can undoubtedly be concluded that the post-war legislature, by using the cited terms in the challenged provision, referred to the very terminology of Articles 13 and 14 of the MCR. The proclamation allegedly referred to all those “war criminals” or “national enemies” who during the war were “shot, killed, or who died or fled [...], whose assets were either not confiscated at all [...], or only the movable property was confiscated or only a part of this assets was.” If at the time of the proclamation of the District People’s Council the property of these persons had already been seized, the seizures could only be issued by judgements of military courts that at the time were adjudicating cases on the basis of the MCR. It is therefore clear that a proclamation of the District People’s Council could be based on a military court judgment. The seizure of assets was determined as an ancillary penalty under the MCR (the second paragraph of Article 16). As such, the court pronounced it together with the main penalty in the criminal proceedings in which a decision was reached regarding the criminal responsibility of the accused.

18. Even at the time the ACCEA was in force, it emerged that on the basis of Article 28 of the ACCEA the assets of persons who were not “war criminals” were seized. The issue of the restitution of such seized assets or payment of compensation for such had already arisen at the time.<sup>2</sup> The fact that a particular person was not a “war criminal” or “national enemy”, could, according to the standpoints accepted at the period of time, be established by a statement of the competent public prosecutor that the person at issue had not been punished and that no criminal proceedings against this person had been instituted. If the prosecutor gave such a statement, the District Executive ways aid and assist the occupier; those who have carried out grave cases of murder, robbery, or similar.”

---

- 2 It was considered at that time (source: Opinion of the Ministry of Justice of the People’s Republic of Slovenia, No. 69/45-245, dated 2 November 1946) that all proclamations are “a decision (finding) that someone was a war criminal or national traitor. The courts could thus only annul their decision on the seizure of assets on the basis of some other decision of the same District Executive Council that, namely, the original report (decision) is annulled because it was subsequently shown that the relevant person was not a war criminal or national enemy.”

Council allegedly issued a decision that its proclamation was annulled, and on this basis the court allegedly also annulled its confiscation decision. Such proceedings were allegedly initiated only upon a motion of the affected person.

19. The representative of the complainant in constitutional complaint proceedings No. Up-133/96 emphasised the provision of Article 7 of the Protection of the Slovene Nation and Its Movement for Liberation and Unification Decree adopted by the SNOO [Slovenski narodnoosvobodilni odbor – Slovene National Liberation Committee]. For certain criminal offences, this provision prescribed a trial by special courts and a prompt, oral, and secret procedure without hearing the perpetrator or the possibility of appeal, whereas the punishment was enforceable immediately. Such regulation was in force until 15 August 1943, when the Establishment of the Brigade and Detachment Military Courts Decree (Slovenski poročevalec [The Slovene Gazette], Year IV, No. 15) entered into force. This Decree already determined that the detailed organisation, operation, and procedure of these courts would be regulated by special rules that were issued on 5 August 1943 and that were already replaced on 16 October 1943 by the Organisation and Operation of Brigade and Detachment Military Courts Rules. With regard to the substantive definition of criminal offences, these Rules referred to the cited Protection of the Slovene Nation Decree. The procedure under these Rules was comprised of the investigation carried out by the prosecutor and the public hearing, of which minutes had to be kept; a written judgement had to be issued and the convicted person had no right of appeal against such, however, a procedure for confirming the judgment was introduced. Judgements had to be sent to the Higher Military Court, which was established by decree of the Headquarters of the NOV and POS [Narodnoosvobodilna vojska in partizanski odredi Slovenije – the National Liberation Army and Partisan Detachments of Slovenia]. The Instructions No. 13<sup>3</sup> that the Judicial Department of the Headquarters of the NOV and POS sent to all the Brigade and Detachment Courts on 30 August 1943 read as follows: “A written judgement with regard to each conviction must be made. The latter must contain a statement as to when and where the judgement was issued; in addition, the offence for which the accused was convicted must be characterised briefly and clearly. Each judgement must also give reasons.” In Instructions No. 5, issued on 17 February 1944 by the Judicial Department, the military courts were notified anew that asset seizure is a measure of criminal law that can be issued only by the courts, and namely by a judgement against a person who had committed a criminal offence. The cited Rules were replaced by the Military Criminal Judiciary Rules issued by the Headquarters of NOV and POS on 20 April 1944, and slightly more than a month later the latter were replaced by the MCR issued by the High Command of NOV and POJ [Narodnoosvobodilna vojska in partizanski odredi Jugoslavije – the National Liberation Army and Partisan Detachments of Yugoslavia].
20. It is therefore evident that a proclamation based on Article 28 of the ACCEA could be based on a criminal court judgment. It is also possible that criminal proceedings took place in some cases, but the court files were not preserved.<sup>4</sup> It is, however, also clear that in certain cases executions were carried out without any court proceedings.<sup>5</sup> When reviewing the MCR in the already cited decision, the Constitutional Court pointed out the results of the recent historical research according to which in certain cases criminal proceedings on the basis of the MCR were abused in order to seize assets, although there was neither a factual nor legal basis for issuing such a measure. The same research also reveals that the majority of the abuses did not occur on the basis of the MCR, but outside of it (arbitrary revenge, extrajudicial executions or liquidations – Paragraph 17 of the cited decision) and, as is evident from the above mentioned, also despite the regulations applicable on Slovene territory before the MCR entered into force. If it were not for the provision of Article 28 of the ACCEA, it would be possible to conclude the discussion at this point and draw a clear distinction between the cases in which persons were convicted in criminal proceedings and cases in which persons were put to death outside of court proceedings. The latter were abuses, but abuses that the provision of Article 28 of the ACCEA, in particular its authentic interpretation (the first paragraph), considered admissible. Not only the seizure of the assets of persons against whom no court proceedings had ever taken place was allowed on its basis, but these persons, merely by the proclamations of the District People's Councils, were proclaimed "war criminals" or "national enemies", which in the criminal law terminology of the time (Paragraph 17 of the reasoning of this Decision) signified persons who had been convicted of war crimes. In addition to the above stated, the legal fiction of a criminal conviction also included persons who had "fled". The legislature thus gave the District People's Councils – i.e. administrative bodies – the authority to find a certain person guilty of a criminal offence on the basis of Article 13 or 14 of the MCR in cases in which there were no criminal judgements nor evidence of criminal proceedings having been carried out. And this was done in proceedings that did not provide even the most minimal guarantees of a fair trial. It is therefore necessary to agree with the applicant that the challenged provision also contains elements of substantive criminal law,

---

3 Source: M. Šnuderl: Dokumenti o razvoju ljudske oblasti v Sloveniji [Documents on the Development of People's Power in Slovenia], Official Gazette SRS, Ljubljana 1949.

-
- 4 Tominšek (Sodstvo v Istrskem odredu [The Judiciary in the Istria Detachment], Revija za zgodovino, literaturo in antropologijo, note 6) refers to the prosecutor, Jože Markučič, and to the commissar of the defence battalion, Milan Cirek. The first states that there were a number of cases of trials held by the detachment court where the court records were not preserved. The other person, who participated often in the court proceedings, states that from February to May 1944, in addition to the registered court processes, there were at least 25-26 unregistered ones of which 15 or 16 ended with a conviction and some ten with an acquittal. Minutes were kept on all these trials, but were probably lost during the German attack on Preloža.
- 5 The circular issued by the Department of Justice of the Headquarters of NOV and POS to the courts stated under point III: "If due to the special exceptional circumstances cited in the circular, a punishment was carried out without prior court discussion, the courts must carry out the court proceedings subsequently on the basis of the charge of the competent public prosecutor [...]". The Headquarters of NOV and POJ responded to this circular, and in their letter to the Headquarters of NOV and POS No. SA 102/44, dated 19 December 1944, explicitly stated that this entailed that dead persons were to be put on trial, which was not envisaged by the MCR and was not supposed to be carried out in other parts of Yugoslavia.

and that its legal quality entailed a retrogression from the criminal law protection already achieved at the time (criminal proceedings could not be conducted against a deceased person, the penalty of the seizure of assets was issued as a sentence by a court against a person who was found guilty of a criminal offence). Even the MCR, despite the fact that it also contained specific elements opposing the basic principles recognised by civilised nations already at the time, was from this point of view a legally more developed regulation than the subsequently adopted ACCEA.

21. The legal nature of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the ACCEA and the legal nature of the proclamation issued by the District People's Councils is therefore of crucial importance for the review of this case. An essential part of its content is the finding that a given person who was shot, killed, or who died or fled during the war period was a war criminal or national enemy. When issuing the sentence of confiscation, the court was not allowed to review the issue of whether the individual person had really been shot, killed, or had died or fled, since establishing this, under the second paragraph of the authentic interpretation of Article 28 of the ACCEA, was within the exclusive jurisdiction of the District People's Councils. Similarly, the courts could not review the issue of whether the individual person had really committed any kind of criminal offence entailing a war crime under the valid legislation of the period and whether this person had been convicted in criminal proceedings in which the basic guarantees of a fair trial were ensured, as already then recognised by civilised nations. The courts therefore issued sentences and carried out confiscations of real property even if a criminal judgement had not been submitted to them, but only on the basis of the proclamation of the District People's Council.
22. From a formal legal point of view, the proclamation was undoubtedly an administrative decision; it was an administrative decision also from the substantive law point of view in all those cases in which and insofar as the finding that an individual person had committed a criminal offence, i.e. was a war criminal, was based on a criminal court judgment. In all other cases it was actually possible to declare an individual person a war criminal by this administrative decision. Undoubtedly, the definition of a "war criminal" and "national enemy" in the circumstances of the period entailed a person who was supposed to have committed a certain criminal offence (Paras. 11 and 12 of the reasoning of Decision No. U-I-6/93). Also in these cases, seizure as such was namely considered to be an ancillary penalty. It was also treated as such in the scholarly literature quoted by the applicant. Thus, Dr Marjan Cigoj (O zaplembi [On Seizure], Ljudski pravnik [People's Lawyer], Nos. 2/49 and 6-7/49) states that there were different types of legally recognised decisions by which seizure was imposed<sup>6</sup>. Thus, the courts sometimes acted as the bodies merely executing the penalty of seizure, and sometimes issued this penalty themselves. According to this author, when issuing the penalty of seizure under Article 28 of the ACCEA, it was necessary to deem that there was an enforceable judgement issued against the persons determined in this

---

6 Among these, only the post-war seizure of assets of German nationals was not considered to be a measure of criminal law but a measure legally based in reparations for war damages.

Article, but the court did not have access to such, since it was not possible to keep archives in the exceptional wartime conditions. The concept of seizure under the provision of Article 28 of the ACCEA thus constituted a concept of criminal law. This entails that the applicant's claim that the administrative decision – the proclamation of a District People's Council in all those cases where it was not based on a criminal court judgment – replaced the criminal court judgment in terms of its substance is well-founded. With regard to this, the District People's Council did not seize this competence on its own, but had explicit statutory authority for such. It was thus the statutory regulation that allowed for a criminal conviction without requiring that prior criminal proceedings be carried out that would guarantee the individual at least the basic principles of a fair trial recognised by civilised nations already at that time. On the basis of this provision it was therefore permissible to take a person's life and then confiscate assets outside of criminal proceedings and irrespective of the military activities of this person. The application of such a provision, which gravely violated human rights and fundamental freedoms, was not in conformity with the basic legal principles recognised by civilised nations even at that time; the possibility of its application in proceedings today would be even more unacceptable. Were such a provision to be used in proceedings today, its application would be contrary to at least Article 23 of the Constitution, according to which everyone has the right to have any criminal charges brought against him decided by an independent, impartial court constituted by law. This right can be violated in the most basic manner precisely by convicting an individual "as a war crime or national enemy" without a criminal court judgment and even without a criminal charge.

23. If an individual legal act, and the proclamation was such an act, is of such nature that it represents a criminal court judgment in terms of its substance, the same rules must apply for such as for criminal court judgments. On the basis of the requirement that the Constitutional Court explicitly addressed to the legislature in the already cited decision on the MCR,<sup>7</sup> a special legal remedy was introduced by the provision of Article 559 of the CrPA for challenging final court decisions. The deadline for exercising such remedies has already expired. The CrPA also contains the provision of Article 416, which introduced particular grounds for a retrial if a final criminal conviction was issued on the basis of a regulation abrogated by a Constitutional Court decision. This legal remedy is undoubtedly also a reflection of the provision of Article 28 of the Constitution, and as such is directed above all at cases of annulled substantive provisions of criminal law determining criminal offences. In the case at issue, the Constitutional Court cannot abrogate the challenged provision as it is no longer in force, but decided that due to its unconstitutionality it can no longer be applied in proceedings before the state authorities in the Republic of Slovenia in the same manner and for the same reasons as the Constitutional Court decided with regard to the MCR. From the point of view of Article 416 of the CrPA, such decision has the same effects in terms of its substance as the abrogation of a regulation determining a criminal offence would. It is therefore necessary to allow persons who were declared war criminals or national enemies by a proclamation without a criminal court judgment, or their legal heirs entitled to such in accordance with the law, to request that a final court decision (i.e. the proclamation of a District People's Council not based on a criminal court judgment) be reversed in a retrial in accordance with Article 416 of the CrPA on the basis of this decision of the Constitutional Court.

<sup>7</sup> Point 3 of the operative provisions of the cited Decision states the following: "The statutory regulation of criminal proceedings in force is contrary to the Constitution as it does not allow all the decisions that were unjust from a procedural and substantive point of view and that were issued on the basis of the regulations of the revolutionary war-time and post-war authorities to be remedied, or allow redress of the consequences of such decisions with exceptional legal remedies. The Constitutional Court calls upon the National Assembly to remedy the established unconstitutionality as soon as possible."

24. Persons who were unjustly convicted in this manner have the right to moral redress, which they can achieve in a retrial under Article 416 of the CrPA. In addition, they also have the right that seized assets be returned to them or their legal heirs. In these cases, the assets were seized by a decision of the competent district court in the formal legal sense on the basis of Article 28 of the ACCEA, which in essence entailed the enforcement of the proclamation. From this point of view, such a decision that can no longer be challenged by any legal remedy would in the above-mentioned cases, despite the possibility of the annulment of the proclamation, represent an obstacle to the return of assets to unjustly convicted persons outside of denationalisation proceedings. However, it is necessary to take into account that in both these cases and in the cases in which the seizure was based on a criminal court judgment, the decision of the district court only entailed a continuation of the criminal court judgment and from that point of view it in fact entailed that a criminal sentence was issued against the individual. Therefore, in cases in which the individual achieves the annulment of the proclamation on which the seizure by a decision of a district court under Article 28 of the ACCEA was based, it is necessary to deem that such also creates a legal basis for the restitution of assets under the provisions of the Enforcement of Criminal Sanctions Act (Official Gazette SRS, No. 17/78, and Official Gazette RS, No. 8/90, 12/92, 58/93, and 10/98).

C

25. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA, composed of: Dr Lovro Šturm, President, and Judges Dr Peter Jambreč, Dr Tone Jerovšek, Mag. Matevž Krivic, Mag. Janez Snoj, Franc Testen, Dr Lojze Ude, and Dr Boštjan M. Zupančič. The Decision was reached by six votes against two. Judges Ude and Zupančič, who submitted a dissenting opinion, voted against. Judges Jerovšek, Šturm, and Testen submitted a concurring opinion.

Dr Lovro Šturm
President

In this case I voted against the majority decision, as it is based on the legal fiction that there exist substantive “grounds for issuing a final criminal conviction” (Article 416 of the CrPA), which is a prerequisite for a retrial in accordance with the current Criminal Procedure Act. As it is impossible to have a retrial of criminal proceedings that never took place, the legal fiction with regard to the interpretation of Article 28 of the Asset Confiscation and Confiscation Enforcement Act (AFIPA) from 1945 only upgrades the first (unjust) legal fiction with a modern “interpretation”, arguing that this provision contains both the substantive and procedural criteria of criminal decision-making and that, as such, it was “the basis for a criminal conviction.” The extreme legal formalism that led to such an interpretation went astray when creating a legal fiction only to meet the formal-legal requirements of the current wording of Article 416 of the Criminal Procedure Act. This stretching of the current wording on a Procrustean bed in order to neutralise the injustices from fifty years ago, however, is not appropriate to the role that the Constitutional Court should assume in such instances.

As of course there can be no doubt that redress for the past injustices must be given, the legislature, which is free to create such a procedural path, is responsible for enabling such redress. If the Constitutional Court intended to achieve such in this manner, it would have to abrogate sua sponte also the legal gap in Article 416 of the Criminal Procedure Act and require the legislature to open up this path using a specific, adapted procedure also for those cases in which the injustice constituted by the confiscation of property was suffered as a secondary “legal consequence” of a not legal execution, etc. The AFIPA could not fictitiously regularise criminal proceedings that never existed. Likewise, the Constitutional Court today cannot infer from a mutatis mutandis interpretation of Article 416 that the procedure that led to the confiscation ever existed.

One must namely ask oneself what the practical procedural consequences of this decision will be. There can de facto be no retrial in these proceedings.

The clear intention of Article 416 of the Criminal Procedure Act was to allow for this type of retrial where the substantive (or even procedural) legal basis for the criminal conviction was amended. In this case, however, the Constitutional Court neither amended nor newly created the substantive legal basis. The other fiction created by the Constitutional Court by this decision will therefore be followed by a whole avalanche of fictitious retrials (rehabilitations and restitutions). Even the actualisation of the State Prosecutor General’s statements made at the public hearing, i.e. that in such cases he will request that the case be remanded to the investigation phase, is very doubtful after fifty years.

I think that at least in this case it is very clear that the Constitutional Court should have required the legislature to enact that which the Constitutional Court now attempted to do in a legally very questionable manner.

Dr Boštjan M. Zupančič

Dr Lojze Ude

---

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE DR JEROVŠEK, JOINED BY JUDGES DR ŠTURM AND TESTEN

This decision enables those persons who were declared “war criminals” or “national enemies” by a proclamation without a criminal court judgment or their legal heirs who are entitled to such in accordance with the law, to request on the basis of this decision of the Constitutional Court that a final court decision (i.e. the proclamation of a District People’s Council not based on a criminal court judgment) be reversed in a retrial in accordance with Article 416 of the CrPA.

It is a known fact that in numerous situations the law uses the instrument of legal presumptions, rarely legal fictions, precisely in order to overcome occurrences in life that seem unresolvable. In the field of criminal law, a legal fiction to the detriment of the defendant or suspect, or even a person known to be innocent, is not admissible. The idea that a certain proclamation is deemed to be the legal fiction of a criminal conviction so that those who were shot, killed, or who died or fled “must be considered” [...] “war criminals” or “national enemies” without a court judgment, is abhorrent, with regard to the most basic principles of justice. The effect of this legal fiction was the confiscation of assets, not to mention the suffering of the innocent who for fifty years on the basis of these legal fictions carried in the eyes of the people the burden of perceived depravity. In a situation where the legislature has not (or not yet) regulated the manner of the redress of injustices caused by the application of Article 28 of the AFIPA, it is the duty of the Constitutional Court to immediately enable the possibility to use legally admissible means of redress for consequences contrary to the principles of law recognised by civilised nations at the time at issue and today.

After it was alerted to such by the affected persons and the state prosecutor, the Constitutional Court must enable violations that cannot be covered or healed even by the passage of time to be redressed at any time. Considering this fact, the decision really had to rely to some extent on the legal fiction of “the existence of a substantive basis”, i.e. a criminal conviction that is then the basis for a retrial (Article 416 of the CrPA). Such legal fiction should have been created a long time ago by the legislature, especially after it became evident that for fifty years many innocent people unjustly suffered the consequences of such judgments on the basis of legal fictions, with no rights to moral or material redress.

This concurring opinion expressly wishes to draw the attention of the legislature and the public to the continued responsibility of the legislature (in spite of this decision) to regulate the normative options of redressing the mentioned injustices, as the powers of the Constitutional Court do not allow it to select the potential cases and to prevent those possible cases where a retrial would also be demanded by those who were justifiably and rightly convicted of crimes and proclaimed to be war criminals and consequently their assets were confiscated. It must be also underlined that crimes against humanity and war crimes are not time-barred and that in such cases it is still possible to initiate proceedings under the Military Courts Decree, which the Constitutional Court in this very part did not abrogate.

By including the Asset Confiscation and Confiscation Enforcement Act in the acts that could constitute the basis for denationalisation (point 18 of the first paragraph of Article 3 of the Denationalisation Act, hereinafter referred to as the DA), the legislature has already resolved the issue of the material redress of the affected persons. This decision of the Constitutional Court furthermore provides for the redress of the moral damage suffered on the basis of the application of the mentioned Act. By adopting additional regulations, the legislature may still prevent the potential financial effects of this decision from exceeding the limits already established by the DA. The Constitutional Court must not shirk the responsibility to protect the most basic right of everyone to be presumed innocent until found guilty by a final judgment. In doing so, it cannot resort to sanctimonious preaching as regards what would result if, in addition to the innocent, this procedural means were also exploited by those who are not innocent. When weighing whether it is permissible to allow, due to the lack of an adequate normative framework, the continuation of a situation which grossly violates human dignity, or to rather fill this legal gap with a decision of the Constitutional Court (until the legislature adopts certain measures), there can be no question for a constitutional court judge; he or she must vote in favour of the latter.

Dr Tone Jerovšek

Dr Lovro Šturm

Franc Testen

DECISION

At a session held on 8 March 2001 in proceedings to decide upon the constitutional complaint of A. A., Ž., represented by B. B., attorney in Z., the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

The constitutional complaint of A. A. against Supreme Court Order No. II Ips 55/98, dated 9 September 1998, in connection with Celje Higher Court Order No. Cp 780/97, dated 1 October 1997, and Celje District Court Order No. P 1209/95, dated 3 July 1997, is dismissed.

Reasoning

A

1. In the challenged order the court of first instance decided that Slovene courts had no jurisdiction to decide on the dispute, and rejected the complainant's lawsuit. The appeal and the appeal to the Supreme Court were dismissed. The complainant filed a lawsuit against the Federal Republic of Germany and claimed damages for actions allegedly committed by the defendant during the Second World War. According to his statements, during the Second World War he and many others were forcibly removed from their parents and transported to Germany in order to be germanised. He claimed damages for the period he spent in a concentration camp, for emotional distress (due to the death of his parents and for destroying the happiness in his life), and for his property that was destroyed by the occupation authorities in 1942. In his constitutional complaint, the complainant contests the position taken in the challenged orders according to which the defendant enjoys immunity in proceedings before the courts of another state. The court of first instance allegedly substantiated the jurisdictional immunity of a foreign state by the rules of customary law, without actually stating them. The court of second instance allegedly substantiated its decision through an incorrect understanding of the principle par in parem non habet iurisdictionem, which has allegedly been obsolete for a long time. The complainant asserted that jurisdictional immunity is not an absolute right and cases of acta iure imperii that violate ius cogens constitute an exception to this right. The complainant is not aware of a case in which jurisdictional immunity has been granted to a state that acted contrary to the fundamental principles of civilised nations. He argues that, in granting jurisdictional immunity, there is no difference between international and national courts. In his opinion, the Nuremberg International Military Tribunal confirmed the position that, in the event of a violation of the peremptory rules of international law, a state may not claim immunity. Furthermore, he alleges that the Supreme Court's position that international law principles have precedence over statutes is disputable. In the complainant's opinion, in interpreting the European Convention on State Immunity (hereinafter referred to as the ECSI)<sup>1</sup>, the court did not answer the question of whether the provisions of the Convention apply to acta iure imperii. The position that the provisions of the Convention are not part of customary law is allegedly erroneous. The complainant further rejected the absolute applicability of the rule pacta tertiis nec nocent nec prosunt. In his opinion, the obligation of subjects of international law to submit to the rules and general principles of international customary law does not depend only on their will, but on the rules adopted by the international community. The complainant's right to judicial protection (Article 23 of the Constitution and the first paragraph of Article 6 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR) was allegedly violated due to an erroneous decision on the existence of the procedural requirements for the consideration of his lawsuit. It is alleged that the right to a legal remedy (Article 25 of the Constitution) was violated as the challenged orders failed to specify their reasons in sufficient detail. The provision of Article 153 of the Constitution was allegedly violated because, in their assessment, the courts failed to take into account the universal human values recognised by civilised nations, which are also a source of law. The complainant suggested that the Constitutional Court annul the challenged orders and decide that the courts of the Republic of Slovenia have jurisdiction to decide on his claim.

2. By the Order dated 30 May 2000, the panel of the Constitutional Court accepted the constitutional complaint for consideration.
3. The Supreme Court did not reply to the constitutional complaint.
4. The Federal Republic of Germany submitted a statement regarding the constitutional complaint.

It claims that state immunity is a principle recognised by international customary law. It explains that this principle originates from the sovereign equality of states in their mutual relations. The principle allegedly contributes to the prevention of legal and political conflicts by resolving disputes at an international level and not at a national level. The principle of state immunity allegedly applies precisely to so-called authoritative acts. It is alleged that the conduct of occupation forces or military units in connection with war events constitutes such an authoritative state act, regardless of the question of whether it is legal or illegal. As a result, such authoritative act could allegedly not be the subject of a lawsuit filed before a court of another state. If individuals could enforce their claims for compensation for pecuniary and non-pecuniary damage against a foreign state before a court of their own state, this would lead to unpredictable consequences for international legal coexistence. The Federal Republic of Germany enclosed with the described position an explanatory document on state immunity that summarises the rules of international public law.

1 The European Convention on State Immunity, signed in Basel on 16 May 1972.

5. In the course of the proceedings, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs also submitted an information on state immunity.

B

6. All three courts based their decisions on Article 26 of the Civil Procedure Act (Official Gazette SFRY [Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia], No. 4/77, etc. – hereinafter referred to as the CPA77), according to which the rules of international law apply in proceedings against foreign states in the Republic of Slovenia. In the challenged order, the court of first instance stated that a foreign state enjoys immunity as a sovereign state, but not as a holder of civil rights and obligations. As the complainant's case entails the first situation, it rejected the lawsuit. The court of second instance dismissed the appeal and added in its reasoning that, in accordance with the rules of international law formed on the basis of treaties, customs, and judicial practice and in conformity with the principle of par in parem non habet iurisdictionem, foreign states enjoy jurisdictional immunity with regard to all acts performed in the exercise of sovereign authority (acta iure imperii). The Supreme Court confirmed the positions of the courts of first and second instance and dismissed the allegations stated in the appeal to the Supreme Court. It stated that the principle of par in parem non habet iurisdictionem has become obsolete in many aspects, but not to the extent that a foreign state could not claim jurisdictional immunity in cases in which it is sued for acta iure imperii. The jurisdictional immunity of states has evolved into international customary law on the basis of state practice. Subsequent conventions were based on that rule, but their provisions limited the scope of immunity (e.g. the ECSI; see also the Draft Articles on Jurisdictional Immunities of States and Their Property prepared by the United Nations International Law Commission). In the Supreme Court's opinion, Article 11 of the ECSI, which specifies some torts as exemptions to immunity, is neither part of domestic internal law nor part of international customary law, and thus it is irrelevant as to whether or not it also applies to acta iure imperii.

The Vienna Convention on Civil Liability for Nuclear Damage (Official Gazette SFRY, MP, No. 9/77), the Convention on International Liability for Damage Caused by Space Objects (Official Gazette SFRY, MP, No. 9/77) and the International Convention on Civil Liability for Damage Caused by Oil Pollution (Official Gazette SFRY, MP, No. 7/77), all of which in the complainant's opinion "exceed" the jurisdictional immunity rule, regulate acts that the state performs iure gestionis. The judgment of a Greek court, which the complainant enclosed with the appeal to the Supreme Court and which has not yet become final, can also not be considered part of international customary law. Cases in which foreign states or individuals were tried before an international court are not equal to cases in which a foreign state is party to the proceedings before a court of another state. Furthermore, substantive provisions on liability for damages must not be confused with the question of jurisdictional immunity. Moreover the non-legal or ethical aspects of state acts do not influence the assessment of the existence of jurisdictional immunity. Lastly, the plaintiffs are not deprived of judicial protection as they have the possibility of claiming damages before the German courts.

7. A constitutional complaint may be lodged against violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms. Article 153 of the Constitution, which determines the hierarchy of legal acts, does not contain provisions [regarding human rights and fundamental freedoms]. However, the grounds on which the complainant substantiates the violation of Article 153 of the Constitution will be considered in the review of the violation of the right to judicial protection.
8. It is clear that this case does not concern a violation of the right to a legal remedy (Article 25 of the Constitution). The ratio decidendi for rejecting the complainant's lawsuit was the same in all three challenged judgments. By providing a reasoned answer to all of the complainant's allegations, the Supreme Court eliminated potential violations of the right to a legal remedy at the lower levels of the judiciary.
9. Regarding the right to judicial protection guaranteed in Article 23 of the Constitution and the first paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR, the complainant challenges the following:
  - (1) the position of the courts that, in the event that a foreign state is sued before a court of another state, the foreign state may successfully rely on jurisdictional immunity for acta iure imperii, and
  - (2) the finding of the courts that the described position is a rule of international law which used to, in accordance with Article 26 of the CPA77, apply to cases in which a foreign state was sued before a Slovene court.
10. In constitutional complaint proceedings, the Constitutional Court cannot review the correctness of the challenged decisions in terms of substantive law and the assessment of the evidence by the courts. In accordance with Article 50 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), when examining a constitutional complaint, the Constitutional Court is limited to a review of whether the challenged decision is based on a specific legal position that is not acceptable from the perspective of the protection of human rights, or whether it is erroneous to such extent and lacks sound legal reasoning that it can be considered arbitrary (see, e.g., Order of the Constitutional Court No. Up-103/97, dated 26 February 1998, OdlUS VII, 118).
11. By challenging the findings of the courts as to which rule of international law was applicable for determining jurisdiction in cases where a foreign state is sued before a Slovene court, the complainant alleges an erroneous application of the law. Such claim could lead to the annulment of the challenged orders only if it were demonstrated that the finding of the courts is not only erroneous but that is so manifestly erroneous and without sound legal reasoning that it can be considered arbitrary. As substantiated hereinafter, the finding of the courts that a foreign state can successfully rely on jurisdictional immunity when it is sued before a court of another state for acta iure imperii was not arbitrary.

12. In accordance with Article 26 of the CPA77, which was applicable at the time of deciding on the complainant's case,<sup>2</sup> rules of international law applied in the event that foreign states were tried in the Republic of Slovenia. Sources of international law include treaties, international custom (as evidence of a general practice accepted as law), and the general principles of law recognised by civilised nations. In addition, judicial decisions and the teachings of the most highly qualified publicists of the various nations are applied as subsidiary means for the determination of the applicable law (Article 38 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice in Hague).
13. In the case at issue, there is no relevant treaty binding on the Republic of Slovenia. Furthermore, there is no general convention that regulates state immunity. States practice is omitting the rule of absolute immunity and moving towards accepting the principle of relative or limited immunity. In addition, the number of cases in which a state does not enjoy immunity is increasing. These developments reflect the changes in the function of the state: while its role was mostly that of a sovereign authority in the nineteenth century, it began to play an active role in the private sector, particularly after the Second World War. According to legal scholars, most states have already abandoned the rule of absolute immunity, but immunity still remains a general rule in the context of established state practice. As regards exceptions, there are (some) differences between states and different legal traditions. It is widely accepted that there is a distinction between the activities of a state as a sovereign authority (acta iure imperii), for which immunity is granted, and the activities of a state of a private-law or commercial character (acta iure gestionis), for which immunity is not granted. Some countries include further criteria in order to reduce exceptions.<sup>3</sup> Due to the difficulties in distinguishing between both types of activities, it is common for legal acts to determine a general rule and then separately list exceptions thereto. Examples of such include the ECSI, adopted within the Council of Europe, and the Draft Articles on Jurisdictional Immunities of States and Their Property, adopted by the United Nations International Law Commission at its forty-third session in 1991 (hereinafter referred to as the Draft Articles).<sup>4</sup> Legal scholars agree that the ECSI defines the existing practice adopted unanimously by European States.<sup>5</sup> Among the exceptions to immunity both, the ECSI and the Draft Articles, list claims for damages for an injury or the death of a person, or damage to tangible property caused in the territory of the state where the person claims damages, provided the author of the damage was present on the territory of that state at the time when the damage was caused (Article 11 of the

---

2 The new Civil Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 26/99) maintained the provision in practically the same wording (see Article 28).

3 Jennings, Watts, Oppenheim's International Law, Volume 1, Introduction and Part I, Longman, 1992, pp. 341–363; Verdross, Simma, Universelles Völkerrecht, Duncker & Humblot, Berlin, 1984, pp. 761–774; Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law, Clarendon Press, Oxford, 1990, pp. 322–345; Shaw, International Law, Cambridge University Press, 1997, pp. 491–521; Combacau, Sur, Droit International Public, Montchrestien, Paris, 1997, p. 241 et seq.

4 Draft Articles on Jurisdictional Immunities of States and Their Property, Yearbook of the International Law Commission, 1991, Volume II, Part 2, pp. 13–62.

5 See, for example, Jennings, Watts, op. cit., p. 343; Sucharitkul, Immunities of Foreign States before National Authorities, RdC 1976/1; Dinh, Daillier, Pellet, Droit International Public, L. G. D. J, Paris, 1992, pp. 429–433.

ECSI and Article 12 of the Draft Articles). The exception reflects a widely accepted rule of general tort law, according to which the injured party may sue for damages, not only before the court with jurisdiction on the basis of the defendant's place of residence, but also the place where the act giving rise to the damage occurred. This exception was determined in the interest of the injured party's protection. It is possible to conclude from the explanation of Article 11 of the ECSI and Article 12 of the Draft Articles that the provision was primarily intended to cover claims for damages from insured risks.

However, the wording of the provisions does not support such a narrow interpretation. It is even explicitly stated in the commentary to Article 12 of the Draft Articles that the provision does not differentiate between acta iure gestionis, on the one hand, and acta iure imperii on the other.<sup>6</sup> Nevertheless, these two documents do not support the conclusion that this rule, as a rule of international customary law, would be applicable in the complainant's case. The ECSI explicitly determines that the exceptions to immunity determined by the Convention do not apply to any activities of the armed forces of a specific state on the territory of another state (Article 31). The Draft Articles, which do not (yet) belong to the rules of international public law, are also not applicable to the proceedings that had commenced before they entered into force.

14. The presented theoretical positions from the field of international law, the efforts to codify such, and the adopted conventions substantiate the conclusion that the Supreme Court's position, in accordance with which states may claim immunity before the courts of another state for acta iure imperii, cannot be deemed arbitrary. The complainant's statements cannot rebut this conclusion. An answer to the question as to whether the ECSI, in particular Article 11 thereof, includes acta iure imperii is not relevant for the decision in the case at issue, as the Convention also includes a specific provision in accordance with which the Convention does not apply to the acts of the armed forces (Article 31). Furthermore, the allegation that the finding of the Supreme Court that the ECSI is not a record of the rules of international customary law is erroneous is not relevant. It is also not impossible to infer a different state of international customary law from the Greek court judgment, or from the article in which the author advocates the introduction of the rule that violations of the peremptory norms of international law (ius cogens) represent exceptions to immunity.<sup>7</sup> In the report from its fifty-first session, the UN International Law Commission, which has been revising the Draft Articles in order to update them,<sup>8</sup> notes the latest trend, which is the strengthening of the position that jurisdictional immunity should be denied to foreign states in the case of death or personal injury due to violations of the peremptory norms of international law on human rights, in particular the prohibition of torture. In this context, reference is made to civil disputes before domestic courts, in relation to which the report establishes that domestic courts have shown some sympathy to the above arguments in some cases; however, in most cases, the objection of states requesting jurisdictional immunity was upheld. The report makes reference to the US Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, amended in 1996, which included monetary damages for personal injury or death caused by an act of torture, extrajudicial killing, aircraft sabotage, or hostage-taking among the existing exceptions to immunity. Consequently, the Constitutional Court concludes that the aforementioned cases reveal a trend in the future development of international law towards limiting the jurisdictional immunity of a state before foreign courts. In any case, the aforementioned cases cannot serve as evidence of general state practice accepted as law and therefore of the establishment of a rule of international customary law, which would allow Slovene courts to try foreign states in the event of violations of the peremptory norms of international law in the area of human rights protection as a consequence of a state's acta iure imperii (which can also be deemed to include the forcible transfer of children of a specific ethnic group during the war).

<sup>6</sup> Draft Articles on Jurisdictional Immunities of States and Their Property, op. cit., p. 45.

<sup>7</sup> The Greek court judgment that the complainant enclosed with the constitutional complaint refers to the article of Richman, Siderman de Blake v. Republic of Argentina: Can the FSIA grant immunity for violations of ius cogens norms? Brook Journal of International Law, Vol. XIX, 1993, pp. 967–1008.

<sup>8</sup> The International Law Commission, Report of the work of its fifty-first session (3 May–23 July 1999), General Assembly, Official Records, Fifty-fourth session, Supplement No. 10 (A/54/10), UN, New York 1999, pp. 414–415.

15. Furthermore, the assertion that, when granting immunity, there is no difference between international and national courts, is not substantiated. Jurisdictional immunity is namely granted in order for a state not to be sued before another subject of international law that is its equal. The Nuremberg International Military Tribunal did not decide on a lawsuit against a state for compensation for war damages; that court decided on the criminal responsibility of the representatives of the state. The correctness of the position of the Supreme Court that international law principles have precedence over statutes is not relevant for deciding the case at issue. The courts applied a statutory provision that refers to international law rules, but it still remains a statutory norm. Furthermore, the correctness of the position of the Supreme Court that the acts defined by the Convention on International Liability for Damage Caused by Space Objects are acts performed iure gestionis, is also not relevant for deciding the case at issue. The treaty namely contains the explicit provision that a lawsuit may be filed before a court of the liable state either by the injured state or by the injured natural person (Articles X and XI).
16. Having established that the decision of the courts on the rule of international law regarding jurisdictional immunity in cases in which a foreign state is sued before a Slovene court is arbitrary, and therefore not inconsistent with the guarantee of the equal protection of rights (Article 22 of the Constitution), it is necessary to review the complainant's first allegation summarised in Paragraph 9 of the reasoning of this Decision. The complainant asserted that the position of the courts, according to which a foreign state, when sued before a court of another state, may claim jurisdictional immunity due to acta iure imperii, was contrary to the right to judicial protection guaranteed by Article 23 of the Constitution and the first paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR.
17. In accordance with Article 23 of the Constitution, everyone has the right to have any decision regarding his or her rights, duties, and any charges brought against him or her made without undue delay by an independent, impartial court constituted by law. From the perspective that is relevant for the present case, this constitutional provision guarantees the right to a decision on the merits regarding an individual's right.

18. The right to judicial protection guaranteed by the first paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR is similar in terms of scope. The European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR) considers the right of access to the courts to be an integral part of the right to judicial protection. This right is not absolute and, when regulating this right, the state may determine limitations according to the needs and resources of the community and individuals. Limitations are admissible if they do not interfere with the essence of the right, if they pursue a legitimate aim, and if there is a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be achieved.<sup>9</sup> In this manner, in the case of Waite and Kennedy v. Germany, the ECtHR decided<sup>10</sup> that the decisions of German courts, by which actions against the European Space Agency (hereinafter referred to as the ESA) were dismissed on the grounds of jurisdictional immunity, interfered with the right of access to the courts (first paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR), but that the interference was admissible. The courts based the challenged decisions on a statutory provision that was similar to Article 26 of the CPA77 and a provision of the Agreement on the Establishment of the ESA that provides for the jurisdictional immunity of this international organisation before a court of the state on the territory of which it operates. The ECtHR held that (1) the challenged judgments were not arbitrary; (2) they pursued a legitimate aim (according to the position of the ECtHR jurisdictional immunity of international organisations is an essential means of ensuring the proper functioning of such organisations free from unilateral interference by individual governments); and (3) the applicants had reasonable alternative means at their disposal to protect effectively their rights under the Convention (the applicants could have appealed to the ESA Appeals Board, which is independent from the Agency and competent to decide on disputes that relate to Agency decisions and originate from the relationship between the Agency and its employees. They also allegedly had the opportunity to request reimbursement from the companies that had dismissed them.)
19. As a general rule, in the event of claims for damages, a court of the Republic of Slovenia has jurisdiction not only in cases in which the defendant permanently resides in the territory of the Republic of Slovenia, but also when the tort is committed in the territory of the Republic of Slovenia or a harmful consequence occurs in the territory of the Republic of Slovenia (see Article 55 of the Private International Law and Procedure Act, Official Gazette RS, No. 56/99). Such connection with the Republic of Slovenia has also been demonstrated in the complainant's case. As a reasonable connection between the complainant's case and the Republic of Slovenia has been demonstrated, the exclusion of judicial protection before Slovene courts entails an interference with the right to judicial protection.

9 See Fayed v. the United Kingdom, Judgment dated 21 September 1994, Publ. ECHR, Ser. A, Vol. 294-B, pp. 49–50, 65, and Waite and Kennedy v. Germany, Judgment dated 18 February 1999, 59, available at the web site www.dhcour.coe.fr.

10 The decision is cited in the previous note.

20. An interference with the right to judicial protection is admissible only if it is consistent with the principle of proportionality. Such entails that the limitation at issue must be required and necessary to reach the pursued constitutionally legitimate aim and must be proportionate to the importance of such aim (the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution). The interference under review is not inadmissible for the reasons stated hereinafter.
21. Jurisdictional immunity is an expression of the principle of the equality of states and, thereby, the respect for the independence and integrity of another state. The rule par in parem non habet iurisdictionem, according to which legal entities with an equal position cannot leave the resolution of a dispute to the court of either of them, originates from this principle.<sup>11</sup> This aim is constitutionally legitimate and the exclusion of judicial protection is required and necessary in order to achieve it. More specifically, the aim can only be achieved by the exclusion of the jurisdiction of a court in another state. The exclusion of judicial protection in the Republic of Slovenia is also proportionate to the importance of the aim pursued. Respect for the principle of the sovereign equality of states is necessary in order to preserve international cooperation and cohesion between the states. On the other hand, by the challenged orders the complainant is not deprived of all judicial protection, but only of judicial protection before domestic courts. According to general rules on jurisdiction (actor sequitur forum rei), the complainant may sue the Federal Republic of Germany before its courts, where the plea of its jurisdictional immunity cannot be used. In its review of the proportionality in the narrower sense, the Constitutional Court also took into account that the case at issue concerns a state that applies the general standards on human rights protection and the principles of a state governed by the rule of law adopted within the Council of Europe, and that the decisions of its courts are subject to review by the institutions that operate at the level of the mentioned international organisation.
22. According to the aforementioned, the allegation of a violation of the right to judicial protection (Article 23 of the Constitution and the first paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR) is not substantiated. Therefore, the Constitutional Court dismissed the constitutional complaint.

C

23. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 59 of the CCA, composed of: Franc Testen, President, and Judges Dr Janez Čebulj, Dr Zvonko Fišer, Lojze Janko, Milojka Modrijan, Dr Ciril Ribičič, Dr Lojze Ude, and Dr Dragica Wedam-Lukić. The decision was adopted unanimously.

Dr Lojze Ude
Vice President

---

11 Jennings, Watts, op. cit., pp. 341–342; Shaw, op. cit., pp. 491–492, Verdross, Simma, op. cit., p. 763.

Decision No. U-I-65/05, dated 22 September 2005

DECISION

At a session held on 22 September 2005 in proceedings to review constitutionality initiated upon the petition of Marta Dominika Jelačin, Ljubljana, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. The Act on the Judicial Review of Administrative Acts (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 50/97, 65/97 – corr., and 70/2000) is inconsistent with the Constitution.
2. The National Assembly must remedy the established inconsistency within a time limit of one year from the publication of this Decision in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia.

Reasoning

A

1. The petitioner challenges the first and second paragraphs of Article 62 and Article 34 of the Act on the Judicial Review of Administrative Acts (hereinafter referred to as the AJRAA). She alleges that the Administrative Court refused to provide her legal protection of her constitutional right to a trial within a reasonable time, as the proceedings in which this right was violated had already been concluded. She states that in the order rejecting the action the Administrative Court adopted the position, in conformity with the established administrative case law with reference to the position of the Constitutional Court, that in proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts a party can only seek to establish, by an action, the existence of a violation of the right to a trial within a reasonable time as determined by Article 23 of the Constitution if the proceedings are still pending; if the proceedings before the court have already been concluded this right can no longer be violated, and thus such violation can no longer be prevented. In accordance with the mentioned position, if the proceedings are no longer pending, a party only has the possibility to claim compensation before the competent court in conformity with Article 26 of the Constitution. The Administrative Court allegedly adopted such a decision exclusively due to the inconsistency of the first and second paragraphs of Article 62 of the AJRAA with Articles 23 and 157 of the Constitution. The petitioner emphasises that Article 23 of the Constitution ensures the right to a trial without undue delay as a comprehensive right, and not only as a “curtailed” right, as is regulated by the challenged Article 62 of the AJRAA – i.e. [it is applicable] only for instances where the proceedings in which a violation allegedly occurred are still pending. The petitioner agrees that after the proceedings have been concluded this right can no longer be violated; however, she stresses that the violation that has already occurred and its consequences have [also] not yet been remedied. Therefore, she is of the opinion that the challenged provision of the AJRAA should enable the affected party, even if judicial proceedings have already concluded, to request that the court establish that a violation occurred. In her opinion, the establishment of a violation is also a logical condition for the compensation determined by Article 26 of the Constitution to even be awarded. In order to determine the compensation in accordance with Article 26 of the Constitution, it is namely also necessary to prove the unlawfulness of [the conduct of] a state authority, which is something that cannot be proven by a civil court. The petitioner is convinced that the state can avoid its obligation to pay compensation pursuant to Article 26 of the Constitution on the basis of the fact that it has de facto a stronger position [than an individual]. The legal protection of the right determined by Article 23 of the Constitution is thus allegedly completely ineffective. According to the petitioner, only if statutory provisions determine the due conduct of the state clearly enough when the right of an individual to a trial without undue delay is violated can one speak of true legal protection of the mentioned right and of the public right to such protection in the correct meaning of the word. Finally, the petitioner emphasises that due to the fact that the challenged provision of the AJRAA is inappropriate and unlawful, the legislation in force does not fulfil the obligations that the state assumed by signing the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR).

2. In its reply the National Assembly stated that the petition is not substantiated. Referring to hitherto positions of the Constitutional Court, it is of the opinion that in proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts it is possible, on the basis of the provisions of the AJRAA, to achieve effective judicial protection of the rights guaranteed by Articles 23 and 157 of the Constitution, and that therefore the challenged provisions are not inconsistent therewith. The Government and the Ministry of Justice are [also] of the opinion that the challenged provisions are not inconsistent with the Constitution and they suggest that the Constitutional Court dismiss the petition.

B – I

3. In conformity with Article 24 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), anyone filing a petition to initiate proceedings must demonstrate his or her legal interest. A legal interest is demonstrated if the regulation whose review has been requested directly interferes with his or her rights, legal interests, or legal position. In accordance with the established case law, a legal interest must be direct and concrete, and the possible granting of the petitioner's proposal must lead to an improvement in his or her legal position (see, e.g., Decision No. U-I-18/98, dated 19 April 2001, Official Gazette RS, No. 37/01, and OdlUS X, 76).

4. The petitioner substantiates her legal interest with the interpretation of the challenged provision of the AJRAA provided by the Administrative Court in Order No. U 2259/2004, dated 26 January 2005, by which it rejected her action filed due to a violation of the right to a trial within a reasonable time in an already concluded civil case. She alleges that she appealed against the Administrative Court Decision to the Supreme Court; however, she emphasises that in proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts she cannot succeed, as the interpretation of the challenged provision of the AJRAA adopted by the Administrative Court is based on the established administrative case law and the equivalent position of the Constitutional Court. During the proceedings for the examination of the petition at issue, the Supreme Court decided on the appeal. The petitioner filed in due time a constitutional complaint (No. Up-526/05) against Supreme Court Order No. I Up 432/2005, dated 14 April 2005, by which her appeal was dismissed. With regard to the above, the petitioner demonstrates legal interest for the [initiation of the proceedings for the] review of the constitutionality of the challenged provisions of the AJRAA.
5. The Constitutional Court accepted the petition for consideration. Since the conditions determined by the fourth paragraph of Article 26 of the CCA were fulfilled, it proceeded to decide on the merits of the case.

B – II

6. The right to judicial protection determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution entails the right of everyone to have any decision regarding his or her rights, duties, and any charges brought against him or her made without undue delay by an independent, impartial court constituted by law. A similar right is also guaranteed by the first paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR. In its hitherto determination of the content of the right to judicial protection under Article 23 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has always proceeded from the general premise that the purpose of the Constitution is not to recognise human rights merely formally and theoretically, but that it is a constitutional requirement to ensure the possibility of effective and actual exercise of human rights (Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-275/97, dated 16 July 1998, OdlUS VII, 231). Concerning such, also the provisions of Article 5 of the Constitution need to be considered. This article is important as it contains the so-called positive obligations of the state or the individual branches of power. One of these is also the obligation of the state "to protect human rights and fundamental freedoms in its own territory." However, the protection of human rights should not only be taken as the obligation of the state to refrain from actions that would interfere with human rights or limit such; the protection of human rights also obliges it to take positive action by which it creates opportunities for the effective exercise of human rights to the greatest extent possible. Already in 1994, the Constitutional Court stated the following in one of its decisions: “In a state governed by the rule of law, there must exist such a system of organisation that enables the implementation of the Constitution and laws and such a system of procedures that enables the exercise of rights and freedoms (Decision No. U-I-13/94, dated 21 January 1994, Official Gazette RS, No. 6/94, and OdlUS III, 8). The Constitutional Court thereby approximated [its position] with the requirement [to take positive action] arising from the case law of the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR), in accordance with which the positive obligation of the state is a new, procedural aspect of the third generation human rights.<sup>1</sup> The obligation of the state to ensure the right to effective judicial protection also already arises from the requirements (principles) of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution). One of which is to achieve the exercise of rights in a peaceful manner and to thereby prevent the arbitrary and forcible resolution of disputes. By eliminating the right of persons to resolve disputes by themselves, the state assumed the obligation to ensure judicial protection as a manner of resolving disputes regarding rights and obligations; this obligation is met by the right of every legal entity to request such from the state.<sup>2</sup>

7. In conformity with these starting points, the Constitutional Court has already adopted a position in accordance with which the right to judicial protection determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution is not exhausted already by the fact that the possibility to submit a case to a court is ensured. Conversely, the meaning of the right to judicial protection lies in the guarantee that within a reasonable time the court will decide substantively and on the merits of the case submitted to its decision-making. Furthermore, from the requirement that human rights must be exercised in a manner such that their full effect is ensured, it follows that the right to judicial protection is also not exhausted when in an individual case the court issues a substantive decision on the merits. An integral part of the right to judicial protection is namely also the right to request that the judicial decision by which the court decided on a certain right or obligation be enforced. As a general rule, the purpose and aim of judicial protection are namely fully achieved only when a certain right or legal relation is realised, and not merely when a decision on the existence of such is adopted. Therefore, everyone who has been recognised a right with finality must be given the possibility and means to actually exercise such right (Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-181/99, dated 18 December 2002, Official Gazette RS, No. 7/03, and OdlUS XI, 292; Decision No. U-I-339/98, dated 21 January 1999, Official Gazette RS, No. 11/99, and OdlUS VIII, 13). The right to obtain a “determination” of a dispute and the right to achieve the enforcement of a final judgment form, also according to the established case law of the ECtHR, an integral part of the right of access to a court as ensured by the first paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR.<sup>3</sup>

---

1 B. M. Zupančič in L. Šturm (Ed.), Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije [Commentary on the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia], Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Ljubljana 2002, Ljubljana, 2002, p. 112.

2 See also A. Galič, Pravica do poštenega sojenja v pravnem postopku [The Right to a Fair Trial in Civil Proceedings], doctoral dissertation, Ljubljana, 1998, p. 90.

3 See, e.g., the judgments in Hornsby v. Greece, No. 18357/91, dated 19 March 1997; Gefima Immobiliare s.r.l. v.

8. An essential integral part of the right to judicial protection is also the right to a trial without undue delay, which ensures everyone who participates in judicial proceedings as a party the possibility to assert his or her rights through the judicial protection thereof within a reasonable time.<sup>4</sup> What in such sense is at issue is a right that entails one of the essential conditions for the effective exercise of all other human rights. Its purpose is to ensure the effectiveness of judicial protection; judicial protection that is too late can nullify its effects. Namely, if judicial protection is too late, the affected person is in the same position as if he or she had no judicial protection at all (justice delayed is justice denied). The right to a trial within a reasonable time is also ensured by the first paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR, which provides that “in the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing ‘within a reasonable time’ by an independent and impartial tribunal.” It follows from the case law of the ECtHR that the right to a trial within a reasonable time is of exceptional importance for the quality of the trial<sup>5</sup> and that the ECHR obliges contracting states to organise their legal systems in a manner such that courts can fulfil the requirements determined by the first paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR, including the reasonable length of proceedings. The state must, therefore, organise its judiciary in such a manner that the actual exercise of this right is ensured.<sup>6</sup> This requirement follows from the positive obligation of the state in the protection of human rights. It is necessary to emphasise that in Kudla v. Poland<sup>7</sup> the ECtHR adopted a new position, namely that the question of whether in a concrete case concerning a decision on an applicant’s civil rights and obligations or a criminal charge against him, the applicant was accorded a trial within a reasonable time must be assessed separately from the question of whether an effective legal remedy to assert such right was available to him under the national law.<sup>8</sup> It emphasised that the ever increasing number of violations of the right to a trial within a reasonable time requires a cautious consideration of the threat to the rule of law posed by the fact that in the national legal systems of Member States effective legal remedies for the protection of the right to a trial within a reasonable time are not ensured. It drew attention to the fact that, on the basis of Article 1 of the ECHR,<sup>9</sup>

---

Italy, No. 2274/93, dated 28 July 1999; Jasiuniene v. Lithuania, No. 41510/98, dated 6 March 2003; Karahalios v. Greece, No. 62503/00, dated 11 December 2003; and Kutić v. Croatia, No. 48778/99, dated 21 February 2002.

- 4 J. Čebulj in L. Šturm (Ed.), Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije [Commentary on the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia], p. 253.
- 5 Guincho v. Portugal, case No. 8990/80, Judgment dated 10 July 1984.
- 6 Buchholz v. Germany, case No. 7759/77, Judgment dated 6 May 1981.
- 7 Case No. 30210/96, Judgment dated 26 October 2000.
- 8 It thereby departed from the position that the first paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR is a lex specialis in relation to Article 13 of the ECHR. Until this case, the ECtHR advocated the position that when a violation of the first paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR is established, it is not necessary to separately assess allegations regarding the lack of appropriate legal remedies for the protection of the right to a trial within a reasonable time in the national law of a Member State, i.e. allegations regarding the violation of Article 13 of the ECHR.
- 9 Article 1 of the ECHR reads as follows: “High Contracting Parties shall secure to everyone within their jurisstate authorities bear the main responsibility for the exercise of the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the ECHR and that, therefore, the mechanism of [filing] an application before the ECtHR is only subsidiary to the human rights protection systems of the state. According to the ECtHR, this subsidiary character is expressed in Article 13 of the ECHR (the right to an effective legal remedy)<sup>10</sup> and in the first paragraph of Article 35 of the ECHR (admissibility criteria)<sup>11</sup>. The ECtHR emphasised that the purpose of the first paragraph of Article 35, which determines the rule that national legal remedies must first be exhausted, is to ensure contracting states the possibility to prevent or remedy the alleged violations even before they reach the ECtHR. Concerning such, it stated that the rule determined by the first paragraph of Article 35 is based on the presumption determined by Article 13 (to which it is tightly connected) that there exists an effective national legal remedy enabling the assertion of the alleged violations of the rights of individuals enshrined in the ECHR. According to the ECtHR, Article 13 of the ECHR, which is a direct expression of the obligation of contracting states to first and foremost protect human rights in the framework of their own legal systems, in such manner ensures individuals an additional safeguard so that they can effectively exercise these rights. From the viewpoint of the ECtHR, Article 13 of ECHR thus functions as a requirement that a national legal remedy is applied in order for the “probability of an accusation” under the ECHR to be substantively assessed and for just satisfaction to be awarded. In the reasoning of the mentioned Judgment, the ECtHR reiterated its position that the extent of the obligations of contracting states under Article 13 of the ECHR changes, namely depending on the nature of the applications of individual applicants; however, the legal remedy required thereby must be “effective” not only in theory but also in practice.<sup>12</sup> With regard to the right to a trial within a reasonable time, the ECtHR held that a legal remedy is effective if it either prevents an alleged violation or its continuation, or ensures just satisfaction. It should be emphasised that it follows from the case law of the ECHR that contracting states must ensure an effective legal remedy against violations of the right to a trial within a reasonable time also in cases where the violation has already ceased. In Šoć v. Croatia<sup>13</sup> the ECtHR established a violation of Article 13 of the ECHR, as the appellant had not had access to national legal remedies that would offer him appropriate satisfaction with regard to the alleged violations of the right to a trial within a reasonable time in proceedings that had already been concluded<sup>14</sup>.

---

diction the rights and freedoms defined in Section I of this Convention.”

10 Article 13 of the ECHR reads as follows: “Everyone whose rights and freedoms as set forth in this Convention are violated shall have an effective remedy before a national authority notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity.”

11 The first paragraph of Article 35 of the ECHR reads as follows: “The Court may only deal with the matter after all national remedies have been exhausted, according to the generally recognised rules of international law, and within a period of six months from the date on which the final decision was taken.”

12 Such position was also expressed in Ilhan v. Turkey, case No. 22277/93, dated 27 June 2000.

13 Case No. 47863/99, Judgment dated 9 March 2003.

14 In the mentioned case, the applicant alleged, inter alia, a violation of Article 13 of the ECHR, as allegedly

9. It is necessary to draw attention to the case of Belinger v. Slovenia<sup>15</sup> (the applicants alleged a violation of the right to a trial within a reasonable time in civil proceedings, which at the time of the filing of the application before the ECtHR had not yet been concluded), in which the ECtHR dismissed the preliminary objection of the Government regarding the inadmissibility of the application due to the non-exhaustion of national legal remedies (the first paragraph of Article 35 of the ECHR). In its consideration of the objection of the Government, the ECtHR reiterated the reasons adopted in the above-mentioned case of Kudla v. Poland, and established that the supervisory complaint (as provided for prior to the amendments to the Courts Act in 2000 and 2004)<sup>16</sup>, the judicial review of administrative acts, and the constitutional complaint could not be deemed effective legal remedies, i.e. legal remedies that are accessible to the complainant within an appropriate period of time both in theory and practice, and that could provide him or her just satisfaction and a reasonable possibility of success.
10. The right to a trial without undue delay determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution is among the rights whose judicial protection is not determined by a special law. However, since it entails a part of Article 23 of the Constitution, in conjunction therewith, with respect to the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, and as is the case with all other human rights and fundamental freedoms,<sup>17</sup> no effective legal remedy was available that he could file with regard to the question of the excessive length of already concluded civil proceedings. The Government objected that the applicant had the possibility to file a constitutional complaint on the basis of Article 63 of the [Constitutional] Act on the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Croatia of 2002, which enables a party to file a constitutional complaint with regard to the length of proceedings even prior to the exhaustion of other legal remedies, while it also enables the Constitutional Court to impose a time limit on a court by which it must carry out a procedural action and, in the event a violation is established, award just satisfaction. According to the Government, in the applicant's case this possibility entailed an effective legal remedy with regard to the length of proceedings. The ECtHR did not accept the Government's objection, but established a violation of Article 13 of the ECHR. In the reasoning it stated that the Government did not cite any decision that would indicate that the Constitutional Court accepts for consideration cases related to the excessive length of already concluded proceedings. On the contrary, the decisions of the Constitutional Court concerning the application of Article 63 of the Act on the Constitutional Court of 2002 clearly demonstrated that the Constitutional Court adopted the position that Article 63 does not refer to cases concerning already concluded proceedings. According to the ECtHR, the case law of the Constitutional Court, the lack of case law supporting the Government's objection, as well as the unclear wording of Article 63 as regards its applicability in cases concerning already concluded proceedings, demonstrate that it is not possible to establish that Article 63 represents an effective legal remedy [in cases concerning the excessive] length of already concluded civil proceedings. Moreover, the ECtHR also did not establish that the applicant had at his disposal any other effective legal remedy.

- 15 Case No. 42320/98, the decision on the admissibility of the application dated 2 October 2001 and the Judgment (friendly settlement), dated 13 June 2002.
- 16 The Act Amending the Courts Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 28/30 – CtsA-C and Official Gazette RS, No. 73/04 – CtsA-D).
- 17 The fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution reads as follows: "Judicial protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms, and the right to obtain redress for the violation of such rights and freedoms, shall be guaranteed."

judicial protection and the right to have all consequences of its violation remedied must also be ensured. The exercise of the right to judicial protection in instances where no other judicial protection is envisaged by law is ensured within the framework of the judicial review of administrative acts on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 157 of the Constitution and on the basis of the third paragraph of Article 1 of the AJRAA. In conformity with the provision of the second paragraph of Article 157 of the Constitution (which is encompassed by the third paragraph of Article 1 of the AJRAA), in proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts, the competent court also decides on the legality of individual actions and acts by which the constitutional rights of an individual are interfered with, if no other judicial protection is ensured. As the conduct of a court that does not issue a judgment without undue delay (within a reasonable time) entails an action by which the mentioned human right is interfered with, protection is ensured in proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts against such conduct. Article 62 of the AJRAA determines that, in proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts referred to in the third paragraph of Article 1 of that Act, the court may establish the illegality of an act or an action, prohibit the continuation of a concrete action, decide on the plaintiff's claim for the compensation for damage, and determine whatever is necessary in order for the interference with constitutional rights to be remedied and for legality to be re-established. The court decides without delay on the prohibition of the continuation of the activity and, if the illegal activity continues, on the measures intended to re-establish legality. If in the case at issue the court cannot decide without delay, it may, in conformity with Article 69 of the AJRAA, ex officio issue an interim injunction.

11. The Constitutional Court has already held that in cases in which proceedings are still pending it falls within the jurisdiction of the Administrative Court to decide on the existence of a violation of the right to a trial without undue delay (e.g. in Order No. Up-369/97, dated 21 January 1998, OdlUS VII, 116). Such a position was also based on the regulation in the AJRAA, which among the provisions on jurisdiction encapsulates the provision of the second paragraph of Article 157 of the Constitution (the third paragraph of Article 1 of the AJRAA). In addition, also other provisions of the AJRAA are adapted to the needs of the effective protection of human rights. For example, courts have multiple possibilities to adopt a decision on the merits of a claim (the first paragraph of Article 62); they are given broad authorisation to adjust the content of a decision to the nature of the violated constitutional right and to actually achieve what is necessary in order for the violation to cease, and may, for this purpose, issue a (regulatory) interim injunction (the second and third paragraphs of Article 62). The Constitutional Court adopted the position that such a regulation offers a sufficiently reliable basis to conclude that an action [initiating the procedure for] a judicial review of an administrative act can entail an effective legal remedy for the protection of the constitutional right to a trial without undue delay.<sup>18</sup> By Decision No. Up-277/96, dated 7 November 1996 (OdlUS V, 189), the Constitutional Court adopted the position that judicial protection [in proceedings for] the judicial review of administrative acts would not be effective in instances where the right to a trial without undue delay is violated in proceedings before the Supreme Court. Therefore, in such cases it is admissible to directly file a constitutional complaint. By Decision No. Up-73/97, dated 7 December 2000 (Official Gazette RS, No. 1/01, and OdIUS IX, 309), the Constitutional Court emphasised that the mentioned adopted positions applied to instances where the violation still existed. In the case at issue, however, it adopted the position that applies to instances where the proceedings in which the right to a trial without undue delay was allegedly violated were already concluded. According to the position of the Constitutional Court, in such cases the protection of this right cannot be requested either within proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts (as subsidiary judicial protection on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 157 of the Constitution) or (if the matter concerns a violation before the Supreme Court) directly by a constitutional complaint. The Constitutional Court based such position on the finding that the meaning of judicial protection against a still-existing violation of this right in the framework of proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts and of a constitutional complaint is in that the continuation of the unnecessary delay of a court's decision-making is prevented. However, once the proceedings before the court are concluded, this right can no longer be violated, therefore the violation can no longer be prevented. The action by which the mentioned right was allegedly violated has namely already ceased. The affected person can request compensation for possible damage caused by such violation by an action for damages against the state on the basis of Article 26 of the Constitution; when in such proceedings [all] legal remedies have been exhausted, such a person can also file, under the conditions determined by the CCA, a constitutional complaint.

---

18 Such reasoning was adopted even prior to the cases of Belinger v. Slovenia, Kudla v. Poland, and Šoć v. Croatia.

12. When assessing the challenged provisions of the AJRAA, the Constitutional Court must observe, irrespective of its positions mentioned in the preceding paragraph of the reasoning, the case law of the ECtHR, in accordance with which effective judicial protection of the right to a trial within a reasonable time is ensured only if it also encompasses protection that offers appropriate satisfaction. Such should be awarded to persons whose rights were violated in proceedings that have already been concluded.<sup>19</sup> The Constitutional Court must observe this case law irrespective of the fact that it was adopted in a case in which Slovenia itself did not participate in proceedings before the ECtHR. What is at issue is namely the clear and established practice of the ECtHR, in accordance with which the conditions that must be fulfilled in order for it to possibly be deemed, with regard to the ECHR, that the legal order of (any) contracting state contains an effective legal remedy against violations of the right to a trial within a reasonable time also in cases where the violation has already ceased are determined in abstracto. Furthermore, the Constitutional Court must observe the fifth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, which determines that no human right or fundamental freedom regulated by legal acts in force in Slovenia (also the ECHR is such an act) may be restricted on the grounds that the Constitution does not recognise that right or freedom or recognises it to a lesser extent. With regard to the mentioned case law of the ECtHR, the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, in accordance with which the judicial protection of human rights and the right to obtain redress for the violation of such rights are guaranteed, must be interpreted in the spirit of the ECHR such that there follows therefrom the requirement that within the framework of the judicial protection of the right to a trial without undue delay also the possibility to claim just satisfaction in cases where the violation has already ceased must be ensured. In such respect, the criteria of the ECtHR for assessing whether a reasonable time for a trial has been exceeded must be taken into consideration. The ECtHR decides on the violation of the right to a trial within a reasonable time on the basis of the circumstances of each concrete case by taking into consideration in particular the following criteria: the complexity of the case, the conduct of state authorities, the conduct of the applicant, and the significance of the case for the applicant.

<sup>19</sup> As the ECtHR stated in Šoć v. Croatia.

13. In accordance with the hitherto position of the Constitutional Court, if proceedings in which the right to a trial without undue delay was allegedly violated have already been concluded (with finality), the affected person can only file, under the legislation in force, an action for damages on the basis of Article 26 of the Constitution.<sup>20</sup> Such an action is decided on by a court in civil proceedings<sup>21</sup> in conformity with the general rules of the law of damages, which are regulated by the Code of Obligations (Official Gazette RS, No. 83/01 etc. – hereinafter referred to as the CO). On such basis, a court can award the affected person compensation for pecuniary and non-pecuniary damage if the prerequisites for liability for damages are fulfilled. There are, however, no special statutory provisions that would enable the affected person to assert the right to just satisfaction in the sense of the ECHR.<sup>22</sup> This also applies in the event compensation is claimed by an action within proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts (the first paragraph of Article 62 of the AJRAA). Just satisfaction due to a violation of the right to a trial within a reasonable time in the sense of the ECHR namely does not entail compensation in the classic sense in accordance with the criteria of civil liability for pecuniary or non-pecuniary damage, which also applies with regard to compensation determined by Article 26 of the Constitution. What is at issue is satisfaction whose primary purpose is compensation due to the

---

20 The first paragraph of Article 26 of the Constitution reads as follows: “Everyone has the right to compensation for damage caused through unlawful actions in connection with the performance of any function or other activity by a person or authority performing such function or activity within a state or local community authority or as a bearer of public authority.”

21 Article 1 of the Civil Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 26/99, 96/02, 12/03 – official consolidated text, 2/04, and 36/04 – official consolidated text).

22 The assumption that proceedings for awarding compensation based on Article 26 of the Constitution ensure the affected person just satisfaction due to a violation of the right to a trial without undue delay after such has already ceased is also not confirmed by case law, as in the digital database of decisions of the Supreme Court and the Higher Court (IUS-INFO) there is no case in which just satisfaction was awarded due to a violation of the right to a trial without undue delay.

failure of the state to fulfil its positive obligation to ensure a system or organisation of proceedings that will enable individuals to obtain a decision of a court within a reasonable time.<sup>23</sup> Since the AJRAA, which in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 157 of the Constitution does indeed regulate the judicial protection of the right to a trial without undue delay, does not contain special provisions adjusted to the nature of the right at issue that would enable the claiming of just satisfaction in the event a violation of the right to a trial within a reasonable time has already ceased, it is inconsistent with the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution in relation to the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution (point 1 of the operative provisions).

14. As what is at issue is a case in which the legislature did not regulate a certain issue that it should have regulated, abrogation is not possible. Therefore, the Constitutional Court adopted, on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 48 of the CCA, a declaratory decision. On the basis of the second paragraph of Article 48 of the CCA, it imposed on the legislature the obligation to remedy the established inconsistency within a time limit of one year from the publication of the Decision in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia (point 2 of the operative provisions). In order to fulfil the guarantees determined by Article 5 and the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, and the requirements determined by the ECHR, the legislature will have to comprehensively regulate the protection of the right to a trial without undue delay in the AJRAA or in some other act. In establishing the system of the protection of the right to a trial without undue delay, the legislature will have to devote special attention to ensure that it does not additionally (over)burden the courts or, in other words, to ensure that the new legal remedy for the protection of the right to a trial within a reasonable time does not cause additional prolongation of court proceedings.<sup>24</sup> From the reasoning of the Judgment in Kudla v. Poland, relating to the obligation of the state to ensure effective legal remedies for the protection of the right to a trial within a reasonable time, it follows that it is not necessary that [the authority which] must decide on such a legal remedy is exactly a court; however, if it is not a court then it is the competences of such authority and the guarantees it provides that are decisive for assessing whether the [available] legal remedy is effective. Furthermore, it is not necessary that what is at issue is a single legal remedy; what is important is the entirety of the legal remedies that are provided by national law.<sup>25</sup> In such respect, the Constitutional Court in particular draws attention to the inappropriateness – from the viewpoint of an effective system of the protection of human rights and the constitutionally determined competences of the Constitutional Court – of the possible regulation in accordance with which it is the Constitutional Court that would have competence as the first instance authority to assess the alleged violations of the right to a trial without undue delay in already concluded proceedings and (provided that a violation of this right is established) to decide on [awarding] just satisfaction.<sup>26</sup> Despite the fact that, in the case at issue, the Constitutional Court only assessed whether the legislation in force ensures effective judicial protection of the right to a trial without undue delay when a violation has already ceased, it points to the fact that, in view of the case law of the ECtHR, also a question of the effectiveness of the judicial protection of the right to a trial without undue delay in cases in which proceedings are still pending is justifiably raised. Therefore, in formulating statutory solutions for remedying the unconstitutionality established in the case at issue it would be necessary to also consider whether the legal remedies for ensuring the protection of the right to a trial without undue delay in cases where proceedings are still pending are appropriate, and whether they should be harmonised with the requirements of the ECtHR. Namely, one of the fundamental concerns of the state,

23 In this respect, it should be mentioned that the ECtHR reserves for itself wide discretion with regard to deciding whether in a concrete case it will award monetary compensation as just satisfaction (and in what amount) due to a violation of a right determined by the ECHR, or whether in the concrete case at issue the mere establishment of the violation of a right itself already entails just satisfaction.

24 It is also worth mentioning the experience of Italy, which in order to ensure an effective legal remedy adopted a special act called Legge Pinto, in conformity with which anyone who has sustained pecuniary or non-pecuniary damage due to a violation of the right to a trial within a reasonable time determined by the first paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR is entitled to just satisfaction. In criminal proceedings, the Higher Criminal Court has the jurisdiction to decide on alleged violations [of such right]. Concerning alleged violations before courts of general jurisdiction, the complaint must be filed with the Ministry of Justice; as regards proceedings before military courts, with the Ministry of Defence; concerning tax procedures, with the Ministry of Finance; and regarding all other procedures, directly with the Government. Appeals are decided on by the Court of Cassation. In practice, it has transpired that due to the significant number of cases also these courts face delays.

---

25 In the mentioned case, the ECtHR also stated that the regulations in certain contracting states (Spain, Portugal) have proved that such legal remedies can be introduced and effectively applied. In such respect, the ECtHR referred to its decisions in Gonzales Marin v. Spain, case No. 29521/98, Order dated 5 October 1999; and in Tome Mota v. Spain, case No. 32082, Order dated 2 December 1999.

26 In such context, the experience of the Republic of Croatia can be instructive. In a series of cases, the Republic of Croatia was found liable for a violation of the first paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR, as the ECtHR established that in its regulation and practice Croatia does not provide an appropriate and effective legal remedy against violations of the right to a trial within a reasonable time. Consequently, in 2002 Croatia adopted an amendment to the Constitutional Act on the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Croatia, on the basis of which the Constitutional Court became the first and last judicial instance for assessing violations of the right to a trial within a reasonable time (complainants did not have to exhaust other legal remedies beforehand). Following the amendment, the ECtHR refused to consider those applications that were filed after the constitutional act was amended and also those applications that the ECtHR received prior to the adoption of the constitutional act; these had to be decided on by the Constitutional Court in Zagreb. In 2001, the Constitutional Court only received 42 constitutional complaints related to a trial within a reasonable time, then as many as 450 in 2002, and 923 already in 2004. In February 2005, in a special report presented to the Sabor [i.e. the Croatian parliament] the Constitutional Court presented its position that due to the overburdening of the Constitutional Court and because the resolution of other constitutional complaints and the review of the constitutionality of regulations were being compromised, it was necessary to delegate the assessment of violations of the right to a trial within a reasonable time to ordinary courts. The Constitutional Court was to have jurisdiction regarding this matter only subsidiarily, upon a constitutional complaint against the decision of an ordinary court (for more detail, see C. Ribičič, Hrvaška v objemu ESČP [Croatia in the Embrace of the ECtHR], Pravna praksa, Vol. 24, Nos. 17–18, appendix, 28 April 2005).

and thus of all the three branches of power, is to ensure conditions for the effective exercise of the function of the judiciary.

15. The remedying of the established inconsistency with the Constitution requires a more complex statutory regulation, therefore the determination of the manner of implementation of a decision determined by the second paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA is not possible in the case at issue. This means that in the event of a possible violation of the mentioned right in already concluded proceedings, despite the established inconsistency with the Constitution, until such inconsistency is remedied, individuals only have the possibility to claim compensation for damage on the basis of Article 26 of the Constitution.

C

16. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of Article 48 of the CCA and the second indent of the third paragraph of Article 46 of the Rules of Procedure of the Constitutional Court (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 93/03 and 98/03 – corr.), composed of: Dr Janez Čebulj, President, and Judges Dr Zvonko Fišer, Lojze Janko, Mag. Marija Krisper Kramberger, Milojka Modrijan, Dr Ciril Ribičič, Dr Mirjam Škrk, Jože Tratnik, and Dr Dragica Wedam Lukić. The decision was reached unanimously. Judge Krisper Kramberger submitted a concurring opinion.

Dr Janez Čebulj
President

---

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE MAG. MARIJA KRISPER KRAMBERGER, JOINED BY JUDGE DR ZVONKO FIŠER

1. Despite my initial concerns, I voted for the decision reached by the Constitutional Court, and I agree with the principal grounds for the decision. Therefore, I concur that the violation of the right to a trial within a reasonable time or to a trial without undue delay requires special regulation as the legislation in force does not contain special provisions tailored to the nature of the considered right.<sup>1</sup> Initially, I was of the opinion that the valid provisions of Article 62 of the AJRAA, of Article 26 of the Constitution, and of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (hereinafter referred to as the ECHR) together with the case law of the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR) relating to Article 41 of the ECHR entailed a sufficient basis for its protection,<sup>2</sup> namely also after the proceedings that lasted too long were concluded (with finality). However, this was confirmed by neither the case law of the ordinary courts nor the case law of

---

1 Paragraph 13 of the reasoning of the Decision of the Constitutional Court.

2 Also Paragraph 12 of the reasoning [of the Decision] of the Constitutional Court can be understood in such a manner.

the Constitutional Court, whereas, in the opinion of the ECtHR, only a legal remedy of national law that is accessible not only in theory, but also in practice, can entail an effective legal remedy.<sup>3</sup>

2. In this concurring opinion, I wish to draw attention to certain questions that were not decisive for the decision of the Constitutional Court, but will be important for the case law until a special law is adopted, and perhaps also for the legislature. As the Constitutional Court emphasised in particular in its Decision<sup>4</sup>, the obligation of the state to ensure the right to effective judicial protection follows already from the requirements (principles) of a state governed by the rule of law determined by Article 2 of the Constitution. This of course entails, firstly, that the state must ensure effective functioning of the judicial branch of power<sup>5</sup>, meaning, in the context of the mentioned right, trials without undue delay, i.e. within a reasonable time. As the fulfilment of this requirement is one of the biggest challenges not only for Slovenia but also for the majority of the Member States of the Council of Europe, punishing [courts] for their failure by determining a new independent legal remedy can have an effect that is the diametric opposite of the one desired. It can entail an additional burden on the courts and thereby [cause] proceedings to last even longer.<sup>6</sup>

---

3 In Belinger v. Slovenia, the ECtHR expressly dismissed the preliminary objection of the Government of the Republic of Slovenia on the inadmissibility of the application due to the non-exhaustion of the national legal remedies, but it only dealt with the legal remedies that allegedly were available to the applicant during the proceedings (Article 62 of the AJRAA, the supervisory complaint, the judicial review of administrative acts, and the constitutional complaint); the Constitutional Court explained this in more detail in Paragraph 9 of the reasoning of the Decision.

4 Paragraph 6 of the reasoning of the Decision of the Constitutional Court.

5 At the international conference organised in the framework of the Council of Europe entitled How to shorten the length of civil judicial proceedings (Madrid, 11–13 July 2001; the materials from this conference are available in the Central Judicial Library of the Supreme Court of the Republic of Slovenia) how Member States tackled this problem was specifically presented. By legislative and organisational measures, Western European states strive to achieve greater discipline of parties to proceedings, a lesser number or the limitation of legal remedies, the out-of-court resolution of disputes, and, by means of various measures within the judiciary, to also interfere with certain previously “untouchable” rights of judges and parties to proceedings. In such manner, the Netherlands adopted a regulation similar to the Slovene “Hercules” system, called “The Flying Brigades”. Austria provides for the institute of “the caretakers of the law” (Rechtspfleger), who carry out execution, probate, and certain other non-litigious proceedings; Austria provided the basis for such regulation in its constitution. Officials resembling the caretakers of the law, however with less authorisations, also exist in, e.g., France, Belgium, Denmark, Sweden, and Germany. Italy adopted a regulation allowing for the shortening of the reasoning of decisions and also for [the adoption of] decisions without a reasoning. For such purpose, also Italy amended its constitution. France modernised civil proceedings by the introduction of the [so-called] “procedural contract” institute (Contrat de la procédure). This is a procedure in which the judge and the legal representatives of both parties agree on the date by which the legal representatives will make a statement on the decisive facts and on the date by which they will submit evidence. After such date, it is no longer possible to either allege new facts or submit new evidence; as for the judge, he or she must quickly call a hearing and then conclude proceedings as soon as possible.

6 In [endnotes] 24 and 26 to the reasoning of the Decision of the Constitutional Court, also the experience of and the special regulation of this legal relationship in Italy and in the Republic of Croatia are described,

The legal nature of the liability of the state for a violation of the right to a trial without undue delay

3. In accordance with the hitherto position of the Constitutional Court, if proceedings in which the right to a trial without undue delay was allegedly violated have already been concluded (with finality), the affected person can file an action for the payment of compensation on the basis of Article 26 of the Constitution. The first paragraph of this Article determines that everyone has the right to compensation for damage caused through unlawful actions in connection with the performance of any function or other activity by a person or authority (a judge or a court) performing such function or activity within a state (or local community) authority (or as a bearer of public authority). The right to compensation is placed among the human rights and can be invoked directly on the basis of the Constitution. The unlawfulness of actions is not determined in more detail in the mentioned provision of the Constitution. Furthermore, the nature of the liability of the person or authority who caused the damage is also not expressly regulated.<sup>7</sup>
4. The right to compensation is also regulated by Article 30 of the Constitution, but only as regards a certain conduct of state authorities and a certain circle of injured parties. In accordance with this provision, any person unjustly convicted [of a criminal offence] or deprived of his liberty without due cause has the right to compensation. The provision of Article 30 of the Constitution is thus significantly narrower than that of Article 26 of the Constitution. The “unlawful” actions are the deprivation of liberty without due cause and “unjust” conviction, although proceedings were carried out in conformity with the law and it is the outcome of proceedings (e.g. a final judgment by which a detainee was acquitted) that causes the consequence to be unlawful. In this provision also the nature of the liability is not determined, nor is the type of damage that is legally recognised. This right, the person liable and the injured party, the damage to be compensated, the mitigating circumstances, and the procedure for exercising such right are regulated in more detail in Chapter XXXII of the Criminal Procedure Act (hereinafter referred to as the CrPA, Articles 538 through 546)<sup>8</sup> and in the Code of Obligations (hereinafter referred to as the CO).
5. When the legislature is to regulate relations arising after proceedings that have lasted too long have concluded, it will first have to answer the question of what kind of legal which indicate that the regulation of the protection of this right causes additional delays in courts and thereby additional ineffectiveness of the legal system in these states. This is certainly not the purpose of the special protection of the right to a trial within a reasonable time.

---

- 7 Possible actions for recovery by the state against individual judges or other officials are not subject to the present consideration. Neither is the second paragraph of Article 26 of the Constitution, which determines that an injured party has the right to claim, in accordance with the law, compensation also directly from the person or authority that caused such damage. The subject of the consideration in the present Decision of the Constitutional Court is the relationship between the state and an individual.
- 8 Also the return of property after the annulment of a sentence of confiscation necessitated a special regulation (the Enforcement of Criminal Sentences Act, Official Gazette RS, No. 22/2000, etc., Articles 145 and 145. a through 145. č).

relation between the state and an individual actually is at issue in such a case. Such a relation is clearer while proceedings are pending, when the state must ensure that proceedings proceed apace and that the court acts in a manner such that it decides on a claim without a delay. However, when proceedings are concluded with finality, it is no longer possible to achieve a reasonable length of proceedings, and the violation has already ceased. The only remaining matter is to remedy the possible consequences that occurred due to the violation.<sup>9</sup> If, however, such remedying cannot be achieved by reinstating the case or in any other manner, it can only be achieved by means of compensation. After proceedings have been concluded, a relationship regarding damages is thus created between the state and the individual whose right to a trial without undue delay was violated, in which the individual has the status of the injured party.

6. Although in the IUS-INFO digital database there is no data on case law based on Article 26 of the Constitution, this does not imply that such case law does not exist. For example, a court partially granted the claim for damages of an injured party who substantiated the occurrence of damage by alleging that civil and execution proceedings were too lengthy.<sup>10</sup> The Higher Court based its Judgment on Article 26 of the Constitution. It established that this provision concerns a “type of strict liability of the defendant (the state), which did not manage to exculpate itself.” In the mentioned case, the court awarded the injured party SIT 800,000 for non-pecuniary damage that he had sustained due to the excessive length of proceedings, namely for his psychological damage due to the interference with his personality rights determined by Article 200 of the Obligations Act (now Article 179 of the CO). It substantiated its decision by the fact that the plaintiff suffered an interference with his mental integrity (indignation, helplessness, and disappointment with regard to the system of justice of the Republic of Slovenia). The court dismissed the claim for the compensation of pecuniary damage, as it established that the plaintiff had not proven such damage. Otherwise, the court deemed, in particular, the fact that in the civil proceedings the judgment was written and issued 15 months after the expiry of the statutorily determined time limit and the fact that in the execution proceedings the first attempt at a seizure was made only three years after a motion for execution was filed to entail the legally decisive circumstances due to which the conduct of the state was unlawful. Thereby it gave substance to the legal standard of a trial within a reasonable time, and at the same time established, by means of the interpretation of Article 26 of the Constitution, what type of liability for damages was at issue.
7. As mentioned above, Article 30 of the Constitution is concretised in Chapter XXXII of the CrPA. The entity liable to pay compensation for damage is the Republic of Slovenia.<sup>11</sup> The CrPA determines which actions the state is liable for, and under which condi-

---

9 The fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution.

10 Ljubljana Higher Court Judgment No. II Cp 1174/2001, dated 12 February 2003, in relation to Ljubljana District Court Judgment No. III P 499/2000, dated 18 April 2001, unpublished.

11 If the matter concerns the recognition of the period of employment or insurance in conformity with Article 546 of the CrPA, then in addition to the state also the authority that did not recognise the injured party the appropriate period can be sued. However, if the matter concerns expungement from the criminal record, this tions. Furthermore, the circle of persons entitled to compensation or rehabilitation and other rights is also determined. I would like to draw attention to the position adopted in [legal] theory and in the case law on the nature of the non-contractual liability of the state for damage determined by Articles 538 and 542 of the CrPA. The state is liable for damage irrespective of whether its authority that caused such was at fault or not. What is at issue is a specific civil liability for damage caused by such conduct determined by the CrPA<sup>12</sup>. This liability is based on objective circumstances, independently of subjective circumstances on the side of the authority which by its action caused the deprivation of liberty without due cause or an unjust conviction.<sup>13</sup> The state can be relieved of its liability if the injured party caused the occurrence of damage by his or her conduct (i.e. he or she was deprived of his or her liberty or convicted). In the case law, a series of problems arose in relation to the application of the CrPA (in particular with regard to the question of the “inadmissible conduct” of the injured party).<sup>14</sup>

8. The CrPA further regulates the procedure, which consists of two phases. Before filing an action for damages with the court, the injured party must request that the State Attorney’s Office reach an agreement with him or her on the existence of damage and on the type and amount of the compensation. If the request for damages is not granted or if the State Attorney’s Office and the injured party do not reach an agreement within three months from the filing of such request, the injured party may file an action for damages before the competent court. The case law indicates that settlements are rarely concluded between the state and injured parties, and such claims represent an additional burden on the courts. In the mentioned chapter, also the time-barring of a claim (three years) and the inheritance of claims for damages are regulated.
9. Although there is no special legislation that would regulate in more detail a violation of the right to a trial within a reasonable time, the wording of Article 26 of the Constitution gives enough support for the interpretation that what is at issue is a special type of strict liability. The state cannot be relieved of its liability otherwise than by proving that the interference with the right occurred outside of its sphere [of influence]. As a general rule, the cause is the injured party him- or herself, other participants in proceedings, or other events on which the state (a court, a judge) had no influence.<sup>15</sup> The fact that the matter concerns a special type of strict liability follows in particular from the fact that in view of its procedural role in proceedings, the judge must also have control over the behaviour of participants in such proceedings.

---

must be carried out ex officio by the court that adjudicated at the first instance (Article 544 of the CrPA).

- 12 See, e.g., B. Strohsack: Odškodninsko pravo in druge neposlovne obveznosti [The Law of Damages and Other Non-Contractual Obligations], Uradni list, Ljubljana, 1996, p. 248.
- 13 For more on strict liability, see N. Plavšak in M. Juhart and N. Plavšak (Eds.), Obligacijski zakonik s komentarjem, splošni del [The Code of Obligations with Commentary, General Part], GV, Ljubljana, 2003, Vol. 1, p. 742 and the entire commentary on Article 131 of the CO, pp. 683 et seq.
- 14 For more on this, see M. Krisper Kramberger: Nedovoljeno ravnanje po tretjem odstavku 542. člena ZKP [Inadmissible Conduct in Accordance with the Third Paragraph of Article 542 of the CrPA], Pravosodni bilten, No. 3/2001, pp. 219–229.
- 15 N. Plavšak, op. cit.

Therefore, generally it is difficult to determine whether the judge in a concrete case had the possibility to influence their conduct. The same result can also be achieved with the interpretation that, as a general rule, the questions of liability and unlawfulness determined by Article 26 of the Constitution overlap. The liability depends on the finding of whether the conduct of a judge (a court) is unlawful.<sup>16</sup> Unlawfulness is a legal standard. If the matter at issue concerns a violation of the right to a trial within a reasonable time, the decision on unlawfulness and thereby on liability will depend on the finding of whether the time that the court needed to decide thereon in view of the circumstances of the concrete case was reasonable.<sup>17</sup> This is also how the ECtHR proceeds. In doing so, it takes into consideration the following factors in particular: the complexity of the case, the conduct of state authorities, the conduct of the applicant, and the significance of the case for the applicant. The case law of the ECtHR is extremely diverse as regards this question. The ECtHR assesses in particular whether it is parties or their authorised representatives who are at fault for proceedings lasting an inappropriately long time. On the other hand, the ECtHR also assesses whether certain cases are of such nature that they in themselves require faster adjudication.<sup>18</sup>

10. In accordance with Article 26 of the Constitution, courts decide in civil proceedings. In Paragraph 14 of the reasoning of its [present] Decision, the Constitutional Court refers to the reasoning of the Judgment of the ECtHR in Kudla v. Poland, in which the ECtHR expressly stated that it is not necessary that [the authority which] must decide on such a legal remedy is exactly a court. However, the Slovene legislature will not be able to avoid the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, which guarantees judicial protection of human rights. Thus, it will be necessary to decide whether proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts or civil proceedings are more appropriate. I am of the opinion, however, that [the legislature] should follow the example of the CrPA, in which the preliminary procedure before the State Attorney's Office is regulated.

Just satisfaction

11. In its Decision, the Constitutional Court did not address the question of what the term "just satisfaction" means and to which category of sanctions due to unconstitutional conduct it belongs. It left it to the legislature to decide on the definition, but

---

16 For more on this, see D. Jadek Pensa in L. Šturm (Ed.): Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije [Commentary on the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia], Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Ljubljana 2002, pp. 295 et seq.

17 For example, the fourth paragraph of Article 60 of the Courts Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 23/05 – official consolidated text, etc.) determines that it is deemed that a court delay occurred if the backlog of cases equaling the number of cases received in the last twelve months is demonstrated.

18 For example, in numerous decisions the ECtHR has held France liable due to excessively lengthy proceedings in which the plaintiffs, who were haemophiliacs, claimed compensation due to an infection with AIDS through blood transfusion. The ECtHR emphasised in particular that the matter concerned people whose life was nearing its end, therefore it was necessary to decide on the compensation within the shortest possible period of time in order for these people to be able to enjoy it at least for some time (the Judgment in Vallee v. France, No. 22121/93, dated 26 April 1994, and the Judgment in Karakaya v. France, No. 22800/93, dated 26 August 1994, etc.).

pointed to the case law of the ECtHR and to the positions adopted in its judgments. In its Decision, the Constitutional Court only drew attention to the fact that what is at issue is not classical compensation.

12. Article 41 of the ECHR determines that if the ECtHR finds that there has been a violation of the Convention or the Protocols thereto, and if the internal law of the High Contracting Party concerned allows only partial reparation to be made, the ECtHR shall, if necessary, afford just satisfaction to the injured party. This provision concerns compensation, which, however, is very general. In its judgments the ECtHR has gradually developed the criteria for awarding such compensation.<sup>19</sup>
13. The ECtHR affords just satisfaction only if the applicant in fact sustained damage and if a causal link exists between such damage and the established violation. Damage can be either pecuniary or non-pecuniary. The applicant must prove the damage. The ECtHR can award monetary compensation as just satisfaction; however, in certain cases it considers that already the mere finding of a violation of a [certain] right constitutes just satisfaction.<sup>20</sup> Hence, the ECtHR understands just satisfaction as compensation for pecuniary (monetary compensation) or non-pecuniary damage (monetary or non-monetary compensation).<sup>21</sup>
14. It was already the ECtHR which realised that proceedings for the determination of just satisfaction are complex and disproportionately lengthy. Applicants often do not submit all the relevant documents, thus causing that the ECtHR is obliged to impose a new time limit for the filing of supplements to the application several times.<sup>22</sup> In practice, cases in which the decision on just satisfaction is issued significantly later than the decision on the merits of the case (as to the existence of a violation) are frequent.<sup>23</sup>
15. Article 26 of the Constitution does not determine which type of damage is legally recognised and which type of compensation injured parties are entitled to.<sup>24</sup> For such 19 For more on this, see J. L. Sharpe, Article 50, in L.-E. Pettiti, E. Décaux, P.-H. Imbert, La Convention européenne des droits de l'homme, Economica, Paris, 1999, pp. 809–842.

20 In G. Bottazzi v. Italy, No. 34884, dated 24 June 1999, published in Dignitas No. 7–8/2000, p. 138, the ECtHR established that the applicant did not succeed in proving the occurrence of pecuniary damage, which was alleged to be a consequence of the excessively lengthy proceedings at issue. On the other hand, concerning non-pecuniary damage, the ECtHR did not concur with the objection of the Government that the mere establishment of the violation itself would already entail just satisfaction. It decided that the applicant certainly sustained certain non-pecuniary damage, which cannot be compensated by merely establishing a violation. Consequently, the ECtHR awarded the applicant monetary compensation.

21 Particularly interesting is the Judgment of the ECtHR in Broniowski v. Poland, in which it established that Article 41 of the ECHR could not be applied, and in the fifth paragraph the operative provisions of the [Judgment] invited the Government of Poland and the injured party to inform the Court within six months whether they have reached an agreement, or to submit their positions in connection with the resolution of the issue of compensation for nationalised property. The Court authorised the president of the ECtHR to reopen the proceedings if necessary (Judgment No. 31443/96, dated 22 June 2004).

22 See the note in relation to the case G. Bottazzi v. Italy.

23 See notes 26 and 27 in M. Krisper Kramberger, Omejitev lastninske pravice v javnem interesu [The Limitation of Private Property in the Public Interest], Pravnik, No. 4–5/97, p. 158.

24 Judgment No. II Cp 1174/2001, dated 12 February 2003, in relation to Ljubljana District Court Judgment No.

reason, general provisions of the law of damages regarding damage and compensation must be applied, i.e. the CO. This Act regulates pecuniary and non-pecuniary damage and compensation therefor. Compensation for non-pecuniary damage can be either monetary or non-monetary, whereas compensation for pecuniary damage can only be monetary.

16. In conformity with Article 132 of the CO, pecuniary damage includes the diminution of assets (ordinary damage) and the prevention of an increase in assets (lost profits). Such damage is in itself not problematic and the legislature will only have to decide whether it will deem [pecuniary damage] – and which [type thereof] – to also be legally recognised in the event of a violation of the right to a trial within a reasonable time.
17. It will be more difficult to regulate compensation for non-pecuniary damage. Already the general regulation in the CO is problematic. In accordance with the definition under Article 132 of the CO, non-pecuniary damage includes the infliction of physical pain or mental distress or fear on another person and damaging the reputation of a legal entity. The provisions of Articles 133, 134, and 178 of the CO, which regulate compensation for damage incurred by an infringement of personality rights, broaden the mentioned definition.<sup>25</sup> In such manner, in Article 178 of the CO other, i.e. non-monetary, types of compensation are determined (e.g. the publication of a judgment or the “performance” of another action by which the purpose achieved by compensation can be achieved). Although the right at issue does not fall among [those determined by] these provisions, I mentioned them because they point to a possible regulation of just satisfaction.
18. Naturally, the legislature can also decide to introduce a so-called tariff, that is, a sum of money determined in advance that depends on the amount of time exceeding a reasonable length of proceedings. However, such a regulation would only be in conformity with the case law of the ECtHR if courts are in every concrete case able to also consider the above-mentioned characteristics of the individual case and the conduct of parties and other participants in proceedings.

Mag. Marija Krisper Kramberger

Dr Zvonko Fišer

---

III P 499/2000, dated 18 April 2001.

25 For more on this, see L. Koman Perenič, Škoda in odškodnina [Damage and Compensation], DZS, 2004, pp. 44 and 45, and in particular with regard to personality rights A. Polajnar-Pavčnik in M. Pavčnik, A. Polajnar-Pavčnik, and D. Wedam Lukić (Eds.), Temeljne pravice [Fundamental Rights], CZ, Ljubljana, 1997, pp. 150 et seq. The author does not consider the right to a trial within a reasonable time to fall within such rights.

Order No. U-I-302/09, Up-1472/09, U-I-139/10, Up-748/10, dated 12 May 2011

ORDER

At a session held on 12 May 2011 in proceedings to review the petitions and constitutional complaints of IZOTERM PLAMA, d. o. o., Podgrad, represented by Dragan Sikirica, attorney in Sežana, and Sabina Zakrajšek, Ljubljana, represented by the law firm Odvetniška družba Čeferin, o. p., d. o. o., Grosuplje, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. The petitions for the initiation of the procedure for the review of the constitutionality of the second paragraph of Article 367c of the Civil Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 73/07 – official consolidated text and 45/08) are dismissed.
2. The constitutional complaint of Izoterm Plama, d. o. o., against Supreme Court Order No. II DoR 73/2009, dated 22 October 2009, is not accepted for consideration.
3. The constitutional complaint of Sabina Zakrajšek against Supreme Court Order No. II DoR 40/2010, dated 18 March 2010, and against Higher Court of Ljubljana Judgement No. I Cp 2769/2009, dated 4 November 2009, concerning the judgement of the District Court of Ljubljana, dated 8 April 2009, is not accepted for consideration.

Reasoning

A

1. Izoterm Plama, d. o. o. (hereinafter referred to as the first petitioner) submitted a constitutional complaint against the order referred to in Point 2 of the operative provisions of this Order, by which the Supreme Court dismissed its motion for leave to appeal. In the reasoning of the Order, the Supreme Court allegedly made only general reference to the non-existence of the conditions for leave to appeal determined by the first paragraph of Article 367a of the Civil Procedure Act (hereinafter referred to as the CPA), without explaining or substantiating its decision in any way. Such mere general reference by the Supreme Court to the provision of the second paragraph of Article 367c of the CPA allegedly violates the right of the first petitioner to the equal protection of rights determined by Article 22 of the Constitution, and the right to a fair trial under the first paragraph of Article 6 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR). The first petitioner – quoting inter alia the case law of the Constitutional Court<sup>1</sup> – emphasises that the court's duty to appropriately reason its decision is a direct expression of the right to be heard in court, and that it is only from the reasoning that it can be inferred whether the court even examined the statements of the parties to the proceedings and whether it ensured a fair trial. Even though the right to appeal on a point of law is not constitutionally guaranteed, according to the first petitioner, proceedings regarding an appeal on a point of law must satisfy the requirements of constitutional procedural guarantees – including the requirement to provide appropriate reasoning, which applies to all important procedural orders. Furthermore, a decision without a statement of reasons is allegedly arbitrary, as it is not clear on what basis the court reached its decision. Since the first petitioner argues that the alleged violations of human rights are a consequence of the application of the second paragraph of Article 367c of the CPA, this legal rule is allegedly inconsistent with Article 22 of the Constitution. The first petitioner, therefore, also submits a petition for the initiation of the procedure for the review of the constitutionality thereof.

2. Sabina Zakrajšek (hereinafter referred to as the second petitioner) submits a constitutional complaint against the judgements of the Higher Court of Ljubljana and the District Court of Ljubljana, and additionally challenges the order by which the Supreme Court dismissed her motion for leave to appeal against the second-instance judgement. Due to the fact that in the challenged order the Supreme Court refers, on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 367c of the CPA, to the non-existence of the conditions for leave to appeal only in general and non-specific terms, without explaining why these conditions are not satisfied, the second petitioner also submits a petition for the initiation of the procedure for the review of the conformity of the mentioned provision with the Constitution. In the petition, the second petitioner – giving mutatis mutandis the same reasons as the first petitioner – alleges an inconsistency with Article 22 of the Constitution, reasoning that the regulation is unacceptable from the point of view of the right to make statements before the court and the right to a fair trial. The party was allegedly prevented from learning whether the court examined her arguments at all, and from understanding why the doors of the Supreme Court were “slammed shut” on her. That the mentioned guarantees are also binding on the Supreme Court allegedly follows inter alia from Constitutional Court Decision No. Up-373/97, dated 22 February 2001 (Official Gazette RS, No. 19/01, and Odlus X, 108).

---

1 Constitutional Court Orders Nos. Up-131/00, dated 30 May 2000 (OdlUS IX, 143) and Up-1515/06, dated 15 May 2007, and Decisions Nos. Up-39/95, dated 16 January 1997 (OdlUS VI, 71), Up-678/09, dated 20 October 2009 (Official Gazette RS, No. 88/09), and Up-232/09, dated 17 February 2000 (Official Gazette RS, No. 24/2000 and OdlUS IX, 131).

3. The National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia emphasises in its response to the first petitioner's petition that the challenged regulation is necessary in order to fulfil the aims of the leave to appeal system. The essence of this system is allegedly to make it possible for the Supreme Court to focus on the substance of only those appeals on a point of law which it has deemed raise legal issues that are of great importance for the legal order from the objective standpoint of the development of case law and the consistency thereof. If the Supreme Court were required to provide a statement of reasons on the merits in orders dismissing motions for leave to appeal, this would preclude a disburdening that is essential if the Supreme Court is to realise its constitutionally defined role as the highest court in the state ensuring legal certainty and equal protection of rights by providing guidance and consistent case law. The regulation of leave to appeal is allegedly common in countries of the Germanic legal circle, whereas the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR) has allegedly already ruled that it is not inconsistent with the procedural guarantees in the Convention if the reasoning of a "negative" decision issued by the highest court is merely formal.<sup>2</sup>
4. Similarly as the National Assembly, the Government of the Republic of Slovenia emphasises in its opinions regarding the petitions that the challenged regulation pursues two inextricably linked aims: (1) to ensure the manageability of the caseload of the highest court in the state, and (2) to ensure that the Supreme Court is capable of fulfilling its function of developing law through case law and ensuring the consistency thereof. The former aim is allegedly a necessary condition for the fulfilment of the latter, which in turn serves to protect human rights and fundamental liberties, and key constitutional principles (i.e. the rule of law, and constitutionality and legality). In the opinion of the Government, it does not follow from any of the constitutionally guaranteed rights that an order dismissing a leave to appeal should be reasoned on the merits, since the proceedings are already final at the time of the issuance of such an order. The key, in its assessment, is that an individual's right to recourse to the Supreme Court yields to the aim of providing a quality system of judicial protection of constitutionality and legality. The Government, furthermore, draws attention to the possibility of a constitutionally compatible explanation of the challenged provision, which it states the Constitutional Court should examine subsidiarily. The challenged provision can thus allegedly be interpreted as entailing that the Supreme Court reasons its decision concisely with reference to an adopted decision which proves that the case law is already established, i.e. that there has not been a divergence from the case law (and, hence, that there are no grounds for granting the leave to appeal determined by Article 367a of the CPA).
5. The petitioners responded to the responses of the National Assembly and the opinions of the Government by reiterating their positions in the petitions.

<sup>2</sup> It makes reference to the cases X v. Germany (decision by the European Commission of Human Rights, dated 16 July 1981) and Buffenne v. France (ECtHR judgment, dated 26 February 2002).

B – I

6. The challenged second paragraph of Article 367c of the CPA stipulates: “It suffices for the reasoning of an order by which a motion for leave to appeal is dismissed that the court makes general reference to the non-existence of the conditions determined by Article 367a of this Act”. As indicated by the Government, this provision certainly does not prohibit a statement of reasons on the merits, but states as a general rule that such is not provided, which the Supreme Court applied in issuing both decisions challenged by the petitioners’ constitutional complaints. The Constitutional Court, therefore, had to review the allegations of the petitioners that the absence of a statement of reasons on the merits is inconsistent with Article 22 of the Constitution.

General Considerations Regarding the Constitutional Requirement to Provide a Statement of Reasons for Court Decisions

7. The petitioners’ starting point is that constitutional procedural guarantees – inter alia the duty of the court to appropriately reason its decision – must be provided in all phases of court proceedings, including in proceedings where this is not required by the Constitution (e.g. in proceedings for extraordinary legal remedies). The Constitutional Court has adopted this position several times, inter alia in Decision No. Up-373/97, which is referred to by the second petitioner, and in Order No. Up-1514/06, which is cited by the first petitioner.
8. It is an established position of the Constitutional Court that the duty to reason court decisions is a component of a party’s right to make statements before the court as an aspect of Article 22 of the Constitution.<sup>3</sup> A reasoned court decision entails a realisation of the court’s duty to take a position on essential statements made by the party, which corresponds to the mentioned right of the party. But the constitutional meaning of the statement of reasons extends beyond the bare manifestation of the court having fulfilled its duty to hear the parties to proceedings. Its essential value lies in providing insight into the reasons for the very decision, in particular for a party which was unsuccessful in proceedings deciding its rights, obligations, or legal interests. This demonstrates the autonomous nature of the reasoning as an independent dimension of the right to a fair trial,<sup>4</sup> which is also one of the aspects of the equal protection of rights determined by Article 22 of the Constitution. In order to guarantee the human right to a fair trial, and to ensure trust in the judiciary, it is of great importance that a party, in particular if he was not successful in proceedings, can learn of the reasons behind a decision on his rights, obligations, or legal interests. The duty to state the reasons for a decision is also imposed on courts by the right to a fair trial determined by the first paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR.<sup>5</sup> Since

---

3 Cf. Constitutional Court Decision No. Up-39/95, dated 16 January 1997 (OdIUS VI, 71), and numerous others. Similar in A. Galič, Ustavno civilno procesno pravo [Constitutional Civil Procedure Law], GV Založba, Ljubljana 2004, p. 282.

4 Cf. Constitutional Court Decisions Nos. Up-147/09, dated 23 September 2010 (Official Gazette RS, No. 83/10) and Up-162/09, dated 16 December 2010 (Official Gazette RS, No. 3/11).

5 M. Viering in: P. van Dijk, F. van Hoof, A. van Rijn, and L. Zwaak (eds.), Theory and Practice of the European everything that is required by the right to appropriate reasoning determined by the Convention is also guaranteed under Article 22 of the Constitution, the positions of the Constitutional Court regarding the alleged inconsistency with Article 22 of the Constitution are by extension its positions regarding the allegations of inconsistency with the first paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR.

9. However, the fact that the right to appropriate reasoning is an independent component of the human right determined by Article 22 of the Constitution does not entail that its dimension is unlimited in scope and the same in all judicial decision-making. On the contrary, the scope of ensuring appropriate reasoning depends on the nature of the decision and the circumstances of the respective case.<sup>6</sup> Some factors which define the mentioned nature and circumstances may be inferred from the case law of the Constitutional Court and the ECtHR. The constitutional requirement to ensure appropriate reasoning correlates with certain other values in constitutional law, most notably, for example, with the human right to legal remedies. The degree of reasoning is, therefore, inter alia determined by what an effective legal remedy against a decision in each specific case requires.<sup>7</sup> The absence of a statement of reasons in a decision which realises the right to a decision on the merits, this right being an element of the human right to judicial protection determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution, results in a violation of that right as well.<sup>8</sup> On the other hand, the scope of the constitutional requirement to provide appropriate reasoning is narrower for decisions against which there is no legal remedy and which uphold the decisions of lower courts.<sup>9</sup> In such cases it is not insignificant that the party already enjoyed judicial protection at two levels, with the highest court merely repeating what the party has already heard (twice).<sup>10</sup>
10. The purpose of the human right to the equal protection of rights determined by Article 22 of the Constitution, which also includes the requirement to ensure appropriate reasoning of decisions, is to protect an individual in proceedings regarding his rights, obligations, and legal interests. The assessment of to what extent the proceedings refer to the individual position of the party is, therefore, an important – perhaps even the most fundamental – factor which determines the scope of the protection

---

Convention on Human Rights, 4th edition, Intersentia, Antwerp – Oxford 2006, p. 595.

- 6 Such standpoint was already adopted in Constitutional Court Decision No. Up-147/09, and similar by the ECtHR, for example, in the cases Ruiz Torija v. Spain (judgment dated 9 December 1994) and Hiro Balani v. Spain (judgment dated 9 December 1994).
- 7 See Constitutional Court Decision No. Up-296/98, dated 20 April 2000 (OdlUS IX, 136), and essentially the same by the ECtHR in Suominen v. Finland (judgment dated 1 July 2003), Paras. 37 and 38.
- 8 See Constitutional Court Decision No. Up-162/09.
- 9 See, for example, Constitutional Court Decision No. Up-373/97 and the ECtHR judgment in the case Garcia Ruiz v. Spain, dated 21 January 1999.
- 10 The position of the German Federal Constitutional Court is that – with exceptions – the court of last instance is not bound by the duty to reason its decisions; the purpose of the reasoning is to enable the individual an appropriate defence of his rights, but when it comes to the decision of the court of last instance, the affected party no longer has recourse to a higher instance (Order BVerfGE 50, 287).

of the right to appropriate reasoning required by the Constitution. In cases when the question is whether the highest court will allow a legal remedy not guaranteed by human rights, as in the case under consideration, it is, therefore, also important to analyse whether the decision has implications for the public interest and to what extent it refers to the individual position of the parties.

The Nature of the Procedure for Deciding on Granting Leave to Appeal and the Role Prescribed for the Supreme Court by the Constitution

11. No human right guarantees the right to appeal on a point of law.<sup>11</sup> The legislature may, therefore, at a starting point decide whether it will grant an appeal on a point of law in civil matters, what purposes this extraordinary legal remedy will predominantly have, and whether it will subject it to access control (by the Supreme Court).
12. Pursuant to the second paragraph of Article 367 of the CPA, an appeal on a point of law is admissible if the value of the challenged part of the final decision exceeds EUR 40,000 (an admissible appeal on a point of law). If an appeal on a point of law is not admissible, it may be granted by the Supreme Court in accordance with Article 367a of the Act (leave to appeal); the Supreme Court cannot grant a leave to appeal when the law stipulates that no appeal on a point of law is possible, or when the value of the challenged part of the final decision does not exceed EUR 2,000 (the third and fourth paragraphs of Article 367 of the CPA). Pursuant to the first paragraph of Article 367a of the CPA, the Supreme Court may grant an appeal on a point of law if it may be expected that it will decide on a legal issue that is relevant to ensuring legal certainty, consistent application of the law, or the development of the law by means of case law. The Supreme Court grants an appeal on a point of law in particular in cases involving: (1) a legal issue with regard to which the decision of the court of second instance diverges from the case law of the Supreme Court, or (2) a legal issue with regard to which Supreme Court case law does not exist, in particular if the case law of the higher courts is not consistent, or (3) a legal issue with regard to which Supreme Court case law is not consistent. In accordance with the challenged provision, the Supreme Court does not need to provide a statement of reasons on the merits for deciding to dismiss an appeal on a point of law on the basis of the mentioned criteria.
13. The described system, with the institute of leave to appeal at its core, primarily establishes the appeal on a point of law as a means of achieving aims which are objectively important from the standpoint of the legal order as a whole. It enables the Supreme Court, as the highest judicial authority for the interpretation and application of the law, to decide on relevant legal issues, thereby ensuring the development of the law by means of case law.<sup>12</sup> It underlines and strengthens the Supreme Court's responsibility to ensure the consistency of case law in the state, thereby guaranteeing equality before

---

11 Cf., for example, Constitutional Court Order No. Up-114/96, dated 25 September 1996, and numerous others.

12 See the Proposal of the Changes and Amendments to the Civil Procedure Act (CPA-D), Gazette of the National Assembly, No. 21/08. Cf. also A. Galič, Za reformo revizije v pravnem postopku [For a Reform of an Appeal on a Point of Law in Civil Procedure], Pravna praksa, No. 43 (2007), pp. 26 et seq.

the law.<sup>13</sup> With the exception of an admissible appeal on a point of law, therefore, the regulation of this extraordinary legal remedy focuses on the protection of the public interest. The subjective dimension of an appeal on a point of law, i.e. protecting parties' rights in specific disputes, is not primary (as is evident in Constitutional Court Decisions Nos. Up-1782/08, U-I-166/08, dated 18 June 2009, Official Gazette RS, No. 54/09, and Up-678/09, dated 20 October 2009, Official Gazette RS, No. 88/09). The principal manner in which the Supreme Court protects the particular interests of individuals is indirect, through the protection of the public interest.<sup>14</sup> This regulation of an appeal on a point of law affirms the role of the Supreme Court as a precedent court, as outlined in connection with the fundamental constitutional principles of a state governed by the rule of law and the separation of powers determined by the first paragraph of Article 127 of the Constitution, which states that the Supreme Court is the highest court in the state. When the Supreme Court takes positions on relevant legal issues within the scope of interpretation it has as the supreme authority of the third branch of power, it co-creates the law. It co-shapes the criteria that in similar cases in the future will serve as ex ante guidelines for courts and the addressees of legal rules in general. In such a manner it enhances the predictability of legal rules and, by extension, legal certainty. The regulation of the appeal on a point of law is, therefore, built upon the notion that, in a modern state governed by the rule of law based on the separation of powers and commitment to the protection of human rights, the Supreme Court makes a significant contribution to strengthening equality before the law and legal certainty by shaping ex ante guidelines on the basis of specific cases. The Court thus effectively exercises its role in the system of checks and balances in which it has the final say on the interpretation of laws (cf. the first paragraph of Article 127 of the Constitution).

14. The summariness of the reasoning of an order to dismiss an appeal on a point of law is in unison with such purpose of an appeal on a point of law, devised on the constitutional role of the Supreme Court as an important co-creator of the law. The procedure for deciding on granting leave to appeal is not designed to protect individual rights in specific cases; this is what proceedings at the first and second instances are dedicated to doing. It is at the first and second instances that the human right to effective judicial protection (including the execution of court decisions) and the human right to legal remedies are realised, and that is where the requirement to provide a statement of reasons on the merits in court decisions applies to its full extent. The purpose of the procedure for deciding on granting leave to appeal, however, is to find elements which go beyond the specific case and interests of the parties to the specific proceedings. It is a sui generis preliminary procedure in which a party attempts to raise an issue of public interest and whose consequence is a decision that does not significantly affect a party's individual position: it "only" causes a refusal of an appeal examination based on the public interest, which the Constitution does not require. The decision as to whether a party's case involves legal issues relevant to the legal order as a whole entails only an insignificant degree of deciding on the party's "rights, obligations, and legal interests". What the constitutional procedural requirement to ensure appropriate reasoning is designed for – protecting the individual position of a party (his right to know the reasons for a decision on his rights, obligations, or legal interests) – is not primary or decisive. This scope of individual protection corresponds to the degree of reasoning that is required under the challenged Article 367c of the CPA.<sup>15</sup> In other words, it does not follow from the right to make statements and the right to a fair trial determined by Article 22 of the Constitution that the Supreme Court must provide a statement of reasons on the merits as to whether based on the criterion of public interest it will grant a legal remedy that human rights do not demand. From the standpoint of this procedural guarantee, it suffices that in its order the Supreme Court merely makes a general reference to the legal reasons for dismissing the leave to appeal. The established position of the ECtHR is essentially the same: in cases when the supreme court or the highest court in the state dismisses a motion by reasoning that there is no legal basis for such, the requirements determined by the first paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR are satisfied even by a very limited statement of reasons.<sup>16</sup>

13 Ibidem.

14 Cf. M. Bobek, Quantity or Quality? Reassessing the Role of Supreme Jurisdictions in Central Europe, The American Journal of Comparative Law, No. 1 (2009), pp. 62 and 63, on how it is the duty of the lower courts, in particular the court of first instance, to examine every case, whereas from the standpoint of the protection of individuals, it is optimal if the supreme court guides lower courts (by ensuring the consistency of the case law and by developing the law), thereby saving individuals from repetitive passage through the judicial system in order to know what the law is.

15. Conversely, the requirement to provide a statement of reasons on the merits of the dismissal of a leave to appeal would dilute the meaning of an appeal on a point of law and, in systemic terms, weaken the importance of the Supreme Court in the constitutional system laid out in the first paragraph of Article 127 of the Constitution.<sup>17</sup> And

---

15 Similar reasons are provided by the German Federal Constitutional Court, which stated that the absence of a detailed reasoning is not a particular shortcoming in the exercise of the applicant's human rights, and that a dismissal of a leave to appeal is limited to clarifying that access to the appeal on a point of law is not available. According to the German Federal Constitutional Court, this is not inconsistent with the system of judicial protection determined by the Constitution (NJW 2004, 1372; 1929).

16 See, for example, the judgments in the cases Nerva and others v. the United Kingdom, dated 11 July 2000 (the House of Lords Appeal Committee did not grant the right to a legal remedy with limited reasoning, by a decision implying that the case did not concern legal issues of fundamental importance), Øvlisen v. Denmark, dated 30 August 2006 (the Procesbevillingsnævnet, i.e. the appeals committee, rejected a motion for the admissibility of an appeal against the decision of a higher court with the reasoning that the case did not deal with legal issues of fundamental importance), and Bachowski v. Poland, dated 2 November 2010 (the Supreme Court only stated the typical formulaic sentence in the reasoning). For similar in ECtHR case law, see A. Galič, Dostop do Vrhovnega sodišča v pravnem postopku v novejši praksi ESČP [Recourse to the Supreme Court in Civil Procedure in Recent ECtHR Case law], Pravna praksa Nos. 6–7 (2011), pp. 7 et seq.

17 M. Bobek, ibidem, p. 41, notes that the system of cassation courts, where recourse to the supreme court is conceived as a party's right, over time has come to no longer serve almost any public purpose, even though cassation courts were conceived as guardians of the public interest. He states that supreme courts composed of hundreds of judges resolve tens of thousands of cases a year, the vast majority of which bring nothing new to the law, with decisions so short as to be almost incomprehensible and contradictions among the cases almost inevitable.

this is not (only) because the requirement to provide a full statement of reasons for a mass of procedural orders that are virtually insignificant with regard to the legal order as a whole could undermine the capabilities of the Supreme Court due to the resulting excessive caseload. What is crucial is that manageability and clarity with regard to the number of cases are inherent to the nature of precedent, and that everything the precedent court states is understood as a precedent (even what it writes with regard to the merits in the order dismissing a leave to appeal).<sup>18</sup> Only if the number of cases is manageable and it is possible to maintain an overview in terms of substance is it reasonable to expect that the cases will indeed serve as ex ante guidelines for courts and addressees of legal rules in general, thereby contributing to equality before the law and legal certainty. The option of only stating the formal reasoning of orders dismissing leaves to appeal is, therefore, necessary to ensure the precedential dimension of the Supreme Court's mission.<sup>19</sup> Such would actually be undermined by the requirement to provide reasoning on the merits of orders dismissing leaves to appeal, and consequently the position of the Supreme Court would be weakened, which is utterly important to the development of the law, the protection of the human right to equality before the law, and, in a broader sense, to the foundations of constitutional democracy.<sup>20</sup>

16. When a leave to appeal procedure demonstrates that the case is of fundamental importance and, therefore, requires a response on the merits from the Supreme Court, the objective importance of the case converges with the subjective interest of the parties. Only when the Supreme Court executes its public interest-based role with a decision on the merits on an appeal on a point of law will it also decide to a more significant extent on the individual right, obligation, or legal interest of the parties that had led to the initiation of judicial protection in the first place. In such cases the fulfilment of the role of a precedent court, which amounts to an exhaustive, extensive, and precisely expressed argumentation on the merits, will overlap with the procedural requirement to ensure appropriate reasoning determined by Article 22 of the Constitution.
17. Just as manifestly unfounded are the allegations of the petitioners that the challenged regulation is inconsistent with the prohibition of judicial arbitrariness determined by Article 22 of the Constitution. For an order to not have reasoning on the 18 Precedent, therefore, cannot exist without a limitation in quantity by means of access control. Its nature requires thorough consideration by the Supreme Court as to when the Supreme Court will speak up and how it will articulate its voice; due to their societal importance, the principal standpoints in decisions which should set a standard for future decisions must be carefully weighed and precisely worded.

19 Essentially the same in A. Galič, Dostop do Vrhovnega sodišča v pravnem postopku v novejši praksi ESČP [Recourse to the Supreme Court in Civil Procedure in Recent ECtHR Case law], p. 8.

20 Cf. A. Galič, Za reformo revizije v pravnem postopku [For a Reform of the Appeal on a Point of law in Civil Procedure], pp. 26 et seq.: The supreme court, as the highest court in the state, having special responsibility with regard to the development of case law, is jeopardised not just by a regulation in which recourse to the supreme court is excluded (and decision-making rendered impossible) but also – just as effectively, albeit not as obviously at first glance – by a regulation where recourse to the supreme court is too broadly enabled. Essentially the same in Proposal of the Changes and Amendments to the Civil Procedure Act (CPA-D), Gazette of the National Assembly, No. 21/08.

merits does not entail that the Supreme Court may decide on a leave to appeal on the basis of criteria that should not have been considered in the trial. What it does entail is that the court need not put into the reasoning of the order the chain of thought regarding the decision-making as to why the legal criteria for leave to appeal determined by the first paragraph of Article 367a of the CPA are not present. The concern of the petitioners that the absence of reasoning on the merits may adversely affect the party's ability to verify whether the Supreme Court may have decided arbitrarily does not suffice for the substantiation of the alleged inconsistency. In this respect, the Constitutional Court adds that the structure of the constitutional order must by all means include safeguards that should reduce the possibility of the system being abused. However, in order for a state governed by the rule of law to be able to fully function, it is inherently necessary to trust the highest judicial authority,<sup>21</sup> comprising experienced legal experts with high ethical integrity. The challenged regulation is necessary for the effective execution of a very important role of the Supreme Court. It is clear that this regulation is not such that it would expose parties to the danger of arbitrary interferences with their rights or legal interests.

18. In view of the above, the Constitutional Court hereby dismissed the petitions as manifestly unfounded (Point 1 of the operative provisions).

B – II

Constitutional Complaints

19. The Constitutional Court did not accept the constitutional complaints for review as the alleged violations of human rights and fundamental liberties are not demonstrated (Points 2 and 3 of the operative provisions).

C

20. The Constitutional Court reached this Order on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 26 and the first indent of the second paragraph of Article 55b of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 64/07 – official consolidated text – CCA), composed of: Mag. Miroslav Mozetič, Vice President, and Judges Dr Mitja Deisinger, Dr Etelka Korpič – Horvat, Jasna Pogačar, Mag. Jadranka Sovdat, Jože Tratnik and Jan Zobec. The Order was adopted unanimously.

Mag. Miroslav Mozetič
Vice President

---

21 The need for trust in the judiciary due to its precedent power is also highlighted by B. M. Zupančič in The Owl of Minerva: Essays on Human Rights, Eleven International Publishing, Utrecht 2008, p. 372.

Decision No. Up-1177/12, Up-89/14, dated 28 May 2015

DECISION

At a session held on 28 May 2015 in proceedings to decide upon the constitutional complaints of Luka Vraneš, Ljubljana, represented by Bojana Potočan, attorney in Ljubljana, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. Supreme Court Judgment No. II Ips 11/2008, dated 10 September 2012, is abrogated and the case is remanded to the Supreme Court for new adjudication.
2. Supreme Court Order No. II DoR 269/2013, dated 21 November 2013, Ljubljana Higher Court Judgment and Order No. II Cp 800/2013, dated 12 June 2013, and Ljubljana District Court Judgment No. P 3103/2007-III, dated 11 January 2013, are abrogated. The case is remanded to the Ljubljana District Court for new adjudication.

Reasoning

A

1. By an action in civil proceedings filed on 10 October 2000, the complainant requested that the defendant (the Republic of Slovenia) pay compensation for non-pecuniary and pecuniary damage incurred due to his removal from the register of permanent residents and transfer into the register of foreigners. He was removed [from the register] after the decision of the Ministry of the Interior (hereinafter referred to as the MI), dated 2 August 1994, was served on him, by which his request to be granted Slovene citizenship was rejected, as granting him citizenship would allegedly constitute a threat to public order and the security of the state. The complainant initiated proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts against this decision of the MI; however, by Judgment No. U 1312/94-9, dated 6 February 1997, the Supreme Court dismissed his action. The complainant succeeded in his efforts to have the mentioned decisions abrogated when the Constitutional Court adopted Decision No. Up-187/97, dated 4 November 1999 (OdIUS VIII, 299), and in the repeated proceedings he was granted [Slovene] citizenship (by a decision of the MI dated 1 June 2000). Since he had to wait almost nine years to obtain a correct decision regarding his citizenship, in the subsequent action for damages he also claimed a violation of the right to a trial within a reasonable time. He alleged that he sustained pecuniary damage totalling SIT 7,885,529.70 (due to lost income from 24 March 1995 to 10 October 2000; due to having lost the right to an [ownership transformation] certificate; and due to the costs of administrative and judicial procedures). He assessed that his non-pecuniary damage amounts in total to SIT 16,835,897.00 (as a result of the psychological damage he suffered due to the defamation of his good name and reputation and as a result of the psychological damage he suffered due to the infringement of his personality rights). The court of first instance partly granted the claim for damages. It assessed that the defendant had acted unlawfully. It explained that the rejection of the application for citizenship had not been reasoned by citing specific conduct of the complainant that would substantiate the conclusion that he poses a threat to the security of the state; therefore, the decision of the MI was arbitrary, as was the Supreme Court decision upholding this decision, which did not take into account the then-established case law of the Constitutional Court. The court of first instance also stated that the complainant's right to a trial without undue delay was violated as well, as the procedure for granting him citizenship took an unreasonably long time. The court of first instance also established that the complainant's monetary claim had become partially time-barred. Due to the objection of the monetary claim being time-barred, it dismissed the claims for compensation for pecuniary damage stemming from the costs of procedures and the certificate, and partially also those stemming from lost income (until 10 October 1997). However, the court of first instance granted the complainant the remaining part of the claim for compensation for pecuniary damage (i.e. income lost from 10 October 1997 until the filing of the action in the amount of SIT 4,329,226.40). Due to the fact that the claim regarding the compensation for non-pecuniary damage for defamation (which happened as early as in 1996, when an official cut his identity card in half in front of everyone present and when he and his wife had to prove the existence of their marriage with two witnesses when he wanted to register her as the new owner of a vehicle) was time-barred, the court of first instance dismissed this claim as well. The court of first instance otherwise awarded compensation for the infringement of personality rights in the amount of SIT 5,000,000.00, but dismissed the remaining part of the claim that exceeded this amount. The total compensation awarded by the court of first instance to the complainant thus amounted to SIT 9,329,226.40.

2. Both parties filed appeals against the first instance judgment. The Higher Court partially granted the appeals of both parties to proceedings. It abrogated the judgment of first instance in the dismissed part regarding pecuniary damage (for income lost before 10 October 1997, for the certificate, and the costs [of the procedures]) and in the successful part regarding income lost in 2000 (amounting to SIT 1,122,392.04), whereas in the part referring to the decision on non-pecuniary damage (in both the dismissed part and in the successful part) and the remaining part of the awarded amount for pecuniary damage (income lost from 10 October 1997 until the end of 1999), it upheld the judgment. The Higher Court concurred with the position of the court of first instance that the defendant had acted unlawfully (i.e. that the application had been rejected arbitrarily and that the procedure had been unreasonably long) and that the claim for compensation for damage that arose before 10 October 1995 became time-barred (due to the absolute limitation period having expired), as did the claim for compensation for non-pecuniary damage due to defamation. On the other hand, the Higher Court adopted a different position with regard to the time-barring of the claim for compensation for the remaining damage. It assessed that the course of the relative limitation period must be assessed with regard to the circumstances of the concrete case, and accepted the allegation in the appeal that in the concrete case the complainant had only been informed who the perpetrator was when the decision of the MI of 1 June 2000 on the granting of citizenship was issued, as only then was his assumption confirmed that the previous two decisions on the rejection of his application had been substantively incorrect. Since the procedure was concluded when the last decision of the MI was issued, the complainant was only then able to find out how long the procedure had lasted.

3. Both parties to proceedings filed revisions against the judgment of the second instance. The Supreme Court partially granted the revision of the complainant, but rejected it with respect to the decision on the costs. The Supreme Court partially granted the revision of the defendant and partially modified the Higher Court Judgment, namely point 3 of the operative provisions, such that it granted the appeal of the defendant also with regard to the successful part of the judgment of the court of first instance in so far as it had not been abrogated, and also in this part dismissed the claim. The Supreme Court based its decision on the position that the injured party's knowledge of two circumstances is important with regard to the onset of the course of the relative limitation period regarding claims for damages: knowledge of the damage and knowledge of the perpetrator (the first paragraph of Article 376 of the Obligations Act, Official Gazette SFRY, Nos. 29/78, 39/85, and 57/89 – hereinafter referred to as the OA). Knowing the perpetrator does not entail knowing that he or she is liable or what the basis for his or her liability is, but refers to the person [as such] who caused damage. The position of the Supreme Court was that in the concrete case the legislation on the basis of which the removal of the complainant from the register of permanent residents was carried out and which the Constitutional Court established was inconsistent with the Constitution (the Aliens Act, Official Gazette RS, No. 1/91-I, etc. – hereinafter referred to as the AA, and the Act Regulating the Legal Status of Citizens of Former Yugoslavia Living in the Republic of Slovenia, Official Gazette RS, No. 76/10 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the ARLSCFY) did not prohibit such claims or otherwise insurmountably interfere with the complainant's right to judicially request the fulfilment of the obligation (Article 383 of the OA). The complainant should have filed the action before the limitation period expired, and in the proceedings the (in)appropriateness of the statutory regulation then in force and its (in)consistency with the Constitution would then also be assessed, if necessary.
4. The court of first instance had to decide anew on the part of the defendant's claim for damages that was abrogated by the mentioned Higher Court Judgment and remanded to the court of first instance for new adjudication. In the new trial it decided on the claim for compensation for pecuniary damage represented by the income lost in 2000, the value of the certificate that the citizens of the Republic of Slovenia received on the basis of the Ownership Transformation of Companies Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 55/92, 7/93, 31/93, and 1/96), and the costs of the administrative and judicial procedures incurred from 1994 to 1997. The court of first instance dismissed the claim in its entirety and decided that the complainant must reimburse the assessed costs of the defendant. It deemed that the claim made in the action dated 10 October 2000 was time-barred. The complainant filed an appeal against this judgment of the court of first instance. The Higher Court granted the appeal and abrogated the challenged judgment of the court of first instance in the part relating to the costs, and in this part remanded it to the court of first instance for new adjudication. In the remaining part, which it did not abrogate, it dismissed the appeal and upheld the judgment of the court of first instance. It adopted the position that the complainant's efforts to prove, in appellate proceedings, that the decision on the rejection of his application for citizenship was arbitrary, falls within the scope of efforts to limit damage and cannot have an influence on the assessment of the onset of the course of the limitation period. The alleged damage is a consequence of the rejection of the application for citizenship and the removal of the complainant from the register of permanent residents, which was a consequence thereof. This was the decisive circumstance for the assessment of when the limitation period began with regard to claiming compensation for the alleged damage. The complainant filed a motion for a revision of the Higher Court Judgment, which the Supreme Court rejected. In doing so, it referred to its position adopted in Judgment No. II Ips 11/2008, in accordance with which, with regard to claims for damages, the injured party's knowledge of two circumstances is crucial for [determining] the onset of the course of the relative limitation period: the damage and the perpetrator (the first paragraph of Article 376 of the OA). Knowing the perpetrator does not entail knowing that he or she is liable or what the basis for his or her liability is; it entails knowing [the identity of] the person who caused the damage. Since in the proceedings at issue also the courts of the first and second instance adopted such a position, the Supreme Court assessed that the complainant did not demonstrate the existence of the conditions for granting a revision.

5. The complainant alleges the violation of the rights determined by Articles 14, 18, 21, 22, 26, 34, 43, and 49 of the Constitution. He is opposed to the position and the reasons stated by the Supreme Court regarding the claim for damages being time-barred. He draws attention to the fact that it took the Supreme Court an unreasonably long time (no less than five years) to decide on the motion of the parties for a revision, with regard to which, according to the complainant, the reason for such lengthy revision proceedings was that the Supreme Court waited for the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR) to decide in the case Kurić and others v. Slovenia (judgment dated 26 June 2012). The complainant is indeed of the opinion that his position is substantially different than that of the [so-called] erased persons, but it is true that he suffered consequences similar to what they did. He explains that starting in 1976 he lived in various towns in Slovenia, namely as an officer of the Yugoslav People's Army, until 1990, when he was transferred to Samobor, Croatia. On 12 November 1991 he applied for Slovene citizenship, in conformity with Article 40 of the Citizenship of the Republic of Slovenia Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 1/91-I, 30/91-I, 38/92, and 13/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CRSA). Although he fulfilled all the statutory conditions, his application was rejected because granting him Slovene citizenship allegedly posed a threat to the security, defence, and public order of the state. Subsequently, in the repeated procedure, after he had received Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-187/97, by which the Supreme Court Judgment and the decision of the MI were annulled, the complainant was granted Slovene citizenship by a decision of the MI, dated 1 June 2000. By an action filed on 10 October 2000, the complainant claimed compensation from the state and was awarded (and also already received) compensation for non-pecuniary damage and compensation for lost income. By the challenged Judgment, No. II Ips 11/2008, dated 10 September 2012, the Supreme Court modified the Higher Court decision and dismissed the complainant's claim for damages in its entirety because it was time-barred. The complainant is firmly opposed to the position of the Supreme Court that the limitation period started already in 1994, when his application for citizenship was rejected with finality. Such a position of the Supreme Court allegedly places him in a position completely without rights and denies his constitutionally guaranteed right to compensation for damage. The complainant once again draws attention to the fact that his position should not be equated with the position of the so-called erased persons, because the latter justifiably expect, on the basis of the [above-mentioned] decision of the ECtHR, the adoption of a systemic solution in order to remedy the injustices that happened to them. The complainant, on the other hand, claimed damages from the state due to arbitrary decision-making in the procedure for acquiring citizenship, and his claim has already been decided on with finality. He is convinced that the position of the Higher Court adopted in Judgment No. II Cp 1428/2007 is correct. According to the Higher Court, the onset of the relative limitation period determined by the first paragraph of Article 376 of the OA must be assessed with regard to the circumstances of the concrete case. The complainant learned of the perpetrator of the damage only from the decision of the MI, dated 1 June 2000, i.e. this was when the prerequisites that enabled him to file a claim for damages were fulfilled. When the decision of the MI was issued on 1 June 2000 the complainant also learned of the damage incurred, however he had been subjected to violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms ever since 1994, when the decision rejecting his application for Slovene citizenship became final (this decision was, in fact, later abrogated). Due to the fact that the complainant could not have known, until the decision of the MI was issued on 1 June 2000, how long the situation in which his human rights and fundamental freedoms were violated would last, he also could not have known what the scope of the damage was. According to the complainant, the position of the Supreme Court regarding the [claim being] time-barred is not only substantively erroneous, but it also does not take into consideration the circumstances of the concrete case and excessively protects the state in relation to the citizen. The complainant stresses that immediately after he learned, i.e. proved, that the rejection of his application for citizenship was unlawful, he filed a claim for damages by which he claimed from the state compensation for the damage he had sustained. He underlines that he did not hesitate for a moment when invoking his rights, whereas the state, on the other hand, took almost nine years to decide whether to grant him citizenship, which were followed by another 12-year procedure for the payment of compensation. The complainant is convinced that his claim for damages did not become time-barred also with regard to the positions adopted in the ECtHR Judgment in Kurić and others v. Slovenia.

6. By Panel Order No. Up-1177/12, Up-89/14, dated 15 April 2014, the Constitutional Court decided that the constitutional complaints be accepted for consideration. In conformity with the first paragraph of Article 56 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 64/07 – official consolidated text and 109/12 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), it notified the Supreme Court thereof. In conformity with the second paragraph of Article 56 of the CCA, it sent the constitutional complaints to the opposing party in the civil proceedings, i.e. to the Republic of Slovenia, to reply thereto; the opposing party replied by a submission dated 8 May 2014. It stated that “it has no comments regarding the Panel Order of the Constitutional Court.” Otherwise, the defendant in the civil proceedings is of the opinion that since the Act Regulating Compensation for Damage Sustained as a Result of Removal from the Register of Permanent Residents (Official Gazette RS, No. 99/13 – hereinafter referred to as the ARCDSTRRR) entered into force, the complainant no longer has a legal interest to file his two constitutional complaints. It explained that the administrative procedure for granting citizenship was demanding and lengthy, with regard to which the complainant was granted citizenship on 1 June 2000. The opposing party dismissed the allegation that the civil proceedings for damages were lengthy and stated that the complainant had already been paid compensation on the basis of the judicial decision, which had become final (i.e. Ljubljana Higher Court Judgment No. II Cp 800/2013 in relation to Ljubljana District Court Judgment No. P 3103/2007-III, dated 11 January 2013), and that despite the Supreme Court Judgment, by which his claim for damages was dismissed, he did not reimburse the sum paid. Furthermore, the awarded compensation was allegedly higher than envisaged by the ARCDSTRRR. This is another reason why the defendant is of the opinion that the constitutional complaint is unfounded.
7. The reply of the defendant in the lawsuit was sent to the complainant, who responded thereto by a submission dated 30 May 2014. He dismissed the allegations of the defendant that he has no legal interest. He maintained that his position is essentially different from the position of the erased persons, as he claimed compensation for damage due to arbitrary decision-making in the procedure for acquiring citizenship, and his claim has already been decided on with finality. Also in other respects the complainant is convinced that the position of the Supreme Court that the claim is time-barred is incorrect, which allegedly follows from the Judgment of the Grand Chamber of the ECtHR in Kurić and others v. Slovenia. The act regulating the question of the compensation to which the erased persons are entitled was only adopted after the complainant's claim had already been decided on with finality, therefore it cannot have an influence on his legal interest. With regard to the alleged violation of Article 18 of the Constitution, the complainant explains that he did not allege physical torture; however, with respect to all that has been said, he was certainly subjected to psychological torture, as he was unable to leave the state (even to attend his mother's funeral and the funerals of other relatives), he was without a permanent residence, without work, without the right to vote, he was not socially insured; in fact, he could not benefit from the fundamental human rights and citizenship rights ensured by the Constitution and the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia. The complainant also opposes the allegation of the defendant that the administrative procedure was so demanding that it justified the nine years of uncertainty in which he lived. The complainant labels as inappropriate the connection made by the defendant between the complainant's allegations regarding the length of procedures and the fact that the compensation has already been paid to the complainant. This fact allegedly does not affect the proceedings before the Constitutional Court. The complainant is convinced that the judgments of the courts of first and second instance were just and also legally correct; however, he disagrees with the Supreme Court decision and thus challenges it by the constitutional complaint.

B – I

8. With regard to the doubt as to the legal interest of the complainant that the defendant in the lawsuit expressed in its submission dated 8 May 2014, it must be underlined that a favourable Constitutional Court decision would mean, for the complainant, an improvement in his legal position. In accordance with the transitional statutory provision (the first paragraph of Article 28 of the ARCDsRRR), the judicial proceedings for compensation for damage sustained as a result of removal from the register of permanent residents that were initiated before the same Act entered into force and which have not yet been decided on finally shall be concluded in conformity with the provisions of the Act (i.e. in conformity with the provisions of the ARCDsRRR). In the event of the abrogation of the challenged judgments and the case being remanded to the court of first instance for new adjudication, the court should take into account, when again assessing the complainant's claims for damages, the second paragraph of Article 11 of the ARCDsRRR, which determines that in proceedings initiated in accordance with this Act, the provisions regarding the time-barring of claims for damages from the act regulating obligation relations do not apply. Since the challenged judgments refer to the [above-mentioned] position regarding the time-barring of claims for damages, the legal position of the complainant would improve in this respect were the constitutional complaint to be granted. Therefore, the Constitutional Court deems that the procedural prerequisite of legal interest is fulfilled.

B – II

9. One of the main allegations of the complainant is that the Supreme Court Judgment No. II Ips 11/2008 (which is challenged by the first constitutional complaint) is based on positions that are not acceptable from the viewpoint of the right to compensation determined by Article 26 of the Constitution. The complainant is firmly opposed to the position of the Supreme Court that his claims for damages are time-barred, in particular the position that the limitation period began already in 1994 when his application for citizenship was rejected and the relevant decision became final.<sup>1</sup> Such position of the Supreme Court allegedly placed the complainant in a position completely without rights and denied him the constitutionally guaranteed right to compensation for damage. In his opinion, the correct position is that of the Higher Court (adopted in Judgment No. II Cp 1428/2007), in accordance with which the course of the relative limitation period determined by the first paragraph of Article 376 of the OA must be assessed with respect to the circumstances of the individual case and that in the case at issue the complainant learned of the perpetrator of the damage only from the Decision of the MI dated 1 June 2000, meaning that only then were the prerequisites that enabled him to claim compensation for damage fulfilled.
10. In two cases the Constitutional Court has already assessed decisions of civil courts related to the liability of the state for removal from the register of permanent residents. By Order No. Up-1176/09, dated 5 July 2011, a Constitutional Court panel decided that the constitutional complaint filed against the decision of the courts to dismiss claims for damages by which the complainant claimed, from the Republic of Slovenia, the payment of compensation for pecuniary damage resulting from the fact that from the time he was removed from the register of permanent residents he had been unable to work, and due to the fact that his application for citizenship had been unjustifiably rejected, and [the payment of compensation] for non-pecuniary damage consisting of the psychological damage he suffered due to the lengthy procedure and lengthy unemployment, when he had no means of subsistence. The Constitutional Court adopted a similar decision in case No. Up-108/11. A Constitutional Court panel decided, by Order No. Up-108/11, dated 26 September 2011, that the constitutional complaint by which the complainant challenged the decision of the courts to dismiss his claims for compensation for pecuniary and non-pecuniary damage caused by his removal from the register of permanent residents would not be accepted for consideration. In both of the mentioned cases the Constitutional Court considered the allegations of the complainants in particular from the viewpoint of the constitutional procedural guarantees ensured by Article 22 of the Constitution

---

1 On 12 November 1991, the complainant applied, in conformity with Article 40 of the CRSA, for Slovene citizenship. His application was rejected by a decision of the MI, dated 2 August 1994, although he fulfilled all the conditions determined by the first paragraph of Article 40 of the CRSA, because, according to the findings of the administrative authorities at the time, the complainant allegedly posed a threat to the security, defence, and public order of the state. Also the Supreme Court upheld such decision, which then remained in force until Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-187/97 was adopted. By a decision of the administrative unit dated 1 June 2000, the complainant was finally granted Slovene citizenship.

(i.e. from the viewpoint of the requirement of a reasoned judicial decision and the prohibition of arbitrary decision-making by the courts).

11. In the mentioned cases, the Constitutional Court did not consider the positions of the court from the viewpoint of the right to compensation for damage guaranteed by Article 26 of the Constitution. However, the allegations of the complainant in the case at issue do require an assessment from the viewpoint of the mentioned human right. In conformity with the established constitutional case law, there is a violation of the right determined by Article 26 of the Constitution when a court bases its decision on a certain legal position that from the viewpoint of this right would be unacceptable.<sup>2</sup> Therefore, the Constitutional Court must verify whether the challenged decision is based on positions that are not acceptable from the viewpoint of the right to compensation for damage determined by Article 26 of the Constitution.
12. In conformity with the first paragraph of Article 26 of the Constitution, everyone has the right to compensation for damage caused through unlawful actions in connection with the performance of any function or other activity by a person or authority performing such function or activity within a state or local community authority or as a bearer of public authority. From this human right there follows, primarily, the general prohibition of exercising authority in an unlawful manner, regardless of which branch of power caused the damage.<sup>3</sup> The essence of the right to compensation for damage is to ensure compensatory protection from unlawful actions by the state power. In conformity with the first paragraph of Article 26 of the Constitution, the basis of this liability is (1) an unlawful action of a state authority, a local community authority, or a bearer of public authority, with regard to which what is at issue is (2) an action when exercising such authority or in connection with the exercise thereof, a consequence of which is (3) damage.
13. There is an established position in the constitutional case law that the forms of unlawful conduct by the state include its liability for omissions that refer to a certain defined or definable person, as well as liability for systemic deficiencies that can be attributed to the state or its apparatus as such (this is stated in Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-695/11). An interpretation in accordance with which the state would only be liable for those forms of unlawful conduct that can be attributed to a certain person or authority in connection with the performance of any function or other activity within a state or local community authority or as a bearer of public authority would namely be unacceptable from the viewpoint of the first paragraph of Article 26 of the Constitution. This would namely mean that the state would not be liable for unlawful conduct that cannot be attributed to a certain person or a certain authority, but [can only be attributed] to the state or its apparatus as such, and also not in cases where there is no individualised relation between the bearer of authority and the affected individual.<sup>4</sup>

2 Cf. Order of the Constitutional Court No. Up-2/04, dated 4 May 2005 (OdUS XIV, 46) and Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-695/11, dated 10 January 2013 (Official Gazette RS, No. 9/13).

3 Cf. J. Zobec, Odškodninska odgovornost sodnika in odgovornost države zanj [Liability of a Judge for Damage and the Liability of the State for such Judge], Pravni letopis 2013 [Legal Chronicle 2013], p. 201.

4 One such instance was a case in which ensuring a trial without undue delay was not merely a responsibility

14. When assessing the content and the scope of the right guaranteed by Article 26 of the Constitution, one must take into account that the liability of the state for damage caused by state authorities, employees, and officials when exercising authority entails a specific form of liability. The specificity of this right follows from a particular position of the state vis-à-vis entities (citizens, legal entities, and also other persons situated on its territory). The state enters such legal relation vertically, i.e. when exercising authority or in connection with the exercise thereof, with regard to which it is bound by the constitutional prohibition of unlawful authoritative conduct.<sup>5</sup> By instituting the liability of the state for damage, affected individuals are protected against the occurrence of damage resulting from the authoritative conduct of [state] authorities.<sup>6</sup> The state is liable for damage caused when exercising the function of authority or in relation to its exercise, i.e. for ex iure imperii conduct.<sup>7</sup> With regard to the above, it is evident that in order to assess the liability of the state for damage, the classic rules of vicarious civil liability for damage do not suffice; when assessing individual prerequisites of the liability of the state, the mentioned specificities that originate from the authoritative nature of the functioning of its authorities must be taken into consideration (this is stated in Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-679/12, dated 16 October 2014, Official Gazette RS, No. 81/14). Even if a court applies, when assessing [the liability of the state], certain rules of the general law of obligations, it must apply them in a manner adapted to the characteristics of liability for damage under public law.
15. In a number of decisions the Constitutional Court has adopted a position on the violations of the human rights and fundamental freedoms of persons removed from the register of permanent residents when the legislation enabling independence was adopted.<sup>8</sup> It follows from these decisions that erased persons as citizens of the former

---

of the courts, but of all three branches of power, i.e. including the executive, in particular through the organisation of the judicial administration, as well as the legislative administration through the adoption of appropriate legislation. Cf. Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-695/11, Paragraph 13 of the reasoning.

5 This is stated by J. Zobec, op. cit., pp. 185–228.

6 This is stated by I. Crnić, Odgovornost države za štetu, Pravo u gospodarstvu, Zagreb, 1–2 (1996), p. 117.

7 Cf. R. Pirnat, Protipravnost ravnanja javnih oblasti kot element odškodninske odgovornosti javnih oblasti oblasti [The Unlawfulness of the Conduct of Public Authorities as an Element of the Liability of Public Authorities for Damage], an article published in proceedings entitled Odgovornost države, lokalnih skupnosti in drugih nosilcev javnih pooblastil za ravnanje svojih organov in uslužbenecv [The Liability of the State, Local Communities, and Other Bearers of Public Authority for the Conduct of Their Authorities and Officials], Zbornik Inštituta za primerjalno pravo [Proceedings of the Institute for Comparative Law], III. dnevi civilnega prava [3rd Civil Law Days], Ljubljana 2005, p. 21.

8 Firstly, the Constitutional Court established, by Decision No. U-I-284/94, dated 4 February 1999 (Official Gazette RS, No. 14/99, and OdlUS VIII, 22), that the AA was inconsistent with the Constitution, because it did not determine the conditions for obtaining permanent residence permits for the citizens of other republics of the former SFRY who did not opt for citizenship of the Republic of Slovenia or whose applications for citizenship were rejected. By Decision No. U-I-246/02, dated 3 April 2003 (Official Gazette RS, No. 36/03, and OdlUS XII, 24), the Constitutional Court established the unconstitutionality of the ARLSCFY because it did not allow the citizens of other republics of the former SFRY who on 26 February 1992 were removed from the register of permanent residents and who obtained a residence permit in conformity with the ARLSCFY

Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (hereinafter referred to as the SFRY) were treated unequally compared to other foreigners who had lived in Slovenia before its independence and whose permanent residence permits remained valid in conformity with Article 82 of the AA. In order to remedy the established unconstitutionality, in 2010 the legislature adopted the Act Amending the Act Regulating the Legal Status of Citizens of Former Yugoslavia Living in the Republic of Slovenia (Official Gazette RS, No. 50/10 – ARLSCFY-B). By this Act, the legislature strived to allow erased persons to obtain a legal status by obtaining a permanent residence permit under milder conditions than those set forth by the AA, and also to enable the issuance of special decisions by which their legal status would be recognised ex tunc. As the Constitutional Court established by Decision No. U-II-1/10, dated 10 June 2010 (Official Gazette RS, No. 50/10, and OdlUS XIX, 11), by [adopting] a special regulation regarding the issuance of permanent residence permits and by ex tunc recognition of actual residence, the legislature provided moral satisfaction as a special form of remedying the consequences of the violations of human rights that occurred due to removal from the register of permanent residence. In such a manner it accomplished the task imposed on it by the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution. The Constitutional Court already at that time warned that the question of the liability of the state for damage determined by Article 26 of the Constitution could be raised in cases when damage was caused to individuals due to their removal from the register of permanent residence because they were deprived of the rights that are conditional upon permanent residence in the Republic of Slovenia.

16. In the case Kurić and others v. Slovenia, the Grand Chamber of the ECtHR decided that the recognition of violations of human rights and the issuance of permanent residence permits to erased persons are not sufficient measures to remedy the injustices [that occurred] on the national level. Taking into account the long period during which the complainants suffered because they were in jeopardy and in legal uncertainty, and with respect to the gravity of the consequences that the removal caused them, the Grand Chamber of the ECtHR adopted the position that such recognition of a violation of human rights and the issuance of permanent residence permits to the complainants are not appropriate and sufficient measures to remedy the injustices [that occurred] on the national level. The ECtHR established that the complainants were not awarded appropriate monetary compensation for the years to also obtain a permanent residence permit ex tunc; because it did not regulate the position of those persons against whom the measure of the forced removal of an alien from the state was imposed; and because it did not determine the criteria for defining the condition of actual residence [necessary] for obtaining a permanent residence permit. Furthermore, in a number of concrete proceedings in which erased persons endeavoured to obtain the restitution of rights related to their lost permanent residence, the Constitutional Court also decided in favour of the erased persons (see Decisions of the Constitutional Court No. Up-336/98, dated 20 September 2001 (Official Gazette RS, No. 79/01, and OdlUS X, 225); No. Up-333/96, dated 1 July 1999 (OdlUS VIII, 286); No. Up-60/97, dated 15 July 1999 (OdlUS VIII, 292); No. Up-20/97, dated 18 November 1999 (OdlUS VIII, 300); No. Up-152/97, dated 16 December 1999 (OdlUS VIII, 302); and No. Up-211/04, dated 2 March 2006 (Official Gazette RS, No. 28/06, and OdlUS XV, 40)).

---

when they were vulnerable and exposed to legal uncertainty. With regard to the possibility that they would claim and be awarded compensation on the national level, the ECtHR established that none of the erased persons received satisfaction for the damage sustained in the form of a final and binding judgment, although several proceedings were pending. The State Attorney's Office also did not grant any of the complainants' claims for compensation. The ECtHR deemed that their chances of receiving compensation in the Republic of Slovenia were too remote to possibly influence the assessment of that concrete case. It assessed that the facts of that case unveiled the deficiencies of the Slovene legal order, a consequence of which is that the entire group of erased persons was still denied the right to compensation due to violations of their fundamental rights.<sup>9</sup>

17. The positions of the ECtHR regarding the application of the rules on time-barring are also important for the assessment of the case at issue. These rules determine that due to the expiration of a time limit, the creditor loses the right to judicial protection of his or her rights.<sup>10</sup> The creditor must namely not be passive and must promptly [request] protection of his or her rights; however, on the other hand, in a certain moment it is necessary to ensure that the legal relation is regulated definitively. The ECtHR has emphasised in a number of judgments that the existence of limitation periods is by itself not incompatible with the European Convention on Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECHR). The institute of time-barring namely pursues multiple legitimate aims: primarily, it is intended to ensure legal certainty and to determine a time limit for judicial invocation of claims, which serves to protect the creditor against the invocation of time-barred claims. In addition, the limitation period prevents the court from adopting decisions on events that occurred in the too distant past and with regard to which there no longer exist sufficient and reliable evidence. However, the task of the court is to establish, in each individual case, whether the application of rules on time-barring, taking into account the nature of the limitation period, is compatible with the requirements under the ECHR.<sup>11</sup> Too rigid application of limitation periods, where the court does not take into account the circumstances of the concrete case, can namely entail an inadmissible interfer-

---

9 The Grand Chamber of the ECtHR based the Judgment in the same case, dated 12 March 2014, on similar positions, by which it further decided on the amount of the compensation for pecuniary damage. In paragraph 18 of the reasoning of the Judgment dated 12 March 2014, the ECtHR emphasised the importance of Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-695/11 for the assessment of the liability of the state for damage in conformity with Article 26 of the Constitution, in particular [the importance of] the position that this Article of the Constitution cannot be interpreted narrowly and that there can exist liability of the state for unlawful conduct that cannot be attributed to an individual or a certain authority that falls within the competence of the state, but to the state itself. According to the Grand Chamber of the ECtHR, that Decision of the Constitutional Court is important for the implementation of the main judgment in that case.

10 For more detail, see S. Cigoj, Teorija obligacij, Splošni del obligacijskega prava [Theory of Obligations, The General Part of the Law of Obligations], Časopisni zavod Uradni list SR Slovenije, Ljubljana 1989, pp. 406 et seq.

11 Cf. Judgments of the ECtHR in Stubbings and Others v. the United Kingdom, dated 22 October 1996; Stagno v. Belgium, dated 7 July 2009; and Howald Moor and Others v. Switzerland, dated 11 March 2014.

ence with the right of access to the court, if it renders the application of an available legal remedy disproportionately difficult for the party or if it prevents the party from applying it. The application of limitation periods and preclusive time limits must not be such as to prevent the effective protection of rights.<sup>12</sup> Otherwise, such can result in an interference with the party's right of access to the court, which is not proportionate to the purpose of ensuring legal certainty and the just conduct of proceedings.<sup>13</sup>

B – III

Decision on the first constitutional complaint

18. The Constitutional Court must assess, by taking into consideration the constitutional dimension and the aspect of the ECHR regarding the dilemma at issue, whether the (restrictive) interpretation and application of rules on time-barring by which the Supreme Court reasoned the decision on the rejection of the complainant's claims for damages entail an excessive interference with the right guaranteed by Article 26 of the Constitution.<sup>14</sup> Such consideration follows from the supposition that the court's decision-making on the liability of the state for damage for ex iure imperii conduct requires an appropriate adaptation of the classic civil law institutes (i.e., in the case at issue, rules regarding time-barring) to the particularities that follow from the public law nature of the liability of the state for damage. The purpose of the Constitution is not to merely formally and theoretically recognise human rights; it is namely a constitutional requirement that the possibility of the effective and actual exercise of human rights be ensured.<sup>15</sup> Therefore, the key question for assessing the case at issue is whether due to the position of the Supreme Court regarding the time-barring it was

-
- 12 This is precisely what happened, according to the ECtHR, in the case Howald Moor and Others v. Switzerland, in which the Swiss courts decided that the limitation period and the preclusive time limit began already when the plaintiff was exposed to asbestos (the day the damage occurred), regardless of the scientific finding that the illness at issue is, as a general rule, latent for a long period of time, meaning that when the damage arises (the deterioration of health and the related pain and trouble), the limitation period has, as a general rule, already expired. In such circumstances, the court should have taken into consideration, when calculating the limitation period, that the injured party was unable to be aware of his illness sooner and that, consequently, he was not able to file an action. The ECtHR thus established a violation of Article 6 of the ECHR and awarded the applicants (the plaintiff's heirs) damages and the costs of proceedings.
- 13 Cf. the Judgment of the ECtHR in Stagno v. Belgium. In that case, the ECtHR assessed that overly strict application of the rules regarding time-barring by Belgian courts, which had not taken into account the special circumstances of the case, prevented the applicants from using the available legal remedy.
- 14 By the positions adopted in the challenged Judgment No. II Ips 11/2008, the Supreme Court set the course of case law with regard to the assessment of claims for damages of erased persons. As can be seen from the IUS-INFO legal database, the Supreme Court regularly refers thereto (e.g. in cases No. II Ips 137/2010, dated 10 September 2012; No. II Ips 1017/2008, dated 10 September 2012; No. II Ips 1202/2008, dated 10 September 2012; No. II Ips 360/2010, dated 27 September 2012; No. II Ips 635/2009, dated 1 October 2012; No. II Ips 304/2009, dated 18 October 2012; No. II Ips 70/2010, dated 8 November 2012; No. II Ips 99/2011, dated 15 November 2012; No. II Ips 449/2010, dated 7 November 2013; No. II DoR 269/2013, dated 21 November 2013; and No. II Ips 129/2013, dated 19 December 2013).
- 15 Cf. Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-275/97, dated 16 July 1998 (OdlUS VII, 231).

made disproportionately difficult for the complainant to effectively invoke, in an action for damages, the right to compensation for damage due to the alleged unlawful action of the state. The assessment regarding the acceptability of the position regarding time-barring in the case at issue depends, to a significant extent, on the question of whether the Supreme Court appropriately assessed the specific circumstances that erased persons and, among them, also the complainant were in, i.e. by taking into consideration the positions of the Constitutional Court regarding the specific position of erased persons and the positions expressed in the Judgment of the Grand Chamber of the ECtHR in the Kurić and others v. Slovenia case.

19. At the beginning of its reasoning, the Supreme Court correctly stated that damage caused by the state and its authorities while exercising authority does not give rise to classic liability, but to a special type of liability that exists as the protection everyone enjoys from potential damage caused by the state by its unlawful actions, and that the liability of the state in such cases falls within public law. However, the remainder of the reasoning of the challenged judgment does not reflect that the Supreme Court adapted the assessment of the case at issue to the public law nature of the liability of the state, in particular also considering the special position of erased persons such as follows from the decisions of the Constitutional Court and the ECtHR. The Supreme Court proceeded from the position that the injured party's knowledge of two circumstances is important with regard to the course of the relative limitation period regarding claims for damages: knowledge of damage and of the perpetrator (the first paragraph of Article 376 of the OA). Knowledge of the perpetrator includes knowledge of the conduct of this person in the real world, but not also a legal assessment (i.e. of the unlawfulness) of the perpetrator's conduct. It is therefore the plaintiff who carries the risk that the assessment that the perceived damaging conduct of the defendant is unlawful will [perhaps not] be made promptly. Therefore, in the opinion of the Supreme Court, the decision of the MI dated 1 June 2000 is not relevant for the time-barring in the case at issue. According to the Supreme Court, the final rejection of the complainant's application for citizenship of the Republic of Slovenia in 1994 and his removal from the register of permanent residents that occurred at that time were the legally relevant grounds for awarding non-pecuniary damages for the infringement of personality rights. In the assessment of the Supreme Court, the complainant has suffered psychological damage ever since, because he could not be employed and could not buy the apartment [he had been residing in], because he did not have health and social insurance, because he had no right to vote, and because he lived in very difficult material conditions, people ignored him, and he was humiliated, all of which was reflected in his psyche. The Supreme Court thus concurred with the court of first instance that the complainant had known for more than three years before filing the action who the perpetrator of the damage was and he was certainly aware of the damage while it was happening. According to the Supreme Court, the position of the Higher Court is erroneous, namely that the three-year limitation period could only start when the decision of the MI on granting citizenship, dated 1 June 2000, was adopted and that only then was the complainant's assumption confirmed that there were no reasons for refusing to grant him citizenship, i.e. that the previous decision on that matter was substantively erroneous, while at the same time he also discovered how long the procedure had lasted.

20. The courts could also have taken the circumstances of the complainant – due to the fact that he was removed from the register of permanent residents – as a basis for suspending the course of the period of limitation (Article 383 of the OA and Article 360 of the Code of Obligations, Official Gazette RS, No. 97/07 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the CO).<sup>16</sup> The term insurmountable obstacles concerns a legal standard that has to be filled in by the court in every concrete case. It denotes obstacles that actually prevent the creditor from judicially requesting the fulfilment of the obligation.<sup>17</sup> Already the described course of decision-making with regard to obtaining citizenship in the concrete case reflects the obstacles that the complainant was faced with when the authorities in power decided on his case. In addition to these circumstances, which are specific to the complainant's case, also the broader context has to be taken into consideration, in particular the fact that despite the decisions of the Constitutional Court, the state (via the executive and legislative branches of power) delayed, for a number of years, the remedying of the consequences of the violations of human rights that erased persons were victims of.<sup>18</sup> It also follows from the Judgment of the Grand Chamber of the ECtHR in Kurić and others v. Slovenia that the existing legal regulation denied erased persons access to [obtaining] compensation for violations of their fundamental human rights. In such circumstances, the possibility of erased persons filing claims for damages against the state was merely hypothetical, i.e. without any real chance of success.
21. The Supreme Court rejected the possibility of applying the institute of time-barring by substantiating that the existing legislation (i.e. the AA and the ARLSCFY) did not prohibit filing claims for damages, nor did it otherwise insurmountably interfere with the complainant's right to judicially request the fulfilment of the obligation (Article 383 of the OA). According to the position of the Supreme Court, not even the legislation on which the removal of the complainant from the register of permanent residents was based, and which the Constitutional Court established was inconsistent with the Constitution, allows a different interpretation of time-barring. The Supreme Court concluded its assessment with the finding that there does not (yet) exist a legal basis that in the circumstances of the case at issue would allow the complainant to succeed despite the defendant's objection to the time-barring. However, such reasoning of the Supreme Court is not acceptable from the viewpoint of the constitutional duty of a court, in the event it considers the statutory provision that it has to apply in a concrete case to be unconstitutional, to stay the proceedings and initiate proceedings before the Constitutional Court (Article 156 of the Constitution), whereas otherwise it must (within the limits of the methods of interpretation that are established in the legal field) find a constitutionally consistent interpretation of the statutory norm.<sup>19</sup> Also from the Judgment of the ECtHR in Kurić and others v. Slovenia there followed the duty of the court to interpret the statutory regulation on which the decision was based in a manner that is not contrary to the reasons the ECtHR adopted in that judgment. If the Supreme Court assessed that within the framework of the statutory regulation in force no interpretation was possible that would be consistent with the requirements under the Constitution and the ECHR, it should have stayed the proceedings and initiated proceedings for a review of the constitutionality of the statutory regulation before the Constitutional Court (Article 156 of the Constitution), which it did not do.

16 Article 383 of the OA read as follows: The limitation period shall not run while the creditor is unable to judicially request the fulfilment of the obligation due to insurmountable obstacles. The same wording is included in Article 360 of the CO.

17 Among the reasons for the suspension of the period of limitation (impedimentum praescriptionis) one can find, in particular, the absolute or relative impossibility to invoke a claim, as well as instances where the invocation of a claim is rendered difficult in practice or is inappropriate due to a special mutual relation between the two parties (a relation of dependence). Such is stated by S. Cigoj, op. cit., pp. 407 and 412.

18 The unresponsiveness of the competent authorities in power entailed disrespect for the decisions of the Constitutional Court and thus a violation of Article 2 and of the second sentence of the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution, which is what the Constitutional Court has drawn attention to in its annual reports ever since 2003.

22. According to the Supreme Court, "it is not correct to look for an impediment against time-barring in the fact that the administrative decision on the rejection of the plaintiff's application for citizenship was valid at the time, as before it was annulled there was no impediment to the plaintiff's claim for damages." Allegedly, already in the proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts initiated against the mentioned administrative decision the complainant had the possibility to claim compensation for damage caused by the execution of the challenged act (Article 11, the second paragraph of Article 27, and the fourth paragraph of Article 42 of the Act Regulating Proceedings for the Judicial Review of Administrative Acts, Official Gazette SFRY, No. 4/77, etc.). Such position presupposes that already when he was invoking his primary legal protection (i.e. during the administrative procedure in which he strove to obtain citizenship), the complainant should also have filed claims for damages against the state. However, it is not realistic to expect that an individual requesting that the state grant him [a certain] legal status (e.g. a citizenship) would at the same time claim compensatory protection against the state.<sup>20</sup> Such position only represents a hypothetical

---

19 This is what the Constitutional Court stated in Decision No. U-I-83/11, Up-938/10, dated 8 November 2012 (Official Gazette RS, No. 95/12), Paragraph 13 of the reasoning.

20 In German case law, a rule was formed within the context of the assessment of the liability of the state for damage (which is based on Article 34 of the German Constitution [i.e. Grundgesetz], whereby the assessment of such liability in fact leans on the civil law institutes of liability for damage, in particular on Article 839 of the Civil Code – BGB) that in the event an individual invokes his or her primary legal protection (e.g. in proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts he or she requests that an unlawful legal act be abrogated or annulled), the course of the limitation period is interrupted (Verjährungsunterbrechung durch Ergreifung des Primärrechtsschutzes) with regard to possible claims for damages. The provisions regarding time-barring from the BGB were substantially amended when the Act Modernising the Law of Obligations Act (Gesetz zur Modernisierung des Schuldrechts, dated 26 November 2001) entered into force on 1 January 2002. Following this possibility for the complainant to claim compensatory protection against the state, which is not compatible with the requirements of the Constitutional Court and the ECtHR regarding effective and actual exercise of human rights.

23. With regard to the above, the position of the Supreme Court regarding the time-barring of claims for damages turns out to be unacceptable already from the viewpoint of the general requirement that, with respect to the circumstances of the individual case, the court must apply the rules regarding limitation periods in such a manner that the filing of claims available to a party is not rendered disproportionately difficult or even prevented [altogether]. In the case at issue, the Supreme Court imposed, by its rigid interpretation of the rules regarding time-barring, a disproportionate burden on the complainant with regard to the invocation of the right to compensation for damage guaranteed by Article 26 of the Constitution. The Supreme Court had certain leeway for interpretation of the statutory regulation that served as the basis for deciding, within the framework of which it could have enabled the complainant effective invocation of compensatory protection against the state. With regard to the special circumstances that accompanied the removal of persons from the register of permanent residents, and the fact that the state postponed the matter for a number of years before definitively regulating their position, the position of the Supreme Court regarding the time-barring of the complainant's claims for damages is not acceptable.
24. The Constitutional Court assesses that by its interpretation of the rules regarding time-barring, the Supreme Court rendered it disproportionately difficult for the complainant to effectively invoke the right to compensation for damage against the state (Article 26 of the Constitution), namely damage caused by his removal from the register of permanent residents, or [even] prevented him from doing so. For such reason, the Constitutional Court abrogated the challenged judgment and remanded the case to the Supreme Court for new adjudication (point 1 of the operative provisions). When deciding anew, the Supreme Court will have to take into consideration the reasons stated in this Decision, in particular also the fact that the case at issue concerns public law liability for damage that requires an adapted application of the criteria for assessing the liability of the defendant for damage, in particular due to the special circumstances which erased persons were in, including the complainant.
25. Since the Constitutional Court abrogated the challenged judgment due to the established violation of the right determined by Article 26 of the Constitution, it did not assess the other alleged violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

---

statutory amendment, the rules on the suspension of the limitation period (Hemmung der Verjährung) are applicable for the majority of the states of the facts that previously were the basis for an interruption of the course of the limitation period. In such manner, the position from the case law on the interruption of the limitation period due to the invocation of primary legal protection (e.g. filing an action for annulment in proceedings for a judicial review of administrative acts) is still being applied, however, now [such a situation] is deemed to be grounds for a suspension of the course of the limitation period. This is stated by F. Ossenbühl and M. Cornils, Staatshaftungsrecht, 6th Edition, Verlag C. H. Beck, Munich 2013, p. 110. The same is also stated by T. Maunz and G. Dürig (Ed.), Grundgesetz, Kommentar – Art. 34, Verlag C. H. Beck, Munich 2009, p. 117.

B – IV

Decision on the second constitutional complaint

26. The judicial decisions challenged in case No. Up-89/14 are based on substantively the same reasons and the same positions regarding the time-barring of the complainant's claim for damages as the Supreme Court Judgment mentioned in point 1 of the operative provisions. In the repeated proceedings, the court decided anew on the claim for compensation for pecuniary damage amounting to EUR 19,523.84. By taking into consideration the positions the Supreme Court adopted in Decision No. II Ips 11/2008 and the fact that the complainant's application for citizenship was rejected with finality by a decision dated 2 August 1994, the Higher Court adopted the position that the claim filed on 10 October 2000 was time-barred. The Higher Court did not accept the complainant's position that the limitation period started when he received, on 1 June 2000, the decision of the MI. In doing so, it referred to the position of the Supreme Court that what is decisive for the onset of the course of the limitation period is the injured party's knowledge of the conduct of the perpetrator in practice and not knowledge of the legal assessment (i.e. of the unlawfulness) of the perpetrator's conduct. It explained that the complainant's efforts to prove, in legal remedy proceedings, the arbitrariness of the decision rejecting his application for citizenship falls within the scope of efforts to limit damage and cannot have an influence on the assessment regarding the onset of the course of the limitation period. By referring to its own positions adopted in Judgment No. II Ips 11/2008, the Supreme Court dismissed the complainant's motion to grant a revision.
27. The judicial decisions challenged by the second constitutional complaint are based on substantively the same positions that the Constitutional Court established entail a disproportionate interference with the complainant's right to compensation determined by Article 26 of the Constitution. Therefore, the Constitutional Court also abrogated the judicial decisions stated in point 2 of the operative provisions and remanded the case to the court of first instance for new adjudication.

C

- 28 The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 59 of the CCA, composed of: Mag. Miroslav Mozetič, President, and Judges Dr Mitja Deisinger, Dr Etelka Korpič – Horvat, Jasna Pogačar, Dr Jadranka Sovdat, and Jan Zobec. The decision was reached unanimously.

Mag. Miroslav Mozetič
President

Decision No. Up-879/14, dated 20 April 2015

DECISION

At a session held on 20 April 2015 in proceedings to decide on the constitutional complaint of Ivan Janez Janša, Velenje, represented by the law firm Odvetniška družba Matoz, o. p., d. o. o., Koper, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. Supreme Court Judgment No. I Ips 2457/2010, dated 1 October 2014, Ljubljana Higher Court Judgment No. II Kp 2457/2010, dated 21 March 2014, and Ljubljana Local Court Judgment No. II K 2457/2010, dated 5 June 2013, are abrogated insofar as they refer to Ivan Janša.
2. The case is remanded to a different judge of the Ljubljana Local Court for new adjudication.

Reasoning

A

1. The Ljubljana Local Court found the complainant guilty of the commission of the criminal offence of accepting a gift for unlawful intervention under the first paragraph of Article 269 of the Criminal Code (Official Gazette RS, No. 95/04 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the CC) in conjunction with Article 25 of the CC. It sentenced him to two years in prison and imposed an accessory penalty of a fine in the amount of EUR 37,000.00, and required him to pay the costs of the criminal proceedings and the court fee. The Higher Court dismissed the appeal of the complainant's defence counsels. The complainant's defence counsels filed a request for the protection of legality against the final judgment that was dismissed by the Supreme Court.
2. The complainant alleges violations of the rights determined by Article 22, the first paragraph of Article 23, Article 27, the first paragraph of Article 28, and Article 29 of the Constitution, as well as Article 6 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR).

3. The complainant alleges a violation of the right to independent and impartial proceedings determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution due to the fact that his requests to disqualify Local Court Judge Barbara Klajnšek and Supreme Court Judges Branko Masleša and Maja Tratnik [from adjudication] were not granted. He emphasises that in this highly sensitive and politically charged case every reasonable doubt should have been excluded as to whether in the given circumstances the courts adjudicated impartially and the judges should have exercised even greater care and protected the aspect of impartial proceedings, which requires the courts to ensure the external appearance of impartial adjudication (i.e. the objective aspect of the right determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution). The complainant particularly criticises the conduct of Supreme Court Judge Branko Masleša. He claims that the latter raised doubts about his impartiality with his speech at the Days of the Slovene Judiciary on 6 June 2014, and therefore he should have been disqualified [from adjudication]. The complainant further alleges a violation of Article 23 of the Constitution due to the fact that, after the time at which the complainant's request for legal protection was to be considered became known, President Branko Masleša adopted the decision that he would be presiding over all sessions of the criminal law panel until the end of 2014, namely also in the complainant's case. By such conduct, he allegedly selected the case in which he was to decide, even though the case was already being considered, and therefore he was acquainted with its subject matter as well as the parties to the proceedings, and consequently also the complainant's right to a duly appointed judge was allegedly violated. The complainant alleges that with regard to Supreme Court Judge Branko Masleša there existed not only objective but also subjective reasons that cast doubt on his impartiality. From the perspective of the possible influence of the court, objective circumstances could have allegedly created the appearance that not every reasonable doubt regarding the impartiality of the court's adjudication was excluded. In the complainant's assessment, such circumstances also existed with regard to Supreme Court Judge Maja Tratnik.
4. The complainant further alleges a violation of the principle of legality stemming from the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution from several perspectives. He initially states that the abstract definition of the criminal offence under the first paragraph of Article 269 of the CC is contrary to the requirement of the certainty of laws (lex certa) and therefore it opens the door for violations of the rights of individuals who trust that their rights, legal interests, and obligations will not be decided on in an arbitrary manner. The complainant further alleges that the statutory elements of the criminal offence of accepting a gift for unlawful intervention under the first paragraph of Article 269 of the CC do not follow from its description, and the described conduct also did not result in an unlawful state of the facts as the required unlawful consequence. The abstract description of the alleged criminal offence in the operative provisions of the first instance judgment is allegedly already incomprehensible and internally contradictory, and the statutory elements of the criminal offence are allegedly not concretised and described in the concrete part of its description. In the complainant's opinion, it is not stated how and in what manner he allegedly fulfilled the statutory element of "acceptance of the promise", but the statutory text from the abstract part of the description is simply reiterated in its concrete part and thus an essential element of the criminal offence is missing. The description of the act as a past event allegedly also does not contain the decisive facts that would concretise the alleged criminal offence. Thus, allegedly, neither the time nor the place of the commission of the criminal offence were stated. Allegedly, even if all the statements regarding facts alleged in the act of indictment were true, a conviction could not follow from such facts, and therefore the court was even barred from initiating criminal proceedings against the complainant. As criminal proceedings have nevertheless been initiated, the complainant believes that due to the inability to concretise the elements of the criminal offence, a judgment of acquittal should have been adopted. The court was allegedly not even allowed to establish the conduct that entailed the commission of the criminal offence, on the basis of either direct or circumstantial evidence, as the prosecutor failed to include such in the act of indictment. According to the complainant's allegations, in the case at issue the courts even applied circumstantial evidence to establish the existence of facts that the prosecutor did not even invoke, but only such facts allegedly allowed for the conclusion that the promise had been accepted. The complainant emphasises that the official act that the unlawful exertion of influence was intended to affect is not clarified and described in the concrete part of the description of the criminal offence, and it further does not identify the public officials at whom the influence was to be directed. He claims that he committed none of the alleged acts and that it is absurd if a person is convicted not because he or she accepted the promise of [the payment of] a commission, but because he or she monitored the preparations for conducting a procedure, supervised such procedure, and was informed of who would be proposed as the local agent. He stresses that the Finnish court acquitted the Finnish citizens identified in the operative provisions of the judgment of the charge that they had committed the criminal offence of active bribery. In the complainant's opinion, therefore, considering the connection between a promise and its acceptance, the failure to prove that a promise had been made simultaneously entails the failure to prove the acceptance of the promise as well.

5. The complainant further claims that the criminal proceedings against him were unfair and that his right to a defence determined by the first indent of Article 29 in conjunction with Articles 22 and 23 of the Constitution and Article 6 of the ECHR was violated. He states that the factual and legal aspects of the charge that would have enabled him [to prepare] an effective defence do not follow from the description of the criminal offence and as a result the adopted judgment surprised him. He is of the opinion that, given the unclear allegations, he could only deny [that he had committed] the criminal offence, as it is impossible to defend oneself against an allegation that one has committed a criminal offence at an unknown place, at an unknown time, and through an unknown method of communication. The lack of clarity of the description of the criminal offence is allegedly further reinforced by the Supreme Court's position that the statutory element of "acceptance of the promise" was concretised in the form of the payment of a commission, as nothing of that kind had been claimed by the prosecutor and it also did not follow from the final judgment. The mere assertion that the complainant had accepted the promise of the payment of a commission without a description of other clear and concrete circumstances of the commission of the criminal offence allegedly did not enable him [to prepare] an effective defence. In addition, the courts allegedly failed to clarify some of the essential circumstances contained in the concrete description of the criminal offence, e.g. what the basis was for the finding that the complainant had in fact been informed of the promise of payment that had been made, that he had accepted such and agreed thereto, and that he had accepted such with the intent to exploit his influence and intervene in the performance of an official act, although not even the amount of the promised commission was known. In the complainant's opinion, such reasoning does not even satisfy the minimum requirements regarding the duty to state reasons and therefore it also entails a violation of Article 22 of the Constitution.

6. The complainant also alleges a violation of Article 22 of the Constitution due to the arbitrary and manifestly erroneous definition of complicity. He claims that the allegation of complicity is only stated in the abstract description of the criminal offence, but it allegedly does not follow from the concrete part of the description or the reasoning of the judgment. The complainant draws attention to the otherwise established position of the Supreme Court that courts violate the criminal statute if an allegation of complicity is only included in the abstract part of the description [of the criminal offence in the judgment] but is not concretised in the concrete description. In addition, with regard to the nature of the alleged criminal offence and the manner in which the complainant allegedly committed it, complicity in the criminal offence under adjudication is allegedly already conceptually excluded. The acceptance of the promise as such is allegedly an intimate decision and an expression of the perpetrator's will, which allegedly does not allow for complicity. Allegedly, case law also deems that only a person who acted in the course of the commission of a criminal offence can be deemed an accomplice, and complicity can be substantiated merely on the basis of a decisive contribution to the commission of a criminal offence only by way of an exception, whereby such an exception has to be interpreted strictly.
7. By adopting a circumstantial judgment the courts allegedly violated the presumption of innocence determined by Article 27 of the Constitution and consequently the right to the equal protection of rights determined by Article 22 of the Constitution. The complainant states that in his case the court did not apply circumstantial evidence as control evidence to confirm the established facts, but it applied circumstantial evidence as fact, whereby the circumstantial evidence did not even follow from his conduct but from the conduct of others. The court allegedly inferred the existence and truthfulness of one circumstantial piece of evidence from another piece of circumstantial evidence. The conclusion regarding a decisive fact was allegedly reached by such fabrication of circumstantial evidence. The complainant believes that instances of drawing conclusions merely on the basis of circumstantial evidence always lead to a subjective and therefore arbitrary interpretation of the truthfulness of an as yet unknown fact and consequently the presumption of innocence and the in dubio pro reo principle derived therefrom are at risk. In light of all of the above, [the adoption of] a circumstantial judgment was allegedly not admissible in the complainant's case. The complainant emphasises that the same circumstantial evidence also allows for the opposite conclusion to be drawn, namely that the criminal offence had not been committed, which is allegedly proven by the assessment of the evidence by the Finnish court in its judgment of acquittal. According to the complainant's assertions, the confirmation of the challenged judgments would entail that in criminal proceedings anyone could be convicted on the basis of the slightest circumstantial evidence and consequently the principle of innocence would be transformed into a presumption of guilt.

8. The Supreme Court, which upheld the Higher Court and the Local Court Judgments and thereby confirmed the positions adopted by the lower courts, first presented its position regarding the allegations of the complainant and the other two persons convicted in the same criminal proceedings<sup>1</sup> regarding the violations of Article 28 of the Constitution on a general level. After highlighting the protected object as regards the criminal offences of corruption and the incrimination of preparatory acts relating thereto, which it believes to be the case with regard to the acceptance of a promise, it adopted the position that such criminal offence is completed by the mere acceptance of the promise of a reward. Relying on grammatical interpretation, it held that the acceptance of a promise is not an open-textured legal term, but it entails concrete conduct by which someone accepts something that is offered or given by another. In the case at issue, such was allegedly the promise of a reward (i.e. a benefit). In the opinion of the Supreme Court, the acceptance of a promise is thus not an indefinite legal term, but a clear normative statutory element, the content of which is known and unambiguously defined. At a general level, the Supreme Court adopted the position that the subjective and objective limits of a trial have to be determined by the procedural act of indictment, and the defendants have to be given an opportunity to acquaint themselves with the charge as well as the facts and evidence that it is based on in order to enable them [to prepare] a defence. Relying on established case law, it developed the premise that, from the perspective of their statutorily determined elements, the act of indictment and the judgment must be regarded in their entirety. If the law defines an individual element of a criminal offence with sufficient precision, the courts allegedly should not reiterate such in the description of the relevant facts of the concrete case or describe it in different words, since, with regard to the clarity and comprehensibility of the operative provisions [of the judgment], such would be superfluous. In accordance with such, in individual cases legal terms from the statutory text could allegedly assume the role of facts, as the concretisation of the statutory element would not be reasonable or in some instances it would not even be possible at all. The description of a criminal offence must contain all the decisive facts that concretise the offence, however, in the opinion of the Supreme Court, the principle of legality is not breached if the description of a criminal offence contained in the operative provisions of a judgment is construed in connection with the judgment's reasoning. From such, the Supreme Court inferred the position that the principle of legality is not violated if an element of the criminal offence is not precisely defined in the operative provisions [of the judgment], but is sufficiently substantiated in the reasoning. The Supreme Court summarised the outlined position by concluding that the description of the criminal offence in the operative provisions [of the judgment] and the reasoning constitute a whole, that they supplement each other, and that in instances when the statutory element of a criminal offence is sufficiently defined and is not open-textured the same terms can be applied to define the statutory element also in the concrete description of the facts of a given case and that that element can subsequently be considered to be a fact.<sup>2</sup>

1 Namely Ivan Črnkovič and Anton Krkovič.

9. The Supreme Court then applied the above-described general position in the assessment of the statements of the individual convicted persons. With regard to the complainant Janša, it emphasised that the benefit (i.e. the reward) was precisely described by the promise of the payment of a commission on the sale in accordance with the contract and that it was sufficiently concretised; the percentage of Wolf's commission was defined as a special bonus in which the agreed commission was taken into account and the amount from which the commission was to be calculated was defined precisely. In the assessment of the Supreme Court, the acceptance of the promise is described as the payment of the commission (which the convicted party Janša accepted in the name of the SDS political party); that description as such was allegedly sufficiently defined, concrete, and clear, as the promise of what had been accepted was allegedly clear. After stating its position that the promise of a reward was accepted in the time period between 10 August and 22 August 2005, the Supreme Court concretely described that on 22 August 2005, in accordance with Janša's instructions, Zagožen requested a prepayment of 30% of the promised commission and a contract that would include the prepayment (whereby the acceptance of the promise of a reward was manifested in the external world); the Supreme Court thus linked the description of the promise of the reward with the acceptance of the promise and with the request for payment in the sense of the realisation of the promise of the reward. The Supreme Court agreed with the position of the Higher Court that the omission of a description of the method of communication does not entail that not all of the statutory elements of the criminal offence were sufficiently described, as the method of communication does not constitute a statutory element of the alleged criminal offence. It emphasised that the method of communication can be outwardly expressed in such a manner that it leaves detectable clues in the external world, however it can also entail covert conduct that is manifested in the external world, but the circumstances of such communication are only known to the persons involved. Therefore, in accordance with the position of the Supreme Court, the manner in which a perpetrator accepted a promise does not necessarily have to be established and concretised, as such concerns dealings that are concealed and are not carried out openly and in the presence of witnesses.<sup>3</sup> In the assessment of the Supreme Court, “the acceptance of the promise of the payment of a reward is concretised by the description of the commission on the sale according to the contract and the percentage as well as the statement that the commission was to be calculated on the basis of the amount of EUR 161,900,000.00”; “the commission in the sense of the promised reward is thus concretised with sufficient precision and the statutory element of acceptance of the promise is also concretised in such manner – i.e. he accepted the promise of the payment of a commission.”<sup>4</sup>

---

2 See Paras. 13–21 of the reasoning of the Supreme Court Judgment.

10. In response to the complainant’s statements that the description of the offence also has to include a description of the recipient’s state of awareness and his or her will to accept the promise and agree to it which is manifested in a manner that is externally perceptible, the Supreme Court replied that such concern statements that do not belong in the description of the offence, but the court also clarified those elements of the criminal offence in the reasoning of the judgment, while as a general rule the subjective element [i.e. the mens rea] of the offence is not described in the operative provisions of the judgment.<sup>5</sup> With regard to the statement of the time of the commission of the criminal offence, the Supreme Court clarified that the time of the commission thereof was sufficiently concretised as also the dates of other key events were stated and that the time of the commission of the criminal offence is not a legally relevant circumstance that would refer to the statutory elements of the criminal offence, but it can be important for other reasons that were not invoked by the defence (e.g. statutes of limitation). With regard to the place of the commission of the criminal offence, the Supreme Court held that the complainant was precluded from invoking this aspect because he did not raise this issue with regard to the jurisdiction of Slovene courts in his appeal and therefore in its assessment the legal remedies have not been substantively exhausted with regard to this allegation.<sup>6</sup> In response to the complainant’s allegations with regard to the inclusion in the description of the offence of the public officials whom the complainant was supposed to influence in the performance of an official act in connection with Patria, the Supreme Court replied that the statutory element of the official act is described as a confidential public tender procedure, i.e. an act within the competence of a state authority that is substantiated by statutory provisions and thus also correctly described. The Supreme Court held that the defence interpreted the content and meaning of the relevant provisions erroneously and that the description of the criminal offence is not de-

3 See Para. 24 of the reasoning of the Supreme Court Judgment.

4 See Para. 25 of the reasoning of the Supreme Court Judgment.

5 See Para. 32 of the reasoning of the Supreme Court Judgment.

6 While in his appeal the complainant stated that the description of the offence does not concretise where the offence had been committed, he did not in fact stress the issue of jurisdiction with regard to such (see the third paragraph on p. 33 of the appeal).

ficient or incomprehensible and if all the statements regarding the facts in the act of indictment were true, a conviction would follow from the alleged facts; it agreed with the complainant's statement that the choice of a local industrial partner does not constitute an official act, but, in the opinion of the Supreme Court, such was not even alleged in the description of the offence.<sup>7</sup>

11. In response to the defence's allegation that it is unclear what the statement in the operative provisions "according to the instructions of Ivan Janša" entails, as the abstract part of the description of the offence does not allege that the convicted party Janša committed the offence by requesting a reward, the Supreme Court replied that the description of the offence to which the defence counsels' cited statements are linked states that, in accordance with Janša's instructions, Zagožen required a prepayment of 30% of the promised commission from Niittynen through Wolf and Riedl (22 August 2005), which entails a description of the realisation of the previously accepted promise of a reward; in the opinion of the Supreme Court, that allegation does not refer only to Zagožen, but that part of the description precisely describes Zagožen's conduct in accordance with the instructions of the convicted party Janša and therefore, also with regard to such, the operative provisions of the judgment are not contradictory or incomprehensible. In the assessment of the Supreme Court, given the precise description of the conduct of the "persons offering the reward" as well as the sufficiently concretised "acceptance of the promise of a reward", it cannot be claimed that also the circumstances of the offer that was made were completely unclear.<sup>8</sup>
12. With regard to the alleged violation of the right to impartial proceedings determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution due to the fact that Supreme Court Judge Branko Masleša was not disqualified from adjudication, the Supreme Court adopted positions in two orders of the plenary session of the Supreme Court. By the Order of 27 August 2014, it dismissed the request for his disqualification as it deemed that there existed no reasons to indicate the subjective or objective partiality of Branko Masleša, whereby it also assessed the allegations from the perspective of his potential participation in the panel that was to decide on the extraordinary legal remedy. It held that in his speech President Branko Masleša did not inadmissibly prejudge this criminal case as he emphasised that he did not dare to engage in an assessment of the correctness and legality of the final judgment, and he also firmly rejected the allegation regarding his personal prejudices and convictions. As in the opinion of the Supreme Court there existed no evidence to the contrary, it did not doubt the impartiality of President Branko Masleša. Allegedly, no negative or hate speech against the complainant Janša followed from the speech of 6 June 2014; on the contrary, Branko Masleša, as the president of the state's highest court, simply responded to the conduct (i.e. the placement of the signs of a former military court next to the sign of the Ljubljana Higher Court) of the political party that is led by the convicted person at issue and in particular to the message that such conduct conveys. In the assessment of the plenary session of the Supreme Court, the decisive circumstance was that Branko Masleša did not act in his capacity as a judge, but responded to the pressures exerted on the judges and judiciary in his capacity as the President of the Supreme Court, namely in the function that pertains to the president of the highest court in the state within the framework of the judicial administration and which cannot be equated with the function of a judge. In the opinion of the plenary session of the Supreme Court, the speech at issue was a justified and, with regard to his function, appropriate response to the repeated attacks on the Slovene judiciary, which had been increasing progressively, in particular because they originated from politicians. With regard to the above and by reference to the case law of the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR), the plenary session of the Supreme Court held that the fears of the convicted party Janša regarding the partiality of President Branko Masleša were not objectively justified.

---

7 See Para. 37 of the reasoning of the Supreme Court Judgment, and pp. 71 and 72 of the Judgment of the court of first instance.

8 See Para. 56 of the reasoning.

13. In the Order of the plenary session of the Supreme Court of 29 September 2014, by which the Supreme Court Judges also dismissed the complainant's second request for the disqualification of the president of the panel, i.e. Branko Masleša, the Supreme Court did not consider the question of whether his speech of 6 June 2014 may have influenced his impartiality; it did, however, assess if Branko Masleša's decision to preside over all sessions of the criminal law panel until the end of 2014, which also included the case at issue, affected his impartiality. It held that in light of all the circumstances the doubt regarding the impartiality of the president of the panel, i.e. Branko Masleša, was not justified, as his decision was consistent with the annual work schedule and he communicated this on 4 September 2014, i.e. before the determination of the agenda of the session in the complainant's case on 16 September 2014. The Supreme Court adopted the interpretation that such a decision was necessary from the perspective of the functioning of the criminal law department.
14. By Order No. Up-879/14, dated 11 December 2014, the Constitutional Court accepted the constitutional complaint for consideration and suspended the implementation of the challenged judgments until the final decision insofar as they refer to the complainant. In accordance with the first paragraph of Article 56 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 64/07 – official consolidated text, and 109/12 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), it informed the Supreme Court of the acceptance of the constitutional complaint.

B – I

15. The complainant, inter alia, asserts that the act of indictment and the challenged judgment do not contain a concrete description of the conduct that constituted the commission of the offence and that would allow the conclusion that the complainant accepted the promise of a reward, but the operative provisions are satisfied with merely quoting the abstract definition of the criminal offence. The essence of the allegations thus lies in the question of the concretisation of the statutory element "acceptance of the promise of a reward" in accordance with the first paragraph of Article

269 of the CC. The Constitutional Court assessed those statements of the complainant from the perspective of the principle of legality in criminal law that is guaranteed by the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution.

16. In accordance with the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution, no one may be punished for an act that had not been declared a criminal offence under law or for which a penalty had not been prescribed at the time the act was committed. By this provision, the Constitution regulates the principle of legality in criminal law, which has also been recognised as a general principle of international law (lex certa) by the international community. The Constitution defines it as a substantive law<sup>9</sup> safeguard in criminal proceedings – as a human right whose observance is intended to prevent the state from applying criminal law repression against individuals in an arbitrary manner. As the Constitutional Court already held in Decision No. U-I-335/02, dated 24 March 2005 (Official Gazette RS, No. 37/05, and OdlUS XIV, 16), this provision determines a number of conditions, namely:

the prohibition on determining criminal offences and penalties by implementing acts inferior to laws or by customary law (nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege scripta);
the prohibition on defining criminal offences and penalties in empty, undeterminable, or unclear terms (nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege certa);
the prohibition on applying [interpretation by] analogy when establishing the existence of criminal offences and sentencing (nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege stricta);
the prohibition on the retroactive effect of regulations that determine criminal offences and prescribe penalties for such (nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege praevia).

17. The above-stated prohibitions give rise to constitutional counter-obligations that are firstly directed at the legislature. In order to protect persons, society as a whole and its values, the legislature may only determine by law (“declared under law” – lex scripta) which conduct of individuals is inherently wrong (mala in se) or unacceptable to such a degree that it has to be prohibited (mala prohibita) and sanctioned under criminal law. The prescribed penalties are severe, as on such basis it is possible to deprive individuals of their liberty (the second paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution). The requirement of [incrimination by] law simultaneously entails that only the legislative power may determine what is criminal and it may do so only by means of a special act that has a special position within the legal system (i.e. a law) and that the Parliament adopts in a special, ex ante regulated procedure (the legislative procedure, Article 89 of the Constitution). When defining a criminal offence, the legislature must act with such a degree of certainty (“declared under law”) that it is possible to completely clearly distinguish between conduct (actions and omissions) that is criminal and conduct that falls outside the scope of criminal liability. It draws this distinction by defining the elements of individual criminal offences with sufficient certainty. The requirement of the certainty of criminal statutes (lex certa) is a special

---

9 The Constitutional Court already stated in Order No. Up-24/98, dated 10 July 2002, that the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution, due to its wording, is only applicable to infringements of substantive criminal law that are constitutionally relevant.

constitutional requirement in comparison to the principle of precision and clarity, as one of the principles of a state governed by the rule of law enshrined in Article 2 of the Constitution, which applies to all regulations. The legislature may nevertheless apply indefinite<sup>10</sup> and open-textured<sup>11</sup> legal terms when defining criminal offences if the content of the prohibited conduct can be precisely construed by means of established methods of interpretation. However, it may not apply empty, undeterminable, or unclear<sup>12</sup> terms. The principle of certainty, which clearly distinguishes between criminal and non-criminal conduct, is also directly connected with the requirement of the prohibition of analogia legis and analogia iuris (lex stricta)<sup>13</sup> already at the level of the legislature. The substantive constitutional safeguard stemming from the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution is directed at individuals who have to know in advance what is incriminated as only such enables them to adjust their conduct. They must be able to predict<sup>14</sup> what kind of consequences their conscious conduct may produce, they have to know where the border lies in terms of which the legislature outlined the scope of criminal liability and outside of which there lies the area of their general right to act freely (Article 35 of the Constitution) without being subject to criminal liability. Hence the logical prohibition of the retroactive determination of criminal offences (lex praevia).

18. What the Constitution prohibits the legislature from doing, on one hand, and what, on the other, it requires of it in order to ensure that this human right is taken into account when defining criminal offences must equally be applied to the interpreter of the law. The latter must not interpret a statutory provision that is as such not inconsistent with the Constitution in such a way so as to assign to it a meaning that would entail a violation of a human right. In criminal proceedings courts are required to interpret substantive criminal law in accordance with the Constitution, just as the courts are required to interpret statutes in such a manner in general.<sup>15</sup> Whether the courts have interpreted the law in accordance with the Constitution – to be precise, in accordance with human rights and fundamental freedoms – is the sole criterion of constitutional judicial control that the Constitutional Court exercises over adju-

10 See Order of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-220/98, dated 16 July 1998 (OdlUS VII, 155) (a large quantity, high value, or great danger of weapons or explosives).

11 See Order of the Constitutional Court No. Up-356/04, U-I-455/06, dated 7 December 2006 (OdlUS XV, 107) (a serious threat in conjunction with endangering security).

12 See Order of the Constitutional Court No. Up-541/06, dated 18 January 2008.

13 See Order of the Constitutional Court No. Up-190/97, dated 18 September 1997, and Decisions of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-213/98, dated 16 March 2000 (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 33/2000, and 39/2000 – corr., and OdlUS IX, 58), and No. U-I-73/09, dated 2 July 2009 (Official Gazette RS, No. 55/09, and OdlUS XVIII, 33).

14 “The purpose of the principle of legality is to prevent a criminal conviction for an act regarding which an individual could not predict that it is a criminal act.” See Orders of the Constitutional Court Nos. Up-62/99, dated 4 July 2000, and Up-437/00, dated 27 February 2003.

15 Regarding the requirement that statutes have to be interpreted in accordance with the Constitution, see M. Pavčnik in: M. Pavčnik and A. Novak (Eds.), (Ustavno)sodno odločanje [(Constitutional) Judicial Decision-Making], GV Založba, Ljubljana 2013, pp. 73–75.

dication. Such also defines the constitutional law relationship between the Constitutional Court and the (regular) courts, the highest of which is, in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 127 of the Constitution, the Supreme Court. Consequently, the Constitutional Court has constantly repeated that in proceedings regarding constitutional complaints it does not review if the courts correctly applied substantive law (and procedural law, or if they have correctly established the facts), however, it does review if they have violated a human right or fundamental freedom with their interpretation of the law. In principle, this must also apply with regard to a review of whether the courts interpreted the law in accordance with the right stemming from the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution. The conditions stemming from the mentioned substantive constitutional safeguard thus constitute the starting point for defining the constitutional requirements that the courts have to observe when they interpret provisions of criminal laws.

19. The substantive constitutional safeguard of the principle of legality in criminal law refers to the judgment and not the act of indictment.<sup>16</sup> Such follows already from the wording of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution, which declares that no one “may be punished.” Only a court can pronounce a penalty (including the deprivation of liberty) for a criminal offence when it establishes that an individual committed such an offence and that he or she is also guilty, which also follows from the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution. Whether the act of indictment presented by the state prosecutor acting as the party to the criminal proceedings representing the state is substantiated may only be decided by an independent court by a judgment issued in fair judicial proceedings, in the framework of which respect for all of the defendant’s rights has been guaranteed (the first paragraph of Article 135 of the Constitution). A judgment by which an individual is punished for a criminal offence is thus an act that, viewed from the perspective of the review of the Constitutional Court, has to respect all constitutional safeguards, including the safeguard stemming from the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution. In constitutional complaint proceedings the Constitutional Court reviews if [the judgment at issue] observed such, but it does not engage in a review of the act of indictment, as the review thereof is a matter for the criminal court.
20. As in accordance with the lex scripta requirement criminal offences may be determined exclusively by the legislature by law, this constitutional requirement importantly supplements the general constitutional law relationship between the legislative power, which adopts the laws, and the judicial power, which interprets them (the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution). This requirement prevents courts from including anything in the scope of criminal liability that the legislature did not clearly and definitely include already at an abstract level through a definition of the elements of an individual criminal offence. This obligation is stronger than the general obligation that binds judges to laws (Article 125 of the Constitution) and it reduces the freedom of criminal judges when interpreting the law. Only those methods of interpretation that remain strictly within the possible meaning of the wording are admissible, while the use of analogy is inadmissible (lex stricta).<sup>17</sup> The requirement of the strict interpretation of criminal laws is also consistent with such.<sup>18</sup> A judge must constantly be aware of the constitutional lex scripta requirement – namely the requirement that strictly binds the interpreter to the law, as the legislature is the one who determines the scope of criminal liability by law. The interpreter of that law – i.e. the judge – does not possess such a power and his or her interpretation of the law has to remain entirely within that scope. As a consequence of the observance of the above-mentioned constitutional requirement, the separation of the competences that the Constitution vests in the legislature from the competences that pertain to the courts also constitutes a constitutional law aspect that the Constitutional Court has to review within the framework of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution. If the Constitutional Court did not include this constitutional law aspect in its review, control of the observance of the lex scripta and lex stricta requirements in individual criminal proceedings would be fundamentally impaired.

---

16 As held by the Constitutional Court already in Order No. Up-366/05, dated 19 April 2007.

21. The lex certa requirement entails that a criminal law must be definite, certain, clear, and predictable, which, on one hand, is a question of the objective semantic precision of the text in its objective meaning, and, on the other hand, of the subjective comprehension of that meaning in the sense that the perpetrator knows ex ante what constitutes criminal conduct. When the courts interpret the statutory elements of a criminal offence and extract the abstract statutory definition of the criminal offence, they naturally interpret the statutory elements with regard to the concrete facts of the given case (i.e. the past event) that are relevant from the perspective of the abstract definition of the criminal offence – they namely interpret the statutory definition of the criminal offence with regard to the legally relevant facts of a concrete case. A conviction for a criminal offence is only possible after the court extracts the abstract, i.e. statutory, definition of the criminal offence from the statutory provision and the legally relevant facts from the concrete case, and by means of their subsequent comparison establishes that the legally relevant facts of the case constitute an example of the statutory definition of the criminal offence to which a legal consequence (i.e. a criminal sanction) is linked.<sup>19</sup> If we wish to verify whether the courts observed the lex scripta, lex certa, and lex stricta requirements<sup>20</sup> when interpreting a criminal law (i.e. when extracting the statutory definition of a criminal offence), the legally relevant facts of the concrete case become the content that has to be compared to the content of the interpreted element of the criminal offence –

17 As held by the Constitutional Court already in Decision No. U-I-213/98, as well as in Decision No. U-I-73/09.

18 As held by the Constitutional Court already in Order No. Up-190/97, and expressly also in Decision No. Up-265/01, dated 26 October 2001 (Official Gazette RS, No. 88/01, and OdlUS X, 228).

19 Cf. M. Pavčnik, Teorija prava, 4. pregledana in dopolnjena izdaja [Theory of Law, fourth revised and supplemented edition], GV založba, Ljubljana 2011, pp. 312–319, and M. Pavčnik, Argumentacija v pravu [Argumentation in Law], Cankarjeva založba, Ljubljana 1998, p. 27.

20 With regard to the circumstances of the case at issue, the lex praevia requirement does not require further consideration.

i.e. to the content of the statutory definition of the criminal offence. Only after the content that defines one of the legally relevant facts of the concrete case has been established is it namely possible to review whether the court, by deeming that such content was decisive from the perspective of the statutory definition of the criminal offence, attributed to the statutory provision content that is imprecise in and of itself or even content that the legislature did not include in the scope of criminal liability.<sup>21</sup> The decisive facts must include descriptions of all of the statutory elements of the criminal offence at the level of the legally relevant facts that have been extracted from the concrete case – therefore we can also speak of a description of the criminal offence that has to include all of the statutory elements of the criminal offence, as it is only through them – and only through all of them together – that the individual's conduct (an action or omission) that corresponds to the conduct that falls within the scope of criminal liability is defined.<sup>22</sup> The content of an individual legally relevant fact (or of a number of legally relevant facts) has to correspond to the content of an individual element of the criminal offence as determined by law, which entails that the interpretation of an element of the criminal offence may only encompass such legally relevant facts of a concrete case that correspond definitely and strictly (lex certa and lex stricta) to the statutory definition of the criminal offence.

22. With regard to what has been stated in the preceding paragraph, it has to be particularly emphasised that such does not concern the question of the correct application of substantive law, but the question of its constitutionally consistent interpretation from the perspective of the requirements stemming from the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution. The review of the Constitutional Court does not include a review of whether the courts correctly established a decisive fact with 21 With regard to, e.g., the question of whether the criminal offence of unauthorised crossing of the state border also encompasses cases where the border has not been crossed (which was a fact established in the judicial proceedings), the Constitutional Court considered that fact, which the courts had established as one of the legally relevant facts of the case, and compared it to the fact stemming from the abstract definition of the criminal offence as determined by the legislature. From Decision No. Up-265/01: "The Constitutional Court deems that it clearly follows already from a grammatical interpretation of the definition of the criminal offence of unauthorised crossing of the state border that the crossing of the border of the Republic of Slovenia is a statutory element of the offences under all of the paragraphs of Article 311 of the CC. The border of the Republic of Slovenia is also the attacked value with regard to that criminal offence. The cited criminal offence is included in the chapter entitled Criminal Offences against Public Order and Peace. A characteristic of the criminal offences under this chapter is that they protect the internal public order of the Republic of Slovenia. An act that did not include a crossing of the border of the Republic of Slovenia therefore cannot constitute the criminal offence under Article 311 of the CC." Cf. also Decision No. Up-40/94, dated 3 November 1995 (OdlUS IV, 136), which concerned the question of whether scrips constituted money and as such they were encompassed by the criminal offence of counterfeiting money.

---

22 In Decision No. Up-265/01 the Constitutional Court particularly emphasised that only all of the elements of the criminal offence, taken together with the value protected by criminal law that was the reason for the incrimination of the act in the first place, show the actual substantive content of the criminal offence and the purpose of its incrimination.

regard to the concrete case,<sup>23</sup> as such is not an aspect of the principle of legality in criminal law, but it entails the question of the correct establishment of the facts or the correct assessment of the evidence, which lie in the competence of the regular courts. In its review, the Constitutional Court is bound by the established facts. The concept of the description of the criminal offence as it is applied by the Constitutional Court cannot be equated only with the description of the criminal offence contained in the operative provisions of a judgment. Whether the description of the legally relevant facts of the case is in its entirety included in the operative provisions, or whether it is partially included in the operative provisions and partially in the reasoning through the concretisation of the decisive facts, is namely not a question of constitutional law, but a question of the correct interpretation of criminal procedural law, which is a matter that lies in the competence of the regular courts and not the Constitutional Court. Even if the operative provisions only contained the finding that an individual committed a specific criminal offence and the sentence imposed on him or her for such, while the entire description of the criminal offence was included in the reasoning of the judgment,<sup>24</sup> such would not be of relevance from the perspective of constitutional law, as the Constitution does not prescribe the structure of a criminal judgment of conviction. Consequently, the position of the Supreme Court that the operative provisions of a judgment and its reasoning constitute a whole cannot be the subject of a review by the Constitutional Court; it is thus irrelevant for a constitutional review whether a specific decisive legally relevant fact of the case is included in the operative provisions of a judgment or in its reasoning. It is, however, important that it is included in the judgment.

23. In order for an individual's conduct to constitute a criminal offence and for the perpetrator to also be guilty of such, his or her conduct must fulfil all of the objective and subjective elements of the criminal offence.<sup>25</sup> From such as well as from the above-provided explanations there follows the requirement that the description of the criminal offence (i.e. the legally relevant facts of the concrete case when compared to the statutory definition of the criminal offence) has to contain all of the elements of the criminal offence. If any element is omitted, such entails a violation of the principle of legality in criminal law. The Constitutional Court has repeated this

23 It is a matter of the assessment of the evidence whether the court correctly established the existence of an element of the criminal offence (i.e. a decisive legally relevant fact of the case that entails an element of the criminal offence); as held already in Order No. Up-167/96, dated 15 June 1998. See also Orders of the Constitutional Court No. Up-456/01, dated 21 May 2003, and No. Up-38/06, dated 8 May 2007.

24 The same is also applied, e.g., by German and French criminal courts, which the same as Slovene courts deem that only the operative provisions of a judgment become final. See, e.g., Judgment No. 11/06308357 of the 17th Panel of the Tribunal de Grande Instance de Paris on the basis of a private law suit of Marine Le Pen against the alleged perpetrators, dated 16 February 2012 (http://www.juritel.com/Ldj\_html-1601.html), and Landgericht Bochum Judgment No. 2 Kls 35 Js 158/07, dated 1 April 2008 (<http://openjur.de/u/131083.html>).

25 Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-758/03, dated 23 June 2005 (Official Gazette RS, No. 66/05, and OdlUS XIV, 96).

position on a number of occasions.<sup>26</sup> It substantiated this by clarifying that unless the description of the criminal offence contained all of the elements of the criminal offence, a conviction would entail a conviction for something that is not a criminal offence.<sup>27</sup> For this to be the case, it already suffices that only one element of the criminal offence is omitted from its description. Such a situation may come about in different ways. In the event that one of the elements of the criminal offence is omitted from the description of the criminal offence, such entails precisely an example of the above stated – a conviction for something that is not a criminal offence. However, we also arrive at the same conclusion in the event that a court interprets an element of a criminal offence in such a manner that it thereby extends the scope of criminal liability as determined by law: the court interprets the legislature's precise definition of a statutory element of the criminal offence extensively and thereby violates the lex certa [requirement]; at the same time it violates the lex scripta and lex stricta requirements if through its interpretation it itself determines that also conduct that the legislature did not include in the scope of criminal liability is criminal.<sup>28</sup> It is for this reason that the requirement that all of the elements of the criminal offence have to be included in the description of the criminal offence is of such importance from the perspective of the substantive constitutional safeguard stemming from the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution.

24. The requirement that the description of the criminal offence has to include all of the statutory elements of the criminal offence cannot extend to something that does not constitute an element of the criminal offence at the level of the statutory definition of the criminal offence. If, e.g., the time, place, and manner in which the criminal offence was committed are not in themselves elements of the criminal offence, their absence from the description of the criminal offence cannot entail a violation of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution.<sup>29</sup>
25. In addition to requiring that all of the statutory elements of the criminal offence have to be included in the description of the criminal offence, the Constitutional

---

26 Held by the Constitutional Court already in Order No. Up-190/97 as well as in Orders No. Up-24/98, No. Up-354/00, dated 25 September 2002, No. Up-456/01, and No. Up-1023/05, dated 28 February 2008, and Decisions No. Up-259/00, dated 20 February 2003 (Official Gazette RS, No. 26/03, and OdlUS XII, 51), and No. Up-758/03.

27 Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-758/03.

28 As in the example in Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-265/01, which concerned the question of whether the criminal offence of unauthorised crossing of the state border also encompasses cases where the border has not been crossed. In that example the statutory offence formally existed, but in reality the interpretation of the courts led to a situation wherein the statutory element of the crossing of the state border was not included in the description of the criminal offence. The case thus entailed a conviction for an act that did not constitute a criminal offence. As it deemed that the criminal offence also encompassed the facts of the concrete case in which no crossing of the border occurred, the court at the same time extended the scope of criminal liability into an area that the legislature did not include in the abstract definition of the criminal offence.

29 See Order of the Constitutional Court No. Up-24/98. If the time of the commission of a criminal offence is an important circumstance for the legal qualification of the criminal offence, but its definition in terms of a limited period of time instead of a date is not in itself disputable from the perspective of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution; held by the Constitutional Court in Order No. Up-62/99.

Court has hitherto not required that concrete conduct (i.e. the legally relevant facts of the concrete case), which we can subsume under the individual elements of the alleged criminal offence as follow from the statutory definition of the criminal offence, has to be included in the description as well. However, from the perspective of what was stated above in Paragraph 21 of the reasoning of this Decision, such a requirement is the logical continuation of the requirement of the existence of all of the statutory elements of the criminal offence. Only once we know the content of every individual fact within the framework of the legally relevant facts<sup>30</sup> can we namely conduct a comparison with what the legislature determined to be an element of the criminal offence at the level of the statutory definition of the criminal offence.<sup>31</sup> If we do not know the content of the conduct that the court determined to constitute an element of the criminal offence in the framework of the legally relevant facts of the case, if such element is namely not even formulated from the established facts regarding the perpetrator's conduct and thus concretised, we cannot review if the courts interpreted the statutory text in accordance with the requirements stemming from the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution.

26. In light of the above, the complainant's allegation that the description of the criminal offence for which he was convicted does not contain the concretisation of the statutory element of acceptance (of the promise of a reward) as such is only included as a copy of that element from the statutory definition of the criminal offence under the first paragraph of Article 269 of the CC, can be linked precisely to the requirements that stem from the principle of legality in criminal law. With regard to what was stated in Paragraph 19 of the reasoning of this Decision, the Constitutional Court does not review an act of indictment when assessing if such allegation of the complainant is substantiated.

B – II

27. The wording of the first paragraph of Article 269 of the CC (accepting a gift for unlawful intervention) reads as follows: "(1) Whoever requests or accepts a reward, gift or any other benefit or the promise or offer of such benefit for him- or herself or for another in exchange for the exploitation of his or her position or influence to intervene so that a certain official act be performed or not be performed, shall be sentenced to imprisonment not exceeding three years." The statutory elements<sup>32</sup> of this criminal offence are: 1) whoever, 2) for him- or herself or for another, 3) accepts 4) the promise of a reward 5) with the intent to exploit his or her position or influence to intervene so that 6) an official act be performed. The acceptance (of the promise of a reward) is an independent statutory element and entails an act of commission. This is a criminal offence that the perpetrator commits by active conduct. It is already clear on the basis of a grammatical interpretation that for the offence to be completed it suffices that the promise is accepted; there is no requirement that the perpetrator also actually intervenes. If the intervention occurs, such still concerns the criminal offence under the first paragraph of Article 269 of the CC, and the same is true if a benefit (a reward) is received in exchange for the intervention. Such a conclusion is already dictated by a grammatical interpretation of the third paragraph of Article 269 of the CC (accepting a benefit for intervening with regard to an unlawful official act), which only refers to the second paragraph of Article 269, namely to instances of unlawful intervention with regard to unlawful official acts, and not also to instances of unlawful intervention with regard to lawful official acts that otherwise would have to be or could be performed (the first paragraph of Article 269 of the CC).<sup>33</sup> The first paragraph of Article 269 of the CC thus encompasses the mere acceptance of the promise as well as the perpetrator's possible further actions, i.e. from (an attempt at) intervening to actually receiving the reward (benefit) for the intervention.

30 As in Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-40/94, e.g., whether the case involved the forgery of "a banknote" or "a scrip".

31 In the case of Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-40/94, e.g., "money".

32 As the complainant was convicted of accepting the promise of a reward as one of the manners in which this criminal offence can be committed, we leave aside the commission thereof by requesting a reward (a gift or other benefit) hereinafter.

28. Thus, under the first paragraph of Article 269 of the CC, already the acceptance of the promise of a reward with the intent to intervene of itself is punishable, which is due to the state's commitments in accordance with Article 12 of the Criminal Law Convention on Corruption (the Act Ratifying the Criminal Law Convention on Corruption, Official Gazette RS, No. 26/2000, MP, No. 7/2000 – ICLCC). The Supreme Court is of the opinion that this criminal offence entails the criminal sanctioning of intent that has not yet been realised, namely the perpetrator's specific intent to commit a certain criminal offence that is usually regarded as extremely dangerous or serious. The criminal offences that entail the criminal sanctioning of corruptive conduct are without a doubt dangerous and they affect an important social value – trust in the lawful and honest conduct of public officials and bearers of power that perform official acts, or as the Supreme Court held: "... the commitment of the entire society and of each individual to the proper and lawful functioning of state services and other services operating in the public interest." In the opinion of the Supreme Court, precisely the perpetrator's specific intent entails the distinguishing element that separates the determination of criminal liability for a preparatory act from conduct that is not criminal.
29. However, it has to be established that the specific intent is only one of the elements of the criminal offence – a subjective element that has to be distinguished from the element of acceptance (of the promise of a reward), which is an objective element of the criminal offence. As such, the latter has to be detectable in the external world. The perpetrator can namely only commit this criminal offence with his or her conduct (even if he or she, e.g., accepts the reward through an intermediary – an assistant), as it is crucial for the acceptance of the reward that the perpetrator's will regarding such is expressed. It is clear that a precondition for the commission [of this criminal offence] is the prior offer of the promise of a reward that is accepted by the perpetrator. An agreement is thus concluded between the person making the promise of a reward and the person accepting the promise of a reward, which the latter concludes precisely by the specific intent to exploit his or her influence or position to intervene with regard to an official act.<sup>34</sup> At the moment when the perpetrator decides by him- or herself to accept the promise of the reward he or she has not yet committed the criminal offence. Such is logical as it would entail the criminalisation of thought, which would be inadmissible. It can definitely not be attributed to the legislature that it wanted to enact such by the first paragraph of Article 269 of the CC. The expressed will to accept (the promise of a reward) must reach the person who made the promise. It does not suffice if it remains in the sphere of the individual's privacy, which other persons cannot access.

---

33 The second, third, and fourth paragraphs of Article 269 CC read as follows: "(2) Whoever exploits his or her position or influence and intervenes with the intent that an official act that should not have been performed is performed, or that an official act that should or could have been performed is not performed, shall be subject to the same punishment as under the preceding paragraph. (3) A perpetrator who accepts a reward, a gift, or any other benefit for him- or herself or for another, for the intervention referred to in the preceding paragraph shall be sentenced to imprisonment of one to five years. (4) The reward, gift, or other benefit received shall be confiscated."

30. As the courts held, the method of communication, i.e. the manner in which the promise is accepted, is not a statutory element of the criminal offence under the first paragraph of Article 269 of the CC. This is correct. If it were, such would entail that the criminal offence – accepting the promise of a reward – could only be committed in a precisely determined manner by means of which the legislature would have additionally narrowed the scope of criminal liability for this offence. In what manner the acceptance is realised is therefore irrelevant. What is decisive is whether it occurs. However, such does not entail that it is not necessary to define at the level of the legally relevant facts of the concrete case the perpetrator's conduct that could be detected in the external world and by means of which the perpetrator fulfilled precisely that statutory element of the criminal offence. The possibility that this requirement could be replaced with a concretisation of other statutory elements of the criminal offence is excluded. When the manner of the acceptance of the promise is known, which is only possible in instances when there exists evidence regarding such, then also the perpetrator's conduct that of itself entails the acceptance (of the promise of a reward), whereby the manner of acceptance only represents accompanying circumstances that are not relevant from the perspective of the statutory element. It is logical that, as the Supreme Court held, criminal offences of corruption are carried out in secret and not publicly and in the presence of witnesses (who do not participate in the agreement). This makes them even more dangerous and there is little chance that in the commission of such a criminal offence the perpetrator's direct conduct that entails the expression of the will to accept (the promise of a reward) could be established. The Supreme Court especially cautioned that the agreement on the acceptance of the promise of a reward can be tacit, that there can also be acceptance through conclusive conduct. In such an instance there would thus be a conclusive acceptance of the promise of a reward. However, such would only entail one of the possible manners of accepting the promise. There still remains the need for an outward expression of the perpetrator's conduct that can substantiate, in accordance with logic and experience, that the will to accept (the promise of a reward) has been expressed. Such may only be conduct of the perpetrator that in the context of the circumstances of the case at issue allows the credible conclusion that the perpetrator accepted the promise of a reward.

34 Baucon speaks of criminal offences of encounter [derived from the German concept of Begegnungsdelikte]; see P. Baucon, Korupcijska kazniva dejanja zoper uradno dolžnost in javna pooblastila [Criminal Offences of Corruption against Official Duties and Public Authorisations], Pravosodni bilten, No. 1 (2006), p. 63.

31. Regardless of the manner in which the acceptance of the promise of a reward is realised, the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution determines constitutional boundaries to be respected by the regular courts when assessing which of the legally relevant facts of a concrete case correspond to the statutory element of acceptance (of the promise of a reward) in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 269 of the CC. The constitutional requirements stemming from the principle of legality are binding on regular courts whenever they interpret the statutory element of acceptance (of the promise of a reward), regardless of whether they are assessing the complainant's conduct that entails the direct acceptance of the promise or the complainant's conduct that indicates the acceptance of the promise. If the acceptance of the promise has not been directly detected, there exists a danger that the court might include a wide range of conduct of the individual that as such is not characteristic of expressing the acceptance (of the promise of a reward). This could lead to a broadening of the scope of criminal liability. Consequently, in this regard only such conduct is relevant that by its nature and content and in the circumstances of the case at issue allow that the existence of that statutory element is established beyond a reasonable doubt. When the court decides on such, it has to take into consideration that practically the only objective element of the criminal offence that can be attributed precisely and only to the perpetrator of that criminal offence is the acceptance (of the promise of a reward). The other objective elements are independent of his or her conduct (the reward, the promise of the reward, the official act). Therefore, in the interpretation of this element of the criminal offence – in the extraction of the statutory definition of the criminal offence with regard to the legally relevant facts of the concrete case – the lex scripta, lex certa, and lex stricta requirements have to be given even further emphasis; this is even more true if in the circumstances of the case at issue the existence of this essential element of the criminal offence is derived from the perpetrator's other conduct. This namely entails that as such the conduct that entails the acceptance of the promise of a reward cannot even be assessed from the perspective of certainty and strictness because we do not even know it. From these perspectives, we can only assess the conduct from which we draw conclusions regarding the existence of the statutory element of the criminal offence.

32. In addition to the existence of all other statutory elements of the criminal offence, the acceptance of the promise of a reward determined by the first paragraph of Article 269 of the CC thus requires that the perpetrator has to express the will to accept (the promise of a reward) with his or her own conduct or at least indicate acceptance with his or her own conduct on the basis of which, given its nature and content and in the circumstances of the case at issue, the existence of this statutory element can be established beyond a reasonable doubt. The constitutional requirements stemming from the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution are thus in any event a constituent part of the assessment of the statutory element and the legally relevant facts of the concrete case that a regular court has to perform. Disregard for these requirements entails a violation of the right determined by the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution.

B – III

The alleged unconstitutionality of the first paragraph of Article 269 of the CC

33. The complainant first alleges that the first paragraph of Article 269 of the CC is inconsistent with the principle of certainty. The unclear statutory provision allegedly enables arbitrary punishment, which is allegedly confirmed by the positions adopted by the regular courts that the alleged criminal offence is committed already with the acceptance of the promise, whereby it is not necessary that the perpetrator in fact intervenes. With regard to the presented constitutional law positions (Paragraph 17 of the reasoning of this Decision), in the case at issue there could have occurred a violation of the principle of certainty if the statutory provision was in fact unclear and indefinite to such an extent that it would allow arbitrary punishment. In such a case, in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 59 of the CCA, the Constitutional Court would firstly assess the constitutionality of the statutory provision on the basis of which the challenged judgments were adopted. However, the case at issue is not such a case.
34. Already a grammatical interpretation of the wording of the first paragraph of Article 269 of the CC leads to the conclusion that for the criminal offence of accepting a gift for unlawful intervention to be completed an intervention is not required when the criminal offence is committed in the form of “accepting the promise of a reward or benefit”. In the statutory text thus the conditional form is applied, i.e. “in exchange for the exploitation of his or her position or influence to intervene”, which points to the intent that was the reason for the acceptance of the promise of the reward or benefit; however, the mere acceptance of the promise actually suffices for the completion of the criminal offence. The above-stated shows that the meaning of the statutory terms can be construed by means of established methods of interpretation and therefore the complainant’s allegation that the first paragraph of Article 269 of the CC is contrary to the lex certa requirement is not substantiated. However, whether the regular courts also interpreted the clear statutory provision in accordance with the Constitution is not the subject of the assessment of the constitutionality of the statutory provision, but the subject of the review of the positions adopted in the challenged judgments.

B – IV

The existence of the elements of the criminal offence

35. The complainant alleges that not all of the statutory elements follow from the description of the criminal offence of which he was convicted and this allegedly entails a violation of the principle of legality stemming from the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution.
36. With regard to such, the regular courts adopted the same position, namely that all of the elements of the criminal offence, including the decisive facts, follow from its description.<sup>35</sup> The court of first instance deemed that the description was already sufficiently defined by the listing of the statutory elements of the criminal offence. Allegedly, the description of the criminal offence has to include in particular the decisive facts that express the statutory elements of the criminal offence, but not the facts and circumstances on the basis of which conclusions regarding the so-called internal subjective facts (the content of consciousness, will, intent, etc.) are drawn. With regard to the statutory element of acceptance (of the promise of a reward), the court of first instance adopted the position that the facts and circumstances that were applied to substantiate the statement that the complainant accepted the promise of a reward are matters that belong in the reasoning by means of which that statutory element is established. In connection with the statutory element of “influence”, however, it deemed that the statutory definition is open-textured as regards its content and that it is already realised when the perpetrator accepts the offer of a benefit, at which point it is not even necessarily true that he or she will actually have to intervene with others. According to the assessment of the court [of first instance], the time and place of the commission of the criminal offence, while important for the individualisation of the concrete criminal offence, do not constitute elements of the criminal offence in question, and in any event all of the statutory elements of the criminal offence and the decisive facts follow from the description. The Higher Court and the Supreme Court confirmed this position; according to their assessment, the manner in which the promise was accepted does not constitute a statutory element, and the same is also true with regard to the time and place of the commission of the criminal offence.
37. From the perspective of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution, the relevant question is whether the act for which the complainant was convicted, provided that his guilt had been proven beyond a reasonable doubt, even constitutes a criminal offence at all. A comparison of the statutory elements of the criminal offence with the legally relevant facts of the concrete case shows that from a formal legal perspective the description of the criminal offence contains all of the statutory elements: for the political party SDS (“for another”)<sup>36</sup> and through Jože Zagožen, Ivan Janša (“whoever”) accepted (“accepts”) the promise of the payment of a commission on the sale [at issue] in accordance with the contract that had been agreed on as a 4.2% commission for Walter Wolf (“the promise of a reward”), even though the political party SDS was not entitled to any kind of commission on the sale in accordance with the contract concluded between the company Patria and the company RHG, with the intent that as the Prime Minister, the President of the SDS political party, a former minister, and an influential personality he would intervene (“with the intent to exploit his influence to intervene”) with those persons at the Ministry of Defence of the Republic of Slovenia who participated in the confidential public tender procedure and the company Patria, or more precisely, its local agent would be selected as the best tenderer, whereby the confidential public tender procedure is an official act (“official act”). As the courts established, the complainant instructed Jože Zagožen to request the prepayment of 30% of the promised commission. In light of the fact that all of the statutory elements of the criminal offence can be derived from the above-presented description, the complainant’s allegations that are aimed at the positions of the regular courts regarding the existence of the elements of the criminal offence are not substantiated. As was already clarified in Paragraph 24 of the reasoning of this Decision, the time, place, and manner of the commission of the criminal offence are not statutory elements and therefore their absence in the description of the criminal offence cannot entail a violation of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution. The case at issue thus is not a situation wherein a statutory element was omitted from the description of the criminal offence, but concerns the question of whether the statutory element of acceptance (of the promise of a reward) was concretised.

---

35 See pp. 55–57 of the reasoning of the Judgment of the court of first instance, Paras. 30 and 31 of the reasoning of the Higher Court Judgment, and Paras. 23–25, 31–37, and 44 of the Supreme Court Judgment.

36 The statutory elements that were concretised by means of alleged facts are provided in italics.

B – V

The concretisation of the element of the criminal offence of acceptance (of the promise of a reward)

38. The complainant was found guilty of accepting, between 10 August 2005 and 22 August 2005, through Jože Zagožen and for the political party SDS, the promise of the payment of a commission on the sale in accordance with the contract between the company Patria and the company RHG that had been made by the leading employees of the company Patria Vehicles Oy, Tuomas Korpi, Heikki Hulkkonen, and Reijo Niittynen. The political party SDS was not entitled to the commission, and the leading employees of the Patria company allegedly promised it with the intent that Ivan Janša as an influential personality would exert influence on those persons at the Ministry of Defence of the Republic of Slovenia who participated in the confidential public tender procedure and that Patria, or more precisely its local agent, would be selected as the best tenderer, whereby the confidential public tender procedure is an official act. Subsequently, on 22 August 2005 Jože Zagožen, allegedly with the same intent and in accordance with the complainant’s instructions, requested through Walter Wolf, and the latter further through Hans Wolfgang Riedl, the prepayment of 30% of the promised commission from Reijo Niittynen. In accordance with the court’s position, the facts and circumstances by which the statement that the complainant accepted the promise of a reward is substantiated are matters that belong in the reasoning of the judgment. Thereby the complainant allegedly committed the criminal offence under the first paragraph of Article 269 of the CC.

39. All of the courts that decided on the merits of the charges against the complainant were faced with the complainant's allegation that the statutory element of acceptance (of the promise of a reward) simply reiterates the statutory element of the criminal offence without concretising the complainant's conduct that allegedly entailed the acceptance (of the promise of a reward). In accordance with the position of the Supreme Court, when a certain statutory element cannot be concretised by a different formulation or if such would not be feasible, it suffices for the concretisation of the criminal offence if the (abstract) term is applied or reiterated in the (concrete) description of the criminal offence. Such allegedly occurs in instances that concern statutory elements that are expressed in words that have a clear, precisely determined, and concrete meaning. The term to accept (the promise of a reward) allegedly entails concrete conduct by which someone accepts something that is offered or given, i.e. promised, by another. In individual cases, when they are included in the factual description of the real life event, such terms from the statutory text allegedly assume the role of facts. The court of first instance and the court of second instance also adopted in principle the same position, but expressed it partly differently (the acceptance of the promise of a reward is a fact that is established and substantiated by facts and circumstances, which the court states in the reasoning of the judgment). Consequently, the reiteration of the statutory element of the acceptance (of the promise of a reward) in the description of the criminal offence allegedly entailed a sufficient concretisation of the alleged criminal offence or a statutory element thereof. Such a position of the Supreme Court (and of the court of first instance) has to be understood from the perspective of its interpretation of the provision of criminal procedural law that requires that the description of the criminal offence contain all decisive facts (in the operative provisions of the judgment) that concretise the criminal offence, while with regard to other circumstances it suffices that they are included in the reasoning of the judgment, whereby the judgment has to be reviewed as a whole. As was already pointed out (Paragraph 22 of the reasoning of this Decision), whether conduct that due to its nature and content may, beyond a reasonable doubt, result in the realisation of the statutory element is included in the operative provisions of the judgment or in its reasoning is not a constitutional law question. What is of relevance for constitutional law is whether such conduct is clearly included in the judgment among the legally relevant facts of the concrete case that can be compared to the statutory element of acceptance (of the promise of a reward). Only in such instances can a review from the perspective of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution be performed.
40. As was already stated (Paragraph 30 of the reasoning of this Decision), a court may not replace the concretisation of one of the statutory elements of the criminal offence with the concretisation of other statutory elements of the criminal offence. Otherwise we would allow for instances where a statutory element at the level of the legally relevant facts of the concrete case would not even have been realised. In such a case, a conviction for the criminal offence would entail a conviction for an act that lacks a statutory element, namely an act that the legislature did not even determine to be a criminal offence. Therefore, in this regard already as a starting point attention has to be drawn to the constitutionally unacceptable positions of the regular courts entailing that the circumstances in connection with the other statutory elements indicate that the complainant accepted the promise of a reward. The Supreme Court linked the complainant's acceptance (of the promise of a reward) with the concretised statement of the commission ("the acceptance of the payment of a reward is concretised by the description of the commission on the sale according to the contract and the percentage as well as that the commission was to be calculated on the basis of the amount of EUR 161,900,000.00" and "the commission in the sense of the promised reward is thus concretised with sufficient precision and the statutory element of acceptance of the promise is also concretised in such manner – i.e. he accepted the promise of the payment of a commission")<sup>37</sup> and with the intent underlying the acceptance of the promise that is linked to the complainant's position and thereby with the potential influence of the persons at the Ministry of Defence of the Republic of Slovenia with regard to the choice of the supplier in the purchase of armoured vehicles. What the Supreme Court in this regard deemed to constitute the outward expression of the acceptance of the promise of a reward is connected to the reward (benefit) itself or the promise of the reward and the intent underlying the acceptance of the promise. However, the acceptance (of the promise of a reward or benefit) is an independent statutory element that must not be interpreted in such a manner that it is merged with the other statutory elements and such that the realisation of those statutory elements would automatically also entail the realisation of that statutory element.<sup>38</sup> The concretisation of the reward (i.e. the benefit) and the intent thus cannot be applied to substantiate that the complainant actually accepted the promise of the reward. The mere existence of the reward (or even only of the promise of the reward) or the existence of the intent to accept it (even if the promise of a reward had been made) namely do not indicate that the complainant's conduct was criminal, unless it can be established that the acceptance (of the promise of a reward) in fact occurred – unless namely also that statutory element had been realised. The above-stated positions are thus already as such inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution.

41. When the regular courts, from the court of first instance to the Supreme Court, replied to the [allegations regarding] the missing concretisation of the acceptance of the reward, they adopted the position that it suffices if the description of the criminal offence (from the perspective of the courts in the operative provisions) contains the decisive facts (whereby as regards the acceptance, the mere reiteration of the statutory element suffices due to its clarity and precisely determined meaning), while their concretisation is a matter that belongs in the reasoning of the judgment, whereby the operative provisions and the reasoning in any event entail a whole. As was already highlighted in Paragraph 22 of the reasoning of this Decision, which part of the judgment has to contain the concretisation of the individual elements of the criminal offence is not important from the perspective of constitutional law, it may also be included in the reasoning of the judgment. However, it is important that it is included in the judgment. In connection with such, the Supreme Court expressly stated that the fact there occurred acceptance (of the promise of a reward) in the time period between 10 August and 22 August 2005 is concretised by the description that, in accordance with the complainant's instructions, on 22 August 2005 Jože Zagožen requested a 30% prepayment of the promised commission and a contract determining the prepayment. Thereby the acceptance of the promise of the reward was allegedly expressed in the external world. The mentioned position indicates that with regard to the complainant's instructions to request the prepayment of the promised commission the Supreme Court concluded that the complainant had accepted the promise of the reward. Thereby Jože Zagožen's alleged request for the prepayment of the promised commission was concretised. The act of giving instructions for the request attributed to the complainant, however, is not concretised in any manner. By its content and nature the term "to give instructions" is comparable to the term to accept (the promise of a reward). The complainant could only have realised it through his own conduct. If such conduct was not directly detected, it could only entail such conduct that in the circumstances of the case at issue could have led to the conclusion that the instructions had been given. Such entails that, with regard to the above-stated positions of the court of first instance and the Supreme Court, already the first instance court should have concretised not only the statutory element of acceptance (of the promise of a reward), but also the complainant's conduct "to give instructions to request the prepayment of the commission". It follows from the challenged judgments that the court [of first instance] did not establish conduct of the complainant that would have as such directly entailed the acceptance (of the promise of a reward) or direct conduct that would have as such entailed the giving of instructions to request [the prepayment]. Therefore, already the court of first instance should have extracted from all of the established facts those facts regarding the complainant's conduct that in the circumstances of the case and due to their nature and content even allowed the existence of the statutory element of acceptance (of the promise of a reward) to be established beyond a reasonable doubt. If it deemed that the complainant's instructions to request the prepayment constituted such conduct, it should have equally extracted the facts that indicate precisely that.

<sup>37</sup> See Para. 25 of the reasoning of the Supreme Court Judgment.

<sup>38</sup> Cf. also Decision of the German Federal Constitutional Court Nos. 2 BvR 2559/08, 2 BvR 105/09, 2 BvR 491/09, dated 23 June 2010.

42. Therefore, it does not follow from the challenged judgments that when establishing whether the decisive facts (i.e. the ones that they should have deemed to constitute the legally relevant facts of the concrete case) correspond to the statutory element of acceptance (of the promise of a reward) the courts performed a review from the perspective of the constitutional requirements stemming from the principle of legality, although the complainant had been invoking them throughout the proceedings.

With regard to what was stated in the preceding paragraph, the courts further did not satisfy that requirement through the concretisation of the other statutory elements of the criminal offence.

43. It follows from the above-stated that in interpreting the statutory element of acceptance (of the promise of a reward) under the first paragraph of Article 269 of the CC, the courts failed to consider the requirements stemming from the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution. Already as a result of this the challenged judgments violated the complainant's right ensured by the Constitution in terms of a constitutional substantive safeguard of defendants in criminal proceedings. Consequently, the Constitutional Court abrogated the challenged provisions (Point 1 of the operative provisions). In light of the nature of the established violation, it remanded the case to the court of first instance for new adjudication, namely in such a manner that a different judge of the Ljubljana Local Court is to decide thereon (Point 2 of the operative provisions).
44. In the new proceedings, the court will have to take into account the positions adopted in this Decision when defining the legally relevant facts of the case at issue. In accordance with those positions, it will have to extract the legally relevant facts of the case from all of the established facts of the past event in question in order to compare them with the statutory definition of the criminal offence, which it will have to obtain through an interpretation of the statutory term of acceptance (of the promise of a reward) in accordance with the requirements stemming from the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution. It will have to take into account that the individual established instances of conduct that are as such not characteristic of an acceptance of the promise of a reward do not entail a realisation of that statutory element. Only due to the circumstances in which it occurred can such conduct allow the conclusion that a promise was accepted. In such instances, it is important from the perspective of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution that a complainant's conduct always remains at the centre of the determination of the relevant statutory definition of the criminal offence. From the perspective of the interpretation of the statutory element of acceptance (of the promise of a reward) it is therefore important whether in the given circumstances the conduct of the complainant enables such a conclusion to be drawn. The inclusion – in this statutory element – of conduct embedded in the established circumstances of the case that due to its content and nature cannot suffice as proof of definite external detection of the complainant's acceptance of the promise of a reward, for example, would entail an interpretation extending its meaning. It is further clear that the promise of a reward, if such in fact was made, does not indicate the complainant's conduct – i.e. its acceptance. However, the latter is precisely what is decisive for the realisation of this statutory element of the criminal offence as one of the elements of the criminal offence under the first paragraph of Article 269 of the CC.
45. As the Constitutional Court abrogated the challenged judgments already due to the established violation of the right determined by the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution, it was not necessary to review the other alleged human rights violations. The Constitutional Court nevertheless decided to also review the alleged violation of the right to impartial proceedings before the Supreme Court, insofar as it concerns the participation of the President of the Supreme Court in the adjudication. Such concerns the highest court of regular jurisdiction in the state, and therefore ensuring the appearance of impartiality of its adjudication is of special importance.

B – VI

The review from the perspective of the right to impartial adjudication before the Supreme Court

46. The complainant also alleges a violation of the right to impartial proceedings determined by Article 23 of the Constitution at the Supreme Court as that court inter alia did not grant a request for the disqualification of its President, Branko Masleša.
47. It follows from the Order of the plenary session of the Supreme Court, dated 27 August 2014, that the Supreme Court Judges reviewed the complainant's request for the disqualification of Branko Masleša with regard to his previous actions in his role as the President of the Supreme Court as well as with regard to his potential participation in the panel that was to decide on the [complainant's] extraordinary legal remedy. They adopted the position that Branko Masleša's speech at the Days of the Slovene Judiciary on 6 June 2014 did not raise any doubts regarding his impartiality and that there existed no reasons that would indicate his subjective or objective partiality. In the assessment of the plenary session of the Supreme Court, Branko Masleša had to respond to the pressure that had been exerted on the judiciary. However, in doing so he allegedly was not acting in his capacity as a judge, as at that time the Supreme Court had not yet received the complainant's request for legal protection, but rather responded in his capacity as the President of the Supreme Court. Branko Masleša thus allegedly responded in the function that pertains to the president of the highest court in the state within the framework of the judicial administration and which allegedly cannot be equated with the function of a judge.
48. By an Order, dated 29 September 2014, the plenary session of the Supreme Court also rejected the complainant's second request for the disqualification of the president of the panel, Branko Masleša, wherein the complainant claimed that the impartiality of adjudication was affected not only by the speech of 6 June 2014 but also by the decision of Judge Branko Masleša to preside over all criminal law panels until the end of 2014, namely also in the complainant's case. The partiality of the president of the panel, Branko Masleša, was allegedly further proven by a statement he had made on the street and that is allegedly established through a notarised statement of the Marvins, a married couple. The Supreme Court adopted the position that it had already decided on the alleged partiality due to the speech by its Order of 27 August 2014, and with regard to the statement of the Marvins it deemed that Branko Masleša enjoys the trust of the Supreme Court Judges and that they do not believe the statement to be true. With regard to his decision to preside over all criminal law panels, the plenary session of the Supreme Court adopted the position that in light of all the circumstances there existed no doubt regarding the impartiality of the president of the panel, Branko Masleša.

49. The right to judicial protection determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution entails the right of everyone to have any decision regarding his rights, duties, and any charges brought against him made without undue delay by an independent, impartial court constituted by law.<sup>39</sup> Impartiality entails that the one who is deciding is not interested in a particular outcome of the proceedings and that he or she is open to the parties' evidence and proposals. In order to be able to decide impartially, a judge must not have a preconceived opinion regarding the subject of the decision-making. The court's decision has to be adopted on the basis of the facts and arguments that the parties presented in the judicial proceedings, and not on the basis of information obtained outside of the proceedings.<sup>40</sup> In the exercise of the right to impartial adjudication it is not only important that the impartiality of adjudication is in fact ensured, but it must also be outwardly expressed. This concerns the so-called appearance of the impartiality of adjudication. It is thus important that in each concrete case the court creates and maintains the appearance of impartiality. Otherwise, the trust of the public in the impartiality of the courts in general as well as the trust of the parties in the impartiality of adjudication in concrete proceedings may be at risk.<sup>41</sup>
50. Furthermore, in accordance with the position of the ECtHR, the subjective criterion, which concerns the determination of the personal convictions of the judge deciding a case, as well as the objective criterion, which concerns the assessment of whether in the proceedings the judge ensured the implementation of procedural safeguards in such a manner that any legitimate doubt regarding his or her impartiality is excluded, are decisive for the impartiality of adjudication.<sup>42</sup> Thereby it is not only important whether the judge performed his or her function in the criminal proceedings in an impartial manner, i.e. whether the manner in which he or she performed his or her function could have influenced the outcome of the proceedings.<sup>43</sup> It is furthermore important that the impartiality of adjudication also has to be outwardly expressed.<sup>44</sup> Thereby the ECtHR verifies whether the judge provided sufficient safeguards to exclude all reasonable doubts regarding such. Such mainly concerns the confidence

39 Cf. Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-65/05, dated 29 September 2005 (Official Gazette RS, No. 92/05, and OdlUS XIV, 72).

40 Cf. Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-92/96, dated 21 March 2002 (Official Gazette RS, No. 32/02, and OdlUS XI, 45).

41 Cf. Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-365/05, dated 6 July 2006 (Official Gazette RS, No. 76/06, and OdlUS XV, 93).

42 Cf. the ECtHR Judgment in Saraiva de Carvalho v. Portugal, dated 22 April 1994, Para. 33.

43 Cf. the ECtHR Judgment in De Cubber v. Belgium, dated 26 October 1984.

44 Such concerns the requirement best illustrated by the English proverb: "Justice must not only be done, it must be seen to be done." Adapted from A. Galič, Ustavno civilno procesno pravo [Constitutional Civil Procedural Law], GV Založba, Ljubljana 2004, p. 413. See also L. E. Pettiti (Ed.), La convention des droits de l'homme – commentaire article par article, Second Edition, Economica, Paris 1999, pp. 260–261.

that courts in a democratic society must inspire in the public. The decisive factor is whether it can be established that a doubt is objectively justified.<sup>45</sup> It is therefore important that when acting in a particular case the court creates and maintains the appearance of impartiality.<sup>46</sup> At the statutory level, the right to impartial adjudication is implemented through the institution of the disqualification of judges.<sup>47</sup>

51. The position of the plenary session of the Supreme Court that there existed no subjective reasons that would indicate the partiality of President Branko Masleša does not raise any constitutional law considerations. However, the contrary is true with regard to its position that the objective reasons that could have affected the appearance of impartiality did not exist. In his speech of 6 June 2014, President of the Supreme Court Branko Masleša critically responded to destructive attacks aimed at judges, who may not respond to criticism due to their duty of secrecy. On that occasion he criticised the positions expressed by the complainant Ivan Janša regarding the court that, as the court of appeal, dismissed his appeal. Thereby he expressly emphasised that he did not wish to engage in an assessment of the correctness or legality of the Ljubljana Higher Court Judgment that was not in favour of the complainant.
52. The Constitutional Court already emphasised that it is not sufficient if in proceedings a court acts and decides in an impartial manner, it must furthermore be composed in such a manner that there exist no circumstances that would cast doubt on the appearance of the impartiality of the judges.<sup>48</sup> Such concerns the need to reinforce the confidence that courts in a democratic society must inspire in the public.
53. There is no dispute regarding the position that the President of the Supreme Court as the highest representative of the judicial branch of power and of all judges must have the possibility to respond when he deems that the judicial branch of power must be protected against attacks. However, if in doing so he critically responds to the conduct of a specific convicted person, his statements may cast doubt on the appearance of his impartiality that cannot as such be deemed to be objectively unjustified. Precisely due to the fact that as regards the composition of the court (or of its panels) it has to be ensured that there exist no circumstances that would cast doubt on the appearance of the judges' impartiality, and as a critical response to the complainant's publicly presented standpoints regarding the court that dismissed his appeal also constitutes such a circumstance, the President of the Supreme Court should not have participated in the panel that decided on the complainant's legal remedy against the final judgment of conviction as president of the panel. As has already been clarified, it is important to ensure the appearance of an impartial court. Therefore, it cannot

---

45 Cf. the ECtHR Judgment in Coëme and Others v. Belgium, dated 22 June 2000, Paragraph 121.

46 These positions of the ECtHR are also expressly included in Švarc and Kavnik v. Slovenia, dated 8 February 2007.

47 See Article 39 of the Criminal Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 32/12 – official consolidated text, 47/13, and 87/14), which determines when, due to certain objective or subjective circumstances, a judge cannot be deemed to be impartial in a given case and therefore he or she has to be disqualified from performing the duties of a judge in that case.

48 Cf. Paragraph 7 of the reasoning of Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-149/99, dated 3 April 2003 (Official Gazette RS, No. 44/03, and OdlUS XII, 25).

be of any importance that in the speech at issue the President of the Supreme Court expressly stated that he would not engage [in an assessment of] the correctness and legality of the final judgment. What is at issue is namely not the potential subjective impartiality of the President of the Supreme Court in his role as the president of the panel that decided on the [complainant's] request for the protection of legality, but rather maintaining the appearance of the impartiality of the court in an objective sense. Such is the foundation of the trust of the public in an independent judiciary that resolves disputes in an impartial manner. Without engaging in an assessment of the response of the President of the Supreme Court to the attacks on the authority of the judiciary, the Constitutional Court has to ensure the appearance of impartiality in adjudicating. If the President of the Supreme Court made such a response, then the Supreme Court should have taken that into account when deciding on his disqualification. Thereby it is irrelevant whether the President responded in his function [as the highest representative] of the judicial administration. What is important is whether such a response could cast doubt on the appearance of the impartiality of adjudication if the President of the [Supreme] Court subsequently participated as a judge in [subsequent] adjudication. From such perspective, the speech of the President of the Supreme Court constituted an objective circumstance that could have cast doubt on the appearance of the impartiality of decision-making if he participated in [subsequent] adjudication. As such, the plenary session of the Supreme Court should have considered this and disqualified the President of the Supreme Court from adjudicating in the complainant's case.

54. With regard to the above, the circumstance that President Branko Masleša participated in deciding on the complainant's request for the protection of legality against a Ljubljana Higher Court Judgment, after he had critically responded, in a speech of 6 June 2014, to the positions expressed by the complainant in connection with the Ljubljana Higher Court, cast doubt on the appearance of the impartiality of the Supreme Court. Consequently, the complainant's right to impartial proceedings determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution was violated.

C

55. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 59 of the CCA and the third indent of the third paragraph and the fifth paragraph of Article 46 of the Rules of Procedure of the Constitutional Court (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 86/07, 54/10, and 56/11), composed of: Mag. Miroslav Mozetič, President, and Judges Dr Mitja Deisinger, Dr Dunja Jadek Pensa, Mag. Marta Klampfer, Dr Etelka Korpič – Horvat, Dr Ernest Petrič, Jasna Pogačar, and Dr Jadranka Sovdat. Judge Jan Zobec was disqualified from deciding on the case. The decision was adopted unanimously. Judges Deisinger and Sovdat submitted concurring opinions.

Mag. Miroslav Mozetič
President

---

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE DR JADRANKA SOVDAT, JOINED BY JUDGE MAG. MIROSLAV MOZETIČ

I

1. As the constitutional law consideration of the alleged violation of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution is in principle the same in all three Decisions by which the complainants' constitutional complaints were decided on, I am writing a common separate opinion to all three Decisions. It is, however, clear that the cases differ to a certain extent. Insofar as those differences are important (also from the perspective of constitutional law), I believe that such has been appropriately considered by the individual Decisions. I agree with the operative provisions as well as the reasoning of the Decisions. In this separate opinion I only wish to additionally clarify some of the arguments applied [by the Decisions] and thereby show that in the process of their drafting and the formulation of the constitutional law arguments substantiating the adopted Decisions also such arguments had been considered that could have led to different conclusions, however, in my opinion, they were justly outweighed by the selected constitutional law arguments. In order to ensure greater clarity, I am in principle writing a separate opinion to Decision No. Up-889/14, in which I was the judge rapporteur. However, it equally applies to the other two Decisions, even though I do not repeat such hereinafter, as from a reading of the Decisions<sup>1</sup> it clearly follows in which part they are comparable and in which part they are different.
2. Up to the present, the Constitutional Court has encountered alleged violations of the right determined by the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution on a few occasions. It has already adopted certain positions with regard to the content of that right, performed certain assessments, and adopted some positions, with regard to which in some cases they were merely stated without being accompanied by constitutional law arguments in support thereof. In my opinion, all of this is sufficiently elaborated in the reasoning of the Decision. The majority of the more important hitherto positions referred to the review of the constitutionality of statutory provisions of substantive law, while fewer were adopted in constitutional complaint proceedings, whereby the proceedings in connection with such alleged violations most frequently ended with a rejection of their acceptance for consideration on the merits. The present Decision confirms the adopted positions and provides constitutional law arguments in support thereof. I believe that only a few points have to be additionally emphasised with regard to this argumentation.
3. The complainants also directed their allegations against the acts of indictment, which, however, cannot be the subject of a constitutional review by the Constitutional Court. I agree with the arguments set out in Paragraph 14 (19, 17) of the reasoning of the Decision. However, I would like to emphasise that it can by no means

---

1 Whenever I refer to the text of the reasoning of the Decisions and I have all of the Decisions in mind, the relevant paragraphs of the reasoning of the other two Decisions are stated in brackets, namely, first that of Decision No. Up-879/14 and second that of Decision No. Up-883/14.

be understood as meaning that when exercising their function state prosecutors do not have to respect the Constitution. They are under an obligation to respect it directly on the basis of the Constitution. In a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution), the Constitution is a mandatory source of law for every state authority and every bearer of power within that state authority, thus also including state prosecutors, who perform their work within the system of state prosecutors' offices. In addition, in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, human rights and fundamental freedoms are exercised directly on the basis of the Constitution. The situation is only different when their nature is such that their exercise requires statutory regulation (the second paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution). In such cases, state prosecutors are naturally bound by the Constitution by means of such statutory regulation. In any event, the exercise of the office of a state prosecutor in its entirety has to be based on law (the fourth paragraph of Article 153 of the Constitution). It falls within the competence of an independent criminal court to review whether state prosecutors have acted in accordance with the Constitution, whether in preparing acts of indictment, on the basis of which criminal proceedings against an individual are initiated, they have namely also respected (the law and) all of the individual's human rights and fundamental freedoms and in that framework also the constitutional law safeguard stemming from the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution, as such is their constitutional duty. It is a competence of that court to review the act of indictment from such perspective, and it is in its competence to decide whether the charges against an individual are substantiated. All of this is constitutionally guaranteed also as the defendant's right to judicial protection against acts of a state prosecutor (the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution, which expressly refers not only to rights and duties but to charges as well). As the Constitutional Court has stressed on numerous occasions, on the basis of Article 125 and the first paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution also the courts have to apply the Constitution directly and protect human rights and fundamental freedoms. Therefore, it is completely clear that through their decision-making they have to "sanction" potential violations of human rights or fundamental freedoms that could be caused by a state prosecutor's act of indictment. In such cases, the court decision is the individual legal act by which the court decides on the (criminal) charges against an individual and by which, in the words of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution, he or she can be "punished for an act". Consequently, also from the perspective of the cited constitutional provision only a court decision can be the subject of a constitutional law review before the Constitutional Court.

4. From the perspective of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 64/07 – official consolidated text, and 109/12 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), which regulates the procedure before the Constitutional Court, we arrive at the same result. The first paragraph of Article 50 of the CCA determines what the subject of review in a constitutional complaint can be. Even though it does not expressly specify that also individual acts by which charges against an individual are decided on can be challenged by a constitutional complaint, such is self-evident. Otherwise, the legislature would have excluded constitutional complaints against criminal judgments (which would constitute a restriction of the sixth indent of the first paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution), while court decisions in all other instances when courts decide on an individual's rights, obligations, or legal benefits could be a subject of review in proceedings before the Constitutional Court. Such would be an absurd interpretation of the first paragraph of Article 50 of the CCA. Therefore, (also) criminal judgments (court decisions) can be a subject of review in a constitutional complaint, which hitherto has never been disputed. However, a state prosecutor's act of indictment can certainly not be deemed to constitute an act in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 50 of the CCA. Namely, by means of such, charges are brought, but (as has long been established, since the establishment of the independent judicial power) the charges against the individual are not yet decided on, as only an independent criminal court may decide thereon.

III

5. The next issue that requires additional clarification is the position that the question of the relationship between the operative provisions and the reasoning of a judgment and what belongs in the operative provisions and what in the reasoning of a judgment is not relevant to constitutional law, but a question of the correct interpretation of the law regulating the criminal procedure. The regular courts or the highest regular court have the last word regarding the interpretation of laws, unless it reaches the level of constitutional law (the first paragraph of Article 127 of the Constitution). A glance into history and across the borders of our state shows that the differentiation between what is to be included in the operative provisions and what belongs in the reasoning of a judgment in the law regulating the criminal procedure that is currently in force is evidently a consequence of the fact that in the past our territory belonged to the Austrian Empire. Also the current Austrian regulation of criminal procedure<sup>2</sup> is (still) the same as in our state. Even if we only take a look at German or French judgments, to remain on the Continent, it soon becomes clear that such a regulation is unknown to them, as the part of the judgment that, when compared to our system, would be called the operative provisions only contains a statement that a certain person is the perpetrator of a specific criminal offence for which a specific sentence is imposed on him or her.<sup>3</sup> Everything that constitutes "the description of

---

2 In accordance with point 1 of the first paragraph of § 260 of the Austrian Criminal Procedure Act (Strafprozessordnung – hereinafter referred to as the Austrian StPO), the operative provisions of a judgment of conviction also have to include a statement regarding "welcher Tat der Angeklagte schuldig befunden worden ist, und zwar unter ausdrücklicher Bezeichnung der einen bestimmten Strafsatz bedingenden Tatumstände" ("the commission of which criminal offence the defendant was found guilty, namely by expressly stating the circumstances of the act that substantiate the application of a particular provision of criminal law" (translated by V. Božič). The text of the Austrian StPO is accessible at: <https://www.ris.bka.gv.at/GeltendeFassung.wxe?Abfrage=Bundesnormen&Gesetzesnummer=10002326>).

3 See footnote 16 (24, 19) of the reasoning of the Decision. The French Code de procédure pénal thus determines in the third paragraph of Article 485 that the operative provisions (dispositif) of the judgment (jugement) the criminal offence in the operative provisions” in our system is included in the reasoning of the judgment.<sup>4</sup> The comparative legal argument as such, of course, tells us nothing of constitutional law relevance. It only tells us that in some other countries the same statutory regulation of this issue as ours is in force, while others regulate it differently. Therefore, it also has to be examined from a constitutional perspective.

6. The Constitution does not expressly regulate this question. If the Constitutional Court elevated the statutory regulation of the relationship between the operative provisions and the reasoning of a judgment in criminal proceedings that is currently in force to a constitutional level, such would entail that in the future any other statutory regulation would be unconstitutional – such would be an obstacle to the legislature introducing, e.g., a statutory regulation following the German or French model. From the perspective of the scope of the freedom of the legislative power, such is anything but irrelevant. In accordance with the principle of the separation of powers (the second sentence of the second paragraph of Article 3 of the Constitution), the legislature is that power that regulates social relations with legally binding effects, and in accordance with the system of checks and balances between the equal branches of power, it is the Constitutional Court that determines the legislature’s constitutional boundaries and that sanctions [i.e. penalises] its actions by abrogating a law if those boundaries are overstepped. It can only set its constitutional boundaries on the basis of (the interpretation of) the Constitution. In my opinion, the Constitution does not contain a basis that would require that the structure of the criminal judgment be regulated in one or another manner. If the Constitutional Court has no basis in the Constitution for setting constitutional limits on the legislature with regard to the statutory regulation of an issue, but nevertheless acted in such a manner, it would thereby act in contradiction to the principle of the separation of powers. I do not understand the position of the esteemed academician Prof. Dr Marijan Pavčnik, who stated that “[i]n criminal cases, the legally relevant facts of the case and the statutory definition of the criminal offence have to be included already in the operative part of the act of indictment and subsequently also in the operative provisions of the judgment. From the perspective of their meaning, the have to include a statement of the criminal offences of which the persons in question were found guilty or responsible for, as well as the penalty, the applied laws, and the potential civil conviction (resulting from a civil claim arising from the criminal offence) (“Le dispositif énonce les infractions dont les personnes citées sont déclarées coupables ou responsables ainsi que la peine, les textes de loi appliqués, et les condamnations civiles.”). When the jury court (cour d’assises) is deciding, a special transcript regarding the vote on the individual points of the judgment (arrêt) is prepared. The text of the Code of Criminal Procedure is accessible at: http://legifrance.gouv.fr/affichCode.do;jsessionid=0E51A19E187E813125E9C52E81ED0706.tpdila24v\_3?cid-Texte=LEGITEXT000006071154&dateTexte=20141209.

---

- 4 In accordance with the fourth paragraph of § 260 of the German Strafprozeßordnung (StPO), similarly, only the legal description of the act is included in the operative provisions, while in accordance with the first paragraph of § 267 of this Act, the reasoning has to contain the facts that the court deemed to have been proven and in which the elements of the criminal offence have been identified. The text of the Act is accessible at: <http://www.gesetze-im-internet.de/stpo/>.

operative provisions and the reasoning are a whole, but such does not entail that the content of the operative provisions may be transferred into the reasoning [...]”<sup>5</sup> as a line of constitutional law arguments that would dictate such. In my opinion, it remains at the level of the statutory regulation. It is possible that the Supreme Court erred in interpreting it in the manner it did. However, in light of what has been stated above, such is not a matter for constitutional review. In this regard, also the finality of judgments is not constitutionally relevant.<sup>6</sup> In legal theory, the question of whether finality extends (only) to the operative provisions of a court decision<sup>7</sup> is a welcome subject of legal scholars’ speculations, and not only in the area of criminal procedural law.<sup>8</sup> Not only is there no explicit constitutional regulation of the finality of operative provisions or the limits of finality in this respect, there is also no explicit statutory regulation of such.

7. In the light of all of the above with regard to the question of whether the delineation of the operative provisions and the reasoning of a judgment constitutes a constitutional law issue, I would like to apply the elegantly phrased warning that Uroš Ferjan, an advisor to the Constitutional Court, formulated during the internal constitutional law discussions of the cases, which in my opinion exposes the essence of what has been said: the Constitutional Court has to be careful not to turn the requirement that laws be interpreted in accordance with the Constitution into “the requirement that the Constitution be interpreted in accordance with laws”.

IV

8. The most important issue that deserves additional clarification and further illustration is the question of the limits of the constitutional review of a criminal judgment as they follow from the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution.

---

5 See M. Pavčnik, Predpraznični dnevnik, Prvi del: od 24. novembra do 7. decembra 2014 [The Pre-Holiday Journal, Part One: from 24 November to 7 December 2014], Pravna praksa, No. 48 (2014), p. 28.

6 From a comparative law perspective, in spite of the different regulation, the same positions regarding the finality of the operative provisions of a judgment can be found in German criminal law doctrine and in Slovene. When considering the finality of a judgment (Die Rechtskraft des Urteils), with regard to substantive finality Beulke stated the following: “The finality only encompasses the operative provisions, and not also the reasoning.” (Translated by M. Hren), see W. Beulke, Strafprozessrecht [Criminal Procedural Law], 12th Edition, C. F. Müller, Munich 2012, p. 341; similarly also Laubenthal and Nestler: “Only the operative provisions of a judgment, and not its reasoning, become final.” (Translated by M. Hren), see K. Laubenthal, N. Nestler, Strafvollstreckung [Execution of Criminal Penalties], Springer, Berlin, Heidelberg 2010, p. 8.

7 The academician Prof. Dr Pavčnik added the following to the cited part: “Let us not forget that finality extends to the operative provisions.” M. Pavčnik, op. cit., p. 28.

8 Particularly numerous debates have been held in the area of civil procedural law, wherein the former President of the Constitutional Court wrote extensively on these questions; see, e.g., D. Wedam-Lukić in: L. Ude, A. Galič (Eds.), Pravdni postopek: zakon s komentarjem, 3. knjiga [The Civil Procedure: The Act with Commentary, Book 3], Uradni list Republike Slovenije, GV Založba, Ljubljana 2009, esp. pp. 156–166. After stating that the operative provisions become final, with reference to Triva and Dika, she inter alia stated the following: “Nevertheless, the reasoning ‘participates’ in the finality of the operative provisions insofar as such is necessary for the identification of the content of the decision.”; ibidem, p. 156.

Those limits simultaneously establish the constitutional law criteria that courts have to observe in order to avoid violating the constitutional principle of legality in criminal law. An outline of the scope of the review is provided already in the general part of the reasoning regarding the content of that constitutional provision and the requirements stemming from it that is contained in part B – I of the reasoning of the Decision (such equally applies to all three Decisions). The scope of the review may only originate in the constitutionally determined relationship between the (regular) courts and the Constitutional Court. Over more than twenty years of deciding on constitutional complaints, the approach highlighted in Paragraph 13 (18, 16) of the reasoning of the Decision has undoubtedly become settled. The situation can be no different as far as the supervision exercised by the Constitutional Court over observance of the principle of legality in criminal law is concerned. The Constitutional Court can supervise the constitutional consistency of the interpretation of criminal substantive law from the perspective of all of the requirements stemming from this principle, which were presented in further detail in the Decision. We usually formulate a view regarding the constitutional level of an interpretation of statutory provisions (which by themselves are not unconstitutional) in a judgment with the help of the following approach: if [in a statutory provision] the legislature adopted the same position as the position that follows from the judgment at issue, would the Constitutional Court abrogate such a statutory provision due to its inconsistency with a human right – if such is the case, there also exists a violation of that human right by the judgment. However, even though we eventually arrive at such a conclusion, when deciding on a constitutional complaint the Constitutional Court is not in exactly the same position as when reviewing the constitutionality of a law. With regard to the latter, the minor and major premises of a constitutional review are always regulations – e.g. a law or the Constitution or the provisions they contain that have to be interpreted. The situation with regard to constitutional complaints is different. The subject of the review is a judgment. The legally relevant facts of a concrete case constitute the minor premise of a court's decision-making, while only the major premise is the statutory definition of the criminal offence that is extracted from a statutory provision through interpretation. As the Constitutional Court is not a trier of fact (judex facti), the question quickly arises as to how far it may go in its review when monitoring the constitutional consistency of the interpretation of the major premise of the adjudication. Should it completely exclude facts from its review and, if such is not possible, how far-reaching are its authorisations to review the constitutionality of the adjudication with regard to facts?

9. The answer to this question in the present Decisions is in reality no different than in decisions on constitutional complaints in general. The Constitutional Court is bound by the state of the facts as it was established by a court in its judgment. To date, the Constitutional Court in fact has only descended to the level of the state of the facts as an exception, and did so only in the framework of Article 22 of the Constitution when in addition to manifestly erroneous interpretations of laws it also allowed [constitutional complaints alleging] manifestly erroneous findings of fact that had decisively affected a procedural right.<sup>9</sup> However, the Constitutional Court has consistently held that a review of the correctness of the established state of the facts, including the free assessment of evidence, is not a matter of constitutional review (unless it falls within the scope of Article 22 of the Constitution). Consequently, it could also review a potential violation of the in dubio pro reo principle in criminal proceedings only from the perspective of Article 22 of the Constitution, thereby descending entirely to the level of the factual – the level of the assessment of evidence, of course only if there exists a manifest error.<sup>10</sup> From the perspective of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution, anything similar is not even an option.

10. The answer to the question of where the limits of the constitutional review lie is in fact obtained together with the answer to the question of what requirements for the Constitutional Court stem from the constitutional substantive safeguard that is being discussed; firstly in general (part B – I of the reasoning of the Decisions), and subsequently as applied to the criminal offences and constitutional law questions that we were facing (part B – II of the reasoning of the Decisions). Such does not entail that the Constitutional Court would be lecturing the courts on the ABCs of legal argumentation that provides the tools for judicial decision-making. Nowadays these are well known to all thanks to the fundamental works of the academician Prof. Dr Pavčnik. They simply have to be applied if we wish to perform judicial work lege artis. In the present case, the Constitutional Court applied them to clarify what observance of the principle of legality in the interpretation of criminal substantive law concretely entails and how the Constitutional Court is going to supervise it. Before I confirm the answer that the Decision(s) provided to that question, I would like to devote some further attention to two previous decisions that may be very useful in illustrating in a simplified manner what is at issue.
11. The first example comes from the period of the first years following the state's independence when, before the introduction of the tolar as the Slovene currency, scrips were in circulation. The complainant was convicted of the criminal offence of counterfeiting money for counterfeiting scrips. In his constitutional complaint, he invoked a violation of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution, as allegedly by deeming that the scrips constituted money the court inadmissibly extended the scope of criminal liability. By Decision No. Up-40/94, dated 3 November 1995 (OdIUS IV, 136), the Constitutional Court decided that there had been no violation (let us disregard the question of whether the decision could also have been different<sup>11</sup>). That the pieces of paper produced by the complainant were scrips and not banknotes that are a form of money was a fact established in the court proceedings. The Constitutional Court did not assess whether that fact had been established correctly. It

---

9 See Decision No. Up-347/96, dated 13 October 1999 (OdIUS VIII, 296), to be precise, the position that the erroneous finding of who had been the complainant's lawyer at the time the denationalisation decision was served entails the establishment of a fact that decisively affects the procedural position of the parties.

10 The Constitutional Court clarified that term in Order No. Up-62/96, dated 11 April 1996 (OdIUS V, 68).

11 See the Dissenting Opinion to the Decision of Judge Boštjan M. Zupančič.

reviewed the court's position that the scrip as a legally relevant fact extracted from the concrete case (according to the statutory element, the subject of counterfeiting was money, and according to the established state of the facts, the subject of the counterfeiting was a scrip – the established subject of the counterfeiting is a relevant fact) corresponded to the statutory element money. Money, in turn, had to be interpreted in light of what it represented in the economic and legal system of the state; in accordance with the constitutional requirements stemming from the principle of legality in criminal law, naturally strictly. Thereby the Constitutional Court in fact reviewed the observance of the principles of lex certa (was the courts' interpretation too loose with regard to the defined statutory element), lex scripta (did the court, by deeming that not only banknotes but also scrips constitute paper money, include something in the field of criminal liability for this criminal offence that had not been included by the legislature), and lex stricta (did the court with its interpretation in reality apply analogy to establish that (also) a scrip constitutes money).

12. The second case in which the Constitutional Court established a violation of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution (Decision No. Up-265/01, dated 26 October 2001, Official Gazette RS, No. 88/01, and OdlUS X, 228) provides an equally apt illustration. It concerned the criminal offence of unauthorised crossing of the state border. The regular court established that no crossing of the border had occurred, but nevertheless deemed that there existed reasonable suspicion that the criminal offence, of which the crossing of the border was (also) a statutory element, had been committed. Again, the Constitutional Court did not consider the question of whether the border had been crossed or not – such had been established by the court. The Constitutional Court only reviewed whether that legally relevant fact of the case at issue, corresponded to the statutory element of crossing the border of the criminal offence at issue, and found that it did not. With such a broad (even absurd) interpretation of the term crossing the border the court failed to include in the description of the decisive facts the statutory element of crossing the border, and at the same time it ventured into the legislature's field as it included in the scope of criminal liability also something that the legislature had completely clearly left outside of the scope of liability.
13. What do these two cases tell us? The Constitutional Court does not engage in an assessment of whether the court correctly established the state of the facts. It does not assess whether the court correctly extracted from all of the established facts of the real life case that happened as a past event the relevant facts that are to be compared with the appropriate statutory element of the statutory definition of the criminal offence. The Constitutional Court only verifies if the court interpreted a statutory element of the criminal offence – e.g. “money” – in accordance with the requirements of the principle of legality when through its interpretation it included in that term also the extracted legally relevant fact of the concrete case – e.g. “a scrip”. The Constitutional Court certainly assesses such an interpretation only from the constitutional perspectives that are precisely described in its decision, as otherwise it could not ensure the respect for that human right in individual criminal proceedings. However, it conducts such assessment as the last court, and not as the first. In order to interpret the law in accordance with the Constitution, which is its constitutional duty, the criminal court must already itself include that part of the assessment in its adjudication. The criminal court of first instance is thus the first<sup>12</sup> court that has to conduct that assessment. The courts that decide on the legal remedies against the criminal judgment have to verify whether the assessment was performed correctly. In accordance with the constitutional (the third paragraph of Article 160 of the Constitution) and statutory (Article 51 of the CCA) conditions with regard to the exhaustion of legal remedies, only following such is it the turn of the Constitutional Court. In order for the Constitutional Court to be able to verify if in a criminal conviction the court observed the requirements of the principle of legality, it is thus necessary that we know first of all what facts the court extracted as the legally relevant facts of the concrete case, individually with regard to each statutory element of the criminal offence. Unless we know and until we know whether we are dealing with a “scrip”, “banknote”, “ticket or receipt”, or something else – i.e. the extracted subject of counterfeiting as the relevant fact – we cannot conduct a review from the perspective of the statutory element of the criminal offence at issue, i.e. “money”, which has to be interpreted in accordance with the lex scripta, lex certa, and lex stricta requirements. If a court does not keep such in mind, there might occur a violation of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution, which the court is bound to observe in accordance with a constitutionally consistent interpretation of the law.

14. Certainly, such is not particularly difficult when what we have before us is a case that can be said to be a textbook example, as we are speaking of something tangible that is always detectable in the external world and undoubtedly expressed in the physical form of an object – as applies to a banknote or a scrip (in a precisely defined form). However, in principle the situation must not be any different if we are faced with an essentially different term, such as the acceptance (of the promise of a reward) or the promise (of a reward). Those two elements are, just like money, objective statutory elements of criminal offences. If we allowed it to be different, i.e. that a different position was adopted due to the complexity and difficulties in identifying the legally relevant fact(s) of a concrete case that correspond to those two statutory elements of criminal offences, such would entail unequal treatment with regard to a human right. In my opinion, such would be inadmissible.
15. What kind of different position do I have in mind? Different in that in light of the nature of that statutory element and in particular because, as a general rule, the acceptance (of the promise of a reward)<sup>13</sup> will not be directly detected, we would have adopted the position that the realisation of that statutory element would fall only and exclusively in the scope of the review of the correctness of the established facts and the correctness of the assessment of evidence – namely in its entirety outside the scope of the review from the perspective of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the 12 And of course, prior to that, the state prosecutor (and before that the police), but the Constitutional Court does not review such.

---

13 The same is naturally true as regards the promise of a reward.

Constitution. Thus, from the perspective of that constitutional safeguard, the position of the Supreme Court, which in reply to an objection stated that it suffices if a statutory element is concretised in the reasoning, but failed to clarify by means of what precisely the acceptance of the promise (as well as the giving of instructions to request its prepayment) and the promise of the reward were concretised, would be undisputable. Also in the case at issue such should have been substantiated lege artis in the reasoning, as it again certainly does not entail an aspect of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution. If we wanted to adopt such a position in the cases at issue, in my opinion, we could have done so only if we had previously changed our position from the two above-presented Decisions, as in such an event we would have had to change it with regard to all future cases. I am afraid that such a change of position would have entailed that the Constitutional Court would have had to retreat to the position that the subject of review from the perspective of that human right is in fact only the constitutionality of the statutory regulation as such. The manner in which the courts interpreted it in adjudicating would have become (or remained) only a matter of the correct application of substantive law in light of the established state of the facts. I cannot find any arguments in support of such a change of position. On the contrary, it would even go against the clearly presented constitutional law reasons that clarify the content of the requirements stemming from the principle of legality in criminal law in the Decision(s).

16. The above, however, does not entail that when conducting a review from the perspective of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution the Constitutional Court may even reach into the sphere of establishing the facts, the assessment of evidence, the correctness of the extraction of the relevant facts, i.e. the legally relevant facts of the concrete case. Although that part of adjudication is conducted “by looking at the statutory element of the criminal offence and back again”,<sup>14</sup> its essence lies only in the establishment of the factual – even if such is peeled down to the level of the legally relevant facts of the concrete case – that is the part that belongs to and has to remain with the judge, who is the trier of fact (judex facti). The Constitutional Court (outside of the few exceptions determined by Article 22 of the Constitution) is not and may not become such, as that would entail disregard for the constitutionally defined relationship between the (regular) courts and the Constitutional Court. Consequently, the latter may not consider that part of adjudication. When that part is concluded, when the result of that part has been finalised – when it becomes clear that what we have in front of us is a “scrip” – then the Constitutional Court reviews whether by including it in the statutory element of “money” the court respected the requirements stemming from the constitutional substantive safeguard. That is the answer to the question of how far towards [establishing] the factual the Constitutional Court may move when monitoring adjudication from the perspective of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution.

14 See M. Pavčnik, Argumentacija v pravu (Od življenjskega primera do pravne odločitve) [Legal Argumentation (From the Real Life Event to the Legal Decision)], Cankarjeva založba, Ljubljana 2002, pp. 106–108.

17. In the cases at issue, it was established that the courts failed to extract the legally relevant facts of the concrete case that correspond to the element of the acceptance of the promise of a reward or the promise of a reward (even if such was not directly detected, but is derived from other conduct that in accordance with its nature and content and in the circumstances of the case at issue allows the drawing of such a conclusion). They attempted to remedy that deficiency by reasoning based on the concretisation of the other statutory elements, which of course cannot be admissible if it leads to the merging of two or more statutory elements of a criminal offence.<sup>15</sup> When we are faced with such a situation, it becomes clear that the courts did not take into account the above-stated constitutional requirements stemming from the principle of legality in criminal law. However, at the same time, such also entails that that part of their task that pertains only to them (firstly to the court of first instance, whose mistakes can be remedied by the court of second instance) cannot be performed by the Constitutional Court in their stead. That would be precisely what the Constitutional Court would have done if on the basis of all of the facts established by the judgments it extracted the legally relevant facts of the case at issue that constituted the acceptance (of the promise of a reward) or the promise (of a reward) by itself, in order to even be able to conduct a review from the perspective of the human right determined by the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution. It would have descended to the level of the trier of fact (judex facti). From the perspective of that human right, that path is closed. Therefore, also in my opinion, the decision to remand the case for new adjudication is correct, as not only are the conditions determined by the first paragraph of Article 60 of the CCA for the Constitutional Court to decide [cases on the merits] not fulfilled, but such is also subject to constitutional constraints.
18. In Paragraph 33 (44, 36) of the reasoning of the Decision the Constitutional Court concisely summarised the task that awaits the court in the new proceedings. As it decided that the case is to be remanded for new adjudication to a different judge, a judge who is not yet acquainted with the case will need a certain amount of time to study the case and that will surely contribute to the length of the new proceedings. Although the Constitutional Court did not dispute the constitutionality of the position of the plenary session of the Supreme Court that the period of limitations of criminal prosecution no longer applies once a judgment becomes final, it is not superfluous to draw attention to the respect for the right to a trial without undue delay determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution (see Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-25/07,<sup>16</sup> dated 11 September 2008, Official Gazette RS, No. 89/08, and OdlUS XVII, 48).

Dr Jadranka Sovdat

---

15 See Paragraph 30 (40, 33) of the reasoning of the Decision.

16 Thereby the Constitutional Court decided on the constitutionality of the statutory regulation in instances of new adjudication in criminal proceedings in which a final judgment was abrogated in a procedure with extraordinary legal remedies.

I voted for the Decision and I agree with all of its arguments. I further agree with the additional arguments from the concurring opinion of Judge Dr Jadranka Sovdat, which I have joined. I would merely like to add another emphasis:

I would particularly like to emphasise how important it is that in exercising their office state prosecutors consistently respect the laws and thereby do not act partially or arbitrarily. What I have in mind is particularly the content of the act of indictment, from which it must clearly follow that the defendant is charged with conduct (acts) that is incriminated by law and that such conduct (acts) of the defendant has to be concretely described (defined).

On the other hand, the responsibility of the court (the judge) to assess, as the law obliges it to, already at the beginning of proceedings, whether in formulating the act of indictment on the basis of which the criminal proceedings were initiated the state prosecutor observed the statutory provisions and the Constitution, especially human rights and in particular also the safeguard under the first paragraph of Article 28. The court of first instance is the court that is first and foremost responsible for ensuring that criminal proceedings are not even initiated if the act of indictment that it has before it does not in its entirety pass a review of its constitutionality and legality.

In accordance with my deep conviction, such a review is extremely important from the perspective of the protection of everyone's human rights and fundamental freedoms, as follows already from the Preamble of the Constitution. The aim of such is not only to prevent an individual from being convicted, but also from being charged for an act that had not been declared a criminal offence under law. Inconsistent or even discriminatory or arbitrary exercise of that competence opens the door to potential abuses of the system of the administration of justice and consequently also leads to the distrust of the general public in the system of the administration of justice (and the judiciary).

Mag. Miroslav Mozetič

---

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE DR MITJA DEISINGER

With this concurring opinion I wish to emphasise the importance of the unanimously adopted Decisions of the Constitutional Court as precedents regarding the principle of legality in criminal law (the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution) and the significance of the abrogation of the judgments from the perspective of adjudicating in the new proceedings.

1. By the Decisions in question, the Constitutional Court held that the courts, from the Ljubljana Local Court to the Ljubljana Higher Court and the Supreme Court, violated the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution and in violation of a human right convicted Janez Janša, Ivan Črnkovič, and Anton Krkovič. All three judgments of those courts were abrogated. Such entails that Janez Janša, Ivan Črnkovič, and Anton Krkovič thereby became innocent (the presumption of innocence in accordance with Article 27 of the Constitution).

2. Along with the abrogation of the judgments, I also proposed that all of the constitutional complainants be acquitted of the charges, but the proposal did not gain the support of the majority. The decision is thus left to the court of first instance, which will have to take into account the reasons of the Constitutional Court decisions, and due to the violation of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution, or in other words the finding that the statutory elements of the acts of commission were not concretised in the descriptions of the offences, reject the act of indictment or acquit the constitutional complainants.
3. The precedential significance of the mentioned Decisions that exceeds the meaning of the consideration of the individual cases lies in the consistent observance of the constitutional principle of legality in criminal law, which is determined as a human right by the constitutional provision of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution. It entails that in our country no one can be convicted for an act unless the concretised statutory elements of a criminal offence follow therefrom. In accordance with the third paragraph of Article 1 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 64/07 – official consolidated text, and 109/12), Constitutional Court decisions are binding. Such applies to the new proceedings in the cases at issue, namely as regards the court as well as the state prosecutor's office. In cases that are essentially the same, such applies also with regard to all other criminal proceedings.
4. By the Decisions the Constitutional Court held that the abstract elements of the criminal offences under the first paragraph of Article 269 and the first paragraph of Article 269a of the Criminal Code (Official Gazette RS, No. 95/04 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the CC), i.e. “accepts the promise of a reward” and “promises a reward”, respectively, as acts of commission and therefore necessary and decisive elements of those criminal offences, were not concretised at all in the descriptions of the criminal offences in the operative provisions, but they were merely stated or reiterated in general terms. The courts further failed to concretise the abstract elements of the criminal offences in the reasoning of the challenged judgments. The Constitutional Court thus rightly qualified such a failure to concretise the abstract elements of the criminal offences as a violation of the right determined by the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution. Such a violation of the principle of legality simultaneously also entails a violation of Article 7 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR).
5. In its review of the constitutionality of the challenged judgments, the Constitutional Court could not consider the issue of the regulation of the structure of a criminal judgment of conviction as such is a question of the correct interpretation of criminal procedural law and thus a matter for the competent [regular] court. In the new proceedings the court of first instance, as well as the state prosecutor's office, will thus have to consistently respect statutory law, namely the provisions of the CC and the Criminal Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 32/12 – official consolidated text, 47/13, and 87/14 – hereinafter referred to as the CrPA), as well as the requirements stemming from the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution.

6. The Constitutional Court returned the cases of all three constitutional complainants to the court of first instance for new adjudication and assignment to a new judge. The challenged judgments no longer exist, the cases have been remanded for new adjudication, whereby the previously lodged act of indictment remains their foundation. Such entails that the lodged act of indictment of the Office of the Supreme State Prosecutor of the Republic of Slovenia No. Ktr 169/10, dated 6 August 2010, corrected on 10 August 2010, amended on 30 January 2011, 17 December 2012, and 27 February 2013, and corrected on 5 March 2013, is once again to be assessed in the summary proceedings before the Ljubljana Local Court. In accordance with the first paragraph of Article 437 of the CrPA, the judge's assessment will contain a finding as to whether there exists any reason why the procedure should be stayed. In that assessment the first instance judge will have to take into account the reasons of the Decisions of the Constitutional Court by which the judgments were abrogated due to a violation of the complainant's human right determined by the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution and assess whether the operative part of the act of indictment contains the concretised elements of the criminal offences. The reasons for staying proceedings are determined by Article 277 of the CrPA. If the operative part of the act of indictment does not contain the concretised elements of the criminal offence, there exists a legal basis to stay the criminal proceedings in accordance with point 1 of the first paragraph of Article 277 in conjunction with the first paragraph of Article 437 of the CrPA.
7. In assessing the operative part of the act of indictment, the judge will have to establish whether, in light of the reasons of the Decisions of the Constitutional Court, the description of the criminal offence in the act of indictment, which has to be the same in both summary and regular proceedings, satisfies all of the requirements stemming from point 2 of the first paragraph of Article 269 in conjunction with the first paragraph of Article 434 of the CrPA, namely if it contains the concrete statutory elements of the criminal offence.<sup>1</sup> In that assessment he or she will not be able to avoid the finding that the description of the act does not contain the concretised abstract statutory elements of the acts of commission, that, furthermore, the time and place of the commission of the criminal offences are not stated,<sup>2</sup> that point I of

1 M. Pavčnik in Pravna praksa, No. 48, 11 December 2014, under the heading "Law and Society": "In criminal cases, the legally relevant facts of the concrete case and the statutory definition of the offence have to be included already in the operative part of the act of indictment and subsequently in the operative provisions of the judgment. Although, from the perspective of their meaning, the operative provisions and the reasoning constitute a whole, such does not entail that the content of the operative provisions may be transferred into the reasoning. Let us not forget that finality extends to the operative provisions."

2 Š. Horvat, Zakon o kazenskem postopku s komentarjem [The Criminal Procedure Act with Commentary], GV Založba, Ljubljana 2004, p. 600, point 3: "However, it is important that the abstract statutory elements of the criminal offence and those provisions of the general part of the CC regarding criminal offences and criminal liability (Articles 7 through 32 of the CC) that are applied in the act of indictment follow from the the operative provisions also does not contain a description of complicity, which is also conceptually impossible, and that there exists an unlawful contradiction as to the descriptions of the acts under points II and III of the operative part of the act of indictment. Above all, it is not possible to reiterate an abstract element of a criminal offence also as a concrete element of that same criminal offence. The subsumption of the abstract under the abstract entails a logical paradox as the same cannot be subsumed under the same, but they have to be equated (a tautology) and a syllogism simply is not a tautology.<sup>3</sup>

8. In the event that the main hearing is called immediately, following the reading of the act of indictment and the conclusion of the main hearing in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 443 of the CrPA, the judgment could be delivered and proclaimed immediately and without interruption in accordance with the second paragraph of the same Article of the CrPA. However, also in such a case the judge would firstly be obliged to assess the description of the acts in the operative part of the act of indictment on the basis of which the new proceedings were initiated. Due to the same reasons that were mentioned in the preceding paragraph of my Opinion and that are based on the reasoning of the Decisions of the Constitutional Court, the judge would only be able to establish that the conduct of the constitutional complainant, as included in the description of the acts, does not contain the concretised elements of the alleged criminal offences. The only possibility that follows from such a legal conclusion is the delivery of a judgment of acquittal in accordance with point 1 of Article 358 of the CrPA.
9. With the exception of the abrogated judgment in the case at issue, the case law of the Supreme Court also followed the correct position that non-concretised statutory elements require the defendant's acquittal. Such is, for example, evident from the Supreme Court Judgments of acquittal No. I Ips 25465/2011, dated 20 February 2014 (due to an inadequate description of the desecration of a grave), and No. I Ips 22697/2011, dated 29 May 2014 (the description did not contain a concretisation of the allegation of what [information] from the personal life of the private prosecutor the convicted person was allegedly distributing or claiming). By Judgment No. I Ips 153/2012, dated 1 March 2012, [the Supreme Court] acquitted the defendant, who had been convicted of the criminal offence under Articles 13 and 14 of the Regulation of Military Courts and sentenced to death by hanging, loss of all political and civil rights, and the confiscation of his entire movable and immovable property. It acquitted him as a result of the allegation contained in the description of the act in the operative provisions of the judgment that on an undetermined day he had committed the criminal offence of a war crime against unidentified persons and in concretised description of the defendant's conduct. Without such concretisation of the charges, the defendant is not ensured an effective defence." And ibidem, p. 742, point 7: "The act that a defendant is accused of does not constitute a criminal offence under law if any of the statutory elements of the criminal offence is missing from the description of the act or if in the description of the defendant's conduct those statutory elements are not stated in concrete terms."

---

3 J. Zobec in his Dissenting Opinion, dated 16 June 2014, in Case No. Up-373/14 (Official Gazette RS, No. 47/14).

an unspecified way. Even with regard to post-war proceedings, the Supreme Court thus required the standard determined by the current procedural laws, however it disregarded such in the judgment abrogated in the case at issue. Even with regard to minor offences the Supreme Court requires a concrete description of the act in the operative provisions of decisions, as otherwise proceedings are stayed (Decisions No. IV Ips 94/2014, No. IV Ips 47/2013, No. IV Ips 121/2012, No. IV Ips 73/2012, No. IV Ips 22/2012, No. IV Ips 21/2012, and numerous others).

10. With regard to the new proceedings, the Decisions of the Constitutional Court only refer to the decision of the first instance judge, however the precedential position determined by the Decisions indirectly also applies to the state prosecutor. As in any criminal proceedings, the decision whether to insist on the lodged act of indictment or to withdraw such lies in his or her independent competence. Neither the state prosecutor nor the court may interfere with the description of the acts contained in the act of indictment because they are bound by the strict and explicit prohibition of reformatio in peius, i.e. no amendment that would worsen the position of the constitutional complainants is possible. [A violation of] the prohibition of reformatio in peius is an essential violation of criminal procedure and applies to all stages of proceedings (see Articles 371, 385, 397, 415, 424, 428, and 429 of the CrPA). Such a prohibition also entails the conscious denial of the principle of material truth because such entails the establishment of a less favourable state of the facts and therefore a worsening of the defendant's positions.<sup>4</sup> From such it follows that only new evidence that is favourable to the defendant is possible. Consequently, the court will, inter alia, have to take into account the evidence contained in "the report of Pieter Westerhof", which the state prosecutor did not present, decide on the search of the office located at the address Brodišče 5 in Trzin, which was conducted without a court order, and the searches conducted in Finland on the basis of police measures. Such an interpretation is consistent with the purpose of the institution of the prohibition of reformatio in peius and is also accepted by recent case law.<sup>5</sup> The Constitutional Court deemed that the prohibition of amending a decision to the detriment [of the defendant], i.e. the prohibition of reformatio in peius, is a part of the concept of a fair trial in criminal proceedings from the perspective of Article 23 and the first paragraph of Article 29 of the Constitution.<sup>6</sup>
11. The case at issue further raises the question of whether the criminal prosecution will become time-barred during the new proceedings. It follows from Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-25/07, dated 11 September 2008 (Official Gazette RS, No. 89/08, and OdlUS XVII, 48), that the CrPA is inconsistent [with the Constitution] because it does not determine a time limit in which the new proceedings have to be concluded. At the same time, the Constitutional Court determined the manner of implementation of that Decision by determining that until the entry into force of the [new] Criminal Code (Official Gazette RS, No. 55/08 and 66/08 – corr. – hereinafter referred to as the CC-1), the new proceedings have to be concluded no later than within two years following the abrogation of a final judgment. The new CC-1 has been in force since 1 November 2008 and on that date the mentioned manner of implementation, which was transitional, ceased to have effect. The second paragraph of Article 91 of the CC-1 precisely determines the conditions for the beginning of the limitation periods and when prosecution becomes time-barred in the event of the abrogation of a final judgment. That limitation period can only be applied in the new adjudication within the framework of procedures with extraordinary legal remedies before the regular courts, namely in the procedure for the protection of legality before the Supreme Court when that court abrogates a final judgment due to essential violations of criminal procedure or violations that affected the legality of the judicial decision and remands the case for new adjudication. If it establishes a violation of substantive criminal law (such as a violation of the principle of legality that is reviewed as a violation of Article 28 of the Constitution by the Constitutional Court), the Supreme Court cannot abrogate a final judgment, but has to amend it by itself by a judgment of acquittal. Therefore, in the case at issue, the abrogation of the final judgments due to a substantive constitutional violation of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution cannot serve as a legal basis for the application of the second paragraph of Article 91 of the CC-1. The Constitutional Court is further not a court of fourth instance in the case at issue and the constitutional complaint is not an extraordinary legal remedy in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 91 of the CC-1. Thereby attention has to be drawn to the legislature's intent in enacting the two-year limitation period by the second paragraph of Article 91 of the CC-1. In the absence of that provision, no limitation period applied after a final judgment had been abrogated in a procedure for the protection of legality due to procedural violations. In the event of the abrogation of a criminal judgment, even if criminal prosecution had been time barred, the mentioned provision now provides a defendant who has succeeded with his or her request the possibility of rehabilitation in new proceedings and in a reasonable time with regard to limitation periods.

4 Ž. Zobec, Komentar Zakona o kazenskem postopku s sodno prakso [Commentary on the Criminal Procedure Act with Case Law], Gospodarski vestnik, Ljubljana 1985, p. 781.

5 Š. Horvat, op. cit., p. 832, point 7.

6 Decisions of the Constitutional Court No. Up-49/97, dated 29 November 2001 (Official Gazette RS, No. 101/01, and OdlUS X, 232), and No. Up-2442/06, dated 4 December 2008 (Official Gazette RS, No. 119/08, and OdlUS XVII, 95).

12. In addition, in the new proceedings the court may not apply the provisions regarding limitation periods contained in the second paragraph of Article 91 of the CC-1, as these criminal proceedings are conducted regarding criminal offences that are defined in accordance with the CC previously in force (CC – official consolidated text No. 1). The new CC-1 could only be applied if also the legal definition of the criminal offences were changed and defined in accordance with the new CC-1. However, such an amendment of the legal qualification of the criminal offences is only possible in accordance with the condition determined by the second paragraph of Article 3 of the CC and the second paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitution. The new CC-1 is not more lenient with regard to the complainants and therefore it may not be applied. A direct combination of both laws, i.e. the CC and the CC-1, is of course not possible, as the new law can only be applied in its entirety.<sup>7</sup> Nevertheless, the enactment of the limitation period by the new CC-1 indirectly also applies to cases adjudicated under the CC, namely in the sense that in the event of abrogation, at least the limitation period that has not yet expired has to be considered for criminal prosecution in accordance with the rules of the general part of the CC.

13. The judge of the court of first instance will thus also have to take into account the rules on limitation periods or the absolute limitation periods in accordance with the sixth paragraph of Article 112 in conjunction with point 4 of the first paragraph of Article 111 of the CC in his or her decisions. Also with regard to the co-defendants in the criminal case at issue, whose cases were considered separately, the absolute limitation period will be taken into account, which, due to the principle of equal rights, will have to apply also to the other constitutional complainants. The time left before the expiry of the absolute limitation period will enable the court to adopt a decision in accordance with the Decisions of the Constitutional Court.

Dr Mitja Deisinger

---

<sup>7</sup> I. Bele, Kazenski zakonik s komentarjem, Splošni del [The Criminal Procedure with Commentary, General Part], GV Založba, Ljubljana 2001, p. 41.

DECISION

At a session held on 8 June 1995, in proceedings to decide upon the constitutional complaint of A.A. from [...], the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

The constitutional complaint, in so far as it relates to the Order of the Ljubljana Higher Court No. Kp 533/93, dated 9 June 1993, and the Order of the Ljubljana Basic Court, Ljubljana Unit, No. Ks 248/93, dated 12 March 1993, is dismissed.

The Judgment of the Supreme Court No. I Ips 233/92, dated 13 January 1993, the Judgment of the Ljubljana Higher Court No. Kp 776/92, dated 22 September 1992, and the Judgment of the Ljubljana Basic Court, Ljubljana Unit, No. III K 387/91, dated 14 April 1992, are abrogated.

The case has been remanded to the Ljubljana Local Court for new adjudication.

Reasoning

A

1. In his constitutional complaint, which was lodged on 9 July 1993, the complainant stated that he was found guilty of the criminal offence of concealment on the basis of Article 176 of the Criminal Code of the Republic of Slovenia (1977) and sentenced to three months in prison by way of a Judgment of the Ljubljana Basic Court, Ljubljana Unit, No. III K 387/91, dated 14 April 1992, in conjunction with the Judgment of the Ljubljana Higher Court No. Kp 776/92, dated 22 September 1992. The Supreme Court rejected the request for the extraordinary examination of the final judgment; the request to reopen proceedings (Order of the Ljubljana Basic Court, Ljubljana Unit, No. Ks 248/93, dated 12 March 1993) and the appeal against this order (Order of the Ljubljana Higher Court, No. Kp 533/93, dated 9 June 1993) were also rejected. The court decisions allegedly deprived him of his right to use all the evidence available and prove his innocence. The court allegedly failed to hear the evidence in criminal proceedings by not examining the proposed witnesses who are purported to have confirmed his alleged alibi. On 10 June 1990, the date on which the criminal offence was allegedly committed by the complainant, he was allegedly sorting through bricks for his own personal needs at the company he works for. It is alleged that the court again failed to hear the evidence provided by the expert graphologist regarding the entire purchase contract and did not accurately assess the discrepancies in the testimonies taken from the injured parties. The complainant urges the Constitutional Court to ensure that the court reopens proceedings, examine the witnesses proposed, and order a graphological assessment of the entire contract and the hand-writing of the defendant and the injured parties.

2. The complainant was found guilty of committing the criminal offence of concealment, since he allegedly introduced himself as D.D. to B.B. and C.C. on 10 June 1990 and to whom he sold a Yugo 60 vehicle, which he is alleged to have known was stolen on 31 May 1990 by D. in Z. The court of first instance heard evidence from the injured party, the complainant's wife E.E., and F.F., before appointing an expert graphologist. The complainant further proposed that evidence be heard from the witnesses G.G., H.H., I.I., and J.J. He stated that witness G. could corroborate that he did in fact unload bricks at the company on 10 June 1990. The witnesses H., I., and J. were also said to be able to confirm that he was allowed to collect bricks outside working hours. The court rejected the evidence proposed by the defendant as unfounded. Its grounds for doing so were based on the fact that these "circumstances were explained to the court on the basis of the inquiries made at the defendant's employer company V.v., and, even without this explanation, the facts were sufficiently clarified through the evidence presented ". The court of first instance summarises its evaluation of the evidence as follows: "Based on all the aforementioned, especially the convincing testimony of the injured parties C.C. and B.B., the fact that the senior management of the part of the defendant's employer company V.v. cannot corroborate that the defendant was in fact sorting through roof tiles at the company on the day in question (10 June 1990), and the fact that the expert graphologist had not ruled out the defendant as a potential signatory of the purchase contract but instead revealed that there was a greater likelihood that the purchase contract had in fact been signed by the defendant, the court concludes with certainty that the defendant [...]" (followed by a summary of the charge).
3. The Higher Court confirmed the evidence assessment made by the court of first instance and concluded its own evidence assessment with the statement that "the position of the court of first instance on the fourth page of the challenged judgment also serves as a convincing explanation as to why there is no need to further verify the defendant's alibi, resulting in the court deeming the extended taking of evidence with the same evidence as proposed in the appeal to be inadmissible".
4. The Supreme Court rejected the request for the extraordinary examination of the final judgment, explaining that the alleged violation of the criminal code was non-existent. The assertions listed in the request are said to only challenge the facts, which constitute inadmissible grounds for lodging such request.
5. The request to reopen proceedings was dismissed by the court of first instance on the grounds that no new evidence had been produced, as the court had already assessed this evidence during the initial proceedings. The court of second instance confirmed the first instance judgment on the grounds that the evidence proposed did not undermine the orders of the court of first instance and the findings in the final judgment of the court of second instance.

6. In response to the constitutional complaint, the Ljubljana Higher Court referred to the reasons listed in the challenged court order.
7. In response to the assertions of the Ljubljana Higher Court, the complainant repeated the allegations from his constitutional complaint. He stated explicitly that he is challenging “all the decisions of the panel of judges, from the Basic Court to the Supreme Court”.

B

8. Above all, the complainant is challenging the Orders of the Basic and Higher courts regarding the request to reopen proceedings, without alleging that any of his constitutional rights were violated by these Orders specifically. The Constitutional Court also could not establish any such violations. As a result, the Constitutional Court dismissed this part of the constitutional complaint as unfounded (first paragraph of Article 59 of the Constitutional Court Act, Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94 - hereinafter referred to as the CCA).
9. Pursuant to the provision of Article 82 of the CCA, the constitutional complaint is deemed to have been lodged in time (as it was lodged 9 July 1993 – before the entry into force of the CCA) and is admissible (all the decisions from the initial proceedings were issued after the entry into force of the Constitution) even against the decisions of the court issued in the initial proceedings. In this case, the Constitutional Court therefore in its decision focused primarily on the issue of whether the complainant’s constitutional rights had been violated by the judicial decisions during the initial proceedings.
10. The constitutional complaint indicates that the complainant’s right to present evidence to his benefit (third indent of Article 29 of the Constitution) was allegedly violated on account of the court rejecting to hear evidence from the witnesses G., H., I., and J. and to appoint a new expert graphologist.
11. With regard to the principle of the free assessment of evidence, the court decides independently in criminal proceedings as to the evidence presented and how its credibility will be assessed. To that end, according to the inquisitorial principle, it must ensure the case is comprehensively resolved in order to determine the whole truth of the matter. However, it may deny motions that delay proceedings and do not help clarify the matter at hand (second paragraph of Article 299 of the Criminal Procedure Act, Official Gazette RS, No. 63/94 - hereinafter referred to as the CrPA; the same rule was also included in the second paragraph of Article 292 of the previous Criminal Procedure Act, Official Gazette SFRY, Nos. 4/77, 14/85, 26/86, 57/89, and 3/90 - hereinafter referred to as the 1977 CrPA).
12. However, the efforts made by the court to conduct proceedings without unnecessary delay may not lead to a violation of the defendant’s constitutional right to present evidence to his benefit (third indent of Article 29 of the Constitution). The following wording of the Constitution: “Anyone charged with a criminal offence must be guaranteed the right to present all evidence to his benefit” cannot be interpreted such that the court is obligated to hear all the evidence proposed by the defence which could, merely by its content, benefit the defendant. The wording instead implies criteria regarding the relevance of the evidence in terms of the substantive law: evidence which is irrelevant in terms of substantive law is deemed inconsequential and so cannot be considered “to the benefit of the defendant”. However, if evidence is associated with a defendant’s alibi, there is certainly no doubt of its legal relevance (and that, in this sense, it is to the benefit of the defendant).

13. The court is also not obliged to hear endlessly all the evidence proposed by the defendant, and is only required to hear evidence for which the burden of proof is satisfied by the defence, and in which the existence and legal relevance of the proposed evidence is substantiated with the required degree of probability. This is also a question which, in terms of constitutional law, depends on whether the evidence is deemed to be to the benefit of the defendant. Evidence proposed only for the purpose of creating a delay cannot benefit the defence in a substantive sense. The constitutional wording is not directed at the benefits that would be gained by the defence from delaying criminal proceedings.
14. The position of the Constitutional Court is that the cited third indent of Article 29 of the Constitution imposes the presumption that, in the event of doubt, all the evidence proposed by the defence is to the benefit of the defendant. The deciding court must take it into consideration, unless it is manifestly clear that the evidence cannot corroborate the line of defence.
15. This conclusion also stems from the logic behind the Criminal Procedure Act, according to which a criminal conviction requires that the facts are established completely and accurately (argumentum a contrario with respect to first paragraph of Article 373 of the CrPA and the equally worded provision of the first paragraph of Article 366 of the 1977 CrPA). This standard of proof is the highest possible standard of proof there is. This entails logically that a significantly lower standard than certainty, and a higher standard than the basic burden of allegation (onus proferendi), is required for the evidence proposed by parties. In other words, as soon as it is demonstrated that doubt could arise from certain evidence, which owing to the presumption of innocence would result in a judgment of acquittal, the court is obligated to accept such proposed evidence and ensure that this aspect of the criminal case has been fully investigated. Since the probability regarding a party’s proposed evidence is actually the likelihood of a probability (of the evidence), it would make no sense to prescribe abstract rules regarding the level of this probability, in order to force the court to accept the proposed evidence. This must be subject of the diligent and specific consideration of evidence by the court deciding on the matter. In any case, it is clear already at first glance that proposed evidence regarding an alibi is decisive in most criminal proceedings. The court is therefore required to fully verify the existence of an alibi if the defence demonstrates at least its likelihood in its motion for adducing the evidence.

16. In the case at issue, by simply rejecting the evidence to be heard from witnesses H., I. and J. and not appointing a new graphologist, the court would not be in breach of the threshold of the principle of the free assessment of evidence. The appointment of another expert is subject to the court's assessment of the evidence. Furthermore, the fact the proposed witnesses could corroborate according to the complainant's assertions has already been established through enquiries made at the complainant's employer company.
17. According to the Constitutional Court's assessment, the court violated the complainant's right to the presentation of evidence to his benefit by rejecting the submitted evidence to examine witness G. As is evident from the criminal case file, the complainant throughout the proceedings – in his defence against the charge (doc. No. 38), as well as at the main hearing (doc. Nos. 59 and 85) and in his appeal (doc. No. 104) – proposed the taking of evidence regarding his alibi to examine multiple witnesses. In the proposal to examine witness G., the defendant also claimed that this witness could corroborate that the defendant was in fact unloading bricks (doc. No. 59) at the company on the day in question (10 June 1990). The court of first instance rejected the proposed evidence to examine the witness, providing the following explanation: "The defendant proposed that the court hear his neighbour G.G. as a witness, who would be able to corroborate that the defendant was unloading bricks at the company on 10 June 1990, and hear evidence from H.H., I.I., and J.J. who would confirm that the defendant was allowed to unload and collect bricks outside working hours. However, the court rejected this evidence proposed by the defendant as unfounded, given that these circumstances surrounding the case were explained to the court through enquiries made at the defendant's employer, company V.v. The facts of the case were sufficiently clarified by the evidence presented, even without this evidence." The complainant therefore explicitly stated that the witness G.G. could confirm that he, the defendant, was not at the location where the criminal offence was committed on 10 June 1990. During the taking of evidence, the disputed fact was addressed only by both injured parties, who confirmed the assertions of the charge and the complainant's wife, who denied them. In no way was the disputed fact clarified by the enquiries made at the complainant's employer company, which the court provided as an additional argument for rejecting the proposed evidence in the reasoning of the judgment. Despite the fact that only evidence supporting the charge was presented regarding the disputed fact (the credibility of the testimony of the complainant's wife was denied by the court in general), the court dismissed the complainant's proposed evidence as unfounded. Such decision by the court entails a violation of the defendant's right to the presentation of evidence to his benefit (third indent of Article 29 of the Constitution).
18. The orders of the court deciding on the matter regarding the acceptance or rejection of the evidence proposed by the parties are procedural in nature. It is altogether usual that there is no appeal against such orders, as this would delay the course of the main hearing. On the other hand, this means that the appellate court, in instances where the defence challenges a judgment of conviction on the grounds of the erroneous or incomplete determination of facts, must be even more wary of the first instance reasoning for rejecting the evidence proposed by the defence during a main hearing. For this reason, in this case the decision of the court of second instance also violates the defendant's constitutional right to present evidence to his benefit. Despite the repeated proposal of evidence, the court of second instance rejected this proposal, simply by making reference to the part of the reasoning of the first instance judgment where the court of first instance rejected the persuasiveness of the testimony of the witnesses favouring the complainant on account of the persuasiveness of the testimony of the injured parties. In its reasoning, its explanation was brief: "On the fourth page of the challenged judgment, the court of first instance has explained convincingly why there was no need to further verify the defendant's alibi, owing to which the proposed additional examination of evidence in the appeal proceedings with the same means of evidence cannot be accepted". Since the second instance judgment failed to redress the violations of the defendant's constitutional right, despite the scope of the assessment provided by the CrPA making such possible, the Constitutional Court finds that the defendant's constitutional right to present evidence to his benefit was also violated by this decision.

19. Furthermore, the violations of these constitutional rights were not remedied by the court even when deciding on the request for the extraordinary examination of the final judgment. The complainant, in fact, only put forward the violation of the criminal code and the existence of considerable doubt regarding the veracity of the decisive facts, but included the following, inter alia, in his explanation: "The court also failed to hear all the required evidence (especially regarding the fact that the convicted person was actually at V.v. and not the automotive fair on the day in question). The accuracy of this fact follows from the statement submitted by H.H. who, together with the convicted person, carried out work at the V.v. on 9 and 10 June 1990 between 9.00 am and 6.00 pm." The Supreme Court rejected this assertion by establishing that "by displaying, [...] that doubt exists as to whether the convicted person was selling this vehicle, which is also evident from the testimony of H.H., [...] the defence counsel in his application argues that the facts were erroneously and incompletely determined. However, this is not an admissible ground for lodging this extraordinary legal remedy."

As already explained, on account of failing to verify the alleged alibi, the courts of first instance and second instance violated the complainant's constitutional right to present evidence to his benefit as a defendant. The cited assertions of the complainant mean exactly the same in terms of their content: through these assertions, the complainant repeated his proposal for his alibi to be checked. In the context of the correct legal qualification, the Supreme Court should have taken these assertions into account, not merely as an alleged erroneous determination of facts, but also as an alleged violation of the right to a defence, which is also an admissible reason for lodging a request for the extraordinary examination of final judgments (Point 3 of Article 427 of the 1977 CrPA), and found in favour of the request. Since it failed to do so, the Constitutional Court finds that the complainant's right referred to in the third indent of Article 29 of the Constitution was also violated by the decision of the Supreme Court.

20. If the constitutional complaint is granted, the Constitutional Court abrogates the decision and remands the case to the authority competent to decide thereon (first paragraph of Article 59 of the CCA). After determining the violation of the complainant's right referred to in the third indent of Article 29 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court abrogated the decisions of the courts of first, second, and third instance, which were issued during the initial proceedings, and remanded the case for re-adjudication to the court that decided on the case at the first instance (Article 427 of the CrPA in conjunction with Article 6 of the CCA).
21. The Constitutional Court granted the constitutional complaint, since, by rejecting the proposed evidence to examine witness G., who is alleged to have been able to corroborate the alibi of the defendant, the court violated the defendant's constitutional right to present evidence to his benefit. The court shall therefore also be required to hear this evidence in the new proceedings.
22. Despite the Constitutional Court not granting the constitutional complaint in the part that relates to the rejection of the proposed evidence to examine the other witnesses and to appoint a new expert graphologist, the complainant can again propose that such evidence be taken in the new proceedings (third paragraph of Article 428 of the CrPA in conjunction with Article 6 of the CCA).
23. The other provisions of Article 428 of the CrPA shall also apply for the new proceedings.

C

24. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 59 of the Constitutional Court Act, composed of: Dr Tone Jerovšek, President, and Judges Dr Peter Jambrek, Mag. Matevž Krivic, Mag. Janez Snoj, Dr Lovro Šturm, Franc Testen, Dr Lojze Ude, and Dr Boštjan M. Zupančič. Decision was reached unanimously.

Dr Tone Jerovšek
President

Decision No. U-I-271/08, dated 24 March 2011

DECISION

At a session held on 24 March 2011 in proceedings to review constitutionality initiated at the request of the Supreme Court of the Republic of Slovenia, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. The third paragraph of Article 56 of the Police Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 107/06 – official consolidated text) was inconsistent with the Constitution.
2. The fourth paragraph of Article 56 of the Police Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 66/09 – official consolidated text, and 22/10) is abrogated to the extent that it refers to the conditions and decision-making procedure for relieving individuals of the duty to maintain the confidentiality of information with regard to the taking of evidence by means of the examination of a police employee in criminal proceedings.
3. Until such time as the statutory regulation thereof changes, the Minister in charge of internal affairs can, [at the request of the competent authority,] relieve a police employee of the duty to maintain the confidentiality of the information determined by the first paragraph of Article 56 of the Police Act. In the event the Minister deems that there are reasons why a police employee cannot be partially or entirely relieved of the duty to maintain the confidentiality of information, he shall inform the president of the competent Higher Court thereof and of the reasons for such opinion within eight days of receiving the request. After examining the criminal file and the confidential information which the Minister deems cannot be disclosed, the president of the Higher Court may order that the confidential information be disclosed, determine the scope and conditions of the disclosure thereof, and determine the use of protective measures, if applicable, under the terms and in the manner determined in paragraphs 34-36 of the reasoning of this Decision. The police must enable the president of the Higher Court to have access to the confidential information that is the subject of the court order.

A

1. Pursuant to Article 156 of the Constitution and the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 64/07 – official consolidated text; hereinafter referred to as the CCA), the Supreme Court stayed the proceedings following a request for the protection of legality by order No. I Ips 187/2007, dated 8 October 2008, and requested that the Constitutional Court review the constitutionality of Article 56 of the Police Act (hereinafter referred to as the PA-OCT6). The provision thereunder regulates the conditions and procedure for the Minister to decide to relieve a police officer or an individual who has helped the police conduct their tasks determined by an act of their duty to maintain the confidentiality of information. In the opinion of the applicant, this provision determines in an unconstitutional manner the conditions under which a defendant is provided information relevant to his defence.
2. The applicant alleges that the third paragraph of Article 56 of the PA-OCT6 is inconsistent with the first indent of Article 29 of the Constitution and point (b) of the third paragraph of Article 6 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 33/94, MP, and 7/94 - hereinafter referred to as the ECHR), which guarantee everyone charged with a criminal offence the right to have adequate time and facilities to prepare his defence; the third indent of Article 29 of the Constitution and point (d) of the third paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR, which guarantee the right to present evidence to the benefit of the defendant and the right to obtain the examination of witnesses on his behalf; Article 23 and the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, and the first paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR, which guarantee the right to the judicial protection of human rights; and Article 2 of the Constitution. The applicant alleges that the challenged provision does not precisely determine the substance of the conditions under which it is admissible to interfere with the mentioned guarantees, that it interferes disproportionately with the mentioned guarantees by not providing for the application of more lenient measures for achieving the aims pursued by the Act, and that the Minister (not a court) is competent to decide on the interference with the mentioned guarantees at his discretion, whereby protection from arbitrary decisions by the competent authority is not ensured.
3. The National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia did not reply to the request. The Government of the Republic of Slovenia submitted an opinion, rejecting the applicant's allegations as unfounded. It states that the Minister's right to not relieve a police officer of the duty to maintain the confidentiality of the identity of an individual who provides the police information about a criminal offence is of key importance in that the safety of the anonymous source could otherwise be jeopardised. Individuals who provide information to the police are allegedly often afraid for their life and health, and concerned about potential threats to those close to them. These individuals allegedly have a trust relationship with the police, the abuse of which would allegedly be inadmissible. This would make it more difficult for the police to investigate criminal offences. In weighing the right of a defendant to a defence against the right to safety of an individual who provides incriminating evidence, the right of the latter allegedly prevails. The Government furthermore points to the practice developed with regard to undercover agents. In such cases, the Minister relieves the undercover agent of the duty to maintain confidentiality to the extent that it refers to the substance of the measure (collected evidence), but he does not relieve him of the duty to maintain confidentiality to the extent that it refers to the tactics and methods of police work, including regarding his true identity. Such decisions by the Minister are allegedly directly connected to the implementation of the third paragraph of Article 240 and Article 240.a of the Criminal Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 32/07 – official consolidated text, 68/08, and 77/09 – hereinafter referred to as the CrPA). The Government states that the legislature in fact did not define the substance of the conditions for relieving one of the duty to maintain confidentiality in Article 56 of the PA-OCT6, however, the hitherto practice shows that decisions on relieving individuals of the duty to maintain confidentiality are made selectively and only in the event specific conditions are fulfilled. The challenged provision is allegedly the only safeguard in cases involving protection of the confidentiality of police work. As the person authorised to relieve individuals of the duty to maintain confidentiality, the Minister is allegedly independent of the pre-trial procedure carried out by the police and directed by the competent state prosecutor. His competence is allegedly circumscribed by the need to protect the lives of individuals, not the substance of specific criminal proceedings. The Minister allegedly does not have discretion in his decisions, as claimed by the applicant, as the conditions that he needs to take into account are allegedly determined. His competence with regard to the decision-making at issue is allegedly not inconsistent with the Constitution. That the court would have competence is allegedly possible in principle, however, due to practical reasons it is less appropriate. The Government furthermore calls attention to the second paragraph of Article 33 of the Classified Information Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 50/06 – official consolidated text, and 9/10 – hereinafter referred to as the CIA), whose substance is identical to that of the third paragraph of Article 56 of the PA-OCT6.

4. The Constitutional Court obtained explanations with regard to the legal regime for classifying information from the Ministry of the Interior (hereinafter referred to as the Ministry). Regarding confidentiality in handling information, the Ministry states that sources of reports, information, and complaints are subject to the legal regime as provided by the CIA, whereby Article 56 of the PA-OCT6 additionally determines the duty to protect professional secrecy. In accordance with and under the conditions arising from the CIA, the police as a general rule allegedly classify the identity of individuals collaborating with the police as sources of reports, information, and complaints; less frequently is classification applied to data obtained from such sources. Confidential information is allegedly deemed to mean information whose disclosure to unauthorised persons could have implications for the security activities of the state authorities of the Republic of Slovenia. The Ministry explains that the second paragraph of Article 33 of the CIA contains the same provision in terms of substance as the third paragraph of Article 56 of the PA-OCT6, in which the scope and the purpose of relieving someone of the duty to maintain the confidentiality of information are crucial. The PA-OCT6 allegedly determines the mentioned substance in narrower terms to the extent that it refers to jeopardising the lives or personal safety of individuals, which, in the case under consideration, allegedly entails the source of the report, information, and complaint. Confidentiality conditions on the basis of the provisions of the CIA allegedly apply with regard to the identity of persons carrying out undercover investigation measures, who perform tasks exclusively on the basis of permission granted by the competent state prosecutor.

B – I

5. If a court deciding some matter deems a law which it should apply to be unconstitutional, it must stay the proceedings and initiate proceedings before the Constitutional Court in accordance with Article 156 of the Constitution and the first paragraph of Article 23 of the CCA. It follows from the reasoning of the Supreme Court's decision to stay the proceedings that the Supreme Court should have applied the third paragraph of Article 56 of the PA-OCT6, as it regulates the conditions and competences to decide to relieve individuals of the duty to maintain confidentiality, thereby determining the conditions under which a police officer may be examined as a witness with respect to data classified as confidential (Article 235 of the CrPA), and the conditions under which he may decline to testify (the fifth item of the first paragraph of Article 236 of the CrPA). It furthermore follows from the decision that the defendant's attorney, in the request for the protection of legality, alleges a violation to the right to a defence under Article 29 of the Constitution and point (d) of the third paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR, in that the defence was not allowed to examine a witness on his behalf, i.e. the person with whom the police officer conducted an informal interview in the pre-trial procedure, and summarised the contents thereof in an official note (which is a part of the case file).
6. As is evident from the first-instance judgment, the court rejected the defence's proposal of evidence and its proposal to apply measures under Article 240.a of the CrPA. It stated that due to objective reasons it did not have at its disposal information about the identity of the person whose examination the defence proposes. In Judgment No. I Kp 1240/2005, dated 10 February 2006, the Higher Court adopted the position that legal and formal reasons rendered it impossible to present evidence by means of the examination of the person who provided the police officer the information in the official note; the evidence was not available because the Minister of the Interior did not enable the disclosure of the identity of the person. With regard to the allegation that the defendant's rights were violated, it adopted the position that in such circumstances the court cannot violate the provisions of laws, the Constitution, or the Convention. In the appeals procedure against the judgment of the court of second instance, the Supreme Court upheld the positions of the lower courts. In Decision No. Kp 6/2006, dated 15 November 2006, it stated that the court unsuccessfully demanded three times that the Minister relieve the criminal detective of the duty to protect the identity of his source of information about the criminal offence as without the Minister's approval the criminal detective was not at liberty to reveal the identity even to the court. According to the position of the Supreme Court, the court of first instance was unable to examine as a witness a person whose identity it did not know and, therefore, could not violate the defendant's right to examine witnesses.

7. During the course of proceedings before the Constitutional Court, the challenged third paragraph of Article 56 of the PA-OCT6 was amended by the Act Amending the Police Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 42/09 – hereinafter referred to as the PA-G). By the amendment, the third paragraph of Article 56 of the PA-OCT6 became the fourth paragraph of Article 56 of the Police Act (hereinafter referred to as the PA), whose substance differs only marginally from the previous third paragraph of Article 56 of the PA-OCT6.
8. If during proceedings before the Constitutional Court a regulation ceased to be in force in the challenged part or was amended, the Constitutional Court decides on its constitutionality or legality if the applicant or petitioner demonstrates that the consequences of its unconstitutionality or unlawfulness were not remedied (the second paragraph of Article 47 of the CCA). In the case under consideration, the request for a review of constitutionality was made by the Supreme Court. After the Constitutional Court reaches its decision, the Supreme Court will have to decide in the procedure for the extraordinary legal remedy on the correctness and legality of the positions of lower courts which were adopted on the basis of the challenged legal provision that is no longer in force, hence the third paragraph of Article 56 of the PA-OCT6 is still relevant to decisions by the Supreme Court. Therefore, the Constitutional Court deemed that the conditions determined in Article 47 of the CCA are fulfilled and reviewed the challenged provision.
9. The Constitutional Court conducted the review of the conditions and decision-making procedure for relieving individuals of the duty to maintain the confidentiality of information with respect to the taking of evidence by means of examining a police employee in criminal proceedings. It furthermore took into account that the challenged third paragraph of Article 56 of the PA-OCT6 was replaced with the fourth paragraph of Article 56 of the PA during the course of proceedings before the Constitutional Court. Since the provisions are identical in substance, the Constitutional Court expanded the procedure for the review of constitutionality to the fourth paragraph of Article 56 of the PA pursuant to Article 30 of the CCA. It assessed that this is necessary for a comprehensive resolution of the constitutional issues raised by the case under consideration.

B – II

10. Article 56 of the PA-OCT6 stated:

“A police officer must maintain the confidentiality of state, official, or other secrets encountered while performing his duties. The duty to maintain the confidentiality of state, official, and other secrets remains in effect after the police officer's employment terminates. Police officers shall be obliged to maintain the confidentiality of a source that has filed a report, provided information, or filed a complaint. The Minister<sup>1</sup> may, in substantiated cases when this is in the interest of the criminal proceedings and does not jeopardise the life or personal safety of an individual, relieve a police officer or an individual who has helped the police to conduct their tasks determined by an act of the duty to maintain confidentiality, at the request of the competent authorities.”

---

1 Under Article 2.a of the PA-OCT6, it is the Minister in charge of internal affairs.

11. The above-mentioned article regulated the duty to maintain the confidentiality of information<sup>2</sup> which police officers become acquainted with in the course of the performance of their tasks, and the procedure for relieving police officers of the duty to maintain confidentiality. To the extent that it referred to classified information, it was a lex specialis in relation to the CIA, i.e. to the general regulation on classified information.<sup>3</sup> The challenged provision limited the possibility of relieving individuals of the duty to maintain the confidentiality of information only to cases where this was required in the interest of the criminal proceedings and did not jeopardise an individual’s life and personal safety. Only the Minister was able to relieve individuals of the duty to maintain confidentiality.<sup>4</sup>
12. The challenged regulation is connected to some of the basic responsibilities of the police: to prevent, detect, and investigate criminal offences, and to detect and arrest perpetrators of criminal offences (Article 3 of the PA-OCT6). In carrying out this task, the police use various operational methods and measures. Individuals (citizens, registered informers) privy to information about the commission of a criminal offence or preparations therefor, often play a key role in the detection and investigation of criminal offences. Such information may constitute a significant clue regarding criminal activity and its scope, and cause the police to collect information, secure evidence, initiate appropriate proceedings in conjunction with the state prosecutor, etc. In the investigation of complex forms of criminal offences and organised crime, effective police tactics are particularly important. Individuals who provide information about perpetrators of criminal offences may be directly jeopardised were their identity to be disclosed. Trust as a key assumption in the cooperation of individuals with the police is also jeopardised. The regulation of the protection of the confidentiality of sources of reports, information, or complaints, thereby guaranteeing anonymity to individuals who voluntarily collaborate with the police based on a relationship of trust and in secrecy, is, therefore, important for ensuring justice in society.<sup>5</sup> It encourages active

---

2 The term confidential means all information subject to the duty to maintain confidentiality or classified as secret (i.e. classified information, protected information, and personal information).

3 The CIA determines the basic principles of the uniform system for the determination of, safeguarding of, and access to classified information in the sphere of activity of government authorities of the Republic of Slovenia relating to public security, defence, foreign affairs, or the intelligence and security activities of the country, and for the declassification of such information (the first paragraph of Article 1).

4 Cf. the second paragraph of Article 33 of the CIA, which stipulates that the head of an authority may, at the request of the competent authorities, relieve a person of the duty to maintain the confidentiality of information solely for the purposes of and to the extent specified in the request of the competent authority.

5 In common law systems, informer privilege is recognised as a mechanism which plays a crucial role in implementing the law. It is based on the understanding that protecting the identity of informers is important for the safety of these persons and for encouraging citizens to disclose information about criminal offences and citizenship. It is furthermore important to ensure the confidentiality of the identity of persons carrying out undercover investigative measures in pre-trial procedures,<sup>6</sup> and of other sensitive information whose disclosure might facilitate the perpetration of a criminal offence or make the detection or investigation thereof more difficult.<sup>7</sup>

13. In criminal proceedings, the duty of police officers to maintain the confidentiality of the information referred to in the first and second paragraphs of Article 56 of the PA-OCT6 is multi-faceted. Police officers may not disclose confidential information in a criminal complaint or in annexes thereto.<sup>8</sup> A criminal complaint becomes a part of the case file when the state prosecutor sends it to the investigating judge (the fourth paragraph of Article 168 of the CrPA) or when he brings an indictment or charge (Article 170 and the second paragraph of Article 430 of the CrPA), with the defendant having the right to learn of the criminal complaint when he asserts the right to examine the case file (the fifth paragraph of Article 128 of the CrPA). Non-disclosure of confidential information in a criminal complaint entails that the court and the parties to the proceedings are not informed thereof.
14. It is particularly important for the protection of confidential information under what conditions a police officer (or an individual who helps the police carry out perpetrators. According to the standpoints of the Canadian Supreme Court, informer privilege is of such fundamental importance to the working of the criminal justice system that it cannot be balanced against other interests relating to the administration of justice. Neither the police nor the court is allowed to make decisions that would relativise its scope. The privilege may be claimed by the prosecution, which cannot make an exception without the consent of the informer. In this sense, the privilege is also a right that the informer has. The privilege prevents not only the disclosure of the informer's name, it also prevents the disclosure of any information that may indirectly reveal his identity. The only admissible exception is the innocence at stake exception. See the decision in the case R. v. Leipert, 1997, 1 S. C. R. 281.

---

- 6 These include police officers, undercover agents, or agents carrying out measures pursuant to Articles 149.a, 150, 151, 155, and 155.a of the CrPA. Since these persons help the police or cooperate with the police in the collection of evidence and the detection of serious criminal offences, it is in the interest of the police and in the public interest to keep them anonymous and, consequently, make it possible for them to continue to cooperate on similar tasks.
- 7 In addition to information that makes it possible to identify human sources of information, information crucial to police work includes information facilitating the identification of individuals who are being investigated by the police; information potentially disclosing operational measures, actions, and methods carried out by the police to prevent criminal offences and to detect or apprehend perpetrators of criminal offences; and intelligence obtained from foreign police forces, security and intelligence services, and international police and security organisations.
- 8 In executing their tasks on the basis of Article 148 of the CrPA, the police must collect all information that may be useful in the successful conduct of criminal procedures (the first paragraph of Article 148 of the CrPA). On the basis of the collected information, the police put together a criminal complaint in which they state the evidence found in the course of the collection of information. The criminal charge does not include statements made by individual persons in the information gathering process. Items, sketches, photographs, reports, records of the measures and actions undertaken, official annotations, statements, and other material which may be useful for the successful conduct of criminal proceedings are enclosed with the criminal charge (the ninth paragraph of Article 148 of the CrPA).

their tasks) may be examined as a witness with respect to information whose confidentiality he must maintain. Pursuant to the first point of Article 235 of the CrPA, it is impossible to examine as a witness “a person who by giving testimony would violate the obligation to maintain the confidentiality of an official or military secret, until the competent authority relieves him of that duty”. Pursuant to the fifth point of the first paragraph of Article 236 of the CrPA, “a counsel, doctor, social worker, psychologist, or other person [is exempt from the duty to testify] on facts he came to know in carrying out his profession if he is bound by the duty to maintain the confidentiality of information he learns of in carrying out his profession, except [...] if statutory conditions are fulfilled under which such persons are relieved of the duty to maintain confidentiality or are bound to disclose confidential information to competent authorities”. The challenged provision determined the conditions under which a police officer or an individual who has helped the police carry out their tasks determined by an act may be examined as a witness with respect to confidential information. A person’s identity may be considered confidential information. It is classified as such if it is so important that its disclosure to unauthorised persons could or might obviously prejudice the security activities of government authorities (Article 5 of the CIA). According to the Ministry, as a general rule the police classify the identity of sources of reports, information, and complaints pursuant to the provisions of the CIA when such sources are individuals who cooperate with the police. In the event that their incriminating statements are directly or indirectly part of the evidence in criminal proceedings, or when the statements are so important for the defence that their effective presentation would require the disclosure of such persons, the protection of the confidential information may trigger a conflict of constitutional values, which the applicant calls attention to.

B – III

Starting points of the review

15. In Article 23, the Constitution guarantees the right to judicial protection. Pursuant to the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution, everyone has the right to have any decision regarding his rights, duties, and any charges brought against him made without undue delay by an independent, impartial court constituted by law. Accordingly, any charge against an individual must be decided by a court, i.e. a state authority which fulfils the criteria of impartiality. At the same time, the first paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR stipulates that everyone is entitled to have criminal charges against him examined by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law. With regard to violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms, judicial protection is also provided in the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution. What is also important for the case under consideration is the minimum procedural guarantees in criminal proceedings, which include the following rights to the same extent for everyone charged with a criminal offence: the right to have adequate time and facilities to prepare his defence, and the right to present all evidence to his benefit (the first and third indents of Article 29 of the Constitution). Points (b) and (d) of the third paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR guarantee the defendant the following minimum rights: to have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of his defence, and to examine or have examined witnesses against him and to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him.

16. With regard to the third indent of Article 29 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court adopted the following positions in Decision No. Up-34/93, dated 8 June 1995 (OdlUS IV, 129): (1) under the principle of the free assessment of evidence, a court decides itself which evidence it will take and how it will adjudge the credibility thereof; (2) a court is not bound to take every item of evidence proposed by the defence; (3) a proposed item of evidence must be legally relevant; (4) the defence must substantiate the existence and legal relevance of proposed evidence with the requisite degree of probability; (5) when there are doubts, any proposal of evidence is to be considered to the benefit of the defendant and the court must take it unless it is obvious that the evidence would not be beneficial. A court is, therefore, obliged to take evidence to the benefit of the defendant if the defence (explicitly) proposes the taking of evidence and satisfies the burden of proof with respect to the existence and substantive relevance of the evidence. As soon as it is demonstrated that a piece of evidence raises doubts that, in view of the presumption of innocence, would result in an acquittal, the court must take such proposal of evidence and ensure that this aspect of the criminal case is fully investigated. The court takes the decision on the proposal of evidence on the basis of diligent, specific, and concrete consideration of the evidence.<sup>9</sup>
17. In Decision No. Up-207/99, dated 4 July 2002 (Official Gazette RS, No. 65/02, and OdlUS XI, 266), the Constitutional Court, referring to point (d) of the third paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR, stated that the defendant must be allowed to challenge incriminating statements, either in the investigation phase or at the main hearing, and to examine the author thereof with respect to such statements. In that case, it decided that the right to examine witnesses against the defendant was not violated, as the defendant had the opportunity to examine the injured party in the phase of investigation but did not use the opportunity due to reasons he was responsible for.<sup>10</sup> In Decision No. Up-518/03, dated 19 January 2006 (Official Gazette RS, No. 11/06, and OdlUS XV, 37), the Constitutional Court found that the court used the incriminating statements of police informers and admitted them as evidence in the proceedings without allowing the defence to examine the author thereof with respect to these statements. It stated that the burden of substantiating evidence may be imposed on the defence only in the event the defence demands the examination of witnesses to the benefit of the defendant or the taking of other evidence to the benefit of the defendant.<sup>11</sup> In Decision No. Up-719/03, dated 9 March 2006 (Official Gazette RS, No. 30/06, and OdlUS XV, 41), the Constitutional Court adopted the position that, in the event a defendant is unable to exercise his right to examine witnesses against him, a guilty verdict may not be exclusively or to a decisive degree based on the statements of such witnesses. An item of evidence is also deemed to be, to a significant degree, the basis of conviction when the court which handed down the verdict reviewed the remaining evidence primarily in terms of whether they confirm the controversial statements of the witnesses against the defendant.<sup>12</sup> In that decision, the Constitutional Court decided that inability to exercise this legal guarantee, which is ensured by the ECHR, at the same time constitutes a violation of the right to a defence guaranteed by Article 29 of the Constitution.<sup>13</sup>

9 Cf. Constitutional Court Decision No. Up-34/93, Paragraph 15. See also Constitutional Court Decision No. Up-13/94, dated 8 June 1995 (OdlUS IV, 128).

10 In this decision, the Constitutional Court took into account the positions of the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR) in Kostovski v. The Netherlands (judgment dated 20 November 1989), in which the ECtHR explained the substance of the right to examine witnesses against the defendant. It stressed that, in principle, all the evidence must be presented in the presence of the defendant at a public hearing with a view to adversarial argument. This does not entail, however, that in order to be used as evidence, statements of witnesses should always be made at a public hearing in court. Using as evidence such statements obtained at the pre-trial stage is not in itself inconsistent with the first paragraph and point (d) of the third paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR, provided the rights of the defence have been respected.

18. In accordance with the positions of the ECtHR, the right to a fair trial is expressed in adversarial proceedings and in the equality of arms between the prosecution and the defence<sup>14</sup>. It follows from the right to adversarial proceedings that the defence and the prosecution are given the opportunity to be informed about, and make statements with regard to, allegations and evidence put forward by the opposing party. Furthermore, what follows from the first paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR is the requirement that prosecuting authorities disclose to the defence essential evidence for the benefit of or against the defendant which they possess.<sup>15</sup> However, the ECtHR emphasises that the right to the disclosure of relevant evidence is not absolute; in a criminal procedure it must be weighed against competing relevant interests such as national security, the protection of witnesses from reprisals, and maintaining the secrecy of methods of police investigation.<sup>16</sup> In Lüdi v. Switzerland, it recognised as legitimate the interest of the police to preserve the anonymity of their undercover agent so that they could protect him and make use of him again in the future.<sup>17</sup> However, 11 In addition to Kostovski v. the Netherlands, the Constitutional Court in this decision also referred to Lüdi v. Switzerland (judgment dated 15 June 1992).

---

12 In this decision, the Constitutional Court inter alia referred to the judgments in the case of Lucif v. Italy, dated 27 February 2001, and Mild and Virtanen v. Finland, dated 26 October 2005. See also the judgment in the case Krasniki v. the Czech Republic, dated 28 May 2006.

13 See also Constitutional Court Decisions Nos. Up-849/05, dated 18 October 2007 (Official Gazette RS, No. 102/07, and OdlUS XVI, 110), Up-487/04, dated 22 June 2006 (Official Gazette RS, No. 69/06, and OdlUS XV, 91), Up-754/04, dated 14 September 2006 (Official Gazette RS, No. 101/06, and OdlUS XV, 94), and Up-483/05, dated 3 July 2008 (Official Gazette RS, No. 76/08, and OdlUS XVII, 78).

14 Judgment in the case Brandstetter v. Austria, dated 28 August 1991, Paras. 66, 67.

15 Judgments in the cases Jasper v. the United Kingdom, dated 16 February 2000, Para. 51, and Rowe and Davis v. the United Kingdom, dated 16 February 2000, Para. 60.

16 Judgments in the cases Jasper v. the United Kingdom, Para. 52, and Rowe and Davis v. the United Kingdom, Para. 61.

17 Judgment dated 15 June 1992, Para. 49.

according to the positions of the ECtHR, withholding evidence from a defendant is admissible only if it is strictly necessary. Moreover, any limitation on the rights of the defence must be sufficiently counterbalanced by the procedures followed by the judicial authorities.<sup>18</sup> The decision-making procedure must, therefore, as far as possible comply with the requirements to ensure adversarial proceedings and the equality of arms and incorporate adequate safeguards to protect the interests of the defendant.<sup>19</sup>

19. In view of the above, the Constitutional Court must decide whether the third paragraph of Article 56 of the PA-OCT6 was inconsistent with any of the fundamental guarantees that the defendant has in criminal proceedings stated in the request, namely the first indent of Article 29 of the Constitution and point (b) of the third paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR (the right to have adequate time and facilities to prepare a defence), the third indent of Article 29 of the Constitution and point (d) of the third paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR (the right to present evidence on his behalf and examine witnesses on his behalf and against him), and the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution in conjunction with the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution and the first paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR (the right to judicial protection). In view of the interconnectedness of these fundamental human rights, and taking into account the case law of the Constitutional Court and the ECtHR, the Constitutional Court must decide whether the challenged provision, in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution, guaranteed the defendant the right to have charges against him examined by an impartial court and the right to a defence, i.e. the guarantee of fair criminal proceedings. The Constitutional Court review does not refer to the question of in which cases the police should keep information confidential, but rather it refers to the question of whether the statutory regulation of the confidentiality thereof was in conformity with the Constitution.

18 Judgments in the cases Jasper v. the United Kingdom, Para. 52, and Rowe and Davis v. the United Kingdom, Para. 61.

19 Judgments in the cases Jasper v. the United Kingdom, Para. 53, and Rowe and Davis v. the United Kingdom, Para. 62. In Jasper v. the United Kingdom, the ECtHR did not establish a violation of the first paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR, whereby it was crucial that it was a court which decided on the withholding of evidence, i.e. weighed the interests of the defence against other interests. The court decided on the withholding of evidence on the proposal of the prosecution in an ex parte procedure; the defence was notified thereof and allowed to take part in the proceedings with its proposals to disclose the evidence. In the case of Rowe and Davis v. the United Kingdom, however, the ECtHR established that limiting the rights of the defence was not sufficiently balanced by an appropriate procedure before the court because the prosecution decided to withhold evidence without notifying the court thereof. The ECtHR adopted the position that a procedure in which the prosecution itself decides on the relevance of information withheld from the defence and weighs it against the public interest in secrecy does not satisfy the requirements of the first paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR. Since the prosecution did not submit evidence to the court, i.e. allow it to decide on disclosure, the defendant was not guaranteed the right to a fair trial. See also the cases Dowsett v. the United Kingdom (judgment dated 24 June 2003) and Edwards and Lewis v. the United Kingdom (judgment dated 27 October 2004).

Reasons the challenged regulation is not in conformity with the Constitution

20. When a court assesses that evidence must be taken by means of the direct examination of a witness – either a witness against the defendant whose statement is the main or essential evidence, or a witness on his behalf – while taking into account Articles 235 and 236 of the CrPA, it cannot disregard the third paragraph of Article 56 of the PA-OCT6 in the event a witness would have to testify on information whose confidentiality he is obliged to maintain (the first and second paragraphs of Article 56 of the PA-OCT6).
21. A court can take evidence by examining a witness if it possesses information that enables the identification thereof (his first name, surname, and possibly his address and occupation),<sup>20</sup> and if the witness is not unreachable for reasons that cannot be influenced. When the identity of a witness is known only to the police, it is evident that, due to the third paragraph of Article 56 of the PA-OCT6, the examination of such a witness used to depend on a decision by the Minister. In his decision-making, the Minister could choose between two options – either to relieve an individual of the duty to maintain confidentiality or to not relieve him of such, while taking into consideration the public benefit (decision-making at the Minister's discretion). Such an interpretation is called for by the word “may” [in the third paragraph of Article 56] and the fact that in order to decline disclosure it sufficed to make a general reference to the interests of the criminal proceedings or to a witness being put in jeopardy thereby. The scope of the phrase “the interests of the criminal proceedings” is not clear. Even if it is interpreted as encompassing the interest of a defendant to confront a witness against him or to obtain the examination of witnesses on his behalf, the regulation did not require an appropriate assessment of such interest in cases when the witness or other interests were not in serious danger.<sup>21</sup> The regulation even went so far as to require that it is not allowed to disclose confidential information even to a court.<sup>22</sup>
22. The statutory regulation under which the right of a defendant to examine a witness against him or on his behalf depends on a decision made at the discretion of the Minister entails an interference with the guarantees under point (d) of the third paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR, and the right to a defence under Article 29 of the Constitution. In addition to the above-mentioned, another aspect related to a defendant's right to have adequate facilities to prepare his defence is also important. Effective exercise of this right depends on the possibilities of a defendant to have access to the evidence (sources and items of evidence). As the applicant states with good grounds, according to the conception of the criminal procedure in force, state authorities are competent to collect evidence (against or on behalf of a defendant). Individuals do

---

20 Cf. the first paragraph of Article 239 of the CrPA.

21 Compare the criterion of a risk to the life or personal safety of an individual under the third paragraph of Article 56 of the PA-OCT6 to the criterion of a serious danger to life or person under the first paragraph of Article 240a of the CrPA.

22 The judge can access classified information on the basis of Article 3 of the CIA but he cannot obtain information that only a police officer is familiar with due to his participation in a police action. Even if he could obtain the information in question, he could under no circumstances decide on its disclosure to parties to proceedings since he would be obliged to maintain its confidentiality under the provisions of the CrPA.

not have formal competence to carry out investigations, they can only obtain documents and information that citizens may obtain anyway, and file judicial petitions and proposals, but nothing more than that. Thus, the collection and selection of materials is entrusted to the police and the state prosecutor, which raises the issue of the disclosure of potentially relevant material to a defendant. If a defendant does not have access to the information important for his defence, since such is in the possession of state authorities and the duty to maintain confidentiality applies to it, he is not able to include such in the preparation of his defence. Therefore, the challenged regulation entails an interference with the right of a defendant under the first indent of Article 29 of the Constitution and point (b) of the third paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR.

23. At the same time, the fact that the decision of a court regarding the taking of evidence (or regarding the scope of such) depends on a prior decision of the Minister, entails an interference with the right to judicial protection. Deciding on criminal responsibility and pronouncing criminal sanctions belong among the classic competences of courts. “Deciding on charges” or a “trial” is interpreted also (or primarily) as deciding which decisive facts need to be established with regard to the criminal offence alleged, what evidence should be taken for such purpose, and careful, diligent, and above all unbiased consideration of such evidence (each piece separately and all together, in accordance with the principle of the free assessment of evidence). The challenged third paragraph of Article 56 of the PA-OCT6 allowed for the Minister to prevent the taking of evidence in criminal proceedings and thus to interfere with decision-making which, under the Constitution, is reserved for the courts. Since the Minister actually made decisions regarding the implementation of the guarantees under Article 29 of the Constitution and since no judicial protection was ensured against his decisions, the challenged regulation also entailed an interference with the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, which ensures judicial protection of human rights.
24. Human rights may be limited only in cases explicitly provided for by the Constitution and in order to protect the human rights of others (the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution). In accordance with the established case law of the Constitutional Court, it is possible to limit a human right if the legislature pursues a constitutionally admissible aim and if such a limitation is consistent with the principles of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution), namely with the principle that prohibits excessive interference by the state (the general principle of proportionality).<sup>23</sup>
25. Non-disclosure of certain information related to police work is undoubtedly legitimate. Such a conclusion follows not only from a careful evaluation of the societal reality we live in, but also from important constitutional law values (while respecting the fundamental principles of a democratic state governed by the rule of law and the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms).<sup>24</sup> The legislature must deter-

23 Cf. Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-18/02, dated 24 October 2003 (Official Gazette RS No. 108/03, and OdlUS XII, 86).

24 The fact that other legal orders know the regime of protecting confidential information (in relation to police work) is also not unimportant. Cf., for example, Article 203 of the Italian Code of Penal Procedure (Codice di procedura penale), Article 44 of the Finnish Police Act (No. 493/1995), and Article 96 of the German Code of mine the conditions under which it is admissible to interfere with a defendant's right to confront, directly at the main hearing (or prior to that, even before an investigating judge), witnesses against him or the rights to examine witnesses on his behalf, and/or to obtain, by means of such evidence, information that is important for his defence. With regard to such, it can take into consideration those interests that stem from important constitutional law values, such as the following: state security, the protection of individuals from interferences with their life or person, the protection of the tactics and methods of police work (e.g. the interest that the identity of undercover agents remain concealed so that they can be used in the future). The legislature specifically determined only one aim on which an interference with procedural guarantees regarding criminal procedure is based, i.e. the protection of individuals; however, practice has shown that also other aims are taken into consideration (e.g. the protection of the tactics and methods of police work),<sup>25</sup> which the legislature did not specifically define in an act, although they at the same time entail the substance of the criteria for the permissibility of an interference with the right to a defence. Each interference with human rights or fundamental freedoms must be regulated precisely and unambiguously. Any possible arbitrary decision-making by a state authority must be excluded.<sup>26</sup> The requirement that acts be precise is more emphasised the higher the disputed subject is valued. In criminal procedure, this subject (human freedom) is set the highest.<sup>27</sup>

26. The duty to maintain the confidentiality of sources and undercover agents, and withholding such from the defence (and consequently the public) is an appropriate measure for achieving the aim – i.e. the protection of a witness if his life or safety could be jeopardised. The measure of not disclosing someone's identity is necessary and proportionate if serious danger to his life or person exists or there are other substantial reasons in the public interest, while at the same time the possibility to examine such a witness upon applying protective measures is ensured.<sup>28</sup> Proportionality does not exist when, upon weighing opposing interests (the right to a defence, on one hand, against the right to safety and the interests of public order, on the other), it turns out that the negative consequences that a defendant could experience due to the non-disclosure of the identity of a witness and thus the impossibility of effective cross-examination, could be more severe than those that the witness could experience (e.g. if the level of threat to the witness or the interests of public order is relatively low).<sup>29</sup>

---

Penal Procedure (Strafprozessordnung).

- 25 It, inter alia, follows from the opinion of the Government that the Minister may not relieve a police employee of the duty to maintain confidentiality to the extent that it refers to the tactics and methods of police work.
- 26 Cf. Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-25/95, dated 27 November 1997 (Official Gazette RS No. 5/98, and OdlUS VI, 158), Paragraph 42.
- 27 Cf. Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-18/93, dated 11 April 1996 (Official Gazette RS No. 25/96, and OdlUS V, 40), Paragraph 38.
- 28 If, due to protective measures, the possibilities of the defence to examine the credibility of a witness are decreased, the court takes such into consideration in evaluating such evidence.
- 29 A defendant must be given the possibility to examine the credibility of a witness against him by cross-examination. In some cases an examination is effective only if the defendant has knowledge of the identity of the

27. When the examination of an anonymous witness suffices for the exercise of the right to a defence, the challenged measure (refusing to disclose the identity of a witness to the court) will not be necessary in such cases. Namely, in some cases it is possible to balance the interest of protecting witnesses and the interest of a defendant to confront them and to contest their statements, or to obtain the examination of witnesses on his behalf. The identity of a witness can be withheld from a defendant and the public while at the same time giving the defence an opportunity to examine the witness. In order to ensure balance between the psychological and physical protection of witnesses, on one hand, and the rights of the defendant, on the other, measures have been enacted by means of which it is possible to maintain the anonymity and thus the security of individuals (informers, undercover agents). Article 240a of the CrPA ensures anonymity to those witnesses for whom testifying and disclosing their identity could result in serious danger to their life or person or that of other persons. This especially concerns testimony related to serious offences or offences concerning organised crime. When in such cases a court considers whether the use of protective measures is justified, it assesses whether disclosing a witness's identity could seriously jeopardise the life or health of the witness or someone close to him. If it establishes such, the information related to identity should not be disclosed.<sup>30</sup> Under the challenged regulation it was possible for such consideration to not even occur. When the identity of a witness remains unknown to the court, it cannot apply the measures provided for in Article 240a of the CrPA and ensure balance between opposing interests. The above-mentioned is substantiated by the conclusion that the challenged regulation interfered in an inadmissible manner with the right of the defendant to a defence provided for in Article 29 of the Constitution and the guarantee under point (d) of the third paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR.

28. With regard to a witness against a defendant, the state has the following two options: either choose to not use such evidence against the defendant and thus ensure the complete anonymity of the source or the withholding of such information, or to insist on using such evidence and thus risk that certain confidential information will be disclosed.<sup>31</sup> In the event a piece of information whose confidentiality must be maintained would be beneficial to the defendant (which is especially evident when it is possible to witness. Special attention is required in cases when a person (an informer) is a witness to a criminal offence committed or when he acted as an agent provocateur when the defence claims that the criminal activity was incited. Cf. the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in R. v. Scott, 1990, 3 S.C.R. 979.

---

30 Such an order can be issued by the investigating judge or the head of a judicial panel after a special hearing has been held at which the defence is not allowed to be present (the fourth and fifth paragraphs of Article 240a of the CrPA). If measures under the first paragraph of Article 240a of the CrPA do not suffice, the fifth paragraph of this Article calls for the application of the Witness Protection Act (Official Gazette RS Nos. 81/06 – official consolidated text, and 110/07), which envisages also other measures.

31 The state prosecutor must pay attention to such when he indicates in the request for an investigation that particular acts be performed, or when he proposes in an indictment which evidence should be taken. With regard to the circumstances of the case, he is obliged to consult the police about issues regarding the use of information obtained from informers and undercover agents.

exculpate the defendant by means of such, e.g. when the evidence provides an alibi), classifying such information as confidential and refusing to disclose it is a barrier to effective implementation of the right to a defence. It is the duty of state authorities who ensure the efficiency of prosecution and of the courts, who must ensure the fairness of proceedings, to assess threats that would follow from different choices and to decide to apply the measure which, upon weighing the legitimate interests and values, is shown to be the least burdensome. This issue requires careful weighing of the interests of public order and/or individuals' personal safety against the right of the defendant to a defence. Whether it is demonstrated, upon appropriate weighing, that such disclosure is well-founded, depends on the circumstances in the individual case, taking into consideration the criminal offence with which the defendant is charged, possible manners of defence, the importance of testifying, and other important elements.<sup>32</sup>

29. The challenged regulation did not ensure such handling of this type of matter, especially since the criteria for decision-making were insufficiently determined and since a final decision regarding the disclosure of information was reserved for the Minister, who does not enjoy the same level of independence and impartiality as the judicial branch of power. In the system of the separation of powers as established by the Constitution the judicial branch has a special status. The reason for such is primarily in that from the range of constitutional provisions that entail a certain derivation from the principle of the separation of powers, including the system of checks and balances, it is evident that the very emphasised role of the judiciary is that of exercising supervision, especially over the executive branch of power.<sup>33</sup> Since the Minister could at his discretion refuse the request of a court to relieve an individual of the duty to maintain the confidentiality of information related to the identity of a witness, or of other important information necessary for the criminal proceedings, and it was not up to the court to carry out the final consideration of whether the reasons for the non-disclosure of certain information are justified, defendants were deprived of judicial protection (in nonconformity with the first paragraph of Article 23 in reference to the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution) and of the right to an effective defence (Article 29 of the Constitution). The challenged regulation was imbalanced since it enabled other interests to prevail over constitutionally ensured guarantees that defendants have in criminal proceedings, even when the necessity to disclose information for the needs of the defence was demonstrated; therefore, it was inconsistent with the rights under the first and third indents of Article 29 of the Constitution and the guarantees of fair criminal proceedings under the first paragraph, and points (b) and (d) of the third paragraph of Article 6 of the ECHR. The Constitutional Court did not address the allegations regarding the nonconformity with Article 2 of the Constitution separately since the relevant aspects that the applicant claimed in relation to the alleged nonconformity with Article 2 of the

---

32 Cf. U.S. Supreme Court Judgment in the case Roviaro v. United States, 1957, 353 U. S. 62.

33 As the Constitutional Court stated in Decision No. U-I-159/08, dated 11 December 2008 (Official Gazette RS No. 120/08, and OdlUS XVII, 71), Paragraph 25.

Constitution were important for the consideration of the nonconformity with the above-mentioned provisions of the Constitution.

30. In light of the above-mentioned, the Constitutional Court found that the third paragraph of Article 56 of the PA-OCT6 was inconsistent with the Constitution (Point 1 of the operative provisions).

B – IV

31. The text of Article 56 of the PA-OCT6 was amended by the PA-G such that it now reads as follows:

“Police employees must maintain the confidentiality of classified information, personal information, and protected information encountered while performing their duties. The duty to maintain the confidentiality of such information remains in effect after such employment terminates.

Protected information of the police is information whose handling requires the implementation of certain safety measures and procedures.

Police employees shall be obliged to maintain the confidentiality of a source that has filed a report, provided information, or filed a complaint.

The Minister may, in substantiated cases when this is in the interest of the criminal proceedings and does not jeopardise the life or personal safety of an individual, relieve a police employee of the duty to maintain confidentiality provided for by the first paragraph of this Article, at the request of the competent authorities.

32. Since the fourth paragraph of Article 56 of the PA does not deviate, in its essence, from the prior regulation, the nonconformity with the Constitution is demonstrated on the same grounds as with regard to the third paragraph of Article 56 of the PA-OCT6. In light of the above-mentioned, the Constitutional Court abrogated the fourth paragraph of Article 56 of the PA to the extent that it refers to the conditions and decision-making procedure for relieving individuals of the duty to maintain the confidentiality of information in criminal proceedings (Point 2 of the operative provisions). The abrogation refers to relieving individuals of the duty to maintain confidentiality in criminal proceedings with regard to the taking of evidence by means of the examination of police employees in order to decide on criminal responsibility or in relation to possible other important issue.

B – V

33. The Constitutional Court partially abrogated the fourth paragraph of Article 56 of the PA. The abrogation of the challenged provision to the extent mentioned above does not remedy the unconstitutional situation in its entirety since the decision-making procedure for disclosing confidential information that a police employee has encountered and that is necessary for carrying out criminal proceedings is not regulated. Since due to the abrogation of the special provision, the general provision under the second paragraph of Article 33 of the CIA would subsequently apply, the Constitutional Court determined, on the basis of the second paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA, the manner of the implementation of this decision. By adopting such an approach the Court on one hand protected the constitutionally admissible aim that the legislature pursued by the challenged regulation, and on the other hand it ensured that in the period prior to the adoption of the new regulation, no inadmissible interference with the human rights and fundamental freedoms of defendants would occur. And by determining the manner of implementation it also determined the procedural rules.

34. When a judge in criminal proceedings (either during an investigation or at the main hearing) finds that it is necessary to take evidence by means of examining a police employee and the taking of evidence refers to confidential information,<sup>34</sup> he requires that the Minister in charge of internal affairs relieve the police employee of the duty to maintain the confidentiality of such information.<sup>35</sup> In the event the Minister finds that there are reasons why the police employee cannot be partially or entirely relieved of the duty to maintain the confidentiality of information (e.g. for reasons of state security, the protection of the tactics and methods of police work, the personal safety of an individual), he shall inform the president of the competent Higher Court which the court that filed the request is within the jurisdiction of, of his standpoint and of the reasons for such opinion, and at the same time submit the request of the court. He shall do so within eight days of receiving the request. The president of the Higher Court then initiates the so-called ex parte procedure, the subject of which is deciding on the possible disclosure of confidential information to the defence. The police must enable the president of the Higher Court to have access to the confidential information, i.e. they must enable him to access it for the purpose of deciding whether it is admissible to disclose such in the criminal proceedings. If the police cite special reasons for maintaining confidentiality, they provide the president of the Higher Court the opportunity to access the confidential information at a location and in a manner that they determine. The request for the disclosure of information becomes void if it is related to incriminating evidence obtained by the examination of a witness which is subsequently withdrawn by the state prosecutor.
35. The president of the Higher Court may obtain explanations and opinions necessary for his decision from state authorities. In his decision-making he is not bound by the reasons stated by the Minister, and must ex officio also establish other important reasons that require the non-disclosure of the confidential information. Prior to final consideration of whether the reasons for the disclosure of certain confidential information are justified, the president of the Higher Court notifies the defendant and his attorney of the initiation of an ex parte procedure and the standpoint of the Minister, and thus enables them to state in a written submission whether the reasons for maintaining the confidentiality of certain information are justified. An adversarial aspect is ensured only to the extent possible while taking into account the nature of the matter. After examining the criminal file<sup>36</sup> and the 34 An analogous situation occurs when the issue of maintaining confidentiality is raised during the examination of a witness.

---

35 The request of the court must contain a statement of reasons.

36 When necessary, he may obtain an explanation from the judge who filed the request.

confidential information, the president of the Higher Court may order that the confidential information be disclosed and determine the scope of the disclosure thereof, all in such a manner that the confidentiality of the information is maintained.<sup>37</sup> He adopts the decision upon carefully considering the needs regarding the taking of evidence and the level of the sensitivity of the information and by weighing the conflicting constitutional law values. If the president of the Higher Court assesses that the disclosure of individual personal information or the entire identity of a source of information is not admissible, he adopts a decision regarding the possible measures provided for in the first paragraph of Article 240a of the CrPA, or submits to the state prosecutor a motion in accordance with the fifth paragraph of Article 240a of the CrPA. Disclosure of personal information or the identity of a source of information is not admissible if the safety of the witness or someone close to him is in evident and serious danger.

36. He may adopt the decision after a special hearing has been held at which he examines in camera persons who could provide information important for his decision, upon mutatis mutandis application of the fifth paragraph of Article 240a of the CrPA. He must ensure all conditions for the safe handling of confidential information while deciding on disclosure and after such. Appeal is not allowed against the order by which he decides on the requested disclosure of certain confidential information. He sends the order to the Court that filed the request, which serves it on the Minister, the state prosecutor, the defence attorney, and the defendant. If a witness has to be examined in criminal proceedings with regard to whom a protective measure has been ordered, the investigating judge or the head of the judicial panel obtains the essential information related to the identity of the witness by examining the case file held by the president of the Higher Court, or he confirms his identity with the assistance of the president of the Higher Court. During the examination of the witness the judge prohibits questions the answers to which could disclose confidential information to a greater extent than allowed.
37. The manner of implementation that the Constitutional Court established regarding the present decision does not entail that this is the only possibility consistent with the Constitution. Therefore, it does not limit the legislature in that, with regard to police employees, it should not regulate in a different manner, yet consistently with the Constitution, the issue of relieving a police employee of the duty to maintain the confidentiality of information or the issue of disclosing such information to the extent to which such is essential in order to carry out criminal proceedings. Within this framework, the legislature may also consider the option of introducing a mechanism that would, in exceptional cases, enable the state prosecutor to decide to terminate the proceedings when there is a risk of the disclosure of confidential information due to a court order. Such a mechanism could entail a special guarantee for the protection of confidential information in exceptional cases.

37 Cf. the second sentence of the second paragraph of Article 240a of the CrPA: "The decision may not contain information that could lead to the disclosure of information that is the subject of the protective measure."

C

38. The Constitutional Court reached this Decision on the basis of Article 21, the second paragraph of Article 47, Article 43, and the second paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA, composed of: Dr Ernest Petrič, President, and Judges Dr Etelka Korpič – Horvat, Mag. Miroslav Mozetič, Jasna Pogačar, and Mag. Jadranka Sovdat. Judges Dr Mitja Deisinger, Jože Tratnik, and Jan Zobec were disqualified from deciding on the case. The decision was adopted unanimously.

Dr Ernest Petrič
President

Decision No. U-I-60/98, dated 16 July 1998

DECISION

At a session held on 16 July 1998 in proceedings to review constitutionality, initiated upon the petitions of Janez Rozman, Ljubljana, and Dr Ksenija Rozman, Ljubljana, represented by the authorised representative Janez Rozman, Dr Rajko Turk, Dr Josip Turk, and Milica Abram, all Ljubljana, represented by Igor Dernovšek, attorney in Ljubljana, Dr Johannes Attems, Vienna, represented by Rok Fink, attorney in Celje, Cecilija Pavlin, Amalija Murn, and Hinko Kirn, Ljubljana, represented by Irena Polak-Remškar, attorney in Ljubljana, Amalija Likar and Peter Bedjanič, Ljubljana represented by their authorised representative Novica Novaković, Ljubljana, Franc Gerden, Trebnje, represented by Hranislav S. Đurković, attorney in Koper, and Stanko Prijatelj, attorney in Ljubljana, Julija Zaletel, Olga Zaletel and Magdalena Betetto, Ljubljana, represented by Irena Polak-Remškar, attorney in Ljubljana, Tom Knez, Ljubljana, represented by Nataša Vidovič, attorney in Ljubljana, Dr Aleksander Majdič, Bled, represented by Nataša Vidovič, attorney in Ljubljana, Dr Ljubo Sirc, Kranj, represented by Nataša Vidovič, attorney in Ljubljana, Dr Igor Levstek, Ljubljana, represented by Nataša Vidovič, attorney in Ljubljana, Jure Filipčič and Mladen Terčelj, Ljubljana, Miha Jemec, Zug, Switzerland, represented by Aleš Rojs, attorney in Ljubljana, Alojzija Farič, Anica Cimperc, Alojzija Osvald and Mirko Lemež Jr., all Maribor, represented by their authorised representative Igor Osvald, Maribor, and Franc Zdolšek, Maribor, Milan Zdolšek, Dobje pri Planini, Marko Zdolšek, Šentjur, Terezija Zdolšek, Šentjur, Marija Rep, Maribor, and Emilija Zdolšek, Šentjur, all represented by Dušan Pungartnik, attorney in Šentjur, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. Articles 145. a and 145. c of the Enforcement of Criminal Sanctions Act (Official Gazette SRS, Nos. 17/87, 23/82, 41/87, 32/89 and 8/90 and Official Gazette RS, Nos. 12/92, 58/93, 71/94, 29/95 and 10/98) are not inconsistent with the Constitution.
2. Point 5 of Article 145. b of the same Act is not consistent with the Constitution to the extent it fails to set a deadline by which a special Act regulating the issuance of bonds should be adopted.
3. Article 3 of the Act Amending the Enforcement of Criminal Sanctions Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 10/98) is not consistent with the Constitution in so far as it fails to stipulate that unjustly convicted persons, or their heirs, who have initiated proceedings for the restitution of assets or the payment of compensation prior to its entry into force shall also have the right to the reimbursement of the costs of proceedings with respect to that part of the claim with which they will not succeed with regard to Article 3 of this Act.

4. The legislature must remedy the inconsistencies established in Points 2 and 3 of the operative provisions of this Decision by no later than six months from the day of the publication of this Decision in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia.
5. The petition to review the constitutionality of the third paragraph of Article 145 and Article 145. č of the Enforcement of Criminal Sanctions Act is dismissed.

Reasoning

A

1. The petitioners who are listed in the introductory part of this Decision challenge the Act Amending the Enforcement of Criminal Sanctions Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 10/98 - hereinafter referred to as the ECSA Amendment) in its entirety or just specific provisions thereof (Janez Rozman and Dr Ksenija Rozman, Dr Rajko Turk, Dr Josip Turk and Milica Abram, Cecilija Pavlin, Amalija Murn, and Hinko Kirn). The petitioners claim that the provisions of Articles 2, 3, 8, 14, 15, 22, 26, 30, 33, 153, and 155 of the Constitution were violated. All the petitioners claim that the principle of equality was violated and point out that it is clear that the challenged amendments to the Enforcement of Criminal Sanctions Act (hereinafter referred to as the ECSA) do not treat citizens that were unjustly convicted prior to 1958 equally as those convicted at a later date, and differently again to those to whom financial compensation for confiscated assets was awarded by way of final judgment even though they were convicted prior to 1958.
2. All the petitioners also propose that the Constitutional Court suspend the implementation of the challenged provisions. They justify such by stating the following harmful consequences that are difficult to remedy could occur:
  - unnecessary work for the courts, which are already dealing with an increased workload and additional financial costs – on the basis of the amended substantive law, the courts would allegedly begin issuing decisions dismissing the claims and appointing new experts to evaluate the property on the basis of the Denationalisation Act [(hereinafter referred to as the DenA)] and other regulations;
  - the petitioners and other beneficiaries would allegedly incur great costs by filing their claims and actions for which no reimbursement is provided by the challenged act, and beneficiaries would even have to pay the costs of litigation to the Republic of Slovenia acting as the defendant if their claims were dismissed;
  - assuming that the Constitutional Court would abrogate the retroactive effect (Article 3), the dismissal of claims would allegedly imply further delays in solving these cases in the courts and thus constitute a violation of the right to judicial protection referred to in Article 23 of the Constitution, which has already been violated by lengthy procedures and moratoriums;

- in case of abrogation of the challenged provisions, even greater confusion, additional costs and problems in the proceedings would ostensibly arise in the courts.

3. Individual petitioners also assert the following in their claims:

- The petitioners Janez and Dr Ksenija Rozman consider that the ECSA is a law which has been in force since 1978 and guarantees the constitutional right to rehabilitation of unjustly convicted persons. In the opinion of the petitioners, any association between the ECSA and the DenA is impermissible and without a legal basis because each regulates its own area of law.

They further state that the National Assembly intentionally violated the Constitution, because by the challenged act it reintroduced a system which the Constitutional Court already abrogated by its Decision No. U-I-10/92. The reasons for adopting the challenged act are, in the opinion of the petitioners, in conflict with the principle of the state governed by the rule of law, because it is allegedly evident from the legislative materials that, for the legislature, anticipated revenue is of greater value than respect for the Constitution.

- The petitioners Dr Rajko Turk, Dr Josip Turk, and Milica Abram state that in the non-litigious civil proceedings No. Nz 394/94 it was already decided that Ljubljana Municipality was obliged to pay compensation to the petitioners in the amount of SIT 5,225,035 for confiscated assets. The aforementioned Decision, however, is not yet final, because the opposing party filed an appeal which has not yet been decided. On the basis of Article 3 of the ECSA Amendment, these proceedings, which were brought to an end at the first instance court two years ago, should be remitted to the first instance, and their request would allegedly be considered in accordance with the DenA, granting fewer rights to the petitioners. In the opinion of the petitioners, the conditions determined in the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution concerning the retroactive effect of legal acts are not met and that is why, by determining that the ECSA Amendment should be applied to all the proceedings where a final decision has not yet been adopted, the legislature interfered retroactively with existing relations and thereby infringed Article 155 of the Constitution.

- The petitioner Dr Johannes Attems states that the amendment to the ECSA is contrary to the principle of the state governed by the rule of law because the state cannot change a law to its advantage after many parties have already been successful in their claims and the confiscated assets was already restituted. A total of 1400 hectares of forests were restituted to the petitioner based on the denationalisation proceedings, but he withdrew his claim and requested that the restitution be carried out in accordance with the then applicable ECSA. The petitioner wishes to know who will reimburse the huge costs of experts that must be covered by the body that is obliged to restitute the assets in the denationalisation proceedings and by a claimant himself in non-litigious civil proceedings. In the supplement to his petition, the petitioner considers that, by adopting the challenged act, the state has again imposed upon him the sanction of confiscation of assets that is not determined by any law.

- The petitioners Cecilija Pavlin, Amalija Murn, and Hinko Kirn state that they filed an action on 27 March 1997 in which they requested that they be paid compensation for the loss of profit incurred as the result of confiscation of assets of their legal ancestor. They claim that the legislature denied the right to compensation for damage, without an objective and reasonable ground to do so, precisely to those persons who were convicted and sentenced most severely during the period of the greatest revolutionary euphoria, and for acts which they never committed. They draw attention to the very high costs which beneficiaries have already incurred by filing their actions (court fees and legal costs).
- The petitioners Anamarija Likar and Peter Bedjanič, as legal successors to the late Dr Hermina Bedjanič, state that the redress of injustices done to unjustly convicted persons should not be based on the DenA, since the unjust conviction was a violation of fundamental human rights resulting in great emotional distress, humiliation and social degradation. They claim that Article 3 of the challenged act is contrary to Articles 28 and 155 of the Constitution, since it determines a new procedure, manner, and scope for returning unjustly confiscated assets with retroactive effect.
- The petitioner Franc Gerden filed two petitions, in which he states that the right to compensation for damage arose at the moment when the sentence of confiscation of assets was overturned by way of a final decision and that, based on the Criminal Procedure Act [(hereinafter referred to as the CrPA)], at that time he was entitled to full compensation for damage and loss of profit.
- The petitioners Julija Zaletel, Olga Zaletel, and Magdalena Betetto state that by way of its Decision dated 15 May 1995, the competent court had already decided that the Republic of Slovenia should pay compensation amounting to SIT 54,768,160 to the heirs to Franc Zaletel, and that the decision is not yet final. They are of the view that, owing to the adoption of the challenged amendments, they are no longer entitled to the reimbursement of the actual value of the confiscated assets; in fact, that they are no longer entitled to anything whatsoever, because the challenged provisions only provide for the adoption of a special law regulating the issuance of bonds for the payment of compensation. Such regulation of recognised rights allegedly causes legal uncertainty, because nobody knows when the aforementioned special law will in fact be adopted, and it is also an unconstitutional method of regulation, which the legislature is using increasingly frequently. In the opinion of the petitioners, the burden on the national economy does not justify the violation of the rights guaranteed by the Constitution. They point out that, taking into consideration the legal system in force and Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-10/92, they decided to enforce their claims on the basis of the ECSA and thus assumed the high court costs for experts and the lawyer.
- In his petition, the petitioner Tomo Knez states that the challenged amendments entail a return to the time prior to the adoption of the constitutional amendment XCVI and abandoning the principles of Article 29 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. He points out that the challenged provisions interfere with final court decisions and the acquired rights, and that they cause unjustly convicted persons to be treated unequally.

- In his petition, Dr Aleksander Majdič states that the challenged provisions of the ECSA alter his position in these proceedings. He points out that amendment XCVI to the Constitution of the Socialist Republic of Slovenia established equality of treatment for unjustly convicted persons, thereby eliminating the ideological barrier for redressing the injustices done to victims of post-war circumstances.
- The petitioner Dr Ljubo Sirc also alleges a violation of the European Convention on Human Rights in conjunction with the Resolution 1096 dated 27 June 1996 of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe. He takes the view that the right to compensation for damage arises at the moment when an unjust conviction is overturned and not as late as on the occasion of a final judgment on the restitution of assets, as stated in the reasons for the draft of the challenged law. In the opinion of the petitioner, the assertions in the reasons for the draft of the challenged law to the effect that “injustices cannot be remedied entirely, that the burdening of economy would be too great, that Slovenia is a social state, that new injustices are not supposed to be committed” do not excuse the legislature from restituting the confiscated assets in their entirety or from giving a “fair financial compensation” in return. The petitioner further points out that, with regard to the retroactive effect of the challenged provisions, the legislature has no grounds to invoke public interest. In the opinion of the petitioner, it is precisely public interest and the principle of a social state that require the assets to be restituted as soon as possible to those who are capable of managing it and producing better results. He draws attention to the fact that the purpose of confiscation in criminal proceedings was not solely to take away assets but also to bring shame on entrepreneurs, and that those proceedings cannot be compared to nationalisation proceedings. However, he considers that it would nevertheless be necessary for the restitution of assets to the beneficiaries to be equal for everyone. It would be necessary to apply the principles of tort law, and the confiscated assets should be restituted at the market value and not a value determined on the basis of laws and regulations. This is why the petitioner also filed the petition for the constitutional review of the DenA. The Constitutional Court separated this petition and will consider it as an independent case under No. U-I-137/98.
- The petitioner Dr Igor Levstek states that the challenged amendments to the ECSA apply to the time prior to the adoption of the constitutional amendment XCVI and represent a departure from the principles of Article 26 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. As the challenged provisions no longer recognise the right to compensation for the loss of profits, they allegedly re-establish the inequality which the Constitutional Court already remedied by abrogating Article 92 of the DenA.
- The petitioners Jure Filipič and Mladen Terčelj state that the challenged law re-establishes the system that was applicable prior to the adoption of the constitutional amendment XCVI. This allegedly constitutes a departure from the principles contained in Article 29 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and is justified by the simple conclusion that we are in a transitional phase, which allegedly allows less rigorous adherence to constitutional and statutory provisions. They are of the opinion that the ECSA, as a regulation governing the enforcement of criminal sanctions and a “specialised” law of a kind, cannot interfere with the provisions of Article 13, the second paragraph of Article 539 or Article 540 of the CrPA.

- The petitioner Miha Jemec challenges Article 145. c, since it no longer recognises full compensation for confiscated assets as determined by the Criminal Proceedings Act and the Obligations Act. He takes the view that the amendment is contrary to Article 30 of the Constitution and that, because of the budgetary problems and the principle of a social state, the legislature should not interfere with the right of unjustly convicted persons to full compensation as recognised by all civilised nations.
- In addition to Articles 145. a and 145. c, the petitioners Alojzija Farič, Anica Cimperc, Alojzija Osvald, and Mirko Lemež Jr. also challenge the third paragraph of Article 145 and Article 145. č. In their petition they also invoke Article 15 of the Constitution. They believe that the challenged provisions impede the exercising of the rights granted in Articles 26 and 30 of the Constitution and deny the right to obtain redress for the violation of human rights and fundamental freedoms (first and fourth paragraphs of Article 15 of the Constitution). They take the view that the legislature had no grounds to limit the rights granted by Articles 26 and 30 of the Constitution in accordance with the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution and the positions of the Constitutional Court. The rights of others, which the challenged provisions allegedly protect (the right of citizens to a certain service from the state financed from the budget or any other right), are not “of the same rank” as the rights referred to in Articles 26 and 30 of the Constitution. They point out that interference with the rights referred to in Articles 26 and 30 is neither necessary nor appropriate. The state should cover the increase in the costs resulting from the payment of compensation by other measures, in particular by reducing its expenditure and improving the efficiency of control.
- Franc Zdolšek, Milan Zdolšek, Marko Zdolšek, Terezija Zdolšek, Marija Rep, and Emilija Zdolšek claim that the provision of Article 145. a is in fact the provision of Article 92 of the DenA that was abrogated by the Constitutional Court, and that the legislature does not have any grounds for making their position equal to the position of denationalisation beneficiaries. The petitioners stress that their claim is exclusively a claim under civil tort law and that it is in no way connected with the nationalisation of private property and the subsequent denationalisation. Unlawful confiscation based on criminal proceedings involves unlawful acts on the part of a state authority or specific judge, for which the responsibility in relation to the injured party lies with the state. They propose that the challenged provisions be abrogated.

4. The National Assembly (reply of the Secretariat for Legislative and Legal Matters of 21 May 1998, following the discussion at the Committee for Internal Policy and Justice) considers that the challenged regulation does not constitute a violation of the Constitution. With regard to the challenged regulation, the legislature took into account the principle of the social state and the principle of equality of all persons whose assets were confiscated or nationalised after the Second World War, and the capacity of the community to fulfil all the obligations arising from the restitution of confiscated assets. During the review, the Constitutional Court should take into account, as a first pertinent reason, that the legislature established equality between all the injured parties regarding the challenged amendments relating to the restitution of confiscated assets. The legislature took into account that, if there was no criminal conviction, the assets of the injured parties would become state property on the basis of some other legal title. The second pertinent reason, which allegedly justifies the challenged regulation, is the principle of the social state demanding that the general financial situation in the state be taken into consideration. The state must act in this way so that the public interest will not be affected because of individual interests, and must consequently regulate the compensation of special damage according to the principle of the proportional balancing of burdens, as is appropriate for a social state, between the state and tax-payers. Special regulation is also justified by the fact that over 40 years have passed since the events that caused the damage and that the confiscated assets were subject to many changes and interventions during that period. Moreover, the explanation in the reply includes information about the number and amount of claims which, although incomplete, point to the risk of state insolvency. The exclusion of claims for compensation for the loss of profits was also dictated by the nature of this tort law instrument which stipulates that the benefits the injured party would enjoy in normal circumstances and on the basis of reasonable and justifiable expectations should be repaid. Since it is not possible to speak of normal circumstances during the 1945-1958 period or of reasonably expected benefits for the injured party, the amount of lost profit comes into question, since this is compensation for damage caused in quite specific circumstances. The petitioners' assertions that the challenged provisions interfere with acquired rights are, in the opinion of the opposing party, unfounded. The legal basis for a claim for damages is established only after the sentence of confiscation of assets is overturned; this, however, does not imply that the right to a certain amount of compensation is acquired in this way. This right is acquired only on the basis of a final court decision, and this is why the challenged amendments do not interfere with the already acquired rights of the injured parties.
5. The Constitutional Court sent the explanations of the opposing party to the petitioners, who filed their petitions for the review of the challenged law until 7 May 1998. In their replies, the petitioners insist with their petitions; they repeat and supplement their statements in their petitions and reply to the positions and grounds provided by the opposing party. The Constitutional Court summarises only those statements made by the petitioners in which they respond to the positions and grounds provided by the opposing party. The replies show that the positions of the opposing party are unacceptable for the petitioners or they consider them to be contrary to the principle of the state governed by the rule of law. With regard to the position that the challenged amendments put the position of all the persons whose assets were confiscated after the Second World War on an equal footing, they point out that it is unacceptable to ignore the fact that the state considered the injured parties to be criminals and confiscated their entire property, all of which took place prior to agrarian reforms or nationalisation. With regard to the position that the assets of the injured persons would be nationalised, even in the absence of criminal conviction, and they would be entitled to request restitution on the basis of the DenA, the petitioners stress that such a finding is not true in many cases, particularly for those who owned small workshops, since these could not be nationalised on the basis of the Private Industrial Enterprises Nationalisation Act (Julijana Zaletel, Olga Zaletel, and Magdalena Betetto, as well as Cecilija Pavlin, Amalija Murn, and Hinko Kirn). They consider that the opposing party cannot invoke the principle of equality since the amendments themselves created inequality between those to whom confiscated assets have already been restituted on the basis of the ECSA and those to whom they have not been yet restituted. The petitioners also argue that invoking the principle of the social state is also unfounded. The National Assembly took into consideration incorrect data, since the amounts actually requested were not that high, and the difference between the compensation for damages paid on the basis of the ECSA and the DenA was not very clear. The amounts requested in actions (for damages), which are the reason invoked by the opposing party for the failure to pay, do not imply that such damages will also be awarded, and it is inadmissible to use them as justification for concern for the social state. The consequences of restituting the confiscated assets should be dealt with by the state using different legal solutions, and not by abolishing the right to full compensation (Dr Igor Levstek, Tomo Knez, Dr Aleksander Majdič, and Dr Ljubo Sirc). With regard to the position that the challenged provisions do not have retroactive effect, the petitioners insist in their replies that they acquired the right to compensation for damage on the basis of the laws in force at the moment when they filed their actions for damages and petitions in the framework of non-litigious proceedings against the state, and that the challenged provision of Article 3 interferes with their acquired rights. They point out that any amendment to the ECSA and attempt to make it equal to the DenA is a violation of Article 155 of the Constitution, since the rights of the unjustly convicted persons are being reduced as a result.

B – I

6. In addition to the data specified in the legislative materials, the Constitutional Court also took into consideration the data provided by the Supreme Court and the Ministry of Justice.
7. From the report of the Supreme Court the following is evident:
  - that the Supreme Court does not keep special records concerning the reopening of criminal proceedings which were decided by final decisions prior to 31 December 1958 and in which the sentence of confiscation of assets was imposed and the information could only be collected by examining more than 1000 files;

- that during the period 1989–1994 (since 1 January 1995, the Supreme Court has no longer been competent to decide on the reopening of proceedings – Article 557 of the CrPA), it decided in 9 cases concerning a request to reopen criminal proceedings and allowed the reopening in favour of 29 convicted persons (in 7 cases, assets confiscation was imposed as a sentence);
  - that during the period 1990–1996 regarding requests for the protection of legality (383 were filed during that period), it decided in favour of 774 convicted persons and that, taking into account the legislation then in force, pursuant to which a sentence of the confiscation of assets was mandatory, it is reasonable to conclude that the sentence of confiscation of assets was also imposed on a large number of convicted persons who were acquitted of all charges by the Supreme Court or where the same overturned the challenged sentence, and so it did not decide separately on the sentence of the confiscation of assets;
  - that only three requests for the protection of legality were filed in 1997 against sentences that became final prior to 31 December 1958 in which the confiscation of assets was imposed. All the requests were filed by the Office of the State Prosecutor of the Republic of Slovenia, and the deadline for filing such requests by convicted persons and their relatives had already expired (Article 559 of the CrPA);
  - that, in 1997, it granted requests for the protection of legality in 18 cases, in which the confiscation of assets was imposed – in 5 cases it overturned the challenged sentences, in 10 cases a judgment of acquittal was pronounced, in 2 cases the sentence was changed, and in one case the criminal proceedings were discontinued; among these cases there were also some that related to several convicted persons.
8. The Ministry of Justice reports that no data exist about the number of criminal sentences in which confiscation of assets was imposed in 1945 and 1946. The data for subsequent years is as follows: 1947 - 870, 1948 - 496, 1949 - 730, 1950 - 351, 1951 - 90, 1952 - 19, 1953 - 3, 1954 - 0, 1955 - 8, 1956 - 0, 1957 - 2, 1958 - 0. The Ministry further reports that the courts should examine all the files in order to determine the number of cases in which proceedings were reopened and were decided by first instance courts in which the sentence of confiscation of assets was imposed. By way of example, the Ministry reports that, during the period between 1 January 1990 and 31 December 1997, a total of 214 requests were filed at the Ljubljana District Court for the reopening of proceedings and that 111 requests were granted. The Ministry furthermore states that, at the end of 1997, approximately 387 non-litigious proceedings concerning the restitution of confiscated assets were pending and that claims for compensation in individual cases were extremely high. With regard to the claims for compensation for the loss of profit, the Ministry also reports that the sum of all the claims sought by action, which amounted to SIT 31 billion during the legislative procedure, increased even further because an action for the loss of profit in the amount of over SIT 11 billion was also filed.
9. For the purpose of joint consideration and adjudication, the Constitutional Court joined the petitions referred to under section A of the reasoning. All the petitioners have a legal interest to challenge the ECSA Amendment. It is evident from the petitions and appendices thereto that all the petitioners demand before the competent courts the restitution of confiscated assets or the payment of compensation, and that the court proceedings have not yet concluded. In the case of the petitioner Dr Aleksander Majdič, the Constitutional Court found that he has a legal interest to dispute the ECSA Amendment since, on the basis of Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-249/96, dated 12 March 1998 (Official Gazette RS, No. 29/98), those whose assets were confiscated on the basis of Article 28 of the Asset Confiscation and Confiscation Enforcement Act (Official Gazette [of the Democratic Federal Yugoslavia], No. 40/45) shall also be entitled to lodge a request for the reopening of proceedings in accordance with the provision of Article 416 of the CrPA and, if successful in the aforementioned proceedings, will be entitled to request the restitution of assets in accordance with the provisions of the ECSA.

10. Given that the conditions specified in the fourth paragraph of Article 26 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA) are met, the Constitutional Court accepted the petitions and immediately proceeded to decide on the merits of the case. However, it dismissed the petitions of Alojzija Farič, Anica Cimperc, Alojzija Osvald, and Mirko Lemež Jr. in so far as they challenge the provisions of the third paragraph of Article 145 and Article 145. č of the ECSA.
11. Considering that the restitution of confiscated assets has already been suspended twice by law, and that these issues should be resolved as soon as possible, the Constitutional Court resolved at a session held on 12 March 1998 not to decide separately on a motion for suspension and to instead consider the case as a matter of priority.

B – II

Review of Articles 145. a and 145. c of the ECSA

12. Article 30 of the Constitution provides that any person unjustly convicted of a criminal offence or deprived of his liberty without due cause has the right to rehabilitation and compensation, and other rights provided by law. This constitutional provision determines the strict liability of the state for damage in cases where, for any reason whatsoever (for fault or no fault, lawful or unlawful reason), a person is unjustly convicted or deprived of liberty without due cause. The right to restitution of assets which were confiscated by imposing the sentence of confiscation of assets is not a special right but constitutes a part of a single constitutional right referred to in Article 30 of the Constitution. Although the restitution of confiscated assets pursuant to Article 145 of the ECSA does not in substantive terms constitute “compensation for damage” in the sense of rules governing tort law but instead represents a special manner of regulating the institute of unjust enrichment,<sup>1</sup> this right is constitutionally protected by Article 30 of the Constitution which grants to those persons who have been unjustly convicted of a criminal offence a universal right to compensation. The aforementioned assumption was also used as the starting point by the legislature, which is evident from the reasons given for the draft of the ECSA Amendment, as well as from the provisions of the fourth paragraph of Article 145, which mentions “compensation” in cases where it is no longer possible to reconstitute the confiscated assets or individual parts thereof in kind or if this is legally not possible.

---

1 Position of the Supreme Court in Decision No. II Ips 27/93.

13. The right to compensation resulting from unjust conviction is the constitutional right of a person who sustains damage as a result of an unjust criminal conviction. It involves a special personality right, which can only be exercised by the unjustly convicted person. If after his death a person is found to have been unjustly convicted, his heirs shall succeed to the right to compensation in accordance with the provisions of the CrPA and the general principles of tort law.<sup>2</sup> The right of the heirs to compensation due to the unjust conviction of their ancestor does not arise from Article 30 of the Constitution but is constitutionally protected in Articles 33 and 67 of the Constitution.
14. The sentences of confiscation of assets were already being imposed by military courts during the war on the basis of decrees and instructions issued by military authorities and, subsequently, on the basis of the Military Courts Decree dated 24 May 1944 (Gazette of the Headquarters of the National Liberation Army and Partisan Detachments of Slovenia, No. 6/44). Confiscation of assets was defined as a so-called security measure (Article 16 of the Decree) and used to be imposed in addition to the sentence. With the Types of Sentences Act (Official Gazette DFY, No. 48/45, and Official Gazette FPRY [Federal People's Republic of Yugoslavia], No. 66/46), the confiscation of assets was defined as one of the sentences which could be imposed by military and civil courts (Article 1). It could be pronounced as the main sentence or as ancillary sentence, and in only those cases in which it was expressly prescribed by the law. The court was obliged to impose the sentence of confiscation of “all assets” if it imposed a sentence of revoking the citizenship. It implied the compulsory seizure of all the assets, or a part thereof, from a person for the benefit of the state and without the possibility of restitution. It was expressly provided that the sentence of confiscation of assets could be imposed against natural and legal persons (Article 14 of the Decree). The sentence of confiscation of assets was prescribed by the substantive criminal law as an ancillary sentence until the adoption of the Criminal Code of the Republic of Slovenia (Official Gazette RS, No. 63/94), which no longer contains the sentence of confiscation of assets.
15. The right to the restitution of confiscated assets if the sentence of confiscation of assets was overturned was already recognised in the former legal system before the recognition of the special right to the rehabilitation and compensation of the unjustly convicted persons (Paragraph 25 of this reasoning), i.e. in the Execution of Sentences, Security Measures and Educational and Correctional Measures Act (Official Gazette FPRY, No. 47/51). Article 91 of this act contained the same provision in terms of its content as the still applicable Article 145 of the ECSA and, in accordance with the latest amendments of the ECSA, it applies for the purpose of restituting the confiscated assets, if the (overturned) sentence of confiscation of assets was imposed after 31 December 1958. In their transitional provisions, neither the aforementioned act nor the subsequent Enforcement of Criminal Sanctions Act (Official Gazette [of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia], No. 3/70 – consolidated text – entered into force on 1 July 1968) excluded the restitution of confiscated assets, if the sentence of confiscation of assets was imposed by a final criminal sentence prior to 1 July 1954 that was subsequently annulled.

<sup>2</sup> Article 204 of the Obligations Act provides that a claim for compensation of non pecuniary damage shall only be inherited by the heirs if it was awarded by a final decision or written agreement.

16. In terms of its content, Article 145 of the ECSA is a provision of substantive law which provides that confiscated assets shall be restituted to the convicted person or his heirs; if the restitution of confiscated assets or individual parts thereof in kind is no longer possible or is not legally possible, the beneficiaries shall be entitled to “compensation”<sup>3</sup>, which shall represent the actual value of the confiscated assets at the time when the decision on the restitution of assets is issued and in the condition they were in at the time of confiscation. The provision of Article 145 of the ECSA therefore excludes the application of the provisions of the Obligations Act (hereinafter referred to as the OA) regarding unjust enrichment, which in case the restitution is no longer possible provide only for the possibility of compensation to the value of the benefit achieved, and it independently regulates the scope and manner of the restitution of confiscated assets after the sentence of confiscation of assets was annulled by a final decision.
17. The challenged Article 145. a provides that, in cases where the sentence of confiscation of assets imposed prior to 31 December 1958 was overturned on the basis of extraordinary legal remedies, the general provisions of Article 145 of the ECSA on the restitution of confiscated assets shall not apply with regard to the forms and scope of the restitution, the restrictions relating to the restitution or the valuation of the assets, but that the provisions of Chapter III of the DenA, which contain special criteria regarding the valuation of the assets (Article 44), restrictions regarding the restitution in kind (Articles 19 and 27) and exclusion (as a rule) of the payment of damages – financial compensation (Articles 42, 43, 45, 46, 47, 48 and 50) shall apply mutatis mutandis.
18. The challenged Article 145. c excludes the recognition of “claims for damages arising from the impossibility of using or managing assets and arising from the maintenance of real estate, as well as any other claims relating to the loss of profit in accordance with the rules of tort law”, and thus excludes the application of general rules of tort law, which also grant, within the scope of compensation for pecuniary damage, in addition to the right to compensation for ordinary damage, the right to compensation for the loss of profit. The claims arising therefrom are based on the provisions of Chapter XXXII of the CrPA, which, with regard to compensation for damage due to unjust conviction, does not contain any special provisions, so that the general rules of tort law on compensation for damage apply. This means that the unjustly convicted person is entitled to request the payment of the entire pecuniary damage – the ordinary damage and the loss of profit. A similar provision to that of Article 145. c of the ECSA is also contained in the second paragraph of Article 72 of the DenA, which also does not admit claims for damages arising from the impossibility to use or manage assets and those arising from the maintenance of real estate during the period between nationalisation and the moment the DenA entered into force. The challenged Article 145. c, therefore represents a special regulation for compensation for pecuniary damage regarding the restitution of confiscated assets (an exception), meaning that the general provisions concerning the compensation for damage due to an unjust conviction as determined in the CrPA and the OA are not applied.

---

3 In conformity with the provisions of the Obligations Act on unjust enrichment, it would be appropriate from a terminological perspective to use “reimbursement” instead of “compensation”.

19. As both challenged provisions entail an independent and special regulation of the issue regarding the restitution of the assets unjustly confiscated until 1 December 1958, the assertions made by the petitioners to the effect that they are not consistent with the CrPA and that the ECSA as an “implementing law” should not regulate the restitution of confiscated assets are unfounded in relation to the constitutional review and were not taken into consideration by the Constitutional Court.
20. As is evident, the challenged provisions interfere to a certain extent with the constitutionally protected right to compensation for damage sustained due to unjust conviction (Article 30 of the Constitution); regarding the cases where the heirs to the unjustly convicted person invoke the restitution of confiscated assets and compensation for pecuniary damage in the form of the loss of profit in relation to the confiscated assets, the challenged provisions interfere with the right to private property and inheritance (Articles 33 and 67 of the Constitution).
21. The right to compensation for damage referred to in Article 30 of the Constitution is a right determined by the Constitution without any statutory reservation. On the basis of the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, it may only be limited when this is necessary for the protection of the rights of others. The right to private property and inheritance is in principle guaranteed in Article 33; additionally, the first paragraph of Article 67 provides that the manner in which property is acquired and enjoyed shall be established by law so as to ensure its economic, social, and environmental function, and it is further determined in the second paragraph of the same article that the manner and conditions of inheritance shall be established by law.
22. The constitutionally guaranteed right to private property as a human right grants an individual liberty with regard to property. Property is a basic human right, which is closely linked to the protection of personal liberty. Its function is to protect the individual’s freedom of activity with regard to property, thereby enabling everyone to freely and responsibly shape their own lives. As such it is a constituent part of the constitutions of democratic countries. According to the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights, as the first international codification of human rights, everyone has the right to their own property alone as well as in association with others. The Convention on the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, International Treaties, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR), which determines a minimum common denominator for the protection of human rights in Europe, guarantees to every natural and legal person the peaceful enjoyment of their property (Article 1 of the Protocol No. 1).
23. The constitutional guarantee of property presupposes the existence of property as a legal concept. The object of private property and the protected rights to dispose of the property are determined by the legal system, taking into consideration economic and social relations in general. In this regard, the system must respect the purpose of the constitutional protection of property, i.e. guaranteeing and exercising personal liberty. The European Court of Human Rights (Judgment Marckx v. Belgium, dated 13 June 1979, Publications, A.31, p. 27) already decided that disposing of things and rights associated with property is an essential constituent of such liberty. At the same time, the content of the property as a legal concept depends on the functions assigned to it by the legal system. The fact that an individual is not unrestricted in his exercise of his rights to dispose of the property, but must also take into consideration the interests of other members of the community, and the community as a whole, already fell under the concept of property rights in the Roman law.<sup>4</sup> According to the Slovene Constitution, the definition of property includes its social, economic and environmental functions (the first paragraph of Article 67). In determining the manner of acquisition and enjoyment of the property and the conditions for inheriting such, the legislature is thus obliged to balance the individual and community aspects of property.

24. In several decisions, the Constitutional Court has already adopted the position that interference with constitutional rights is subject to rigorous constitutional review in accordance with the so-called proportionality test, in which interference is permissible only if it is necessary (unavoidable) for the protection of other human rights; such interference also should not be excessive, meaning that only the mildest of the possible forms of interference required to ensure the constitutionally permissible and desired aim, i.e. the protection of the equally important rights of others, is permissible. The legislature must prove that it cannot fully protect this right because, by doing so, it would interfere with other human rights. Even in cases where the Constitution leaves it to the law to determine the manner of regulating a specific constitutional right (within the meaning of the provision of the second paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, or on the basis of the constitutional provision that specifically provides that the law shall determine the manner of exercising a right), this does not entail that the legislature is not restricted in this regard. The principle of the state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution) requires that the legislature acts in accordance with the principle of proportionality. The legislature, in particular, is obliged to act in such a manner where it restricts human rights and fundamental freedoms in order to protect other rights. Furthermore, the legislature must always observe the principle of equality referred to in Article 14 of the Constitution and should not act in discriminatory manner when determining the manner of exercising, or when restricting individual human rights and freedoms.
25. In the case under consideration, the Constitutional Court first had to review whether there were necessary (unavoidable) reasons to limit the right to compensation for damage and to exclude compensation for the loss of profit having occurred as a result of confiscation of assets, and with regard to the limiting of the right to the reimbursement of the actual value of confiscated assets. For this review, it took into consideration the reasons stated in the legislative materials, and it also based its review on other reasons based on specific historic sources and data from the Supreme Court and the Ministry of Justice.

---

4 Kranjc, Začetki in razvoj lastnine v antičnih pravih [The Beginnings and Development of Property in Antique Legal Orders], in Šturm et al., Varstvo lastninske pravice kot temeljne človekove pravice [Protection of Right of Property as a Fundamental Human Right], Inštitut za javno upravo, Ljubljana 1997, p. 62.

26. It is evident from legislative materials (EPA 367 - II - fast-track procedure, Gazette of the National Assembly, No. 5, dated 20 January 1998) that the legislature interfered with the aforementioned constitutional rights due to the fact that full compensation in relation to the confiscated assets “is unacceptable in view of the burden it would put on the national economy”, because of the large number of overturned sentences of confiscation of assets imposed in the early post-war years, and that the principle of the social state dictates that a balance be struck between beneficiaries that have the right to the restitution of confiscated assets or payment of compensation and those who will have to fulfil the obligations arising from the right to the restitution of confiscated assets or the payment of compensation. The legislature started from the assumption that the court proceedings, which were based on the criminal legislation and sentencing policy in force at the time, were means for nationalising the means of production. In order to redress the injustices it is therefore unclear whether the assets were nationalised on the basis of administrative or court (criminal) proceedings. The injustices caused by unjust confiscations should thus be redressed in the context of redressing the injustices of the past period, and with identical criteria applying to all to whom the state confiscated assets in any way. For this reason, assets should be returned to all those who were sentenced to confiscation by a final judgment pronounced up until 1958 which was subsequently overturned, and pursuant to the provisions of the DenA, which uniformly regulates the redress of injustices from the past. The legislative materials also provide data from the State Attorney’s Office concerning the total to which the claims resulting from the impossibility of the restitution in kind amounted (253 cases in total, amounting to approx. SIT 37 billion), as well as concerning the total to which the claims arising from the loss of profit amounted (in 253 cases in total amounting to approx. SIT 31 billion). Further, the legislative materials also draw attention to the large number of pronounced sentences of confiscation of assets, particularly in the early post-war years (1947 - 870, 1949 - 731), that confiscations included around 200 larger and smaller companies and that confiscations resulted in the nationalisation of approx. 41,000 hectares of agricultural land, 51,000 hectares of forest, 5,837 residential buildings and 874 business premises. It is also pointed out that former criminal legislation did not recognise the right to compensation for damage to persons unjustly convicted prior to 1 January 1954. Those persons only acquired this right on the basis of constitutional amendment XCVI to the Constitution of the [Socialist] Republic of Slovenia.
27. The Constitutional Court finds that the in the past right to compensation for damage used to be regulated differently and that the right to full compensation for damage in accordance with the rules of tort law was not recognised until the basic principles of criminal law guaranteeing the legality of criminal proceedings (principle of legality, presumption of innocence) and preventing the abuse of human rights and fundamental freedoms were included in the criminal legislation.<sup>5</sup>

28. The right to compensation for damage was granted to unjustly convicted persons by the Criminal Procedure Code adopted on 10 September 1953 (Official Gazette FPRY, No. 40/53 – hereinafter referred to as the CPC/54). The unjustly convicted persons had the right to compensation for pecuniary damage only. After the death of the beneficiary, the compensation for damage could only be requested by his/her spouse and relatives, whom the unjustly convicted person was obliged to support, but only to the extent they were deprived of maintenance because of the unjust conviction. In Article 7 of the Introductory Act to the CPC/54, the right to compensation for damage was recognised only to those who were unjustly convicted prior to 1 January 1954. Pursuant to Article 6 of the Introductory Act, the provisions of CrPA/48 were applied to the reopening of proceedings that ended by final judgment prior to 1 January 1954; these provisions, however, allowed the reopening of proceedings only 5 German law still does not recognise full compensation to heirs but only to the extent to which the person was under a statutory obligation to support them (the first paragraph of Article 11 of the Act on compensation for criminal prosecution measures - Gesetz über die Entschädigung für Strafverfolgungsmassnahmen). Germany also adopted a special law on rehabilitation and compensation for victims of criminal persecution measures implemented in violation of the principles of the state governed by the rule of law in the annexed territory (Gesetz über die Rehabilitierung und Entschädigung von Opfern rechtsstaatswidriger Strafverfolgungsmassnahmen im Beitrittsgebiet). The law encompassed criminal sentences passed by German courts in the annexed territory during the period between 8 May 1945 and 2 October 1990, if they were passed in violation of the fundamental principles of the free state governed by the rule of law. The provisions of this law also apply to measures under the criminal law that were not imposed by court decision. The law restricts the number of persons who can file a request for compensation for damage. It may be filed by the injured person and, after his/her death, by his/her spouse, lineal descendants, brothers and sisters or other persons with a justified interest in the rehabilitation of the injured person. A request may also be filed by state prosecutor's office if the injured person consents to this. With regard to the restitution of assets confiscated by a criminal sentence, the law refers to the application of a special Property Act (Vermögensgesetz) and Investment Act (Investitionsgesetz) as general laws dealing with the restitution of assets. In the event that the assets cannot be returned in kind, they provide special rules for the determination of financial compensation and thereby exclude the general rules of civil law applying to compensation for damage and the loss of profit. Compensation does not amount to the present sales value of the confiscated assets, even in cases where a deduction based on a digressive scale is the lowest. Other claims (e.g. property damage, decrease in value, inability to use) are excluded (taken from: Tappert, Die Wiedergutmachung von Staatsunrecht der SBZ/DDR durch die Bundesrepublik Deutschland nach der Wiedervereinigung, Arno Spitz, Berlin, 1995, p. 221). - In the United States of America, the strict liability of the state arising from unjust conviction does not exist. In the case of Korematsu v. United States (323 U.S. 214; 65Ct. 193; 89 L.Ed.194 - 1944), the Supreme Court confirmed the executive order of President Roosevelt of February 1942 on the forced evacuation of inhabitants of Japanese descent from the entire West Coast into the so-called "detention centres". By 1948 Congress had adopted a law on the basis of which beneficiaries received over USD 37 million in compensation. In 1980, Congress appointed a special body (U.S. Internment Commission) to investigate violations against Japanese Americans that were interned, and, on the basis of its proposal, further compensations were paid in cases that were deemed appropriate (American Constitutional Law, Ralph A. Rossum and G. Alan Tarr, St. Martin Press, New York).

---

if proposed by the public prosecutor of the Republic or federal public prosecutor.<sup>6</sup> The Constitution of FPRY of 1963 (Official Gazette SFRY, No. 14/63) defined the rights to rehabilitation and compensation for damage as human rights. In the sixth paragraph of Article 50, it provided that a person who is unjustly convicted for a criminal offence or who is deprived of his liberty without due cause has the right to obtain compensation from public funds for the damage sustained.

29. The right to compensation for damage to the extent as determined by the present provisions - the return of pecuniary and non-pecuniary damage - was conferred by the Constitution of SFRY of 1974 to the unjustly convicted persons as well as to those who were deprived of their liberty without due cause. In the fourth paragraph of Article 181, it provided that unjustly convicted persons and those who were deprived of their liberty without due cause shall have the right to rehabilitation and compensation for damage from public funds and other rights provided by law.
30. This constitutional provision was followed by the Criminal Procedure Act of 1977 (Official Gazette SFRY, Nos. 4/77, 14/85, 74/87, 57/89, and 3/90 – hereinafter referred to as the CrPA-77) which, in the provisions regarding the compensation for damage for unjustly convicted persons, extended this right also to non-pecuniary damage as well as the right of heirs. Inheritability of the right to compensation for pecuniary damage was no longer limited only to spouses and relatives whom the person was obliged to support and to the extent they were deprived of such maintenance as a result of the unjust conviction. As an obligational right, it was inherited by all the heirs without any restrictions after the death of the injured party. The CrPA-77 still did not confer the right to compensation for damage to persons unjustly convicted prior to 1 January 1954, and the reopening of proceedings that ended by way of a final judgment prior to 1954 was only possible on the basis of a motion by the public prosecutor of the Republic or federal public prosecutor. In Articles 561 and 562, it extended the validity of Articles 6 and 7 of the Introductory Act to the CPC/54.
31. These two provisions (the exclusion of the right to compensation for damage and the prohibition from reopening proceedings) were in force until the adoption of the constitutional amendment XCVI to the Constitution of the SR of Slovenia, dated 4 October 1990 (Official Gazette RS, No. 37/90), which provided that in the Republic of Slovenia the provisions of Articles 561 and 562 of the CrPA-77 shall no longer be applied. In this manner, all the unjustly convicted persons acquired the right to compensation for damage, regardless of the date of their unjust conviction, and the right to demand the reopening of proceedings was no longer within the exclusive competence of the public prosecutor, but could also be proposed by the convicted person, his counsel, and after the death of the convicted person also his close relatives.

6 Tomo Grgič, Varstvo človekovih pravic v kazenskem procesnem pravu [Protection of Human Rights in Criminal Procedural Law], pp. 177-188, Slovenija in Evropska konvencija o človekovih pravicah [Slovenia and the European Convention on Human Rights], Zbornik razprav, Svet za varstvo človekovih pravic in temeljnih svoboščin. Page 182: "The public prosecutor of the Republic has filed requests in previous years to reopen proceedings in connection with the so-called political processes and they were granted, but such requests were not really frequent, for his decisions in this regard were based on his discretion. [...] in the criminal cases that ended by final decision prior to 1 January 1954, neither the public prosecutor of the Republic (of Slovenia) nor the federal public prosecutor filed any requests for the protection of legality, clearly adopting the position that the request for the protection of legality was not possible in such cases. That such position is not correct [...] since the extraordinary application of the provisions of the CrPA/48 was expressly restricted to the reopening of criminal proceedings that had ended by final decision prior to 1 January 1954, was also clearly stated by a chamber of the Supreme Court of the Republic of Slovenia when it decided on requests made by the public prosecutor of the Republic to reopen two proceedings [...] This position of the chamber of the Supreme Court was also followed by the practice of the Public prosecutor of the Republic of Slovenia in the mid-1990s."

32. After the Constitution was adopted, CrPA-77 still applied in the Republic of Slovenia in so far as it was not contrary to the legal system of the Republic of Slovenia and in so far as not determined otherwise by the Constitutional Act Implementing the Basic Constitutional Charter on the Independence and Sovereignty of the Republic of Slovenia – until the Criminal Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 63/94, hereinafter referred to as the CrPA) was adopted. The provisions on compensation for damage awarded to unjustly convicted persons were not changed by the CrPA, and they remained the same as former provisions. By extending the right to file a request for the protection of legality also to the convicted person and his counsel, and after the convicted person's death also to his close relatives (Article 421 of the CrPA), it indirectly also extended the circle of persons who have the right to use extraordinary remedies in order to achieve that a particular conviction issued prior to 1 January 1954 be found unjust. On the basis of the transitional provision of Article 559, a special deadline was set, within which these persons could file the request for the protection of legality against a decision that became final before the CrPA entered into force, and against any court proceedings pending prior to such final decision, i.e. two years after the CrPA entered into force. The CrPA also granted the right to request compensation for damage to all those persons who were unjustly convicted prior to 1 January 1954 and who, owing to the expiration of the limitation period of three years, could no longer enforce their right to compensation for damage. In Article 562 it provided that the deadline for filing a claim shall begin to run on the date the CrPA enters into force, i.e. 1 January 1995.
33. It is evident from the foregoing that the CrPA guarantees the best possibilities for all the persons unjustly convicted in the post-war period to be (morally) rehabilitated and, due to unjust conviction, to also demand compensation for pecuniary and non pecuniary damages, and for their heirs to demand compensation for pecuniary damages if the conditions determined in Articles 538 to 541 of the CrPA are met.
34. Regarding the restitution of confiscated assets, or with compensation, if restitution of the confiscated assets in kind is no longer possible, the legislature already took the view when adopting the DenA that, with regard to the restitution of assets confiscated through criminal proceedings that ended by final sentence before 31 December 1958, the provisions of the DenA (Article 92) should be applied. From the legislative materials – proposal for the adoption of the Denationalisation Act, together with draft law - ESA 299, Gazette of the National Assembly, No. 7/91, dated 19 February 1991, it is evident that, even at the time, the legislature considered that confiscations of assets, regardless of the authority that imposed them (courts in criminal and non-litigious proceedings, special commissions of People's Committees) were the primary method of nationalising the assets and that other measures – nationalisation, agrarian reform – were no less repressive, despite their different denomination. It follows from these materials that the legislature did not have the data at its disposal regarding the number of confiscations of assets and, in particular, did not have data regarding the confiscation of assets in criminal proceedings. With its Decision No. U-I-10/92, dated 5 November 1992, the Constitutional Court abrogated Article 92 of the DenA due to violations of the right determined in Article 30 of the Constitution and the prohibition of the retroactive effect of the legal acts referred to in Article 155 of the Constitution. Since the grounds that led the Constitutional Court to reach such a conclusion are not clearly stated in the reasoning of the aforementioned decision, on the basis of the data contained in the file, the Constitutional Court finds that both at the time of the adoption of the DenA and when the Constitutional Court made its decision, the full scope of confiscations pronounced in criminal proceedings that ended with the rehabilitation as a result of extraordinary legal remedies, and thus the scope of financial liability of the state, were not yet known. The Constitutional Court also obtained data in those proceedings from the Supreme Court and the Ministry of Justice from which it was evident that only a minor number of confiscations were based on criminal proceedings. Thus, the Ministry of Justice reported that only 29 judgments that imposed confiscation of assets were overturned on the basis of the reopening of criminal proceedings. The Supreme Court pointed out inter alia the inconsistency of Article 92 of the DenA, which provided for the restitution of confiscated assets pursuant to the provisions of the DenA only in cases where the sentence of confiscation of assets was overturned on the basis of the reopening of criminal proceedings, but not also on the basis of a request for the protection of legality, which created inequality between the beneficiaries. Moreover, in the opinion of the then Legislative and Legal Commission of the Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia (No. 720 -01/91 - 3/37 -1, dated 30 June 1992), the provision of Article 92 of the DenA (concerning the scope and form of compensation for damage) did not correspond to the right to compensation for damage guaranteed by Article 30 of the Constitution to the unjustly convicted person. The Decision of the Constitutional Court, to which the petitioners also make reference in their petitions, was the result of the knowledge of the circumstances and information at the time when the beneficiaries had not yet filed their requests for the payment of compensation for confiscated assets and for the reimbursement of the loss of profit before the courts. In its Decision No. U-I-107/96, dated 4 December 1996, in which it reviewed the Temporary, Partial Suspension of Assets Restitution Act, the Constitutional Court advised the legislature to re-examine the restitution of assets on the basis of Article 145 of the ECSA and that, in the context of a most strict constitutional review, a different manner of regulating the state's liability to pay damages might be taken into consideration. It invited the legislature to assess whether differentiation between the redress of the consequences due to the confiscation of assets by courts and the redress of the consequences due to the confiscation of assets by administrative authorities was well founded. At the same time, it also drew the legislature's attention to an evaluation of the financial capabilities of the Republic of Slovenia regarding full redress or injustices, which also includes the return of the loss of profit due to the confiscation of assets.

35. The challenged provisions thus represent a new regulation of this matter which should, based on new data concerning the number and scope of confiscations of assets and a re-examination of the question of the restitution of confiscated assets, ensure fair redress for post-war injustices, and simultaneously reduce the significant financial obligations of the state regarding redress for all post-war injustices. In this way, a certain balance would be achieved: the past injustices would be redressed without endangering or injuring the rights of others which have their basis in the constitutional definition of Slovenia as a social state (Article 2 of the Constitution).
36. The Constitutional Court considers that the reasons that dictated the challenged new regulation of the restitution of assets confiscated until 31 December 1958 are absolutely necessary. In addition to the available data on the number of confiscations based on criminal proceedings and actions filed in relation to the claims for the loss of profit, the Constitutional Court took into account as a determining reason the data which unequivocally demonstrates that the sentence of confiscation of assets was widespread until 1954 and that confiscation as a sentence used to be a primary method of nationalising, which is referred to in historic literature as "patriotic nationalisation". It is widely accepted that the authorities of that time used the judiciary for their own political objectives.<sup>7</sup> Only the adoption of the CrPA in 1954, which

---

7 Ključne značilnosti slovenske politike v letih 1929-1955 [Essential Characteristics of Slovene Politics in the Years 1929-1955], znanstveno poročilo [Scientific Report] Inštituta za novejšo zgodovino, Ljubljana, September 1995. Page 89: A political system based on attracting the masses into political life via the Liberation Front (the so-called people's democracy) was used by the communist party to settle accounts with the bourgeois opposition and subdue wartime political allies. The authorities used judicial proceedings to act against potential opposition. The basic aim of the processes with political background was "to expose the activities directed against the people" by the former Yugoslav regime, to settle accounts with class enemies (merchants, industrialists and kulaks), as well as with the Church and members of German minority, and to confiscate their assets." Page 90: "Among the most characteristic post-war processes were the processes before courts of national honour, the purpose of which was to enforce the moral principles of the National Liberation War (in addition to being sentenced to prison, convicted persons were also deprived of their assets and their citizenship), processes against Nazi war criminals, against collaborators of occupying forces, terrorist groups, spies, saboteurs and organizers of the "King's" Army in their home country, processes against merchants and industrialists and the so-called kulak processes. Among the political processes, the most prominent are the Nagode process (July 1947), partly processes against priests (they fall under various categories) and the Dachau processes (1948-1949). In the latter, there was a political settling of accounts within the Communist Party of Slovenia, and the processes displayed typical features of Stalinist political processes (fabricated or invented charges, trials against members of the same party and people of the same ideological views). Political background also characterised some other judicial processes. The judiciary became a means of class struggle and was based on politically reliable but professionally unqualified staff. According to data from the public prosecutor of the People's Republic of Slovenia, 124 persons were sentenced to death in the period 1947-49 before ordinary courts in Slovenia, of which only 8 were for criminal offences (murders, organised crime, etc.). During the period 1948-1950 there enacted basic legal institutions of criminal procedural law to ensure greater legality of criminal proceedings, marked the end of the criminal proceedings conducted on the basis of revolutionary laws and regulations which were passed during and after the war and on the basis of which a great number of criminal sentences were passed until 1954, and the fundamental principles of substantive and procedural criminal law were violated on a large scale, as evidenced by the number of persons who were unjustly convicted. The Constitution and the Criminal Code (general part) of 1947 did not contain the principle of legality, and the criminal procedure was not regulated until 1948, with the exception of individual organisational regulations. The numerous violations on the part of criminal courts at that time are also corroborated by the number of motions for reopening granted in recent years and the number of proceedings initiated based on requests for the protection of legality.

37. The described political situation and the data that more than 70% of the capital invested in industry was transferred to state ownership through confiscations and that 50% of all land had already been transferred to land reserves<sup>8</sup> by the end of 1946, imply that confiscations of assets based on criminal proceedings, together with agrarian reform and nationalisation, represented a process of property acquisition by the state. It is precisely the described extensive scope, where due to confiscations more than half of nationalised property became the property of the state, which serves as the aforementioned reason for the state to restrict its own strict responsibility for unjust confiscations of assets. The Constitutional Court also took into account that the provisions on compensation for damage due to unjust conviction, ensuring compensation for damage on the were approximately 1000 people sentenced each year in political trials and 91 people in 1952 and 1953. The exact number of persons sentenced in political trials until 1948 has not yet been established.”

---

8. Ključne značilnosti - znanstveno poročilo [Essential Characteristics - Scientific Report] (see note 7). Page 92: “In the early post-war years, the new authorities first nationalised the so-called “enemy’s” property (German property and property belonging to those collaborating with occupying forces), which is termed “patriotic nationalisation”. ... Most of the property seized to the benefit of the state was seized based on confiscations. In the criminal system, these took the form of ancillary penalties for various offences. Most of the confiscations were pronounced by the courts in Slovenia in 1945. By the end of 1946, around 70% of the capital invested in industry had become state property. The authorities also used confiscation thereafter as an ancillary penalty for those sentenced for a violation of the obligation to hand over crops and for other violations of the law.” Zdenko Čepič: Agrarna reforma in kolonizacija v Sloveniji (1945–1948) [Agrarian Reform and Colonisation in Slovenia (1945–1948)], Page 126: “Confiscations represented a supplemental source for land reserves, while the major single share of land was created on the basis of the Avnoj (Antifascist Council of National Liberation of Yugoslavia) Decree on the confiscation and transfer of German property and the property of opponents of the national liberation movement to state property and on the basis of court confiscations. ...In this way, the land also passed to the land reserves in subsequent periods, when agrarian reform had almost been completed. For example, assets were confiscated wholly or in part from those farmers who did not deliver a certain part of their crops in the period when obligatory buying was in force. ... The ratio between expropriated and confiscated land in the land reserves shows the nature of agrarian reform in Slovenia, which, in addition to social liberation, also had a distinct purpose of national liberation. In this way, the agrarian reform in Slovenia was also a form of “patriotic nationalisation”. Of all the land in the land reserves, 50% came from confiscations (134,117 hectares). Also the number of confiscated estates (8447) was the highest in land reserves.”

basis of the strict responsibility of the state to the widest possible extent, were adopted at the same time as the exclusion of restitution in the event that any criminal sentences pronounced prior to 1 January 1954 were overturned. The realisation that massive injustices caused by the political regime of that time by confiscations of assets based on criminal proceedings cannot be redressed by measures provided for cases where unjust criminal convictions rarely occur is now, with the entire scope of this issue coming to light, quite understandable. This fact was not taken into account by the legislature when adopting the constitutional amendment in 1990, and neither was the Constitutional Court aware of this fact at the time of abrogating Article 92 of the DenA, as has already been explained in Paragraph 34 of this reasoning. The majority of former communist countries also adopted special statutory measures to redress the massive injustices and restricted the payment of compensation for nationalised property.<sup>9</sup>

38. With the challenged provisions of Articles 145. a and 145. c, the legislature interfered to a certain extent with the constitutional rights of unjustly convicted persons and with the constitutional rights of their legal successors. The Constitutional Court estimates that in order to make the position of unjustly convicted persons equal to the position of all persons entitled to redress of post-war injustices is an appropriate method, and that the legislature could not achieve its purpose by imposing a milder measure. In this case, the Constitutional Court finds that the principle of the social state gives the legislature the right, with due consideration paid to the right of all citizens to social security, to attend to financial capabilities of the state and, in cases which are constitutionally admissible, also to limit the rights for this reason. This limitation is also required by the principle of equality. For it is evident from the petitions themselves and from the appendices thereto that, owing to the considerable length of time that passed since the confiscations based on criminal proceedings, the restitution of confiscated assets and compensation for damage due to the loss of profit in connection with confiscated assets is demanded mainly by relatives of the unjustly convicted persons, who were not directly affected by the unjust criminal conviction and whose position is not in any way different from the position of the persons whose assets were dispossessed through another form of nationalisation.
39. The process of nationalisation, which was carried out through the imposition of the sentence of confiscation of assets in criminal proceedings, was in many cases undoubtedly more brutal than the nationalisation and agrarian reforms and administrative confiscations, because in addition to pecuniary damage, the injured persons could also sustain even greater non-pecuniary damage and suffering, which is quite rightly pointed out by many of the petitioners. Having regard of the petitioners' statements regarding the harm, fear and other consequences suffered by them as the result of unjust conviction, the Constitutional Court stresses that the challenged provisions do not interfere with other rights guaranteed by the CrPA on the basis of Articles 30 and 33 of the Constitution to those persons who were affected by unjust criminal conviction.

---

9 Annex to the 9th report on implementation of the Denationalisation Act, Gazette of the National Assembly, No. 27/95.

tion – the right to rehabilitation, compensation for any other pecuniary damage and to compensation for non-pecuniary damage, if the person is still alive or if the compensation was awarded to him when he was still alive. This is because the challenged provision of Article 145. c only excludes compensation for the loss of profit as a result of pronouncement of the criminal sentence of confiscation of assets.

40. On the basis of the foregoing reasons, the Constitutional Court concludes that, by adopting Articles 145. a and 145. c of the ECSA, the legislature restricted the right to compensation for damage and the right to the restitution of confiscated assets in accordance with the principle of proportionality and that Articles 2, 3, 14, 15, 30, and 33 of the Constitution were not violated. Furthermore the international acts were not violated either. The sixth paragraph of Article 14 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (Official Gazette SFRY, No. 7/91, and Official Gazette RS, No. 35/92) only imposes compensation for damage in cases where a person has served a sentence on the basis of unjust conviction. Article 3 of Protocol No. 7 to the Convention on the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94) also guarantees the right to compensation for unjust convictions in accordance with the law or practice of the country. Furthermore the Resolution 1096, dated 27 June 1996, on measures to dismantle the heritage of former communist totalitarian systems, which was adopted by the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe, contains merely a recommendation that victims of totalitarian violence should be awarded material compensation which should not be (much) lower than the compensation accorded to those unjustly convicted for crimes under the law in force, and that if a return in kind or in its entirety proves not to be possible, just material compensation should be awarded.

Review of point 5 of Article 145. b of the ECSA

41. Article 145. b is a special provision which defines the competent bodies that have to restitute the confiscated assets, since the provisions of the DenA on competent bodies for the restitution (of assets), in particular since companies ownership transformation procedures have been brought to the end, cannot be applied. Provisions of Article 145. b - when compared to the provisions of the DenA - grant the right to compensation in the form of shares and bonds of the Republic of Slovenia in cases where the restitution in kind is not possible. The challenged point 5 provides that the issuance of bonds for the payment of compensation shall be regulated by a special law. The principle of the state governed by the rule of law, which also comprises the principle of protection of the trust in the law, demands from the legislature to ultimately regulate a certain relation or right and in doing so not to invoke a regulation which does not yet exist and in relation to which the deadline by which it should be adopted has not yet been specified. In practice, there are numerous cases where the restitution of confiscated assets in kind is no longer possible, and the restitution will have to be carried out in the form of pecuniary remuneration. By failing even to determine a deadline by which it will adopt a law regulating issuance of the bonds of the Republic of Slovenia, the legislature did not ultimately regulate the possibility of payment of “compensation” through bonds, thus practically excluding this form of compensation. As the legislature with the challenged provision violated the principle of protection of the trust in the law and, thus, the principle of the state governed by the rule of law referred to in Article 2 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court found that the challenged provision was inconsistent with the Constitution and determined a deadline of six months for the legislature to adopt the envisaged law (Decision No. U-I-86/94, dated 14 November 1994, OdlUS V, 153).

Review of Article 3 of the ECSA Amendment

42. The challenged provision stipulates that “non-litigious and civil proceedings relating to the restitution of confiscated assets that commenced before this act entered into force and have not yet been decided by final decision before this act entered into force, shall be brought to an end in accordance with this act.” All the petitioners dispute this provision because they consider that, contrary to the second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution, it interferes with acquired rights.
43. It is evident from legislative materials that the legislature was aware of retroactive effect of the challenged provision, but it considered that such retroactive effect was required in the public interest - the prevention of extraordinary financial burdening of the state which could lead to its insolvency.
44. The second paragraph of Article 155 of the Constitution provides that retroactive effect is permissible only if two conditions are fulfilled cumulatively; retroactive effect of a law must be justified by public interest and, at the same time, retroactive effects may not infringe acquired rights. Already when reviewing Articles 145. a and 145. c, the Constitutional Court found that public interest justifies the interference with the right to compensation for damage or to compensation for confiscated assets. Therefore, the same reasons apply in relation to the existence of the public interest when reviewing this provision. With regard to the second condition, the legislature is wrong to find that the challenged provision does not infringe acquired rights, since the beneficiaries would only acquire the right to restitution of confiscated assets on the basis of a final decision on the restitution of confiscated assets or on compensation for the loss of profit.
45. The CrPA itself determines when the beneficiaries become entitled to compensation for damage which they demand on the basis of the CrPA, including the compensation for damage due to the loss of profit in connection with confiscated assets. Unjustly convicted persons shall become entitled to compensation for damage on the date of final decision by which they were acquitted of charges or by which the charges were dismissed, or by the final decision by which the indictment was quashed or by which the proceedings were discontinued (the first paragraph of Article 539 of the CrPA). The heirs become entitled to compensation for pecuniary damage when the beneficiary dies. Article 541 of the CrPA expressly provides that in the event of the death of an unjustly convicted person, his heirs may continue proceedings which have already been initiated, or they may initiate them within a specified deadline – within three years of the date of final judgment of acquittal or final decision to discontinue the proceedings. In contrast with the CrPA, the ECSA does not contain any specific provisions concerning the limitation period relating to claims for the restitution of confiscated assets. Given the fact that the restitution of confiscated assets represents a special right in relation to the compensation for “damage” due to unjust sentencing, to which provisions of the CrPA do not apply, it is necessary to conclude that the general five year limitation period as determined in Article 371 of the OA applies.<sup>10</sup> Taking into consideration the general rule that the limitation period begins to run once the party is in a position to file his claim, it is necessary to find that also the right to the restitution of confiscated assets arose on the date of the final decision by which the sentence of confiscation of assets was overturned.

46. The challenged provisions therefore interfere with rights retroactively. In already initiated civil and non-litigious proceedings, courts would need to apply other regulations relating to the restitution (of assets) that are less favourable for the beneficiaries, namely the provisions of the DenA and of implementing regulations. There is no doubt that these persons, who initiated proceedings at the time when former legislation was in force, through no fault of their own incurred certain litigation costs, which were caused by the state amending the law.
47. In accordance with the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, a law can only interfere with acquired rights if it is subjected to constitutional review applying the strict test of proportionality, which has already been explained by the Constitutional Court in this Decision. The Constitutional Court therefore reviewed whether the conditions had been met in this case in order to justify the interference of the legislature with an acquired right. It is essential to take into consideration in this review that the challenged provision merely restricts the two constitutional rights granted in Articles 30 and 33 of the Constitution. The unjustly convicted persons and their heirs are still entitled to the restitution (of assets) in kind. If the restitution in kind is not possible, they have the right to ask for compensation for the confiscated assets, which in accordance with the amended provision is no longer evaluated based on the general rules of tort law but according to special provisions of the DenA and the regulations adopted on the basis thereof. In Article 145. b, the DenA provides for the possibility of compensation in the form of shares in possession of the Republic of Slovenia, the bonds of the Republic of Slovenia, and financial compensation under the conditions of Article 50 of the DenA. In case of payment of compensation for confiscated assets the legislature put the unjustly convicted persons into a more favourable position than denationalisation beneficiaries, since it did not provide that the latter are entitled to the payment of compensation (damages) with the bonds of the Compensation Fund. As already pointed out, exclusion of the right to compensation for the loss of profit due to the confiscation of assets does not entail that the unjustly convicted person or his legal successors do not have the right to request compensation for any other pecuniary damage (e.g. damage arising from the deprivation of liberty) on the basis of the CrPA. The Constitutional Court considers that the legislature had a necessary reason to interfere with the pending proceedings. During this period, most proceedings are pending and that is why, if it were otherwise, it would not be able to achieve the aim pursued by the challenged amendment and in reference with which the Constitutional Court already found that it was legitimate. The aim could not be attained by any milder measure either. As already mentioned, the legislature took into consideration the special position of the persons who were affected by its measure and envisaged a more favourable position of those persons with regard to the payment of compensation in bonds. In this way it achieved proportionality between interference with the right to compensation for the entire damage or the right to the restitution of confiscated assets according to their actual value and the equal rights of all those to whom the state will still have to pay damages or compensation for the injustices they suffered during the post-war period. In this regard, the Constitutional Court also took into account that a change to regulation would treat unequally those unjustly convicted persons and their legal successors who have not yet filed their claims or where judgment of acquittal or the discontinuance of criminal proceedings is yet to take place.

<sup>10</sup> Article 371 of the OA: “The limitation period for claims is five years, unless other limitation period is determined by law.”

48. As the persons who initiated non-litigious and civil proceedings incurred litigation costs through no fault of their own, the Constitutional Court decided that the legislature must regulate separately the question of reimbursement of these costs within 6 months. The principle of the state governed by the rule of law requires that the state provides for the reimbursement of those costs that it caused by amending an act, and this even in case where the amendment of such act is constitutionally founded.

B – III

The third paragraph of Article 145 and the first paragraph of Article 145. č of the ECSA

49. The petitioners Alojzija Farič, Anica Cimperc, Alojzija Osvald, and Mirko Lemež Jr. consider that the provision of the third paragraph of Article 145, also, renders the compensation for the entire damage resulting from the confiscation of assets impossible. The actual value of assets, which was of substantial value at the time of confiscation, should supposedly not be assessed at the time of the issuance of the decision on the restitution, for the market value (of agricultural machinery, car) was supposedly much higher at the time of confiscation than the present market value. By way of example they state that in 1948 a tractor cost a fortune, while due to the technical progress its present value is much lower.
50. Article 30 of the Constitution, which determines strict liability of the state for the damage caused by unjust conviction, puts the unjustly convicted persons in a more favourable position regarding the claims for damages than the one they would be in if they had based their claims on Article 26 of the Constitution. In Article 26, the Constitution grants the right to compensation for damage caused through unlawful actions in connection with the performance of any function or other activity by a person or authority performing such function or activity. As of the day when the sentence of confiscation is finally overturned, unjustly convicted persons shall be entitled to the restitution of the aforementioned assets, and the state cannot be relieved of this liability by proving that the court or the judge acted "lawfully". The third paragraph of Article

145 provides that in case the restitution of confiscated assets in kind is not possible, the actual value of those assets as determined at the time of issuance of the decision on restitution of the assets and in the condition as it was in at the time of the confiscation of assets shall be paid. As already explained (Paragraph 16 of the reasoning), in the third paragraph of Article 145 the legislature excluded the application of provisions of the OA regarding unjust enrichment in conformity with Article 30 of the Constitution and made the scope of the compensation for damage for confiscated assets equal to the compensation for damage under the general rules of tort law. In cases where previous situation cannot be re-established, the injured parties are thus entitled to obtain financial compensation by which they can replace the confiscated assets with new assets. This is only possible if the value of confiscated assets is assessed as at the time of the issuance of the decision on the restitution (of assets), and not as at the time when it was confiscated.<sup>11</sup> This is why the assertions of the petitioners, that the third paragraph of Article 145 does not recognise full compensation as determined by Article 30 of the Constitution, are obviously unfounded, and the Constitutional Court consequently dismissed this part of their petition. The Constitutional Court again points out that the provision of Article 145 only applies in case of the restitution of assets confiscated in criminal proceedings that ended by final decision after 31 December 1958 (Paragraph 15 of this reasoning). Following the finding of the Constitutional Court that the provision of Article 145. a, which determines a special regulation of returning the assets confiscated prior to 31 December 1958, is not inconsistent with the Constitution, the petitioners can no longer base their claim on Article 145 but on the basis of Article 145. a, which provides that also in connection with the valuation of assets the provisions of Chapter III of the DenA shall apply mutatis mutandis.

51. With regard to challenging Article 145. č, the petitioners Alojzija Farič, Anica Cimperc, Alojzija Osvald, and Mirko Lemež Jr. consider that by determining the proceedings as non-litigious their rights referred to in Articles 22 and 23 of the Constitution were violated. The amendment regarding the subject-matter jurisdiction allegedly means that their action would be decided by the Maribor Local Court in non-litigious proceedings, and not by the district court in the civil proceedings. The legislature should not have determined different proceedings for protection of rights before the courts and state authorities for identical matters, i.e. for the restitution of confiscated assets. As the legislature determined that claims for the restitution of assets shall be considered in the non-litigious proceedings, which is in the opinion of the petitioners inappropriate for the consideration of cases regarding the restitution of confiscated assets, it allegedly also made it impossible for the courts to adjudicate without undue delay.
52. The former Article 145 of the ECSA did not prescribe the type of judicial proceedings with regard to the restitution of confiscated assets. This is why the Supreme Court at its plenary session of 21 and 22 December 1992 adopted a general legal opinion that the restitution of confiscated assets be decided by courts in non-litigious proceedings. The new Article 145. č then only enacted the existing case law and did not change the position of the beneficiaries entitled to the restitution of confiscated assets in any way. This is why the assertions of the petitioners on the basis of the challenged provision that the restitution of confiscated assets will be decided by the local court instead of the district court are erroneous. The assertions of the petitioners that the determining the non-litigious proceedings for consideration of matters relating to the restitution of already confiscated assets or assets confiscated in advance implies a violation of the principle of equality (Article 14) and the equal protection of rights (Article 22 of the Constitution), as well as the right to judicial protection without undue delay (Article 23 of the Constitution), are clearly unfounded. A non-litigious civil procedure is also a court procedure regulated by law and normally gives identical procedural guarantees to the parties as the civil procedure (Non-Litigious Civil Procedure Act, Official Gazette SRS, Nos. 30/86 and 20/88, [hereinafter referred to as the NCPA]). Also in these proceedings, the court must enable the parties to the proceedings to make their statements concerning the assertions of other parties, to take part in the hearing of evidence and to discuss the results of the entire proceedings (Article 4). In non-litigious civil procedures, the provisions of the Civil Procedure Act apply mutatis mutandis unless otherwise provided by the Non-Litigious Civil Procedure Act, or any other act (Article 37). Thus, the second paragraph of Article 154. č expressly provided that the judicial review of decisions of the courts of second instance is allowed, for it would otherwise not be allowed (Article 34 of the NCPA<sup>12</sup>). Bearing this in mind, the finding that the assertions of the petitioners of violations of constitutional provisions due to determining a non-litigious civil procedure are obviously unfounded and that the rights granted in Articles 22 and 23 of the Constitution cannot be violated by determining the non-litigious civil procedure in advance, the Constitutional Court did not proceed to review the reasons stated by the petitioners concerning the inappropriateness of a non-litigious civil procedure for the restitution of confiscated assets or the compensation of their value.

<sup>11</sup> The second paragraph of Article 189 of the OA: "Compensation for damage shall be evaluated according to the prices at the time of the issuance of court decision, unless otherwise determined by law."

C

53. The Constitutional Court adopted this decision pursuant to the second paragraph of Article 26, the first paragraph of Article 40, and Article 48 of the CCA, composed of: Dr Lovro Šturm, President, and Judges Dr Miroslava Geč-Korošec, Dr Peter Jambrek, Dr Tone Jerovšek, Mag. Matevž Krivic, Franc Testen, Dr Lojze Ude, and Dr Dragica Wedam-Lukić. Point 1 of the operative provisions was reached by six votes against two (Judges Šturm and Jambrek voted against), Point 3 of the operative provisions was reached by seven votes against one (Judge Šturm voted against), and Points 2, 4, and 5 of the operative provisions were reached unanimously. Judge Šturm submitted a dissenting opinion and was joined by Judge Jambrek.

Dr Lovro Šturm
President

---

12 Article 34 of the NCPA: "Appeal to the Supreme Court is inadmissible unless determined otherwise by law."

---

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE DR ŠTURM, JOINED BY JUDGE DR JAMBREK

25

I voted against Point 1 of the operative provisions of the adopted Decision since it fails to take account of specific situations for specific categories of beneficiaries affected by the amendment to the law. The legislature should have dealt with the unjustly convicted persons who are still alive, as well as all those beneficiaries who have already been awarded the damages at the first instance, if no legal irregularities or factual errors with regard to the state of affairs were established in eventual further judicial proceedings. I would like to note that, also in these cases, I do not oppose the position of the Constitutional Court regarding its justification for not recognising the loss of profit, with which I agree. In this dissenting opinion I am instead defending the right of persons classified in one of the aforementioned categories to be awarded fair compensation for their confiscated property in cases where restitution in kind is not possible. The interference of the legislature with the legally protected positions of the beneficiaries who were direct victims of fabricated political judicial proceedings is objectively unfounded and illegitimate. Note in particular should be taken that the confiscations of property ordered by the courts were enforced before 1950, over half a century ago, and that only some of the convicted persons are still alive, i.e. only three among the petitioners. Therefore there are no objective grounds for the state to not be in a position to guarantee the right to compensation to these beneficiaries, whom are relatively few in number (here I exclude the claims for loss of profit) pursuant to the legislation in force on the date the claims were filed.

Redressing past injustices in these cases must not put the financial security of the state at risk. Pursuant to the DA, the beneficiaries are now required to align their claims to the new methodology for the valuation of the confiscated property, meaning that the current lengthy judicial proceedings will be of no avail and will have to be commenced anew. Such a situation runs contrary to: the constitutional principles of the protection of trust in the law and the protection of legitimate expectations derived from the principle of the rule of law referred to in Article 3 of the Constitution; the constitutional requirement that the courts must reach a decision without undue delay, as referred to in Article 23 of the Constitution; and to Articles 30 and 33 of the Constitution. Moreover, this is a degrading experience for the few remaining participants, who are advanced in age, and therefore also represents a violation of the constitutional ban on torture and degrading treatment by the state, as determined in Article 18 of the Constitution.

Therefore the interference of the legislature with the rights to compensation for the property confiscated by the courts of the former convicted persons that are still alive and were rehabilitated and filed a claim in accordance with the applicable statutory provisions, regardless of whether the first instance court already adopted its decision, is not only entirely disproportionate and excessive, but also not consistent with the Constitution and European Convention on Human Rights. The legal successors of the unjustly convicted persons who filed claims for compensation based on the final court decision, by which former judgments on the confiscation of property were overturned, and to whom the court of first instance had already awarded damages in accordance with the statutory provisions (here I again exclude the compensation for the loss of profit), had legitimate expectations that the judicial proceedings would be concluded pursuant to the statutory provisions that were in force when the court of first instance adopted the decision. There are also few such cases which can be attributed to the lengthy judicial proceedings at first instance. The legitimate expectations and the trust of these beneficiaries in the law have been violated, and thus the interference of the legislature in these cases is excessive and contrary to Articles 2, 23, and 33 of the Constitution and the European Convention on Human Rights.

U-I-60/98

16 July 1998

I did not vote against Point 3 of the operative provisions, although I could have done so for the sake of consistency, because it nevertheless goes some way to mitigating the constitutionally impermissible interference of the legislature.

Dr Lovro Šturm

Dr Peter Jambrek

Decision No. Up-50/99, dated 14 December 2000

DECISION

At a session held on 14 December 2000 in proceedings to decide upon the constitutional complaint of A. A., d. d., Z., and B. B. from Y., represented by Mag. C. C., attorney in X., the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. Supreme Court Judgment No. II Ips 160/97, dated 30 October 1998, Ljubljana Higher Court Judgment No. II Cp 374/97, dated 21 May 1997, and Ljubljana District Court Judgment No. I P 328/95, dated 9 December 1996, rectified by Order No. I P 328/95, dated 17 March 1997, are abrogated.
2. The claim of the plaintiff D. D. is dismissed in the part that refers to the finding that “defendants A. A., d. o. o., and B. B., Y., violated the plaintiff’s constitutionally ensured privacy by publishing his name and surname on page 59 of the book “V znamenju lože” [“In the Sign of the Lodge”] and in the part in which the defendants are prohibited from further violating the right of D. D. to privacy by publishing in the press and by spreading his name and surname with regard to his membership in a freemason lodge, insofar as the prohibition refers to publishing his name and surname in the book V znamenju lože.
3. In the remaining part, the case is remanded to the Ljubljana District Court for new adjudication.

Reasoning

A

1. The District Court found for the plaintiff, whose claim was that the court should establish that by publishing the name of the plaintiff in the media the defendants interfered with his right to privacy, his personal rights, and his right to the protection of personal data. At the same time, the court prohibited the defendants from further interfering with the rights of the plaintiff and awarded the plaintiff monetary damages in respect of non-pecuniary damage in the amount of SIT 5,012,800.

The court calculated the amount of the damages in such manner that it calculated the costs of the publication of the commercial advertisements that interfered with the rights of the applicant. The Higher Court abrogated the judgment of the court of first instance in the part in which the damages were awarded. It was of the opinion that the court of first instance did not establish with sufficient precision in what forms the non-pecuniary damage arose. In the remaining part it upheld the judgment of the court of first instance. The Supreme Court partially granted the revision of the defendants against the judgment of the court of second instance and modified the judgments of the courts of the second and first instances so that the declaratory operative provisions only referred to the finding of a violation of the right to privacy and not also to the finding of a violation of personal rights and the right to the protection of personal data. The Supreme Court modified the operative provision that prohibited further interferences in such manner that it now states the following: Defendants A. A., d. o. o., Z., and B. B. are prohibited from further violating the right of the plaintiff D. D. to privacy by publishing in the press and by spreading his name and surname with regard to his membership in a freemason lodge. In the remaining part, the Supreme Court dismissed the revision as unfounded.

2. The defendants filed a constitutional complaint against the Judgments cited in the operative provisions in which they claim that the court erroneously weighed the relation between the plaintiff's right to privacy and their freedom of expression and freedom of artistic endeavour. In their opinion, the court failed to establish a fair balance between the opposing rights, but favoured the right to privacy instead. They allege that the complainant as the author of the book "V znamenju lože", published by the A. A. publishing company, described in it the problems of freemasonry in Slovenia and his personal experience with it, because he became a member of the society, which functions as an association, and remained a member thereof for some time. In this part, the book has an autobiographical character; [the author] also described in this respect several persons whom he encountered [in such context]. The complainant B. B. also draws attention to the fact that not only did he name the plaintiff by his full name, but also more than 16 persons. [Allegedly], the right of the complainant to independently decide which persons he would name by their real names, which by pseudonyms, and which he would black out cannot be limited. He allegedly named plaintiff D. D. by his full name due to the fact that he was his "guide" when he was accepted into the freemasons' association. The complainants further allege that the problems related to freemasonry do not refer only to the private sphere, because the activities of freemasonry as well as the activities of the associations that evoke the ideas of freemasonry are directed towards the benefit of all citizens. This is precisely why citizens allegedly have the right to obtain information regarding the functioning of these associations. The information regarding the functioning of such associations without the names being stated is, in the opinion of the complainants, imperfect information. The prohibition of spreading such information allegedly entails a violation of the freedom of expression. Consequently, with regard to the above, the challenged Judgments allegedly violated the complainants' freedom of expression (Article 39 of the Constitution) and the freedom of science and the arts (Article 59 of the Constitution). The complainants also draw attention to the fact that only the Supreme Court carried out the procedure of weighing between individual rights and substantiated it, whereby the courts allegedly also violated his right to legal remedies (Article 25 of the Constitution).

3. On 10 October 2000, the panel of the Constitutional Court accepted the constitutional complaint for consideration. In conformity with the provisions of Articles 6 and 56 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), the Constitutional Court served the constitutional complaint on the Supreme Court and the opposing party (the plaintiff) in the dispute. The opposing party in the dispute alleged in his reply to the complainant's allegations from the constitutional complaint that the challenged judicial decisions did establish a fair balance between the right to privacy and the freedom of expression. He is of the opinion that already the order in which constitutional rights are listed in the Constitution demonstrates that when weighing and where all the circumstances of the concrete case are taken into consideration, the right to privacy must be given priority over the right [i.e. freedom] of expression. The opposing party also draws attention to the fact that he is no longer a public person, but an entirely ordinary citizen, about whom it would only be admissible to publish information in connection with his activities as an attorney. He is of the opinion that the complainant collected data on the freemason society in an unfair manner, because he joined the society under the pretence that he wished to become a member thereof, whereas in fact he was only interested in collecting information. In such manner, he allegedly violated the rules of the society and also the rules of journalism. The opposing party also alleges that the disclosure of his name did not in any way contribute to informing the public in a better manner, nor did it contribute to the artistic power of expression of the complainant's work. The citation of his name was allegedly unfair, immoral, and written for the purposes of chicanery and vengeance, because the opposing party and the complainant had a long-term dispute. In the opinion of the opposing party, also in the event one allowed the possibility that the citation of his name in the copyrighted work is in conformity with the admissible aim and that it is intended to inform the public – which is something that he doubts – the citation of his name in commercial advertisements would only serve the economic interests of the complainants and the sensationalistic promotion of the book and would thus be inadmissible. The Supreme Court did not reply to the constitutional complaint.
4. The Supreme Court stated in the reasoning of the Judgment that in conformity with the principle in accordance with which human rights are limited only by the rights of others and in such cases as are determined by the Constitution (the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution), in the concrete case it weighed between the right to privacy (Article 35 of the Constitution), on the one hand, and the freedom of expression (Article 39 of the Constitution) and the freedom of sciences and the arts (Article 59 of the Constitution), on the other. In doing so, it allegedly took into consideration the principle of proportionality between the interference and the aim pursued by the measure. In the opinion of the court, the existence of the public interest in being informed is important for the assessment of the relation between the right to privacy and the freedom of expression. The court concluded that there was no public interest in the interference with the defendant's privacy, because it would have also been possible to describe freemasonry with all its characteristics and positive and negative influences without mentioning the name of the plaintiff. In the opinion of the court, with regard to the right to be informed of a certain important occurrence in social life it is namely necessary to separate the event (a certain activity or association) from the individuals participating in the event. In the assessment of the Supreme Court, the individuals in the concrete case were not important to the description of the event, which is also confirmed by the fact that the other most important participants in the association were referred to by pseudonyms. The Supreme Court stresses that there were also no other circumstances that would justify the citation of the plaintiff's full name. Despite his past positions (e.g. the president of the Basketball Association and the president of the Rotary Club), which in the opinion of the court can in fact have an influence on whether a person is recognised in public, he was not a person from political or public life, therefore it was not allowed for his name to be used in public without his authorisation for purposes that have no connection with his past positions. The Supreme Court also warns that not even the possible authorisation given some time ago by the defendant that certain of his personal information may be published entails that he agrees with all the future statements given regardless of the context. With regard to that, the Supreme Court assessed that the right to privacy must be given priority over the freedom to expression. Mentioning a person's membership in a certain association can even entail, in the opinion of the Supreme Court, a violation of the right of association (Article 42 of the Constitution), which allegedly also follows from the case law of American courts. With regard to the collision between the right to privacy and the right to artistic endeavour, on the basis of the findings of the courts of lower instances that the informational value of the copyrighted work would not have been reduced if the plaintiff had not been referred to by his real name, the Supreme Court concluded that the right to artistic endeavour was not affected.

5. The Supreme Court separately assessed the question of whether the relation between the right to privacy and the right [i.e. freedom] to expression or to be informed must be assessed differently when what is at issue are names that are mentioned in advertisements. In its opinion, advertising in newspapers for commercial purposes can entail a significantly more severe interference with privacy than the publication of a name and surname in an artistic or any other copyrighted work. While publication in the context of a copyrighted work could even be allowed, in the assessment of the Supreme Court, "advertising with sentences taken from the copyrighted work in newspapers with a large circulation, which applies in particular to A. A. and D., in any event [entails] an inadmissible interference with privacy if only the name of one member of the lodge is mentioned in the advertisements and if precisely that name is the subject of marketing." For such reason, the assessment of the collision between the two rights requires a different weighing of opposing interests, which in the case at issue brings us to the result that the protection of privacy has priority over providing [the public with] information. The Supreme Court adds that the same also applies to naming the plaintiff by his real name in the book.

B

6. In constitutional complaint proceedings, the Constitutional Court examines the challenged decision with regard to the question of whether human rights or fundamental freedoms were violated therewith. The opposing party stated in its reply to the constitutional complaint that the challenged Judgments refer exclusively to commercial advertisements and that they did not interfere with the book "V znamenju lože", therefore the right of the complainants to the freedom of expression and to the freedom of sciences and the arts cannot be violated therewith. The Constitutional Court found that point 2 of the operative provisions of the judgment of first instance, which prohibits the defendants from further violating the plaintiff's human rights and fundamental freedoms (after the judgment of revision, only the plaintiff's human right to privacy) by "publishing in the press," is based on point 1 of the operative provisions, in which the court of first instance established that a violation of the plaintiffs' constitutional right inter alia also occurred due to the mention of the plaintiff's name on page 59 of the book "V znamenju lože". Also from the reasoning of the challenged Judgments it follows that the courts assessed the admissibility of the publication of the plaintiff's name both in the book and in commercial advertisements and that they thereby came to the conclusion that the plaintiff's right to privacy was violated already by the publication of his name in the book, therefore the Constitutional Court assessed whether such standpoint is in conformity with the Constitution. The Constitutional Court examined the challenged Judgments from the viewpoint of a possible violation of the freedom of expression (Article 39 of the Constitution) and the freedom of artistic endeavour (Article 59 of the Constitution), namely on the basis of allegations that the courts failed to establish a fair balance between the opposing rights, on the basis of the allegations that citizens have the right to obtain information regarding the functioning of associations whose objectives are directed towards the benefit of all citizens, on the basis of allegations that information regarding the functioning of such associations without the mention of names is imperfect information, and on the basis of allegations that authors have the right to independently decide whether they will name a certain person by his or her full name. It thereby took into consideration that in the dispute the plaintiff did not claim that the complainant's statement was not true, nor did he allege that the mention of his name with regard to his membership in the lodge was offensive to him and that it entailed an interference with his honour and good name.
7. Modern legal theory defines privacy as a sphere of an individual in which no one may interfere without special statutory authorisation.<sup>1</sup> The right to privacy establishes, for individuals, a sphere of their own intimate functioning in which they may decide by themselves – and this is guaranteed by the state – which interferences there-with they will allow.<sup>2</sup> However, the right to privacy is not an absolute right;<sup>3</sup> it is limited by the protection of the rights and benefits of others and by the behaviour of an individual in public.<sup>4</sup> In fact, a human as a social being who perpetually comes into contact with other people cannot completely avoid the fact that for various reasons and motives also others are interested in him or her and his or her personal life.<sup>5</sup> In such context, we could divide the sphere of an individual's private life into the sphere of the individual's intimate life and family life, the sphere of the individual's private life that does not take place in public, and the sphere of the individual's [private] life that does take place in public.<sup>6</sup> In general, it is true that the less intimate the sphere of an individual's private life is, the smaller the scope of legal protection it enjoys when it comes into collision with the interests and rights of other individuals.<sup>7</sup> In the assessment of the admissibility of an interference with an individual's right to privacy also the characteristics of the individual whose right is interfered with must be taken into consideration. Legal theory states in such context that without the consent of the affected person it is admissible to write about the personal life of personalities from modern life in whom the public is interested (so-called absolute public persons) and of persons in whom the public is interested only in connection with a certain concrete event (so-called relative public persons), but not also about other persons. When describing the life events of absolute and relative public persons it is, in particular, allowed to describe, without the consent of the affected person, what is important for the character, actions, and thoughts of these persons with regard to their public activities. However, with regard to such persons it is not allowed, without the consent of the affected person, to publish matters from their intimate lives.<sup>8</sup> However, special rules for resolving collisions between the right to privacy and the freedom of expression or the right to artistic endeavour apply when a person reveals (in a conversation or in an artistic work), within the framework of the description of his or her own life, the private life of another person. The free development of an individual's personality namely requires that a person is not only entitled to an existence that is isolated from all other beings; we must namely allow an individual to develop in an active and extraverted manner precisely due to the free development of his or her personality (which is the basis for acknowledging all individual personal rights). A human being as a social being must be allowed not only to form his or her opinions, but also to

1 J. Rivjero, Les publiques, Vol. 2, Presses Universitaires de France, 1989, p. 76, and A. Finžgar, Osebnostne pravice [Personality Rights], Slovenian Academy of Sciences and Arts, Ljubljana 1985, p. 121.

---

2 Decisions & Reports 5, Report No. 6825, p. 89.

3 A. Finžgar, 1985, p. 121.

4 R. St. J. Macdonald et al., European System for the Protection of Human Rights, Kluwer Academic Publishers, Netherlands 1993, p. 407.

5 See A. Finžgar, 1985, p. 121 et seq.

6 Ibidem.

7 M. Baston Vogt, Der sachliche Schutzbereich des zivilrechtlichen allgemeinen Persönlichkeitsrechts, Mohr Siebeck, 1997, p. 208.

8 A. Finžgar, 1985, p. 128.

convey them (in oral or written form or by conclusive actions) and to elaborate them in contacts with others.<sup>9</sup> With regard to the above, an author must have the right to describe in his or her work (or to mention in a conversation that refers to his or her life) the persons with whom he or she has come into contact and the events he or she has experienced therewith without needing their consent. This right belongs to him or her on the basis of his or her freedom of expression and of artistic endeavour regardless of whether this concerns a person from public life or any other individual.

8. In the particular case, the plaintiff, as the former president of the Bar Association, president of the Rotary Club, president of the Basketball Association, a known attorney in Ljubljana, and at the same time also a member of the freemasons (the plaintiff did not deny this fact during the lawsuit) was exposed to public interest, a consequence of which was also that the sphere of his privacy was reduced. The position of the Higher Court (also joined by the Supreme Court) – namely that the former positions of the applicant can indeed have an influence on his being recognised in public, yet without his consent it is not allowed for his name to be used in public for entirely different purposes that have no connection with his past positions – not only no longer corresponds to the factual standards that have become established in the Slovene press and in other media, where the general tolerance of individuals with regard to unveiling their private lives is significantly greater than that of the plaintiff, it even does not correspond to the standpoints in legal theory.<sup>10</sup> Human rights law theory, for instance, states that the right to private life is limited by the protection of the rights and benefits of others and by the behaviour of the individual in public.<sup>11</sup> The Constitutional Court has already emphasised that by entering the space of social activities, an individual must also assume the risk that his or her actions will be the subject of discussion and assessment (Decision No. U-I-172/94, dated 9 November 1994 – Official Gazette RS, No. 73/94, and OdlUS III, 123). What was at issue in the concrete case was actually not the unveiling of facts from the plaintiff's intimate sphere, but the description of his role in the events that occurred, where he came into contact with numerous people, inter alia also with the complainant, who then described in his book their interactions with regard to freemasonry. The complainant's primary purpose was not to reveal data from the plaintiff's private sphere; he wished to describe freemasonry as a phenomenon, as well as his own experience and perspective regarding freemasonry. In doing so, he also wrote of persons whom he encountered in connection with freemasonry and the events that he experienced with these persons. In such context, he also wrote about the plaintiff, due to the fact that allegedly the plaintiff was sort of his guide, because he helped the complainant join the freemasons, and he played the central role in his freemasonry-related life. The complainant only described events from the plaintiff's activities in this circle and not from his intimate life. In the framework of the freedom of expression and in the framework of artistic endeavour, the complainant as a social being undoubtedly has such right to describe the events in which he participated and the persons whom he encountered in his life. The fact that by this written work he violated the internal agreements between the members of the lodge has no influence on the existence of his freedom of expression. Therefore, the mentioned legal situation cannot be equalled to the example from the American case law where the government requested a list of the members of a certain association.<sup>12</sup> Due to the fact that what is at issue does not entail a violation of the plaintiff's right to privacy, it is irrelevant for the assessment whether in the book the complainant named by their real names also other persons or not. With regard to that, the decision [of the court] that in the concrete case the right to privacy must be given priority over the freedom of expression and artistic endeavour is inconsistent with the Constitution. The decision of the court thus entails a violation of the complainant's freedom of expression (Article 39 of the Constitution) and artistic endeavour (Article 59 of the Constitution).

<sup>9</sup> M. Baston Vogt, 1997, p. 207.

<sup>10</sup> E.g., R. St. J. Macdonald et al., 1993, p. 407.

<sup>11</sup> Ibidem.

9. The freedom of expression determined by Article 39 of the Constitution also includes the right to advertise for commercial purposes. The Constitutional Court concurs with the position that stricter criteria apply for the assessment of whether the mention of names for advertising and commercial purposes entails a violation of the right to privacy than if names are published in a copyrighted work. In foreign and Slovene legal theory and case law it is not disputable that it is not allowed for an individual's name or image to be exploited for advertising and commercial purposes without the consent of the person concerned.<sup>13</sup> However, in the concrete case it must be taken into consideration that what was at issue was the publication of a name in an advertisement for a copyrighted work in which the plaintiff's name figured; according to the complainant's allegation, even a direct quotation from the book was published. Due to the fact that the finding of the courts in the challenged Judgments that the publication of the plaintiff's name in an advertisement entails a violation of his right to privacy was based on the assessment that the publication of the plaintiff's name in the book already entails such a violation – while the Constitutional Court established that this standpoint is not in conformity with the Constitution – a new assessment of this question must be carried out.
10. In light of the above, the Constitutional Court abrogated the challenged Judgments. In the part in which the challenged Judgments refer to the publication of the plaintiff's name in the book, it decided on the matter itself, by applying the first paragraph of Article 60 of the CCA, and in this part dismissed the claim. The Constitutional Court decided to adopt such decision because it assessed that the standpoint that in the concrete case the right to privacy must be given priority over the freedom of expression and artistic endeavour is inconsistent with the Constitution, and because 12 As follows from the file, it is not disputable between the parties that the plaintiff did not request, from the state or the Lodge, the list of all persons engaged in freemasonry [in Slovenia], nor did the state request such list from the database manager; therefore, the reference of the Supreme Court to the American case law that examines such cases is irrelevant.

---

13 A. Finžgar, 1985, p. 102; F. Seifert, NJW 27/99, p. 1893.

in the file there was enough data for the adoption of such decision. It thereby also took into consideration that the proceedings have already lasted several years and that in the event of new decision-making on this question they would be additionally delayed, to the detriment of the complainant's constitutional rights.

11. In the part in which the challenged Judgments refer to the publication of the plaintiff's name in commercial advertisements, the Constitutional Court remanded the case to the court of first instance for new adjudication. When deciding anew, the court will have to reassess the question of whether the constitutional complainants violated the plaintiff's right to privacy by publishing his name in commercial advertisements, by taking into consideration all the circumstances of the case and by observing the consideration of the Constitutional Court that the position that the publication of the plaintiff's name in the book already entails a violation of the plaintiff's right to privacy is inconsistent with the Constitution. The court will have to substantiate the outcome of such weighing with arguments that are in conformity with the Constitution and that ensure that each of the colliding rights is assigned appropriate constitutional weight.
12. Since the Constitutional Court abrogated the challenged Judgments already due to a violation of the rights determined by Articles 39 and 59 of the Constitution, it did not examine whether the Supreme Court Judgment also violated the complainants' right to legal remedies (Article 25 of the Constitution).

C

13. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 59 and the first paragraph of Article 60 of the CCA, composed of: Franc Testen, President, and Judges Dr Janez Čebulj, Dr Zvonko Fišer, Lojze Janko, Milojka Modrijan, Dr Mirjam Škrk, Dr Lojze Ude, and Dr Dragica Wedam-Lukić. The decision was reached unanimously.

Franc Testen
President

DECISION

At a session held on 7 October 2004 in proceedings to decide upon the constitutional complaint of A. A., from Z. Z., the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. Supreme Court Judgement No. II Ips 495/2001, dated 17 April 2002, Ljubljana Higher Court Judgment No. II Cp 214/2000, dated 25 April 2001, and Ljubljana District Court Judgment No. II P 384/99, dated 22 December 1999, are abrogated.
2. The case is remanded to the Ljubljana District Court for new adjudication.

Reasoning

A

1. In renewed civil proceedings, the court of first instance established that the sales contract dated 30 June 1995 that the complainant had entered into with the plaintiff was rescinded. Furthermore, it imposed on him the obligation to return to the plaintiff the possession of real properties entered under land register entry No. 1319, cadastral municipality Z., and to reinstate the land register situation as it had existed prior to the filing of the land register proposal dated 3 July 1995, which is registered under No. Dn 5806/95. The complainant appealed against such decision. The Higher Court dismissed his appeal as unfounded and upheld the judgement of the court of first instance. The Supreme Court dismissed his request for a revision.
2. In the challenged judgment, the Supreme Court stated that it had already replied to the entire set of allegations contained in the request for a revision that refer to the “recording of the conversation and the eavesdropping on the conversation between the plaintiff and the defendant in the attorney’s office” in Order No. II Ips 80/98, dated 25 March 1999, by which it abrogated Ljubljana Higher Court Judgment No. II Cp 381/97, dated 15 October 1997, in relation to Ljubljana District Court Judgment No. II P 1401/95, dated 6 September 1996, and remanded the case to the court of first instance for new adjudication. Moreover, the Supreme Court explained that the case involved a question of principle, with regard to which the plenary session of the Supreme Court adopted a legal opinion on the basis of the mentioned Order, therefore, in its opinion, there is no need to substantiate again why the evidence related to the disputed telephone conversation between the original plaintiff and the defendant (the audio recording of the conversation, a copy thereof on cassette, and the examination of the witness regarding that conversation) were admissible.

3. In his constitutional complaint, the complainant expresses his disapproval of the decision of the court and alleges that the second paragraph of Article 14 and Article 22 of the Constitution were violated. He argues that the court did not reply to all of his allegations, but only referred to its principled legal opinion, which states in general that testimony as to what a witness knows about a telephone conversation between litigating parties is not inadmissible. He is also of the opinion that in the case at issue the inadmissible recording [of the conversation] was prepared in advance, in which also the plaintiff's attorney participated. He adds that he does not agree with the Supreme Court's position according to which, in the revision proceedings, he allegedly produced new evidence, because he had produced that evidence already in the first-instance proceedings, however the court of first instance had not admitted it. For such reason, his right to the equal protection of rights determined by Article 22 of the Constitution was allegedly violated.
4. By Order No. Up-472/02, dated 25 May 2004, a panel of the Constitutional Court accepted the constitutional complaint for consideration. In conformity with Article 56 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), the Constitutional Court sent the constitutional complaint to the Supreme Court, which did not respond thereto. On the basis of Article 22 of the Constitution, the constitutional complaint was sent to the opposing party in the civil proceedings, who did not take delivery thereof. In conformity with Article 6 of the CCA in relation to the second paragraph of Article 141 of the Civil Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 26/99 etc. – hereinafter referred to as the CPA), after the expiry of the fifteen-day time limit the document was deemed to have been served, which is what the opposing party was also warned of in the postal notification.

B

5. By stating that in the challenged judgment the Supreme Court did not respond to his allegations, but only referred to its own reasoning in Order No. II Ips 80/98, dated 25 March 1999, and to the legal opinion adopted on the basis of that Order, the complainant substantiates that Article 22 of the Constitution was violated, which in the field of judicial proceedings is a reflection of the principle of equality before the law determined by the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution. The Constitutional Court has already emphasised numerous times that from the right of a party to make a statement (Article 22 of the Constitution) there also follows the duty of courts to take notice of the party's allegations, to weigh their significance, and to adopt a position with regard to those allegations that are of essential importance for the decision. However, by merely referring to the reasons stated in its previous decision and its legal opinion, the Supreme Court did not violate the complainant's right to make a statement. This is in particular true in the case at issue, as the decision to which the Supreme Court referred was adopted in a preliminary stage of the same proceedings, and the complainant does not allege that he stated any new reasons in the request for a revision.

6. By the Order to which the Supreme Court referred in the challenged judgment the Supreme Court abrogated the judgements of the courts of the first and second instances, which had been based on the position that in a civil procedure it is inadmissible to testify on what a witness knows about a telephone conversation between two other persons (in the case referred to, between the two litigating parties), where one of them was unaware that someone else was also listening to the conversation. The Supreme Court carried out the assessment from the viewpoint of the protection of privacy and concluded that a party to proceedings may be opposed to a witness testifying on the content of a telephone conversation with regard to which that party would have the right to refuse to testify thereon for the reasons determined by Article 271 in relation to the first paragraph of Article 238 of the CPA, because otherwise his or her right to refuse to testify would be circumvented. Evidently, according to the Supreme Court, the rejected evidence in the case at issue is not such an example. The Supreme Court further explained why, in the taking of such evidence, it did not see the danger of violating the defendant's right to privacy, and in such context it particularly emphasised that this was the case due to the content of the telephone conversation, which was of a business character – a conversation on the sale and purchase of real property. The court was thus of the opinion that the participants in the business-related telephone conversation were not entitled to expect that the other participant in the conversation would not enable someone else to listen to such telephone conversation. Common knowledge includes knowing means by which this can be achieved, as does knowing that business partners, e.g. parties to an agreement in the event of a dispute, completely justifiably wish to ensure the possibility to secure evidence in order to be able to prove in a possible judicial dispute the content of such business relationship. Therefore, the expectation that in such a conversation the interlocutor would not take advantage of such possibility cannot be considered to be justified – but only if the confidentiality of the conversation was not evident due to the intertwining of the business conversation with strictly private (e.g. intimate or erotic) content or was not explicitly agreed upon, mutually promised, or guaranteed to both interlocutors. According to the Supreme Court, a course of events such as the plaintiff alleges occurred in the case at issue cannot be deemed to entail an interference with privacy regarding a telephone communication.
7. With regard to the evidence of “a cassette recording of a conversation between the parties to proceedings,” the Supreme Court adopted the position that an audio recording of a conversation with another person that is recorded by a participant in the conversation – by means of a cassette recorder or any other type of recording device (e.g. a voice recorder, which is merely a mobile cassette recorder – a miniature cassette recorder with a built-in microphone) – must in principle be assessed in entirely the same manner as notes made regarding a conversation. Irrespective of the type of transcript (by hand, by a typewriter, or by a computer) and regardless of the time of the transcription (during the conversation or afterwards), such transcript allegedly in any case firstly entails (in particular) an aid to the writer's memory – his or her “memory's record”, as today one could completely justifiably say given the current knowledge of the functioning of a human brain. Secondly, it allegedly (only) entails additional evidence (an aid to the credibility of the narrative, i.e. the verbalisation of the “memory's record”). That which applies to a participant in a conversation who records his or her conversation with another person should allegedly also apply in instances where the audio record of the conversation is made, in accordance with the will of one participant, by a third person. According to the Supreme Court, “in general, no reason can be seen why – to put it simply – the decisive basis for a different assessment should be who “pressed the button,” i.e. who turned on the cassette recorder by which the conversation was recorded.”

8. On the basis of a constitutional complaint the Constitutional Court also assesses whether the disputed decision is based on a position that from the viewpoint of the protection of human rights is unacceptable. In the case at issue, the question is raised whether some constitutional right of the complainant was violated due to the fact that the Supreme Court adopted a position in favour of the admissibility of the testimony of the defendant's attorney with regard to the content of the telephone conversation between the parties to proceedings, and of using the record thereof.
9. The complainant assesses, mutatis mutandis, that by adopting such positions, the Supreme Court violated his rights determined by Articles 35 and 37 of the Constitution. The Constitution protects that part of privacy that refers to the freedom of communication in two instances: in Article 35, where it sets the general rule that every person has the right to privacy and that privacy is inviolable, and especially in the first paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution, by which the privacy of correspondence and other means of communication is guaranteed.
10. The Constitutional Court has already adopted the position that a person's privacy, the inviolability of which is guaranteed by Article 35 of the Constitution, refers, in the context of a person's existence, to a more or less complete whole of his or her behaviours and involvements, feelings, and relations, for which it is characteristic and essential that the person shapes and maintains it alone or alone with those near to him or her with whom he or she lives in intimate community, for example with a spouse, and that he or she lives in such community with a sense of being protected against intrusion by the public or any other undesired person (Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-32/94, dated 13 April 1995, OdlUS IV, 38). Human actions thus also constitute a common and essential part or aspect of such whole. These include the right of a person to his or her own voice, i.e. the right over one's voice.<sup>1</sup> The latter allows everyone to decide on their own on the appearance of their personality [which they convey] in communication with others. The personality of a person is namely reflected in his or her words. Everyone has the right to speak freely, without reservation, and in normal circumstances, which is expressed in the proverb: “verba volant, litterae scriptae manent.”<sup>2</sup> The [mentioned] protection includes the possibility that in communication with others the person responds in a manner he or she deems most appropriate and adapts to each individual addressee. Another element that corresponds to this fundamental right is also that the person decides for him- or herself who can hear the content of his or her communication – only his or her interlocutor, a certain closed group of persons, or the public. Such a decision regarding oneself and one’s words therefore also encompasses the determination of the circle of persons who are to hear the content of one’s conversation. This right finds substance in the entitlement of every person to decide whether his or her voice shall be recorded and thereby, through a sound carrier, perhaps transmitted to third persons, whereby the words and the voice become separated from the person and independent. A recording gives power over another person, over a personal asset of someone else, as it enables repetition and thus interferes with the exclusive right of the person to control the spread of the content of his or her communication and to decide by him- or herself who shall or who may hear such communication.<sup>3</sup> With the protection guaranteed by Article 35 and in particular by Article 37 of the Constitution, human communication is safeguarded against the threat that words (e.g. a thoughtless or impulsive statement, a superficial opinion, or any kind of conversation due to the content or the tone of the voice in different circumstances) could be used as evidence against the person who uttered them. Therefore, protection from the (secret) recording of conversations without the permission of all the persons participating therein is ensured. Furthermore, not only protection from recording is guaranteed, but also protection from other violations. Protection also extends to the situation wherein an interlocutor includes in the conversation a third person as a listener without the other interlocutor being aware thereof. The protection of this right does not depend on whether an action can be qualified as a criminal offence as determined by Article 148 of the Penal Code (Official Gazette RS, No. 63/94, etc.). The punishable character of a certain action can certainly point to the fact that a certain particularly protected asset is affected; however, for the constitutional protection of the right to privacy it is not decisive whether, in a specific legal order, listening to or recording a telephone conversation between two persons is also regulated by criminal law. The right over one’s voice as a reflection of the right to privacy is protected regardless of that. However, if a person behaves in a manner such that his or her words can be heard without much difficulty by a third person, he or she must bear the consequences him- or herself. What is essential, therefore, is whether a person can reasonably expect, given the circumstances of the case, that a third person will not hear him or her. The [mentioned] right is also not violated if the person allows a third person to either record or listen to the conversation.

1 In German (constitutional) case law and literature, one speaks of “Recht an der eigene Stimme” or “Recht am gesprochenen Wort,” while in France a similar expression, “le droit à la voix,” is used. The same is stated in A. Finžgar: Osebnostne pravice [Personality Rights], SAZU, Ljubljana 1985, p. 114.

---

2 A. Finžgar, ibidem.

3 Ibidem.

11. The right over one's voice is also not limited with regard to the content of the conversation. For the protection of this right it is not relevant that the content of the conversation may be of an intimate character or that it may concern an exchange of secret information (e.g. business secrets), or the fact that the interlocutors have specifically agreed that the conversation would be confidential. Often times it is impossible to predict in advance how the conversation will develop. Thus, a conversation that was first of a business character can turn into a private conversation, and a private conversation can become a business conversation. The possibility of changing the topic of the conversation without one person losing their ability to be at ease therein is contained in the right of [each] interlocutor to decide on his or her own actions. Such possibility to decide on one's actions entitles the person to prepare for the possible legal consequences of the conversation. Therefore, if a person knows that a third person is listening to the conversation or that the conversation is being recorded, such that it will be possible for the third person to be examined as a witness or such that the recording of the conversation may be used in subsequent judicial proceedings, he or she may refrain altogether from speaking about something that could have legal consequences. Similarly, he or she could as well acquire evidence by him- or herself or say something in such a manner that subsequently in judicial proceedings could be used to his or her benefit. All these possibilities are taken from the person if he or she is not given the possibility to decide by him- or herself whether he or she allows the content of the conversation to be heard or recorded by someone else.
12. The concrete case concerned a conversation between two contracting parties regarding (in their opinion) important issues related to a concluded sales contract on real property, and their conversation was not intended to be heard by an indefinite circle of persons. The interlocutor, i.e. the plaintiff in the lawsuit, enabled the telephone conversation to be listened to by a third person (i.e. her legal representative) and she also recorded it. Her legal representative was then examined as a witness in the judicial proceedings, and the recording of the telephone conversation was used as evidence as well.
13. The Supreme Court substantiated the position that what is at issue is not an interference with the complainant's right to privacy by stating that the complainant as a participant in the telephone conversation should have expected that his interlocutor would enable a third person to listen to the telephone conversation. As has already been explained, the possibility of such an interference cannot be excluded already due to the fact that different means enabling listening to the conversation are considerably widespread (multiple telephone connections, multiple handsets, an internal network of telephones, or a telephone with a loudspeaker).<sup>4</sup> The court, however, did not establish that the complainant was acquainted with the fact that a third person

4 Devices built into a telephone (another handset or a loudspeaker) have various purposes. They give the user the technical possibility to extend the circle of persons participating in a telephone conversation. A loudspeaker can also be used so that the interlocutor's hands are free during the conversation, and he or she is thus able to take notes of the conversation or to browse through documentation without interrupting the telephone conversation.

was listening to the telephone conversation. Furthermore, not even the general finding that a third person listening to a telephone conversation or a recording thereof is in certain fields a usual or even standard practice can substitute for the interlocutor's consent that a third person may also listen to such conversation. On the other hand, the court did not determine even the [possible] facts that would indicate that the complainant had tacitly consented to the listening [of the conversation by a third person] or to the recording [thereof]. An audio recording of a telephone conversation cannot be equated with notes on the conversation. There namely exists an essential difference in their quality. Notes on a conversation consist of abstracts of what has been said and are written in accordance with the subjective assessment of the person recording what is so important that it should be written down. A recording, on the other hand, is an authentically preserved series of words or voice that was separated, when it was recorded, from the person who said it. As has already been emphasised, an audio recording gives power over another person or a personal asset thereof, because it enables repetition (repeated playbacks). Therefore, if such a recording is made without the affected person being aware thereof, then the exclusive right of such person to control the spread of his or her words or voice is thereby interfered with.<sup>5</sup>

14. In fact, the latter does not mean that such an interference with the right to privacy cannot be admissible under certain conditions; however, particularly justified circumstances must exist in order to take, in civil proceedings, evidence obtained by means of a violation of the right to privacy. The taking of such evidence must be of particular importance for the exercise of a certain right protected by the Constitution. In such a case, courts must observe the principle of proportionality and carefully assess which right should be given priority (the third paragraph of Article 15 and Article 2 of the Constitution). Since the challenged decision is based on the position that admitting the testimony of the witness who listened to the telephone conversation, as well as playing the recorded conversation in court as evidence, does not entail an interference with the complainant's right to privacy, it is evident that the court at issue did not even address whether the circumstances in the case at issue would justify such an interference.
15. With regard to the above, the complainant's right to privacy determined by Article 35 and the right to the privacy of correspondence and other means of communication determined by the first paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution were violated by the challenged judgments. Therefore, the Constitutional Court abrogated them and remanded the case to the court of first instance for new adjudication. In the renewed proceedings, the court must not base its decision on the position that the Constitutional Court established is inconsistent with the Constitution.

---

5 This is also the position adopted in German (constitutional) case law. Two recent cases from this field include, for example, Decision of the Federal Constitutional Court No. 1 BvR 1611/96 and 1 BvR 805/98, dated 9 October 2002, and Judgment of the Federal Supreme Court No. XI ZR 165/02, dated 18 February 2003. The same position is also supported in Austrian and Swiss case law; see, for example, Judgment of the Austrian Supreme Court No. 6Ob190/01m, dated 27 September 2001, and Judgment of the Swiss Supreme Court No. 5P.308/1999/min, dated 17 February 2000.

C

- 16. The Constitutional Court adopted this Decision on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 59 of the CCA, composed of: Dr Dragica Wedam Lukić, President, and Judges Dr Janez Čebulj, Dr Zvonko Fišer, Lojze Janko, Milojka Modrijan, Dr Ciril Ribičič, Dr Mirjam Škrk, and Jože Tratnik. The decision was reached unanimously. Judge Mag. Marija Krisper Kramberger was disqualified from deciding in the case.

Dr Dragica Wedam Lukić
President

DECISION

At a session held on 26 March 2009 in proceedings to review constitutionality initiated upon the petition of Zmago Jelinčič Plemeniti, Ljubljana, and Bogdan Barovič, Ljubljana, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. The first sentence of the first paragraph of Article 16 and the fourth indent of the first paragraph of Article 17 of the Restrictions on the Use of Tobacco Products Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 57/96, 119/02, 101/05, 17/06 – official consolidated text, and 60/07) are not inconsistent with the Constitution.
2. The petition to initiate the proceedings for the review of the constitutionality of the first and fifth paragraphs of Article 14 and Article 20 of the Restrictions on the Use of Tobacco Products Act is rejected.

Reasoning

A

1. The petitioners, who filed a petition as both National Assembly deputies and citizens of the Republic of Slovenia, challenge Articles 4, 6, 7, and 9 of the Act Amending the Restrictions on the Use of Tobacco Products Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 60/07 – hereinafter referred to as RUTPA-C). They allege that the ban on smoking in hospitality establishments puts smokers in an unequal position, as they can no longer freely smoke in hospitality establishments and are forced to smoke in designated smoking rooms, where, however, they cannot drink or eat, as the law prohibits them from doing such. In their opinion, the challenged regulation interferes with their right to act freely (Article 35 of the Constitution), as the principle that applies is that everything which is not prohibited is permitted, whereas smoking is not declared to be a criminal offence. Therefore, in their opinion, smokers have the right to smoke. The fact that in public indoor places smoking is restricted to designated smoking rooms and that the consumption of food and beverages in such rooms is prohibited allegedly also interferes with their personal liberty (Article 19 of the Constitution), their freedom of movement (Article 32 of the Constitution), and their personality and dignity (Articles 21 and 34 of the Constitution). Allegedly no sound reason exists for the prohibition of the consumption of food and beverages in the designated smoking rooms. Furthermore, in their opinion, the legislature should allow specialized hospitality establishments with limited admission where smoking should be unrestricted. Namely, only in such a manner would smokers' right to socialize and associate, as guaranteed by Article 42 of the Constitution, be ensured. Thereby hospitality establishment owners' free economic initiative, as determined in Article 74 of the Constitution, is interfered with, as they cannot freely choose whether to have a smoking or non-smoking hospitality establishment.

2. With reference to Article 4 of the RUTPA-C, which prohibits persons under 18 years of age from selling tobacco products, the petitioners allege the inconsistency with Articles 14, 15, 34, 35, 49, and 66 of the Constitution. Such regulation allegedly prohibits work that persons under 18 years of age could carry out before the amendment of the Act and allegedly offends their personal dignity and integrity, as it demonstrates the legislature's lack of trust towards young people. With reference to Article 9 of the RUTPA-C, which regulates supervision of the implementation of the Act and accountability for the implementation of the ban on smoking, the petitioners claim that it does not meet the requirements laid down in Article 2 of the Constitution, as it is allegedly not determined in what manner inspectorates shall act, what is the relation between the accountability of the owners and tenants of hospitality establishments, etc. Thus, in their opinion, the state did not fulfil its obligations determined in Article 5 of the Constitution.
3. The National Assembly did not reply to the petition. In the opinion of the Government, the challenged regulation is not inconsistent with the Constitution. In its opinion, the Government reiterated standpoints which have already been stated in the legislative materials.

B – I

4. Anyone who demonstrates legal interest may lodge a petition requesting that the procedure for the review of constitutionality be initiated (the first paragraph of Article 24 of the Constitutional Court Act, Official Gazette RS, No. 64/07 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the CCA). In accordance with the second paragraph of the same article, legal interest is deemed to be demonstrated if a regulation or general act issued for the exercise of public authority whose review has been requested by the petitioner directly interferes with his rights, legal interests, or legal position.
5. The petitioners challenge Articles 4 and 9 of the RUTPA-C. Article 4 of the RUTPA-C amends the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Restrictions on the Use of Tobacco Products Act (hereinafter referred to as the RUTPA) and adds a new fifth paragraph, whereas Article 9 of the RUTPA-C amends Article 20 of the RUTPA. The Constitutional Court thus deemed that the petitioners challenge the first and fifth paragraphs of Article 14 and Article 20 of the RUTPA. The first paragraph of Article 14 of the RUTPA prohibits the sale of tobacco products to persons under 18 years of age and persons under 18 years of age from selling tobacco products. In addition, the fifth paragraph of Article 14 requires that the prohibition of the sale of tobacco products to persons under 18 years of age is displayed visibly in shops where tobacco products are sold. The above-mentioned provisions do not directly interfere with petitioners' rights, legal interests, or their legal position, as the petitioners, who lodged the petition also as National Assembly deputies, are not persons under 18 years of age. Furthermore, also the provisions of Article 20 of the RUTPA, which regulate supervision of the implementation of the RUTPA and the accountability for the implementation of the ban on smoking, do not interfere with their rights, legal interests, or legal position. The provisions of Article 20 of the RUTPA, which regulate competence for supervision of inspection bodies for supervision of the implementation of the individual parts of the Act in and of themselves cannot interfere with the petitioners' legal position, whereas with reference to accountability for the implementation of the ban on smoking in indoor public places and indoor workplaces, the petitioners did not demonstrate that they are owners, tenants, or managers of places where the ban on smoking should be implemented. The petitioners therefore do not demonstrate legal interest for the review of the constitutionality of the challenged statutory provisions. Therefore, the Constitutional Court rejected their petition in this part (Point 2 of the operative provisions).

6. The petitioners also challenge Articles 6 and 7 of the RUTPA-C. Article 6 amends Article 16 of the RUTPA, whereas Article 7 amends the text of Article 17 of the RUTPA. The Constitutional Court deemed that the petitioners challenge the provisions of the RUTPA. With reference to such, the allegations in the petition only refer to the first sentence of the first paragraph of Article 16 and the fourth indent of the first paragraph of Article 17 of the RUTPA, therefore the Constitutional Court reviewed the RUTPA only in this part. The Constitutional Court accepted the petition for consideration in the above-mentioned part and, with consideration of the fact that the requirements laid down in the fourth paragraph of Article 26 of the CCA are fulfilled, proceeded to decide on the merits.

The Review of the First Sentence of the First Paragraph of Article 16 of the RUTPA

7. The first sentence of the first paragraph of Article 16 of the RUTPA reads as follows: "Smoking is prohibited in all indoor public places and indoor workplaces."
8. Articles 34 and 35 of the Constitution protect individuals' personal dignity, personality rights, safety, and privacy. The right to personal dignity ensures individuals recognition of their worth as human beings and from which there follow their ability to decide independently. Also the guarantee of personality rights stems from this human characteristic. The name itself indicates that these are the rights which a human being as a person, thus a human being as such, is entitled to. The guarantee of personality rights ensures the elements of individuals' personality that are not protected by other provisions of the Constitution (by the freedoms of conscience, expression, etc.), but only by them all together are individuals given an opportunity to develop freely and live their lives as they decide (see Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-226/95, dated 8 July 1999, Official Gazette RS, No. 60/99 and OdlUS VIII, 174). Constitutional case law also includes in this scope the general right to act freely (e.g. in Decision No. U-I-137/93, dated 2 June 1994, Official Gazette RS, No. 42/94 and OdlUS III, 62). This constitutional right also encompasses the principle that in a state governed by the rule of law a person is permitted to do everything which is not prohibited and not vice versa (Decision No. U-I-290/96, dated 11 June 1998, Official Gazette RS, No. 49/98, and OdlUS VII, 124).

9. However, the general right to act freely is not an unlimited and abstract “natural” freedom. It can be exercised only within the constitutional framework. In a substantive sense, the general right to act freely entails a legally determined freedom which is limited yet protected within these boundaries. As members of society, individuals must endure the limitations of the general right to act freely which are dictated by the interests of others and society as a whole. These limitations in and of themselves do not entail an interference with the general right to act freely, but define its constitutionally protected substance. As regards the above-mentioned, the Constitutional Court had to first establish whether the challenged regulation concerns an interference with the constitutional right to act freely or if the challenged regulation stems from the very nature of this right as a constituent part thereof.
10. The general right to act freely gives individuals the right “to do what one will with oneself” and with all aspects of one’s person, without external interferences. It is namely important that individuals are able to choose their own lifestyle, develop their personality, and live their personal life as they choose.<sup>1</sup> The general right to act freely thus also comprises the individuals’ right to decide whether to smoke or not. The individuals’ choice necessarily includes their free will.<sup>2</sup> With reference to the use of tobacco products, also the fact that such cause addiction, which can to a certain extent exclude the freedom of choice not only of smokers but also of users of other tobacco products, must necessarily be taken into consideration.<sup>3</sup> Regardless of the existence of addiction to tobacco products, the use of tobacco products is not an inborn need of men, such as eating, drinking, sleeping, moving about, and voicing one’s opinion, but at least in the beginning<sup>4</sup> (before addiction develops) it is their free choice.
11. As applies for all human rights and fundamental freedoms, it also applies for personality rights, which are protected by Article 35 of the Constitution, that they are not absolute and unlimited. In accordance with the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, they are limited by the rights of others and in such cases as are provided by the Constitution. The Constitutional Court holds that the challenged statutory reg-

1 A. Kjonstad, Is it a Human Right to Smoke Tobacco?, in: R. Bainpain and G. Anderson (Editor), Smoking and the Workplace, Kluwer Law International, The Hague, 2005, p. 65.

2 Cf., M. L. Tyler, Blowing Smoke: Do Smokers Have a Right? Limiting the privacy rights of cigarette smokers, Georgetown Law Journal, 86 (1998) 1, pp. 802 – 803.

3 See Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-141/97, dated 22 November 2001, Official Gazette RS, No. 104/01 and OdlUS X, 193, paragraph 25 of the reasoning.

4 Cf., American Federal Appellate Court Judgment in Case Palmer v. Liggett Group Inc., 825, F 2nd 680 (1st Cir. 1987).

ulation which prohibits smoking in indoor public places and indoor workplaces, entails an interference with the general right to act freely (Article 35 of the Constitution). Interferences with human rights or fundamental freedoms are, in accordance with the established case law, admissible if they are consistent with the principle of proportionality. The Constitutional Court carries out a review of whether an interference with a human right is admissible on the basis of the so-called strict test of proportionality (see Decision No. U-I-18/02, dated 24 October 2003, Official Gazette RS, No. 108/03 and OdlUS XII, 86; paragraph 25 of the reasoning). The Constitutional Court must first establish (review) whether the legislature pursued a constitutionally admissible aim.

12. As follows from the legislative materials,<sup>5</sup> the aim of the challenged statutory regulation is to ensure employed persons in all occupational groups full protection from exposure to the adverse health effects of tobacco smoke in workplaces and all persons full protection from exposure to the adverse health effects of tobacco smoke in public places, to reduce demand for tobacco products, to reduce smoking among young people and adults alike, and to increase the number of persons that give up smoking. The Constitutional Court holds that the above-mentioned suffices for the conclusion that the legislature had a constitutionally admissible aim in limiting the petitioners' general right to act freely, as protected within the framework of Article 35 of the Constitution.
13. In addition to the conclusion that the interference pursues a constitutionally admissible aim and that it is not inadmissible from this point of view, it must also always be reviewed whether such is consistent with the principles of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution), and thus with that constitutional principle which prohibits excessive interferences (the general principle of proportionality). The review of whether an interference is excessive is carried out by the Constitutional Court on the basis of a strict proportionality test. The test comprises a review of three aspects of the interference: (1) whether the interference is at all necessary (needed) in order to achieve the pursued aim; (2) whether the evaluated interference is appropriate for achieving the pursued aim in the sense that such aim can in fact be achieved by the interference; (3) whether the weight of the consequences of the reviewed interference with the affected human right is proportionate to the benefits which will result therefrom (the principle of proportionality in the narrower sense or the principle of proportionality). Only if the interference passes all three aspects of the test is it constitutionally admissible (see Constitutional Court Decision No. U-I-18/02).
14. Within the framework of the review of the necessity of the interference, the Constitutional Court reviews whether the interference is at all necessary (needed) in the sense that the aim in question cannot be achieved without an interference in general (i.e. by means of some manner of interference) or that the aim cannot be achieved without the reviewed (concrete) interference but by means of some other interference which would be less severe in nature. These requirements are met regarding the challenged regulation on the ban on smoking. As is true for active smoking, second-hand smoking is also harmful to one's health. The first paragraph of Article 8 of the WHO Framework

---

5 National Assembly Gazette, No. 30/07, p. 9.

Convention on Tobacco Control. (Official Gazette RS, No. 16/05, IT, No. 2/05 – hereinafter referred to as the FCTC), which is binding on the Republic of Slovenia, requires that parties recognize that scientific evidence has unequivocally established that exposure to tobacco smoke causes death, disease, and disability. Second-hand smoking or environmental tobacco smoke is the combination of smoke emitted from the burning end of a cigarette or other tobacco products and smoke exhaled by the smoker.<sup>6</sup> Environmental tobacco smoke contains thousands of known chemicals, at least 250 of which are known to be carcinogenic or otherwise toxic.<sup>7</sup> Evidence on the adverse health effects of exposure to tobacco smoke has been accumulating for nearly 50 years. In this period, the link between environmental tobacco smoke and the following illnesses has been established: coronary heart disease, lung cancer, breast cancer, respiratory symptoms and illnesses, whereas among children exposure to tobacco smoke effects asthma (exacerbates preexisting asthma and causes new-onset asthma), lung growth and development, and middle-ear disease (otitis media).<sup>8</sup> According to the data contained in the legislative materials,<sup>9</sup> as many as 65% of all adult residents of the Republic of Slovenia are exposed to tobacco smoke (with different durations and frequencies). 57% of non-smokers were exposed to tobacco smoke. As many as 60% of all adult residents were exposed to tobacco smoke in hospitality establishments, among which one quarter was exposed to it every day or almost every day. Slightly more than 27% of adult residents of the Republic of Slovenia were exposed to second-hand smoke every day or almost every day. Most often they were exposed to tobacco smoke in hospitality establishments, at their workplace, and in a home environment. On average these persons spent somewhat less than 3 hours per day in smoky places, in a timeframe from a few minutes to more than 16 hours. Almost one half of the group of exposed persons were non-smokers.

15. In order to ensure employed persons in all occupational groups full protection against exposure to the adverse health effects of tobacco smoke, smoking must be banned in all indoor public places and indoor workplaces. A hospitality establishment is a workplace for persons employed in the hospitality sector and protecting such employees from second-hand smoking can only be ensured by the complete prohibition of smoking in hospitality establishments. The measures laid down in the RUTPA before the implementation of the RUTPA-C, which comprised the prohibition of smoking in public places except in parts which were specially marked and separated from places designated for non-smokers, whereby it was left to the owners of hospitality establishments to designate such special places for smokers as well as their size, did not achieve their aim. The RUTPA before the implementation of the

6 World Health Organisation, Protection from Exposure to Second-Hand Tobacco Smoke, Policy Recommendations, 2007, p. 4.

7 United States Department of Health and Human Services, National Institutes of Health, National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences, National Toxicology Program, Report on Carcinogens, 11th Editions, Washington DC 2005, published at: <http://ntp.niehs.nih.gov/ntp/roc/toc11.html> (23 February 2009).

8 World Health Organisation, Protection from Exposure to Second-Hand Tobacco Smoke, Policy Recommendations, 2007, pp. 5–6.

9 National Assembly Gazette, No. 30/07, p. 3.

RUTPA-C did not enable employed persons in all positions of employment or workers in all occupational groups appropriate protection from tobacco smoke.<sup>10</sup> In addition, employed persons in the hospitality industry, who are to a greater extent and for longer periods exposed to tobacco smoke, did not exercise their right to require that their employer ensure a smoke-free work environment, as they were not aware of the adverse effects of second-hand smoking or they were afraid to lose their jobs.<sup>11</sup> Furthermore, in accordance with recent scientific evidence, the statutory provision of the RUTPA before the implementation of the RUTPA-C, which introduced the requirement of appropriate ventilation in order to prevent the mixing of [smoky and non-smoky] air, is no longer appropriate, as none of the accessible ventilation technologies or air purification systems can ensure protection against exposure to tobacco smoke without extensive and impractical increased ventilation. Even separated places for smokers and non-smokers do not protect workers. What is more, there is a high concentration of carcinogens and toxins from tobacco smoke in separated places for smokers.<sup>12</sup> In view of the fact that there is no safe level of exposure to tobacco smoke,<sup>13</sup> the Constitutional Court finds that the prohibition of smoking in all indoor public places and indoor workplaces is the only measure which enables the legislature's pursued aim to be achieved, i.e. the protection of workers and other persons from the adverse effects of environmental tobacco smoke.

16. The Constitutional Court holds that the interference is also appropriate in order to achieve the pursued aim. As already explained above, the prohibition of smoking in indoor public places and indoor workplaces is the only measure which can ensure effective protection from the adverse effects of tobacco smoke or from second-hand smoking. Thereby, exposure to environmental tobacco smoke and consequently the risks connected to second-hand smoking namely decrease considerably. Studies conducted in countries that have banned smoking show that indoor air quality improved considerably following the implementation of the prohibition of smoking. Reduced exposure to environmental tobacco smoke was primarily observable in places intended for leisure activities and in hospitality establishments. This is expressed in a considerable improvement in the respiratory health of workers employed in the hospitality sector and in a substantial decrease in the occurrence of heart attacks and the death rate within a few months following the implementation of the policy.<sup>14</sup>
17. In order for the challenged provision to pass the test of proportionality, the condition of proportionality in a narrower sense must also be fulfilled. Proportionality in a narrower

---

10 Ibidem, p. 7.

11 Ibidem.

12 Ibidem, p. 8.

13 World Health Organisation, Protection from Exposure to Second-Hand Tobacco Smoke, Policy Recommendations, 2007, p. 7.

14 See especially the studies cited in footnotes 54-56 in the Green Paper of the Commission of the European Communities, Towards a Europe free from tobacco smoke: policy options at EU level, COM(2007) 27 final, 30 January 2007, published at: <http://eurlex.europa.eu/LexUriServ/LexUriServ.do?uri=CELEX:52007DC0027:SL:HTML> (23 February 2009).

sense concerns a review of whether the weight of the consequences of the reviewed interference with the affected human right is proportional to the value of the pursued aim or to the benefits which will result due to the interference. The ban on smoking limits smokers regarding their freedom to act when they are at their workplace or in indoor public places. This also applies to their visits to hospitality establishments, as such are made increasingly more difficult due to the ban on smoking, whereas visiting hospitality establishments is one of the aspects of social life. On the other hand are the individual's rights to health (Article 51 of the Constitution) and to a healthy living environment (Article 72 of the Constitution), which require that the legislature adopt appropriate measures for their provision. The FCTC also requires that Slovenia actively promote the adoption and implementation of effective legislative, executive, administrative, and/or other measures that provide for protection from exposure to tobacco smoke in indoor workplaces, public transport, indoor public places and, as appropriate, other public places (the second paragraph of Article 8 of the FCTC). The challenged regulation is such a measure whose aim is to prevent or reduce the adverse effects of environmental tobacco smoke on employed persons and other persons and by which their right to health and a healthy living environment is ensured. Health is such an important value for everyone that right to act freely may be interfered with in order to ensure such. The interference with the right determined in Article 35 of the Constitution is not excessive due to the importance of the aim that the legislature pursues and due to the importance of the benefits which are protected by the challenged regulation. It is especially not excessive if it is taken into consideration that smokers can always leave an indoor public place or indoor workplace for a short period of time in order to use tobacco products. The challenged regulation of the ban on smoking is thus not inconsistent with the general right to act freely determined in Article 35 of the Constitution.

18. The petitioners also allege that the challenged regulation is inconsistent with the right of association determined in Article 42 of the Constitution, as the state renders it impossible for them to socialize and associate in hospitality establishments and as it does not allow specialized hospitality establishments where smoking is permitted.
19. Article 42 of the Constitution establishes several constitutional rights. In the first paragraph the right of peaceful assembly and the right of public meeting are ensured. The second paragraph ensures the right to freedom of association. In accordance with the third paragraph of Article 42, legal restrictions of these rights are permissible where so required for national security or public safety and for protection against the spread of infectious diseases. A special restriction is determined in the fourth paragraph for professional members of the defence forces and the police; they namely may not be members of political parties. An assembly of people is a meeting of people – either in an indoor place or under the open sky – together with their participation in expressing or exchanging ideas or opinions.<sup>15</sup> It is exercised through a less formal form of a connection of people than an association,<sup>16</sup> which is a more organised and permanent community of individuals who are closely connected in order to pursue common interests. Due to such characteristics of association, by their very nature associating or socializing in hospitality establishments cannot be considered association within the meaning of the second paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution.

15 L. Šturm, 42. člen (Pravica do zbiranja in združevanja) [Article 42 (Freedom of Assembly and Association)] in: L. Šturm (Editor), Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije [Commentary on the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia], Fakulteta za podiplomske in evropske študije, Ljubljana, 2002, p. 461.

20. The constitutional provision on the right of assembly determined in the first paragraph of Article 42 is a special provision in relation to the general right to act freely, which is protected in Article 35 of the Constitution. It entails the assembly of at least two persons,<sup>17</sup> which is not coincidental,<sup>18</sup> and which requires at least some degree of internal connection of the participants. The participants must be aware of the fact that they are assembling and must wish to participate in such (the element of willingness). The right of assembly requires assembly with the intention of common expression with the aim of participating in a public expression of opinions.<sup>19</sup> Assembly is thus not merely a connection [of individuals] or amusement,<sup>20</sup> therefore entertainment (e.g. public festivities) or commercial events (e.g. sporting events<sup>21</sup> or public parties in the open air<sup>22</sup>) are not considered assemblies, as they lack the element of the internal connection [of the individuals involved].<sup>23</sup> Considering the characteristics of spending time and socializing in hospitality establishments, they cannot be regarded as assembly within the meaning of the first paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution, as they are in general coincidental, they do not entail a group expression, and also the element of the internal connection of visitors in general does not exist. Therefore, the petitioners' allegation regarding the inconsistency of the challenged regulation with the right determined in Article 42 of the Constitution is not substantiated.
21. Furthermore, the petitioners allege that the challenge regulation also violates the principle of equality before the law determined in the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution, as smokers cannot freely visit hospitality establishments, as non-smokers can. They claim that smokers are severely restricted due to the ban on smoking when visiting hospitality establishments, whereas the state does not allow hospitality establishments to be specialized so that smoking is permitted in them.
22. The second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution determines that all are equal before the law. Respecting the principle of equality and ensuring equal treatment are thus fundamental requirements which the legislature must observe when regulating

---

16 Ibidem.

17 D. C. Umbach and T. Clemens (Editor), Grundgesetz, Mitarbeiterkommentar und Handbuch, Band I, C. F. Müller Verlag, Heidelberg 2002, p. 626 – hereinafter referred to as Umbach/Clemens.

18 Ibidem, p. 627.

19 Cf., German Federal Constitutional Court Decision in the Loveparade Case, BVerfG, 1 BvQ 28/01, dated 12 July 2001, paragraph 16 of the reasoning.

20 Umbach/Clemens, p. 627. The same also in H. D. Jarass and B. Pieroth, Grundgesetz für die Bundesrepublik Deutschland, 4th Edition, Beck Verlag, München 1997, p. 241 – hereinafter referred to as Jarass/Pieroth.

21 Jarass/Pieroth, ibidem.

22 Umbach/Clemens, p. 627.

23 Jarass/Pieroth, p. 241.

rights and obligations. However, this principle cannot be viewed as simple general equality for all. In accordance with the established case law of the Constitutional Court, the principle of equality before the law does not entail that a regulation – in cases in which the bases for different regulation are not the circumstances determined in the first paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution – should not differently regulate the same positions of legal subjects, but that such cannot be done in an arbitrary manner, without a sound and objective reason. There must thus exist a sound reason deriving from the nature of the matter.

23. The challenged regulation, inter alia, pursues the aim of protecting employed persons in all occupational groups, thus also persons employed in the hospitality industry. Also the latter have the right to work in a workplace environment where they are not exposed to environmental tobacco smoke. Also persons employed at specialized hospitality establishments would have to be exposed to environmental tobacco smoke because of the nature of the matter. Finally, also the fact that the RUTPA also protects employed persons who are smokers from the adverse effects of second-hand smoking must be taken into consideration. It can namely not be deemed that because of the fact that they are smokers they consent to being exposed to environmental tobacco smoke at their workplace. It also follows from the legislative materials that the measures pursuant to the RUTPA before the implementation of the RUTPA-C, according to which it was left to owners (or tenants or managers) of hospitality establishments to designate special places for smokers as well as their size, did not achieve their aim, and workers often were not able to exercise their right to require that their employer ensure a smoke-free work environment, due to their existential dependency on their employment. The Constitutional Court finds that the protection of employed persons from environmental tobacco smoke (i.e. second-hand smoking) is not an unsound reason for the challenged regulation, in which specialized smoking hospitality establishments are not envisaged. Therefore, the petitioners' allegations regarding the inconsistency of the challenged regulation with the principle of equality before the law determined in the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution are not substantiated.
24. The Constitutional Court cannot agree with the petitioners that the prohibition of smoking in indoor public places and indoor workplaces violates Article 19 of the Constitution, as it only protects individuals' personal liberty, especially from arrest and similar, and not from the fact that in certain special situations (e.g. when visiting hospitality establishments), in which individuals enter voluntarily, they are required to respect certain rules of conduct.
25. The Constitutional Court did not review the alleged inconsistency of the first sentence of the first paragraph of Article 16 of the RUTPA with Article 74 of the Constitution, which regulates free economic initiative, as the petitioners did not demonstrate their legal interest from the viewpoint of free economic initiative, as they did not demonstrate that they are owners, tenants, or managers of a hospitality establishment. The very general allegations that the challenged regulation deprives numerous subjects on the market of the possibility of having a hospitality establishment for smokers, do not demonstrate the petitioners' legal interest.

26. As regards the above-mentioned, the challenged provision of the first sentence of the first paragraph of Article 16 of the RUTPA is not inconsistent with the Constitution.

The Review of the Fourth Indent of the First Paragraph of Article 17 of the RUTPA

27. The fourth indent of the first paragraph of Article 17 of the RUTPA determines that food and beverages may not be consumed in smoking rooms.
28. The Constitutional Court holds that the above-mentioned prohibition interferes with the petitioners' general right to act freely laid down in Article 35 of the Constitution. As already explained above (paragraph 11 of the reasoning), also personality rights, which are protected by Article 35 of the Constitution, are not absolute and unlimited, but are, pursuant with the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, limited by the rights of others and in such cases as are provided by the Constitution. The interferences with human rights or fundamental freedoms are, in accordance with the established constitutional case law, admissible if they are in compliance with the principle of proportionality.
29. In order to ensure the possibility to work in an environment where air is not polluted and in order to prevent employed persons from being exposed to the adverse effects of environmental tobacco smoke against their will, the Constitutional Court finds that such entails that the legislature had a constitutionally admissible aim in limiting the petitioners' right to act freely, which is protected within the framework of Article 35 of the Constitution.
30. The interference must also be necessary, appropriate, and proportionate in a narrower sense in order not to be excessive. In view of the fact that the petitioners' allegations only refer to smoking rooms in hospitality establishments, the Constitutional Court limited the strict test of proportionality only to such. The Constitutional Court holds that also in the case of the prohibition of the consumption of food and beverages in smoking rooms in hospitality establishments all three conditions are still met. In the case of smoking rooms in hospitality establishments, it is namely presumed that in order to carry out their work obligations, i.e. serving and cleaning up after guests (with the exception of self-service restaurants, and even those require some cleaning up), employed persons would have to enter such. This entails that they would be exposed to environmental tobacco smoke, regarding which it follows from the scientific evidence that there is no safe level of exposure to tobacco smoke.<sup>24</sup> Such is particularly dangerous in separated places for smokers where a high concentration of carcinogens and toxins from tobacco smoke are present.<sup>25</sup> If it was allowed that food and beverages were consumed in smoking rooms in hospitality establishments, the aim that the legislature pursues would not be achieved. Thus the interference with the general right to act freely is not excessive, especially if it is considered that the limitation is only of a temporary nature. Smokers namely stay in smoking rooms only a short time and may immediately after they leave such rooms consume food and beverages. The aim of the law is namely to protect the health of employed persons so that they are protected from second-hand smoke in situations in which they are not smoking themselves. The fourth indent of the first paragraph of Article 17 of the RUTPA, which prohibits food and beverages from being consumed in smoking rooms, is not inconsistent with the general right to act freely protected in Article 35 of the Constitution.

---

24 See footnote 10.

25 See footnote 12.

31. As regards the starting points of the principle of equality laid down in the second paragraph of Article 14 of the Constitution, which the Constitutional Court explained in paragraph 22 of this reasoning, the Constitutional Court has to answer the question of whether there exists a sound reason, deriving from the nature of the matter, for the prohibition of the consumption of food and beverages in smoking rooms. It follows from the legislative materials<sup>26</sup> that the challenged regulation ensures employed persons the possibility to work in an environment where the air is not polluted and at the same time prevents them from being exposed to the adverse effects of tobacco smoke against their will. The Constitutional Court finds that the above-mentioned reasons are not unsound and are relevant to the aims pursued by the legislature. The possibility of consuming food and beverages in smoking rooms in hospitality establishments namely presumes that employed persons will enter such rooms in order to serve guests and related activities (i.e. to bring food and beverages as well as to clean up after guests). In this manner the full protection of employed persons is guaranteed, as they do not need to enter such rooms within the scope of their work obligations and consequently they are not exposed to second-hand smoke. The allegation that the prohibition of the consumption of food and beverages is inconsistent with the fourth indent of the first paragraph of Article 17 of the RUTPA is thus not substantiated.
32. As the Constitutional Court explained in paragraph 24 of the reasoning, Article 19 of the Constitution only protects individuals' personal liberty, especially from arrest and similar, and not from the fact that in certain special situations, e.g. in smoking rooms in which individuals enter voluntarily, they are required to respect certain rules of conduct. Therefore, the allegation regarding the alleged inconsistency of the prohibition of the consumption food and beverages in smoking rooms determined in the fourth indent of the first paragraph of Article 17 of the RUTPA is not substantiated. Also the allegation regarding the inconsistency of the challenged regulation with Article 21 of the Constitution is not substantiated, as the protection of human personality and dignity in accordance with this article is specifically limited to protection in legal proceedings in cases of arrest, detention, and the enforcement of punitive sanctions. In addition, the above-mentioned prohibition does not interfere with the freedom of movement determined in Article 32 of the Constitution, as such only refers to free movement, especially in the sense of choosing a place of residence, movement in and outside the country, etc.
33. Thus, the Constitutional Court finds that the first sentence of the first paragraph of Article 16 and the fourth indent of the first paragraph of Article 17 of the RUTPA are not inconsistent with the Constitution (Point 1 of the operative provisions).

<sup>26</sup> National Assembly Gazette, No. 30/07, p. 10.

C

34. The Constitutional Court reached this decision on the basis of Article 21 and the third paragraph of Article 25 of the CCA, composed of: Jože Tratnik, President, and Judges Dr Mitja Deisinger, Mag. Marta Klampfer, Mag. Miroslav Mozetič, Dr Ernest Petrič, Dr Ciril Ribičič, and Jan Zobec. The decision was reached unanimously.

Jože Tratnik
President

Decision No. Up-2530/06, dated 15 April 2010

DECISION

At a session held on 15 April 2010 in proceedings to decide upon the constitutional complaint of Miha Kozinc, Ljubljana, represented by Odvetniška družba Čeferin, o. p., d. o. o., [the law firm Čeferin], Grosuplje, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

The constitutional complaint against the second paragraph of the operative provisions of Supreme Court Decision No. Dsp 2/2006, dated 27 October 2006, in conjunction with Decision of the Disciplinary Court of the Bar Association of Slovenia No. Ds 4/2005, dated 27 March 2006, is dismissed.

Reasoning

A

1. By the contested decision, the Disciplinary Court of the Bar Association of Slovenia (hereinafter referred to as the Disciplinary Court) held the complainant responsible for a violation of the professional duties of a lawyer pursuant to the sixth paragraph of Article 77.a of the Statutes of the Bar Association of Slovenia (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94 etc. – hereinafter referred to as the Statutes), in conjunction with Article 18 of the Lawyers Professional Code of Conduct, as on 26 July 2005 he unjustifiably refused to carry out the duty to be present during the search of a lawyer's office. It imposed upon him a disciplinary measure, i.e. a warning. The Supreme Court rejected the complainant's appeal, and dismissed the appeals of his defence counsel and of the Disciplinary Court prosecutor.
2. The Disciplinary Court rejected the allegations of the complainant that the warrant of the investigating judge had not been drawn up in accordance with the Lawyers Act (Official Gazette RS, Nos. 18/93, 24/01, 54/08, and 35/09 – hereinafter referred to as the LA), and stated that the warrant contains all the essential elements required for the search pursuant to the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 63/94 etc. – hereinafter referred to as the CrPA) and Article 8 of the LA (it stated, however, that the files and objects that the search had been ordered for could have been indicated more precisely in the operative provisions of the judgment), and assessed the complainant's refusal to be present during the search of the lawyer's office as unjustified. This was confirmed also by the Supreme Court, which stated that a representative of the Bar Association is obliged to be present during the search of a lawyer's office due to the protection of the secrecy of files which are not the subject of such search, and that the lawyer's departure from the premises of the search may result in the search being carried out without supervision by a lawyer. It also held that a representative of the Bar Association has the right to assess whether the search warrant was drawn up in accordance with the law, but he does not have the right to refuse to be present during the search on the basis of his own assessment regarding the (in)completeness of the warrant.

3. The complainant alleges a violation of Articles 36 and 137 of the Constitution. He states that as a representative of the Bar Association he refused to cooperate in the search of the lawyer's office as the search warrant was unlawful. According to the allegations of the complainant, the files and objects subject to the search were not listed in the operative provisions of the warrant but only in its reasoning. He refers to Article 8 of the LA, which is lex specialis with respect to the general provisions of the CrPA regarding the search of premises. Due to the special status enjoyed by lawyers in the legal order, the LA allegedly determines in greater detail the conditions for the conduct of a search of the premises of lawyers' offices as it allegedly specifies that in the warrant it must be stated which files and which objects are to be examined. The complainant states that a lawyer and his clients are linked by a special relationship, which has the nature of confidentiality and secrecy. Therefore in a search, law enforcement authorities should not intrude into case files that are not connected with the criminal case in question. If law enforcement authorities were allowed to conduct a search of the entire premises of a lawyer's offices, these confidential relations would be irreparably damaged. In legal theory there allegedly exists a generally accepted standpoint that it is merely the operative provisions of a legal act that become final and executable, whereas the reasoning allegedly serves only to ensure the right to a legal remedy. In the opinion of the complainant, the statements stated in the reasoning of the warrant in question are not sufficient since the addressees of the legal act are bound only by the operative provisions. The operative provisions of the type of warrant in question should allegedly contain instructions to the police officers who are to perform the search on how to act in a specific case. The police officers should allegedly act in accordance with the operative provisions of the search warrant as they are allegedly not even obliged to read the reasoning. The complainant believes that in the case at issue the police officers were entitled to search the entire premises and examine all the case files of the lawyer's office, which is in complete contradiction to the constitutional and statutory rights of the complainant as a lawyer. The complainant stresses that the attorneyship is an independent and autonomous service within the system of justice, regulated by law, and that, owing to the particularities of their profession, lawyers are in a special position as parties in criminal proceedings, which should be taken into account when such procedures are carried out. The complainant therefore opposes the standpoint of the Supreme Court according to which representatives of the Bar Association do not have the right to refuse to be present during the search of a lawyer's office if they assess that such is unlawful since the search warrant was not drawn up in accordance with Article 8 of the LA.

4. The complainant opposes the standpoint of the Supreme Court that a search may be conducted also in the absence of a representative of the Bar Association. He believes that the presence of a representative of the Bar Association is a necessary condition for a search to be conducted. The role of the representative of the Bar Association in the search is allegedly not to protect secrecy but to see to it that the search is conducted in accordance with the law. The complainant was allegedly aware that as a representative of the Bar Association he must ensure that the search of a lawyer's office is conducted in accordance with the law and the Constitution. However, as in his opinion it was not possible to ensure such, he allegedly acted out of necessity so as to avert an immediate danger (i.e. an unlawful search) which he did not cause himself and which allegedly could not have been averted in any other way (before leaving, the complainant allegedly urged the court to amend the warrant), whereby the harm thus incurred did not exceed the harm which threatened him (the right of the inviolability of dwellings was allegedly more important than an expeditious performance of a search, which would have occurred if the court had issued an accurate warrant). The complainant was allegedly punished only because he had observed the relevant provisions of the LA, the Criminal Procedure Act, and the Constitution, and due to this the independence of the attorneyship was allegedly put in jeopardy.
5. In proceedings pursuant to the third paragraph of Article 55.c of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS, No. 64/07 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), the Constitutional Court accepted the constitutional complaint for consideration by its Order No. Up-2530/06, dated 6 April 2009. In accordance with the first paragraph of Article 56 of the CCA, it informed the Supreme Court thereof.

B – I

6. The Constitutional Court consulted case files Nos. Ds 4/2005 and Dsp 2/2006 of the Disciplinary Courts of the first and second instances. As follows therefrom, the search of the lawyer's office was conducted in the following manner: On the basis of Warrant No. Kpd 462/05, dated 25 July 2005, issued by the investigating judge of the Koper District Court, the detectives of the Koper Police Directorate intended to conduct a search of the office of lawyer D. A. on 26 July 2005. The complainant came to the site of the intended search as a representative of the Bar Association and established that in the warrant the objects and case files subject to the search were not precisely defined. In a telephone conversation with the investigating judge and later with the President of the Koper District Court, he requested that the scope of the search be precisely defined in the warrant in accordance with Article 8 of the LA. As both of them continued to maintain that there was nothing wrong with the warrant as such, the complainant addressed a written complaint against the conduct of the investigating judge to the President of the Koper District Court. To protect the interests of the lawyer's clients, he refused to cooperate in such a search and reasoned his refusal in the annex to the record of the search. In a written statement he indicated that he refused to cooperate in the conduct of the search as he believed that the conditions for such were not fulfilled. The warrant issued by the investigating judge was allegedly inconsistent with the first paragraph of Article 8 of the LA, pursuant to which only an examination of case files and objects specifically mentioned in the warrant is permitted. In the complainant's view, the case files and objects should have been precisely indicated in the operative provisions of the search warrant. Due to the unfulfilled formal requirements (the absence of the Bar Association representative), the police did not conduct the search. The detectives sealed the lawyer's office and ordered the lawyer into police custody. After the investigating judge was informed of the event, he ordered that the search warrant be executed on the following day, i.e. on 27 July 2005. On that day the complainant and the President of the Regional Assembly [of the Bar Association] were present during the search. As is apparent from the oral defence given by the complainant, the search was conducted in such a manner that the lawyer's defence counsel and the head of the criminal police squad agreed to set apart the files subject to search. Those case files were taken to a special room where they were examined by the detectives.

B – II

7. The inviolability of a lawyer's office is ensured within the framework of the spatial aspect of privacy determined by Article 36 of the Constitution.<sup>1</sup> The search of a lawyer's office entails a severe interference with this constitutionally protected living space. Due to the weight of the interference and the constitutional significance of the protection of spatial privacy, only the judicial branch of power may order a search (the second paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution). In a search of a lawyer's office it is not possible to observe only this aspect of privacy but also the aspects related

---

1 The first and second paragraphs of Article 36 of the Constitution read as follows: Dwellings are inviolable. No one may, without a court order, enter the dwelling or other premises of another person, nor may he search the same, against the will of the resident. In the context of „reasonably expected privacy“, the word dwelling should not be understood only as dwelling in the narrow sense but also as hotel rooms and all premises in general where a citizen has the right to the privacy he or she may reasonably expect. See B. M. Zupančič in: L. Šturm (ed.), Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije [Commentary on the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia], Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Ljubljana 2002, p. 388. Some authors interpret the term other premises of another person as referring to business premises, premises of undertakings, and other legal persons (G. Klemenčič, Hišna preiskava [Search of Premises]; in: G. Klemenčič, B. Kečanović, M. Žaberl, Vaše pravice v policijskih postopkih [Your Rights in Police Procedures], Založba Pasadena, Ljubljana 2002, p. 157). A provision similar to the one in the Slovene Constitution is also contained in the German Constitution, which in Article 13 explicitly refers only to the inviolability of dwellings and does not mention any other premises. It follows from the commentary on Article 13 of the German Constitution that the object of protection also includes business premises, with the exception of those which are generally accessible. H. D. Jarass, B. Pieroth, Grundgesetz für die Bundesrepublik Deutschland, 3. Auflage, Verlag C. H. Beck, München 1995, p. 310.

to the nature of the lawyer-client relationship. As an independent and autonomous adviser and assistant, a lawyer is bound to engage in legal acts for the benefit of his clients within the limits of the law. A prerequisite for the performance of this task is a confidential relationship between a lawyer and his client.<sup>2</sup> In criminal proceedings, the right to confidential contact between the defendant and his defence counsel is an essential element of the right to legal counsel.<sup>3</sup> Confidential contact between a defence counsel and a defendant (or a detained person) is protected within the framework of the third paragraph of Article 19 of the Constitution and the second indent of Article 29 of the Constitution. This relationship is protected irrespective of whether the information is intended to be used in the criminal proceedings by the defence. Due to the fact that in a search of a lawyer's office there exists a risk that the police will obtain documents and objects not related to the criminal offence which is the subject of investigation, the legal order must ensure the protection of the rights determined by Article 35, the first paragraph of Article 37, and the first paragraph of Article 38 of the Constitution.<sup>4</sup> Therefore, this does not concern protection of the lawyer's interests (or his privilege), but his duty to protect professional secrets<sup>5</sup> and the protection of the human rights and fundamental freedoms of his clients. Legal protection of this confidential relationship encourages clients to communicate freely with their lawyer or defence counsel, i.e. without fear that a potential subsequent disclosure of confidential data will jeopardise their legal position.<sup>6</sup>

- 2 The privilege of the confidential relationship between a lawyer and his client is one of the oldest acknowledged privileges relating to confidential communications. The purpose of the privilege is to foster full and open communication between lawyers and their clients, and thereby foster broader public interest in respect for the law and judiciary. See US Supreme Court judgment in the case Upjohn Co. v. United States, 449 U. S. 383, 389 (1981). See also the judgments in the cases Fisher v. United States, 425 U. S. 391 (1976), and Swidler & Berlin v. United States, 524 U. S. 399 (1998).
- 3 Defence counsels cannot perform any of their duties well unless the persons deprived of their freedom can present to them without reservations the circumstances of their case and how they have been treated. Constitutional Court Order No. Up-101/96, dated 1 October 1998 (OdlUS VII, 249).
- 4 Privilege refers to confidential communication between clients and their legal advisers when such is intended for obtaining or providing legal advice or for its application in proceedings which have already been or are to be initiated. This privilege is essential for the adequate and dignified arrangement of personal matters in a social environment poisoned by interferences with privacy. The individual must be enabled to obtain legal advice and legal assistance without fearing that his communication will be subject to investigation and seizure on the basis of a court order. Denying the privilege against a search warrant would have a minimal effect in securing convictions but a major damaging effect on the relationship between the legal profession and its clients. It would engender an atmosphere in which citizens feel that their private papers are insecure and that relationships they previously thought confidential are no longer safe from police intrusion. See judgment of the High Court of Australia in the case Baker v. Campbell, (1983) 153 CLR 52.
- 5 In accordance with the first paragraph of Article 6 of the LA, a lawyer must protect what his client has confided in him as a secret. A violation of the duty to protect a professional secret is defined as a severe violation of a lawyer's duty in practicing the legal profession (the first paragraph of Article 77.b of the Statutes).
- 6 The objective significance of legal practice and the legally protected confidential relationship between a lawyer and his client is in any case affected when, due to the risk of unlimited access to data, the lawyer-client

8. The violations of third party privacy rights which might occur in a search of a lawyer's office would be irreparable. Due to the protection of the confidential relationship and privacy of the lawyer's clients, an act must determine the conditions under which a search of a lawyer's office is admissible. These conditions are determined by Article 8 of the LA, which stipulates the conditions for a search of a lawyer's office that supplement those contained in the CrPA.<sup>7</sup> Pursuant to the first paragraph of Article 8 of the LA, a search of a lawyer's office is permitted only on the basis of a warrant issued by a competent court, and only regarding the case files and objects which are explicitly stated in the search warrant. The same paragraph also stipulates that in a search the secrecy of other documents and objects must not be compromised. Pursuant to the second paragraph of Article 8 of the LA, a representative of the Bar Association of Slovenia must be present during a search of a lawyer's office. The presence of a representative of the Bar Association is intended to protect the human rights of third parties who in the situation referred to in the first paragraph of Article 8 of the LA reasonably expect that the protection of their privacy will be ensured. The position of such representative differs from the usual position of solemn witnesses. The latter observe closely how the search is conducted and make objections, if any, to the contents of the record (the third paragraph of Article 216 of the CrPA). The representative of the Bar Association, on the other hand, must ensure that the secrecy of documents and objects which are not the subject of the search is respected. It follows also from the case law of the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR) that national law must regulate searches of lawyers' offices by providing for special safeguards.<sup>8</sup> relationship is burdened from the beginning with uncertainty regarding its confidentiality. With the extent of the potential knowledge of confidential statements that state authorities may acquire, the probability increases that in pursuing their interests even those who are not suspects will no longer trust the persons who are normally entrusted with professional secrets. See paragraph 94 of Order of the Second Senate of the German Federal Constitutional Court 2 BvR 1027/02, dated 12 April 2005.

---

- 7 The CrPA does not contain any detailed provisions regarding the manner of conducting a search of a lawyer's office.
- 8 A search of a lawyer's office entails an interference with the right to respect for privacy determined by Article 8 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS, No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR); see the case of Niemietz v. Germany, judgment dated 16 December 1992. Such interference is admissible if it is provided for by the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety, or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others. According to the standpoints of the ECtHR, the search and seizure of documents in the office of a lawyer undoubtedly interfere with the professional secrecy which is the basis for a confidential relationship between a lawyer and his client. The protection of professional secrecy [in the lawyer-client relationship] is related to the right of the client against self-incrimination, which presupposes that the authorities obtain evidence without force or pressure, i.e. against the will of the defendant. If national law envisages the possibility of a search of a lawyer's office, the search must be consistent with special safeguards (garanties particulières). The ECHR does not prohibit the imposition of certain duties on lawyers that may relate to the relationship with their clients if there are reasonable indications that a lawyer has participated

9. The complainant challenges the standpoints of the courts which were the basis for disciplinary punishment. He alleges a violation of the spatial aspect of privacy determined in the first paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution, but there is manifestly no such violation. The warrant in question namely did not refer to a search of his office. Nor can the complainant succeed by alleging a violation of the first paragraph of Article 137 of the Constitution, which regulates the institutionalized position of the attorneyship – it defines such as an independent and autonomous service within the system of justice. The Constitutional Court agrees with the complainant that an independent and autonomous attorneyship is of particular importance for the functioning of a state governed by the rule of law, in which human rights and fundamental freedoms are respected. However, the Constitution does not directly regulate human rights or fundamental freedoms in this provision, therefore the complainant cannot substantiate the constitutional complaint by referring to this provision.
10. The allegations of the complainant that he was punished because he observed the provisions of the Constitution and that he acted out of necessity in order to avert an immediate danger which he did not cause himself and which allegedly could not have been averted in any other way, could be taken into consideration in light of the right to personal dignity determined in Article 34 of the Constitution. This right would have been violated if it were established that the bases for his disciplinary punishment included an unconstitutional standpoint. Therefore, the Constitutional Court had to evaluate the allegations in the light of the constitutionality of the standpoints on which the challenged court decisions are based.
11. When a search is conducted on the premises of a lawyer's office, the scope of the search must be strictly limited in the warrant to the case files and objects which, in order to provide evidentiary material relating to a particular criminal offence, make the search of the lawyer's office admissible.<sup>9</sup> The reasoning of the warrant must not lead one to conclude that all the documentation in the lawyer's office should be examined or that one should search in the lawyer's office for whatever one wishes to find. The Supreme Court based the challenged decision on the standpoint of the case law according to which a warrant must include: the data on the person whose premises are to be searched; the reasons which lead to the justified suspicion that a criminal offence has been committed if a search is conducted before the initiation of the judicial investigation; an indication of the person, traces, or objects to which the search relates, and an indication of the circumstances that demonstrate the likeli-in a criminal offence, or within the framework of combating certain forms of conduct. Such measures must, however, be strictly limited as lawyers have a central role in the administration of justice, and, due to their mediatory role between clients and courts, they could be defined as courts' assistants. Paragraphs 41 and 42 of judgment in the case André et al. v. France, dated 24 July 2008.

---

- 9 The protection of the confidential relationship between a lawyer and his client does not entail an impediment to obtaining communications which were used for a criminal offence. Communications lose the nature of confidentiality if they were made with a view to obtaining legal advice to facilitate the commission of a criminal offence. See, for example, the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in the case Descôteaux et al. v. Mierzwinski, [1982] 1 S. C. R. 860.

hood that the defendant will be apprehended or that the traces and objects that are important for the criminal proceedings will be revealed; and a specific indication of the premises where the search is to be conducted.<sup>10</sup> It stated that comparing a warrant to a judgment, which the law prescribes what its operative provisions must contain, is inappropriate, and it agreed with the standpoint of the court of first instance that the reasoning of the warrant clearly stated which objects and documents were to be searched for and which clients the case files that may be subject to search refer to.

12. The complainant does not contest the fact that the case files and objects subject to search were defined in the warrant, but he alleges that it was insufficient that they were defined only in its reasoning. Police officers are allegedly not obliged to read the reasoning. [The Court finds, however, that] he cannot substantiate the alleged violation thereby. It would indeed be clearer and more correct if the case files and objects regarding which the search of the lawyer's office had been ordered were stated in the operative provisions, as was already established by the court of first instance. However, this is irrelevant from the viewpoint of the protection of the privacy of the persons who are in a confidential relationship with the lawyer (Articles 35, 37, and 38 of the Constitution) – what is essential is that the subject of the search is described in sufficient detail, and one cannot imagine how the judge could have written the warrant in any more detail. From the warrant it clearly follows that only the documents connected to the matter should be searched for and examined, without the police officers being permitted to examine all other documents in the lawyer's office as well; such is also the standpoint that follows from the decision of the Supreme Court.
13. A court warrant must enjoy respect for the authority of a decision issued by the judicial power equal to any other court decision; an individual is obliged to comply therewith. If the decision is not executable and if legal remedies are available to the individual, he or she may contest it. If legal remedies are not available, the decision is binding. The binding power of court decisions is an element of a state governed by the rule of law determined by Article 2 of the Constitution, and an element of the right to effective judicial protection determined by the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution. It can be stripped of this binding power only in highly exceptional cases due to which this power should be considered “invalid”. The case at issue is not such a case. Considering the significance of the authority of a court decision, a representative of the Bar Association does not have the right to assess whether the warrant was drawn up in accordance with the law, moreover, he has even less right to oppose it. Therefore, the Supreme Court's central standpoint, according to which the complainant does not have the right to refuse to be present during a search of a lawyer's office which is to be conducted on the basis of a court warrant cannot be deemed unconstitutional. The position of the Supreme Court according to which such conduct is contrary to the established legal order (Article 2 and the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution) is namely relevant from the point of view of constitutional law. This position is decisive for a review of the contested decisions; the complainant, however, does not state any arguments against it that are relevant from the point of view of constitutional law.

---

10 See Judgment of the Supreme Court No. I Ips 214/97, dated 28 November 2002.

14. As regards the aforementioned, a violation of Article 34 of the Constitution is not demonstrated, therefore the Constitutional Court dismissed the constitutional complaint.

C

15. The Constitutional Court reached this decision on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 59 of the CCA, composed of: Mag. Miroslav Mozetič, Vice President, and Judges Mag. Marta Klampfer, Mag. Marija Krisper Kramberger, Mag. Jadranka Sovdat, and Jan Zobec. Judges Jasna Pogačar, Dr Mitja Deisinger, Dr Ernest Petrič, and Jože Tratnik were disqualified from deciding in the case. The decision was adopted unanimously. Judge Sovdat submitted a concurring opinion.

Mag. Miroslav Mozetič
Vice President

---

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE MAG. JADRANKA SOVDAT, JOINED BY JUDGE MAG. MARIJA KRISPER KRAMBERGER

“We must seek justice, but at the same time attend to legal certainty, for it is itself a component of justice, and [...] build the rule of law which must possibly satisfy both concepts.”
(Radbruch, from Appendix III to Philosophy of Law)<sup>1</sup>

1. The Disciplinary Court of the Bar Association of Slovenia found the complainant responsible for a violation of the professional duties of a lawyer pursuant to the sixth paragraph of Article 77.a of the Statutes of the Bar Association of Slovenia (hereinafter referred to as the BAS) (Official Gazette RS, No. 15/94 etc.), in conjunction with Article 18 of the Lawyers Professional Code of Conduct, since, as a representative of the BAS, he unjustifiably refused to carry out the duty to be present during a search of a lawyer's office. It imposed on him a disciplinary measure, i.e. a warning. The Supreme Court, which acting as an appellate disciplinary court, rejected the complainant's appeal as time-barred, and dismissed the appeals of his defence counsel and of the Disciplinary Court prosecutor, adopted a number of standpoints. One of the adopted standpoints was that the complainant did not have the right to refuse to be present during the search of the lawyer's office. I agree with the finding of the decision that, in light of the complainant's allegations, which he primarily kept directing at the court search warrant, before the beginning of the search as well as in legal remedies against the court decisions, this is the central standpoint of the contested decision. I also agree with the fact that the said standpoint cannot be deemed unconstitutional as a court warrant must enjoy respect for the power of a decision made by the judicial power equally as any other court decision. If the legal order does not provide any legal remedies against such (and it does not follow from the constitutional order that the statutory regulation is unconstitutional if it does not provide legal remedies), the warrant is binding. In this case, it is binding also for the representative of the BAS when fulfilling the duty following from the second paragraph of Article 8<sup>2</sup> of the Lawyers Act<sup>3</sup> (hereinafter referred to as the LA).<sup>4</sup> The Constitutional Court did not consider the question of which legal remedy is available to the lawyer whose office is searched or even to the clients of this lawyer, and whether the court warrant is constitutional from their viewpoints, as this was not the subject of deciding in this case.

---

<sup>1</sup> G. Radbruch: Filozofija prava [Philosophy of Law], Študijska izd., Cankarjeva založba (Zbirka pravna obzorja; 16), Ljubljana 2001, p. 281.

2. The essential allegation of the complainant directed against the court search warrant is that the particulars stated in the reasoning denoting which files and objects were to be searched for in the lawyer's office,<sup>5</sup> should have been stated in the operative provisions and not merely in the reasoning, since police officers are allegedly only bound by the operative provisions, whereas they are allegedly not even obliged to read the reasoning of a court warrant, thus on such basis they could search the entire office of a lawyer. Thereby, the complainant does not provide a legal qualification specifying which human right such would entail a violation of. This is understandable, in a way, since it could be merely a question of legality and, in this respect, it would certainly be more appropriate if the contents of the reasoning of the court warrant, the obligatory presence of a representative of the BAS, and the obligation to respect the secrecy of documents and objects not defined as the subject of the search were stated in the operative provisions of the warrant, whereas the reasoning would state what is now written in the operative provisions, i.e. that the above-stated is ordered because Article 8 of the LA must be respected in the search of a lawyer's office.<sup>6</sup> Nevertheless, the mere issue of the interpretation of the procedural rules defining the manner in which a court decision is structured cannot be the subject of review in a constitutional complaint unless at the same time a matter of constitutionality is at issue.

---

2 It reads as follows: "A representative of the Bar Association of Slovenia shall be present at the search of a lawyer's office."

3 Official Gazette RS, No. 18/93 etc.

4 Conversely, the Supreme Court stated in the contested decision that the BAS representative has the right to assess whether the search warrant is drawn up in accordance with the law. Such standpoint would be reasonable only if the legal order provided for a special legal remedy by which he could contest the (constitutionality and) legality of the court warrant.

5 In the reasoning of the court warrant it is stated: "Business and other documents of the company [...] referring to the actual and modified records, the income [...] in [...] from 1996 onwards, statements of accounts sent [...], data on current accounts and transactions on them, a list of the financial assets of the company and in [...], data and evidence referring to the assets owned by the company [...], as well as to all the confidential documents of A. A. referring to the operations of the company [...] and the representation of the suspects B. B. and C. C."

6 The first paragraph of this Article stipulates: "A search of a lawyer's office shall be permitted only on the basis of a warrant issued by the competent court and only with reference to the records and objects explicitly stated in the search warrant. The search shall not affect the secrecy of other documents and objects."

3. I agree with the arguments of the decision, therefore I voted in favour of the dismissal of the constitutional complaint. However, I also wish to draw attention to the fact that the contested decision of the Supreme Court also contains standpoints which are, in my opinion, unconstitutional or which [could] consequently lead to unconstitutionality or may even lead to severe violations of human rights, not those of the complainant, but those of the clients of the lawyer whose office was searched. Moreover, in my opinion this raises another serious issue, namely the issue of the constitutionality of the statutory regulation of searches when such concern a lawyer's office, which makes it necessary for the legislature to regulate the issues pointed out below as soon as possible in order to prevent, in future cases of searches of lawyers' offices, violations of Article 35, the first paragraph of Article 37, the first paragraph of Article 38, and, in cases involving the defence of defendants in criminal proceedings, even of Article 29 of the Constitution. It is true, however, that the standpoints that I consider unconstitutional do not constitute the central standpoint of the decision, and it is also true that in this case what follows from this was not even highlighted since a situation wherein these issues could have arisen as key issues did not occur. The representative of the BAS namely left the site of the search before it began.
4. In addition to the requirements determined in Article 8 of the LA, the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Act (Official Gazette No. 32/07 – official consolidated text etc. – hereinafter referred to as the CrPA) apply for the search of a lawyer's office. Pursuant to these provisions, inter alia, a search is to be conducted by the investigating judge of a competent court (the first paragraph of Article 171 of the CrPA), who may assign the execution of a warrant ordering a search of premises or a personal search (the third paragraph of Article 172 of the CrPA) to the police, which evidently is generally what happens,<sup>7</sup> whereby two adults must be present at the search as witnesses. Before the search begins, the witnesses must be warned to observe closely how the search is conducted, and they must be informed of their right to make objections before signing the record of the search if they consider its content to be inadequate (the third paragraph of Article 216 of the CrPA). I highlighted precisely the provisions stated above because: 1.) it is obvious that a general rule has been established according to which the police carry out searches of lawyers' offices (as well), although in my opinion the investigating judge should not assign such task to the police, and 2.) in the contested decision, by limiting the role of the representative of the BAS to having the right to be present and to make objections, comments, and suggestions that are entered into the record "as anybody who has the right to be or must be present during a search of premises for the purposes of the protection of his rights or the rights of other persons in accordance with the provisions of the seventh paragraph of Article 216 and Articles 79-82 of the CrPA", the Supreme Court assigned the representative of the BAS only the role of a witness in the performance of his duties pursuant to Article 8 of the LA. From a constitutional point of view, both reasons seem highly questionable to me.

<sup>7</sup> Horvat denotes such as an operative investigative act which is normally not performed by an investigating judge himself. See Š. Horvat, Zakon o kazenskem postopku s komentarjem, GV Založba, Ljubljana 2004, p. 402.

5. The special rules which must apply in the search of a lawyer's office are intended to protect professional secrecy. Despite the fact that we usually refer to legal professional privilege, this is not a lawyer's privilege, but entails, by its nature, his duty to protect the rights of third parties who are in a confidential relationship with the lawyer. Thereby, it is most important that this in fact concerns the protection of the human rights of his clients, which is ensured by the Constitution within Article 35, the first paragraph of Article 37, the first paragraph of Article 38, and, in the case of a counsel for the defence in criminal proceedings, also within the framework of the right to defence determined by Article 29 of the Constitution, since the confidentiality of the relationship between a lawyer and a defendant is, so to speak, a natural constituent part of the said right.<sup>8</sup> A search of a lawyer's office is therefore undoubtedly an attack on the professional secrecy on which this confidential relationship is based.<sup>9</sup> And therefore, a search of a lawyer's office must be carried out only in exception, however, the exceptional nature of such a search cannot entail that a search of a lawyer's office would not be permitted in the event of suspicion that a lawyer has committed a criminal offence. If a search is permitted, it is precisely in order to protect these human rights that the rules according to which the search may be conducted must be set out in detail. The Constitutional Court has already adopted the position precisely regarding the constitutional provisions protecting human dignity, personal rights, privacy, and safety (Articles 34 to 38 of the Constitution) that these are provisions which have a special place among human rights and fundamental freedoms, and which prohibit everyone - beginning with the State - from (inadmissibly) interfering therewith (Decision No. U-I-25/95, dated 27 November 1997, Official Gazette RS, No. 5/98, and OdlUS VI, 158, Paragraph 32 of the reasoning). The basic condition set by the Constitution is that a limitation of human rights and fundamental freedoms may be prescribed only by law, for, pursuant to the second paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution, if the manner in which a human right is exercised may (only) be determined by law, then under the conditions set by the Constitution in the third paragraph of the same Article, the limitation of the human right must all the more be determined by law.<sup>10</sup>

---

8 "The privilege protecting from disclosure communications between solicitor and client is a fundamental right - as fundamental as the right to counsel itself since the right can exist only imperfectly without the privilege. The Courts should be astute to protect both." Cf. the Supreme Court of Canada in the judgment Descôteaux et al. v. Mierzwiński, [1982] 1 S.C.R. 860.

9 Cf. the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR) in the judgment in the case André and other v. France, dated 24 July 2008, in Para. 41: "The Court assesses that searches and seizures in the case of lawyers undoubtedly entail an attack on professional secrecy, which is a basis of the confidentiality relationship between a lawyer and his client."

10 In the aforementioned judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, the Court established that the legislation enabled the search of a law office and the seizure of the objects for which there existed reasonable reasons that they entailed evidence in relation to the commission of a particular criminal offence, but it did not lay down a special procedure that would apply to such cases. The Court believed that in granting a search war-

The regulation must be specific and unambiguous in order to rule out any possibility of arbitrary deciding by a state authority. As the Constitutional Court has already stressed in several decisions, legal certainty (lex certa) is a primordial element of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution) and would apply as an imperative constitutional postulate even if it were not explicitly mentioned in the Constitution (Decision No. U-I-25/95, Paragraph 42 of the reasoning).

6. When a court warrant specifies the files to be examined, it is perfectly logical that the judge who issued the warrant cannot order, for example, that the second file from the left on the third shelf on the left-hand side of the lawyer's study should be taken out and therein the first three documents should be examined and seized (if I may exaggerate), such that it could be said that judicial power ordered with absolute precision what the subject of the search is. Since, naturally, such level of precision is impossible, it is necessary to set up other mechanisms to ensure the protection of human rights. The first mechanism is undoubtedly a court decision which allows such interference, and which is required by the Constitution in the second paragraph of Article 36. As soon as a court warrant exists, at least three basic questions are raised:
  1. Who should search the lawyer's office for the files that, according to the court warrant, are permitted to be the subject of the search and who should select the documents that are to be examined?
  2. Who is to make an assessment of whether it is admissible to seize all the selected documents?
  3. Who may object to the seizure of documents, and, in the event of such, who decides thereon and when, and what happens to the seized documents until such decision is taken?
7. Pursuant to Slovene regulations, the answers to these questions are the following: The files are to be searched for by the police, who also decide what they will seize and when this will happen (while conducting the search). Nobody can effectively object to such in a way that would prevent the seizure, therefore the one who in this State is called upon to decide objectively and independently (a part of this decision-making of course also being the protection of human rights), i.e. the courts - cannot decide thereon and because of that they cannot decide on the protection of professional secrecy either, which is in the particular interest of the clients who are not associated with the search of the lawyer's office, on the basis of the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution, and regarding human rights, particularly on the basis of the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution. If we define the role of a representative of the BAS as the role of a "qualified" witness, then pursuant to the third paragraph of Article 216 of the CrPA [the duty of] such witnesses [is to] closely observe how the search is conducted and they have the right to make objections rant the judge must be particularly demanding and must grant it if there is no other reasonable alternative. Moreover, the search should be made in the presence of a representative of the Bar. The Supreme Court ordered the courts to set out in the court warrant procedures for its execution which take into account the right to privacy and limit the interferences with this right to what is strictly unavoidable.

---

before they sign the record of the search if they consider its contents inadequate. Neither the witness referred to in the third paragraph of Article 216 of the CrPA nor the representative of the BAS merely in the role of such witness has the right to assess the contents of the documents that the police wish to seize, and even less right to object to the seizure thereof. The objections made by witnesses to be entered into the record may play a role in criminal proceedings in comprising an assessment of whether individual evidence was obtained in a constitutional and legal manner. They play no role whatsoever in preventing interferences with the rights of the lawyer's clients. It is no less important to raise a question as to the extent to which the seizure of documents from files is permitted, i.e. documents which are a reflection of the confidential relationship between a lawyer, as a defence counsel in criminal proceedings, and his client, as a defendant in the same proceedings. There is no possibility for the representative of the BAS to prevent inadmissible interferences with these rights. Therefore his presence cannot play the role for which it was enacted by the legislature, i.e. the protection of the confidential relationships between a lawyer and his clients. Violations of human rights thereby already occur; in their nature they may be such that a question arises as to whether their consequences are at all remediable, such as is prescribed by the fourth paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution.

8. Therefore, in my view, the standpoint according to which a representative of the BAS may act merely in the role of a witness who may only put forward objections and comments to be entered into the record is unconstitutional, however, this unconstitutionality does not remain at the level of a statutory interpretation contrary to the Constitution, but is incorporated into the statutory regulation in force itself. The latter is not sufficient to achieve the purpose pursued by Article 8 of the LA,<sup>11</sup> which is also confirmed by the standpoints adopted by the ECtHR on the interference with the confidential relationship between a lawyer and his client.
9. In its judgment in the case Wieser and Bicos Beteiligungen GmbH v. Austria, dated 16 October 2007, the ECtHR examined whether national law ensures appropriate and effective safeguards to prevent any abuse and arbitrariness.<sup>12</sup> It established that the safeguards provided for by the Austrian criminal procedure were fully complied with as regards the search of documents. Whenever the representative of the Bar Association objected to the seizure of a particular document, this document was sealed. Later the investigating judge decided, in the presence of the applicant, which documents were subject to professional secrecy, and returned a number of them to the applicant. The same safeguards, however, were not observed as regards electronic data. The representative of the Bar Association could not properly exercise his supervisory function in this respect.<sup>13</sup> The ECtHR found that, due to the failure to comply with these safeguards, the search and seizure of the data in digital form were disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. It therefore decided that the applicants' right determined in Article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECHR) was violated. It established an infringement of the same Convention right also in its judgment in the case Iliya Stefanov v. Bulgaria, dated 22 May 2008.<sup>14</sup> Among other things, the presence of two witnesses with no legal education was problematic, and therefore it is highly unlikely that they were able to assess, independently of the investigators, whether particular evidence was protected by professional privilege. The presence of these witnesses therefore did not entail an effective safeguard against excessive police interference with the professional secrecy of the applicant.<sup>15</sup>

---

11 Therefore, in the contested decision the standpoint of the Supreme Court according to which "the lawyer's departure from the premises of the search may result in the search being carried out without the supervision of a lawyer" is questionable as well.

12 It examined, in particular, whether the warrant was issued by a judge, whether the scope of the warrant was reasonably limited, and - since the search of a lawyer's office was concerned - whether it was carried out in the presence of an independent observer in order to ensure that documents protected by professional secrecy were not seized. The ECtHR found that the search warrant was issued by the investigating judge and that the scope of the warrant was reasonably limited.

10. While a statutory requirement corresponding to the second paragraph of Article 8 of the Slovene LA has evidently not been enforced in Bulgaria, it is different in France. Notwithstanding this, the ECtHR established an infringement of a Convention right in its judgment in the case André and other v. France. The search of a lawyer's office was carried out in the presence of the Head of the Bar Association. The documents that were seized included handwritten notes of the lawyer and the documents on which the notes of the lawyer in his own handwriting were added. The Head of the Bar Association explicitly stated that these were the lawyer's private documents and therefore they were absolutely protected by professional secrecy. The applicants lodged a request for cassation against the seizure, which was unsuccessful. The ECtHR found that a special guarantee applied to the search because it was carried out in the presence of a representative of the Bar Association. Furthermore, the presence of this representative and his observations related to the protection of professional secrecy

13 Whereby the list of computer files seized was not drawn up at the end of the search but only subsequently. Moreover, the police officers did not inform the applicant or the representative of the Bar of the results of the search before leaving the premises.

14 The ECtHR examined the severity of the offence in connection with which the search was carried out, whether it was carried out on the basis of a court warrant, whether the warrant was based on reasonable suspicion, and whether its scope was reasonably limited. It also reviewed the manner in which the search was executed, and – since this concerned a lawyer's office – whether it was carried out in the presence of an independent observer in order to ensure that evidence subject to legal professional privilege was not seized. The ECtHR also examined the possible repercussions on the work and reputation of the persons affected by the search. See Para. 38 of the judgment.

15 The ECtHR found that the search warrant was based on a sufficiently reasonable suspicion and that it was issued by a court. However, neither the warrant nor the application for its issue specified what was expected to be found in the applicant's office, or whether privileged material was to be seized as well. The warrant was therefore drawn up in overly broad terms and was thus not capable of minimising the interference with the applicant's right determined in Article 8 of the ECHR and with professional secrecy. On the basis of this warrant, the search, too, was carried out in an excessively broad manner. The entire computer used by the applicant for his work was seized, and it is natural to suppose that it contained files covered by professional privilege. The ECtHR therefore established that in these circumstances the search disproportionately interfered with the applicant's professional secrecy. See Paragraphs 40–43 of the judgment.

were stated in the record of the relevant investigative act. However, the presence of this representative and his objection did not prevent the actual examination and seizure of documents subject to professional secrecy.<sup>16</sup> The ECtHR also established that the search warrant was written very broadly as it referred to the search and seizure of all the documents and data storage devices related to the alleged fraud which might have been found on the premises of the applicants. The search of the applicants' premises was carried out merely because of their role as lawyers of the suspected company, as the applicants were not suspected of being involved in the criminal offence.<sup>17</sup> On the basis of everything stated above, the ECtHR established that the search and seizure of the applicants' documents were disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued.<sup>18</sup> Therefore, [it established that] Article 8 of the ECHR was violated.

11. Whenever the ECtHR has established that sufficient guarantees for respect for rights have been fulfilled, it has decided the cases already at the level of the inadmissibility of the case. In this context, in its decision on the inadmissibility of the application in the case Alwin Tamosius v. United Kingdom, dated 19 September 2002, it examined whether the search was carried out with sufficient procedural safeguards to prevent any abuse and arbitrariness. It stated that the search of a lawyer's office interferes with or threatens to interfere with the protection of professional secrecy and may have repercussions on the proper administration of justice, and hence on the rights determined in Article 6 of the ECHR.<sup>19</sup> In this particular case, the search was carried out under a court warrant, which, contrary to the allegations of the applicant, was not excessively broad. The warrant that was executed was accompanied by a schedule of 35 companies and individuals listed as being under investigation. The applicant did not persuade the ECtHR that he was not able to assess whether the investigators acted unlawfully. Furthermore, the search was carried out under the supervision of counsel, whose task was to identify<sup>20</sup> which documents were protected by professional privilege. Although the applicant claimed that this was not a sufficient safeguard, the ECtHR noted that the counsel was under instructions to act independently of the investigators and to give independent advice. The applicant also did not claim in any domestic proceedings that the counsel had made erroneous decisions. The ECtHR established that in domestic law such privilege provides a sufficient safeguard against interferences with professional secrecy and the administration of justice, therefore the search was not disproportionate to the aim pursued.

---

16 Para. 44 of the judgment.

17 Para. 46 of the judgment.

18 Para. 48 of the judgment.

19 Regarding this, the ECtHR refers to its judgment in the case Niemietz v. Germany, dated 16 December 1992, Para. 37.

20 The Inland Revenue obtained a search warrant in order to search the applicant's premises. During the search some 69 documents, files, and books were examined and seized. Officers searched for relevant data. Once their relevance had been established, the documents were then reviewed by the counsel nominated by the Attorney General. The task of the counsel was to advise whether any document was or was not subject to professional privilege. Any document found to be subject to privilege was returned to the applicant's attorneys. All the documents seen by counsel were listed, with counsel's opinion as to each.

12. Judgments of the ECtHR have the power of precedent, therefore the standpoints of the ECtHR are also binding on Slovene State authorities.<sup>21</sup> The Constitutional Court has already stressed such.<sup>22</sup> Besides the standpoints of the ECtHR, it is worth noting that a number of countries provide for additional guarantees in their legal orders relating to searching a lawyer's office in order to prevent violations of human rights or even abuse. In France, for example, a search of a lawyer's office may be carried out only by a judicial officer (a magistrat)<sup>23</sup> in the presence of the Head of the Bar Association, whereas a representative of the Bar Association may prevent, by the powers vested in him, an inadmissible interference with human rights. In this respect, a special role was played by the case law of the highest court in the State, which had established certain conditions even before the enactment of the mentioned regulation in 2000. In particular, it developed standpoints on the exceptional admissibility of the seizure of the correspondence between a lawyer and his client if the seized documents are evidence of the lawyer's involvement in a criminal offence,<sup>24</sup> and it decided the same in cases concerning the seizure of electronic data.<sup>25</sup> Despite all these safeguards, a violation of a Convention right may occur, as follows from the judgment of the ECtHR in the case André and other v. France.

13. Also in the Federal Republic of Germany the police may not examine files [at a lawyer's office] without the lawyer's permission. This is exclusively the right of a State Prosecutor.<sup>26</sup> The lawyer may insist on sealing the disputed documents even if the State Prosecutor is present. The lawfulness of the measure is decided upon by the court in appellate proceedings. In Belgium, certain practices have evolved, notwithstanding the absence of the (relevant) explicit statutory provisions, according to which the investigating judge must personally be present in the search of the 21 See B. M. Zupančič in: The Owl of Minerva, Essays on Human Rights, Eleven International Publishing, Utrecht 2008 (On the Interpretation of Legal Precedents and of the Judgements of the European Court of Human Rights), pp. 351–392.

22 Decision No. U-I-65/05, dated 22 September 2005 (Official Gazette RS, No. 92/05, and OdlUS XIV, 72), Paragraph 12 of the reasoning, inter alia, stipulates: "The Constitutional Court must consider this case law irrespective of the fact that it was adopted in a case in which Slovenia itself did not participate in proceedings before the ECtHR."

23 Pursuant to Articles 56-1 and 96 of the Code de procédure pénal, the search of a lawyer's office and of the premises of his residence may be carried out only by a judicial officer (a magistrat – normally the investigating judge or the State Prosecutor) in the presence of the Head of the Bar Association or his deputy, to whom the judicial officer first presents the contents of the reasoned court decision. Only the judicial officer and the Head of the Bar Association may become acquainted with the documents found on the site of the search before they are seized. If the Head of the Bar Association objects to the seizure of a particular document, it must be sealed, a report must be written and the sealed document must be submitted to the 'Judge of freedoms and detention', who decides on its seizure after previously hearing the judicial officer who conducted the search, the State Prosecutor, the lawyer whose premises were searched, and the Head of the Bar Association.

24 Judgments of the Criminal Chamber of the Court of Cassation dated 12 March 1992, 20 January 1993, and 27 June 2001.

25 Judgments of the Criminal Chamber of the Court of Cassation dated 14 November 2001 and 8 August 2007.

26 Article 110 of the Criminal Procedure Act (Strafprozessordnung).

premises, after he has informed the Head of the Bar Association and called for a representative of the Association to be present at the search.<sup>27</sup>

14. By his conduct the applicant evidently pursued justice. This was explicitly stated by the first panel of the Disciplinary Court, which took into consideration the fact that by his conduct the applicant “wished to pursue the legitimate aims of the protection of the inviolability of the lawyer’s office in terms of the protection of the confidentiality of the data of the lawyer’s clients” as one of the reasons for pronouncing the mildest disciplinary measure. However, in so doing, the applicant could not be successful unless he took into account legal certainty, a component of which is also compliance with court decisions. As I have already stated above, this was the essential reason why I voted in favour of the dismissal of the constitutional complaint. I believe that it was necessary to draw attention to the unconstitutionality of some of the standpoints handed down by the Supreme Court in this regard, and to the fact that, in light of the standpoints of the ECtHR and a number of examples from the comparative data, it is necessary for the legislature to supplement the regulation determined in Article 8 of the LA either by amending this Act or the CrPA in the part that regulates the search of premises.

Mag. Jadranka Sovdat

Mag. Marija Krisper Kramberger

---

27 In theory, there exist various positions regarding the powers vested in the investigating judge and the Head of the Bar Association in an examination of the files and private notes of a lawyer. Some authors claim that where the investigating judge believes that evidence is to be found in the files of the lawyer, he should indicate such to the Head of the Bar Association. The latter should examine the file by himself in order to establish whether it really contains evidence, and in such case he should hand them over to the judge. See M. Franchimont, A. Jacobs, and A. Masset, Manuel de procédure pénale, Second edition, Larcier, Bruxelles 2006, p. 462. Others believe that such interferes with the powers vested in the investigating judge. In their opinion, only the investigating judge may decide which documents are protected by professional secrecy, after consulting the Head of the Bar Association or his deputy if necessary. See H.-D. Bosly and D. Vandermeersch, Droit de la procédure pénale, Fourth edition, La Chartre, Bruges 2005, p. 663.

Decision No. U-I-40/12, dated 11 April 2013

DECISION

At a session held on 11 April 2013 in proceedings to review constitutionality initiated upon the request of the Supreme Court of the Republic of Slovenia, the Constitutional Court

decided as follows:

1. The first sentence of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Prevention of Restriction of Competition Act (Official Gazette RS Nos. 36/08, 40/09, 26/11, 87/11, and 57/12) is inconsistent with the Constitution.
2. The National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia must remedy the unconstitutionality referred to in the preceding paragraph within one year following the publication of this Decision in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia.
3. Until the established unconstitutionality is remedied, the first sentence of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Prevention of Restriction of Competition Act shall apply.
4. Articles 54, 56, 57, 59, and 61 of the Prevention of Restriction of Competition Act are not inconsistent with the Constitution.

Reasoning

A

1. The Supreme Court of the Republic of Slovenia filed a request to review the constitutionality of Articles 28, 29, and Articles 54 to 61 of the Prevention of Restriction of Competition Act (hereinafter referred to as the PRCA-1). Articles 28 and 29 of the PRCA-1 are allegedly inconsistent with the right to the inviolability of dwellings determined by Article 36 of the Constitution, with the right to the protection of the privacy of correspondence and other means of communication determined by Article 37 of the Constitution, and with the right to respect for private and family life determined by Article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Official Gazette RS No. 33/94, MP, No. 7/94 – hereinafter referred to as the ECHR). The other challenged provisions are allegedly inconsistent with the right to a legal remedy determined by Article 25 of the Constitution. The Supreme Court underlines that it proceeds from Articles 28 and 29 of the PRCA-1 that the legal basis for the search of a company against which a procedure is being conducted is a search order, which is issued by the Slovene Competition Protection Agency (hereinafter referred to as the Agency) and which can only be challenged in appellate proceedings against the final decision. Allegedly, the Constitutional Court has not yet answered the question of whether also legal entities enjoy protection under Article 36 of the Constitution with regard to their business premises. The Supreme Court assesses that it can be logically concluded from the constitutional case law that Article 36 of the Constitution also protects legal entities. The second paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution namely expressly mentions also “other premises of another person”, which allegedly also include the business premises of legal entities subject to search by the Agency. The spatial aspect of the right to privacy determined by Article 36 of the Constitution is allegedly also ensured to legal entities on premises where they justly expect one – on business premises that are not generally publicly accessible. The Supreme Court is of the opinion that legal entities also enjoy protection under Article 37 of the Constitution, as they, through their representatives, also use means of communication or transferring data. Due to the fact that for entry onto business premises, the inspection thereof, and the inspection of business documentation, the PRCA-1 requires nothing but a search order issued by the Agency, which is a part of the executive branch of power, Articles 28 and 29 of the PRCA-1 are allegedly inconsistent with the requirements determined by Articles 36 and 37 of the Constitution. The Supreme Court also alleges that by their nature, procedures for determining violations of competition law are punitive procedures. Such is allegedly confirmed by the case law of the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as the ECtHR). In addition, in the case Société Calas Est and others v. France, dated 16 April 2002, that Court allegedly ruled that the French legal regulation which allowed the national competition protection authority to conduct a search of a company without a court order violated Article 8 of the ECHR. The opinion of the Supreme Court is that the necessity of a court order being required to conduct a search in the procedure for determining a violation of competition law already proceeds from two facts: firstly, in minor offence proceedings, as a general rule, the Agency refers to its findings from the procedure for determining a violation of competition law; secondly, evidence acquired on the basis of the challenged provisions of the PRCA-1 would most probably also be used in criminal proceedings.

2. With regard to Articles 54 to 61 of the PRCA-1, the Supreme Court underlines above all that the guarantees determined by Article 25 of the Constitution can only be protected in proceedings where the court has full jurisdiction, interpreted in such a manner that a court can assess both the factual and the legal basis of the challenged decision. The procedure determined in the PRCA-1 allegedly only envisages one administrative and one judicial instance. These judicial protection proceedings are allegedly not proceedings where the court has full jurisdiction. As the procedure before the Agency is allegedly comparable to a pre-trial procedure, it would be sensible to expect, in the opinion of the Supreme Court, that a party to judicial protection proceedings under the PRCA-1 would have more procedural rights ensured than in proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts. In reality, the situation is allegedly just the opposite. The Supreme Court draws attention firstly to the prohibition of stating new facts and of proposing new evidence in an action under Article 57 of the PRCA-1 (which allegedly logically excludes the possibility that the Supreme Court take new evidence ex officio), secondly, to the fact that the Supreme Court adjudicates, as a general rule, without a trial (Article 59 of the PRCA-1), and thirdly, to the exclusion of an appeal issued in judicial protection proceedings (Article 61 of the PRCA-1). Such proceedings allegedly do not enable a plaintiff to efficiently challenge the state of the facts determined by the Agency, as the assessment of the state of the facts before the Supreme Court is allegedly limited to what the Agency determined in the administrative procedure. For the protection of the rights of parties in competition cases it is allegedly crucial that the state of the facts be determined before a court. The Supreme Court faults the regulation of the judicial protection in the PRCA-1 for interfering with the right to judicial protection determined by Article 25 of the Constitution. The pursued aim of a speedy procedure and efficiency in the Agency's supervision is allegedly unable to outweigh the weight of such interference. The Supreme Court is of the opinion that such an aim would also be attained to a sufficient degree if in judicial protection proceedings under the PRCA-1 the Act on the Judicial Review of Administrative Acts (Official Gazette RS Nos. 105/06, 62/10, and 109/12 – hereinafter referred to as the AJRAA-1) were applicable in its entirety. The Supreme Court proposes that the Constitutional Court adopt a declaratory decision on the unconstitutionality of the challenged provisions, impose a deadline on the legislature by which it must remedy the inconsistencies, and determine the manner of the implementation of its decision.

3. The request of the Supreme Court was served on the National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia, which replied to it. The National Assembly is of the opinion that the challenged provisions of the PRCA-1 are not inconsistent with the Constitution. It stresses that the protection of competition is a constitutional category and a category of European Union law. The National Assembly describes in detail the characteristics of the legal regulation of the protection of competition in the European Union (hereinafter referred to as the EU). It draws attention to the fact that the Agency conducts minor offence procedures separately from administrative procedures. The Minor Offences Act (Official Gazette RS No. 29/11 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the MOA-1) predominantly applies for them, not the PRCA-1. The Agency is allegedly not the sole administrative authority to have the competence, within the framework of administrative procedures, to enter business premises and conduct a search thereof without a court order. The National Assembly substantiates such claim by citing specific provisions of the Tax Administration Act (Official Gazette RS Nos. 1/07 – official consolidated text, 40/09, and 33/11 – TAA-1), the Tax Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS Nos. 13/11 – official consolidated text, 32/12, and 94/12 – TPA-2), the Inspection Act (Official Gazette RS No. 43/07 – official consolidated text – hereinafter referred to as the IA), and the Customs Service Act (Official Gazette RS Nos. 103/04 – official consolidated text, 40/09, and 9/11 – CSA-1). The regulation of the search in the PRCA-1 is allegedly comparable to the regulation of various inspection procedures. The aim of the search procedure allegedly lies in ensuring efficient supervision and in establishing the existence of restrictive conduct causing immense damage to consumers and to the economy. The National Assembly opposes the position of the Supreme Court that the procedure for determining violations under the PRCA-1 is a punitive procedure. It makes reference to Order of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-108/99, dated 20 March 2003 (Official Gazette RS No. 33/03, and OdlUS XII, 22), in which the Constitutional Court allegedly determined that a tax inspection procedure is not a criminal procedure. It is of the opinion that in minor offence procedures the Agency cannot make use of a piece of evidence not obtained in conformity with the MOA-1. In the ECtHR case law, a request to obtain documents from a suspect is allegedly not inconsistent with the right to remain silent, which is allegedly even truer with regard to an administrative procedure in which the existence of an unlawful restriction of competition is established. The National Assembly claims that for legal entities it cannot be true that everything that is connected with their market operations and with acquiring profit is private. Allegedly, the protection of legal entities cannot, in such sense, equal that of natural persons. The National Assembly refers to Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-430/00, dated 3 April 2003 (Official Gazette RS No. 36/03, and OdlUS XII, 57), in which the connection between an entry onto business premises and the guarantee of the inviolability of dwellings was allegedly not established. The ECtHR allegedly differentiates between the level of spatial privacy that natural persons enjoy, on one hand, and that legal entities enjoy, on the other. The regulation of the search under the PRCA-1 allegedly does not match the criteria that the ECtHR developed regarding the admissibility of interferences with Article 8 of the ECHR. With regard to the regulation of judicial protection in the PRCA-1, the National Assembly claims that the Supreme Court has all competence to assess substantive and procedural legal questions as well as the regularity and completeness of the determination of the state of the facts. The Supreme Court is allegedly not bound by the state of the facts established by the Agency. It allegedly proceeds from Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-219/03, dated 1 December 2005 (Official Gazette RS No. 118/05, and OdlUS XIV, 88) that a multitude of legal remedies does not of itself guarantee more efficient protection of rights or higher quality and that Article 25 of the Constitution allows, under certain conditions, that a request for the judicial review of a decision serves as a legal remedy. Due to the similarity of the statutory provisions at issue, that Decision is allegedly legally important also for assessing the constitutionality of the PRCA-1. Such is allegedly true also for the limits and the scope of the assessment of a challenged administrative decision, for the preclusion of stating new facts, for suggesting new evidence, and for the Supreme Court deciding without a trial. The National Assembly is of the opinion that parties to proceedings already have, in the framework of administrative proceedings, sufficient possibilities to state their position on decisive aspects of the case. In addition, a party who discovers new facts or new evidence after the issuance of the decision allegedly would have at its disposal a retrial in conformity with the General Administrative Procedure Act (Official Gazette RS Nos. 24/06 – official consolidated text, 126/07, 65/08, and 8/10 – hereinafter referred to as the GAPA).

4. The Government of the Republic of Slovenia submitted its opinion on the request of the Supreme Court. Its position is that all of the challenged provisions are consistent with the Constitution. With regard to the issuance of a search order, it claims that companies – as legal entities – as a general rule cannot be holders of personal rights determined by the Constitution. From the hitherto decisions of the Constitutional Court, namely Decision No. Up-430/00 and Order No. U-I-36/03, dated 9 June 2005, it allegedly proceeds that the right to the inviolability of dwellings determined by Article 36 of the Constitution cannot refer to the business premises of legal entities. The regulation of inspection competences in the IA allegedly conforms with such. The Government claims that the premises of legal entities are not intended for living, but for carrying out the activities of the company, therefore the protection determined by Article 36 of the Constitution does not apply thereto. In its assessment, individuals – who otherwise can invoke the constitutional provisions on privacy – also enjoy a lower degree of expected privacy at their workplace than in their residence. Also the Judgment of the Court of the European Union, dated 22 October 2002, in the case Roquette Frères SA v. Directeur général de la concurrence, de la consommation et de la répression des fraudes, C-94/00 allegedly cannot essentially influence these conclusions. It allegedly proceeds therefrom that on one hand the respect for privacy of one's home determined in Article 8 of the ECHR can, in certain circumstances, expand to include business premises of companies, while on the other hand the permitted interferences can be much more far-reaching with regard to professional or business premises or regarding activities than in other cases. The Government claims that EU law (regarding the competences of the European Commission) as well as the legal systems of a large number of EU Member States (regarding the competences of national competition regulatory authorities) allow for searches of the business premises of legal entities to be conducted without a prior court order. It is of the opinion that it does not proceed from the ECtHR Judgment in the case Société Calas Est and others v. France that Article 8 of the ECHR protects business premises per se. Only the private content of the documents searched can allegedly have an influence on the applicability of Article 8 of the ECHR. Therefore, Articles 28 and 29 of the PRCA-1 are allegedly not inconsistent with either Article 36 of the Constitution or Article 8 of the ECHR. In the opinion of the Government, Articles 28 and 29 of the PRCA-1 are allegedly not inconsistent even with Article 37 of the Constitution. Communication between natural persons on behalf and for the account of a company which is in its entirety of a business nature is allegedly not constitutionally protected from the viewpoint of privacy, as the natural person is merely a medium who transfers information for the company, whose personality rights are not recognised. All competences to conduct searches under the second paragraph of Article 29 of the PRCA-1 allegedly refer to business correspondence connected to the operations of the legal entity, which is not protected by Article 37 of the Constitution. The Government claims that the Slovene Competition Protection Office [i.e. the competition authority preceding the Agency] (hereinafter referred to as the Office) cannot, without the competences determined by Article 29 of the PRCA-1, obtain data necessary for carrying out procedures and for efficient conduct of its tasks. As the business nature of a document allegedly cannot be established before its examination, the Government holds the position that, as a general rule, all documentation that is located in the registered office of a company is deemed business documentation (while the individual allegedly retains the right and duty to be present at the search and during the delimitation of his personal sphere from the business one). The Government refers to Supreme Court Judgment No. G 3/2009, dated 30 June 2009, in which the Supreme Court allegedly explained that during the handing over of business documentation a selection must be made and personal correspondence must be eliminated. In the opinion of the Government, while communication of a business nature can certainly entail a business secret of a company, it cannot, however, entail a private piece of data of individual employees that they have a legitimate interest in hiding. The Government also stresses that the competences of the Office are determined so that they enable efficient implementation of Articles 101 and 102 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (consolidated version, OJ C 326, 26 October 2012 – hereinafter referred to as the TFEU). In the case at hand, it is allegedly not relevant for the deciding of the Constitutional Court whether the use of evidence from the administrative procedure is possible also in other proceedings (especially in criminal and minor offence proceedings) – this allegedly remains a matter to be decided by the competent courts.

5. Articles 54 to 61 are allegedly not inconsistent with Article 25 of the Constitution. The Government underlines the special importance of supervision over conduct that, contrary to EU legislation, the Constitution, and the PRCA-1, limits effective competition. Thus, the preclusion regarding new facts and new evidence is allegedly legitimate especially due to the emphasised principle of the speediness of proceedings. However, in procedures before the Office parties are allegedly already ensured sufficient possibilities to state facts and evidence that benefit them. In this regard, especially the obligatory provision of a summary of the relevant facts and the possibility to give a statement thereon are allegedly important. The Government does not concur with the criticisms of the Supreme Court regarding the inadmissible limitation of the judicial assessment of the factual basis of the Office's decision – allegedly, under Article 64 of the AJRAA-1 the Supreme Court has the possibility, due to incomplete findings on the state of the facts, to abrogate the administrative act and to remand the case for new adjudication to the Office. Likewise, under Article 65 of the AJRAA-1, it allegedly has the possibility to carry out a trial, to determine a different state of the facts, and to overturn the decision. The Government is of the opinion that the right to an effective judicial remedy is ensured with the possibility of judicial protection before the Supreme Court. The purpose of single-stage proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts is allegedly to accelerate proceedings and to attain standards of effective competition protection. Lastly, the Government stresses that the execution of the challenged provisions of the PRCA-1 is necessary for the fulfilment of the obligations of the Republic of Slovenia stemming from its membership in the EU, especially the obligation to effectively implement Articles 101 and 102 of the TFEU.

6. On the basis of the second paragraph of Article 28 of the Constitutional Court Act (Official Gazette RS Nos. 64/07 – official consolidated text and 109/12 – hereinafter referred to as the CCA), the Constitutional Court obtained the position of the Office on the request of the Supreme Court.<sup>1</sup> The Office is of the opinion that the addressee of the right to spatial privacy can only be a natural person. The possibility to enter the business premises of a legal entity without a court order, therefore, allegedly does not entail an interference with a human right of the legal entity. When assessing the proportionality of measures it is allegedly necessary to take into consideration that a search of business premises is always conducted in the presence of a person who can have a reasonable expectation of privacy. In the Office's estimation, too broad an interpretation of the right to privacy can supersede each and every possibility of the protection of public order and the rights of others. The protection of competition is allegedly impossible without the possibility to conduct unannounced searches of the premises of companies that violate competition rules. The same allegedly applies to the possibility of accessing company computers and e-mail. Therefore, the Office suggests such an interpretation of Article 37 of the Constitution that the phrase "criminal proceedings" is interpreted more broadly, such that it also includes punitive procedures, which procedures for the protection of competition are. The Office allegedly has always conducted searches of electronic data carriers and of e-mail in such a manner that users had the possibility to delimit private communications from business correspondence. The Office does not concur with the criticisms of the Supreme Court that judicial protection proceedings under the PRCA-1 are not proceedings where the court has full jurisdiction and that therefore there exists an inconsistency with Article 25 of the Constitution. It draws attention to the significant importance of the legal value of the effective competition and to the sophistication of the parties to a competition procedure. The Office does not concur with the position that in order to ensure the effectiveness of the procedure and the protection of the rights of parties, the AJRAA-1 should apply in its entirety in such a procedure. It stresses that in the challenged regulation there are no "exaggerated" limitations of the decision-making of the Supreme Court in proceedings where the court has full jurisdiction – in particular, the prohibition of stating new facts and of proposing new evidence and the exclusion of appeals against judicial decisions allegedly do not entail the exclusion of proceedings where the court has full jurisdiction. In the opinion of the Office, the Supreme Court can carry out a trial and determine, on the basis of the documentation from the file, a different state of the facts. The Supreme Court allegedly adopts a decision on the basis of those facts and evidence on which the Office grounded the decision challenged by the action, and on the basis of the facts and evidence that had been stated or proposed by the parties before the Office's decision was issued. The Office explains in detail how parties to proceedings have enough possibilities to claim facts and propose evidence that benefit them already in the administrative procedure before the Office. The subsequent expansion of such possibilities in judicial proceedings would allegedly transfer the centre of gravity of decision-making in matters concerning the protection of competition to a court.

<sup>1</sup> After this position was adopted, the Agency, which was registered in the register of companies on 31 December 2012, assumed the tasks and authorisations of the Office.

7. The reply of the National Assembly, the opinion of the Government, and the position of the Office were served on the Supreme Court, which announced that it would not reply to them.
8. The companies Unior Kovaška industrija PLC, Zreče and RTC Krvavec PLC, Cerklje na Gorenjskem, otherwise parties to the judicial proceedings that were halted by the Supreme Court due to the filing of the request for a constitutional review, confirmed participation in the Constitutional Court proceedings to decide the request. The participants concur with the arguments of the request and allege that the PRCA-1 permits very intense interferences with the human rights of parties, which in the search procedure and in the judicial proceedings are very limited. They draw attention to the confrontation of the public interest in the protection of efficient competition with the parties' human rights to the inviolability of dwellings, to the protection of the privacy of correspondence and other means of communication, to respect for one's private and family life, and to an effective legal remedy. In their opinion, the search competences of the Agency are very broad and before and during the search there is allegedly no external supervision over their execution. The participants expressly underline that the PRCA-1 permits entry into a residence or other premises and a search thereof without a court order and against the will of the entity subject to search only on the basis of a decision of the Office, therefore, of the executive authority. They claim that the regulation of judicial protection under PRCA-1 interferes with the right of the parties to effective judicial protection. They assess that it would be also sensible in competition protection procedure to ensure judicial protection under the AJRAA-1. The current regulation allegedly does not pass the proportionality test.

B – I

Determination of the Scope of Assessment

9. The Supreme Court claims that it challenges Articles 28 and 29 of the PRCA-1. However, it is evident from the content of the request that in its opinion in the stated provisions the only unconstitutional aspect is that the decision on the basis of which the search of business premises and the examination of business documentation are conducted is adopted by the Agency instead of a court. This is determined by the first sentence of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the PRCA-1, under which the search order regarding a company against which a procedure is being conducted is issued by the Agency. Therefore, the Constitutional Court deemed that the applicant challenges only the first sentence of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the PRCA-1.
10. The applicant claims that it challenges all provisions from Article 54 to Article 61 of the PRCA-1. However, in its request there are no substantiated criticisms that refer to the regulation of the possibility of judicial protection against the decisions and orders of the Agency, to the priority treatment of judicial protection under the PRCA-1, to the limits of the assessment of the challenged acts, and to the regulation of parties' right to review the documents of the case before the court (which is regulated in Articles 55, 58, and 60 of the PRCA-1). Therefore, the Constitutional Court deemed that the applicant only challenges Articles 54, 56, 57, 59, and 61 of the PRCA-1.

11. Even though the Supreme Court challenges a part of the statutory regulation of searches of "companies against which a procedure is being conducted", wherein the notion of a company is defined by the first indent of Article 3 of the PRCA-1 so as to also include natural persons running a sole proprietorship (sole proprietors, freelance professionals),<sup>2</sup> the applicant challenges Article 28 of the PRCA-1 exclusively from the viewpoint of the protection of the human rights of companies – legal entities who are subject to a search. Therefore, the Constitutional Court assessed the criticisms only from such point of view.

B – II

The Right to Privacy

12. The first sentence of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the PRCA-1 determines: "The order on the search of a company against which a procedure is being conducted is issued by the Agency." The applicant claims that the challenged provision is inconsistent with Articles 36 and 37 of the Constitution and with Article 8 of the ECHR. It is of the opinion that these provisions of the Constitution and the ECHR also protect the privacy of legal entities on business premises that are not generally publicly accessible. Therefore, the guarantees determined by the Constitution, among them especially the admissibility of interferences with the rights under the first paragraph of Article 36 and under the first paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution, which are permitted only on the basis of a prior court order, should also apply to procedures under the PRCA-1, which by their nature should be punitive procedures.
13. In Article 35, the Constitution guarantees the inviolability of a person's physical and mental integrity, and the inviolability of his privacy and personality rights. In addition to this general provision on the protection of privacy, it also includes three special provisions which specifically protect the inviolability of dwellings (the first paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution), the privacy of correspondence and other means of communication (the first paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution), and the protection of personal data (the first paragraph of Article 38 of the Constitution).<sup>3</sup>

2 A company is an entity that exercises an economic activity, regardless of its legal form and ownership. An association of sole proprietors that does not directly exercise an economic activity, but influences or could have an influence on the conduct of companies under the first sentence of the mentioned indent on the market is also a company.

3 In Paragraph 19 of the reasoning of Decision No. U-I-272/98, dated 8 May 2003 (Official Gazette RS 48/03, and OdlUS XII, 42), the Constitutional Court stressed that the aspects of privacy that are traditionally protected include the inviolability of dwellings, the privacy of communication, and – in recent times – also the protection of personal data. However, the content of the protected privacy is not exhausted by the three special guarantees mentioned.

The inviolability of dwellings, or the so-called spatial aspect of privacy, and the privacy of correspondence and other means of communication, or the so-called communication aspect of privacy, are thus specifically protected as constitutional values.<sup>4</sup> It is true, as the applicant states, that the Constitutional Court has in its hitherto constitutional case law already taken a position on what content is protected by both the general provision and the mentioned special provisions of the Constitution when natural persons are at issue. However, it has not yet taken a position on the question of whether also legal entities enjoy constitutional protection of privacy.

14. When what is at issue is the protection of natural persons, the Constitutional Court has defined that a human's privacy, the inviolability of which is guaranteed by Article 35 of the Constitution, "refers, in the context of man's existence, to a more or less complete whole of his or her behaviours and involvements, feelings, and relations, for which it is characteristic and essential that the person shapes and maintains it alone or alone with those near to him or her with whom he or she lives in intimate community, for example with a spouse, and that he or she lives in such community with a sense of being protected against intrusion by the public or any other undesired person".<sup>5</sup> The right to privacy of an individual establishes a sphere of his or her own intimate functioning in which he or she is allowed to decide him- or herself which interferences with it he or she will allow. The more the field of the private life of the individual is intimate, the greater legal protection he or she must enjoy. This is even truer when it is admissible that the state or competent state authorities interfere with it. Matters that may not be revealed include personal matters which the individual wishes to keep hidden and which by the nature of the matter or with regard to moral or otherwise established rules of conduct in society have such status (for instance, one's sexual and family life, health status, confidential talks between close persons, and diary entries).<sup>6</sup>
15. The Constitutional Court has also defined the spatial aspect of constitutionally protected privacy. A matter is private also with regard to the space in which it happens. In the framework of the spatial aspect of privacy, an individual is protected from having his or her conduct revealed where he or she justifiably expects to be left undisturbed. His or her dwelling – a residence – is the first but not the only such location. He or she is protected everywhere where he or she, evidently for others, can justifiably expect that he or she will not be exposed to the eyes of the public.<sup>7</sup> A normal and an essential part or aspect of human privacy is one's habitation or domicile; the material environment for a person is usually his or her dwelling, home, or residence. The factual and exclusive authority over the space of the residence and over everything substantial in it is an essential part and condition of residence as a part of human privacy.<sup>8</sup> The Constitutional Court underlined that the subject of protection

---

4 Cf. Paragraphs 40 and 75 of Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-25/95, dated 27 November 1997 (Official Gazette RS No. 5/98, and OdlUS VI, 158).

5 Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-32/94, dated 13 April 1995 (OdlUS IV, 38).

6 Compare with Decision of the Constitutional Court No U-I-272/98, Paragraph 20 of the reasoning.

7 Ibidem and Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-25/95, Paragraph 38 of the reasoning.

8 Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-32/94, Paragraph 12 of the reasoning.

of the right under the first paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution is, proceeding from the purpose of the guarantee, the complete whole of the premises that a person uses as a dwelling, where he or she lives alone or with those nearest and dearest, hidden from the public view, and which he or she only permits persons whom he or she allows a view into the most hidden spheres of his or her life access to. Therefore, such are premises where the person justly expects to be left undisturbed because he or she lives there. Such is the manner the terms “dwelling” and “other premises of another person” under the second paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution are to be interpreted.<sup>9</sup> The Constitutional Court specifically underlined that it is essential for the notions of dwelling and other premises of another person in the sense of the second paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution that it is a complete spatial unit intended and used for living, and hidden from the eyes of the public.<sup>10</sup> It is not the space as such that is protected, but the individual’s privacy in that space. Therefore, what is protected is the residence as a home, as the privacy existing in the living space in which the individual justly expects privacy and regards as his or her living space. The point of such privacy is the purpose of residence in a space where the individual’s private life is developed, while privacy is protected against any interference against the will of the tenant or resident in that space.<sup>11</sup>

16. The right to communication privacy guaranteed by the first paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution represents the “protection of the individual’s interest that the state or uninvited third persons do not learn of the content of a message that he or she transfers via any means that allows remote exchange or transfer of information; just as the individual’s interest in having control and freedom to decide to whom, to what degree, how, and under which conditions he will transmit a certain message”.<sup>12</sup> The subject of protection is free and uncontrolled communication and thus the protection of the confidentiality of relations into which the individual – when communicating – enters.<sup>13</sup> The protection of communication privacy cannot be reduced to only the content of communication, as this right also protects data on how the communication took place, who initiated it, with whom he or she initiated it, and whether it took place at all.<sup>14</sup> It also refers, for instance, to data on phone calls which constitute an integral part of the communication.<sup>15</sup> The statutory regulation of interferences with communication privacy must include detailed instructions that, while

9 Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-430/00, Paragraph 13 of the reasoning.

10 Ibidem, Paragraph 19 of the reasoning.

11 Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-3381/07, dated 4 March 2010 (Official Gazette RS No. 25/10), Paragraph 5 of the reasoning.

12 G. Klemenčič in: L. Šturm (Ed.), Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije, dopolnitev – A [Commentary on the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia: Supplement to the Commentary – A], Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Ljubljana 2011, p. 522.

13 Ibidem.

14 Ibidem, pp. 522–523.

15 See Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-106/05, dated 2 October 2008 (Official Gazette RS No. 100/08, and OdlUS XVII, 84).

taking into consideration the express constitutional requirements, prevent the arbitrariness of state authorities and the misuse of special methods and means. Thus, for instance, when what are at issue are special investigation competences of the police, the categories of persons on whom the police can eavesdrop must be determined, the criminal offences, and the duration of eavesdropping have to be determined more precisely, the procedure under which summaries of verbal communications are handled must be prescribed, the circumstances and conditions for their destruction must be determined, and supervision mechanisms must be arranged.<sup>16</sup>

The Privacy of Legal Entities

17. On the basis of the hitherto constitutional assessments, it is thus possible to clearly conclude that natural persons enjoy the protection of privacy as guaranteed by the general provision of Article 35 of the Constitution as well as the first paragraph of Article 36 and the first paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution in all the stated respects.<sup>17</sup> For the constitutional assessment at hand, however, it is first necessary to answer the question of whether also legal entities enjoy the right to privacy, including its spatial and communication aspects, which in this case are underlined by the applicant. The legal-ethical foundation of modern states which are based on the concept of constitutional democracy, i.e. on the presumption that the authority of the state has to be limited by some fundamental rights and freedoms which belong to a person due to his or her own worth, is respect for human dignity. Human dignity is the highest ethical value and the measure for limiting the functioning of the authority of the state.<sup>18</sup> The constitutional order is thus built on values that fundamentally belong to the individual – the free human being. Also the right to free economic initiative under the first paragraph of Article 74 of the Constitution belongs, as a human right, to the individual. In order to be able to exercise it, he or she also has the right to establish legal entities – economic organisations. However, he or she is not entirely free in that, as in the first sentence of the second paragraph of Article 74 the Constitution authorises the legislature to determine the conditions for establishing economic organisations and thus also their legal form of organisation. A typology of economic subjects regulated by law is necessary for the legal regulation of the market

---

16 See Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-158/95, dated 2 April 1998 (Official Gazette RS Nos. 31/98 and 70/98; OdlUS VII, 56, and OdlUS VII, 194). In Decision No. Up-412/03, dated 8 December 2005 (Official Gazette RS No. 117/05, and OdlUS XIV, 104), the Constitutional Court, modelling itself on the case law of the ECtHR, developed additional criteria regarding the necessary clarity and precision of the legal basis for interfering with communication privacy and with regard to preventing abuses.

17 The right to privacy with all the stated aspects is also protected by the ECHR. In Article 8, which regulates the right to respect for private and family life, it determines that everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home, and his correspondence. With regard to the presented aspects of privacy, the ECHR does not ensure a higher level of protection of the right to privacy than the mentioned constitutional provisions.

18 Cf. Paragraph 6 of the reasoning of Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-109/10, dated 26 September 2011 (Official Gazette RS No. 78/11).

and for the unfolding of legal transactions, and thus for legal certainty.<sup>19</sup> In addition, one of the aspects of the freedom of association determined by the second paragraph of Article 42 of the Constitution is that individuals have the possibility to establish a legal entity in order to enable collective functioning in a field of common interests. An essential integral part of the freedom of association is that the law enables the association to obtain the status of a legal entity. Without this, the freedom of association would often have no sense.<sup>20</sup> Legal entities are thus important also for exercising some rights of natural persons, including their human rights. Therefore, appropriate constitutional protection of legal entities is necessary.

18. Furthermore, developments as regards the establishment and functioning of legal entities have brought us to the point where also legal entities need to be ensured legal protection in some fields where otherwise natural persons are constitutionally protected, whereby such protection of legal entities is, by its nature, developed from the need to protect humans. Therefore, some of the rights that the Constitution guarantees to natural persons as human rights also need to be recognised to legal entities as constitutionally guaranteed rights. However, not because the legal entities and the human rights that they enjoy would constitute an end in themselves, but because the human rights of natural persons are protected through them.<sup>21</sup> Nevertheless, this protection of legal entities first depends on whether individual rights can apply to them with regard to their content and nature. The Constitutional Court has already decided that regarding property issues, legal entities enjoy rights equal to those of natural persons.<sup>22</sup> Likewise, the Constitutional Court has expressed its opinion that legal entities also enjoy constitutional protection under the first paragraph of Article 39 of the Constitution, which protects the right to freedom of expression,<sup>23</sup> protection of the general freedom of action (Article 35 of the Constitution)<sup>24</sup>, protection of constitutional procedural guarantees<sup>25</sup>, and the protection that the Constitution guarantees in Article 33 (private property) and in the first paragraph of Article 74 of the Constitution (free economic initiative).<sup>26</sup>

19 Order of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-49/94, dated 6 October 1994 (OdlUS III, 101).

20 Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-155/07, dated 9 April 2009 (Official Gazette RS No. 32/09, and OdlUS XVIII, 17).

21 Legal entities function through natural persons who act on their behalf and for their account, or to their benefit, thereby even their responsibility for unlawful conduct can only be established through the conduct of natural persons. See Article 4 of the Liability of Legal Entities for Criminal Offences Act (Official Gazette RS Nos. 98/04 – official consolidated text, 65/08, 57/12 – LLECOA). Cf. M. Deisinger, Odgovornost pravnih oseb za kazniva dejanja [Criminal Liability of Legal Entities], GV Založba, Ljubljana 2007, p. 50.

22 Order of the Constitutional Court No. Up-10/93, dated 20 June 1995 (OdlUS IV, 164).

23 Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-141/97, dated 22 November 2001 (Official Gazette RS No. 104/01, and OdlUS X, 193).

24 Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-290/96, dated 11 June 1998 (Official Gazette RS No. 49/98, and OdlUS VII, 124).

25 Order of the Constitutional Court No. Up-199/98, dated 25 March 1999.

26 See, for instance, Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-117/07, dated 21 June 2007 (Official Gazette RS Nos. 38/07 and 58/07, and OdlUS XVI, 64), and No. U-I-189/10, dated 15 March 2012 (Official Gazette RS No. 27/12).

Therefore, the right to free economic initiative, which is guaranteed by the Constitution as a human right of natural persons, also protects legal entities, once adapted to the nature of such right and to the nature of the legal entity at issue. On the constitutional level, we can thus speak of the constitutional protection of legal entities that encompasses – with regard to the above – rights that are adapted in comparison with those that the Constitution guarantees to natural persons as human rights. Therefore, we can speak of the constitutional rights of legal entities.

- 19. The Constitution guarantees equal legal protection to legal entities only with regard to some rights that it otherwise recognises as the human rights of natural persons (for instance, with regard to constitutional procedural guarantees under Article 22 of the Constitution), a lower degree of protection than guaranteed to natural persons regarding some other rights, while legal entities cannot enjoy some rights at all due to the nature of human rights or legal entities. Therefore, it first has to be established – with regard to the above-mentioned aspects – whether a legal entity enjoys to any degree the right to privacy as a constitutional right. If we take into consideration only a literal interpretation of Article 35 of the Constitution, which speaks of the inviolability of a “person’s privacy”, such would indicate that the constitutional protection of privacy is reserved for humans (natural persons).<sup>27</sup> However, the sole literal interpretation of the Constitution does not suffice with regard to what was stated in the previous paragraph. When interpreting constitutional provisions, the Constitutional Court must also take into consideration their intention, as well as the legal nature of these provisions, whereby from the viewpoint of such assessment it is essential whether the individual rights that the Constitution otherwise guarantees to natural persons as human rights can, in light of their nature, apply to legal entities and to what extent. In the case at hand, the Constitutional Court must take a position on the question of whether also legal entities<sup>28</sup> enjoy privacy and especially whether they also enjoy the spatial and communication aspects of privacy. Therefore, it has to take a position on whether legal entities enjoy the constitutional rights under Article 35, the first paragraph of Article 36, and the first paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution.
- 20. Legal entities are an artificial form within the legal order. Their establishment and functioning are derived from the human right to establish legal entities in order for natural persons to exercise their interests. However, it is also important for the existence of legal entities and for the normal performance of their activities for which they were established that they enjoy a certain inner circle that is protected and sheltered to a reasonable extent from outside intrusions. In this circle, members of their human substratum (partners, members, employees, management, etc.) can peacefully carry out the activities directed at the purpose for which the entity was established. The reason for this lies in the tendency to protect organisations (in which individuals associate) from arbitrary interference by state authorities, which is the primary aim of the protection of privacy. It is not possible to imagine how a legal entity could plan its activities and attain its objectives in an undisturbed manner if it did not have the possibility to protect the fact of and data on its activities from (arbitrary) interferences by the state or from interferences by other individuals, or if it was not guaranteed a certain space safe from unwanted intrusions, and the possibility of safe and private communications, including at a distance. Also a legal entity has some functional, personnel, and spatially delimited internal sphere that it can justifiably expect to be protected from the intrusions of third persons who do not belong to the organisational structure of the legal entity. In such sense, also a legal entity enjoys the constitutional right to privacy, even though it is adapted to its nature. This starting point does not entail, however, that a legal entity must enjoy this constitutional right to the same extent as applies to the human rights of natural persons. As legal entities are artificial forms which are constitutionally protected in order for the sphere of individuals' freedom to be widened and protected, the level of their protection can from the outset be lower than for natural persons.

---

<sup>27</sup> The same can also be seen in the second paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution.

<sup>28</sup> In the case at hand, the notion of legal entities entails private law legal entities that can be subject to a search under the PRCA-1, because they can be categorised as “companies” – i.e. subjects who exercise economic activities (see also Paragraph 11 of the reasoning of this Decision). In order to decide in this case, the Constitutional Court namely does not have to adopt a position with regard to other legal entities and especially not with regard to public law legal entities.

The Spatial Privacy of Legal Entities

21. The sphere of privacy of legal entities includes, inter alia, both the spatial aspect (on the business premises on which it exercises its activity) and the communication aspect (the possibility of free and undisturbed communication at a distance on behalf and for the account of the legal entity inside its structure and with the outside world). However, for both aspects the special nature of the legal entity and its functioning has to be taken into consideration. When the spatial aspect is at issue, firstly, it is necessary to distinguish the business premises of the legal entity that are intended to be used by the public with regard to the purpose of its establishment and functioning. On such business premises the legal entity enjoys no privacy at all. In addition, the legal entity also has business premises that are not generally publicly accessible. On those business premises, however, the legal entity does enjoy the constitutional right to privacy,<sup>29</sup> but it has to be realised that such is formed in two layers or circles of privacy in which the expectations of the legal entity to be left undisturbed essentially differentiate. Such is due to the legal nature of legal entities. In the wider, outer circle of this expected privacy, the legal entity cannot expect privacy which in terms of its quality would correspond to the privacy that, under the first paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution, is protected to the highest degree with regard to the spatial aspect of natural persons. In the inner, narrower circle of such privacy, also a legal entity can expect the same constitutional protection of spatial privacy as a natural person.

29 T. Keresteš and M. Repas state that the term dwelling or other premises under the second paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution must be interpreted widely, so as to include also business premises, especially those to which public access is restricted. See T. Keresteš, M. Repas, Nekateri ustavnopravni vidiki pooblastil Urada za varstvo konkurence [Some Constitutional Law Aspects of the Powers of the Competition Protection Office], LeXonomica – Revija za pravo in ekonomijo, year IV, No. 2 (2012), p. 229.

22. The legal entities to which the constitutional assessment at issue applies are established for the purpose of exercising an economic activity. The Constitution expressly prohibits that the economic activity is exercised contrary to the public benefit (the second sentence of the second paragraph of Article 74 of the Constitution), and equally expressly prohibits acts of unfair competition, as well as acts which contrary to law limit competition (the third paragraph of Article 74 of the Constitution). These constitutional prohibitions, which are also the basis for limitations of the right to free economic initiative (the first paragraph of Article 74 of the Constitution), require appropriate action by the legislature. In certain instances, they can be joined by other constitutional requirements, such as the authorisation of the legislature to determine the conditions and manner of exercising economic activity so as to ensure a healthy living environment (the second paragraph of Article 72 of the Constitution). In order for the legislature to be able to apply all the mentioned constitutional authorisations, it does not suffice that it merely regulates the exercise of individual economic activities in accordance with them, but it also has to ensure the effectiveness of such rules in daily life. It can thereby also interfere with other rights that are guaranteed to legal entities. In order to ensure the effectiveness of the stated constitutional authorisations, the legislature can envisage, for instance, inspection supervision, as well as other forms of supervision over the exercise of the activity, and usually, as a general rule, also criminal sanctions for the most undesirable deviations from respect for the rules. It follows therefrom that legal entities cannot expect that the state will not supervise their operations. In order to ensure respect for the mentioned and other constitutional provisions, the state will, if necessary (on the basis of express statutory rules and in a predetermined manner of exercise of the authorisations of the competent state authorities), also enter into the wider sphere of the spatial privacy of legal entities, therefore also on their business premises that are otherwise inaccessible to the public, which, however, are intended for the exercise of their economic activity. Such privacy is not equal to the spatial privacy of natural persons. The wider, outer circle of the legal entity's privacy on its business premises is thus not protected by the first paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution. In it, however, the legal entity does enjoy the general protection of privacy guaranteed by Article 35 of the Constitution. Interferences with this constitutionally protected right are admissible also with regard to a legal entity if such pursue a constitutionally admissible aim and if they are proportionate. Therefore, the measures by which competent state authorities can interfere with the right protected by Article 35 of the Constitution must be determined by law and be consistent with the third paragraph of Article 15 and with Article 2 of the Constitution.
23. The wider circle of privacy of legal entities, in which for the mentioned reasons the legal entity cannot expect that interferences – on the basis of rules which are predetermined by law – will not occur there relatively often, is not comparable with the expectancies of natural persons which are, as a human right, protected by the first paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution. Namely, natural persons are very strongly protected in their residence and on other premises which they perceive as their home and in which they can (except in cases determined by the fifth paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution) always expect to be left undisturbed (see paragraph 15 of this reasoning); this especially applies to interferences by the state with the right to their spatial privacy. The second, third, and fourth paragraphs of Article 36 of the Constitution are specifically intended for such protection. Therefore, the Constitution already protects natural persons from any interference with this expected field of spatial privacy with the express requirement of a prior court order, which is required just to enter the residence itself, not merely for a search thereof (the second paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution). With regard to the above, by itself, entry onto the business premises (and visual inspection of the premises without opening hidden compartments and without the seizure of objects and equipment to be found in these hidden compartments) by, for instance, an inspector exercising his competence, cannot be regarded as an interference with the right of the legal entity protected by the first paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution, despite the fact that these premises are otherwise not accessible to the public. In this part, therefore, with regard to their nature, the purpose of their establishment and functioning, and the fact that they cannot expect that the state will not supervise the conduct of business activities in conformity with the stated constitutional requirements, legal entities do not enjoy the same level of constitutional protection as natural persons do. For this reason, it is also not necessary that they are protected from interferences with their privacy from the spatial perspective in the same manner as are natural persons.

24. However, it has to be realised at the same time that even with regard to the legal entity there exists a narrower sphere of its spatial privacy in which it can expect – regardless of the above facts – that there will be no interferences with it. In that sphere even the legal entity can expect to be left undisturbed, which must also apply to [potential interferences by] the state. Therefore, in this part also the legal entity does have the constitutional right to spatial privacy determined by the first paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution. Interferences with that narrower sphere of privacy of the legal entity are by their nature connected with the high intensity of the interference, which is reflected in such authorisations of the competent state authority that they correspond to the content of the term “search” from the second paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution. Then, it no longer concerns – for instance – the personnel of the legal entity being obliged to allow a certain limited inspection of the premises, but authorisations on the basis of which authorised persons of competent state authorities can, against the will of the legal entity,<sup>30</sup> execute a thorough search of the business premises, including the hidden compartments thereof.<sup>31</sup> Such a search is conducted for the purpose of obtaining data and seizing documents and other media on the basis of which competent officials can evaluate whether the legal entity conforms to the legal rules which the legislature enacted for the purpose of ensuring the effectiveness of constitutional prohibitions regarding the exercise of economic activities. In this manner, an interference with the privacy of a legal entity passes from the wider into the narrower sphere of its privacy, which is protected as a constitutional right of the legal entity by the first paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution. Therefore, an interference with this constitutional right is only admissible on the basis of a prior court order as required by the second paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution. In this regard, the privacy of the legal entity – with regard to the need for constitutional protection against intrusions – namely matches that level of expected spatial privacy that is essentially guaranteed by the first paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution to natural persons. In such manner, it depends, above all, on the content and the intensity of the authorisations of the state authority whether an interference resulting from such authorisations entails an interference with the right of the legal entity protected by the first paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution, for the admissibility of which, except in the instances determined by the fifth paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution, a prior court order is required.

30 The free and uncoerced consent of a legal entity to a search of any degree of thoroughness, i.e. voluntarily enabling an examination and the submission of confidential documents of any degree excludes the obligation to fulfil the requirements under the second to fourth paragraphs of Article 36 of the Constitution.

31 The inspection of data saved on some information-communication media always entails, in this sense, the inspection of a “hidden compartment”, even though such media is, for instance, easily accessible and visible during a simple visual inspection of the premises of the legal entity.

25. The ECHR does not contain a special provision regarding the spatial aspect of privacy, as such is protected by the general provision of the first paragraph of Article 8 of the ECHR. However, it also proceeds from the case law of the ECtHR that the term “home” in the mentioned provision of the ECHR in certain circumstances also includes the right to respect for the registered office of the company, of a branch thereof, or other business premises.<sup>32</sup> The second paragraph of Article 8 of the ECHR, which determines under which conditions interferences with the right determined by the first paragraph of that Article are admissible, does not otherwise specifically require a prior court order.<sup>33</sup> However, in instances in which, with regard to the circumstances of the case, it is necessary to recognise the spatial aspect of the right under the first paragraph of Article 8 of the ECHR to a legal entity, the ECtHR has also in-32 See, for instance, the Judgment of the ECtHR in the case Société Colas Est and others v. France, paragraphs 40 and 41.

---

33 With regard to the mentioned right, the ECtHR stressed that an interference therewith is only admissible if:

- (a) it is in accordance with the law, which entails that it has an appropriate basis in the domestic law, which must be accessible and predictable in the sense that its provisions are sufficiently detailed, clear, and precise for the citizens to understand under which conditions and in which circumstances the state authorities can exercise the measure at issue, while the national law must, in conformity with the principle of the rule of law, include appropriate and efficient safeguards against arbitrary interferences and abuses;
- (b) there exists one of the legitimate aims under the second paragraph of Article 8 of the ECHR; and
- (c) it is necessary in a democratic society. In the framework of the last criterion, the ECtHR assesses whether the measure corresponds to a pressing social need and if there exists proportionality between the measure and its legitimate aim. The reasons for the admissibility of the measure under the second paragraph of Article 8 of the ECHR must be interpreted narrowly and in every individual case it must be convincingly determined whether the measure is necessary. See, for instance, the decisions of the ECtHR in Chappell v. United Kingdom, dated 30 March 1989, Petri Sallinen and others v. Finland, dated 27 September 2005, and Buck v. Germany, dated 28 April 2005.

troduced the requirement of a prior court order as one of the conditions for ensuring the proportionality of a measure when such measure is very intense. Nonetheless, at the same time it allowed that interferences with this right with regard to legal entities can be more intense than with regard to natural persons.<sup>34</sup> In such a manner, we can realise that in instances when the competent state authorities intensely interfere with the narrowest protected circle of the spatial aspect of a legal entity's privacy by exercising statutorily determined authorisations, an essentially equal level of protection of the constitutional right to the spatial aspect of the privacy of the legal entity – from the viewpoint of the requirement of a prior court order before the search – is guaranteed by both the Constitution (the second paragraph of Article 36) and by the ECHR (Article 8). Therefore, in the case at issue, the constitutional assessment has to be conducted from the viewpoint of the Constitution.

The Communication Privacy of Legal Entities

26. In addition to Article 35 of the Constitution, it is especially the first paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution that protects the communication aspect of privacy. Also when legal entities are at issue there are communications at a distance that the legal entity can regard as confidential – and with regard to which it is entitled to expect privacy. Therefore, also legal entities are entitled to protection under the first paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution and thus, in instances when they do not wish to disclose their communications at a distance, to claim protection of their communication privacy. Also the ECtHR in its case law has broadened the protection under the first paragraph of Article 8 of the ECHR to include legal entities with regard to electronic data in a computer system which fall under the term “correspondence” from the Convention.<sup>35</sup> The second paragraph of Article 8 of the ECHR allows the limitation of all aspects of the right to privacy when such is determined by law and necessary in a democratic society due to the security of the state, public safety, or the economic welfare of the state, in order for disorder or crime to be prevented, for the 34 See the Judgment in Société Colas Est and others v. France, paragraph 49. In that case, an extensive search of the business premises of 56 companies was conducted and the investigators of the National Investigation Agency (the authority was a part of the executive branch of power) seized a couple of thousand documents. Subsequently, another extensive search was conducted. The investigators entered the business premises without the consent of the companies' management and (which was then permitted by the law) without a prior court order. On the basis of the materials collected, procedures against the complainants before the competition regulator were later initiated due to the suspicion of a violation of competition rules, which concluded with the imposition of fines, which the courts upheld (with the exception of a change in the amount of certain fines). The ECtHR concluded that the actions of the investigators, due to the manner they were conducted (a detailed, far-reaching, and burdensome search of an extensive number of premises), fulfilled the elements of an interference with the complainants' home (domicile). The legislation and the practice did not offer appropriate and efficient safeguards against abuses. The executive authority namely had very extensive authorisations and exclusive competence to determine the necessity, number, length, and scope of searches. In addition, the searches were conducted without a prior court order and without the presence of a high ranking police officer. Due to the disproportionate measure, the complainants' right under Article 8 of the ECHR was violated.

35 See the ECtHR Judgment in Wieser and Bicos Beteiligungen GmbH v. Austria, dated 16 October 2007, paragraph 45.

protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of other people. It can be therefore stated that from the viewpoint of the ECHR, interferences with the right to privacy protected by Article 8 of the ECHR are admissible from all the aspects from which limitations of constitutional rights are admissible also in the Slovene legal order (the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution).

27. The second paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution contains in this regard a somewhat different provision than the ECHR and states that a law can prescribe “that on the basis of a court order, the protection of the privacy of correspondence and other means of communication and the inviolability of personal privacy [may] be suspended for a set time where such is necessary for the institution or course of criminal proceedings or for reasons of national security.” If the Constitution did not contain the stated provision, interferences with this right would be possible under the same conditions as are generally determined for limiting rights. This, however, would not entail that a prior court order is not necessary for interferences with this constitutional right of legal entities, as the Constitutional Court has already adopted the position that in cases of the most serious interferences with the right to privacy (with regard to an interference with Article 35 of the Constitution), the requirement of a court order already proceeds from the principle of proportionality.<sup>36</sup> However, by the second paragraph of Article 37, the Constitution delimits the possibility to interfere with the right to communication privacy also from the viewpoint of the possible aims that the statutory regulation pursues. In the instances that it determines, it namely allows its limitation only when such is urgent for the initiation or course of criminal proceedings, or for the security of the state. It does not allow, however, the legislature to determine different aims of such interferences with the right to communication privacy, such as the economic welfare of the state, which is expressly stated among the aims in the second paragraph of Article 8 of the ECHR. Whenever the standards of protection of a particular right enshrined by the Constitution are stricter than those in a treaty, which is what the ECHR is, the Constitutional Court must base its decision on constitutional rules.
28. The notion of the security of the state can be interpreted as including both state and public safety. The question is, however, what is included under the constitutional meaning of the term “criminal proceedings”. The sole literal interpretation of the second paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution would lead to an interpretation that by the use of this term the constitution-framer envisaged only what, with regard to the respective positive law, is punished as a criminal offence. It is also true that the provisions that are the basis for limiting constitutional rights cannot be interpreted widely. When they are interpreted, however, their content and purpose have to be taken into consideration and, in the assessment of the case at hand, also the nature of legal entities. The second paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution limits the aims due to which it is admissible to interfere with communication privacy, but the content of these aims entails the protection of other constitutional values, and possibly also of human rights. The goals of such protection cannot be reached if they are always interpreted restrictively. When the constitution-framer defined the constitutionally admissible aims, it undoubtedly wanted to protect some values which in certain social circumstances would be assessed to also require protection under criminal law – which entails that an interference with the right to communication privacy is admissible, but only on the basis of a prior court order. When legal entities are at issue, the legislature does not necessarily achieve such objective only by defining criminal offences, but possibly also by defining other socially highly dangerous conduct which it penalises as minor offence when such is, by its nature and by the severity of the sanctions which are imposed for it, comparable to criminal offences. The fines prescribed for legal entities for minor offences are in certain instances even higher than the fines prescribed for criminal offences. Therefore, the starting point on the basis of which the Constitutional Court has already interpreted the term “criminal offence”, which is used in the Constitution, with regard to the content of proscribed conduct and the weight of the prescribed sanction can be used so that the constitutional provisions that refer to it also apply for minor offences.<sup>37</sup> When legal entities are at issue, it depends primarily on whether what is at issue is forbidden conduct which by its nature and weight is comparable with a criminal offence for the term “criminal proceedings” determined by the second paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution to also possibly apply to such. The term criminal proceedings in this constitutional provision is, when the communication privacy of legal entities is at issue, therefore not connected only to criminal proceedings as such are established in positive law. This term entails, constitutionally speaking, proceedings which are carried out in order to ensure the protection of individual values which due to their high social importance must be highly protected. Such is also reflected in the fact that these values are also protected by means of punitive law, which in the stated framework can also include minor offences.

---

36 Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-272/98, Paragraph 37 of the reasoning. The Constitutional Court reiterated such position in Paragraph 23 of the reasoning of Decision No. Up-1293/08, dated 6 July 2011 (Official Gazette RS No. 60/11).

29. All of the above means that when assessing the admissibility of an interference with the constitutional right of legal entities to communication privacy under the first paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution it first has to be assessed whether such interference pursues a constitutionally admissible aim under the second paragraph of the mentioned constitutional provision. If it does, the interference can only be admissible on the basis of a court order, which is specifically required by the second paragraph of Article 37. Such constitutional requirement must also apply to legal entities. With a prior court order, the arbitrary conduct of the state power and its possible misuse are namely prevented. As was already mentioned in Paragraph 20 of the reasoning of this Decision, also legal entities must be protected from such actions. With regard to the fact that communication privacy is more strictly protected by Article 37 of the Constitution than by Article 8 of the ECHR, the constitutional assessment also from this point of view has to be conducted on the basis of the Constitution and not on the basis of the ECHR.

37 In Decision No. Up-120/97, dated 18 March 1999 (Official Gazette RS No. 31/99, and OdlUS VIII, 126), the Constitutional Court adopted the position that “also a defendant in minor offence proceedings must be ensured the fundamental guarantees of fair trial, however the level of ensured rights can be, in instances of less serious violations, lower than that guaranteed in criminal proceedings”. The criterion for the assessment whether in minor offence proceedings a fair trial was ensured to the defendant is the guarantee of the equal protection of rights under Article 22 of the Constitution in conjunction with Article 29 of the Constitution on legal guarantees in criminal proceedings (The Constitutional Court held the same in Decision No. U-I-295/05, dated 19 June 2008, Official Gazette RS No. 73/08, and OdlUS XVII, 44). With regard to the constitutional requirement for lex certa for minor offences, see, e.g., Decision No. Up-456/10, U-I-89/10, dated 24 February 2011 (Official Gazette RS No. 26/11).

B – III

Assessment of the First Sentence of the First Paragraph of Article 28 of the PRCA-1

a) The Challenged Regulation

30. The challenged provision of the PRCA-1 is placed in Section 3 of Chapter 2 of Part V of the PRCA-1, whose title is The Search Procedure. The PRCA-1 otherwise regulates restrictive conduct, concentrations of companies, authoritarian limitations of competition and measures for preventing restrictive conduct, and concentrations that substantially limit efficient competition when they have or can have an effect in the territory of the Republic of Slovenia (the first paragraph of Article 1 of the PRCA-1). The PRCA-1 applies, in conformity with Council Regulation (EC) No. 1/2003 of 16 December 2002 on the implementation of the rules on competition laid down in Articles 81 and 82 of the Treaty (OJ L 1, 4 January 2003 – hereinafter referred to as Regulation 1/2003), also to violations of Articles 101 and 102 of the TFEU<sup>38</sup> (the second paragraph of Article 4 of the PRCA-1).<sup>39</sup> The Agency is namely not competent only to exercise control over the implementation of the PRCA-1, but also to exercise control over respect for both of the mentioned Articles of the TFEU (the first paragraph of Article 12 of the PRCA-1). The search procedure is a part of the procedure regarding restrictive conduct (i.e. restrictive agreements and abuses of a dominant position), which are otherwise defined in Articles 6 to 9 of the PRCA-1 and by Articles 101 and 102 of the TFEU. The Agency can namely issue an order on the initiation of the procedure ex officio when it discovers circumstances that indicate the probability of a violation of either Articles 6 or 9 of the PRCA-1, or Articles 101 or 102 of the TFEU (Article 23 of the PRCA-1). In the search procedure, which is intended for determining the existence of restrictive conduct, the Agency has at its disposal multiple investigation instruments. In addition to the request to convey data under Article 27 of the PRCA-1, the most important instrument is precisely the search of the company against which the procedure is being conducted, which is de-38 Due to the fact that the text of PRCA-1, which literally reads “Articles 81 and 82 of the Treaty establishing the European Community”, is to be (everywhere) interpreted after the entry into force of the TFEU.

---

39 Article 2 of the PRCA-1 determines that the PRCA-1 regulates the procedure and competence regarding the implementation of Regulation No. 1/2003 and Council Regulation (ES) No. 139/2004 of 20 January 2004 on the control of concentrations between undertakings (OJ L 24, 29 January 2004 – Regulation No. 139/2004).

terminated especially in Articles 28 and 29 of the PRCA-1. The search is the main tool for uncovering evidence connected with the most serious violations of competition law, such as trusts and abuses of a dominant position.<sup>40</sup> Numerous provisions of the PRCA-1 on the search procedure with regard to restrictive conduct – including Articles 28 and 29 of the PRCA-1 – are applied mutatis mutandis also for the procedure with regard to concentrations (see Articles 47 to 49 of the PRCA-1).

31. Article 28 of the PRCA-1 determines that the Agency issue an order to search the company<sup>41</sup> against which the procedure is being conducted.<sup>42</sup> In addition, it determines the obligatory components of the search order (the subject and the purpose of the search, the date of the beginning of the search, the name of the authorised person who will lead the search, the scope of the authorisations of the Agency, and a warning stating the prescribed fine for declining to cooperate or obstructing the search), the manner of it being served on the company (at the beginning of conducting the search, possibly together with the serving of the order on the initiation of the procedure) and that there exists no direct judicial remedy against such order.<sup>43</sup> The search of business premises and residences of “third party” natural persons or legal entities (regarding a company against which the procedure is not being conducted or in the residences of members of the managing or supervisory body, employees, or other associates of a company against which the procedure is not being conducted), however, cannot be ordered by the Agency itself, as it has to obtain, in conformity with the first paragraph of Article 33 of the PRCA-1, an order issued by the competent court.

b) Authorisations of the Agency

32. Article 29 of the PRCA-1 determines who and when can conduct a search and, above all, enumerates the competences of the competent persons who are to conduct the search. The competent persons can conduct the search also against the will of the company (the fourth paragraph of Article 29 of the PRCA-1),<sup>44</sup> with regard to which 40 T. Bratina in: P. Grilc (Ed.), Zakon o preprečevanju omejevanja konkurence (ZPOmK-1) s komentarjem [The Prevention of Restriction of Competition Act with Commentary], GV Založba, Ljubljana 2009, p. 314.

41 With regard to the first indent of the second paragraph of Article 29 of the PRCA-1, a search can be carried out in the registered office of the company against which the procedure is being conducted and in other places where this company carries out the activity and business from which there arises the probability of a violation of competition rules. The same as applies to a company against which the procedure is being conducted also applies to a company operating under its authority.

42 The supervision procedure is initiated by a special order (Article 23 of the PRCA-1), which under the first paragraph of Article 24 of the PRCA-1 includes a description of the conduct which is the reason for the initiation of the procedure, the statement of the provisions of the Act for which the probability of a violation has been demonstrated, and the substantiation of the reasons for the initiation of the procedure.

43 The search order can be challenged in judicial protection proceedings against the decision of the Agency (the second indent of the third paragraph of Article 55 of the PRCA-1).

44 If a company disallows entry onto its premises, obstructs it, or disallows access to its business books or other documentation, obstructs such, in any other way obstructs the search, or if such is justifiably expected, an authorised person can enter the premises or access the business books or other documentation against the company's will with the assistance of the police (the first paragraph of Article 31 of the PRCA-1). The second they may enter and inspect premises, plots of land, and means of transport, inspect books and other business documentation regardless of the media carrying data, seize or obtain copies or summaries from books and other documentation in whatever form, seal all business premises, books, and other documentation for the period of the of investigation, seize objects and documents for a limited period of time, request oral and written explanations from the representatives and employees of the company with regard to the subject and the purpose of the search, inspect documents by means of which the identity of persons can be established, and conduct other actions which are in line with the aim of the search. The only thing excluded from the search is communication between the company against which the investigation is being conducted and its legal counsellor, insofar as such refers to this procedure. Article 32 of the PRCA-1 regulates a special procedure for resolving any dispute between the Agency and the company with regard to the existence of such privileged communication, in which the Administrative Court decides.

33. For the regulation of the search of a company against which the procedure is being conducted which is ordered independently by the Agency, which is not a court, wide and intense authorisations of the Agency are typical. There is no hierarchy among the acts of investigation and the Agency can freely choose among them, and, in conformity with the search order, apply one or more of the statutory measures. It is admissible to inspect premises that are (in any manner) connected with the activity and business from which there arises the probability of a violation of competition law. It is not necessary that in the search order it is precisely determined which documents the authorised persons wish to inspect, as often even the Agency cannot know what documents the company has. Authorised persons have the right to actively seek potentially relevant documents on the searched premises.<sup>45</sup> It is evident from the intention of the legislature to give the Agency efficient and sufficient authorisations so that the Agency may, by force, enter the premises of a company which are not freely publicly accessible, at its registered office or at some other location (a branch, an office, etc.), and inspect such premises, i.e. open closets, drawers, safes, closed boxes, and do everything necessary to achieve the aim of the search. The Agency may also review business books and other documents which concern the functioning of the company, regardless of the type of media which carry such data, and make copies or summaries (which also applies to business letters, e-mails, and SMSs stored on a computer or on a telephone, and to various other forms of communication saved in information systems of the company or accessible therefrom, etc.). The search authorisations of the Agency are thus such that the Agency has, on their basis, the possibility to inspect the whole internal sphere of the company, so that nothing remains hidden from those searching. This exceeds the viewing and acquisition of documents which the legal entity must – already on the basis of numerous statutory provisions – submit to competent state authorities when such exercise supervision over its op-to fifth paragraphs of Article 31 of the PRCA-1 prescribe high fines for obstructing and preventing a search.

---

45 T. Bratina, M. Kocmut in: P. Grilc (Ed.), op. cit., pp. 325–328.

erations. Furthermore, the Agency independently decides on the number of searches necessary and which premises of the company are to be searched.

34. A search is possible whenever there exists a suspicion of restrictive conduct as determined in the PRCA-1. It is, however, not possible to conduct a search before the supervision procedure is initiated against the company. For such, it is required that the Agency discovers circumstances from which there arises the “probability of a violation” of either Articles 6 or 9 of the PRCA-1, or Article 101 or 102 of the TFEU (Article 23 of the PRCA-1). In addition, the first indent of the second paragraph of Article 29 of the PRCA-1 determines that a search is to be carried out where the company exercises its activities and business from which there arises the “probability of a violation”. This provision is to be interpreted so that the search is carried out where it is probable that it will be possible to find appropriate evidence of a violation.<sup>46</sup> By conducting a search determined in Articles 28 and 29 of the PRCA-1 it is possible to gather data which allow the discovery and limitation of restrictive conduct. It is reasonable to expect that evidence of the existence of restrictive conduct and abuse of a dominant position are concealed on such premises which are inaccessible to the public, and in the written and electronic documentation of the company.

c) The Legal Nature of the Procedure before the Agency

35. The applicant and the Agency claim that the procedure in which the stated authorisations of the Agency are exercised is, by its nature, a punitive procedure. In fact, the PRCA-1 regulates two different kinds of procedures regarding the assessment of violations of competition law. On one hand, it regulates such procedures as were conducted in cases in which the Supreme Court halted the proceedings and requested an assessment of the constitutionality of a law and which are in their entirety held under the provisions of the PRCA-1, and on the other hand, procedures on minor offences which are carried out under the provisions of Part VIII of the Act in conformity with the MOA-1, while the PRCA-1 includes only a few special provisions on these minor offence procedures. On this basis it would be possible to assume that the procedures for determining violations of competition law which are carried out in their entirety under the PRCA-1 are not, by their nature, punitive procedures.<sup>47</sup> It would be possible to qualify them as special procedures for supervising the conduct of subjects on the market, which are conducted by a specialised authority, i.e. the Agency. At the same time, however, it has to 46 In addition to the above mentioned, the PRCA-1 must be interpreted (consistently with the Constitution) so that it is not admissible to order and conduct a search if the relevant information can be obtained in a less severe manner, especially by means of a request to transfer information under Article 27 of the PRCA-1.

47 The Constitutional Court has already stressed that not every definition of prohibited conduct and sanctions for violating such prohibition can be regarded as defining criminal offences – such would require that the substantive guarantees that the Constitution specifically determines for criminal offences be fulfilled. Likewise, decision-making on the imposition of sanctions for violations of these prohibitions cannot always be regarded as criminal proceedings in which, therefore, all the constitutional procedural guarantees that specifically refer to criminal proceedings would have to be fulfilled (see Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-145/03, dated 23 June 2005, Official Gazette RS No. 69/05, and OdlUS XIV, 62).

be realised that under the first paragraph of Article 12 of the PRCA-1, the Agency is competent to exercise control over the execution of the PRCA-1 and of “Articles 81 and 82 of the Treaty Establishing the European Community” (now Articles 101 and 102 of the TFEU), and that the Agency is, under the second paragraph of Article 12 of the PRCA-1, also a minor offence authority which decides on minor offences due to violations of the provisions of the PRCA-1 and the TFEU. As a minor offence authority, the Agency has no discretion over the initiation of minor offence procedures, but it has to carry out, in instances when it determines the existence of the elements of a minor offence, also the minor offence procedure. The data gathered on the basis of the search order will thus regularly be used in two procedures before the same authority which deal with the same state of the facts, even though they are different in terms of their legal nature.<sup>48</sup>

36. The supervisory authorisations of the Agency are directed towards remedying the unconstitutional situation and towards the reestablishment of the compliance of the market with the rules on competition. In its procedure for assessing restrictive conduct, the Agency determines ex officio the existence of a violation of the prohibition of concluding restrictive agreements and a violation of the prohibition of the abuse of a dominant position (Article 23 of the PRCA-1), and it also conducts procedures regarding assessments of concentrations (Article 11 of the PRCA-1). In the supervision procedure, the Agency enjoys wide authorisations, as it has the power to determine, by a decision, the existence of a violation of the prohibition of concluding restrictive agreements or a violation of the prohibition of the abuse of a dominant position, and to demand that the company cease such violation. It also may impose on the company measures which it considers suitable for remedying the stated violation and its consequences, it can accept commitments voluntarily proposed by the company for remedying the unlawful situation (Articles 37 and 39 of the PRCA-1), and it may also prohibit concentrations inconsistent with competition rules, demand that the effects of unconstitutional concentrations be remedied, and adopt proposed corrective measures which can eliminate the serious suspicion regarding the compliance of the concentration with competition rules (Articles 50, 51, and 53 of the PRCA-1). In the valid statutory regulation, the supervision procedure under the PRCA-1 is thus, in itself, essentially not regulated as a punitive procedure. Supervision over the legality of the decision-making of the Agency in this procedure is granted to the Supreme Court (Article 56 of the PRCA-1), which decides in special judicial proceedings in which the provisions of the Act regulating proceedings for the judicial review of administrative acts apply mutatis mutandis insofar as the PRCA-1 itself does not contain certain special provisions that regulate those proceedings differently.
37. In the minor offence procedure, the Agency imposes a fine as a repressive measure for general, special-preventive, and retributive purposes (therefore, it is a punitive sanction). The amount of the fine that it may impose is high. In minor offence procedures, 48 For instance, from the first and second indent of the first paragraph of Article 73 of the PRCA-1 it proceeds that the conclusion of a restrictive agreement and the abuse of a dominant position, therefore restrictive conduct under Articles 6 and 9 of the PRCA-1, also constitute minor offences.

---

judicial control, which includes a request for judicial protection before the competent court, under the provisions of the MOA-1, is guaranteed against the decisions of the Agency. It seems that the supervision procedure and the minor offence procedure under the PRCA-1 are formally separated procedures. However, they are both conducted by the same authority (the Agency), they refer to the same state of the facts,<sup>49</sup> and evidence acquired in the search procedure (also on the basis of the search order), which is a phase of the supervision procedure, will also regularly and expectedly be used in the minor offence procedure.<sup>50</sup> Moreover, they may even find their way into criminal proceedings.<sup>51</sup> In instances where the Agency, when exercising its authorisations under Article 29 of the PRCA-1, also establishes elements of a minor offence, the search will thus continue in the minor offence procedure – therefore in a punitive procedure – and the evidence acquired therein will possibly even serve as the basis for initiating criminal proceedings. Therefore, it is not that relevant whether the procedure which the applicant halted before having filed the request is in itself a punitive procedure<sup>52</sup> – what is decisive is that the data and evidence acquired in the search conducted on the basis of the authorisations under Article 29 of the PRCA-1 will subsequently serve as the basis of all the stated procedures. Most often this will be the minor offence procedure which is carried out ex officio by the Agency. Therefore, the stated authorisations of the Agency are to be interpreted as authorisations given to a state authority in order to carry out a punitive procedure and, with regard to the possible reuse of the acquired evidence in the criminal proceedings before the competent court, also to conduct criminal proceedings. Efficient execution of the supervision procedure under the PRCA-1 during the search is namely also a necessary condition for successfully imposing sanctions on the legal entity which by violating competition rules committed a minor offence<sup>53</sup> and possibly also a criminal offence.<sup>54</sup>

49 See the preceding note.

50 As a general rule, the supervision procedure precedes the minor offence procedure. Extensive data on the functioning of the company are gathered therein and the company is thereby also warned that the public authority is seeking evidence of its unlawful conduct. If such evidence is subsequently not used in the minor offence procedure, it is difficult to imagine how the Agency would obtain equivalent (or any) evidence that would be sufficient for the imposition of a punitive sanction.

51 In Article 225, the Penal Code (Official Gazette RS No. 51/12 – official consolidated text – PC-1) regulates the criminal offence of the unlawful restriction of competition that is committed by whoever, contrary to the rules that regulate the protection of competition, violates, while exercising a business activity, the prohibition of restrictive agreements between companies, abuses the dominant position of one or more companies, or creates a prohibited concentration of companies and thus prevents or significantly distorts competition in the Republic of Slovenia or on the EU market or on a significant part thereof, or significantly influences trade between Member States which results in a significant pecuniary advantage for such company or companies or in a significant pecuniary loss for another company.

52 With regard to the current legal regulation presented, this is not a punitive procedure, despite the allegation of the applicant to the contrary.

53 These minor offences are comparatively distinctly grave and serious, which is reflected in the prescribed fines under Articles 73 and 74 of the PRCA-1.

54 The Constitutional Court has, for instance with regard to the privilege against self-incrimination, in Decision

d) Assessment of Consistency with the Constitutional Rights to Spatial and Communication Privacy

38. As is regulated by Articles 28 and 29 of the PRCA-1, the search corresponds in terms of its content to the notion of a search as is referred to by the Constitution in the second paragraph of Article 36. Such a search represents an invasive interference with the right of the companies against which the procedure under the first paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution is being conducted. With regard to the intensity of the search, it entails an interference with the narrowest sphere of the right to spatial privacy. Therefore, the constitutional requirement of a prior court order under the second paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution must apply in order to limit the search. With regard to the authorisation of the Agency to also search all data carriers and communication contained therein, the search also entails an interference with the right of companies determined by the first paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution. Therefore, the challenged regulation entails an interference with the rights that protect the spatial and communication aspect of the privacy of legal entities. At this point it is necessary to again draw attention (see Paragraphs 17 and 20 of the reasoning of this Decision) to the fact that even though these constitutional rights of legal entities are protected by the Constitution, they are protected less intensely than the privacy of natural persons. The constitution-framer did not make use of this value-based starting point under Articles 36 and 37 of the Constitution to set milder fundamental formal conditions for interferences of the state with these two constitutional rights of legal entities. A lower degree of protection of legal entities could thus be reflected – in comparison with natural persons – especially in milder conditions for ordering the measure (with regard to the degree of suspicion, reasons for the measure, etc.) both on the abstract level and in concrete procedures, in the possibility to order more invasive and lengthy measures, etc. Such lowering of such constitutional protection cannot, however, be reflected in dispensing with the requirement of a court order – especially because of the purpose due to which this constitutional requirement was set. The purpose of prior authorisation, adopted by an independent and unbiased court, to interfere with this constitutional right is, as was underlined above (see Paragraph 29 of the reasoning of this Decision), to prevent abuses and to ensure respect for the equal legal treatment of all subjects. Also legal entities must be protected from arbitrary interferences by the state.
39. The Constitution envisages the court order as one of the conditions for the admissibility of both interferences whereby the only admissible exception therefrom is determined by the fifth paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution.<sup>55</sup> The first sentence

---

No. Up-1293/08 already adopted the position that its scope encompasses all the procedures in which de facto a criminal investigation is conducted under the guise of an inspection or supervision procedure and procedures in which the activity of officials is directed towards collecting data for subsequent criminal proceedings.

- 55 The stated constitutional provision allows that a law determine the detailed conditions under which an official may enter the dwelling of another person or other premises and in such place exceptionally without the presence of witnesses conduct a search, if such is absolutely necessary for the direct apprehension of a person who has committed a criminal offence or to protect people or property.

of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the PRCA-1 is not a statutory provision which under this authorisation of the constitution-framer would regulate the conditions for the urgent arrest of criminal offenders and for protecting people and property in dwellings and on other premises of other persons in a more detailed manner. Therefore, the fifth paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution is not relevant for the constitutional review in the case at hand. What is decisive is that the first paragraph of Article 28 of the PRCA-1 determines that the measures which interfere with the spatial privacy of companies are ordered by the Agency, not a court, including when such measures are ordered and executed against the will of legal entities.<sup>56</sup> This is inconsistent with the express requirement under the second paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution, which requires a prior court order in such instances. When exercising these authorisations, the Agency will – by the nature of the matter and with regard to the degree of their invasiveness which allows the Agency to conduct a complete search of business premises and the objects thereon – also interfere with the narrower circle of the spatial privacy of the legal entity. Therefore, it is necessary to concur with the applicant that the challenged provision, inadmissibly and inconsistently with the second paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution, limits the constitutional right determined by the first paragraph of Article 36 of the Constitution and is thus inconsistent therewith.

40. The challenged statutory provision also allows interferences by authorised persons with the right that is guaranteed also to legal entities by the first paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution. With regard to what is stated in Paragraphs 27 and 36 of the reasoning of this Decision, it is necessary to realise that interferences with that right by the exercise of the authorisations of the Agency determined by Article 29 of the PRCA-1 pursue a constitutionally admissible aim. Under the notion of criminal proceedings under the second paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution, it is namely possible to also include, on the basis of the reasons stated in the mentioned paragraphs of the reasoning of this Decision, the procedure which the Agency conducts during the search, the constitutional admissibility of which is the subject of this review. However, the regulation that allows the Agency to carry out a search without a prior court order, which is expressly required by the second paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution when interferences with communication privacy are at issue, is inconsistent with the stated provision and thus also with the right under the first paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution.

e) Determination of the Unconstitutionality and the Manner of the Implementation of the Decision

41. Under the challenged statutory provision, it is admissible for the Agency, by exercising the authorisations under Article 29 of the PRCA-1, to interfere with the spa-

56 If a company disallows entry onto its premises, obstructs such, or disallows access to its business books or other documentation, obstructs such, obstructs the search in any other way, or if such is justifiably expected, the Agency can enter the premises or access business books or other documentation against the company's will with the assistance of the police. The costs of the entry or access and possible damage are to be covered by the company (the first paragraph of Article 31 of the PRCA-1).

tial and communication privacy of a legal entity without having, regarding such measures against the will of the legal entity, the prior authorisation of the judicial authority. With regard to the statutory regulation of such measures, the legislature could, in conformity with the positions in this Decision, determine some lower standards for the protection of the constitutional rights to privacy of legal entities (see Paragraph 38 of the reasoning of this Decision), but it would thereby have to take into consideration that in instances where the search interferes with the spatial and communication privacy of legal entities against their will, it should not dispense with the requirement of a prior court order. From this point of view, the PRCA-1 does not contain the regulation that the Constitution requires for ensuring the mentioned constitutional rights of legal entities. Therefore, in conformity with the first paragraph of Article 48 of the CCA, the Constitutional Court determined the challenged statutory provision to be unconstitutional and imposed on the legislature a time limit for remedying the unconstitutionality (Points 1 and 2 of the operative provisions). With regard to the presented starting points, the statutory regulation must at the same time respect the stated constitutional rights of legal entities<sup>57</sup> and ensure protection of the important constitutional values based on constitutional provisions, especially on those that prohibit the pursuit of commercial activities contrary to the public interest (the second sentence of the second paragraph of Article 74 of the Constitution), that prohibit unfair competition practices and practices which restrict competition in a manner contrary to the law (the third paragraph of Article 74 of the Constitution), and that require the effectiveness of Articles 101 and 102 of the TFEU (the third sentence of Article 3a of the Constitution) to be ensured. The legislature must adopt a complex legal regulation in order to ensure a balance between the mentioned constitutional values. Therefore, in conformity with the second paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA, the Constitutional Court decided that until the established unconstitutionality is remedied, the first sentence of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the PRCA-1 shall continue to apply (Point 3 of the operative provisions). This entails that the Agency has had and still has (until the established unconstitutionality is remedied) a lawful basis for conducting appropriate searches in the PRCA-1, which will also have to be taken into consideration by the competent court when assessing the constitutionality and legality of the Agency's work.

---

57 With regard to the regulation of inspections conducted by the European Commission on the basis of EU law, when the national law in the case of a company's resistance [against the carrying out of an inspection] requires a prior court order (such a situation is allowed by the sixth and the seventh paragraphs of Article 20 of Regulation No. 1/2003), the legislature will have to take into consideration also the distribution of competences between the European Commission and the national court under the eighth paragraph of Article 20 of Regulation No. 1/2003. See also the Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Union in Roquette Frères SA v. Directeur général de la concurrence, de la consommation et de la répression des fraudes.

B – IV

Assessment of Articles 54, 56, 57, 59, and 61 of the PRCA-1

a) Consistency with the Right to Appeal

42. The applicant alleges the inconsistency of Articles 54, 56, 57, 59, and 61 of the PRCA-1 from Chapter 4 of Part V of the PRCA-1 (Judicial Protection) with the right to legal remedies under Article 25 of the Constitution. The applicant is of the opinion that judicial protection can, in conformity with the mentioned right, be attained only in proceedings where the court has full jurisdiction, in which the Administrative Court – the court of first instance – would assess both legal and factual questions, in which the parties would not be precluded from stating new facts and evidence, and in which the right to an appeal would be guaranteed against decisions of the court of first instance.
43. From the right to legal remedies guaranteed by Article 25 of the Constitution (the right to appeal or to any other legal remedy) there proceeds the obligation of the legislature to respect the principle of appellate review, the essential content of which is that the authority of second instance can assess the decision of the authority of first instance from the viewpoint of all questions necessary for deciding on rights and obligations.<sup>58</sup> The “any other” legal remedy in the sense referred to in Article 25 of the Constitution can also be a legal remedy by which the judicial proceedings are initiated, if such corresponds to the stated constitutional requirements.<sup>59</sup>
44. The Constitutional Court has already adopted the position that, under certain conditions,<sup>60</sup> a request to review the decision of a specialised state authority in judicial proceedings can assume the function of a legal remedy.<sup>61</sup> If in judicial proceedings that at the same time function as a legal remedy it is allowed to state all the legal and factual aspects of the case, such a regulation is not inconsistent with Article 25 of the Constitution. The challenged provisions ensure such judicial decision-making in proceedings before the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court can, in the framework of the reasons for the claim, verify without limitations the correctness and completeness of the establishment of the state of the facts as was established by the Agency (the Supreme Court is not bound by this), even though it cannot in such manner correct with finality the established errors and decide on the matter by a judgment. In the judicial protection proceedings under the PRCA-1, the Supreme Court has sufficient authorisations to verify a decision of the Agency from the viewpoint of all issues that are important for deciding on a right or obligation, or with regard to the existence of factual, material, or procedural errors.

58 Order of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-309/94, dated 16 February 1996 (OdlUS V, 21).

59 See Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-219/03 and No. U-I-56/06, dated 15 March 2007 (Official Gazette RS No. 29/07, and OdlUS XVI, 21).

60 If the legal remedy before the court still ensures the fundamental purpose of the appellate review, as is guaranteed by the right under Article 25 of the Constitution – i.e. that the legal remedy is, by its nature, as efficient as an appeal against a decision of the specialised authority would be.

61 Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-219/03.

The Supreme Court then substantively<sup>62</sup> (on the basis of a substantive analysis and assessment) decides on the correctness of the challenged act of the Agency regardless of the fact whether it rejects the action for not being substantiated, abrogates the challenged act and remands the case to the Agency for a renewed procedure, abrogates the challenged act and decides itself on the matter by a judgment, by an order declares the act of the Agency to be null, or, if the Agency remains silent, orders what administrative act it is to issue, or, if the decision has not been served, orders it to serve the decision (see Articles 63 to 65 and 67 to 69 of the AJRAA-1). Therefore, Articles 54, 56, and 59 do not limit the right to appeal and are not inconsistent with it. As the right to a legal remedy is already ensured in the case at issue, the regulation, which does not allow an appeal against a decision by the Supreme Court (Article 61 of the PRCA-1), is also not inconsistent with the stated provision of the Constitution, as it does not guarantee a further right to legal remedy after such has already been invoked and is thus exhausted.<sup>63</sup>

b) Consistency with the Right to Judicial Protection

45. Insofar as the applicant alleges that judicial proceedings should be regulated such that they unfold as so-called proceedings where the court has full jurisdiction, its allegations are to be interpreted as finding fault with the inconsistency with the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution. As long as the decision of the Agency is reviewed from all factual and legal aspects that the legal entity has the right to invoke in proceedings before the Supreme Court, as is explained in the preceding paragraph of the reasoning herein, the statutory regulation does not interfere with the right to judicial protection under the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution. A different position would namely entail that also the statutory regulation of the AJRAA-1, which regulates judicial protection in a comparable manner, is unconstitutional from the viewpoint of the mentioned right. Regulation of the manner of exercise of the right to judicial protection in these instances falls within the legislature's sphere of discretion. If the legislature decides to establish a special state authority that is to conduct appropriate procedures in which constitutional procedural guarantees are respected, and allows judicial protection against its decisions in a manner mutatis mutandis equal to the requirements under the first paragraph of Article 157 of the Constitution, such a regulation would not interfere with the right to judicial protection under the first paragraph of Article 23 of the Constitution.

c) Consistency with the Right to the Equal Protection of Rights

46. The applicant's allegations that in proceedings before the Supreme Court a legal entity cannot state new facts and evidence, entail alleging an inconsistency of Article 57 of the PRCA-1 with Article 22 of the Constitution. In conformity with the latter provision, everyone enjoys the equal protection of rights in proceedings before a court and before other state authorities, local community authorities, and bearers of public authority that decide on his or her rights, duties, or legal interests. This right guarantees, among other things, the right of a party to make a statement and thus the entitlement that the party may state facts and propose evidence to its benefit. This ensures the right to adversarial proceedings, on the basis of which the court must regard the party as an active participant in the proceedings and enable it an effective defence of its rights and thus the possibility to actively influence the decision in matters that interfere with its rights and interests.<sup>64</sup> By Decision No. U-I-219/03, the Constitutional Court already adopted the position that a regulation which limits the right of a party to make a statement (i.e. the right to state facts and to propose evidence to its benefit) to a certain period during the course of the procedure entails an interference with the right under Article 22 of the Constitution. For the same reasons, also Article 57 of the PRCA-1 interferes with this human right of parties to competition procedures.

---

62 Of course, only on the basis of a legal action which fulfils the substantive prerequisites for carrying out the assessment.

63 Compare with paragraph 50 of Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-219/03.

47. Human rights may only be limited in instances determined by the Constitution in order for the rights of others to be protected or for reasons in the public benefit (the third paragraph of Article 15 of the Constitution). If the legislature pursues a constitutionally admissible aim and if the limitation is consistent with the principles of a state governed by the rule of law (Article 2 of the Constitution), i.e. with those principles that prohibit excessive measures of the state (the general principle of proportionality), the limitation of the human right is admissible under the established constitutional case law.<sup>65</sup>
48. The aims of the prescribed measure proceed from the reply of the National Assembly, from the opinion of the Government, and from the opinion of the Agency. The constitutionally admissible aims that are pursued by the challenged limitation of the human right to the equal protection of rights include ensuring free and fair competition, a fast and efficient procedure for exercising supervision over violations of competition, ensuring the efficient execution of the obligations of the Republic of Slovenia under Articles 101 and 102 of the TFEU, and the suspension of the “centre of gravity” of the decision-making of the Agency as a specialised authority on matters regarding the protection of competition. As the regulation under Article 57 of the PRCA-1 can accelerate the judicial control proceedings and at the same time ensure that in proceedings only those facts can be established that had been established or were at least stated by a party in the procedure before the Agency, as the most suitable and specialised authority for that purpose, the preclusion of stating new facts and proposing new evidence at issue is an appropriate measure for attaining the stated aims.
49. In order to attain these aims in the judicial control proceedings over the decisions of the Agency adopted in procedures for the protection of competition, it is necessary to prevent the possibility of stating new facts and proposing new evidence as late as in the judicial proceedings. It is thereby necessary to take into consideration that while assessing the necessity of a certain measure, the Constitutional Court assesses whether the measure is necessary for the desired aim to be attained as successfully and to such a degree as is possible for that measure. Stated differently, another measure (that interferes more mildly or even does not interfere with human rights) can undermine the necessity of a stricter measure only if it is in no manner less efficient than it. In the case at issue, it is important that the introduction of the authorisation of the court to assess, in an individual case, whether the plaintiff had justifiably stated certain facts only as late as in the legal action, obviously cannot in an equally successful manner ensure the pursued aim of fast, efficient, and economical implementation of control over respect for the legal regulation of competition. The need of the Supreme Court to deal with (sometimes) complex admissibility questions regarding the subsequent submission of procedural documentation can namely make judicial proceedings more complicated and could also prolong them. Even more obvious is the necessity of the preclusion of stating new facts and proposing new evidence in order to prevent the separation of the factual basis of the dispute from the state of the facts that was outlined in the procedure before the Agency, which is an authority specialised for the protection of competition.

<sup>64</sup> Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-146/07, dated 13 November 2008 (Official Gazette RS No. 111/08, and OdlUS XVII, 59).

<sup>65</sup> See Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-18/02, dated 24 October 2003 (Official Gazette RS No. 108/03, and OdlUS XII, 86), Paragraph 25 of the reasoning.

50. Whether the weight of the consequences of the examined measure is proportionate to the weight of the pursued aim depends above all on whether the party had sufficient opportunities to make a statement on all the relevant aspects of the case, whereby the party itself must contribute to the acceleration of the procedure. In the procedure before the Agency, the party has sufficient possibilities to suggest appropriate facts by means of which it challenges the accusations of the Agency regarding the existence of prohibited conduct under the PRCA-1, to prove these facts with appropriate motions for evidence, to present its legal positions, and to state its position in general with regard to all legally relevant aspects of the case. If the PRCA-1 does not state otherwise, the GAPA is applicable in the decision-making procedure of the Agency (the second paragraph of Article 15 of the PRCA-1), which in Article 9 states the principle of hearing parties.<sup>66</sup> Also the special regulation under the PRCA-1 guarantees adversarial proceedings.<sup>67</sup> It is especially important that the company against which the search was carried out can submit comments on the report on the search within fifteen days following its service (Article 34 of the PRCA-1) and that 66 The first paragraph of Article 9 of the GAPA determines that before a decision is issued the party must be given the possibility to make a statement on all the facts and circumstances relevant for the decision. The third paragraph of Article 9 of the GAPA determines that the authority cannot base its decision on facts with regard to which all the parties were not given the possibility to make a statement thereon, except in instances determined by law.

---

67 Article 19 of the PRCA-1 determines that in order for the right to a defence to be ensured, the decision of the Agency must not be based on facts and evidence with regard to which the company against which the procedure is being conducted and the party submitting notice of a concentration were not given the possibility to make a statement thereon.

before a decision that is negative for the party is adopted, the party must be provided a summary of the relevant facts, which includes findings on the facts and evidence important for the decision. The party has the right to make a statement, within an appropriate period of time, on the summary of the relevant facts (Article 36 of the PRCA-1). The PRCA-1 even includes certain special procedural possibilities enabling proactivity, whereby the party can prevent the establishment of the existence of restrictive conduct or the adoption of a decision on the prohibition of a concentration due to an inconsistency with competition rules (the commitments referred to in Article 39 of the PRCA-1 and corrective measures under Article 51 of the PRCA-1). Article 57 of the PRCA-1 does not limit the parties when stating facts and evidence to their benefit, to such an extent that the weight of the interference with the right to the equal protection of rights would be disproportionate with the pursued aims. For this reason, it is not inconsistent with Article 22 of the Constitution.

51. With regard to all of the above, Articles 54, 56, 57, 59, and 61 of the PRCA-1 are not inconsistent with the Constitution (Point 4 of the operative provisions).

C

52. The Constitutional Court reached this decision on the basis of Articles 21 and 48 and the second paragraph of Article 40 of the CCA, and the second indent of the second paragraph of Article 46 of the Rules of Procedure of the Constitutional Court (Official Gazette RS Nos. 86/07, 54/10, and 56/11), composed of: Dr Ernest Petrič, President, and Judges Dr Mitja Deisinger, Mag. Marta Klampfer, Dr Etelka Korpič – Horvat, Mag. Miroslav Mozetič, Jasna Pogačar, Dr Jadranka Sovdat, and Jan Zobec. Judge Dr Dunja Jadek Pensa was disqualified from deciding on the case. Points 1 to 3 of the operative provisions were adopted by seven votes against one; Judge Mozetič voted against. Point 4 of the operative provisions was adopted unanimously. Judge Mozetič submitted a partially dissenting opinion. Judge Zobec submitted a concurring opinion.

Dr Ernest Petrič
President

---

PARTIALLY DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE MAG. MIROSLAV MOZETIČ

1. I voted against the decision that the first sentence of the first paragraph of Article 28 of the Prevention of Restriction of Competition Act (hereinafter referred to as the PRCA-1) is inconsistent with the Constitution, which does not entail that I do not agree with some of the positions that are expressed in the reasoning of the Decision. Therefore, in this partly dissenting opinion I wish to explain with what I agree and with what I do not.
2. Briefly, in one sentence and very roughly and generally: I agree that also legal entities that exercise a business activity and that are subject to supervision under the PRCA-1 enjoy a certain degree of the expected privacy determined by Article 35 of the Consitution; however, I do not agree with the position that they also enjoy constitutional protection under Articles 36 and 37 of the Constitution.

3. I entirely agree with the positions expressed in Paragraphs 13 to 16 of the Decision that essentially summarize the hitherto constitutional case law of the Constitutional Court. The Constitution undoubtedly ensures a high level of protection to an individual (to everyone) that enables him or her to “establish a sphere of his or her own intimate functioning in which he or she is allowed to decide him- or herself which interferences with it he or she will allow”. In addition, such requires protection wherever the person “justifiably expects to be left undisturbed” [...] and that “he or she will not be exposed to the eyes of the public”, and requires also “free and uncontrolled communication and thus the protection of the confidentiality of relations into which the individual – when communicating – enters.” Human privacy is a more or less complete whole of his or her behaviours and involvements, feelings, and relations, for which it is characteristic and essential that the person shapes and maintains it alone or alone with those near to him or her with whom he or she lives in intimate community, and that he or she lives in such community with a sense of being protected against intrusion by the public or any other undesired person (Decision of the Constitutional Court No. Up-32/94). The Constitution guarantees the protection of human privacy in all its aspects, especially the aspects of spatial (Article 36), communication (Article 37), and information privacy (Article 38). The constitutional protection of privacy stems from human – the individual’s – dignity and freedom. Also the right to privacy is not an absolute right, but interferences with it are only admissible under strict constitutional and statutory conditions.
4. I agree that it is not possible to refuse a certain degree of privacy also to legal entities, including spatial and communication privacy. Legal entities exercise certain activities that they certainly have an interest in not exercising in the public view and in the state not supervising at any time, arbitrarily, and unjustly. Such an expectation certainly proceeds from the right to free economic initiative (the first paragraph of Article 74 of the Constitution), as well as from the freedom of action (Article 35 of the Constitution). It is clear that legal entities per se do not perform any activity, as they are an artificial form, and that it is natural persons – individuals – that are the ones who lead and manage legal entities and perform their activities. I am of the opinion, though, that it is not possible to acknowledge that also legal entities perform their activities and the tasks that their activities and management comprise, and that it is not possible to attribute rights to them which otherwise individuals enjoy, even though in fact it is individuals who perform the stated activities.<sup>1</sup>
5. As already stated, proceeding from their free economic initiative and freedom of action, legal entities can perform various activities. They are free to do so, but they must not perform activities contrary to the public interest. The purpose of establishing a legal entity under commercial law is not connected to implementing the

---

1 It is not disputable that individuals enjoy, also inside legal entities, a certain degree of protection of privacy under Articles 35 to 38 of the Constitution.

innermost and most intimate – protected from unwanted view – sphere of people's relations, as people establish such relations in families, within their circle of relatives, in groups of friends, i.e. in less formally defined formations. Legal entities are always oriented outwards, towards the society. Due to this outward orientation, their interests and conduct come into collision with the interests of the state and of other legal subjects. The density of the regulation – i.e. the presence of legal rules – with regard to relations into which legal entities enter, is always greater than with regard to informal relations into which people or natural persons enter. While the personal (at least non-business) relations of people are often only limited by the autonomy of their participants, legal entities under commercial law must at all times respect a series of limitations from the fields of labour relations, safety at work, environmental protection, tax and accounting regulations, consumer protection, reporting to supervisory bodies, public control, the fulfilment of subsidy conditions, etc. Due to the strongly expressed public interest in the transparent, correct, and lawful functioning of legal entities of the mentioned type, the need of the state to interfere with their internal sphere is greater and stronger than its need to interfere with natural persons' internal sphere. This is especially true in a modern regulatory state that asserts the public interest in all the operational fields of legal entities, especially in the commercial field. However, the public interest cannot be efficiently enforced and ensured without supervision over legal entities. Such supervision requires the possibility of reasonable access to the information and data that are elements of the internal sphere of legal entities that are subject to supervision by various public law regulators. A legal entity under commercial law is aware and must be aware of these facts since its establishment – the level of its legitimate expectation of privacy, which in my opinion is not entirely comparable [with that of natural persons], is thus significantly lower than that of natural persons.

6. I am therefore of the opinion that due to their nature and purpose of establishment, legal entities under commercial law cannot justifiably expect the same level of protection from interferences with premises and communication as natural persons can. I am convinced that they should be refused protection under Articles 36 and 37 of the Constitution, just as they have already been refused protection under Article 38 of the Constitution (Decision of the Constitutional Court No. U-I-84/03). Therefore, I am of the opinion that the right to privacy can only be recognised to legal entities under commercial law under Article 35 of the Constitution. The legitimate expectation of legal entities under commercial law does not consist of the fact that the state will not supervise, through its bodies, specifically the Agency, whether they act consistently with the public interest and in conformity with the rules. The sole legitimate expectation that legal entities have is that the state will not arbitrarily interfere with their operations. It concerns protection against arbitrary interferences. This means, above all, that authorisations for interferences with the privacy of legal entities must be clearly and specifically prescribed by law, that they have to be related to the purpose of the supervision prescribed by the law, and they must respect the principle of proportionality. Judicial protection must also be ensured.

7. From here onwards I mostly disagree. With regard to my position that [with regard to privacy] legal entities only enjoy the right determined by Article 35 of the Constitution, a test of the constitutionality of Articles 28 and 29 of the PRCA-1 with that Article would have to be carried out.
8. As the Constitutional Court adopted the position that legal entities also enjoy the rights determined by Articles 36 and 37 of the Constitution, due to the high level of protection of such rights granted to individuals, it had to take a position on the question whether these rights are to be attributed to the same extent also to legal entities. In my opinion, the Constitutional Court placed this level too high. On the other hand, however, there arises the question whether entry itself onto the “non-public” part of business premises against the legal entity’s will does not entail an interference with Article 36 of the Constitution. In addition, there also arose a problem regarding the interpretation of the second paragraph of Article 37 of the Constitution, which determines that it is possible to interfere with the privacy of correspondence and other means of communication where such is prescribed by law and only with a court order where such is necessary for the institution or course of criminal proceedings. Until now, theory held that interferences are only possible in criminal proceedings, not in minor offence procedures.<sup>2</sup> The Minor Offences Act (hereinafter referred to as the MOA-1) is also in line with such view, as it does not allow interferences with the privacy of correspondence and other means of communication.<sup>3</sup> By means of interpretation, the Constitutional Court has now broadened the term “criminal proceedings” also to minor offence procedures if what is at issue are minor offences which by their nature and the weight of the sanctions are comparable to criminal offences. Is thereby the path paved to interferences with communication privacy also in minor offence procedures? Probably not entirely, but at least in those cases when what is at issue is the search and seizure of electronic and connected devices and carriers of electronic data (the eighth indent of the first paragraph of Article 67 of the MOA-1) and in procedures in which the state authority seizes entire sources of documentation, including business correspondence. I do agree, however, that such an interpretation was necessary, otherwise it would be impossible for the Agency to collect the most important data necessary for its work. Despite this fact, the question is still open whether the Agency may interfere with communication privacy without having started a minor offence procedure beforehand. The Agency’s primary function is to exercise supervision and then also to carry out the minor offence procedure. However, the supervision procedure is not a minor offence (punitive) procedure.
9. The biggest problem of the PRCA-1 is obviously that it separates the supervisory procedure from the minor offence procedure. For the supervision procedure, the

---

2 G. Klemenčič in: L. Šturm (Ed.), Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije, dopolnitev – A [Commentary on the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia: Supplement to the Commentary – A], Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Ljubljana 2011, p. 547.

3 See Article 67 of the MOA-1.

General Administrative Procedure Act is used subsidiarily, judicial protection is guaranteed before the Supreme Court and the MOA-1 is used for the minor offence procedure. In practice, I believe, it is impossible for these two procedures to be separated. The supervision initiated by the Agency finishes, not always, but as a general rule, with the finding that the supervised [legal] entity acted contrary to Articles 6 or 9 of the PRCA-1. Such finding is followed by supervisory sanctions and a fine. It entails that the supervision procedure finishes, as a general rule, with the minor offence procedure, in which a fine is imposed. With regard to this, the Constitutional Court states: “In the minor offence procedure, the Agency imposes a fine as a repressive measure for general, special-preventive, and retributive purposes (therefore it is a punitive sanction). The amount of the fine that it may impose is high. In minor offence procedures, judicial control, which includes a request for judicial protection before the competent court, under the provisions of the MOA-1, is guaranteed against the decisions of the Agency. It seems that the supervision procedure and the minor offence procedure under the PRCA-1 are formally separated procedures. However, they are both conducted by the same authority (the Agency), they refer to the same state of the facts and evidence acquired in the search procedure (also on the basis of the search order), which is a phase of the supervision procedure, will also regularly and expectedly be used in the minor offence procedure. Moreover, they may even find their way into criminal proceedings. In instances where the Agency, when exercising its authorisations under Article 29 of the PRCA-1, also establishes elements of a minor offence, the search will thus continue in the minor offence procedure – therefore in a punitive procedure – and the evidence acquired therein will possibly even serve as the basis for initiating criminal proceedings. Therefore, it is not that relevant whether the procedure which the applicant halted before having filed the request is in itself a punitive procedure – what is decisive is that the data and evidence acquired in the search conducted on the basis of the authorisations under Article 29 of the PRCA-1 will subsequently serve as the basis of all the stated procedures. Most often this will be the minor offence procedure which is carried out ex officio by the Agency. Therefore, the stated authorisations of the Agency are to be interpreted as authorisations given to a state authority in order to carry out a punitive procedure and, with regard to the possible reuse of the acquired evidence in the criminal proceedings before the competent court, also to conduct criminal proceedings. Efficient execution of the supervision procedure under the PRCA-1 during the search is namely also a necessary condition for successfully imposing sanctions on the legal entity which by violating competition rules committed a minor offence and possibly also a criminal offence.”

10. As soon as the authorisations of the Agency are to be interpreted as authorisations granted to a state authority to carry out a punitive procedure, it is clear that from the moment when the conditions for the initiation of a minor offence procedure are met it is necessary to act in accordance with the MOA-1. Such entails that the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Act apply mutatis mutandis for ordering a house or personal search, for the seizure and inspection of electronic devices and connected devices and carriers of electronic data, and for interferences with the privacy of correspondence and other means of communication (Articles 58 and 67 of the MOA-1).

11. It is the responsibility of the legislature to ensure that supervision under the PRCA-1 will still be effective and to determine how it is to be regulated so that in addition to ensuring a high level of protection of the spatial and communication privacy of legal entities that perform an economic activity it will still be able to attain its aim, which does not lie primarily in imposing sanctions, but in ensuring healthy and fair competition between companies, which as a result above all protects consumers.

Mag. Miroslav Mozetič

---

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE JAN ZOBEC

